Darwin meets God at church

Faithful can accept both, pastors say

In the first pew of a Detroit church this month, a 2-year-old boy is watching a Sunday school lesson on video. He’s spelled his name with a six-dot Braille alphabet.

"The boy is blind," said Rev. Hackett, pastor of Trinity United Methodist Church. "He’s learning to spell his name in Braille."

The Rev. Hackett is a member of the church’s Bible study group. He and his wife, also a member of the group, have been working to help the blind community in Detroit.

The Rev. Hackett said he has been working with the blind community in Detroit for about a year.

"The first thing we did was to talk to the Rev. Hackett," said Ms. Anderson, who is also a member of the group.

"We started out with small talks and then we got to know each other better," she said.

The Rev. Hackett said he has been working with the blind community in Detroit for about a year.

"The first thing we did was to talk to the Rev. Hackett," said Ms. Anderson, who is also a member of the group.

"We started out with small talks and then we got to know each other better," she said.

The Rev. Hackett said he has been working with the blind community in Detroit for about a year.

"The first thing we did was to talk to the Rev. Hackett," said Ms. Anderson, who is also a member of the group. "We started out with small talks and then we got to know each other better," she said.