I is in English considered both as a vowel and consonant. I vowel has a long sound, as fine, thine, which is usually marked by an e final; or a short sound, as fin, thin. Prefixed to e it makes a diphthong of the same sound with the soft i, or double e, ee; thus field, yield, are spoken as feeld, yeeld. Subjoined to u or e it makes them: long, as, suil, neigh. The sound of i before another i, and at the end of a word, is always expressed by y. J consonant has invariably the same sound with that of g in giant, as jade, jet.

WATER. s. [wæter, Dut. wæter, Sax.] 1. Sir Isaac Newton defines water, when pure, to be a very fluid salt, volatile, and void of all savour or taste; and it seems to consist of small, smooth, hard, porous, spherical particles, of equal diameters, and of equal specific gravities, as Dr. Cheyne observes; and also that there are between them spaces so large, and ranged in such a manner, as to be pervious on all sides. Their smoothness accounts for their sliding easily over one another's surfaces; their sphericity keeps them also from touching one another in more points than one; and by both these their friction in sliding over one another is rendered the least possible. Their hardness accounts for the incompressibility of water.

when it is free from the intermixture of air. The porosity of water is so very great, that there is at least forty times as much space as matter in it; for water is nineteen times specifically lighter than gold, and consequently rarer in the same proportion. Quincy.

At hand, it shines less than at a distance. They are more frequent in places unctuous, marshy, and bounding with reeds. They haunt burying places, places of execution, and dung-hills. They commonly appear in summer, and at the beginning of autumn, at the height of about six feet. They follow those that run, and fly from those that follow. Some that have been caught consist of a shining viscous matter, like the spawn of frogs, not hot, but only shining; so that the matter seems to be phosphorus, raised from putrid plants or carcases by the heat of the sun, which is condensed by the cold of the evening, and then shines.
