the leaves more than one-half crimson, and some of my specimens are almost as if they were all red. This arrangement, however, though beautifully coloured, is devoid of flowers. For myself I don't know how much I care, I only like to have it three or four petaled flowers, and I think if they are absent the coloured leaves rather aggravate me. My own Rosas Rubina and Rubus nigrolineolatus are always described as having white flowers set in it just to shine there like jewels. It is for this sole reason that the telling glowing colours of the leaves are noticed above almost all others. B. Rubus nigrolineolatus, I imagine anything more beautiful than the carved leaves of a Chinese screen.
