PRACTICAL · PIETY;

OR,

THE INFLUENCE

OF THE

RELIGION OF THE HEART

ON THE

CONDUCT OF THE LIFE.

By HANNAH MORE.

The fear of God begins with the Heart, and purifies and rectifies it; and from the Heart, thus rectified, grows a conformity in the Life, the Words, and the Actions.

Sir Matthew Hale's Contemplations.

THE SIXTH EDITION,

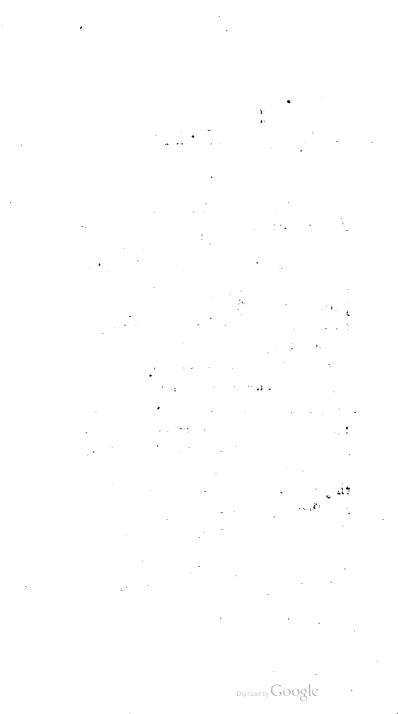

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR T. CADELL AND W. DAVIES, IN THE STRAND.

1811.

AN eminent Professor of our own time modefly declared that he taught chemistry in order that he might learn it. The writer of the following pages might, with far more justice, offer a fimilar declaration, as an apology for fo repeatedly treating on the important topics of religion and morals.

Abashed by the equitable precept, Let these teach others who themselves excelfhe is aware, how fairly she is putting it in the power of the reader, to ask, in the searching words of an eminent old Prelate, "They that speak thus and advise thus, do they do thus?" She can defend herself in no other way, than by adopting for a reply the words of the same venerable Divine, which immediately follow — "O that it were not too true. Yet although it be but A 3 little little that is attained, the very aim is right, and fomething there is that is done by it. It is better to have fuch thoughts and defires, than altogether to give them up; and the very defire, if it be ferious and fincere, may fo much change the habitude of the foul and life, that it is not to be defpifed."

The world does not require fo much to be informed as reminded. A remembrancer may be almost as useful as an instructor; if his office be more humble, it is fcarcely lefs neceffary. The man whole employment it was, flatedly to proclaim in the ear of Philip, REMEMBER THAT THOUART MORTAL, had his plain admonition been allowed to make its due impression, might have produced a more falutary effect on the royal Usurper, than the impaffioned orations of his immortal affailant ----

whole refitles eloquence

Shook th' arfenal, and fulmined over Greece, " To Macedon and Artaxerxes' throne,

While the orator boldly ftrove to check the ambition, and arreft the injustice of the King,

vi

King, the fimple herald barely reminded him, how fhort would be the reign of injustice, how inevitable and how near was the final period of ambition. Let it be remembered to the credit of the Monarch, that while the thunders of the Politician were intolerable, the Monitor was of his own appointment.

This flight fketch, for it pretends to no higher name, aims only at being plain and practical. Contending folely for those indispensable points, which, by involving prefent duty, involve future happines, the writer has avoided, as far as Christian fincerity permits, all controverted topics; has fhunned whatever might lead to disputation rather than to profit.

We live in an age, when, as Mr. Pope obferved of that in which he wrote, it is criminal to be moderate. Would it could not be faid that Religion has her parties as well as Politics! Those who endeavour to fteer clear of all extremes in either, are in danger of being reprobated by both It is A 4 rather rather a hardfhip for perfons, who having confidered it as a Christian duty to cultivate a fpirit of moderation in thinking, and of candor in judging, that, when these dispofitions are brought into action, they frequently incur a harsher censure, than the errors which it was their chief aim to avoid.

٧ñ

Perhaps, therefore, to that human wildom whose leading object is human applause, it might answer best to be exclusively attached to some one party. On the protection of that party at least, it might in that case reckon; and it would then have the diflike of the opposite class alone to contend against; while those who cannot go all lengths with either, can hardly escape the disapprobation of both.

To apply the remark to the prefent cafe. — The Author is apprehensive that she may be at once censured by opposite classes of readers as being too strict, and too relaxed, — too much attached to opinions, and too indifferent about them; — as having narrowed the broad field of Christianity by labouring bouring to establish its peculiar doctrines; as having broken down its inclosures by not confining herfelf to doctrines exclusively; — as having confidered morality of too little importance, as having raifed it to an undue elevation; — as having made practice every thing; — as having made it nothing.

While a Catholic fpirit is accufed of being latitudinarian in one party, it really is fo in another. In one, it exhibits the character of Christianity on her own grand but correct fcale; in the other it is the offspring of that indifference, which, confidering all opinions as of nearly the fame value, indemnifies itfelf for tolerating all, by not attaching itfelf to any; which, establishing a felf-complacent notion of general benevolence, with a view to difcredit the narrow fpirit of Christianity, and adopting a display of that cheap material, liberal featiment, as opposed to religious strictness, facrifices true piety to false candor. Christianity may be faid to fuffer between two criminals, but it is difficult to determine by which the fuffers most :---whether by what uncharitable uncharitable bigotry which difguifes her divine character, and fpeculatively adoptsthe faggot and the flames of inquifitorial intolerance; or by that indifcriminate candor, that conceding flacknefs, which, by ftripping her of her appropriate attributes, reduces her to fomething fcarcely worth contending for; to fomething which, inflead of making her the religion of Christ, generalizes her into any religion which may chufe to adopt her.-The one difforts her lovely lineaments into caricature, and throws her graceful figure into gloomy shadow; the other, by daubing her over with colours not her own, renders her form indiffinct, and obliterates her features. In the first instance, the excites little affection; in the latter, the is not recognized.

The Writer has endeavoured to address herfelf as a Chriftian who must die soon, to Christians who must die certainly. She trusts that she shall not be accused of erecting herself into a censor, but be considered as one who writes with a real confcious field as a construction of the source of t that she is far from having reached the attainments the fuggests; with a heartfelt conviction of the danger of holding out a standard. too likely to difcredit her own practice. She writes not with the affumption of fuperiority, but with a deep practical fense of the infirmities against which the has prefumed to caution others. She withes to be underflood as fpeaking the language of fympathy, rather than of dictation, of feeling rather than of document. So far from fancying herfelf exempt from the evils on which the has animadverted, her very feeling of those evils has affifted her in their delineation. Thus this interior fentiment of her own deficiencies, which might be urged as a difqualification, has, the trufts, enabled her to point out dangers to others .- If the patient cannot lay down rules for the cure of a reigning disease, much less effect the cure ; yet from the fymptoms common to the fame malady, he who labours under it may fuggest the necessity of attending to it. He may

xi

may treat the cafe feelingly, if not fcientifically. He may fubfitute experience, in default of fkill: he may infift on the value of the remedy he has neglected, as well as recommend that from which he has found benefit.

The fubjects confidered in these Volumes have been animadverted on, have been in a manner exhausted, by perfons before whose names the Author bows down with the deepest humility; by able professional instructors, by piety adorned with all the graces of style, and invigorated with all the powers of argument.

Why then, it may be afked, multiply books which may rather incumber the Reader than ftrengthen the caufe ?— "That the old is better" cannot be difputed. But is not the being "old" fometimes a reafon why the being "better" is not regarded ? Novelty itfelf is an attraction which but too often fuperfedes merit. A flighter drapery, if it be a new one, may excite a degree of attention attention to an object, not paid to it when clad in a richer garb to which the eye has been accuftomed.

XÏ

The Author may begin to ask with one of her earlieft and most enlightened friends* ----"Where is the world into which we were born?" Death has broken most of those connexions which made the honour and the nappinels of her youthful days. Fresh links bowever have continued to attach her to fociety. She is fingularly happy in the affectionate regard of a great number of amiable. young persons, who may peruse, with additional attention, fentiments which come recommended to them by the warmth of their own attachment, more than by any claim of merit in the writer. Is there not fomething in perfonal knowledge, fomething in the feelings of endeared acquaintance, which, by that hidden affociation, whence fo much of our undefined pleasure is derived, if it does not impart new force to old truths, may excite a new interest in confidering truths

• Dr. Johnson.

which

xiii -

which are known? Her concern for thefe engaging perfons extends beyond the tranfient period of prefent intercourfe. It would fhed a ray of brightnefs on her parting hour, if fhe could hope that any caution here held out, any principle here fuggefted, any habit here recommended, might be of ufe to any one of them, when the hand which now guides the pen, can be no longer exerted in their fervice. This would be remembering their friend in a way which would evince the higheft affection in them, which would confer the trueft honour on herfelf.

Digitized by Google

Barley Wood, March 1ft, 1811.

xiv

¢

CONTENTS

ØF

THE FIRST VOLUME.

CHAP. L

Christianity an Internal Principle PAGE 1 CHAP. II. Christianity a Practical Principle - 27 CHAP. III. Mistakes in Religion - - -52 CHAP. IV. Periodical Religion -8r CHAP. V. Prayer -102 CHAP. VI. Cultivation of a Devotional Spirit - 130

CONTENTS.

CHAP, VIL

The Love of God -PAGE 150 CHAP. VIII. The Hand of God to be acknowledged in the daily Circumstances of Life 173 CHAP. IX. Christianity universal in its Requisitions 193 CHAP. X. Christian Holines 216 CHAP. XI. On the comparatively fmall Faults and Virtues . 233 CHAP. XII. Self-Examination 262

PRAC.

PRACTICAL PIETY.

CHAP. I.

Christianity an Internal Principle.

CHRISTIANITY bears all the marks of a divine original. It came down from heaven, and its gracious purpofe is to carry us up thither. Its Author is God. It was forefold from the beginning by prophecies which grew clearer and brighter as they approached the period of their accomplishment. It was confirmed by miracles which continued till the religion they illustrated was established. It was ratified by the blood of its Author. Its doctrines are pure, fublime, confistent. Its precepts just and holy. Its worfhip is fpiritual. Its fervice reasonable, and rendered practicable by the offers of divine a d to It is fanctioned by the human weaknefs. promife VOL. 1.

CHRISTIANITY

promife of eternal happinels to the faithful, and the threat of everlasting mifery to the disobedient. It had no collusion with power, for power fought to crush it. It could not be in any league with the world, for it fet out by declaring itself the enemy of the world. It reprobated its maxims, it shewed the vanity of its glories, the danger of its riches, the emptinels of its pleafures.

Christianity, though the most perfect rule of life that ever was devifed, is far from being barely a rule of life. A religion confifting of a mere code of laws might have fufficed for man in a state of innocence. But man who has broken these laws cannot be faved by a rule which he has violated. What confolation could he find in the perufal of statutes, every one of which, bringing a fresh conviction of his guilt, brings a fresh affurance of his condemnation. The chief object of the Gofpel is not to furnish rules for the prefervation of innocence, but to hold out the means of falvation to the guilty. It does not proceed upon a fuppofition, but a fact :

a fact; not upon what might have fuited man in a flate of purity, but upon what is fuitable to him in the exigencies of his fallen flate.

This religion does not confift in an external conformity to practices which, though right in themfelves, may be adopted from human motives, and to anfwer fecular purpofes. It is not a religion of forms, and modes, and decencies. It is being tranfformed into the image of God. It is being like-minded with Chrift. It is confidering him as our fanctification, as well as our redemption. It is endeavouring to live to him here that we may live with him hereafter. It is defiring earneftly to furrender our will to his, our heart to the conduct of his fpirit, our life to the guidance of his word.

The change in the human heart, which the Scriptures declare to be neceffary, they represent to be not fo much an old principle improved as a new one created; not educed out of the former B 2 character.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTIANITY

character, but infufed into the new one. This change is there expressed in great varieties of language, and under different figures of speech. Its being so frequently described, or figuratively intimated in almost every part of the volume of inspiration, entitles the doctrine itself to reverence, and ought to shield from obloquy the obnoxious terms in which it is sometimes conveyed.

The facred writings frequently point out the analogy between natural and fpiritual things. The fame fpirit which in the creation of the world moved upon the face of the waters, operates on the human character to produce a new heart and a new life. Bv this operation the affections and faculties of the man receive a new impulse — his dark understanding is illuminated, his rebellious. will is fubdued, his irregular defires are rectified; his judgment is informed, his imagination is chaftifed, his inclinations are fanctified; his hopes and fears are directed to their true and adequate end. Heaven becomes the object of his hopes, an eternal feparation feparation from God the object of his fears. His love of the world is transmuted into the love of God. The lower faculties are prefied into the new fervice. The fenfes have a higher direction. The whole internal frame and conftitution receive a nobler bent; the intents and purposes of the mind a fublimer aim; his afpirations a loftier flight; his vacillating defires find a fixed object; his vagrant purpofes a fettled home; his difappointed heart a certain refuge. That heart no longer the worfhipper of the world. is ftruggling to become its conqueror. Our bleffed Redeemer, in overcoming the world, bequeathed us his command to overcome it alfo; but as he did not give the command without the example, fo he did not give the example without the offer of a power to obey the command.

Genuine religion demands not merely an external profession of our allegiance to God, but an inward devotedness of ourfelves to his fervice. It is not a recognition, but a dedication. It puts the Christian into a new state of things, a new condition of being. Is raifes him above the world while he lives in it. It difperfes the illufions of fenfe, by opening his eyes to realities in the place of those shadows which he has been purfuing. It prefents this world as a fcene whofe original beauty Sin has darkened and difordered, Man as a helplefs and dependent creature, Jefus Chrift as the repairer of all the evils which fin has caufed, and as our reftorer to holinefs and happinefs. Any religion short of this, any, at least, which has not this for its end and object, is not that religion which the Gofpel has prefented to us, which our Redeemer came down on earth to teach us by his precepts, to illustrate by his example, to confirm by his death, and to confummate by his refurrection.

вз

CHRISTIANITY

If Christianity do not always produce these happy effects to the extent here represented, it has always a tendency to produce them. If we do not see the progress to be such as the Gospel annexes to the transforming power of true religion, it is not owing to any defect in

Digitized by Google

AN INTERNAL PRINCIPLE.

7

in the principle, but to the remains of fin in the heart; to the imperfectly fubdued corruptions of the Christian. Those who are very fincere are still very imperfect. They evidence their fincerity by acknowledging the lowness of their attainments, by lamenting the remainder of their corruptions. Many an humble Christian whom the world reproaches with being extravagant in his zeal, whom it ridicules for being enthufiaftic in his aims, and rigid in his practice, is inwardly mourning on the very contrary ground. He would bear their cenfure more cheerfully, but that he feels his danger lies in the opposite direction. He is fecretly abafing himfelf before his Maker for not carrying far enough that principle which he is accufed of carrying too far. The fault which others find in him is excels. The fault he finds in himfelf is deficiency. Hę is, alas! too commonly right. His enemies fpeak of him as they hear. He judges of himfelf as he feels. But, though humbled to the dust by the deep sense of his own unwor-

B4

Digitized by Google

unworthinefs, he is "ftrong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." "He has," fays the venerable Hooker, "a Shepherd full of kindnefs, full of care, and full of power." His prayer is not for reward but pardon. His plea is not merit but mercy; but then it is mercy made fure to him by the promife of the Almighty to penitent believers.

The miltake of many in religion appears to be, that they do not begin with the beginning. They do not lay their foundation in the perfuasion that man is by nature in a ftate of alienation from God. They confider him rather as an imperfect than as a fallen creature. They allow that he requires to be improved, but deny that he requires a thorough renovation of heart.

But genuine Christianity can never be grafted on any other stock than the apostacy of man. The defign to re-instate beings who have not fallen; to propose a restoration without a previous loss, a cure where there was no radical disease, is altogether an inconincongruity which would feem too palpable to require confutation, did we not fo frequently fee the doctrine of redemption maintained by thofe who deny that man was in a ftate to require fuch a redemption. But would Chrift have been fent " to preach deliverance to the captive," if there had been no captivity; and " the opening of the prifon to them that were bound," had there been no prifon, had men been in no bondage ?

AN INTERNAL PRINCIPLE.

We are aware that many confider the doctrine in queftion as a bold charge againft our Creator. But may we not venture to afk, Is it not a bolder charge againft God's goodnefs to prefume that he had made beings originally wicked, and againft God's veracity to believe, that having made fuch beings he pronounced them "good?" Is not that doctrine more reafonable which is expressed or implied in every part of Scripture, that the moral corruption of our first parent has been entailed on his whole posterity; that from this corruption B ζ they

they are no more exempt than from natural death?

We must not, however, think fallely of our nature; we must humble but not degrade it. Our original brightness is obfcured but not extinguished. If we confider ourfelves in our natural state, our estimation cannot be too low; when we reflect at what a price we have been bought, we can hardly over-rate ourfelves in the view of immortality.

If, indeed, the Almighty had left us to the confequences of our natural flate, we might, with more colour of reafon, have mutinied againft his juffice. But when we fee how gracioufly he has turned our very lapfe into an occafion of improving our condition; how from this evil he was pleafed to advance us to a greater good than we had loft; how that life which was forfeited may be reftored; how, by grafting the redemption of man on the very circumflance of his fall, he has raifed him to the capacity of a higher condition than that which he has forfeited,

to

Digitized by Google

feited, and to a happinels fuperior to that from which he fell — What an imprefiion does this give us of the immeafurable wifdom and goodnels of God, of the unlearchable riches of Chrift !

The religion which it is the object of these pages to recommend, has been fometimes mifunderftood, and not feldom mifreprefented. It has been defcribed as an unproductive theory, and ridiculed as a fanciful extravagance. For the fake of diffinction it is here called, The Religion of the heart. There it fubfifts as the fountain of Spiritual life; thence it fends forth, as from the central feat of its existence, fupplies of life and warmth through the whole frame; there is the foul of virtue, there is the vital principle which animates the whole being of a Chriftian.

This religion has been the fupport and confolation of the pious believer in all ages of the Church. That it has been perverted both by the cloyftered and the un-cloyftered myftic, not merely to promote ab-B 6 ftraction ftraction of mind, but inactivity of life, makes nothing against the principle itself. What doctrine of the New Testament has not been made to speak the language of its injudicious advocate, and turned into arms against some other doctrine which it was never meant to oppose?

· Digitized by Google

CHRISTIANITY

But if it has been carried to a blameable excess by the pious error of holy men, it has also been adopted by the less innocent fanatic, and abused to the most pernicious purposes. His extravagance has furnished to the enemies of internal religion, arguments, or rather invectives, against the found and fober exercises of genuine piety. They seize every occasion to represent it as if it were criminal, as the foe of morality; ridiculous, as the infallible test of an unfound mind; mischievous, as hostile to active virtue, and destructive as the bane of public utility.

But if these charges be really well founded, then were the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church — then were Horne, and Porteus, Porteus, and Beveridge ; then were Hooker, and Taylor, and Herbert; Hopkins, Leighton, and Usher; Howe, Doddridge, and Baxter; Ridley, Jewell, and Hooper; --then were Chryfoftome, and Augustine, the Reformers and the Fathers: then were the goodly fellowship of the Prophets, then were the noble army of Martyrs, then were the glorious company of the Apostles, then was the Difciple whom Jefus loved, then was Jefus himfelf - I fhudder at the implication -dry fpeculatifts, frantic enthuliafts, enemies to virtue, and fubverters of the public weal.

Those who difbelieve, or deride, or reject this inward religion, are much to be compaffionated. Their belief that no fuch principle exists, will, it is to be feared, effectually prevent its existing in themselves, at least, while they make their own flate the measure. of their general judgment. Not being fenfible of the required dispositions, in their own hearts, they establish this as a proof of its its impoffibility in all cafes. This perfuafion, as long as they maintain it, will affuredly exclude the reception of divine truth. What they affert can be true in no cafe, cannot be true in their own. Their hearts will be barred against any influence in the power of which they do not believe. They will not defire it; they will not pray for it, except in the Liturgy, where it is the decided language : They will not addict themfelves to those pious exercises to which it invites them, exercifes which it ever loves and cherifhes. Thus they expect the end, but avoid the way which leads to it; they indulge the hope of glory, while they neglect or pervert the means of grace. But let not the formal religionist, who has, probably, never fought, and, therefore, never obtained, any fenfe of the fpiritual mercies of God, conclude that there is, therefore, no fuch ftate. His having no conception of it is no more proof that no fuch flate exifts, than it is a proof that the cheering beams of a genial genial climate have no existence because the inhabitants of the frozen zone have never felt them.

CHRISTIANITY

Where our own heart and experience do not illustrate these truths practically, so as to afford us fome evidence of their reality, let ' us examine our minds, and faithfully follow up our convictions; let us enquire whether God has really been wanting in the accomplifhment of his promifes, or whether we have not been fadly deficient in yielding to those fuggestions of confcience which are the motions of his fpirit? Whether we have not neglected to implore the aids of that Spirit; whether we have not, in various inftances, refifted them ? Let us afk ourfelves - have we looked up to our heavenly father with humble dependence for the fupplies of his grace? or have we prayed for thefe bleffings only as a form, and having acquitted ourfelves of the form, do we continue to live as if we had not fo prayed ! Having repeatedly implored his direction, do we endeavour to fubmit ourfelves to its guidance?

guidance? Having prayed that his will may be done, do we never ftoutly fet up our own will in contradiction to his?

If, then, we receive not the promifed fupport and comfort, the failure muft reft fomewhere. It lies between him who has promifed, and him to whom the promife is made. There is no other alternative; would it not be blafphemy to transfer the failure to God? Let us not, then, reft till we have cleared up the difficulty. The fpirits fink, and the faith fails, if, after a continued round of reading and prayer; after having, for years, conformed to the letter of the command; after having fcrupuloufly brought in our tale of outward duties; we find ourfelves juft where we were at fetting out.

We complain justly of our own weakness, and truly plead our inability as a reason why we cannot ferve God as we ought. This infirmity, its nature, and its measure, God knows far more exactly than we know it; yet he knows that, with the help which he

AN INTERNAL PRINCIPLE.

he offers us, we can both love and obey him, or he never would have made it our qualification for heaven. He never would have faid, " give me thy heart" — " feek ye my face" — " add to your faith virtue" — " have a right heart and a right fpirit" — " ftrengthen the things that remain" — " ye will not come to me that ye might have life" — had not all thefe precepts a definite meaning, had not all thefe been practicable duties.

Can we fuppofe that the omnifcient God would have given thefe unqualified commands to powerlefs, incapable, unimprefible beings? Can we fuppofe that he would command paralyzed creatures to walk, and then condemn them for not being able to move? He knows, it is true, our natural impotence, but he knows, becaufe he confers, our fuperinduced ftrength. There is fcarcely a command in the whole Scripture which has not either immediately, or in fome other part, a correfponding prayer, and a correfponding promife. If it fays in one place " get thee a new a new heart" — it fays in another "a new heart will I give thee;" and in a third "make me a clean heart." For it is worth observing that a diligent enquirer may trace every where this threefold union. If God commands by Saint Paul " let not fin reign in your mortal body," he promises by the fame Apostle, "Sin shall not have dominion over you;" — while, to complete the tripartite agreement, he makes David proy that his "fins may not have dominion over him."

The Saints of old, fo far from fetting up on the flock of their own independent virtue, feem to have had no idea of any light but what was imparted, of any ftrength but what was communicated to them from above. — Hear their importunate petitions! — "O fend forth thy light and thy truth!" — Mark their grateful declarations! — "The Lord is my ftrength and my falvation!" — Obferve their cordial acknowledgements! "Blefs the Lord, O my foul, and all that is within me blefs his holy name."

Though

18

Digitized by Google

AN INTERNAL PRINCIPLE.

Though we must be careful not to mistake for the divine Agency those impulses which pretend to operate independently of external revelation; which have little reference to it : which fet themfelves above it; it is, however, that powerful agency which fanctifies all means, renders all external revelation effectual. - Notwithstanding that all the truths of religion, all the doctrines of falvation, are contained in the Holy Scriptures, thefe very Scriptures require the influence of that Spirit which dictated them to produce an influential faith. This Spirit, by enlightening the mind, converts the rational perfuafion, brings the intellectual conviction of divine truth conveyed in the New Teftament, into an operative principle. A man, from reading, examining, and enquiring, may attain to fuch a reafonable affurance of the truth of revelation as will remove all doubts from his own mind, and even enable him to refute the objections of others; but this bare intellectual faith alone will not operate againft his corrupt affections, will not cure his befetting fetting fin, will not conquer his rebellious will, and may not therefore be an efficacious principle. A mere hiftorical faith, the mere evidence of facts with the foundeft reafonings and deductions from them, may not be that faith which will fill him with all joy and peace in believing.

An habitual reference to that Spirit which animates the real Christian is fo far from excluding, that it ftrengthens the truth of revelation, but never contradicts it. The word of God is always in unifon with his fpirit. His fpirit is never in opposition to Indeed that this influence is not his word. an imaginary thing is confirmed by the whole tenor of Scripture. We are aware that we are treading on dangerous, becaufe difputed ground; for among the fashionable curtailments of Scripture doctrines, there is not one truth which has been lopped from the modern creed with a more unsparing hand; not one, the defence of which excites more fuspicion against its advocates. But if it had been a mere phantom, should we with such jealous.

Digitized by Google

AN INTERNAL PRINCIPLE.

Jealous'iteration, have been cautioned against neglecting or oppofing it ? If the holy Spirit could not be " grieved," might not be " quenched," were not likely to be " refifted;" that very spirit which proclaimed the prohibitions would never have faid " grieve not," " quench not," " refift not." The Bible never warns us against imaginary evil, nor courts us to imaginary good. If then we refuse to yield to its guidance, if we reject its directions, if we fubmit not to its gentle perfuafions, for fuch they are, and not arbitrary compulsions, we fhall never attain to that peace and liberty which are the privilege, the promifed reward of fincere Christians.

In speaking of that peace which paffeth understanding, we allude not to those illuminations and raptures, which, if God has in some instances bestowed them, he has no where pledged himself to bestow: but of that rational yet elevated hope which flows from an affured persuasion of the paternal love of our heavenly Father; of that "fecret of

of the Lord," which he himfelf has affured us, " is with them that fear him;" of that life and power of religion which are the privilege of thole " who abide under the fhadow of the Almighty;" of thole who " know in whom they have believed;" of thole " who walk not after the flefh but after the fpirit;" of thole " who endure as feeing him who is invifible."

Some people reafon as if it were the object of divine influences to blind and not to enlighten, to miflead and not to guide, to create confusion not regularity, eccentricity not order; while the opposite class actually convert this facred agency into a diforderly principle. It is easy to talk of religion without this divine aid, but impossible to produce it. In the opposite case, it is not difficult to inflame the imagination, but it is very difficult to reform the heart.

Many faults may be committed where there is nevertheless a fincere defire to please God. Many infirmities are confistent with a cordial love of our Redeemer. Faith may be fincere where it is not ftrong. But he who can confcientioufly fay that he feeks the favour of God above every earthly good; that he delights in his fervice incomparably more than in any other gratification; that to obey him here and to enjoy his prefence hereafter is the prevailing defire of his heart; that his chief forrow is that he loves him no more and ferves him no better, fuch a man requires no evidence that his heart is changed, and his fins forgiven.

3

may

23

For the happinels of a Christian does not confift in mere feelings which may deceive, nor in frames which can only be occasional; but in a fettled, calm conviction that 'God and eternal things have the predominance in his heart; in a clear perception that they have, though with much alloy of infirmity, the fupreme, if not undifturbed posseficient of his mind; in an experimental perfusion that his chief remaining forrow is, that he does not furrender himfelf with fo complete an acquiefcence as he ought to his convictions. These abatements, though fufficient to keep us us humble, are not powerful enough to make us unhappy.

The true meafure then to be taken of our ftate is from a perceptible change in our defires, taftes, and pleafures; from a fenfe of progrefs, however fmall, in holinefs of heart and life. This feems to be the fafeft rule of judging, for if mere feelings were allowed to be the criterion, the prefumptuous would be inflated with fpiritual pride from the perfuafion of enjoying them; while the humble, from their very humility, might be as unreafonably deprefied at wanting fuch evidences.

The recognition of this divine aid, then, involves no prefumption, raifes no illufion, caufes no inflation, it is fober in its principle and rational in its exercife. In eftablishing the law of God it does not reverfe the law of Nature, for it leaves us in full poffession of those natural faculties which it improves and fanctifies; and fo far from inflaming the imagination, its proper tendency is to fubdue and regulate it.

A fe-

A fecurity which outruns our attainments is a most dangerous state, yet it is a state most unwifely coveted. The probable way to be fafe hereafter, is not to be prefumptuous now. If God gracioufly vouchfafe us inward confolation, it is only to animate us to farther progrefs. It is given us for support in our way, and not for a fettled maintenance in our prefent condition. If the promifes are our aliment, the commandments are our work; and a temperate Christian ought to defire nourishment only in order to carry him through his bufinefs. If he fo fupinely reft on the one as to grow fenfual and indolent, he might become not only unwilling, but incapacitated for the performance of the other. We must not expect to live upon cordials, which only ferve to inflame without ftrengthening. Even without thefe fupports, which we are» more ready to defire than to put ourfelves in the way to obtain, there is an inward peace in an humble truft in God, and in a fimple reliance on his word ; there is a repole

VOL. I.

С

Digitized by Google

pofe of fpirit, a freedom from folicitude in a lowly confidence in him, for which the world has nothing to give in exchange.

On the whole, then, the flate which we have been defcribing is not the dream of the Enthufiast ; it is not the reverse of the Visionary, who renounces prescribed duties for fanciful fpeculations, and embraces shadows for realities; but it is that fober earnest of Heaven, that reasonable anticipation of eternal felicity, which God is gracioufly pleafed to grant, not partially, nor arbitrarily, but to all who diligently feek his face, to all to whom his fervice is freedom, his will a law, his word a delight, his Spirit a guide; to all who love him unfeignedly, to all who devote themfelves to him unrefervedly, to all who with deep felf-abafement, yet with filial confidence, proftrate themfelves at the foot of his Throne, faying, Lord, lift thou up the life of thy countenance upon us, and we fhall be fafe.

[27]

CHAP. II.

Christianity a Practical Principle.

IF God be the Author of our fpiritual life, the root from which we derive the vital principle, with daily fupplies to maintain this vitality; then the best evidence we can give that we have received fomething of this principle, is an unreferved dedication of ourfelves to the actual promotion of his glory. No man ought to flatter himfelf that he is in the favour of God, whole life is not confecrated to the fervice of God. Will it not be the only unequivocal proof of fuch a confectation, that he be more zealous of good works than those who, difallowing the principle on which he performs " them, do not even pretend to be actuated by any fuch motive?

The finest theory never yet carried any man to Heaven. A Religion of notions c 2 which which occupies the mind, without filling the heart, may obstruct, but cannot advance the falvation of men. If these notions are false, they are most pernicious; if true and not operative, they aggravate guilt; if unimportant though not unjust, they occupy the place which belongs to nobler objects, and fink the mind below its proper level; subflituting the things which only ought not to be left undone, in the place of those which ought to be done; and causing the grand effentials not to be done at all. Such a religion is not that which Christ came to teach mankind.

All the doctrines of the Gospel are practical principles. The word of God was not written, the Son of God was not incarnate, the Spirit of God was not given, only that Christians might obtain right views, and posses just notions. Religion is fomething more than mere correctness of intellect, justness of conception, and exactness of judgment. It is a life-giving principle. It must be infused into the habit, as well as govern in in the understanding; it must regulate the will as well as direct the creed. It must not only caft the opinions into a right frame, but the heart into a new mould. It is a transforming as well as a penetrating principle. It changes the taftes, gives activity to the inclinations, and, together with a new heart, produces a new life.

28

Digitized by Google

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

Christianity enjoins the fame temper, the fame fpirit, the fame difpofitions on all its real profeffors. The act, the performance, must depend on circumstances which do not depend on us. The power of doing good is withheld from many, from whom, however, the reward will not be withheld. If the external act conflituted the whole value of Christian virtue, then must the Author of all good be himfelf the Author of injustice, by putting it out of the power of multitudes to fulfil his own commands. In principles, in tempers, in fervent defires, in holy endeavours, confifts the very effence of Christian duty.

Nor must we fondly attach ourselves to the practice of fome particular virtue, or value C 3

CHRISTIANITY

value ourfelves exclusively on fome favourite quality; nor must we wrap ourfelves up in the performance of fome individual actions as if they formed the fum of Christian duty. But we must embrace the whole law of God in all its afpects, bearings, and relations. We must bring no fancies, no partialities, no prejudices, no exclusive choice or rejection, into our religion, but take it as we find it, and obey it as we receive it, as it is exhibited in the Bible without addition, curtailment, or adulteration.

Nor must we pronounce on a character by a fingle action really bad, or apparently good; if fo, Peter's denial would render him the object of our execration, while we should have judged favourably of the prudent economy of Judas. The catastrophe of the latter, who does not know? while the other became a glorious martyr to that Master whom, in a moment of infirmity, he had denied.

A Piety altogether fpiritual, difconnected with all outward circumftances; a religion of pure meditation, and abstracted devotion, was was not made for fo compound, fo imperfect a creature as man. There have, indeed, been a few fublime fpirits, not " touch'd but rap't," who, totally cut off from the world, feem almost to have literally foared above this terrene region; who almost appear to have ftolen the fire of the Seraphim, and to have had no business on earth, but to keep alive the celestial flame. They would, however, have approximated more nearly to the example of their divine Master, the great standard and only perfect model, had they combined a more diligent discharge of the active duties and beneficences of life with their high devotional attainments.

But while we are in little danger of imitating, let us not too harfhly cenfure the pious error of these fublimated spirits. Their number is small. Their example is not catching. Their etherial fire is not likely, by spreading, to inflame the world. The world will take due care not to come in contact with it, while its distant light and C 4 warmth warmth may cafl, accidentally, a not unuleful ray on the cold-hearted and the worldly.

But from this fmall number of refined but inoperative beings, we do not intend to draw our notions of practical piety. God did not make a religion for these few exceptions to the general state of the world, but for the world at large; for beings active, bufy, reftlefs; whofe activity he, by his word, diverts into its proper channels; whole buly fpirit is there directed to the common good; whofe reftleffnefs, indicating the unfatisfactorinefs of all they find on earth, he points to a higher defination. Were total feclusion and abstraction defigned to have been the general flate of the world, God would have given man other laws, other rules, other faculties, and other employments.

There is a class of visionary but pious writers, who feem to shoot as far beyond the mark, as mere moralists fall short of it. Men of low views and gross minds may be faid faid to be wife below what is written, while those of too subtle refinement are wise above it. The one grovel in the dust from the inertness of their intellectual faculties; while the others are loss in the clouds by stretching them beyond their appointed limits. The one build spiritual castles in the air, instead of erecting them on the "holy ground" of Scripture; the other lay their foundation in the fand instead of resting it on the rock of ages. Thus, the superstructure of both is equally unsound.

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

God is the fountain from which all the freams of goodnels flow; the centre from which all the rays of bleffednels diverge. All our actions are only good, as they have a reference to him: the ftreams must revert back to their fountain, the rays must converge again to their centre.

If love of God be the governing principle, this powerful fpring will actuate all the movements of the rational machine. The effence of religion does not fo much confift in actions as affections. Though right acc 5 tions, tions, therefore, as from an excels of courtely, they are commonly termed, may be performed where there are no right affections; yet are they a mere carcafe, utterly deftitute of the foul, and, therefore, of the fubstance of virtue. But neither can affections fubitantially and truly fubfift without producing right actions; for never let it be forgotten that a pious inclination which has not life and vigour fufficient to ripen into act when the occasion prefents itself, and a right action which does not grow out of a found principle, will neither of them have any place in the account of real goodness. À good inclination will be contrary to fin, but a mere inclination will not fubdue fin.

CHRISTIANITY

The love of God, as it is the fource of every right action and feeling, fo is it the only principle which neceffarily involves the love of our fellow-creatures. As man we do not love man. There is a love of partiality but not of benevolence; of fenfibility but not of philanthropy; of friends and favourites, of parties and focieties, but not of man man collectively. It is true we may, and do, without this principle, relieve his distreffes, but we do not bear with his faults. We may promote his fortune, but we do not forgive his offences; above all, we are not anxious for his immortal interests. We could not fee him want without pain, but we can fee him fin without emotion. We could not hear of a beggar perifhing at our door without horror, but we can, without concern, witnefs an acquaintance dying without repentance. Is it not strange that we must participate fomething of the divine nature, before we can really love the human? It feems, indeed, to be an infenfibility to fin, rather than want of benevolence to mankind. that makes us naturally pity their temporal and be careless of their spiritual wants; but does not this very infenfibility proceed from the want of love to God?

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

As it is the habitual frame, and predominating difpolition, which are the true meafure of virtue, incidental good actions are no certain criterion of the ftate of the heart; c 6 for

Digitized by Google

CHRISTIANITY

for who is there, who does not occafionally do them ? Having made fome progrefs in attaining this difpofition, we muft not fit down fatisfied with propenfities and inclinations to virtuous actions, while we reft fhort of their actual exercife. If the principle be that of found Chriftianity, it will never be inert. While we fhall never do good with any great effect, till we labour to be conformed, in fome meafure, to the image of God; we fhall beft evince our having obtained fomething of that conformity, by a courfe of fleady and active obedience to God.

Every individual fhould bear in mind, that he is fent into this world to act a part in it. And though one may have a more fplendid, and another a more obfcure part affigned him, yet the actor of each is equally, is awfully accountable. Though God is not a hard, he is an exact Mafter. His fervice, though not a fevere, is a reafonable fervice. He accurately proportions his requifitions to his gifts. If he does not expect that one talent talent fhould be as productive as five, yet to even a fingle talent a proportionable refponfibility is annexed.

He who has faid " Give me thy heart," will not be fatisfied with lefs; he will not accept the praying lips, nor the mere hand of Charity, as fubfitutes.

A real Chriftian will be more just, sober, and charitable than other men, though he will not rest for falvation on justice, sobriety, or charity. He will perform the duties they enjoin, in the spirit of Christianity, as instances of devout obedience, as evidences of a heart devoted to God.

All virtues, it cannot be too often repeated, are fanctified or unhallowed according to the principle which dictates them; and will be accepted or rejected accordingly. This principle, kept in due exercife, becomes a habit, and every act ftrengthens the inclination, adding vigour to the principle and pleafure to the performance.

We cannot be faid to be real Chriftians, till religion become our animating motive, our

1.....

CHRISTIANIT'Y

our predominating principle and purfuit, as much as worldly things are the predominating motive, principle, and purfuit of worldly men.

New converts, it is faid, are most zealous, but they are not always the most perfevering. If their tempers are warm, and they have only been touched on the fide of their paffions, they flart eagerly, march rapidly, and are full of confidence in their own strength. They too often judge others with little charity, and themfelves with little humility. While they accuse those who move steadily of standing still, they fancy their own course will never be flackened. If their conversion be not folid, religion, in lofing its novelty, lofes its power. Their fpeed declines. Nay, it will be happy if their motion become not Those who are truly fincere, retrograde. will commonly be perfevering. If their fpeed is lefs eager, it is more fleady. As they know their own heart more, they discover its deceitfulnefs, and learn to diftrust themfelves. As they become more humble in fpirit fpirit they become more charitable in judging. As they grow more firm in principle they grow more exact in conduct.

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

The rooted habits of a religious life may indeed lofe their prominence, becaufe they are become more indented. If they are not emboffed it is becaufe they are burnt in. Where there is uniformity and confiftency in the whole character, there will be little relief in an individual action. A good deed will be lefs striking in an established Chriftian than a deed lefs good in one who had been previoufly carelefs; good actions being his expected duty and his ordinary practice. Such a Christian indeed, when his right habits ceafe to be new and ftriking, may fear that he is declining : but his quiet and confirmed courfe is a furer evidence than the more early flarts of charity, or fits of piety, which may have drawn more attention and obtained more applause.

Again; we should cultivate most affiduously, because the work is most difficult, those graces which are most opposite to our natural natural temper; the value of our good qualities depending much on their being produced by the victory over fome natural wrong propenfity. The implantation of a virtue is the eradication of a vice. It will coft one man more to keep down a rifing paffion than to do a brilliant deed. It will try another more to keep back a fparkling but corrupt thought, which his wit had fuggested, but which his Religion checks, than it would to give a large fum in Charity. A real Christian being deeply sensible of the worthleffness of any actions, which do not fpring from the genuine fountain, will aim at fuch an habitual conformity to the divine image, that to perform all acts of justice, charity, kindnefs, temperance, and every kindred virtue, may become the temper, the habitual, the abiding flate of his heart; that like natural streams they may flow fpontaneously from the living fource.

Practical Christianity, then, is the actual operation of Christian principles. It is lying on the watch for occasions to exemplify them.

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

them. It is " exercifing ourfelves unto godlinefs." A Christian cannot tell in the morning what opportunities he may have of doing good during the day; but if he be a real Christian, he can tell that he will try to keep his heart open, his mind prepared, his affections alive to do whatever may occur in the way of duty. He will, as it were, fland in the way to receive the orders of Providence. Doing good is his vocation. Nor does the young artifan bind himfelf by firmer articles to the rigid performance of his master's work, than the indentured Chriftian to the active fervice of that divine Master who himself "went about doing good." He rejects no duty which comes within the fphere of his calling, nor does he think the work he is employed in a good one, if he might be doing a better. His having well acquitted himfelf of a good action, is fo far from furnishing him with an excuse for avoiding the next, that it is a new reafon for his embarking in it. He looks not at the work which he has accomplished; but on on that which he has to do. His views are always profpective. His charities are fcarcely limited by his power. His will knows no limits. His fortune may have bounds. His benevolence has none. He is, in mind and defire, the benefactor of every miferable man. His heart is open to all the diftreffed; to the household of faith it overflows. Where the heart is large, however fmall the ability, a thousand ways of doing good will be invented. Christian charity is a great enlarger of means. Christian felfdenial negatively accomplishes the purpose of the favourite of fortune in the fables of the Nurfery : --- If it cannot fill the purfe by a wifh, it will not empty it by a vanity. It. provides for others by abridging from itfelf. Having carefully defined what is neceffary and becoming, it allows of no encroachment on its definition. Superfluities it will lop, vanities it will cut off. The devifer of liberal things will find means of effecting them, which to the indolent appear incredible, to the covetous imposfible. Christian beneficence

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

ficence takes a large fweep. That circumference cannot be fmall, of which God is the centre. Nor does religious charity in a Christian stand still because not kept in motion by the main fpring of the world. Money may fail, but benevolence will be going on. If he cannot relieve want, he may mitigate forrow. He may warn the inexperienced, he may inftruct the ignorant, he may confirm the doubting. The Chriftian will find out the cheapeft way of being good as well as of doing good. If he cannot give money, he may exercife a more difficult virtue; he may forgive injuries. Forgivenefs is the economy of the heart. A Chriftian will find it cheaper to pardon than to relent. Forgivenels faves the expence of anger, the cost of hatred, the waste of fpirits. It also puts the foul into a frame, which makes the practice of other virtues eafy. The achievement of a hard duty is a great abolisher of difficulties. If great occafions do not arife, he will thankfully feize on fmall ones. If he cannot glorify God by by ferving others, he knows that he has always fomething to do at home; fome eviftemper to correct; fome wrong propenfity to reform, fome crooked practice to ftraiten. He will never be at a lofs for employment, while there is a fin or a mifery in the world; he will never be idle, while there is a diffrefs to be relieved in another, or a corruption to be cured in his own heart. We have employments affigned to us for every circumftance in life. When we are alone, we have our thoughts to watch; in the family, our tempers; in company, our tongues.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTIANITY

It will be a teft of our fincerity to our own hearts, and for fuch tefts we should anxioully watch, if we are as affiduous in following up our duty when only the favour of God is to be obtained by it, as in cafes where fubordinate confiderations are taken into the account; and bring their portion of influence. We must therefore conficientioully examine in what fpirit we fulfil those parts of our duty which lie more exclusively between our Creator and our conficience. Whether

.44

Whether we are as folicitous about our inward difpofition as about the act of which that difpofition fhould be the principle. If our piety be internal and fincere we fhall lament an evil temper no lefs than an evil action, confcious that though in its indulgence we may efcape human cenfure, yet to the eye of Omnifcience, as both lie equally open, both are equally offenfive.

Without making any fallible human being our infallible guide, and established standard, let us make use of the examples of eminently pious men as incentives to our own growth in every Christian grace. A generous emulation of the excellencies of another is not envy. It is a fanctification of that noble excitement which frired the foul of Themiftocles, when he declared that the trophies of Miltiades prevented him from fleeping. The Christian must not stop here. He must imitate the Pagan hero in the u/e to which he converted his reftlefs admiration, which gave him no repose till he himself became equally illustrious by fervices equally diffinguished with those of his rival.

But

CHRISTIANITY

But to the Christian is held out in the facred volume not only models of human excellence but of divine perfection. What an example of difinterested goodness and unbounded kindness, have we in our Heavenly Father, who is merciful over all his works, who distributes common bleffings without diffinction, who beftows the neceffary refreshments of life, the shining fun and the refreshing shower, without waiting, as we are apt to do, for perfonal merit, or attachment or gratitude; who does not look out for defert, but want, as a qualification for his favours; who does not afflict willingly, who delights in the happinefs, and defires the falvation of all his children. who difpenfes his daily munificence, and bears with our daily offences; who in return for our violation of his laws, fupplies our neceffities, who waits patiently for our repentance, and even folicits us to have mercy on our own fouls!

What a model for our humble imitation, is that divine perfon who was clothed with

3

our

A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

our humanity; who dwelt among us, that the pattern being brought near, might be rendered more engaging, the conformity be made more practicable; whole whole life was one unbroken feries of univerfal charity; who in his complicated bounties, never forgot that man is compounded both of foul and body; who after teaching the multitude, fed them; who repulsed none for being ignorant; was impatient with none for being dull; despiled none for being contemned by the world; rejected none for being finners; who encouraged those whose importunity others cenfured; who in healing fickneffes converted fouls, who gave bread, and forgave injuries!

It will be the endeavour of the fincere Chriftian to illustrate his devotions in the morning, by his actions during the day, He will try to make his conduct a practical exposition of the divine prayer which made a part of them. He will defire " to hallow the name of God," to promote the enlargement and " the coming" of the " kingdom" of of Chrift. He will endeavour to do and to fuffer his whole will; " to forgive," as he himfelf trufts that he is forgiven. He will refolve to avoid that " temptation" into which he had been praying " not to be led;" and he will labour to fhun the " evil" from which he had been begging to be " delivered." He thus makes his prayers as practical as the other parts of his religion, and labours to render his conduct as fpiritual as his prayers. The commentary and the text are of reciprocal application.

CHRISTIANITY

If this gracious Saviour has left us a perfect model for our devotion in his prayer, he has left a model no lefs perfect for our practice in his Sermon. This divine Expofition has been fometimes mifunderflood. It was not fo much a fupplement to a dcfective law, as the reftoration of the purity of a perfect law from the corrupt interpretations of its blind expounders. These perfons had ceased to confider it as forbidding the principle of fin, and as only forbidding the act. Chrift reftores it to its original 2 meaning, meaning, fpreads it out in its due extent, shews the largeness of its dimensions and the spirit of its institution. He unfolds all its motions, tendencies, and relations. Not concerning himfelf, as human Legislators are obliged to do, to prohibit a man the act which is injurious to others, but the inward temper which is prejudicial to himfelf.

48

Digitized by Google

There cannot be a more ftriking inftance, how emphatically every doctrine of the Gofpel has a reference to practical goodnefs, than is exhibited by St. Paul, in that magnificent picture of the Refurrection, in his Epiftle to the Corinthians, which our Church has happily felected, for the confolation of furvivors at the last closing scene of mortality. After an inference, as triumphant as it is logical, that becaufe " Chrift is rifen. we shall rife also;" after the most philofophical illustration of the raifing of the body from the duft, by the process of grain fown in the earth, and fpringing up into a new mode of existence; after describing the subjugation of all things to the Redeemer, and bis

VOL. I.

D

CHRISTIANITY

his laying down the mediatorial Kingdom; after sketching with a feraph's pencil, the relative glories of the celeftial and terrestrial bodies; after exhausting the grandest images of created nature, and the diffolution of nature itfelf; after fuch a difplay of the folemnities of the great day, as makes this world and all its concerns thrink into nothing : in fuch a moment, when, if ever the rapt fpirit might be fuppofed too highly wrought for precept and admonition --- the apostle wound up, as he was, by the energies of infpiration, to the immediate view of the glorified state-the last trumpet foundingthe change from mortal to immortality effected in the twinkling of an eye --- the fting of death drawn out - victory fnatched from the grave - then, by a turn, as furprifing as it is beautiful, he draws a conclusion as unexpectedly practical as his premifes were grand and awful :--- " Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." Then at once, by another quick transition, reforting reforting from the duty to there ward, and, winding up the whole with an argument as powerful as his rhetoric had been fublime, he adds, — " forafmuch as ye know that your labour is not vain in the Lord."

51

DI

[52]

CHAP. III.

Mistakes in Religion.

TO point out with precifion all the miftakes which exift in the prefent day, on the awful fubject of Religion, would far exceed the limits of this fmall work. No mention therefore is intended to be made of the opinions or the practice of any particular body of people; nor will any notice be taken of any of the peculiarities of the numerous fects and parties which have rifen up among us. It will be fufficient for the prefent purpofe, to hazard fome flight remarks on a few of those common classes of characters which belong more or less to most general bodies.

There are, among many others, three different forts of religious Profeffors. The religion of one confifts in a fturdy defence of what they themfelves call orthodoxy, an attendance MISTAKES, &C.

attendance on public worfhip, and a general decency of behaviour. In their views of religion, they are not a little apprehenfive of excels, not perceiving that their danger lies on the other fide. They are far from rejecting faith or morals, but are fomewhat afraid of believing too much, and a little fcrupulous about doing too much, left the former be fuspected of fanaticism, and the latter of fingularity. These Christians confider Religion as a point, which they, by their regular obfervances, having attained, there is nothing further required but to maintain the point they have reached, by a repetition of the fame observances. They are therefore fatisfied to remain stationary, confidering that whoever has obtained his end, is of course faved the labour of pursuit; he is to keep his ground without troubling himfelf in fearching after an imaginary perfection.

These frugal Christians are afraid of nothing fo much as fuperfluity in their love, and fupererogation in their obedience. This kind of fear however is always fuperfluous, but but most especially in those who are troubled with the apprehenfion. They are apt to weigh in the nicely-poifed feales of fcrupulous exactness, the duties which must of hard neceffity be done, and those which without much rifk may be left undone; compounding for a larger indulgence by the relinquishment of a fmaller; giving up, through fear, a trivial gratification to which they are lefs inclined, and fnatching doubtingly, as an equivalent at one they like better. The gratification in both cafes being perhaps fuch as a manly mind would hardly think worth contending for, even were religion out of the question. Nothing but love to God can conquer love of the world. One grain of that divine principle dropping in would make the fcale of felf-indulgence kick the beam.

D 3

MISTAKEŚ

54

These perfons dread nothing so much as enthusiafm. Yet if to look for effects without their predisposing causes; to depend for Heaven on that to which Heaven was never promised, be features of enthusias, then are they themselves enthusias.

The

The religion of a fecond clafs, we have already defcribed in the two preceding chapters. It confifts in a heart devoted to its Maker; inwardly changed in its temper and disposition, yet deeply sensible of its remaining infirmities; continually afpiring however to higher improvements in faith, hope and charity, and thinking that " the greatest of thefe is charity." Thefe, by the former class, are reckoned enthusiasts, but they are in fact, if Christianity be true, acting on the only rational principles. If the doctrines of the Gofpel have any folidity, if its promifes have any meaning, 'thefe Christians are building on no falfe ground. They hope that fubmiffion to the power of God, obedience to his laws, compliance with his will, trust in his word, are, through the efficacy of the eternal spirit, real evidences, because they are vital acts of genuine faith in Jefus If they profess not to place their Chrift. reliance on works, they are however more zealous in performing them than the others, who, profeffing to depend on their good deeds D'4 deeds for falvation, are not always diligent. in fecuring it by the very means which they themfelves eftablish to be alone effectual.

There is a third class - the high-flown professor, who looks down from the giddy heights of antinomian delusion on the other two, abhors the one and defpifes the other, concludes that the one is loft, and the other in a fair way to be fo. Though perhaps not living himfelf in any courfe of immorality, which requires the fanction of fuch doctrines, he does not hefitate to imply, in his difcourfe, that virtue is heathenish and good works fuperfluous, if not dangerous. He does not confider that though the Gofpel is an act of oblivion to penitent finners, yet it no where promifes pardon to those who continue to live in a state of rebellion against God, and of difobedience to his laws. He forgets to infift to others that it is of little importance even to believe that fin is an evil, (which however they do not always believe) while they perfift to live in it; that to know every thing of duty except the doing it, is to offend God

God with an aggravation, from which ignorance itfelf is exempt. It is not giving ourfelves up to Chrift in a namelefs, inexplicable way, which will avail us. God loves an humble, not an audacious faith. To fuppofe that the blood of Chrift redeems us from fin, while fin continues to pollute the Soul, is to fuppofe an impoffibility; to maintain that it is effectual for the falvation, and not for the fanctification of the finner, is to fuppofe that it acts like an amulet, an incantation, a talifman, which is to produce its effect by operating on the imagination and not on the difeafe.

The Religion which mixes with human paffions, and is fet on fire by them, will make a ftronger blaze than that light which is from above, which fheds a fteady and lafting brightnefs on the path, and communicates a fober but durable warmth to the heart. It is equable and conftant; while the other, like culinary fire, fed by grofs materials, is extinguifhed the fooner from the fiercenefs of the flame.

. D 5

That

MISTAKES

That religion which is merely feated in the paffions, is not only liable to wear itfelf out by its own impetuofity, but to be driven out by fome other paffion. The dominion of violent paffions is fhort. They difpoffefs each other. When religion has had its day, it gives way to the next ufurper. Its empire is no more folid than it is lafting, when principle and reafon do not fix it on the throne.

The first of the above classes confider prudence, as the paramount virtue in Religion, Their antipodes, the flaming profeffors, believe a burning zeal to be the exelufive grace. They reverse Saint Paul's collocation of the three Christian graces, and think that the greatest of these is faith. Though even in respect of this grace, their conduct and conversation too often give us reason to lament that they do not bear in mind its genuine and diffinctive properties. Their faith instead of working by love, feems to be adopted from a notion that it leaves the Christian nothing to do, rather than I than because it is its nature to lead him to do more and better than other men-

In this cafe, as in many others, that which is directly contrary to what is wrong, is wrong alfo. If each opponent would only barter half his favourite quality with the favourite quality of the other, both parties would approach nearer to the truth. They might even furnish a complete Christian between them, that is, provided the zeal of the one was fincere, and the prudence of the other honest. But the misfortune is, each is as proud of not posses the quality he wants, because his adversary has it, as he is proud of possessing that of which the other is destitute, and because he is destitute of it.

Among the many miftakes in religion, it is commonly thought that there is fomething fo unintelligible, abfurd, and fanatical in the term conversion, that those who employ it run no small hazard of being involved in the ridicule it excites. It is feldom used but ludicrously, or in contempt. This arises partly from the levity and ignorance of the D 6 censurer, cenfurer, but perhaps as much from the imprudence and enthusiafm of those who have abfurdly confined it to real or fuppofed instances of fudden or miraculous changes from profligacy to piety. But furely, with reafonable people, we run no rifk in afferting that he, who being awakened by any of those various methods which the Almighty ufes to bring his creatures to the knowlege of himfelf, who feeing the corruptions that are in the world, and feeling those with which his own heart abounds, is brought, whether gradually or more rapidly, from an evil heart of unbelief, to a lively faith in the Redeemer; from a life, not only of grofs vice, but of worldlinefs and vanity, to a life of progreffive piety; whole humility keeps pace with his progrefs; who, though his attainments are advancing, is fo far from counting himfelf to have attained, that he preffes onward with unabated zeal, and evidences, by the change in his conduct, the change that has taken place in his heart --fuch a one is furely as fincerely converted, and

and the effect is as much produced by the fame divine energy, as if fome inftantaneous revolution in his character had given it a miraculous appearance. The doctrines of Scripture are the fame now as when David called them, " a law converting the foul, and giving light to the eyes." This is perhaps the most accurate and comprehensive definition of the change for which we are contending, for it includes both the illumination of the understanding, and the alteration in the disposition.

If then this obnoxious expression fignify nothing more nor less than that change of character which confists in turning from the world to God, however the term may offend, there is nothing ridiculous in the thing. Now, as it is not for the term which we contend, but for the principle conveyed by it; fo it is the principle and not the term, which is the real ground of objection; though it is a little inconfistent that many who would fneer at the idea of conversion, would yet take it extremely ill if it were fuspected that their hearts were not turned to God.

Reformation,

Reformation, a term against which no objection is ever made, would, if words continued to retain their primitive fignification, convey the fame idea. For it is plain that to re-form means to make anew. In the prefent use, however, it does not convey the meaning in the fame extent, nor indeed does it imply the operation of the fame principle. Many are reformed on human motives, many are partially reformed ; but only those who, as our great Poet fays, are " reformed altogether," are converted. There is no complete reformation in the conduct effected without a revolution in the heart. Ceafing from fome fins; retaining others in a lefs degree; or adopting fuch as are merely creditable; or flying from one fin to another; or ceasing from the external act without any internal change of disposition, is not Chriftian reformation. The new principle must abolish the old habit, the rooted inclination must be subdued by the substitution of an opposite one. The natural bias must be changed. The actual offence will no more be be pardoned than cured if the inward corruption be not eradicated. To be " alive unto God through Jefus Chrift" must follow " the death unto fin." There cannot be new aims and ends where there is not a new principle to produce them. We shall not chuse a new path until a light from Heaven direct our choice and " guide our feet." We shall not " run the way of God's commandments" till God himself enlarge our heart.

We do not, however, infift that the change required is fuch as precludes the poffibility of falling into fin; but it is a change which fixes in the Soul fuch a difposition as shall make fin a burden, as shall make the defire of pleasing God the governing defire of a man's heart; as shall make him hate the evil which he does; as shall make the lowness of his attainments the subject of his deepess forrow. A Christian has hopes and fears, cares and temptations, inclinations and defires, as well as other men. God in changing the heart does not extinguish the passions.

Digitized by Google

64

paffi n. Were that the cafe, the Ch iftian life would ceafe to be a warfare.

We are often deceived by that partial improvement which appears in the victory over fome one bad quality. But we must not mistake the removal of a symptom for a radical cure of the difeafe. An occafional remedy might remove an accidental fickness, but it requires a general regimen to renovate the difeafed conftitution.

It is the natural but melancholy hiftory of the unchanged heart that, from youth to advanced years, there is no other revolution in the character but fuch as increases both the number and quality of its defects : that the levity, vanity, and felf-fufficiency of the young man is carried into advanced life, and only meet, and mix with, the defects of a mature period; that inftead of crying out with the Royal Prophet, " O remember not my old fins," he is inflaming his reckoning by new ones: that age protracting all the faults of youth, furnishes its own contingent of vices; that floth, fuspicion, and

IN RELIGION.

and covetoufnefs, fwell the account which Religion has not been called in to cancel: that the world, though it has loft the power to delight, has yet loft nothing of its power to enflave. Inftead of improving in candour by the inward fenfe of his own defects, that very confciousness makes him less tolerant of the defects of others, and more fuspicious of their apparent virtues. His charity in a warmer feafon having failed to bring him in that return of gratitude for which it was partly performed, and having never flowed from the genuine fpring, is dried up. His friendships having been formed on worldly principles or intereft, or ambition, or convivial hilarity, fail him. " One must make fome facrifices to the world," is the prevailing language of the nominal Christian. "What will the world pay you for your replies the real Christian. facrifices ?" Though he finds that the world is infolvent, that it pays nothing of what it promifed, for it cannot beftow what it does not poffefs ---happinefs, yet he continues to cling to it almost almost as confidently as if it had never difappointed him. - Were we called upon to name the object under the Sun which excites the deepest commiseration in the heart of Christian sensibility, which includes in itself the most affecting incongruities, which contains the fum and fubftance of real human mifery, we fhould not hefitate to fay AN The mere debility IRRELIGIOUS OLD AGE. of declining years, even the hopeleffnels of decrepitude, in the pious, though they excite fympathy, yet it is the fympathy of tendernefs unmixed with diffrefs. We take and give comfort from the cheering perfuafion that the exhausted body will foon cease to clog its immortal companion ; that the dim and failing eyes will foon open on a world of glory .- Dare we paint the reverse of the picture; Dare we suffer the imagination to dwell on the opening prospects of hoary impiety? Dare we'figure to ourfelves that the weaknefs, the miferies, the terrors we are now commiferating, are eafe, are peace, are happinefs, compared with the unutterable perfpective?

There

There is a fatal way of lulling the confcience by entertaining diminishing thoughts of fins long fince committed. We perfuade ourfelves to forget them, and we therefore perfuade ourfelves that they are not remembered by God. But though distance diminishes objects to the eye of the beholder, it does not actually leffen them. Their real magnitude remains the fame. Deliver us, merciful God, from the delution of believing that fecret fins, of which the world has no cognizance, early fins, which the world has forgotten, but which are known to " him with whom we have to do," become by fecrecy and diftance as if they had never been. " Are not thefe things noted in THY book ?" If we remember them, God may forget them, especially if our remembrance be fuch as to induce a found repentance. If we remember them not, he affuredly will. The holy contrition which fhould accompany this remembrance, while it will not abate our humble truft in our compassionate Redeemer, will keep our confcience tender, and our heart watchful.

We

We do not deny that there is frequently much kindness and urbanity, much benevolence and generofity in men who do not even pretend to be religious. These qualities often flow from constitutional feeling, natural foftnefs of temper, and warm affections; often from an elegant education, that beft buman fweetner and polifher of focial life. We feel a tender regret as we exclaim, " what a fine foil would fuch difpolitions afford to plant religion in ?" Well bred perfons are accultomed to respect all the decorums of fociety, to connect infeparably the ideas of perfonal comfort with public efteem, of generofity with credit, of order with refpectability. They have a keen fense of dishonour, and are careful to avoid every thing that may bring the fhadow of discredit on their name. Public opinion is the breath by which they live, the ftandard by which they act; of course they would not lower, by grofs mifconduct, that ftandard on which their happiness depends. They have been taught to refpect themfelves; this they can do with more fecurity while while they can retain, on this half-way principle, the refpect of others.

In fome who make further advances towards religion, we continue to fee it in that fame low degree which we have always observed. It is dwarfish and stunted, it makes no fhoots. Though it gives fome figns of life it does not grow. By a tame and fpiritlefs round, or rather by this fixed and immoveable position, we rob ourselves of that fair reward of peace and joy which attends on an humble confciousness of progrefs; on the feeling of difficulties conquered; on a fense of the divine favour. That religion which is profitable, is commonly perceptible. Nothing fupports a traveller in his Christian courfe, like the conviction that he is getting on; like looking back on the country he has paffed; and, above all, like the fenfe of that protection which has hitherto carried him on, and of that grace which has promifed to fupport him to the end.

The proper motion of the renewed heart is still directed upward. True religion is of

of an afpiring nature, continually tending towards that Heaven from whence it was transplanted. Its top is high because its root is deep. It is watered by a perennial fountain; in its most flourishing state it is always capable of further growth. Real goodness proves itself to be such by a continual defire to be better. No virtue on earth is ever in a complete state. Whatever stage of religion any man has attained, if he be fatisfied to reft in that stage, we would not call that man religious. The Gofpel feems to confider the highest degree of goodness as the lowest with which a Christian ought to fit down fatisfied. We cannot be faid to be finished in any Christian grace, because there is not one which may not be carried further than we have carried it. This promotes the double purpose of keeping us humble as to our prefent stage, and of stimulating us to fomething higher which we may hope to attain.

That fuperficial thing which by mere people of the world is dignified by the appellation lation of religion, though it brings just that degree of credit which makes part of the fystem of worldly Christians; neither brings comfort for this world, nor fecurity for the next. Outward observances, indispensable as they are, are not religion. They are the acceffory, but not the principal; they are important aids and adjuncts, but not the thing itfelf; they are its aliment but not its life, the fuel but not the flame, the fcaffolding, but not the edifice. Religion can no more fubfift merely by them, than it can fubfift without them. They are divinely appointed, and must be confcientiously obferved; but obferved as a means to promote an end, and not as an end in themfelves.

IN RELIGION.

The heartlefs homage of formal worfhip, where the vital power does not give life to the form, the cold compliment of ceremonial attendance, without the animating principle, as it will not bring peace to our own mind, fo neither will it fatisfy a jealous God. That God whofe eye is on the heart, " who

:71

" who trieth the reins and fearcheth the fpirits," will not be fatisfied that we make him little more than a nominal deity, while the world is the real object of our worship. Such perfons feem to have almost the whole body of performance; all they want is the foul. They are conftant in their devotions, but the heart, which even the heathens efteemed the best part of the facrifice, they keep away. They read the Scriptures, but reft in the letter, inftead of trying themfelves by its spirit. They confider it as an enjoined task, but not as the quick and powerful instrument put into their hands for the critical differtation of " piercing and dividing afunder the foul and fpirit;" not as the penetrating " difcerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." These well intentioned perfons feem to fpend no inconfiderable portion of time in religious exercifes, and yet complain that they make little progress. They almost feem to infinuate, as if the Almighty did not keep his word with them, and manifest that religion to them is not " pleafantnefs," nor her " paths peace."

72

Of

Of fuch may we not afk, Would you not do better to examine than to complain? to enquire whether you do, indeed, poffessa heart which, notwithstanding its imperfections, is fincerely devoted to God? He who does not defire to be perfect is not fincere. Would you not do well to convince yourfelves that God is not unfaithful; that his promifes do not fáil, that his goodnefs is not flackened; May you not be entertaining fome fecret infidelity, practifing fome latent difobedience, withholding fome part of your heart, neglecting to exercise that faith, fubftracting fomething from that devotednefs to which a Christian should engage himfelf, and to which the promifes of God are annexed? Do you indulge no propenfities contrary to his will? Do you never refift the dictates of his fpirit, never thut your eves to its illumination, nor your heart to its influences? Do you not indulge fome cherished fin which obscures the light of grace, fome practice which obstructs the growth of virtue, fome diftruft which chills VOL. I. the E

the warmth of love? The difcovery will repay the fearch, and if you fucceed in this fcrutiny, let not the detection difcourage but ftimulate.

If, then, you refolve to take up religion in earneft, especially if you have actually adopted its cultomary forms, reft not in fuch low attainments as will afford neither prefent peace nor future happinefs. To know Christianity only in its external forms, and its internal diffatisfactions, its fuperficial appearances without, and its disquieting apprehenfions within, to be defirous of flanding well with the world as a Christian, yet to be unfupported by a well-founded Christian . hope, to depend for happiness on the opinion of men, instead of the favour of God, to go on dragging through the mere exercises of piety, without deriving from them real ftrength, or folid peace; to live in the dread of being called an enthufiaft, by outwardly exceeding in religion, and in fecret confciousness of falling short of it, to be conformed to the world's view of Christianity, rather rather than to afpire to be transformed by the renewing of your mind, is a state not of pleasure but of penalty, not of conquest but of hopeless conflict, not of ingenuous love but of tormenting fear. It is knowing religion only as the captive in a foreign land knows the country in which he is a prifoner. He hears from the cheerful natives of its beauties, but is himfelf ignorant of every thing beyond his own gloomy limits. He hears of others as free and happy, but feels nothing himfelf but the rigours of incarceration.

Digitized by Google

The Chriftian character is little underflood by the votaries of the world; if it were, they would be ftruck with its grandeur. It is the very reverse of that meannels and pufillanimity, that abject fpirit and those narrow views which those who know it not afcribe to it.

A Christian lives at the height of his being; not only at the top of his fpiritual, but of his intellectual life. He alone lives in the full exercise of his rational powers. Religion

E 2

•Digitized by Google

Religion ennobles his reason while it enlarges it.

Let, then, your foul act up to its high deftination; let not that which was made to foar to heaven, grovel in the duft. Let it not live fo much below itfelf. You wonder it is not more fixed, when it is perpetually refting on things which are not fixed themfelves. In the reft of a Chriftian there is ftability. Nothing can fhake his confidence but fin. Outward attacks and troubles rather fix than unfettle him, as tempefts from without only ferve to root the oak fafter, while an inward canker will gradually rot and decay it.

That religion which finks Christianity into a mere conformity to religious usages, must always fail of substantial effects. If fin be feated in the heart, if that be its home, that is the place in which it must be combated. It is in vain to attack it in the suburbs when it is lodged in the centre. Mere forms can never expel that enemy which they can never reach. By a religion of of decencies, our corruptions may perhaps be driven out of fight, but they will never be driven out of poffeffion. If they are expelled from their outworks, they will retreat to their citadel. If they do not appear in the groffer forms prohibited by the Decalogue, still they will exist. The shape may be altered, but the principle will remain. They will exift in the fpiritual modification of the fame fins equally forbidden by the divine Expositor. He who dares not be revengeful, will be unforgiving. He who ventures not to break the letter of the feventh commandment in act, will violate it in the fpirit. He who has not courage to renounce Heaven by profligacy, will fcale it by pride, or forfeit it by unprofitablenefs.

It is not any vain hope built on fome external privilege or performance on the one hand, nor a prefumptuous confidence that our names are written in the book of life, on the other, which can afford a reafonable ground of fafety; but it is endeavouring to E_3 keep keep all the commandments of God—it is living to him who died for us—it is being conformed to his image as well as redeemed by his blood. This is Christian virtue, this is the holiness of a believer. A lower motive will produce a lower morality, but such an unfanctified morality God will not accept.

For it will little avail us that Chrift has died for us, that he has conquered fin, triumphed over the powers of darknefs, and overcome the world, while any fin retains its unrefifted dominion in our hearts, while the world is our idol, while our foftered corruptions caufe us to prefer darknefs to light. We muft not perfuade ourfelves that we are reconciled to God while our rebellious hearts are not reconciled to goodnefs.

It is not caffing a fet of opinions into a mould, and a fet of duties into a fyftem, which conftitutes the Chriftian religion. The circumference must have a centre, the body must have a foul, the performances must have a principle. Outward obfervances ances were wifely conftituted to roufe our forgetfulnefs, to awaken our fecular fpirits, to call back our negligent hearts; but it was never intended that we fhould ftop fhort in the ufe of them. They were defigned to excite holy thoughts, to quicken us to holy deeds, but not to be ufed as equivalents for either. But we find it cheaper to ferve God in a multitude of exterior acts, than to ftarve one interior corruption.

Nothing fhort of that uniform ftable principle, that fixednefs in religion which directs a man in all his actions, aims, and purfuits, to God as his ultimate end, can give confiftency to his conduct, or tranquillity to his foul. This ftate once attained, he will not wafte all his thoughts and defigns upon the world; he will not lavifh all his affections on fo poor a thing as his own advancement. He will defire to devote all to the only object worthy of them, to God. Our Saviour has taken care to provide that our ideas of glorifying E 4 him, him, may not run out into fanciful chimeras or fubtle inventions, by fimply flating — "HEREIN IS MY FATHER GLORIFIED THAT YE BEAR MUCH FRUIT." This he goes on to inform us is the true evidence of our being of the number of his people, by adding — "So fhall ye be my difciples."

-

Digitized by Google

CHAP. IV.

Periodical Religion.

WE deceive ourfelves not a little when we fancy that what is emphatically called the world is only to be found in this or that fituation. The world is every where. It is a nature as well as a place; a principle as well as "a local habitation and a name." Though the principle and the nature flourish most in those haunts which are their congenial foil, yet we are too ready, when we withdraw from the world abroad to bring it home, to lodge it in our own bosom. The natural heart is both its temple and its worshipper.

But the most devoted idolater of the word, with all the capacity and industry which he may have applied to the fubject, has never yet been able to accomplish the grand defign of uniting the interests of Heaven and earth. This experiment, which has been more affiduoufly and more frequently tried than that of the Philosopher for the grand Hermetic secret, has been tried with about the same degree of success. The most haborious process of the spiritual Chemist to reconcile religion with the world has never yet been competent to make the contending principles coalesce.

E 5

Digitized by Google

has

But to drop metaphor. Religion was never yet thoroughly relified by a heart full of the world. The world in return cannot be completely enjoyed where there is just religion enough to difturb its false peace. In fuch minds Heaven and earth ruin each other's enjoyments.

Life paffes in the hopelefs project of combining both. It is the object of the worldly fyftem to flatter our paffions, of the religious principle to fubdue them, yet we adopt the one practically, while we maintain the other fpeculatively; we grafp at the gratifications of the one, we will not relinquifh the promifes of the other. What makes life fo little productive of real happines is that we are are thus driving at oppofite interefts at the fame time, though not with the fame zeal.

It is no wonder that the more abstract doctrines of religion can make little impression on minds fupremely engroffed by the objects of fense, when its most obvious and practical truths can but fuperficially imprefs them; when all the prefent objects which abforb their thoughts and affections are of a caft and character which furnish a perpetual hindrance and a powerful counteraction.

There is a religion which is too fincere for hypocrify but too transient to be profitable; too fuperficial to reach the heart, too unproductive to proceed from it. It is flight, but as far as it goes, not falfe. It has difcernment enough to diftinguish fin, but not firmness enough to oppose it ; compunction fufficient to foften the heart, but not vigour fufficient to reform it. It laments when it does wrong, and performs all the functions of repentance of fin except forfaking it. It has every thing of devotion except the stability, and gives every thing to religion except the heart. Е б This

34 PERIODICAL RELIGION.

This is a religion of times, events, and circumftances; it is brought into play by accidents, and dwindles away with the occafion which called it out. Festivals and Fasts, which occur but feldom, are much observed, and it is to be feared becaufe they occur but feldom; while the great feftival which comes every week comes too often to be fo refpectfully treated. The piety of these people comes out much in fickness, but is apt to retreat again as recovery approaches. If they die they are placed by their admirers in the Saints Calendar; if they recover, they go back into the world they had renounced, and again fuspend their amendment as often as death fuspends his blow.

There is another clafs whofe views are ftill lower, who yet cannot fo far fhake off religion as to be eafy without retaining its brief and ftated forms, and who contrive to mix up thefe forms with a faith of a piece with their practice. They blend their inconfiftent works with a vague and unwarranted reliance on what the Saviour has done for for them, and thus patch up a merit and a propitiation of their own - running the hazard of incurring the danger of punifhment by their lives, and inventing a fcheme to avert it by their creed. Religion never interferes with their pleafures except by the compliment of a fhort and occasional fuspen-Having got through these periodical fion. acts of devotion, they return to the fame fcenes of vanity and idlenefs which they had quitted for the temporary duty; forgetting that it was the very end of those acts of devotion to cure the vanity and to correct the idlenefs. Had the periodical obfervance anfwered its true defign, it would have difinclined them to the pleafure inftead of giving them a difpenfation for its indulgence. Had they used the devout exercise in a right spirit, and improved it to its true end, it would have fet the heart and life at work on all those purfuits which it was calculated to promote. But their project has more ingenuity. By the flated minutes they give to religion, they cheaply purchase a protection for for the mifemployment of the reft of their time. They make thefe periodical devotions a kind of fpiritual Infurance Office, which is to make up to the Adventurers in pleafure, any lofs or damage which they may fuftain in its voyage.

It is of these shallow devotions, these prefumed equivalents for a new heart and a new life, that God declares by the Prophet, that he is "weary." Though of his own express appointment, they become " an abomination" to him, as soon as the fign comes to be rested in for the thing fignified. We Christians have " our New Moons and our facrifices" under other names and other shapes; of which facrifices, that is, of the spirit in which they are offered, the Almighty has faid, " I cannot away with them, they are iniquity."

Now is this fuperficial devotion that "giving up ourfelves not with our lips only, but with our lives," to our Maker, to which we folemnly pledge ourfelves, at leaft once a week? Is confectating an hour or two

I

PERIODICAL RELIGION.

ì

two to public worfhip on the Sunday morning, making the Sabbath "a delight?" Is defecrating the reft of the day by "doing our own ways, finding our own pleafure, fpeaking our own words," making it "honourable?"

Sometimes in an awakening fermon, these periodical religionists hear, with awe and terror, of the hour of death and the day of judgment. Their hearts are penetrated with the folemn founds. They confeis the awful realities by the impression they make on their own feelings. The Sermon ends, and with it the ferious reflections it excited. While they liften to thefe things, especially if the preacher be alarming, they are all in all to them. They return to the world ---and these things are as if they were not, as if they had never been; as if their reality lasted only while they were preached; as if their existence depended only on their being heard; as if truth were no longer truth than while it folicited their notice; as if there were as little stability in religion itself as in their their attention to it. As foon as their minds are difengaged from the queftion, one would think that death and judgment were an invention, that heaven and hell were blotted from existence, that eternity ceased to be eternity, in the long intervals in which they ceased to be the object of their confideration.

This is the natural effect of what we venture to denominate periodical religion. It is a transient homage kept totally distinct and feparate from the reft of our lives, inftead of its being made the prelude and the principle of a course of pious practice; instead of our weaving our devotions and our actions into one uniform tiffue by doing all in one fpirit and to one end. When worfhippers of this defcription pray for "a clean heart and a right Spirit," when they beg of God to " turn away their eyes from beholding vanity," is it not to be feared that they pray to be made what they refolve never to become, that they would be very unwilling to become as good as they pray to be made, and would be

be forry to be as penitent as they profefs to defire? But alas! they are in little danger of being taken at their word; there is too much reafon to fear their petitions will not be heard or anfwered; for prayer for the pardon of fin will obtain no pardon while we retain the fin in hope that the prayer will be accepted without the renunciation.

The most folemn office of our Religion. the facred memorial of the death of its Author, the bleffed injunction and tender testimony of his dying love, the confolation of the humble believer, the gracious appointment for strengthening his faith, quickening his repentance, awakening his gratitude, and kindling his charity, is too often reforted to on the fame erroneous principle. He who ventures to live without the use of his holy institution, lives in a state of disobedience to the last appointment of his Redeemer. He who refts in it as a means for fupplying the place of habitual piety, totally miftakes its defign, and is fatally deceiving his own foul.

This

This awful folemnity is, it is to be hoped, rarely frequented even by this class of Chriftians without a defire of approaching it with the pious feelings above defcribed. But if they carry them to the Altar, are they equally anxious to carry them away from it, are they anxious to maintain them after it? Does the rite fo ferioufly approached commonly leave any veftige of ferioufness behind it? Are they careful to perpetuate the feelings they were fo defirous to excite ? Do they ftrive to make them produce folid and fubstantial effects? --- Would that this inconftancy of mind were to be found only in the class of characters under confideration! Let the reader, however fincere in his defires, let the writer, however ready to lament the levity of others, ferioufly afk their own hearts if they can entirely acquit themfelves of the inconfiftency they are fo forward to blame? If they do not find the charge brought against others but too applicable to themfelves?

Irre-

Irreverence antecedent to, or during this facred folemnity, is far lefs rare than durable improvement after it. If there are, as we are willing to believe, none fo prophane as to violate the act, except thofe who impioufly ufe it only as " a picklock to a place," there are too few who make it laftingly beneficial. Few fo thoughtlefs as not to approach it with refolutions of amendment; few comparatively who carry thefe refolutions into effect. Fear operates in the previous inftance. Why fhould not love operate in that which is fubfequent ?

A periodical religion is accompanied with a periodical repentance. This fpecies of repentance is adopted with no fmall mental refervation. It is partial and difconnected. Thefe fragments of contrition, thefe broken parcels of penitence——while a fucceffion of worldly purfuits is not only reforted to, but is intended to be reforted to during the whole of the intervening fpaces, are not that forrow which the Almighty has promifed to accept. To render them pleafing to God and effica-efficacious to ourfelves, there must be an agreement in the parts, an entirenes in the whole web of life. There must be an integral repentance. A quarterly contrition in the four weeks preceding the facred feasons will not wipe out the daily offences, the hourly negligences of the whole finful year. Sins half forfaken through fear, and half retained through partially resulted temptation and partially adopted resolution, make up but an unprofitable piety.

92 PERIODICAL RELIGION.

In the bofom of thefe profeffors there is a perpetual conflict between fear and inclination. In converfation you will generally find them very warm in the caufe of Religion; but it is Religion as oppofed to Infidelity, not as oppofed to worldly mindednefs. They defend the worfhip of God, but defire to be excufed from his fervice. Their heart is the flave of the world, but their blindnefs hides from them the turpitude of that world. They commend piety, but dread its requifitions. They allow that repentance is neceffary, but then how eafy is it to find reafons fons for deferring a neceffary evil ? Who will haftily adopt a painful meafure which he can find a creditable pretence for evading? They cenfure whatever is oftenfibly wrong, but avoiding only part of it, the part they retain robs them of the benefit of their partial renunciation.

We cannot fufficiently admire the wifdom of the church in enjoining extraordinary acts of devotion at the return of those festivals fo happily calculated to excite devotional Extraordinary repentance of fin feelings. is peculiarly fuitable to the feafons that record those grand events which fin occasioned. But the church never intended that thefe more stated and strict felf-examinations fhould preclude our habitual felf-infpection. It never intended its holy offices to fupply the place of general holinefs, but to promote it. It intended that these folemn occasions should animate the flame of piety, but it never meant to furnish a reason for neglecting to keep the flame alive till the next return should again kindle the dying embers. It meant meant that every fuch feafon fhould gladden the heart of the Chriftian at its approach, and not difcharge him from duty at its departure. It meant to lighten his confcience of the burden of fin, not to encourage him to begin a new fcore, again to be wiped off at the fucceeding feftival. It intended to quicken the vigilance of the believer, and not to difmifs the centinel from his poft. If we are not the better for thefe divinely appointed helps, we are the worfe. If we ufe them as a difcharge from that diligence which they were intended to promote, we convert our bleffings into fnares, our devotions into fins.

This abufe of our advantages arifes from our not incorporating our devotions into the general habit of our lives. Till our religion become an inward principle and not an external act, we fhall not receive that benefit from her forms, however excellent, which they are calculated to convey. It is to those who posses the spirit of Christianity that her forms are so valuable. To them the

Digitized by Google

the form excites the fpirit, as the fpirit animates the form. Till religion becomes the defire of our hearts, it will not become the bufinefs of our lives. We are far from meaning that it is to be its actual occupation; but that every portion of time, every habit of the mind, every act of life, is to be animated by its fpirit, influenced by its principle, governed by its power.

The very make of our nature and our neceffary commerce with the world, naturally fill our hearts and minds with thoughts and ideas, over which we have unhappily too little controul. We find this to be the cafe when in our better hours we attempt to give ourfelves up to ferious reflection. How many intrusions of worldly thoughts, how many impertinent imaginations, not only irrelevant but uncalled and unwelcome, crowd in upon the mind fo forcibly as fcarcely to be repelled by our fincerest efforts. How impotent then to repel fuch images must that mind be, which is devoted to worldly purfuits, which yields itfelf up to them, whole opinions, habits, and and conduct are under their allowed influence!

We should fairly adjust the claims of both worlds, and having equitably determined their value, act upon that determination. We shall then fix the proportions and the limits of that attention which each deferves. A just estimate of their respective worth would cool our ardor and tame our immoderate defires after things fo really little in themfelves, and fo fhort in their duration. Providence has fet narrow bounds to life, piety fhould proportionally narrow our anxieties refpecting it; for to be inordinately enamoured of any object, the worth of which will not justify the attachment, argues an ill-regulated mind and a defective judgment.

All the ftrong remarks of devout writers on the littleness of those things which the world call great, might be looked upon as mere rhetorical flouristics, or as the envious ebullitions of retired men who could not attain the things they contemn; did not their brief duration justify the description. — Let the censurer only image to himself the world paffing paffing away, and the earth vanishing, ere long to all, and to every man at his death, which to him is the end of the world, and he whom he now despises as a passionate declaimer will then appear a sober reasoner.

Let us not then confider a fpirit of worldlinefs as a little infirmity, as a natural and therefore a pardonable weaknefs; as a trifling error which will be overlooked for the fake of our many good qualities. It is in fact the effence of our other faults : the temper that flands between us and our falvation : the fpirit which is in direct opposition to the fpirit of God. Individual fins may more eafily be cured, but this is the principle of all fpiritual difeafe. A worldly fpirit, where it is rooted and cherished, runs through the whole character, infinuates itfelf in all we fay and think and do. It is this which makes us fo dead in religion, fo averfe from fpiritual things, fo forgetful of God, fo unmindful of eternity, fo fatisfied with ourfelves, fo impatient of ferious difcourfe, and fo alive to that vain and frivolous intercourfe which excludes VOL. I. F

98 PERIODICAL RELIGION.

excludes intellect almost as much as piety from our general conversation.

It is not therefore our more confiderable actions alone which require watching, for they feldom occur. They do not form the habit of life in ourfelves, nor the chief importance of our example to others. It is to our ordinary behaviour, it is to our deport. ment in common life; it is to our prevailing. turn of mind in general intercourfe, by which we shall profit or corrupt those with whom we affociate. It is our conduct in focial life which will help to diffuse a spirit of piety. or a distante to it. If we have much influence, this is the place in which particularly to exert it. If we have little, we have still enough to infect the temper and lower the tone of our narrow fociety.

If we really believe that it is the defign of Christianity to raife us to a participation of the divine nature, the flightest reflection on this elevation of our character would lead us to maintain its dignity in the ordinary intercourse of life. We should not fo much enquire enquire whether we are tranfgreffing any actual prohibition, whether any ftanding law is pointed against us, as whether we are supporting the dignity of the Christian character; whether we are acting fuitably to our profession; whether more exactness in the common occurrences of the day, more correctness in our conversation, would not be such evidences of our religion, as by being obvious and intelligible, might not almost infensibly produce important effects.

The most infignificant people must not through indolence and felfishness undervalue their own influence. Most perfons have a little circle of which they are a fort of centre. Its fmallness may leften their quantity of good, but does not diminish the duty of using that little influence wifely. Where is the human being fo inconfiderable but that he may in fome shape benefit others, either by calling their virtues into exercise, or by fetting them an example of virtue himself? But we are humble just in the wrong place. When the exhibition of our talents or splendid qualities is in question, we are not backward in the difplay. When a little felfdenial is to be exercifed, when a little good might be effected by our example, by our difcreet management in company, by giving a better turn to conversation, then at once we grow wickedly modeft. --- "Such an infignificant creature as I am can do no good." -"" Had I a higher rank or brighter talents, then indeed my influence might be exerted to fome purpofe." - Thus under the mafk of diffidence, we justify our indolence; and let flip those leffer occasions of promoting religion which if we all improved, how much might the condition of fociety be raifed!

F 2

99

did

The hackneyed interrogation "What muft we be always talking about religion ?" muft have the hackneyed anfwer — Far from it. Talking about religion is not being religious. But we may bring the fpirit of religion into company and keep it in perpetual operation when we do not profeffedly ake it our fubject. We may be conftantly advancing advancing its interefts, we may without effort or affectation be giving an example of candour, of moderation, of humility, of forbearance. We may employ our influence by correcting falfehood, by checking levity, by difcouraging calumny, by vindicating mifreprefented merit, by countenancing every thing which has a good tendency — in fhort, by throwing our whole weight, be it great or fmall, into the right fcale.

Digitized by Google

[102]

CHAP. V.

Prayer.

PRAYER is the application of want to him who can only relieve it; the voice of fin to him who alone can pardon it. It is the urgency of poverty, the profitration of humility, the fervency of penitence, the confidence of truft. It is not eloquence, but earnestness, not the definition of helpleffness, but the feeling of it; not figures of speech, but computction of foul. It is the "Lord fave us we perish" of drowning Peter; the cry of faith to the ear of mercy.

Adoration is the nobleft employment of created beings; confession the natural language of guilty creatures; gratitude the spontaneous expression of pardoned finners. Prayer is defire. It is not a mere conception of the mind, nor a mere effort of the intellect, nor an act of the memory; but but an elevation of the foul towards its Maker; a prefling fenfe of our own ignorance and infirmity, a confcioufnels of the perfections of God, of his readinefs to hear, of his power to help, of his willingness to fave. It is not an emotion produced in the fenses, nor an effect wrought by the imagination; but a determination of the will, an effution of the heart.

Prayer is the guide to felf-knowledge by prompting us to look after our fins in order to pray against them; a motive to vigilance, by teaching us to guard against those fins which, through felf-examination, we have been enabled to detect.

Prayer is an act both of the underftanding and of the heart. The understanding must apply itfelf to the knowledge of the divine perfections, or the heart will not be lead to the adoration of them. It would not be a reasonable service, if the mind was excluded. It must be rational worship, or the human worshipper would not bring to the fervice the diftinguishing faculty of his nature, which

F 4

which is reafon. It must be fpiritual worfhip or it would want the diffinctive quality to make it acceptable to Him who is a fpirit, and who has declared that he will be worfhipped " in fpirit and in truth."

Prayer is right in itfelf as the most powerful means of resisting fin and advancing in holines. It is above all right, as every thing is, which has the authority of Scripture, the command of God, and the example of Christ.

There is a perfect confiftency in all the ordinations of God; a perfect congruity in the whole fcheme of his difpenfations. If man were not a corrupt creature, fuch prayer as the Gofpel enjoins would not have been neceffary. Had not Prayer been an important means for curing those corruptions, a God of perfect wisdom would not have ordered it. He would not have prohibited every thing which tends to inflame and promote them, had they not existed, nor would he have commanded every thing that has a tendency to diminish and remove them, them, had not their existence been fatal. Prayer therefore is an indifpenfable part of his economy and of our obedience.

It is a hackneyed objection to the use of Prayer, that it is offending the omnifcience of God to suppose he requires information of our wants. But no objection can be more futile. We do not pray to inform God of our wants, but to express our fense of the wants which he already knows. As he has not fo much made his promifes to our necessities, as to our requests, it is reafonable that our requests should be made before we can hope that our necessities will be relieved. God does not promife to those who want that they shall " have," but to those who "ask;" nor to those who need that they shall "find," but to those who " feek." So far therefore from his previous knowledge of our wants being a ground of objection to Prayer, it is in fact the true ground for our application. Were. he not Knowledge itself, our information would be of as little use, as our application cation would be, were he not Goodneis itself.

106

We cannot attain to a just notion of Prayer while we remain ignorant of our own nature, of the nature of God as revealed in Scripture, of our relation to him and dependance on him. If therefore we do not live in the daily study of the Holy Scriptures, we shall want the highest motives to this duty, and the best helps for performing it; if we do, the cogency of these motives, and the inestimable value of these helps, will render argument unnecessary and exhortation fuperfluous.

One caufe therefore of the dullnefs of many Christians in prayer is, their flight acquaintance with the Sacred volume. They hear it periodically, they read it occasionally, they are contented to know it historically, to confider it fuperficially; but they do not endeavour to get their minds imbued with its fpirit. If they flore their memory with its facts, they do not imprefs their hearts with its truths. They do not regard it as 2 the the nutriment on which their spiritual life and growth depend. They do not pray over it; they do not confider all its doctrines as of practical application; they do not cultivate that spiritual difcernment which alone can enable them judiciously to appropriate its promifes and its denunciations to their own actual cafe. ' They do not apply it as an unerring line to afcertain their own rectitude or obliquity.

In our retirements, ve too often fritter away our precious moments, moments refcued from the world, in trivial, fometimes, it is to be feared, in corrupt thoughts. But if we must give the reins to our imagination, let us fend this excursive faculty to range among great and noble objects. Let it ftretch forward under the fanction of faith and the anticipation of prophecy, to the accomplifhment of those glorious promifes and tremendous threatenings which will foon be realized in the eternal world. Thefe are topics which under the fafe and fober guidance F 6 guidance of Scripture, will fix its largeft fpeculations and fuftain its loftieft flights. The fame Scripture, while it expands and elevates the mind, will keep it fubject to the dominion of truth; while at the fame time it will teach it that its boldeft excurfions muft fall infinitely flort of the aftonifhing realities of a future ftate.

Though we cannot pray with a too deep fense of fin, we may make our fins too exclufively the object of our prayers. While we keep, with a felf-abafing eye, our own corruptions in view, let us look with equal intentnefs on that mercy, which cleanfeth from all fin. Let our prayers be all humiliation, but let them not be all complaint. When men indulge no other thought but that they are rebels, the hopelefinefs of pardon hardens them into difloyalty. Let them look to the mercy of the King, as well as to the rebellion of the Subject. If we contemplate his grace as difplayed in the Gofpel, then, though our humility will increase, our defpair despair will vanish. Gratitude in this as in human instances will create affection. "We love him because he first loved us."

Let us therefore always keep our unworthinefs in view as a reafon why we ftand in need of the mercy of God in Chrift; but never plead it as a reafon why we fhould not draw nigh to him to implore that mercy. The beft men are unworthy for their own fakes; the worft on repentance will be accepted for his fake and through his merits.

In prayer then, the perfections of God, and efpecially his mercies in our redemption, fhould occupy our thoughts as much as our fins; our obligation to him as much as our departures from him. We fhould keep up in our hearts a conftant fenfe of our own weaknefs, not with a defign to difcourage the mind and deprefs the fpirits; but with a view to drive us out of ourfelves, in fearch of the divine affiftance. We fhould contemplate our infirmity in order to draw us to look for his ftrength, and to feek that power from God which we vainly look for in ourfelves:

felves: We do not tell a fick friend of his danger in order to grieve or terrify him, but to induce him to apply to his Phyfician, and to have recourfe to his remedy.

Among the charges which have been brought against ferious piety, one is that it teaches men to defpair. The charge is just in one fenfe as to the fact, but falfe in the fenfe intended. It teaches us to defpair indeed of ourfelves, while it inculcates that faith in a Redeemer, which is the true antidote to defpair. Faith quickens the doubting fpirit while it humbles the prefumptuous. The lowly Christian takes comfort in the bleffed promife, that God will never forfake them that are his. The prefumptuous man is equally right in the doctrine, but wrong in applying it. He takes that comfort to himfelf which was meant for another clafs of characters. The mal-appropriation of Scripture promifes, and threatenings, is the caufe of much error and delution.

Some devout enthusiasts have fallen into error by an unnatural and impracticable difindifinterestedness, afferting that God is to be loved exclusively for himfelf, with an absolute renunciation of any view of advantage to ourfelves; yet that prayer cannot be mercenary, which involves God's glory with our own happines, and makes his will the law of our requests. Though we are to defire the glory of God fupremely; though this ought to be our grand actuating principle, yet he has gracioufly permitted, commanded, invited us, to attach our own happinefs to this primary object. The Bible exhibits not only a beautiful, but an infeparable combination of both, which delivers us from the danger of unnaturally renouncing our own benefit, for the promotion of God's glory on the one hand; and on the other, from feeking any happiness independent of him, and underived from him. In enjoining us to love him fupremely, he has connected an unspeakable bleffing with a paramount duty, the highest privilege with the most pofitive command.

What a triumph for the humble Chriftian to be affured, that " the high and lofty one - which which inhabiteth eternity," condescends at the fame time to dwell in the heart of the contrite: in his heart! To know that God is the God of his life, to know that he is even invited to take the Lord for his God. - To clofe with God's offers, to accept his invitations, to receive God as his portion, must furely be more pleasing to our heavenly Father, than feparating our happiness from his glory. To difconnects our interests from his goodnefs, is at once to detract from his perfections, and to obfcure the brightnefs of our own hopes. The declarations of infpired Writers are confirmed by the authority of the heavenly hofts. They proclaim that the glory of God and the happiness of his creatures, fo far from interfering, are connected with each other. We know but of one Anthem composed and fung by Angels, and this most harmoniously combines " the glory of God in the highest with peace on earth and good will to men."

"The beauty of Scripture," fays the great Saxon Reformer, " confifts in pronouns." This God is our God — God even our •wwn God fhall blefs us — How delightful the appropriation! to glorify him as being in himfelf confummate excellence, and to love him from the feeling that this excellence is directed to our felicity! Here modefty would be ingratitude, difintereftednefs, rebellion. It would be fevering ourfelves from him, in whom we live, and move, and are; it would be diffolving the connection which he has condefcended to eftablifh between himfelf and his Creatures.

It has been juftly obferved, that the Scripture Saints make this union the chief ground of their grateful exultation — "My ftrength," "my rock," "my fortrefs," "my deliverer !" again "let the God of my falvation be exalted!" Now take away the pronoun and fubfitute the article the, how comparatively cold is the imprefion! The confummation of the joy arifes from the peculiarity, the intimacy, the endearment of the relation.

Not to the liberal Christian is the grateful joy diminished, when he bless his God as "the

" the God of all them that truft in him." All general bleffings, will he fay, all providential mercies, are mine individually, are mine as completely, as if no other shared in the enjoyment. Life, light, the earth and heavens, the Sun and Stars, whatever fustains the body, and recreates the fpirits! My obligation is as great as if the mercy had been made purely for me; as great? nay it is greater - it is augmented by a fense of the millions who participate in the bleffing. The fame enlargement of perfonal obligation holds good, nay rifes higher in the mercies of Redemption. The Lord is my Saviour as completely as if he had redeemed only me. That he has redeemed " a great multitude which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds and people and tongues," is diffusion without abatement ; it is general participation without individual diminution. Each has all.

In adoring the Providence of God, we are apt to be ftruck with what is new and out of course, while we too much overlook long, long, habitual, and uninterrupted mercies. But common mercies, if less ftriking, are more valuable, both becaufe we have them always, and for the reafon above affigned, becaufe others fhare them. The ordinary bleffings of life are overlooked for the very reason that they ought to be most prized, because they are most uniformly bestowed. They are most effential to our support, and when once they are withdrawn we begin to find that they are also most effential to our Nothing railes the price of a comfort. blefling like its removal, whereas it was its continuance which should have taught us its We require novelties, to awaken value. our gratitude, not confidering that it is the duration of mercies which enhances their value. We want fresh excitements. We confider mercies long enjoyed as things of courfe, as things to which we have a fort of prefumptive claim; as if God had no right to withdraw what he has once bestowed, as if he were obliged to continue what he has once been pleafed to confer.

114

Digitized by Google

But

But that the Sun has fhone unremittingly from the day that God created him, is not a lefs stupendous exertion of power than that the hand which fixed him in the heavens, and marked out his progrefs through them, once faid by his fervant, "Sun, ftand thou ftill upon Gibeon." That he has gone on in his ftrength, driving his uninterrupted career, and " rejoicing as a Giant to run his courfe," for fix thousand years, is a more aftonishing exhibition of Omnipotence than that he fhould have been once fufpended by the hand which fet him in motion. That the ordinances of heaven, that the established laws of nature. should have been for one day interrupted to ferve a particular occafion, is a lefs real wonder, and certainly a lefs fubstantial bleffing, than that in fuch a multitude of ages they fhould have purfued their appointed courfe, for the comfort of the whole fystem.

As the affections of the Christian ought to be fet on things above, so it is for them that his prayers will be chiefly addressed. God, in in promifing to " give thole who delight in him the defire of their heart," could never mean temporal things, for these they might defire improperly as to the object, and inordinately as to the degree. The promise relates principally to spiritual bleffings. He not only gives us these mercies, but the very defire to obtain them is also his gift. Here our prayer requires no qualifying, no conditioning, no limitation. We cannot err in our choice, for God himself is the object of it; we cannot exceed in the degree, unless it were possible to love him too well, or to please him too much.

We fhould pray for worldly comforts, and for a bleffing on our earthly plans, though lawful in themfelves, conditionally, and with a refervation, becaufe, after having been earneft in our requefts for them, it may happen that when we come to the petition " thy will be done" we may in thefevery words be inadvertently praying that our previous petitions may not be granted. In this brief requeft confifts the vital principle, the effential fpirit of

117 .

of Prayer. God fhews his munificence in encouraging us to alk most earnestly for the greatest things, by promising that the smaller "fhall be added unto us." We therefore acknowledge his liberality most when we request the highest favours. He manifests his infinite superiority to earthly fathers by chiefty delighting to confer those spiritual gifts which they less folicitously desire for their children than those worldly advantages on which God sets fo little value.

Nothing fhort of a fincere devotedness to God, can enable us to maintain an equality of mind, under unequal circumstances. We murmur that we have not the things we ask amis, not knowing that they are withheld by the fame mercy by which the things that are good for us are granted. Things good in themselves may not be good for us. A refigned spirit is the proper disposition to prepare us for receiving mercies, or for having them denied. Refignation of foul, like the allegiance of a good subject, is always in readiness though not in action; whereas whereas an impatient mind is a fpirit of difaffection, always prepared to revolt, when the will of the fovereign is in opposition to that of the fubject. This feditious principle is the infallible characteristic of an unrenewed mind.

A fincere love of God will make us thankful when our fupplications are granted, and patient and cheerful when they are denied. He who feels his heart rife against any divine difpensation ought not to reft till. by ferious meditation and earnest prayer it be moulded into fubmiffion. An habit of acquiescence in the will of God, will so operate on the faculties of his mind, that even his judgment will embrace the conviction, that what he once fo ardently defired, would not have been that good thing, which his blindness had confpired with his wishes to make him believe it to be. He will recollect the many inftances in which if his importunity had prevailed, the thing which ignorance requefted, and wifdom denied, would have infured his mifery. Every fresh difappointdifappointment will teach him to diftruft himfelf and to confide in God. Experience will inftruct him that there may be a better way of hearing our requests than that of granting them. Happy for us that He to whom they are addressed knows which is best and acts upon that knowledge.

We fhould endeavour to render our private devotions effectual remedies for our own particular fins. Prayer against fin in general is too indefinite to reach the individual cafe. We must bring it home to our own heart, elfe we may be confessing another man's fins and overlooking our own. If we have any predominant fault we should pray more efpecially against that fault. If we pray for any virtue of which we particularly stand in need, we should dwell on our own deficiencies in that virtue, till our fouls become deeply affected with our want of it. Our Prayers should be circumstantial, not as was before obferved for the information of infinite wifdom, but for the ftirring up of our own dull affections. And as the recapitulation of our

our wants tends to keep up a fenfe of our dependence, the enlarging on our efpecial mercies will tend to keep alive a fenfe of gratitude. While indifcriminate petitions, confeffions, and thankfgivings, leave the mind to wander in indefinite devotion and unaffecting generalities, without perfonality and without appropriation. It must be obvious that we except those grand universal points in which all have an equal interest, and which must always form the effence of family, and efpecially of public prayer.

On the bleffing attending importunity in prayer, the Gofpel is abundantly explicit. God perhaps delays to give that we may perfevere in afking. He may require importunity for our own fakes, that the frequency and urgency of the petition may bring our hearts into that frame to which he will be favorable.

As we ought to live in a fpirit of obedience to his commands, fo we fhould live in a frame of waiting for his bleffing on our prayers, and in a fpirit of gratitude when VOL. I.

we have obtained it. This is that "preparation of the heart" which would always keep us in a pofture for duty. If we defert the duty becaufe an immediate bleffing does not vifibly attend it, it fhews that we do not ferve God out of confcience but felfiftnefs; that we grudge expending on him that fervice which brings us in no immediate intereft. Though he grant not our petition, let us never be tempted to withdraw our application.

Our reluctant devotions may remind us of the remark of a certain great political wit, who apologized for his late attendance in Parliament, by his being detained while a party of foldiers were dragging a volunteer to his duty. How many excufes do we find for not being in time! How many apologies for brevity! How many evafions for neglect! How unwilling, too often, are we to come into the divine prefence, how reluctant to remain in it! Thofe hours which are leaft valuable for bufinefs, which are leaft feafonable for pleafure, we commonly give to religion.

ligion. Our energies, which were fo readily exerted in the fociety we have just quitted, are funk as we approach the divine prefence. Our hearts, which were all alacrity in fome frivolous conversation, become cold and inanimate, as if it were the natural property of devotion to freeze the affections. Our animal fpirits which fo readily performed their functions before, now flacken their vigour and lofe their vivacity. The fluggifh body fympathizes with the unwilling mind, and each promotes the deadness of the other; both are flow in liftening to the call of duty; both are foon weary in performing it. How do our fancies rove back to the pleafures we have been enjoying ! How apt are the diverfified images of those pleafures to mix themfelves with our better thoughts, to pull down our higher afpirations. As prayer requires all the energies of the compound being of man, fo we too often feel as if there were a confpiracy of body, foul, and fpirit, to difincline and difqualify us for it.

When the heart is once fincerely turned to G 2 religion, religion, we need not, every time we pray, examine into every truth, and feek for conviction over and over again; but affume that those doctrines are true, the truth of which we have already proved. From a general and fixed impression of these principles, will refult a taste, a disposedness, a love, so intimate; that the convictions of the understanding will become the affections of the heart.

'To be deeply impressed with a few fun-.damental truths, to digeft them thoroughly, to meditate on them ferioufly, to pray over them fervently, to get them deeply rooted in the heart, will be more productive of faith and holinefs, than to labour after variety. ingenuity, or elegance. The indulgence of imagination will rather diffract than edify. Searching after ingenious thoughts will rather divert the attention from God to ourfelves, than promote fixedness of thought, fingleness of intention, and devotedness of Whatever is fubtil and refined, is fpirit. in danger of being unfcriptural. If we do not

: 1^{*}

1$4

not guard the mind it will learn to wander in queft of novelties. It will learn to fet more value on original thoughts than devout affections. It is the bufinefs of prayer to caft down imaginations which gratify the natural activity of the mind, while they leave the heart unhumbled.

We should confine ourselves to the prefent business of the prefent moment; we should keep the mind in a state of perpetual dependence; we should entertain no long views. "Now is the accepted time." "To-day we must hear his voice." "Give us this day our daily bread." The manna will not keep till to-morrow : to-morrow will have its own wants, and must have its own petitions. To-morrow we must feek the bread of heaven afresh.

We fhould however avoid coming to our devotions with unfurnished minds. We should be always laying in materials for prayer, by a diligent course of ferious reading, by treasuring up in our minds the most important truths. If we rush into the divine G 3 prefence prefence with a vacant or ignorant and unprepared mind, with a heart full of the world; as we fhall feel no difposition or qualification for the work we are about to engage in, fo we cannot expect, that our petitions will be heard or granted. There must be fome congruity between the heart and the object, fome affinity between the ftate of our minds and the business in which they are employed, if we would expect fuccess in the work.

We are often deceived both as to the principle and the effect of our prayers. When from fome external caufe the heart is glad, the fpirits light, the thoughts ready, the tongue voluble, a kind of fpontaneous eloquence is the refult; with this we are pleafed, and this ready flow we are willing to impofe on ourfelves for piety.

On the other hand, when the mind is dejected, the animal fpirits low, the thoughts confused; when apposite words do not readily prefent themselves, we are apt to accuse our hearts of want of fervor, to lament . our

our weaknefs, and to mourn that becaufe we have had no pleafure in praying, our prayers have, therefore, not afcended to the throne of mercy. In both cafes we perhaps judge ourfelves unfairly. These unready accents, thefe faltering praifes, thefe ill-expressed petitions, may find more acceptance than the florid talk with which we were fo well fatisfied: the latter confifted it may be of fhining thoughts, floating on the fancy, eloquent words dwelling only on the lips; the former was the fighing of a contrite heart, abased by the feeling of its own unworthinefs, and awed by the perfections of a holy and heart-fearching God. The heart is diffatisfied with its own dull and taftelefs repetitions, which, with all their imperfections, Infinite Goodnefs may perhaps hear with favor*.--We may not only be elated with

• Of these fort of repetitions, our admirable Church Liturgy has been accused as a fault; but this defect, if it be one, happily accommodates itself to our infirmities. Where is the favored being whose attention never wanders, whose heart accompanies his lips in G 4 every with the fluency but even with the fervency of our prayers. Vanity may grow out of the very act of renouncing it, and we may begin to feel proud at having humbled ourfelves fo eloquently.

There is however a ftrain and fpirit of prayer equally diffinct from that facility and copioufnefs for which we certainly are never the better in the fight of God, and from that conftraint and drynefs for which we may be never the worfe. There is a fimple, folid, pious ftrain of prayer in which the fupplicant is fo filled and occupied with a fenfe of his own dependence, and of the importance of the things for which he afks, and fo perfuaded of the power and grace of God through Chrift to give him thofe things, that while he is engaged in it, he does not merely imagine, but feels aflured that God every fentence? Is there no abfence of mind in the petitioner, no wandering of the thoughts, no inconflancy of the heart, which these repetitions are wisely calculated to correct, to rouse the dead attention, to bring back the strayed affections?

is nigh to him as a reconciled father, fo that every burden and doubt are taken off from his mind. "He knows," as St. John expreffes it, " that he has the petitions he defired of God," and feels the truth of that promife, " while they are yet fpeaking I will hear." This is the perfection of Prayer.

Digitized by Google

[130]

CHAP. VI.

Cultivation of a Devotional Spirit.

TO maintain a devotional Spirit, two things are efpecially neceffary—habitually to cultivate the difpofition, and habitually to avoid whatever is unfavourable to it. Frequent retirement and recollection are indifpenfable, together with fuch a general courfe of reading, as, if it do not actually promote the fpirit we are endeavouring to maintain, fhall never be hoftile to it. We fhould avoid as much as in us lies all fuch fociety, all fuch amufements as excite tempers which it is the daily bufinefs of a Chriftian to fubdue, and all thofe feelings which it is his conftant duty to fupprefs.

And here may we venture to obferve, that if fome things which are apparently innocent, and do not affume an alarming afpect, or bear a dangerous character; things which the generality nerality of decorous people affirm, (how truly we know not,) to be fafe for them; yet if we find that these things ftir up in us improper propenfities, if they awaken thoughts which ought not to be excited; if they abate our love for religious exercifes, or infringe on our time for performing them; if they make fpiritual concerns appear infipid, if they wind our hearts a little more about the world; in fhort, if we have formerly found. them injurious to our own fouls, then let no example or perfuation, no belief of their alleged innocence, no plea of their perfect fafety, tempt us to indulge in them. It matters little to our fecurity what they are to Our bufinefs is with ourfelves. others. Our responsibility is on our own heads. Others cannot know the fide on which we are affailable. Let our own unbiaffed judgment determine our opinion, let our own experience decide for our own conduct.

In fpeaking of books, we cannot forbear noticing that very prevalent fort of reading. which is little lefs productive of evil, little lefs

G 6

132

lefs prejudicial to moral and mental improvement, than that which carries a more formidable appearance. We cannot confine our cenfure to those more corrupt writings which deprave the heart, debauch the imagination, and poifon the principles. Of thefe the turpitude is fo obvious that no caution on this head, it is prefumed, can be neceffary. But if justice forbids us to confound the infipid with the mischievous, the idle with the vicious, and the frivolous with the profligate, still we can only admit of shades, deep shades we allow, of difference. These works, if comparatively harmlefs, yet debafe the tafte, flacken the intellectual nerve, let down the understanding, fet the fancy loofe, and fend it gadding among low and mean objects. They not only run away with the time which fhould be given to better things, but gradually deftroy all tafte for better things. They fink the mind to their own standard, and give it a fluggifh reluctance, we had almost faid, a moral incapacity for every thing above their level. The mind, by long habit

A DEVOTIONAL SPIRIT.

habit of ftooping, lofes its erectnefs, and yields to its degradation. It becomes fo low and narrow by the littlenefs of the things which engage it, that it requires a painful effort to lift itfelf high enough, or to open itfelf wide enough, to embrace great and noble objects. The appetite is vitiated. Excefs, inftead of producing a furfeit, by weakening the digeftion, only induces a loathing for ftronger nourifhment. The faculties which might have been expanding in works of science, or foaring in the contemplation of genius, become fatisfied with the impertinences of the most ordinary fiction, lose their relifh for the feverity of truth, the elegance of tafte, and the foberness of religion. Lulled in the torpor of repose, the intellect dozes, and enjoys in its waking dream,

All the wild trafh of fleep, without the reft.

In avoiding books which excite the paffions, it would feem ftrange to include even fome devotional works. Yet fuch as merely kindle warm feelings are not always the fafeft. Let us rather prefer those which, while they tend tend to raife a devotional fpirit, awaken the affections without difordering them, which while they elevate the defires, purify them : which fhew us our own nature, and lay open its corruptions. Such as fhew us the malignity of fin, the deceitfulness of our hearts, the feeblenefs of our beft refolutions: fuchas teach us to pull off the mask from the faireft appearances, and difcover every hidingplace, where fome lurking evil would conceal itfelf; fuch as fhew us not what we appear to others, but what we really are; fuch as, co-operating with our interior feelings, and shewing us our natural state, point out our abfolute need of a Redeemer, lead us to feek to him for pardon from a conviction that there is no other refuge, no other falvation. Let us be converfant with fuch writings as teach us that while we long to obtain the remiflion of our tranfgreffions, we must not defire the remission of our duties. Let us feek for fuch a Saviour as will not only deliver us from the punishment. of fin, but from its dominion alfo.

The

The conftant habit of perufing devout books is fo indifpenfable, that it has been termed with great propriety the oil of the lamp of prayer. Too much reading, however, and too little meditation, may produce the effect of a lamp inverted, which is extinguifhed by the very excefs of that aliment whofe property it is to feed it.

And let us ever bear in mind that the end of prayer is not anfwered when the Prayer is finished. We should regard prayer as a means to a farther end. The act of prayer is not sufficient, we must cultivate a spirit of prayer. And though, when the actual devotion is over, we cannot, amid the difstractions of company and business, always be thinking of heavenly things, yet the defire, the frame, the propensity, the willingness to return to them, we must, however difficult, endeavour to maintain.

The proper temper for prayer fhould precede the act. The difposition should be wrought in the mind before the exercise is begun. To bring a proud temper to an humble humble prayer, a luxurious habit to a felfdenying prayer, or a worldly difposition to a spiritually minded prayer, is a positive anomaly. A habit is more powerful than an act, and a previously indulged temper during the day will not, it is to be feared, be fully counteracted by the exercise of a few minutes devotion at night.

Prayer is defigned for a perpetual renovation of the motives to virtue, if therefore the caufe is not followed by its confequence, a confequence inevitable but for the impediments we bring to it, we rob our nature of its higheft privilege, and run the danger of incurring a penalty where we are looking for a bleffing.

That the habitual tendency of the life fhould be the preparation for the flated prayer, is naturally fuggested to us by our bleffed Redeemer in his Sermon on the Mount. He announced the precepts of holiness, and their corresponding beatitudes; he gave the spiritual exposition of the Law, the directions for alms-giving, the exhortation ation to love our enemies, nay, the effence and fpirit of the whole Decalogue, previous to his delivering his own divine prayer, as a pattern for our's. Let us learn from this that the preparation of prayer is therefore to live in all those pursuits which we may fafely beg of God to bless, and in a conflict with all those temptations into which we pray not to be led.

A DEVOTIONAL SPIRIT. 137

If God be the centre to which our hearts are tending, every line in our lives muft meet in him. With this point in view there will be a harmony between our prayers and our practice, a confiftency between devotion and conduct, which will make every part turn to this one end, bear upon this one point. For the beauty of the Chriftian fcheme confifts not in parts, (however good in themfelves) which tend to feparate views, and lead to different ends; but it arifes from its being one entire, uniform, connected plan, "compacted of that which every joint fupplieth," and of which all the parts terminate in this one grand ultimate point.

The

CULTIVATION OF

The defign of Prayer therefore, as we before observed, is not merely to make us devout while we are engaged in it, but that its odour may be diffused through all the intermediate fpaces of the day, enter into all its occupations, duties, and tempers. Nor must its refults be partial, or limited to eafy. and pleafant duties, but extend to fuch as are lefs alluring. When we pray, for inftance, for our enemies, the prayer must be rendered practical, must be made a means of fostening our fpirit, and cooling our refentment toward them. If we deferve their enmity, the true spirit of prayer will put us upon endeavouring to cure the fault which has excited it. If we do not deferve it, it will put us on striving for a placable temper, and we shall endeavour not to let flip fo favorable an occafion of cultivating it. There is no fuch foftener of animofity, no fuch foother of refentment, no fuch allayer of hatred, as fincere cordial prayer.

It is obvious, that the precept to pray without ceafing can never mean to enjoin a con-

A DEVOTIONAL SPIRIT.

a continual course of actual prayer. But while it more directly enjoins us to embrace all proper occafions of performing this facred duty, or rather of claiming this valuable privilege, fo it plainly implies that we fhould try to keep up constantly that fense of the divine prefence which shall maintain the difposition. In order to this, we should inure our minds to reflection; we should encourage ferious thoughts. A good thought barely paffing through the mind will make little impression on it. We must arrest it, constrain it to remain with us, expand, amplify, and, as it were, take it to pleces. It must be distinctly unfolded, and carefully examined, or it will leave no precise idea, it must be fixed and incorporated, or it will produce no practical effect. We must not difmifs it till it has left fome trace on the mind, till it has made fome impreffion on the heart.

On the other hand, if we give the reins to a loofe ungoverned fancy, at other times, if we abandon our minds to frivolous thoughts; if

if we fill them with corrupt images; if we cherish fensual ideas during the rest of the day, can we expect that none of these images will intrude, that none of these imprefions will be revived, but that " the temple into which foul things" have beeninvited will be cleanfed at a given moment; that worldly thoughts will recede and give place, at once, to pure and holy thoughts ? Will that fpirit, grieved by impurity, or refifted by levity, return with his warm beams, and cheering influences, to the contaminatedmanfion from which he has been driven out? Is it wonderful if finding no entrance into a heart filled with vanity he fhould withdraw himfelf ?--- We cannot, in retiring into our clofets, change our natures as we do our cloaths. The difposition we carry thither will be likely to remain with us. We have no right to expect that a new temper will meet us at the door. We can only hope that the fpirit we bring thither will be cherished and improved. It is not easy, rather it is not possible, to graft genuine devotion on a life of an oppofite tendency; nor can we delight ourfelves regularly for a few flated moments, in that God whom we have not been ferving during the day. We may, indeed, to quiet our confcience, take up the employment of prayer, but cannot take up the flate of mind which will make the employment beneficial to ourfelves, or the prayer acceptable to God, if all the previous day we have been carelefs of ourfelves, and unmindful of our Maker. They will not pray differently from the reft of the world, who do not live differently.

140

on

What a contradiction is it to lament the -weaknefs, the mifery, and the corruption of our nature, in our devotions, and then to rufh into a life, though not perhaps of vice, yet of indulgences, calculated to encreafe that weaknefs, to inflame those corruptions, and to lead to that mifery! There is either no meaning in our prayers, or no fense in our conduct. In the one we mock God, in the other we deceive ourfelves.

Will not he who keeps up an habitual intercourfe

142 CULTIVATION OF

tercourfe with his Maker, who is vigilant in thought, felf-denying in action, who ftrives to keep his heart from wrong defires, his mind from vain imaginations, and his lips from idle words, being a more prepared fpirit, a more collected mind, be more engaged, more penetrated, more prefent to the occafion? Will he not feel more delight in this devout exercife, reap more benefit from it, than he who lives at random, prays from cuftom, and who, though he dares not intermit the form, is a ftranger to its fpirit.

We fpeak not here to the felf-fufficient formalift, or the carelefs profligate. Among thofe whom we now take the liberty to addrefs, are to be found, efpecially in the higher clafs of females, the amiable and the interefting, and, in many refpects, the virtuous and correct : — characters fo engaging, fo evidently made for better things, fo capable of reaching high degrees of excellence, fo formed to give the tone to Chriftian practice, as well as to fashion, fo calculated to give a beautiful impression of that religion

A DEVOTIONAL SPIRIT.

-which they profess without fufficientlyadorning; which they believe without fairly exemplifying; that we cannot forbear taking a tender intereft in their welfare, we cannot forbear breathing a fervent prayer, that they may yet reach the elevation for which they were intended; that they may hold out a uniform and confiftent pattern, of " whatfoever things are pure, honeft, just, lovely, and of good report !" This the Apoftle goes on to intimate can only be done by THINKING ON THESE THINGS. Things can only influence our practice as they engage our attention. Would not then a confirmed habit of ferious thought tend to correct that inconfideration, which we are willing to hope, more than want of principle, lies at the bottom of the inconfistency we are lamenting ?

If, as it is generally allowed, the great difficulty of our fpiritual life is to make the future predominate over the prefent, do we not, by the conduct we are regretting, aggravate what it is in our power to diminish? Mifcal-

: 143

Mifcalculation of the relative value of things is one of the greateft errors of our moral life. We effimate them in an inverse proportion to their value, as well as to their duration: we lavish earness and durable thoughts on things so trifling that they deferve little regard, so brief that they "perish with the using," while we bestow only flight attention, on things of infinite worth, only transient thoughts, on things of eternal duration.

Thofe who are fo far confcientious as not to intermit a regular courfe of devotion, and who yet allow themfelves at the fame time to go on in a courfe of amufements which excite a directly opposite fpirit, are inconceivably augmenting their own difficulties. They are eagerly heaping up fuel in the day, on the fire which they intend to extinguish in the evening; they are voluntarily adding to the temptations, against which they mean to requeft grace to ftruggle. To acknowlege at the fame time, that we find it hard to ferve God as we ought, and yet to be fystematically indulging indulging habits, which must naturally increase the difficulty, makes our character almost ridiculous, while it renders our duty almost impracticable.

While we make our way more difficult by those very indulgences with which we think to cheer and refresh it, the determined Christian becomes his own pioneer; he makes his path comparatively easy by voluntarily clearing it of the obstacles which impede his progress.

Thefe habitual indulgences feem a contradiction to that obvious law, that one virtue always involves another; for we cannot labour after any grace, that of prayer for inftance, without refifting whatever is oppofite to it. If then we lament, that it is fo hard to ferve God, let us not by our conduct furnifh arguments againft ourfelves; for, as if the difficulty were not great enough in itfelf, we are continually heaping up mountains in our way, by indulging in fuch purfuits and paffions, as make a fmall labour an infurmountable one.

VOL.I.

H

We

We may often judge better of our ftate by the refult, than by the act of prayer, our very defects, our coldnefs, deadnefs, wanderings, may leave more contrition on the foul, than the happiest turn of thought. The feeling of our wants, the confession of our fins, the acknowledgment of our dependence, the renunciation of ourfelves, the fupplication for mercy, the application to " the fountain opened for fin," the cordial entreaty for the aid of the Spirit, the relinguishment of our own will, resolutions of better obedience, petitions that these refolutions may be directed and fanctified, thefe are the fubjects in which the fupplicant fhould be engaged, by which his thoughts fhould be abforbed. Can they be fo abforbed, if many of the intervening hours are paffed in purfuits of a totally different complexion? purfuits which raife the paffions which we are feeking to allay? Will the cherifhed vanities go at our bidding ? Will the required dispositions come at our calling? Do we find our tempers fo obedient, our paffions paffions fo obfequious in the other concerns of life? If not, what reafon have we to expect their obfequioufnefs in this grand concern? We fhould therefore endeavour to believe as we pray, to think as we pray, to feel as we pray, and to act as we pray. Prayer muft not be a folitary, independent exercife; but an exercife interwoven with many, and infeparably connected with that golden chain of Christian duties, of which, when fo connected, it forms one of the most important links.

Let us be careful that our cares, occupations and amufements may be always fuch that we may not be afraid to implore the divine bleffing on them; this is the criterion of their fafety and of our duty. Let us endeavour that in each, in all, one continually growing fentiment and feeling of loving, ferving, and pleafing God, maintain its predominant flation in the heart.

An additional reafon why we fhould live in the perpetual ufe of prayer, feems to be, that our bleffed Redeemer after having given both the example and the command, while on earth, condefcends ftill to be our unceafing interceffor in Heaven. Can we ever ceafe petitioning for ourfelves, when we believe that he never ceafes interceding for us ?

H 2

both

If we are fo unhappy as now to find little pleafure in this holy exercife, that however is fo far from being a reafon for difcontinuing it, that it affords the ftrongeft argument for perfeverance. That which was at first a form, will become a pleasure; that which was a burden will become a privilege; that which we impose upon ourfelves as a medicine, will become neceffary as an aliment, and defirable as a gratification. That which is now fhort and fuperficial, will become copious and folid. The chariot wheel is warmed by its own motion. Ufe will make that eafy which was at first painful. That which is, once become eafy will foon be rendered pleafant. Instead of repining at the performance, we shall be unhappy at the omiffion. When a man recovering from fickness attempts to walk, he does not dif.

A DEVOTIONAL SPIRIT. 149

difcontinue the exercife becaufe he feels himfelf weak, nor even becaufe the effort is painful. He rather redoubles his exertion. It is from his perfeverance that he looks for ftrength. An additional turn every day diminifhes his repugnance, augments his vigour, improves his fpirits. That effort which was fubmitted to becaufe it was falutary, is continued becaufe the feeling of renovated ftrength renders it delightful.

Digitized by Google

[150]

CHAP. VII.

The Love of God.

OUR love to God arifes out of want. God's love to us out of fulnels. Our indigence draws us to that power which can relieve, and to that goodnefs which can blefs us. His overflowing love delights to make us partakers of the bounties he gracioufly imparts, not only in the gifts of his Providence, but in the richer communications of his grace. We are first drawn to love him from the confideration of his mercies, from the experience of his bounties; but this confideration and this experience in a rightly turned mind lead us to love him for his own excellences. We can only be faid to love God, when we endeavour to glorify him, when we defire a participation of his nature, when we ftudy to imitate his perfections.

We

We are fometimes inclined to fufpect the love of God to us. We are too little fufpicious of our want of love to him. Yet if we examine the cafe by evidence, as we fhould examine any common question, what real inftances can we produce of our love to Him? What imaginable inftance can we not produce of his love to us? If neglect, forgetfulness, ingratitude, difobedience, coldness in our affections, deadness in our duty, be evidences of our love to him, fuch evidences, but fuch only, we can abundantly allege. If life and all the countlefs catalogue of mercies that makes life pleafant, be proofs of his love to us, thefe he has given us in hand : - if life eternal, if bleffednefs that knows no measure and no end, be proofs of love, thefe he has given us in promife --- to the Christian we had almost faid, he has given them in poffession.

When the adoring foul is gratefully expatiating on the inexhaustible instances of the love of God to us, let it never forget to rife to its most exalted pitch, to reft on its its loftieft object, His ineftimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jefus Christ. This is the crowning point; this is the gift which imparts their highest value to all his other gifts. It combines whatever can render divine munificence compleat : ---pardon of fin, acceptance with God, perfection and perpetuity of bleffednefs. Well may the Christian in the devout contemplation of this fublime mystery, which the higheft of all created intelligences " defire to look into," exclaim in grateful rapture, "Thou art the God that doeft wonders!" A redeemed world is the triumph of infinity. Power and goodness, truth and mercy, righteoufnefs and peace, incorporated and loft in each other!

H 4

Love is a grace of fuch pre-eminent diftinction, that the Redeemer is emphatically defignated by it. To HIM THAT LOVED. This is fuch a characteristic style and us. title that no name is appended to it.

It must be an irkfome thing to ferve a mafter whom we do not love; a master whom we

we are compelled to obey, though we think his requifitions hard, and his commands unreafonable; under whofe eye we know that we continually live, though his prefence is: not only undelightful but formidable.

Now every creature must obey God, whether he love him or not : he must act always in his fight, whether he delight in him or not; and to a heart of any feeling, to a fpirit of any liberality, nothing is fo grating as conftrained obedience. To love God, to ferve him becaufe we love him, is therefore no lefs our higheft happinefs, than our most bounden duty. Love makes all labor light. We ferve with alacrity, where we love with cordiality.

Where the heart is devoted to an object, we require not to be perpetually reminded of our obligations to obey him : they prefent themfelves fpontaneoufly, we fulfil them readily, I had almost faid, involuntarily; we think not fo much of the fervice as of the object. The principle which fuggefts the work infpires the pleafure; to neglect it, would

нs

would be an injury to our feelings. The performance is the gratification. The omiffion is not more a pain to the confcience, than a wound to the affections. The implantation of this vital root perpetuates virtuous practice, and fecures internal peace.

Though we cannot be always thinking of God, we may be always employed in his ferivce. There must be intervals of our communion with him, but there must he no intermission of our attachment to him. The tender father who labours for his children, does not always employ his thoughts about them; he cannot be always conversing with them, or concerning them, yet he is always engaged in promoting their interefts. His affection for them is an inwoven principle, of which he gives the most unequivocal evidence, by the affiduoufnefs of his application in their fervice.

" Thou, shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart," is the primary law of our Religion. Yet how apt are we to complain that we cannot love God, that we cannot not maintain a devout intercourfe with him. But would God, who is all justice, have commanded that of which he knew we were incapable? Would he who is all mercy have made our eternal happiness to depend on fomething which he knew was out of our power to perform, capriciously disqualifying us for the duty he had prefcribed? Would he have given the exhortation, and withheld the capacity? This would be to charge Omnifcience with folly, and Infinite Goodnefs with injustice --- no, when he made duty and happinefs infeparable, he neither made our duty impracticable, nor our happiness unattainable. But we are continually flying to falle refuges, clinging to falfe holds, refting on falfe fupports : as they are uncertain they difappoint us, as they are weak they fail us ; but as they are numerous, when one fails, another prefents itfelf. Till they flip from under us, we never fufpect how much we refted upon them. Life glides away in a perpetual fucceffion of these false dependencies and fucceffive privations.

н б

Though

156 THE LOVE OF GOD.

Though we may be in a flate of acceptance with God, without those feelings of joy and confidence which fome confider as the only evidences of fafety, yet let us remember that thefe, though not indifpenfable, are most defirable characters of religion. Let us be patient if we do not posses fuch a state of mind, but let us never be fatisfied not to defire it. Let us efpecially never reft contented while ordinary amufements, worldly events, pleafing fociety excite a feeling of delight which religion has never yet excited in us. Let us be humbled but not terrified. if it pleafe God to withhold from us this " peace and joy in believing;" but let us feel a deep felf-abafement to obferve with what different fenfations we receive the impreffions which the pleafures of fenfe convey. to us; that though from a principle of confcience we follow up our religious exercifes, yet that God only receives from us a duty of neceffity and obligation, of coldness and conftraint, while the worldly purfuits monopolize our pleafurable feelings as well as our time and thoughts.

There

THE LOVE OF GOD.

There is, as we have elfewhere obferved. a ftriking analogy between the natural and fpiritual life, the weakness and helplefiness of the Christian resemble those of the infant: neither of them becomes strong, vigorous, and full grown at once, but through a long and often painful courfe. This keeps up a fenfe of dependence, and accustoms us to lean on the hand which fofters us. There is in both conditions, an imperceptible chain of depending circumstances, by which we are carried on infenfibly to the vigour of maturity. The operation which is not always obvious, is always progreffive. Bv attempting to walk alone, we difcover our weaknefs, the experience of that weaknefs. humbles us, and every fall drives us back to the fuftaining hand, whole affiftance we vainly flattered ourfelves we no longer. needed.

In fome halcyon moments we are willing to perfuade ourfelves that Religion has made an entire conqueft over our heart; that we have renounced the dominion of the world,

Digitized by Google

world, have conquered our attachment to earthly things. We flatter ourfelves that nothing can now again obstruct our entire fubmiffion. But we know not what fpirit we are of. We fay this in the calm of repofe and in the ftillnefs of the paffions; when our path is fmooth, our profpect fmiling, danger diftant, temptation absent, when we have many comforts and no trials. Suddenly, some loss, some disappointment, some privation tears off the maik, reveals us to ourfelves. We at once difcover that though the fmaller fibres and leffer roots which fasten us down to earth may have been loofened by preceding ftorms, yet our fubstantial hold on earth is not shaken, the tap root is not cut, we are yet fast rooted to the foil, and still stronger tempests must be fent to make us let go our hold.

In all Academical Inftitutions a broad foundation is provided, and a large flock of general preparatory fludy is proposed to be laid in before it is determined to what particular profession the fludent shall be called. The

Digitized by Google

The preliminary purfuits are afterwards convertible to fuch individual purposes as may eventually arife. That student would be but indifferently qualified for his own profession. without this large initiatory bafis. The fpiritual character (hould be formed formewhat in the fame manner with the intellectual. We must be prepared by a general previous discipline to meet all the dispensations of divine Providence, without knowing to what fpecific trials and duties we maybe called out. It is not enough therefore that we meet expected events with fubmiffion to the will of God; we must strive after such a general fpirit of acquiescence as shall fit us for those that are unforefeen. In fuch a world as this, fudden attacks, unlooked-for affaults must be met with a spirit armed for the conflict. We should live, not in the tormenting dread of indefinite evils, but with the expectation of their probable occurrence; for encountering which a flock of fuperinduced ftrength laid in by habitual prayer will be the only armour. We must not prefumptuoufly tuoufly truft for fafety under trials to the refiftance we fancy we fhall then be able to make, fo much as to the collected forces of antecedent piety; for the grace of refiftance may be withheld where habits of piety have not been cultivated.

It might be useful to adopt the habit of ftating our own cafe as ftrongly to ourfelves as if it were the cafe of another; to exprefs in fo many words, thoughts which are not apt to affume any fpecific or palpable form; thoughts which we avoid fhaping into language, but flur over, generalize, foften, and do away. How indignant, for inftance, fhould we feel (though we ourfelves make the complaint) to be told by others, that we do not love our Maker and Preferver. But let us put the queftion fairly to ourfelves. Do we really love him? Do we love him with a fupreme, nay, even with an equal affection ? Is there no friend, no child, no reputation, no pleafure, no fociety, no poffeffion which we do not prefer to him ? It is eafy to affirm in a general way that thereis is not. But let us particularize, individualize the queftion — bring it home to our own hearts in fome actual inftance, in fome tangible fhape. Let us commune with our own conficiences, with our own feelings, with our own experience : let us queftion pointedly, and anfwer honeftly. Let us not be more afhamed to detect the fault, than to have been guilty of it.

This then will commonly be the refult. Let the friend, child, reputation, poffeffion, pleafure be endangered, but efpecially let it be taken away by fome stroke of Providence. The fcales fall from our eyes; we fee, we feel, we acknowledge, with brokenness of heart, not only for our lofs, but for our fin, that though we did love God, yet we loved him not fuperlatively; that we loved the bleffing, threatened or refumed, still more. But this is one of the cafes in which " the goodness of God bringeth us to repentance." By the operation of his grace the refumption of the gift brings back the heart to the giver. The Almighty by his fpirit takes takes poffession of the Temple from which the idol is driven out: God is reinstated in his rights, and becomes the fupreme and undifputed Lord of our reverential affection.

There are three requifites to our proper enjoyment of every earthly bleffing which God beftows on us—a thankful reflection on the goodnefs of the giver, a deep fenfe of the unworthinefs of the receiver, and a fober recollection of the precarious tenure by which we hold it. The firft would make us grateful, the fecond humble, the laft moderate.

But how feldom do we receive his favours in this fpirit! As if religious gratitude were to be confined to the appointed days of public thankfgiving, how rarely in common fociety do we hear any recognition of Omnipotence even on thofe ftriking and heartrejoicing occafions, when " with his own right hand, and with his holy arm, He has gotten himfelf the victory!" Let us never detract from the merit of our valiant leaders, but rather honour them the more for for this manifestation of divine power in their favour; but let us never lose fight of Him " who teacheth their hands to war and their fingers to fight." Let us never forget that " He is the Rock, that his work is perfect, and all his ways are judgment."

How many feem to fhew not only their want of affiance in God, but that " he is not in all their thoughts," by their appearing to leave him entirely out of their concerns, by projecting their affairs without any reference to him, by setting out on the flock of their own unaffisted wifdom, contriving and acting independently of God; expecting profperity in the event, without feeking his direction in the outfet, and taking to themfelves the whole honour of the fuccefs without any recognition of his hand; do they not thus virtually imitate what Sophocles makes his bluftering Atheift * boaft. " Let other men expect to conquer with the affiftance of the Gods, I intend to gain honour without them."

* Ajax.

The

The Chriftian will rather rejoice to afcribe the glory of his profperity to the fame hand to which our own manly Queen gladly afcribed her fignal victory. When after the defeat of the Armada, impioufly termed Invincible, her enemies, in order to lower the value of her agency, alleged that the victory was not owing to her, but to God who had raifed the ftorm, fhe heroically declared that the vifible interference of God in her favour, was that part of the fuccels from which fhe derived the trueft honour.

Incidents and occafions every day arife, which not only call on us to truft in God, but which furnifh us with fuitable occafions of vindicating, if I may prefume to ufe the expression, the character and conduct of the Almighty in the government of human affairs; yet there is no duty which we perform with lefs alacrity. Strange, that we should treat the Lord of heaven and earth with lefs confidence than we exercise towards each other! That we should vindicate the honour of a common acquaintance with more zeal than

THE LOVE OF GOD.

than that of our infulted Maker and Preferver!

If we hear a friend accufed of any act of injuctice, though we cannot bring any pofitive proof why he should be acquitted of this fpecific charge, yet we refent the injury offered to his character ; we clear him of the individual allegation on the ground of his general conduct, inferring that from the numerous inftances we can produce of his rectitude on other occasions, he cannot be guilty of the alleged injustice. We reafon from analogy, and in general we reafon But when we prefume to judge of fairly. the Most High, instead of vindicating his rectitude on the fame grounds, under a Providence feemingly fevere ; inftead of reverting, as in the cafe of our friend, to the thousand instances we have formerly tasted of his kindness, instead of giving God the fame credit we give to his erring creature, and inferring from his past goodness, that the prefent inexplicable difpensation must be confistent, though we cannot explain how, with

THE LOVE OF GOD.

with his general character, we mutinoufly accufe him of inconfiftency, nay of injuftice. We admit virtually the most monstrous anomaly in the character of the perfect God.

But what a clue has Revelation furnished to the intricate labyrinth which seems to involve the conduct which we impiously queftion! It unrols the volume of divine Providence, lays open the mysterious Map of infinite wisdom, throws a bright light on the darkest dispensations, vindicates the inequality of appearances, and points to that bleffed region, where to all who have truly loved and ferved God, every apparent wrong shall be proved to have been unimpeachably right, every affliction a mercy, and the feverest trials the choicest bleffings.

So blind has fin made us, that the glory of God is concealed from us, by the very means which, could we difcern aright, would difplay it. That train of fecond caufes, which he has fo marvelloufly difpofed, obftructs our view of himfelf. We are fo filled with wonder at the immediate effect, that that our fhort fight penetrates not to the first cause. To see him as he is, is referved to be the happiness of a better world. We shall then indeed "admire him in his Saints, and in all them that believe;" we shall see how necessary it was for those whose bliss is now so perfect, to have been poor, and despised, and oppressed. We shall see why the "ungodly were in such prosperity." Let us give God credit here for what we shall then fully know; let us adore now, what we shall understand hereafter.

They who take up Religion on a falfe ground will never adhere to it. If they adopt it merely for the peace and pleafantnefs it brings, they will defert it as foon as they find their adherence to it will bring them into difficulty, diftrefs, or difcredit. It feldom anfwers therefore to attempt making profelytes by hanging out falfe colours. The Chriftian " endures as feeing him who is invifible." He who adopts Religion for the fake of immediate enjoyment, will not do a virtuous action that is difagreeable able to himfelf; nor refift a temptation that is alluring, prefent pleafure being his motive. There is no fure bafis for virtue but the love of God in Chrift Jefus, and the bright reverfion for which that love is pledged. Without this, as foon as the paths of piety become rough and thorny, we fhall ftray into pleafanter paftures.

Religion however has her own peculiar advantages. In the transactions of all worldly affairs, there are many and great difficulties. There may be feveral ways out of which to chuse. Men of the first understanding are not always certain which of these ways is the best. Perfons of the deepest penetration are full of doubt and perplexity; their minds are undecided how to act, less while they pursue one road, they may be neglecting another, which might better have conducted them to their proposed end.

In religion the cafe is different, and in this refpect, eafy. As a Christian can have but one object in view, he is also certain there is but one way of attaining it. Where 4 there there is but one end it prevents all poffibility of chufing wrong, where there is but one road it takes away all perplexity as to the courfe of purfuit. That we fo often wander wide of the mark, is not from any want of plainnefs in the path, but from the perverfenefs of our will in not chufing it, from the indolence of our minds in not following it up.

168

In our attachments to earthly things even the most innocent, there is always a danger of excess, but from this danger we are here perfectly exempt, for there is no poffibility of excess in our love to that being who has demanded the whole heart. This peremptory requisition cuts off all debate. Had God required only a portion, even were it a large portion, we might be puzzled in fettling the quantum. We might be plotting how large a part we might venture to keep back without abfolutely forfeiting our fafety; we might be haggling for deductions, bargaining for abatements, and be perpetually compromifing with our Maker. VOL. L. I

169

Maker. But the injunction is entire, the command is definite, the portion is unequivocal. Though it is fo compressed in the expreffion, yet it is fo expansive and ample in the measure; it is fo distinct a claim, fo imperative a requifition of all the faculties of the mind, and ftrength ; all the affections of the heart and foul; that there is not the least opening left for litigation; no place for any thing but abfolute unreferved compliance. But though our love of God can never be exceffive in the degree, yet the expreffion of that love may be indifcreet, the exercife of it may be eccentric. We may debafe that which is noble by low and puerile language; we may tarnish that which is pure by groffnefs; and diforder it by irregularity. Though the principle may be found there may be illufion in its application. Our love must operate in fuch instances as God has commanded, and not in fuch as fuperfition has devifed or enthufiasm invented. The pure fountain must not be polluted with earthly infufions; the expression expression of our love to our heavenly father must not be degraded by images borrowed from human passions, nor difhonoured by ideas, nor rendered grossly familiar by phrases which are fcarcely pardonable even when applied to those passions.

Every thing which relates to God is infinite. We must therefore, while we keep our hearts humble, keep our aims high. Our higheft fervices indeed are but finite, imperfect. But as God is unlimited in goodnefs, he fhould have our unlimited love. The best we can offer is poor, but let us not withhold that beft. He deferves incomparably more than we have to give, let us not give him lefs than all. If he has ennobled our corrupt nature with fpiritual affections, let us not refuse their noblest aspirations, to their nobleft object. Let him not behold us fo prodigally lavishing our affections on the meanest of his bounties, as to have nothing left for himfelf. As the ftandard of every thing in religion is high, let us endeavour to act in it with the highest intention 12 intention of mind, with the largeft use of our faculties. Let us obey him with the most intense love, adore him with the most fervent gratitude. Let us " praise him according to his excellent greatness." Let us ferve him with all the ftrength of our capacity, with all the devotion of our will.

Grace being a new principle added to our natural powers, as it determines the defires to a higher object, fo it adds vigour to their activity. We shall best prove its dominion over us by defiring to exert ourfelves in the caufe of heaven with the fame energy with which we once exerted ourfelves in the caufe of the world. The world was too little to fill our whole capacity. Scaliger lamented how much was loft becaufe fo fine a poet as Claudian, in his choice of a fubject, wanted matter worthy of his talents; but it is the felicity of the Christian to have chosen a theme to which all the powers of his heart and of his understanding will be found inadequate. It is the glory of religion to fupply an object worthy of the entire confecration tion of every power, faculty, and affection of an immaterial, immortal being.—Chriftianity demands the energies of the entire man; its worfhip the choiceft portion of his time; its doctrines the ftrenuous exertion of his intellectual powers; its duties the ftretch and compafs of his wideft endeavours; its truths the higheft exercife of his faith; its promifes of his hopes. It prefents objects commenfurate to thofe large capacities, and inextinguifhable defires which God gave him when he provided a bleffednefs fo worthy to fill and fatisfy them.

173

[174]

CHAP. VIII.

The Hand of God to be acknowledged in the daily Circumstances of Life.

IF we would indeed love God let us " acquaint ourfelves with him." The word of infpiration has affured us that there is no other way to "be at peace." As we cannot love an unknown God, fo neither can we know him, or even approach toward that knowledge, but on the terms which he himfelf holds out to us; neither will he fave us but in the method which he has himfelf prefcribed. His very perfections, the just objects of our adoration, all stand in the way of creatures fo guilty. His justice is the flaming fword which excludes us from the Paradife we have forfeited. His purity is fo oppofed to our corruptions, his omnipotence to our infirmity, his wildom to our folly, that had we not to plead the great propitiation, those very attributes which are now our truft, would would be our terror. The most opposite images of human conception, the widest extremes of human lauguage, are used for the purpose of shewing what God is to us, in our natural state, and what he is under the Christian dispensation. The "consuming fire" is transformed into effential "love."

But as we cannot find out the Almighty to perfection, fo we cannot love him with that pure flame which animates glorified fpirits. But there is a preliminary acquaintance with him, an initial love of him, for which he has furnifhed us with means by his works, by his word, and by his Spirit. Even in this bleak and barren foil fome germs will fhoot, fome bloffoms will open, of that celeftial plant, which, watered by the dews of heaven, and ripened by the Sun of Righteoufnefs, will, in a more genial clime, expand into the fulnefs of perfection, and bear immortal, fruits in the Paradife of God.

A perfon of a cold phlegmatic temper, who laments that he wants that fervor in his love of the Supreme Being, which is apparent in

I4

Digitized by Google

in more ardent characters, may take comfort, if he find the fame indifference respecting his worldly attachments. But if his affections are intense towards the perishable things of earth, while they are dead to such as are spiritual, it does not prove that he is destitute of passions, but only that they are not directed to the proper object. If however he love God with that measure of feeling with which God has endowed him, he will not be punished or rewarded, because the stock is greater or smaller than that of some other of his fellow-creatures.

In those intervals when our fense of divine things is weak and low, we must not give way to distrust, but warm our hearts with the recollection of our best moments. Our motives to love and gratitude are not now diminiss to love and gratitude are not now diminished, but our spiritual frame is lower, our natural spirits are weaker. Where there is languor there will be discouragements. But we must not defist. "Faint yet purfuing" must be the Christian's motto.

There is more merit (if ever we dare apply fo

Digitized by Google

fo arrogant a word to our worthlefs efforts) in perfevering under depression and discomfort, than in the happiest flow of devotion. when the tide of health and fpirits runs high. Where there is lefs gratification there is more diffintereftedness. We ought to confider it as a cheering evidence, that our love may be equally pure though it is not equally fervent, when we perfift in ferving our heavenly father with the fame conftancy, though it may pleafe him to withdraw from us the fame confolations. Perfeverance may bring us to the very difpositions the absence of which we are lamenting.-"" O tarry thou the Lord's leifure, be ftrong and he shall comfort thy heart."

We are too ready to imagine that we are religious becaufe we know fomething of religion. We appropriate to ourfelves the pious fentiments we read, and we talk as if the thoughts of other men's heads were really the feeling of our own hearts. But piety has not its feat in the memory, but in the

15

ĸ

the affections, for which however the memory is an excellent purveyor, though a bad fubftitute. Inftead of an undue elation of heart when we perufe fome of the Plalmist's beautiful effusions, we should feel a deep felf-abafement at the reflection, that however our cafe may fometimes refemble his, yet how inapplicable to our hearts are the ardent expressions of his repentance, the overflowing of his gratitude, the depth of his fubmiffion, the entireness of his felfdedication, the fervor of his love.' But he who indeed can once fay with him " Thou art my portion," will like him furrender himfelf unrefervedly to his fervice.

It is important that we never fuffer our faith, any more than our love, to be depreffed or elevated, by mistaking for its own operations, the ramblings of a busy imagination. The steady principle of faith must not look for its character, to the vagaries of a mutable and fantastic Fancy — La folle de la Maifon, as she has been well denominated. Faith

Faith which has once fixed her foot on the immutable rock of ages, fastened her firm eye on the cross, and stretched out her triumphant hand to feize the promifed crown, will not fuffer her stability to depend on this ever-shifting faculty; she will not be driven to despair, by the blackess thades of its pencil, nor be betrayed into a careles fecurity, by its most flattering and vivid colours.

One cause of the fluctuations of our faith is, that we are too ready to judge the Almighty by our own low standard. We judge him not by his own declarations of what he is, and what he will do, but by our own feelings and practices. We ourfelves are too little disposed to forgive those who have offended us. We therefore conclude that God cannot pardon our offences. We fufpect him to be implacable becaufe we are apt to be fo, and we are unwilling to believe that he can pass by injuries, because we find it fo hard to do it. When we do forgive, it is grudgingly and fuperficially; we there-1 6 fore fore infer that God cannot forgive freely and fully. We make a hypocritical diffinction between forgiving and forgetting injuries. God clears away the fcore when he grants the pardon. He does not only fay, "thy fins and thy iniquities will I forgive," but "I will remember no more."

We are difpofed to urge the fmallnefs of our offences, as a plea for their forgivenes; whereas God, to exhibit the boundleffnefs of his own mercy, has taught us to alledge a plea directly contrary, " Lord, pardon my iniquity, for it is great." To natural reafon this argument of David is most extraordinary. But while he felt that the greatnefs of his own iniquity left him no refource, but in the mercy of God, he felt that God's mercy was greater even than his own fin. What a large, what a magnificent idea, does it give us of the divine power and goodnefs that the believer, inftead of pleading the fmallnefs of his own offences as a motive forpardon, pleads only the abundance of the divine compassion !

We

Digitized by Google

We are told that it is the duty of the Christian to "feek God." We affent to the truth of the proposition. Yet it would be less irksome to corrupt nature, in pursuit of this knowledge, to go a pilgrimage to distant lands, than to feek him within our own hearts. Our own heart is the true terra incognita; a land more foreign and unknown to us, than the regions of the polar circle: yet that heart is the place, in which an acquaintance with God must be fought. It is there we must worship him, if we would worship him in fpirit and in truth.

But, alas! the heart is not the home of a worldly man, it is fcarcely the home of a Christian. If business and pleafure are the natural element of the generality; a dreary vacuity, floth, and infensibility, too often worse than both, difincline, difqualify too many Christians for the pursuit.

I have obferved, and I think I have heard others obferve, that a common beggar had rather fcreen himfelf under the wall of a churchyard, if overtaken by a fhower of rain, though though the church-doors ftand invitingly open, than take fhelter within it, while divine fervice is performing. It is a lefs annoyance to him to be drenched with the ftorm, than to enjoy the convenience of a fhelter and a feat, if he must enjoy them at the heavy price of listening to the Sermon.

181

While we condemn the beggar, let us look into our own hearts; happy if we cannot there detect fomewhat of the fame-indolence, indifpofedness, and distaste to serious things! Happy, if we do not find, that we prefer not only our pleafure and enjoyments, but, I had almost faid, our very pains, and vexations, and inconveniences, to communing with our Maker! Happy, if we had not rather be abforbed in our petty cares, and little difturbances, provided we can contrive to make them the means of occupying our thoughts, filling up our minds, and drawing them away from that devout intercourfe, which demands the liveliest exercife of our rational powers, the highest elevation elevation of our fpiritual affections! It is not to be apprehended, that the dread of being driven to this facred intercourfe, is one grand caufe of that activity, and reftleffnefs, which fets the world in fuch perpetual motion?

Though we are ready to express a general fense of our confidence in Almighty goodnefs, yet what definite meaning do we annex to the expression? What practical evidences have we to produce, that we really do trust him? Does this trust deliver us from worldly anxiety? Does it exonerate us from the fame perturbation of fpirit. which those endure who make no fuch profeffion? Does it relieve the mind from doubt and distrust? Does it tranquillize the troubled heart, does it regulate its diforders, and compose its fluctuations? Does it foothe us under irritation? Does it support us under trials? Does it fortify us aganst temptations? Does it lead us to repofe a full confidence in that Being whom we profels to truft? Does it produce in us " that

"that work of righteoufnefs which is peace." that effect of righteoufnefs, which is "quietnefs and affurance for ever?" Do we commit ourfelves and our concerns to God in word, or in reality? Does this implicit reliance fimplify our defires? Does it induce us to credit the testimony of his word and the promifes of his Gospel? Do we not even entertain fome fecret fuspicions of his faithfulnefs and truth in our hearts, when we perfuade others and try to perfuade ourfelves that we unrefervedly truft him ?

In the preceding Chapter we endeavoured to illustrate our want of Love to God by our not being as forward to vindicate the divine conduct as to justify that of an acquaintance. The fame illustration may express our reluctance to trust in God. If a tried friend engage to do us a kindness, though he may not think it neceffary to explain the particular manner in which he intends to do it, we repose on his word. Affured of the refult, we are neither very inquisitive about the mode nor the detail. But do we treat treat our Almighty friend with the fame liberal confidence? Are we not murmuring becaufe we cannot fee all the process of his administration, and follow his movements ftep by ftep? Do we wait the developement of his plan, in full affurance that the iffue will be ultimately good? Do we trust that he is as abundantly willing as able to do more for us than we can ask or think, if by our fuspicions we do not offend him, if by our infidelity we do not provoke him? In short do we not think ourselves utterly undone, when we have only Providence to trust to?

We are perhaps ready enough to acknowledge God in our mercies, nay, we confefs him in the ordinary enjoyments of life. In fome of these common mercies, as in a bright day, a refreshing shower, delightful scenery; a kind of sensitive pleasure, an hilarity of spirits, a fort of animal enjoyment, though of a refined nature, mixes itself with our devotional feelings; and though we confess and adore the bountiful Giver, we

we do it with a little mixture of felf-complacency, and of human gratification, which he pardons and accepts.

But we must look for him in fcenes lefs animating, we must acknowledge him on occasions lefs exhilarating, lefs fensibly gratifiing. It is not only in his promifes that God manifest his mercy. His threatenings are proofs of the fame conpassionate love. He threatens, not to punish, but by the warning, to fnatch from the punishment.

We may alfo trace marks of his hand not only in the awful vifitations of life, not only in the feverer difpenfations of his Providence, but in vexations fo trivial that we fhould hefitate to fufpect that they are Providential appointments, did we not know that our daily life is made up of unimportant circumftances rather than of great events. As they are however of fufficient importance to exercife the Chiftian tempers and affections, we may trace the hand of our heavenly father in those daily little difappointments, and hourly vexations, which occur even in the

the most prosperous state, and which are infeparable from the condition of humanity. We must trace that fame beneficent hand, fecretly at work for our purification, our correction, our weaning from life, in the imperfections and difagreeableness of those who may be about us, in the perverseness of those with whom we transact business, and in those interruptions which break in on our favourite engagements.

We are perhaps too much addicted to our innocent delights, or we are too fond of our leifure, of our learned, even of our religious leifure. But while we fay, " it is good for us to be here," the divine vifion is withdrawn, and we are compelled to come down, from the mount. Or, perhaps, we do not improve our retirement for the purpofes for which it was granted, and to which we had refolved to devote it, and our time is broken in upon to make us more fenfible of its value. Or we feel a complacency in our retirement, a pride in our books; perhaps we feel proud of the good things we are intending tending to fay, or meditating to write, or preparing to do. A check is neceffary, yet it is given in a way almost imperceptible. The hand that gives it is unfeen, is unfufpected. yet it is the fame gracious hand which directs the most important events of life. An importunate application, a difqualifying though not fevere indifposition, a family avocation, a letter important to the writer, but unfeasonable to us, breakes in on our projected privacy; calls us to a facrifice of our inclination, to a renunciation of our own will. These inceffant trials of temper, if well improved, may be more falutary to the mind, than the fineft paffage we had intended to read, or the fubliment fentiment we had fancied we fhould write.

187

Inftead then of going in fearch of great mortifications, as a certain clafs of pious writers recommend, let us chearfully bear, and diligently improve these inferior trials which God prepares for us. Submission to a cross which he inflicts, to a disappointment which he sends, to a contradiction of our felf-love, which.

which he appoints, is a far better exercife, than great penances of our own chufing. Perpetual conquefts over impatience, illtemper, and felf-will, indicate a better fpirit than any felf-impofed mortifications. We may traverfe oceans and fcale mountains on uncommanded pilgrimages, without pleafing God; we may pleafe him without any other exertion than by croffing our own will.

Perhaps you had been bufying your imagination with fome projected fcheme, not only lawful, but laudable. The defign was radically good, but the fuppofed value of your own agency, might too much interfere, might a little taint the purity of your best intentions. The motives were fo mixed that it was difficult to feparate them. Sudden fickness obstructed the defign. You naturally lament the failure, not perceiving that, however good the work might be for others, the fickness was better for yourfelf. An act of charity was in your intention, but God faw that your foul required the exercife

3

of

of a more difficult virtue; that humility and refignation, that the patience, acquiescence, and contrition of a fick bed, were more neceffary for you. He accepts the meditated work as far as it was defigned for his glory, but he calls his fervant to other duties, which were more falutary for him, and of which the mafter was the better judge. He fets afide his work, and orders him to wait; the more difficult part of his tafk. As far as your motive was pure, you will receive the reward of your unperformed charity, though not the gratification of the performance. If it was not pure, you are refcued from the danger attending a right action performed on a worldly principle. You may be the better Chriftian though one good deed is fubtracted from your catalogue.

By a life of activity and ufefulnefs, you had perhaps attracted the public efteem. An animal activity had partly ftimulated your exertions. The love of reputation begins to mix itfelf with your better motives. You do not, it is prefumed, act entirely, or chiefly chiefly for human applaule; but you are too fenfible to it. It is a delicious poifon which begins to infuse itself into your pureft cup. You acknowledge indeed the fublimity of higher motives, but do you never feel that, feparated from this accompaniment of felf, they would be too abstracted, too speculative, and might become too little productive both of activity and of fenfible gratification. You begin to feel the human incentive neceffary, and your fpirits would probably flag if it were withdrawn.

This fenfiblity to praife would gradually tarnish the purity of your best actions. He who fees your heart, as well as your works, mercifully fnatches you from the perils of prosperity. Malice is awakened. Your most meritorious actions are ascribed to the most corrupt motives. You are attacked just where your character is least vulnerable. The enemies whom your fuccefs raifed up, are raifed up by God, lefs to punish than to fave you. We are far from meaning that he can ever be the author of evil; he does not not excite or approve the calumny, but he uses your calumniators as inftruments of your purification. Your fame was too dear to you. It is a coftly facrifice, but God requires it. It must be offered up. You would gladly compound for any, for every other offering, but this is the offering he chufes: and while he gracioufly continues to employ you for his glory, he thus teaches you to renounce your own. He fends this trial as a teft by which you are to try yourfelf. He thus inftructs you not to abandon your Chriftian exertions, but to elevate the principle which infpired them, to defecate it from all impure admixtures.

2

By thus ftripping the moft engaging employments of this dangerous delight, by infufing fome drops of falutary bitternefs into your fweeteft draught, by fome of thefe illtafted but wholefome mercies, he gracioufly compels us to return to himfelf. By taking away the ftays by which we are perpetually propping up our frail delights, they fall to the ground. We are, as it were, driven back back to Him, who condefcends to receive us, after we have tried every thing elfe, and after every thing elfe has failed us, and though he knows we fhould not have returned to him if every thing elfe had not failed us. He makes us feel our weaknefs, that we may have recourfe to his ftrength, he makes us fenfible of our hitherto unperceived fins, that we may take refuge in his everlafting compafion.

VOL. 1.

Í 194]

CHAP. 1X.

Christianity universal in its Requisitions.

IT is not unufual to fee people get rid of fome of the most awful injunctions, and emancipate themfelves from fome of the most folemn requisitions of Scripture, by affecting to believe that they do not apply to them. They confider them as belonging exclusively to the first age of the Gospel, and to the individuals to whom they were immediately addressed is confequently the necessfity to observe them does not extend to perfons under an established Christianity, to hereditary Christians.

These exceptions are particularly applied to fome of the leading doctrines, fo forcibly and repeatedly preffed in the Epistles. The reasoners endeavour to perfuade themselves that it was only the Ephesians " who were dead in trespasses and fins"—that it was

CHRISTIANITY UNIVERSAL, &c. 195

was only the Galatians who were enjoined " not to fulfil the lufts of the flefh"-that it was only the Philippians who were "enemies to the Crofs of Chrift." They fhelter themfelves under the comfortable affurance of a geographical fecurity. As they know that they are neither Ephefians, Galatians, nor Philippians, they have of courfe little or nothing to do with the reproofs, expoltulations, or threatenings which were originally directed to the converts among those people. They confole themfelves with the belief that it was only thefe Pagans who "walked according to the course of this world"-who were " ftrangers from the covenants of promife"-" and who were without God in the world,"

But these felf-fatisfied critics would do well to learn that not only "circumcifion nor uncircumcifion," but baptism or no baptism "availeth nothing" (I mean as a mere form) "but a new creature." An irreligious professor of Christianity is as much "ftranger and foreigner," as a heathen; K 2 he he is no more "a fellow citizen of the Saints," and of the houfehold of God, "than a Coloffian or Galatian was, before the Chriftian difpenfation had reached them."

But if the perfons to whom the Apoftles preached had, before their conversion, no vices to which we are not liable, they had certainly difficulties afterwards from which we are happily exempt. There were indeed differences between them and us in external fituations, in local circumstances, references to which we ought certainly to take into the account in perufing the Epiftles. We allow that they were immediately, but we do not allow that they were exclusively, applicable to them. It would have been too limited an object for infpiration to have confined its instructions to any one period, when its purpole was the conversion and instruction of the whole unborn world. That these converts were miraculoufly " called out of darknefs into the marvellous light of the Gofpel"- that they were changed from gross blindness to a rapid illumination ---that that the embracing the new faith expoled them to perfecution, reproach and ignominy — that the few had to ftruggle against the world — that laws principalities and powers which support our faith opposed theirs these are distinctions of which we ought not to lose fight: nor should we 'forget that not only all the difadvantages lay on their fide in their antecedent condition, but that also all the superiority lies on ours in that which is subsequent.

But however the condition of the external flate of the Church might differ, there can be no neceffity for any difference in the interior flate of the individual Chriftian. On whatever high principles of devotednefs to God and love to man, they were called to act, we are called to act on precifely the fame. If their faith was called to more painful exertions, if their felf-denial to harder facrifices, if their renunciation of earthly things to feverer trials, let us thankfully remember this would naturally be the cafe, at the first introduction of a religion which κ_3 had had to combat with the pride, prejudices and enmity of corrupt nature, invefted with temporal power: — that the hoftile party would not fail to perceive how much the new religion oppofed itfelf to their corruptions, and that it was introducing a fpirit which was in direct and avowed hoftility to the fpirit of the world.

197

But while we are deeply thankful for the diminifhed difficulties of an eftablished faith, let us never forget that Christianity allows of no diminution in the temper, of no abatement in the fpirit, which constituted a Christtian in the first ages of the Church.

Chriftianity is precifely the fame religion now as it was when our Saviour was upon earth. The fpirit of the world is exactly the fame now as it was then. And if the most eminent of the Apostles, under the immediate guidance of inspiration, were driven to lament their conflicts with their own corrupt nature, the power of temptation, combining with their natural propenfities to evil, how can we expect that a lower faith, faith, a flackened zeal, an abated diligence, and an inferior holinefs will be accepted in us? Believers then, were not called to higher degrees of purity, to a more elevated devotion, to a deeper humility, to a greater rectitude, patience and fincerity, than they are called to in the age in which we live. The promifes are not limited to the period in which they were made, the aid of the Spirit is not confined to thole on whom it was first poured out. It was expressly declared, by St. Peter on its first effusion, to be promifed not only " to them and to their children, but to all who were afar off, even to as many as the Lord their God fhould call."

If then the fame falvation be now offered as was offered at first, is it not obvious that it must be worked out in the fame way? And as the fame Gospel retains the fame authority in all ages, so does it maintain the fame universality among all ranks. Christianity has no bye-laws, no particular exemptions, no individual immunities. That there is no appropriate way of attaining $\kappa 4$ falvation

200 CHRISTIANITY UNIVERSAL

falvation for a prince or a philosopher, is probably one reason why greatness and wifdom have so often rejected it. But if rank cannot plead its privileges, genius cannot claim its distinctions. That Christianity did not owe its success to the arts of rhetoric or the sophistry of the schools, but that God intended by it "to make foolish the wisdom of this world," actually explains why "the disputers of this world" have always been its enemies.

It would have been unworthy of the infinite God to have imparted a partial religion. There is but one "gate," and that a "ftrait" one; but one "way," and that a " narrow" one; there is but one falvation, and that a common one. The Gofpel enjoins the fame principles of love and obedience on all of every condition; offers the fame aids under the fame exigencies; the fame fupports under all trials; the fame pardon to all penitents; the fame Saviour to all believers; the fame rewards to all who " endure to the end." The temptations of one

one condition and the trials of another may call for the exercife of different qualities, for the performance of different duties, but the fame perfonal holinefs is enjoined on all. External acts of virtue may be promoted by fome circumstances, and impeded by others, but the graces of inward piety are of univerfal force, are of eternal obligation.

The universality of its requisitions is one of its most distinguishing characteristics. In the Pagan world it feemed fufficient that a few exalted spirits, a few fine geniuses, should foar to a vaft fuperiority above the mafs; but it was never expected that the mob of Rome or Athens fhould afpire to any religious fentiments or feelings in common with Socrates or Epictetus. I fay religious fentiments, becaufe in matters of tafte the diftinctions were lefs striking, for the mob of Athens were competent critics in the dramatic art, while they were funk in the most ftupid and degrading idolatry. As to those of a higher class, while no fubject in fcience, arts, or learning was too lofty or too abstrufe for

K 5

202 CHRISTIANITY UNIVERSAL

for their acquifition, no object in nature was too low, no conception of a depraved imagination was too impure for their worfhip. While the civil and political wifdom of the Romans was carried to fuch perfection that their Code of laws has still a place in the moft enlightened Countries, their deplorably grofs fuperfititions rank them in point of religion with the Savages of Africa. It fhews how little a way that reafon which manifested itself with fuch unrivalled vigour in their Poets, Orators and Hiftorians, as to make them ftill models to ours, could go in what related to religion, when these polished people in the objects of their worship are only on a par with the inhabitants of Otaheite.

It furnishes the most incontrovertible proof that the world by wisdom knew not God, that it was at the very time, and in the very country, in which knowledge and taste had attained their utmost perfection, when the Porch and the Academy had given laws to human intellect, that Atheism first assumed a shape, a fhape, and eftablished itself into a school. of Philosophy. It was at the moment when the mental powers were carried to the highest pitch in Greece, that it was settled as an infallible truth in this Philosophy that the fenses were the highest natural light of mankind. It was in the most enlightened age of Rome that this Atheistical Philosophy wastransplanted thither, and that one of her most elegant poets adapted it, and rendered it popular by the bewitching graces of his verse.

It has been intimated with a view to depreciate Chriftianity by thole who are offended at her humbling doctrines, that the heathen philofophers had given fufficient exaltation to the human character; that they exhibited an elevation of fentiment, and a dignity of virtue, which left nothing to defire on the fide of moral excellence. This is meant to convey an oblique infinuation that the Chriftian revelation might have been difpenfed with.

Christianity would gain no fresh honours by stripping those noble writers of their κ 6 fplendid fplendid trophies. We must acknowledge that we are frequently astonished at the heights they reached. We may blush to see to much grandeur of conception, and rectitude of sentiment, where there was such an absence of illumination.

But those who give this tacit preference, do not feem to feel where the grand characteriftic difference lies. The turning point which feparates Christianity from all the other religions in the world efcapes their observation. The dignity of the letter of Pagan virtue, and of the fpirit of Christian virtue, is of a totally opposite character. The foundation is different, the views are different, the end is different. The one fills man with a perfect complacency in his own perfections. It is the object of the other to ftrip him of every boaft. The one fwells him with fatisfaction at the confcioufness of his own attainments. The other teaches him never to " count himfelf to have attained :" a feeling of imperfection accompanies him in his best actions, and never forfakes him in his his higheft advancements. The one makes the proficient in virtue rich in his own independent worth, the other " brings every thought into captivity to the obedience of Chrift." The one glories in the victory his felf-denial has obtained; the other, after his highest conquests, exclaims," God forbid that I should glory, fave in the Cross of our Lord Jefus Chrift." - Philofophy not feldom carried its profeffor to fuch an elevation that he rofe above riches, above honours, above the world: but it never enabled him to rife above him/elf. It never raifed its votary to owe his fatisfaction, his happinefs, his independence, to any thing without him, or above him. He borrows nothing, he derives nothing, all is his own. Outward temptations are combated, even inward propenfities are refifted, the world is degraded, but [elf is enthroned. He labours to be virtuous, and to a certain degree he obtains his 6bject, but his virtue, that is himfelf, is every thing to him.

The Christian's career is more difficult, and less dazzling. He is not only commanded " not

205

Digitized by Google

" not to love the world nor the things of the world," he is called to a harder renunciation : he must renounce all dependence on the virtues of which he dares not neglect the performance. If the philosopher despifed the world, this contempt was founded in pride, and was a homage to his own virtue. As to the Christian, " the world is crucified to him and he to the world," on a principle fo abafing, that natural wifdom revolts at it; the humbling principle of " the crofs of Chrift." The fage who feafted on the plenitude of his own perfections would think it a mortifying exchange to be " filled with the fulnefs" of any other being, though that being was " God." How would the man whofe heart was overflowing with a fense of his own value endure that injunction to focial kindnefs, " look not every man on his own things, but every man alfo on the things of others ?" --- " Let every man efteem others more than himfelf," would have been accounted the dictate of folly where felf-eftimation was the actuating principle.

Humility

2

Humility which forms the very bafis of the Chriftian character is fo far from making a part of the code of philofophy, that it was " against the canon law of their foundation." Not only no fuch quality has a place in their ethics, but it was philologically, as well as morally degraded; the very term expreffing not virtue but bafenefs.

As coming from the founder of a fchool, indeed, they might have adopted the maxim, " let this mind be in you which was in Chrift Jefus;" but the claufe — " who made himfelf of no reputation," ftrips it of its value. " This is a hard faying," which of them could hear it ?

It feems as if the most accomplished nations stood in the most prefling need of the light of revelation; for it was not to the dark and stupid corners of the earth that the Apostles had their earliest missions. One of St. Paul's first and noblest expositions of Christian Truth was made before the most august deliberative assembly in the world, though, by the way, it does not appear that more

more than one member of Areopagus was converted. In Rome fome of the Apoftle's earlieft converts belonged to the Imperial Palace. — It was to the metropolis of cultivated Italy, it was to the polifhed " regions of Achaia," to the opulent and luxurious city of Corinth, in preference to the barbarous countries of the uncivilized world, that fome of his earlieft Epiftles were addreffed.

Natural religion must have shewn man that he was a sinner, or we should not have heard of such frequent horrors of confcience, such inextinguishable remorfe as is discoverable in the expressions of many heathens, It even shattered him with an intimation that the wrath of the Deity might be averted; this accounts for their numerous altars, facrifices and lustrations. But these were only vague hopes, indefinite notions floating on a fea of doubt and uncertainty. They had no foundation in the divine promiss; the penitent sinner had no affurance of the divine forgivenes. The doctrine of falvation falvation by the crofs of Chrift is fo contrary to all human conception, that it never could have come from man; being fo incredible to natural reafon, " that man," fays a fine writer, " ftands in need of all his fubmiffion to make it an object of his faith, though an infallible God has revealed it."

But even natural religion was little underítood by those who professed it; it was full of obfcurity till viewed by the clear light of the Gofpel. Not only natural religion remained to be clearly comprehended, but reafon itfelf remained to be carried to its highest pitch in the countries where revela-Natural religion could tion is profeffed. not fee itfelf by its own light; reafon could not extricate itfelf from the labyrinth of error and ignorance in which falfe religion had involved the world. Grace has raifed na-Revelation has given a lift to reafon, ture. and taught her to defpife the follies and corruptions which obscured her brightness. If Nature is now delivered from darknefs, it was the

the helping hand of Revelation which raifed her from the rubbish in which she lay buried.

Christianity has not only given us right. conceptions of God, of his holinefs; of the way in which he will be worfhipped : it has not only given us principles to promote our happinels here, and to infure it hereafter ; but it has really taught us what a proud philosophy arrogates to itself, the right use of reafon. It has given us those principles of examining and judging, by which we are enabled to determine on the abfurdity of falfe religions. "For to what elfe can it beafcribed," fays the fagacious Bifhop Sherlock, " that in every Nation that names the name of Chrift, even Reafon and Nature fee and condemn the follies, to which others are still, for want of the fame help, held in fubjection ?"

Allowing however that Plato and Antoninus feemed to have been taught of heaven, yet the object for which we contend is, that no provision was made for the vulgar. While a faint ray shone on the page of Philosophy, lofophy, the people were involved in darknefs which might be felt. The million were left to live without knowledge, and to die without hope. For what knowledge or what hope would be acquired from the preposterous though amusing, and, in many respects, elegant Mythology, which they might pick up in their Poets, the belief of which feemed to be confined to the populace ?

But there was no common principle of hope or fear, of faith or practice, no motive of confolation, no bond of charity, no com_{τ} munion of everlafting interefts, no reverfionary equality between the wife and the ignorant, the mafter and the flave, the Greek and the Barbarian.

A religion was wanted which fhould be of general application. Chriftianity happily accommodated itfelf to the common exigence. It furnished an adequate supply to the universal want. Instead of perpetual but unexpiating facrifices to appease imaginary deities,

Gods fuch as guilt makes welcome,

it prefents " one oblation, once offered, a full, perfect, and fufficient facrifice, oblation and fatisfaction for the fins of the whole world." It prefents one confistent scheme of morals growing out of one uniform fyftem of doctrines; one perfect rule of practice depending on one principle of faith : it offers grace to direct the one and to affift the other. It encircles the whole fphere of duty with the broad and golden zone of coalefcing charity, flamped with the beautiful inscription, "a new Commandment give I unto you, that you love one another." Christianity, instead of destroying the diftinctions of rank, or breaking in on the regulations of fociety, by this univerfal precept, furnishes new fences to its order, additional fecurity to its repofe, and fresh ftrength to its fubordinations.

The precept of doing to others as we would they fhould do unto us, is fo clear and undeniable a duty, that the light of nature had impreffed it upon many on whom the light of revelation had never fhone. A Roman

Digitized by Google

man Emperor caufed it to be engraved on his plate. The first Incas of Peru taught it as one of their most indispensable rules; but it received its higheft fanction and fulleft confirmation from those divine lips who famped its importance in the Christian code by the broad declaration, this is the law and the prophets : thus establishing a legitimate and regulated felf-love as the standard of our focial conduct: as both the rule of charity, and the law of equity. How lamentably do men depart from this obvious and intelligible principle when they vindicate their unkindness or their injustice by making what others actually do to them, their own measure of retribution, instead of what they would that others fhould do!

Were this univerfal requisition uniformly observed, the whole frame of fociety would be cemented and confolidated into one indisfoluble bond of univerfal brotherhood. This divinely enacted law is the feminal principle of justice, charity, patience, forbearance, in short, of all focial virtue. That it it does not produce these excellent effects, is not owing to any defect in the principle, but in our corrupt nature, which so reluctantly, so imperfectly obeys it. If it were confcientiously adopted, and substantially acted upon, received in its very spirit, and obeyed from the ground of the heart, human laws might be abrogated, Courts of Justice abolissed, and Treatises of Morality burnt; war would be no longer an Art, nor military Tactics a Science. We should suffer long and be kind, and so far from "feeking that which is another's," we should not even " feek our own."

But let not the Soldier or the Lawyer be alarmed. Their craft is in no danger. The world does not intend to act upon the divine principle which would injure their profeffions; and till this only revolution which good men defire, actually takes place, our fortunes will not be fecure without the exertions of the one, nor our lives without the protection of the other.

AH

1

s

)

ì

ŀ

ł

3-

)•

Be

Jur

ich.

ays

the

our

ifelf.

eader

1 offi-

ı, buţ

All the virtues have the appropriate place and rank i brown They are introduced as individualy beautiful, and as reciprocally connected, like the grace r the Mythologic dance. But ment I Christian grace ever fat to in me more confummate mafter incomparable painter, San I her at full length, in 11 1-11-11-Every attitude is fin = ---ment, of beauty. perfect and entry Who can lock I - out blufhing # = ---at? Yet if is men ---a cordial internet liation will as infrequent _____ figure, and for a ---lead = = _ ... but viere : --divize I---

Digitized by Google

[216]

CHAP. X.

Christian Holiness.

CHRISTIANITY then, as we have attempted to fhew in the preceding Chapter, exhibits no different ftandards of goodnefs applicable to different ftations or characters. No one can be allowed to reft in a low degree and plead his exemption for aiming no higher. No one can be fecure in any ftate of piety below that ftate which would not have been enjoined on all, had not all been entitled to the means of attaining it.

Those who keep their pattern in their eye, though they may fail of the highest attainments, will not be fatisfied with fuch as are low. The striking inferiority will excite compunction; compunction will stimulate them to prefs on, which those never do, who, losing sight of their standard, are satissfied with the height they have reached. He He is not likely to be the object of God's favour, who takes his determined ftand on the very loweft ftep in the fcale of perfection; who does not even afpire above it, whofe aim feems to be, not fo much to pleafe God as to efcape punifhment. Many however will doubtlefs be accepted though their progrefs has been fmall; their difficulties may have been great, their natural capacity weak, their temptations ftrong, and their inftruction defective.

Revelation has not only furnished injunctions but motives to holines; not only motives, but examples and authorities. "Be ye therefore perfect" (according to your measure and degree) "as your father which is in heaven is perfect." And, what fays the Old Testament? It accords with the New—"Be ye holy, for I the Lord your God am holy."

This was the injunction of God himfelf, not given exclusively to Moles, to the leader and legislator, or to a few diffinguished officers, or to a felection of eminent men, but

VOL. I.

Ţ,

217

tø

Digitized by Google

to an immenfe body of people, even to the whole affembled hoft of Ifrael: to men of all ranks, profeffions, capacities, and characters, to the Minifter of religion. and to the uninftructed, to enlightened rulers, and to feeble women. "God," fays an excellent writer *, "had antecedently given to his people particular laws fuited to their feveral exigencies, and various conditions, but the command to be holy was a general (might he not have faid a univerfal) law."

"Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the Gods? Who is like unto thee, glorious in holinefs, fearful in praifes, doing wonders?" This is perhaps the fublimeft apoftrophe of praife, rendered more ftriking by its interrogatory form, which the Scriptures have recorded. It makes a part of the firft fong of gratulation which is to be found in the treafury of facred Poetry. This epithet of haly is more frequently affixed to the name of God than any other. His mighty name-

Saurin.

Digitized by Google

is

is lefs often invoked, than his boly name. To offend against this attribute is reprefented as more heinous than to oppose any other. It has been remarked that the impiety of the Association Monarch is not defcribed by his hostility against the great, the Almighty God, but it is made an aggravation of his crime that he had committed it against the Holy one of I/rael.

When God condefcended to give a pledge for the performance of his promife, he fweats by his holine/s, as if it were the diftinguishing quality which was more efpecially binding. It feems connected and interwoven with all the divine perfections. Which of his excellences can we contemplate as feparated from this? Is not his juffice ftamped with fanctity? It is free from any tincture of vindictiveness, and is therefore a holy justice. His mercy has none of the partiality, or favouritifm, or capricious fondnefs of human kindnefs, but is a holy mercy. His holinefs is not more the fource of his mercies than of his punifhments. If his ho-L 2 linefs linefs in his feverities to us wanted a juftification, there cannot be at once a more fubftantial and more fplendid illuftration of it than the noble paffage already quoted, for he is called "glorious in holinefs" immediately after he had vindicated the honour of his name, by the miraculous deftruction of the army of Pharaoh.

Is it not then a neceffary confequence growing out of his own perfections, that "a righteous God loveth righteoufnefs," that he will of courfe require in his creatures a defire to imitate as well as to adore that attribute by which He himfelf loves to be diftinguifhed? We cannot indeed, like God, be effentially holy. In an infinite being it is a fubftance, in a created being it is only an accident. God is the effence of holinefs, but we can have no holinefs, nor any other good thing, but what we derive from him— It is his prerogative, but our privilege.

If God loves holinefs becaufe it is his image, he must confequently hate fin becaufe it defaces his image. If he glorifies his

his own mercy and goodnefs in rewarding virtue, he no lefs vindicates the honour of his holinefs in the punifhment of vice. - A perfect God can no more approve of fin in his creatures than he can commit it him-He may forgive fin on his own condifelf. tions, but there are no conditions on which he can be reconciled to it. The infinite goodness of God may delight in the beneficial purpofes to which his infinite wifdom has made the fins of his creatures fubfervient, but fin itfelf will always be abhorrent to his nature. His wifdom may turn it to a merciful end, but his indignation at the offence cannot be diminished. He loves man, for he cannot but love his own work : He hates fin, for that was man's own invention. and no part of the work which God had Even in the imperfect administration made. of human laws, impunity of crimes would be conftrued into approbation of them *.

* Note-See Charnok on the Attributes.

L3

The

The law of holinefs, then, is a law binding on all perfons without diffinction, not limited to the period nor to the people to whom it was given. It reaches through the whole Jewifh difpenfation, and extends, with wider demands and higher fanctions, to every Chriftian, of every denomination, of every age, and every country.

A more fublime motive cannot be affigned why we fhould be holy than becaufe " the Lord our God is holy." Men of the world have no objection to the terms virtue, morality, integrity, rectitude, but they affociate fomething overacted, not to fay hypocritical, with the term holinefs, and neither ufe it in a good fenfe when applied to others, nor would wifh to have it applied to themfelves, but make it over, with a little fufpicion, and not a little derifion, to puritans and enthufiafts.

This fulpected epithet however is furely refcued from every injurious affociation, if we confider it as the chofen attribute of the Moft High. We do not prefume to apply the the terms virtue, probity, morality, to God, but we afcribe holinefs to him becaufe he first ascribed it to himself, as the aggregate and confummation of all his perfections.

Shall fo imperfect a being as Man, then, ridicule the application of this term to others, or be afhamed of it himfelf? There is a caufe indeed which should make him ashamed of the appropriation, that of not deferving it. This comprehensive appellation includes all the Christian graces, all the virtues in their just proportion, order, and harmony; in all their bearings, relations, and dependencies. And as in God, glory and holinefs are united, fo the Apostle combines " fanctification and honour" as the glory of Man.

Traces more or lefs of the holinefs of God may be found in his works, to those who view them with the eye of faith : they are more plainly visible in his Providences; but it is in his word that we must chiefly look for the manifestations of his holines. He is every where defcribed as perfectly holy in himfelf, as a model to be imitated by his creatures, fplendid trophies. We must acknowledge that we are frequently aftonished at the heights they reached. We may blush to see to much grandeur of conception, and rectitude of sentiment, where there was such an absence of illumination.

2

L 4

But those who give this tacit preference, do not feem to feel where the grand characteriftic difference lies. The turning point which feparates Christianity from all the other religions in the world escapes their observation. The dignity of the letter of Pagan virtue, and of the fpirit of Christian virtue, is of a totally opposite character. The foundation is different, the views are different, the end is different. The one fills man with a perfect complacency in his own perfections. It is the object of the other to strip him of every boast. The one swells him with fatisfaction at the confciousness of his own attainments. The other teaches him never to " count himfelf to have attained :" a feeling of imperfection accompanies him in his best actions, and never forfakes him in his his highest advancements. The one makes the proficient in virtue rich in his own independent worth, the other "brings every thought into captivity to the obedience of Chrift." The one glories in the victory his felf-denial has obtained ; the other, after his higheft conquests, exclaims," God forbid that I should glory, fave in the Crofs of our Lord Jefus Chrift." - Philofophy not feldom carried its professor to such an elevation that he rofe above riches, above honours, above the world; but it never enabled him to rife above himself. It never raised its votary to owe his fatisfaction, his happinefs, his independence, to any thing without him, or above He borrows nothing, he derives nohim. thing, all is his own. Outward temptations are combated, even inward propenfities are refifted, the world is degraded, but [elf is enthroned. He labours to be virtuous, and to a certain degree he obtains his 6bject, but his virtue, that is himfelf, is every thing to him.

The Chriftian's careeris more difficult, and lefs dazzling. He is not only commanded " not

205

Digitized by Google

" not to love the world nor the things of the world," he is called to a harder renunciation : he must renounce all dependence on the virtues of which he dares not neglect the performance. If the philosopher despifed the world, this contempt was founded in pride, and was a homage to his own virtue. As to the Christian, " the world is crucified to him and he to the world," on a principle fo abafing, that natural wifdom revolts at it; the humbling principle of " the crofs of Chrift." The fage who feafted on the plenitude of his own perfections would think it a mortifying exchange to be "filled with the fulnefs" of any other being, though that being was " God." How would the man whofe heart was overflowing with a fense of his own value endure that injunction to focial kindnefs, " look not every man on his own things, but every man alfo on the things of others ?" --- " Let every man efteem others more than himfelf," would have been accounted the dictate of folly where felf-eftimation was the actuating principle.

Humility

2

Humility which forms the very bafis of the Chriftian character is fo far from making a part of the code of philofophy, that it was " againft the canon law of their foundation." Not only no fuch quality has a place in their ethics, but it was philologically, as well as morally degraded; the very term expreffing not virtue but bafenefs.

As coming from the founder of a fchool, indeed, they might have adopted the maxim, " let this mind be in you which was in Chrift Jefus;" but the claufe — " who made himfelf of no reputation," ftrips it of its value. " This is a hard faying," which of them could hear it ?

It feems as if the most accomplished nations stood in the most prefling need of the light of revelation; for it was not to the dark and stupid corners of the earth that the Apostles had their earliest missions. One of St. Paul's first and noblest expositions of Christian Truth was made before the most august deliberative assembly in the world, though, by the way, it does not appear that more

more than one member of Areopagus was converted. In Rome fome of the Apoftle's earlieft converts belonged to the Imperial • Palace. — It was to the metropolis of cultivated Italy, it was to the polifhed " regions of Achaia," to the opulent and luxurious city of Corinth, in preference to the barbarous countries of the uncivilized world, that fome of his earlieft Epiftles were addreffed.

Natural religion must have shewn man that he was a finner, or we fhould not have heard of fuch frequent horrors of confcience, fuch inextinguishable remorfe as is discoverable in the expressions of many heathens. It even flattered him with an intimation that the wrath of the Deity might be averted; this accounts for their numerous altars. facrifices and luftrations. But these were only vague hopes, indefinite notions floating on a fea of doubt and uncertainty. They had no foundation in the divine promife; the penitent finner had no affurance of the divine forgiveness. The doctrine of falvation falvation by the crofs of Chrift is fo contrary to all human conception, that it never could have come from man; being fo incredible to natural reafon, " that man," fays a fine writer, " ftands in need of all his fubmiffion to make it an object of his faith, though an infallible God has revealed it."

But even natural religion was little underftood by those who professed it; it was full of obfcurity till viewed by the clear light of the Gofpel. Not only natural religion remained to be clearly comprehended, but reafon itfelf remained to be carried to its highest pitch in the countries where revelation is profeffed. Natural religion could not fee itself by its own light; reason could not extricate itfelf from the labyrinth of error and ignorance in which falfe religion had involved the world. Grace has raifed na-Revelation has given a lift to reafon, ture. and taught her to defpife the follies and corruptions which obscured her brightness. If Nature is now delivered from darknefs, it was " the

the helping hand of Revelation which raifed her from the rubbish in which she lay buried.

Christianity has not only given us right conceptions of God, of his holinefs, of the way in which he will be worfhipped : it has not only given us principles to promote our happinels here, and to infure it hereafter; but it has really taught us what a proud philofophy arrogates to itfelf, the right use of reafon. It has given us those principles of examining and judging, by which we are enabled to determine on the abfurdity of falfe religions. " For to what elfe can it beafcribed," fays the fagacious Bifhop Sherlock, " that in every Nation that names the name of Chrift, even Reafon and Nature fee and condemn the follies, to which others are still, for want of the fame help, held in fubjection ?"

Allowing however that Plato and Antoninus feemed to have been taught of heaven, yet the object for which we contend is, that no provision was made for the vulgar. While a faint ray fhone on the page of Philofophy, lofophy, the people were involved in darknefs which might be felt. The million were left to live without knowledge, and to die without hope. For what knowledge or what hope would be acquired from the preposterous though amufing, and, in many respects, elegant Mythology, which they might pick up in their Poets, the belief of which feemed to be confined to the populace ?

But there was no common principle of hope or fear, of faith or practice, no motive of confolation, no bond of charity, no communion of everlafting interests, no reverfionary equality between the wife and the ignorant, the master and the flave, the Greek and the Barbarian.

A religion was wanted which fhould be of general application. Chriftianity happily accommodated itself to the common exigence. It furnished an adequate supply to the universal want. Instead of perpetual but unexpiating facrifices to appeale imaginary deities,

Gods fuch as guilt makes welcome,

it

it prefents " one oblation, once offered, a full, perfect, and fufficient facrifice, oblation and fatisfaction for the fins of the whole world." It prefents one confiftent fcheme of morals growing out of one uniform fyftem of doctrines; one perfect rule of practice depending on one principle of faith : it offers grace to direct the one and to affift the other. It encircles the whole fphere of duty with the broad and golden zone of coalefcing charity, ftamped with the beautiful infcription, "a new Commandment give I unto you, that you love one another." Christianity, instead of destroying the diftinctions of rank, or breaking in on the regulations of fociety, by this universal precept, furnishes new fences to its order, additional fecurity to its repose, and fresh ftrength to its fubordinations.

The precept of doing to others as we would they fhould do unto us, is fo clear and undeniable a duty, that the light of nature had imprefied it upon many on whom the light of revelation had never fhone. A Roman

Digitized by Google

man Emperor caufed it to be engraved on his plate. The first Incas of Peru taught it as one of their most indispensable rules; but it received its higheft fanction and fulleft confirmation from those divine lips who famped its importance in the Christian code by the broad declaration, this is the law and the prophets : thus establishing a legitimate and regulated felf-love as the ftandard of our focial conduct: as both the rule of charity, and the law of equity. How lamentably do men depart from this obvious and intelligible principle when they vindicate their unkindnefs or their injustice by making what others actually do to them, their own measure of retribution, instead of what they would that others fhould do!

Were this univerfal requifition uniformly obferved, the whole frame of fociety would be cemented and confolidated into one indiffoluble bond of univerfal brotherhood. This divinely enacted law is the feminal principle of juffice, charity, patience, forbearance, in fhort, of all focial virtue. That it it does not produce these excellent effects, is not owing to any defect in the principle, but in our corrupt nature, which fo reluctantly, fo imperfectly obeys it. If it were confcientiously adopted, and substantially acted upon, received in its very spirit, and obeyed from the ground of the heart, human laws might be abrogated, Courts of Justice abolished, and Treatises of Morality burnt; war would be no longer an Art, nor military Tactics a Science. We should fuffer long and be kind, and so far from "feeking that which is another's," we should not even " feek our own."

But let not the Soldier or the Lawyer be alarmed. Their craft is in no danger. The world does not intend to act upon the divine principle which would injure their profeffions; and till this only revolution which good men defire, actually takes place, our fortunes will not be fecure without the exertions of the one, nor our lives without the protection of the other.

AH

Digitized by Google

All the virtues have their appropriate place and rank in Scripture. They are introduced as individually beautiful, and as reciprocally connected, like the graces in the Mythologic dance. But perhaps no Chriftian grace ever fat to the hand of a more confummate mafter than Charity. Her incomparable painter, Saint Paul, has drawn her at full length, in all her fair proportions. Every attitude is full of grace, every lineament, of beauty. The whole delineation is perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

Who can look at this finished piece without blushing at his own want of likeness to it? Yet if this confcious diffimilitude induce a cordial defire of refemblance, the humiliation will be falutary. Perhaps a more frequent contemplation of this exquisite figure, accompanied with earness endeavours for a growing refemblance, would gradually lead us, not barely to admire the Portrait, but would at length affimilate us to the divine Original.

[216]

CHAP. X.

Christian Holiness.

CHRISTIANITY then, as we have attempted to fhew in the preceding Chapter, exhibits no different ftandards of goodnefs applicable to different ftations or characters. No one can be allowed to reft in a low degree and plead his exemption for aiming no higher. No one can be fecure in any ftate of piety below that ftate which would not have been enjoined on all, had not all been entitled to the means of attaining it.

Thole who keep their pattern in their eye, though they may fail of the higheft attainments, will not be fatisfied with fuch as are low. The ftriking inferiority will excite compunction; compunction will ftimulate them to prefs on, which thole never do, who, lofing fight of their ftandard, are fatisfied with the height they have reached.

He

He is not likely to be the object of God's favour, who takes his determined ftand on the very loweft ftep in the fcale of perfection; who does not even afpire above it, whofe aim feems to be, not fo much to pleafe God as to efcape punifhment. Many however will doubtlefs be accepted though their progrefs has been fmall; their difficulties may have been great, their natural capacity weak, their temptations ftrong, and their inftruction defective.

Revelation has not only furnished injunctions but motives to holines; not only motives, but examples and authorities. "Be ye therefore perfect" (according to your measure and degree) "as your father which is in heaven is perfect." And, what fays the Old Testament? It accords with the New—"Be ye holy, for I the Lord your God am holy."

This was the injunction of God himfelf, not given exclusively to Moles, to the leader and legislator, or to a few diftinguished officers, or to a felection of eminent men, but

VOL. I.

L

217

tø

to an immenfe body of people, even to the whole affembled hoft of Ifrael: to men of all ranks, profeffions, capacities, and characters, to the Minifter of religion, and to the uninftructed, to enlightened rulers, and to feeble women. "God," fays an excellent writer *, "had antecedently given to his people particular laws fuited to their feveral exigencies, and various conditions, but the command to be holy was a general (might he not have faid a univerfal) law."

"Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the Gods? Who is like unto thee, glorious in holinefs, fearful in praifes, doing wonders?" This is perhaps the fublimeft apoftrophe of praife, rendered more ftriking by its interrogatory form, which the Scriptures have recorded. It makes a part of the firft fong of gratulation which is to be found in the treafury of facred Poetry. This epithet of haly is more frequently affixed to the name of God than any other. His mighty name

is

is lefs often invoked, than his boly name. To offend against this attribute is reprefented as more heinous than to oppose any other. It has been remarked that the impiety of the Affyrian Monarch is not defcribed by his hostility against the great, the Almighty God, but it is made an aggravation of his crime that he had committed it against the Holy one of I/rael.

When God condefcended to give a pledge for the performance of his promife, he fweats by his holinefs, as if it were the diftinguishing quality which was more efpecially binding. It feems connected and interwoven with all the divine perfections. Which of his excellences can we contemplate as feparated from this? Is not his juffice ftamped with fanctity? It is free from any tincture of vindictiveness, and is therefore a holy justice. His mercy has none of the partiality, or favouritifm, or capricious fondnefs of human kindnefs, but is a holy mercy. His holinefs is not more the fource of his mercies than of his punifhments. If his ho-L 2 linefs

linefs in his feverities to us wanted a juftification, there cannot be at once a more fubftantial and more fplendid illustration of it than the noble passage already quoted, for he is called "glorious in holinefs" immediately after he had vindicated the honour of his name, by the miraculous destruction of the army of Pharaoh.

Is it not then a neceffary confequence growing out of his own perfections, that "a righteous God loveth righteoufnefs," that he will of courfe require in his creatures a defire to imitate as well as to adore that attribute by which He himfelf loves to be diftinguifhed ? We cannot indeed, like God, be effentially holy. In an infinite being it is a fubftance, in a created being it is only an accident. God is the effence of holinefs, but we can have no holinefs, nor any other good thing, but what we derive from him— It is his prerogative, but our privilege.

If God loves holinefs becaufe it is his image, he must confequently hate fin becaufe it defaces his image. If he glorifies his

his own mercy and goodnefs in rewarding virtue, he no lefs vindicates the honour of his holinefs in the punifhment of vice. - A perfect God can no more approve of fin in his creatures than he can commit it himfelf. He may forgive fin on his own conditions, but there are no conditions on which he can be reconciled to it. The infinite goodnefs of God may delight in the beneficial purposes to which his infinite wildom has made the fins of his creatures fubfervient, but fin itfelf will always be abhorrent to his nature. His wifdom may turn it to a merciful end, but his indignation at the offence cannot be diminished. He loves man, for he cannot but love his own work ; He hates fin, for that was man's own invention. and no part of the work which God had Even in the imperfect administration made. of human laws, impunity of crimes would be conftrued into approbation of them *.

L 3

The

^{*} Note-See Charnok on the Attributes.

222 CHRISTIAN HOLINESS.

The law of holinefs, then, is a law binding on all perfons without diffinction, not limited to the period nor to the people to whom it was given. It reaches through the whole Jewifh difpenfation, and extends, with wider demands and higher fanctions, to every Christian, of every denomination, of every age, and every country.

A more fublime motive cannot be affigned why we fhould be holy than becaufe " the Lord our God is holy." Men of the world have no objection to the terms virtue, morality, integrity, rectitude, but they affociate fomething overacted, not to fay hypocritical, with the term holinefs, and neither ufe it in a good fenfe when applied to others, nor would wifh to have it applied to themfelves, but make it over, with a little fufpicion, and not a little derifion, to puritans and enthufiafts.

This fufpected epithet however is furely refcued from every injurious affociation, if we confider it as the chofen attribute of the Moft High. We do not prefume to apply the the terms virtue, probity, morality, to God, but we afcribe holinefs to him becaufe he first afcribed it to himfelf, as the aggregate and confummation of all his perfections.

Shall fo imperfect a being as Man, then, ridicule the application of this term to others, or be afhamed of it himfelf? There is a caufe indeed which fhould make him afhamed of the appropriation, that of not deferving it. This comprehensive appellation includes all the Christian graces, all the virtues in their just proportion, order, and harmony; in all their bearings, relations, and dependencies. And as in God, glory and holinefs are united, fo the Apostle combines "fanctification and honour" as the glory of Man.

Traces more or lefs of the holinefs of God may be found in his works, to thofe who view them with the eye of faith : they are more plainly vifible in his Providences; but it is in his word that we must chiefly look for the manifestations of his holinefs. He is every where described as perfectly holy in himfelf, as a model to be imitated by his L 4 creatures, creatures, and, though with an interval immeafurable, as imitable by them.

2

The great doctrine of Redemption is infeparably connected with the doctrine of Sanctification. As an admirable writer has obferved, " if the blood of Chrift reconcile us to the juffice of God, the fpirit of Chrift is to reconcile us to the holinefs of God." When we are told therefore that Chrift is made unto us " righteoufnefs," we are in the fame place taught that he is made unto us " fanctification;" that is, he is both juftifier and fanctifier. In vain fhall we deceive ourfelves by refting on his facrifice, while we neglect to imitate his example.

The glorious Spirits which furround the throne of God are not reprefented as finging halfelujahs to his omnipotence, nor even to his mercy, but to that attribute which as with a glory encircles all the reft. They perpetually cry Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hofts; and it is obfervable, that the Angels which adore him for his holinefs are the ministers of his justice. Thofe Those pure intelligences perceive, no doubt, that this union of attributes constitutes the divine perfection.

This infinitely bleffed being, then, to whom angels and archangels and all the hofts of heaven are continually afcribing holinefs, has commanded us to be holy. To be holy becaufe God is holy, is both an argument and a command. An argument founded on the perfections of God, and a command to imitate him. This command is given to creatures fallen indeed, but to whom God graciously promifes strength for the imitation. If we do not endeavour to imitate him whom we worship, we do not worship him in fincerity. It is obvious that we fee little of the infinite excellences of that being to fome faint refemblance of which we do nor endeavour to afpire. If in God holinefs implies an aggregate of perfections; in man. even in his low degree, it is an incorporation of the Christian graces.

The holinefs of God indeed is confined by no limitation; ours is bounded, finite, im-L 5 perfect.

226 CHRISTIAN HOLINESS.

perfect. Yet let us be fedulous to extendour little fphere. Let our defires be large, though our capacities are contracted. Let our aims be lofty, though our attainments are low. Let us be folicitous that no day pafs without fome augmentation of our holinefs, fome added height in our afpirations, fome wider expansion in the compass of our vir-Let us strive every day for some tues. fuperiority to the preceding day, fomething that shall distinctly mark the passing fcene with progrefs; fomething that fhall afpire an humble hope that we are rather lefs unfit for heaven to-day, than we were yesterday. The celebrated artift who has recorded that he paffed no day without drawing a line, drew it not for repetition but for progrefs; not to produce a given number of ftrokes. but to forward his work, to complete his defign. The Christian, like the painter, does not draw his line at random, he has a model to imitate, as well as an outline to fill. Every touch conforms him more and more to the great original. He who has tranffufed e /

fuled most of the life of God into his foul, has copied it most fuccessfully.

" To feek happinefs," fays one of the Fathers, " is to defire God, and to find him is that happinefs." Our very happinefs therefore is not our independent property : it flows from that eternal mind which is the . fource and fum of happinels. In vain we look for felicity in all around us. It can only be found in that original fountain, whence we, and all we are and have, are derived. Where then is the imaginary wife man of the fchool of Zeno? What is the perfection of virtue fuppofed by Aristotle? They have no existence but in the Romance of Philosophy. Happiness must be imperfect. in an imperfect state. Religion, it is true, is initial happiness, and points to its perfection : but as the beft men poffefs it but imperfectly, they cannot be perfectly happy. Nothing can confer completeness which is itself incomplete. "With Thee, O Lord, is the fountain of life, and in Thy light only we shall fee light *."

* See Leighton on Happinefs.

l 6

Whatever

228 CHRISTIAN HOLINESS.

Whatever shall still remain wanting in our attainments, and much will still remain, let this laft, greateft, higheft confideration ftimulate our languid exertions that God has negatively promifed the beatific vision, the enjoyment of his prefence, to this attainment, by fpecifically proclaiming that without holinels no man shall fee his face. To know God is the rudiments of that eternal life which will hereafter be perfected by feeing him : --- As there is no ftronger reafon why we must not look for perfect happiness in this life than becaufe there is no perfect holinefs, fo the nearer advances we make to the one, the greater progrefs we shall make towards the other; we must cultivate here those tendencies and tempers which must be carried to perfection in a happier clime. But as holinefs is the concomitant of happinefs, fo must it be its precurfor. As fin has destroyed our happiness, so fin must be deftroyed before our happiness can be reftored. Our nature must be renovated before our felicity can be established. This is according to

to the nature of things as well as agreeable to the law and will of God. Let us then carefully look to the fubduing in our inmost hearts all those dispositions that are unlike God, all those actions, thoughts and tendencies that are contrary to God.

Independently therefore of all the other motives to holinefs which religion fuggefts ; independently of the fear of punifhment, independently even of the hope of glory, let us be holy from this ennobling, elevating motive, becaufe the Lord our God is holy. And when our virtue flags, let it be renovated by this imperative injunction, backed by this irrefiftble argument. The motive for imitation, and the Being to be imitated, feem almost to identify us with infinity. It is a connection which endears, an affimilation which dignifies, a refemblance which The Apostle has added to the elevates. prophet an affurance which makes the fulnefs and confummation of the promife, " that though we know not yet what we shall be, yet we know that when we shall appear, we . fhall fhall be like him, for we fhall fee him as he is."

In what a beautiful variety of glowing. expressions, and admiring strains, do the Scripture worthies delight to reprefent God; not only in relation to what he is to them, but to the fupreme excellence of his own transcendent perfections! They expatiate, they amplify, they dwell with unwearied iteration on the adorable theme; they ranfack language, they exhaust all the expreffions of praife and wonder and admiration, all the images of aftonifhment; they delight to laud and magnify his glorious name. They praife him, they blefs him, they worfhip him, they glorify him, they give thanks to him for his great glory, faying, " Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hofts, Heaven and earth are full of the majefty of thy glory."

They glorify him relatively to themfelves. — " I will magnify Thee, O Lord my ftrength — My help cometh of God — The Lord himfelf is the portion of my inheritance."

230

ance." At another time, foaring with a noble difinterestedness, and quite losing fight of felf and all created glories, they adore him for his own incommunicable excellences. " Be thou exalted, O God, in thine own ftrength." — ". Oh the depth of the riches both of the wifdom and knowlege of God !" Then burfting into a rapture of adoration, and burning with a more intense flame, they cluster his attributes - " To the King eternal, immortal, invisible, be honour and glory for ever and ever." One is loft in admiration of his wildom - his afcription is " to the only wife God." Another in triumphant ftrains overflows with transport at the confideration of the attribute on which we have been defcanting-" O Lord, who is like unto Thee, there is none holy as the Lord." " Sing praifes unto the Lord, oh. ye faints of his, and give thanks unto him for a remembrance of his holinefs."

The Prophets and Apoftles were not deterred from pouring out the overflowings of their fervent fpirits, they were not reftrained from from celebrating the perfections of their Creator, through the cold-hearted fear of being reckoned Enthulialts. The faints of old were not prevented from breathing out their rapturous hofannas to the King of faints, through the coward dread of being branded as fanatical. The conceptions of their minds dilating with the view of the glorious constellation of the divine attributes; and the affections of their hearts warming with the thoughts that those attributes were all concentrated in Mercy, - they difplay a fublime oblivion of themfelves, --- they forget every thing but God. Their own wants dwindle to a point. Their own concerns, nay the Universe itself, fhrink into nothing. They feem abforbed in the effulgence of deity, loft in the radiant beams of infinite glory.

[233]

CHAP. XI.

On the comparatively small Faults and Virtues.

THE "Fifhers of Men," as if exclusively bent on catching the greater finners, often make the interstices of the moral net fo wide, that it cannot retain those of more ordinary fize, which everywhere abound. Their draught might be more abundant, were not the messes fo large that the smaller fort, aided by their own lubricity, escape the toils and flip through. Happy to find themselves not bulky enough to be entangled, they plunge back again into their native element, enjoy their escape, and hope they may fasely wait to grow bigger before they are in danger of being caught.

It is of more importance than we are aware, or are willing to allow, that we take care diligently to practife the fmaller virtues, avoid fcrupuloufly the leffer fins, and bear patiently inferior trials; for the fin of habitually bitually yielding, or the grace of habitually refifting, in comparatively fmall points, tends in no inconfiderable degree to produce that vigour or that debility of mind, on which hangs victory or defeat.

Confcience is moral fenfation. It is the hafty perception of good and evil, the peremptory decision of the mind to adopt the one or avoid the other. Providence has furnished the body with senfes, and the foul with confcience, as a tact by which to fhrink from the approach of danger; as a prompt feeling to fupply the deductions of reafoning; as a fpontaneous impulse to precede a train of reflections for which the fuddenness and furprife of the attack allow no time. An enlightened confcience, if kept tenderly alive by a continual attention to its admonitions, would efpecially preferve us from those, fmaller fins, and ftimulate us to those leffer duties which we are falfely apt to think are too infignificant to be brought to the bar of religion, too trivial to be weighed by the ftandard of scripture. By

By cherishing this quick feeling of rectitude, light and fudden as the flash from heaven, and which is in fact the motion of the fpirit, we intuitively reject what is wrong before we have time to 'examine why it is wrong; and feize on what is right before we have time to examine why it is right. Should we not then be careful how we extinguish this facred spark? Will any thing be more likely to extinguish it than to negleft its hourly mementos to perform the fmaller duties, and to avoid the leffer faults which, as they in a good measure make up the fum of human life, will naturally fix and determine our character, that creature of habits? Will not our neglect or observance of it, incline or indifpofe us for those more important duties of which these smaller ones are connecting links.

The vices derive their existence from wildness, confusion, diforganization. The difcord of the passions is owing to their having different views, conflicting aims, and opposite ends. The rebellious vices have no common common head; each is all to itfelf. They promote their own operations by diffurbing those of others, but in diffurbing they do not deftroy them. Though they are all of one family they live on no friendly terms. Profligacy hates covetous fires as much as if it were a virtue. The life of every fin is a life of conflict which occasions the torment, but not the death of its opposite. Like the fabled brood of the ferpent, the passions fpring up, armed against each other, but they fail to complete the refemblance, for they do not effect their mutual deftruction.

But without union the Chriftian graces could not be perfected, and the fmaller virtues are the threads and filaments which gently but firmly tie them together. There is an attractive power in goodnefs which draws each part to the other. This concord of the virtue is derived from their having one common centre in which all meet. In vice there is a ftrong repulfion. Though bad men feek each other, they do not love each other. Each feeks the other in order to promote his own purposes, while he hates him by whom his purposes are promoted.

The leffer qualities of the human character are like the lower people in a country; they are numerically, if not individually, important. If well regulated they become valuable from that very circumftance of numbers which, under a negligent adminiftration, renders them formidable. The peace of the individual mind and of the nation, is materially affected by the difcipline . in which thefe inferior orders are maintained. Laxity and neglect in both cafes are fubverfive of all good government.

But if we may be allowed " to glance from earth to heaven," perhaps the beauty of the leffer virtues may be ftill better illuftrated by that long and luminous track made up of minute and almost imperceptible stars, which though separately too inconfiderable to attract attention, yet from their number and their confluence, from that soft and shining faream of light every where discernible, and which always corresponds to the same fixed ftars, ftars, as the fmaller virtues do to their concomitant great ones.—Without purfuing the metaphor to the claffic fiction that the Galaxy was the road through which the ancient heroes went to heaven, may we not venture to fay that Chriftians will make their way thither more pleafant by the confiftent practice of the minuter virtues ?

Every Christian should confider Religion as a fort which he is called to defend. The meanest foldier in the army, if he add patriotifm to valour, will fight as earneftly as if the glory of the contest depended on his fingle arm. But he brings his watchfulnefs as well as his courage into action. He ftrenuoufly defends every pais he is appointed to guard, without enquiring whether it be great or fmall. There is not any defect in religion or morals fo little as to be of no confeguence. Worldly things may be little becaufe their aim and end may be little. Things are great or fmall, not according to their oftenfible importance, but according to the magnitude of their object, and the importance of their confequences.

I

The

The acquifition of even the fmallest virtue being, as has been before observed, an actual conquest over the opposite vice, doubles our moral strength. The spiritual enemy has one subject less, and the conqueror one virtue more.

By allowed negligence in fmall things, we are not aware how much we injure religion in the eye of the world. How can we expect people to believe that we are in earneft in great points, when they fee that we cannot with ft and a trivial temptation, again ft which refiftance would have been comparatively eafy? At a diftance they hear with refpect of our general characters. They become domefticated with us, and difcover the fame failings, littleneffes and bad tempers, as they have been accuftomed to meet with in the most ordinary perfons.

If Milton in one of his letters to a learned foreigner who had vifited him, could congratulate himfelf on the confcioufnefs that in that vifit he had been found equal to his reputation, and had fupported in private converfation converfation his high character as an author; fhall not the Chriftian be equally anxious to fupport the credit of his holy profession, by not betraying in familiar life any temper inconfistent with religion ?

It is not difficult to attract refpect on great occafions, where we are kept in order by knowing that the public eye is fixed upon us. It is eafy to maintain a regard to our dignity in a "Sympofiac, or an academical dinner;" but to labour to maintain in the receffes of domeftic privacy requires more watchfulnefs, and is no lefs the duty, than it will be the habitual practice, of the confiftent Chriftian.

Our neglect of inferior duties is particularly injurious to the minds of our dependants and fervants. If they fee us " weak and infirm of purpofe," peevifh, irrefolute, capricious, paffionate, or inconfiftent, in our daily conduct, which comes under their immediate obfervation, and which comes alfo within their power of judging, they will not give us credit for those higher qualities 2 which

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 241

which we may poffefs, and those fuperior duties which we may be more careful to Neither their capacity nor their opfulfil. portunities, may enable them to judge of the orthodoxy of the head; but there will be obvious and decifive proofs to the meaneft capacity, of the ftate and temper of the heart. Our greater qualities will do them little good, while our leffer but inceffant faults do them much injury. Seeing us fo defective in the daily courfe of domestic conduct, though they will obey us becaufe they are obliged to it, they will neither love nor efteem us enough to be influenced by our advice, nor to be governed by our inftructions, on those great points which every confcientious head of a family will be careful to inculcate on all about him. It demands no lefs circumfpection to be a Christian, than to be " a hero, to one's valet de chambre."

In all that relates to God and to himfelf, the Chriftian knows of no fmall faults. He confiders all allowed and wilful fins, whatever be their magnitude, as an offence vol. I. M againft againft his Maker. Nothing that offends him can be infignificant. Nothing that contributes to faften on ourfelves a wrong habit can be triffing. Faults which we are accuftomed to confider as fmall, are repeated without conpunction. The habit of committing them is confirmed by the repetition. Frequency renders us at firft indifferent, then infentible. The hopelefinefs attending a long indulged cuftom generates careleffnefs, tills for want of exercise the power of refiftance is firft weakened, then destroyed.

But there is a ftill more ferious point of wiew in which the fubject may be confidered. The finall faults continually repeated, always retain their original diminutiveness? Is any axiom more established than that all evil is of a progressive nature? Is a bad temper which is never repressed, no worse after years of indulgence, than when we first gave the reins to it? Does that which we first allowed ourselves under the name of harmless levity on ferious subjects, never proceed to profanenes? Does what was once admired as proper proper spirit, never grow into pride, never fwell into infolence? Does the habit of incorrect narrative, or loose talking, or allowed hyperbole, never lead to falsehood, never fettle in deceit? Before we positively determine that small faults are innocent, we muss undertake to prove that they shall never outgrow their primitive dimensions; we muss afcertain that the infant shall never become a giant.

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 243

Procrastination is reckoned among the most venial of our faults, and fits fo lightly on our minds, that we fcarcely apologize for it. But who can affure us that had not the affistance we had refolved to give to one friend under diftrefs, or the advice to another under temptation to-day, been delayed, and from mere floth and indolence been put off till to-morrow, it might not have preferved the fortunes of the one, or faved the foul of the other?

It is not enough that we perform duties, we must perform them at the right time. We must do the duty of every day in its own

M 2

feafon.

feafon. Every day has its own imperious duties; we must not depend upon to-day for fulfilling those which we neglected yesterday, for to-day might not have been granted us. To-morrow will be equally peremptory in its demands; and the succeeding day, if we live to see it, will be ready with its proper claims.

Indecifion, though it is not fo often caufed by reflection as by the want of it, yet may be as mifchievous, for if we fpend too much time in balancing probabilities, the period for action is loft. While we are ruminating on difficulties which may never occur, reconciling differences which perhaps do not exift, and poifing in oppofite fcales things of nearly the fame weight, the opportunity is loft of producing that good, which a firm and manly decifion would have effected.

Idlenefs, though itfelf " the most unperforming of all the vices," is however the pass through which they all enter, the stage on which they all act. Though supremely passive itself, it lends a willing hand to all evil, evil, practical as well as fpeculative. It is the abettor of every fin whoever commits it, the receiver of all booty whoever is the thief. If it does nothing itfelf, it connives at all the mifchief that is done by others.

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 245

Vanity is exceedingly mifplaced when ranked, as the commonly is, in the catalogue of fmall faults. It is under her character of harmleffnefs that the does all her mitchief. She is indeed often found in the fociety of great virtues. She does not follow in the train, but mixes herfelf with the company, and by mixing mars it. The ufe our fpiritual enemy makes of her is a mafter stroke. When he cannot prevent us from doing right actions, he can accomplife his purpofe almost as well "by making us vain of them." When he cannot deprive the public of our benevolence, he can defeat the effect to ourfelves by poifoning the principle. When he cannot rob others of the good effect of the deed, he can gain his point by robbing the doer of his reward.

M. 3.

Peevishness

Digitized by Google

Peevilbnels is another of the minor mife-Human life, though fufficiently unries. happy, cannot contrive to furnish misfortunes fo often as the paffionate and the peevifh can fupply impatience. To commit our reafon and temper to the mercy of every acquaintance, and of every fervant, is not making the wifeft use of them. If we recollect that violence and peevifhnefs are the common refource of those whose knowledge is small, and whofe arguments are weak, our very pride might lead us to fubdue our paffion, if we had not a better principle to refort to. Anger is the common refuge of infignificance. People who feel their character to be flight, hope to give it weight by inflation. But the blown bladder at its fulleft diftenfion is still empty. Sluggish characters, above all, have no right to be paffionate. They fhould be contented with their own congenial faults. Dulnefs however has its impetuofities and its fluctuations as well as genius. It is on the coaft of heavy Bœotia that the Euripus exhibits exhibits its unparalleled reftleffnefs and agitation.

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 247

Triffing is ranked among the venial faults. But if time be one grand talent given us in order to our fecuring eternal life; if we triffe away that time fo as to lofe that eternal life, on which by not trifling we might have laid hold, then will it answer the end of fin. A life devoted to trifles not only takes away the inclination, but the capacity for higher The truths of Christianity have purfuits. fcarcely more influence on a frivolous than on a profligate character. If the mind be fo abforbed, not merely with what is vicious, but with what is ufelefs, as to be thoroughly difinclined to the activities of a life of piety, it matters little what the caufe is which fo difinclines it. If these habits cannot be accufed of great moral evil, yet it argues a low ftate of mind, that a being who has an eter. nity at stake can abandon itself to trivial purfuits. If the great concern of life cannot be fecured without habitual watchfulnefs, how is it to be fecured by habitual careleffnefs? It will afford little comfort to the trifler, when at the last reckoning he gives in his long negative catalogue that the more oftenfible offender was worfe employed. The trifler will not be weighed in the fcale with the profligate, but in the balance of the fanctuary.

M 4

will

Some men make for themfelves a fort of code of the leffer morals, of which they fettle both the laws and the chronology. They fix " the climactericks of the mind*;" determine at what period fuch a vice may be adopted without difcredit, at what age one bad habit may give way to another more in character. Having fettled it as a matter of courfe, that to a certain age certain faults are natural, they proceed to act as if they thought them neceffary.

But let us not practife on ourfelves the groß imposition to believe that any failing, much less any vice, is neceffarily appended to any state or any age, or that it is irrefistible at any. We may accustom our-

• Dr. Johnfon.

felves

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 249

felves to talk of vanity and extravagance as belonging to the young, and avarice and peevifhnefs to the old, till the next ftep will be that we shall think ourselves justified in adopting them. Whoever is eager to find excufes for vice and folly, will feel his own backwardnefs to practife them much dimi-It is only to make out an imaginary nifhed. neceffity, and then we eafily fall into the neceffity we have imagined. Providence has established no fuch affociation. There is, it is true, more danger of certain faults under certain circumstances; and some temptations are stronger at fome periods, but it is a proof that they are not irrefiftible becaufe all do not fall into them. The evil is in ourfelves who mitigate the difcredit by the fuppoled neceffity. The prediction, like the dream of the Aftrologer, creates the event inftead of foretelling it. But there is no fupposition can be made of a bad cafe which will justify the making it our own: Nor will general positions ever ferve for individual apologies. - Who has not known perfons who, though they retain the found health and vigour of active life, fink prematurely into floth and inactivity, folely on the ground that thefe difpofitions are fancied to be unavoidably incident to advancing years? They demand the indulgence before they feel the infirmity. Indolence thus forges a difmission from duty before the difcharge is iffued out by Providence. No. — Let us endeavour to meet the evils of the feveral conditions and periods of life with fubmission, but it is an offence to their divine difpenfer to foreftal them.

M 5

But we have ftill a faving claufe for ourfelves, whether the evil be of a greater or leffer magnitude. If the fault be great we lament the inability to refift it, if fmall, we deny the importance of fo doing; we plead that we cannot withftand a great temptation, and that a fmall one is not worth withftanding. But if the temptation or the fault be great, we fhould refift it on account of that very magnitude; if fmall, the giving it up can coft but little; and the confcientious habit of of conquering the lefs will confer confiderable ftrength towards fubduing the greater.

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 251

There is again a fort of fplendid character, which winding itfelf up occasionally to certain fhining actions, thinks itfelf fully justified in breaking loofe from the fhackles of reftraint in fmaller things; it makes no feruple to indemnify itfelf for these popular deeds by indulgences which, though allowed, are far from innocent. It thus secures to itself praise and popularity by what is fure to gain it, and immunity from censure in indulging the favourite fault, practically exolaiming, " is it not a little one?"

Nanity is at the bottom of almost all, may we not fay, of all our fins? We think more of fignalizing than of faving ourfelves. We overlook the hourly occasions which occur of ferving, of obliging, of comforting those around us, while we fometimes not unwiljingly perform an act of notorious generofity. The habit however in the former cafe better indicates the disposition and bent of the M 6 mind, mind, than the folitary act of fplendor. The apoftle does not fay whatfoever great things ye do, but "whatfoever things ye do, do all to the glory of God." Actions are lefs weighed by their bulk than their motive. Virtues are lefs meafured by their fplendor than their principle. The racer proceeds in his courfe more effectually by a fteady unflackened pace, than by ftarts of violent but unequal exertion.

That great abstract of moral law, of which we have elsewhere spoken *, that rule of the highest court of appeal, set up in his own bosom, to which every man can always refort, " all things that ye would that men should do unto you do ye also unto them." — This law if faithfully obeyed, operating as an infallible remedy for all the disorders of self-love, would, by throwing its partiality into the right scale, establish the exercise of all the smaller virtues. Its strict observance would not only put a stop to all injuftice but to all unkindnefs; not only to oppreffive acts, but to unfeeling language. Even haughty looks and fupercilious geftures would be banifhed from the face of fociety, did we afk ourfelves how we fhould like to receive what we are not afhamed to give. Till we thus morally tranfmute place, perfon, and circumftance with those of our brother, we fhall never treat him with the tendernefs this gracious law enjoins.

* Chap. IX.

injustice

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 253

Small virtues and fmall offences are only fo by comparison. To treat a fellow creature with harsh language, is not indeed a crime like robbing him of his estate or defitroying his reputation. They are however all the offspring of the fame family. They are the fame in quality though not in degree. All flow, though in streams of different magnitude, from the fame fountain; all are indications of a departure from that principle which is included in the law of love. The confequences they involve are not less certain, though they are less important.

4

The

The reafon why what are called religious people often differ fo little from others in fmall trials is, that instead of bringing religion to their aid in their leffer vexations, they either leave the diffurbance to prev upon their minds, or apply to falle reliefs for its removal. Those who are rendered unhappy by frivolous troubles, feek comfort in frivolous enjoyments. But we fhould apply the fame remedy to ordinary trials as to great ones; for as finall difquietudes foring from the fame caufe as great trials, namely, the uncertain and imperfect condition of human life, fo they require the fame remedy. Meeting common cares with a right spirit would impart a smoothness to the temper, a fpirit of cheerfulnels to the heart, which would mightily break the force of heavier trials.

You apply to the power of religion in great evils. Why does it not occur to you to apply to it in the lefs? Is it that you think the inftrument greater than the occasion demands?

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 255

demands? It is not too great if the leffer one will not produce the effect; or if it produce it in the wrong way, for there is fuch a thing as putting an evil out of fight without curing it. You would apply to religion on the lofs of your child - apply to it on the lofs of your temper. Throw in this wholefome tree to fweeten the bitter waters. As no calamity is too great for the power of Christianity to mitigate, fo none is too fmall to experience its beneficial refults. Our behaviour under the ordinary accidents of life forms a characteristic distinction between different classes of Christians. The least advanced refort to Religion on great occafions, the deeper proficient reforts to it on all. What makes it appear of fo little comparative value is, that the medicine prepared by the great Phyfician is thrown by inftead of being taken. The patient thinks not of it but in extreme cafes. A remedy however potent, not applied, can produce no effect. But he who has adopted one fixed principle for the government of his life.

256 ON THE COMPARATIVELY

life, will try to keep it in perpetual exercife. An acquaintance with the nature of human evils and of their remedy, would check that fpirit of complaint which fo much abounds, and which often makes fo little difference between people profeffing religion and thofe who profess it not.

If the duties in queftion are not great, they become important by the conftant demand that is made for them. They have been called " the fmall coin of human life," and on their perpetual and unobftructed circulation depends much of the comfort as well as convenience of its transactions. They make up in frequency what they want in magnitude. How few of us are called to carry the doctrines of Chriftianity into diftant lands! but which of us is not called every day to adorn those doctrines, by gentleness in our own carriage, by kindness and forbearance to all about us ?

In performing the unoftenfible duties there is no incentive from vanity. No love of fame infpires that virtue of which fame will will never hear. There can be but one motive, and that the pureft, for the exercife of virtues, the report of which will never reach beyond the little circle whofe happinefs they promote. They do not fill the world with our renown, but they fill our own family with comfort, and if they have the love of God for their principle, they will have his favour for their reward.

Digitized by Google

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 257

In this enumeration of faults, we include not fins of infirmity, inadvertency, and furprize, to which even the most fincere Chriftians are but too liable. What are here adverted to are allowed, habitual, and unrefisted faults: habitual because unrefisted, and allowed from the notion that they are too inconfiderable to call for refiftance. Faults into which we are betrayed through furprize and inadvertency, though that is no reafon for committing them, may not be without their uses; they renew the falutary conviction of our finful nature, make us little in our own eyes, increase our fense of dependence, promote watchfulnels, nefs, deepen humility, and quicken repentance.

258 ON THE COMPARATIVELY

We must however be careful not to entangle the conficience or embarrals the spirit by groundless apprehensions. We have a merciful father, not a hard master to deal with. We must not harrals our minds with a sufficious dread as if by a needless rigour the Almighty were laying fnares to entrap us, nor be terrified with imaginary fears as if he were on the watch to punish every cafual error.—To be immutable and impeccable belongs not to humanity. He who made us best knows of what we are made. —Our compassionate High Priest will bear with much infirmity, will pardon much involuntary weakness.

But knowing, as every man must know who looks into his own heart, the difficulties he has from the intervention of his evil tempers, in ferving God faithfully, and still however earness to ferve him, is it not to be lamented that he is not more folicitous to remove his hindrances by trying to

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 259

to avoid thole inferior fins, and refifting thole leffer temptations, and practifing thole fmaller virtues, the neglect of which obftructs his way, and keeps him back in the performance of higher duties. Inftead of little renunciations being grievous, and petty felf-denials a hardihip, they in reality foften grievances, diminish hardihip. They are the private drill which trains for public fervice.

If, as we have repeatedly remarked, the principle is the teft of the action, we are hourly furnifhed with occasions of shewing our piety by the spirit in which the quiet unnoticed actions of life are performed. The facrifices may be too little to be observed except by him to whom they are offered. But small folicitudes, and demonstrations of attachment, fcarcely perceptible to any eye but his for whom they are made, bear the true character of love to God, as they are the infallible marks of affection to our fellow creatures.

By

By enjoining fmall duties, the fpirit of which is every where implied in the Gofpel, God, as it were, feems contriving to render the great ones eafy to us. He makes the light yoke of Chrift ftill lighter, not by abridging duty, but by increasing its facility through its familiarity. These little habits at once indicate the fentiment of the soul and improve it.

It is an awful confideration, and one which every Christian should bring home to his own bosom, whether small faults wilfully perfisted in, may not in time not only dim the light of conficience, but extinguish the spirit of grace : Whether the power of refistance against great fins may not be finally withdrawn as a just punishment for having neglected to exert it against small ones.

Let us endeavour to maintain in our minds the awful imprefision that perhaps among the first objects which may meet our eyes when we open them on the eternal world,

SMALL FAULTS AND VIRTUES. 261

world, may be that tremendous book, in which, together with our great and actual fins, may be recorded in no lefs prominent characters, the ample page of omiffions, of neglected opportunities, and even of fruitlefs good intentions, of which indolence, indecifion, thoughtlefinefs, vanity, trifling and procraftination, concurred to frustrate the execution.

Digitized by Google

F 262 1

CHAP. XII.

Self-Examination.

IN this age of general enquiry, every kind of ignorance is efteemed difhonourable. In almost every fort of knowledge there is a competition for fuperiority. Intellectual attainments are never to be undervalued. Learning is the best human thing. All knowledge is excellent as far as it goes, and as long as it lafts. But how fhort is the period before " tongues shall cease and knowledge fhall vanish away !"

Shall we then effeem it diffonourable to be ignorant in any thing which relates to life and literature, to tafte and fcience, and not feel ashamed to live in ignorance of our own hearts?

To have a flourishing estate and a mind in diforder; to keep exact accounts with a Steward.

3

SELF-EXAMINATION.

Steward, and no reckoning with our Maker; to have an accurate knowledge of lofs or gain in our bufinefs, and to remain utterly ignorant whether our fpiritual concerns are improving or declining; to be cautious in afcertaining at the end of every year how much we have increafed or diminifhed our fortune, and to be carelefs whether we have incurred profit or lofs in faith and holinefs, is making a wretched eftimate of the comparative value of things. To beftow our attention on objects in direct oppofition to their importance, is furely no proof that our learning has improved our judgment.

That deep thinker and acute reasoner, Dr. Barrow, has remarked, that "it is a peculiar excellency of human nature, and which diftinguishes man from the inferior creatures more than bare reason itself, that he can reflect upon all that is done within him, can differen the tendencies of his foul, and is acquainted with his own purposes."

262

Digitized by Google

SELF-EXAMINATION

This diftinguishing faculty of felf-infpection would not have been conferred on man, if it had not been intended that it should be in habitual operation. It is furely, as we before obferved, as much a common law of prudence to look well to our fpiritual as to our worldly poffefions. We have appetites to control, imaginations to reftrain, tempers to regulate, paffions to fubdue; and how can this internal work be effected, how can our thoughts be kept within due bounds. how can a proper bias be given to the affections, how can " the little state of man" be preferved from continual infurrection, how can this reftraining power be maintained, · if this capacity of difcerning, if this faculty of infpecting be not kept in regular exercife? Without constant discipline, imagination will become an outlaw, confcience an attainted rebel.

This inward eye, this power of introverfion is given us for a continual watch upon the foul. On an unremitted vigilance over its interior motions, those fruitful feeds of action, action, those prolific principles of vice and virtue, will depend both the formation and the growth of our moral and religious character. A fuperficial glance is not enough for a thing fo deep, an unfteady view will not fuffice for a thing fo wavering, nor a cafual look for a thing fo deceitful as the human heart. A partial infpection on any one fide, will not be enough for an object which must be observed under a variety of afpects, becaufe it is always fhifting its pofition, always changing its appearances.

264

Digitized by Google

SELF-EXAMINATION.

We hould examine not only our conduct but our opinions; not only our faults but our prejudices, not only our propenfities but our judgments. Our actions themfelves will be obvious enough; it is our intentions which require the fcrutiny. These we should follow up to their remoteft fprings, fcrutinize to their deepest recesses, trace through their most perplexing windings. And left we should, in our pursuit, wander in uncertainty and blindnefs, let us make use of that guiding clue which the Almighty has furnished by his word, and by his spirit, for VOL. I. conducting N conducting us through the intricacies of this labyrinth. "What I know not teach Thou me," fhould be our conftant petition in all our refearches.

Did we turn our thoughts inward, it would abate much of the felf-complacency with which we fwallow the flattery of others. Flattery hurts not him who flatters not himfelf. If we examined our motives keenly, we fhould frequently blufh at the praifes our actions receive. Let us then confcientioufly enquire not only what we do, but whence and why we do it, from what motive and to what end.

Self-infpection is the only means to preferve us from felf-conceit. We could not furely fo very extravagantly value a being whom we ourfelves fhould not only fee, but feel to be fo full of faults. Self-acquaintance will give us a far more deep and intimate knowlege of our own errors than we can poffibly have, with all the inquifitivenefs of an idle curiofity, of the errors of others. We are eager enough to blame them without , knowing knowing' their motives. We are no lefs eager to vindicate ourfelves, though we cannot be entirely ignorant of our own. Thus two virtues will be acquired by the fame act, humility and candour; an impartial review of our own infirmities, being the likelieft way to make us tender and compaffionate to thole of others.

Digitized by Google

Nor fhall we be fo liable to over-rate our own judgment when we perceive that it often forms fuch falfe effimates, is fo captivated with trifles, fo elated with petty fucceffes, fo dejected with little difappointments. When we hear others commend our charity which we know is fo cold ; when others extol our piety which we feel to be fo dead; when they applaud the energies of our faith, which we must know to be fo faint and feeble; we cannot poffibly be fo intoxicated with the applaufes which never would have been given had the applauder known us as we know, or ought to know ourfelves. If we contradict him, it may be only to draw on ourfelves the imputation of a fresh virtue, N 2

humility.

humility, which perhaps we as little deferve to have afcribed to us as that which we have been renouncing. If we kept a fharp look out, we fhould not be proud of praifes which cannot apply to us, but fhould rather grieve at the involuntary fraud of impofing on others, by tacitly accepting a character to which we have fo little real pretention. To be delighted at finding that people think fo much better of us than we are confcious of deferving, is in effect to rejoice in the fuccefs of our own deceit.

We fhall alfo become more patient, more forbearing and forgiving, fhall better endure the harfh judgment of others refpecting us, when we perceive that their opinion of us nearly coincides with our own real though unacknowleged fentiments. There is much lefs injury incurred by others thinking too ill of us, than in our thinking too well of ourfelves.

It is evident then, that to live at random, is not the life of a rational, much lefs of an immortal, leaft of all of an accountable being being. To pray occasionally, without a deliberate courfe of prayer; to be generous without proportioning our means to our expenditure; to be liberal without a plan, and charitable without a principle; to let the mind float on the current of public opinion, lie at the mercy of events for the probable occurrence of which we have made no provision ; to be every hour liable to death without any habitual preparation for it; to carry within us a principle which we believe will exift through all the countless ages of eternity, and yet to make little enquiry whether that eternity is likely to be happy or miferable — all this is an inconfiderateness which, if adopted in the ordinary concerns of life, would bid fair to ruin a man's reputation for common fense; yet of this infatuation he who lives without felf-examination is abfo--lutely guilty.

Nothing more plainly fhews us what weak vacillating creatures we are, than the difficulty we find in fixing ourfelves down to the very felf-foruting we had deliberately refolved on. Like the worthless Roman Emperor we retire to our clofet under the appearance of ferious occupation, but might now and then be furprized, if not in catching flies, yet in purfuits nearly as contemptible. Some trifle which we fhould be afhamed to dwell upon at any time, intrudes itfelf on the moments dedicated to ferious thought; recollection is interrupted; the whole chain of reflection is broken, fo that the fcattered links cannot again be united. And fo inconfiftent are we that we are fometimes not forry to have a plaufible pretence for interrupting the very employment in which we had just before made it a duty to engage. For want of this home acquaintance, we remain in utter ignorance of our inability to meet even the ordinary trials of life with cheerfulnefs; indeed by this neglect we confirm that inability.

N 3

on.

$70 SELF-EXAMINATION.

Nurfed in the lap of luxury, we have perhaps an indefinite notion that we have but a loofe hold on the things of this world, and of the world itfelf. — But let fome accident take away, not the world, but fome triffe on on which we thought we fet no value while we poffeffed it, and we find to our aftonifhment that we hold, not the world only, but even this trivial pofferfion with a pretty tight grafp. Such detections of our felfignorance, if they do not ferve to wean, ought at least to humble us.

There is a fpurious fort of felf-examination which does not ferve to enlighten but to blind. A perfon who has left off fome notorious vice, who has foftened fome fhades of a glaring fin, or fubftituted fome outward forms in the place of open irreligion, looks on his change of character with pleafure. He compares himfelf with what he was, and views the alteration with felf-complacency. He deceives himfelf by taking his flandard from his former conduct, or from the character of still worfe men, instead of taking it from the unerring rule of Scripture. He looks rather at the difcredit than the finfulnefs of his former life, and being more ashamed of what is difreputable than grieved at what is vicious, he is, in this state of shallow refor-, mation, more in danger in proportion as he is

N 4

is more in credit. He is not aware that it is not having a fault or two lefs will carry him to heaven, while his heart is ftill glued to the world and eftranged from God.

If we ever look into our hearts at all, . we are naturally most inclined to it when we think we have been acting right. Here infpection gratifies felf-love. We have no great difficulty in directing our attention to an object when that object prefents us with pleafing images. But it is a painful effort to compel the mind to turn in on itfelf, when the view only prefents fubjects for regret and remorfe. This painful duty however must be performed, and will be more falutary in proportion as it is lefs pleafant. - Let us establish it into a habit to ruminate on our faults. With the recollection of our virtues we need not feed our vanity. They will, if that vanity does not obliterate them, be recorded elfewhere.

We are also most disposed to look at those parts of our character which will best bear it, and which confequently least need it; at those those parts which afford most felf gratulation. If a covetous man, for instance, examines himfelf, instead of turning his attention to the peccant part, he applies the probe where he knows it will not go very deep; he turns from his avarice to that fobriety of which his very avarice is perhaps the fource. Another, who is the flave of paffion, fondly refts upon fome act of generofity, which he confiders as a fair commutation for fome favourite vice, that would coft him more to renounce than he is willing to part with. We are all too much difpofed to dwell on that fmiling fide of the profpect which pleafes and deceives us, and to fhut our eyes upon that part which we do not chufe to fee, becaufe we are refolved not to quit. Selflove always holds a fcreen between the fuperficial felf-examiner and his faults. The nominal Chriftian wraps himfelf up in forms which he makes himfelf believe are religion. He exults in what he does, overlooks what he ought to do, nor ever fuspects that what is done at all can be done amifs.

As

273

274 SELF-EXAMINATION.

As we are fo indolent that we feldom examine a truth on more than one fide, fo we generally take care that it fhall be that fide which fhall confirm fome old prejudices. While we will not take pains to correct those prejudices and to rectify our judgment, left it fhould oblige us to difcard a favorite opiaion, we are yet as eager to judge, and as forward to decide, as if we were fully pefieffed of the grounds on which a found judgment may be made, and a juft decifion formed.

We should watch ourfelves whether we obferve a fimple rule of truth and justice, as well in our conversation, as in our ordinary transactions; whether we are exact in our measures of commendation and censure; whether we do not beftow extravagant praife where fimple approbation alone is due; whether we do not withhold commendation, where, if given, it would support modesty and encourage merit; whether what deferves only a flight censure as imprudent, we do not reprobate as immoral; whether we do not fometimes affect to over-rate ordinary 2 merit, merit, in the hope of fecuring to ourfelves the reputation of candor, that we may on other occasions, with lefs fuspicion, depreciate established excellence. We extol the first because we fancy that it can come into no competition with us, and we derogate from the last because it obviously eclipses us.

Let us afk ourfelves if we are confcientioufly upright in our effimation of benefits; whether when we have a favour to afk we do not depreciate its value, when we have one to grant we do not aggravate it ?

It is only by fcrutinizing the heart that we can know it. It is only by knowing the heart that we can reform the life. Any carelefs obferver indeed, when his watch goes wrong, may fee that it does fo by cafting an eye on the dial plate; but it is only the artift who takes it to pieces and examines every fpring and every wheel feparately, who, by afcertaining the precife caufes of the irregularity, can fet the machine right, and reftore the obftructed movements.

м б

The

275

SELF-EXAMINATION.

276

The illusions of intellectual vision would be materially corrected by a close habit of cultivating an acquaintance with our hearts. We fill much too large a fpace in our own imaginations; we fancy we take up more room in the world than Providence affigns to an individual who has to divide his allotment with fo many millions, who are all of equal importance in their own eyes; and who, like us, are elbowing others to make room for themfelves. Just as in the natural world, where every particle of matter would ftretch itself and move out of its place, if it were not kept in order by furrounding particles: the preffure of other parts reduces this to remain in a confinement from which it would escape, if it were not thus prefied and acted upon on all fides. The confcientious practice we have been recommending, would greatly affift in reducing us to our proper dimensions, and in limiting us to our proper place. We should be astonished if we could fee our real diminutiveness, and the fpeck we actually occupy. When shall we learn learn from our own feelings of how much confequence every man is to himfelf?

Nor must the examination be occasional but regular. Let us not run into long arrears, but fettle our accounts frequently. Little articles will run up to a large amount, if they are not cleared off. Even our innocent days, as we may chufe to call them, will not have paffed without furnishing their contingent. Our deadness in devotion our eagerness for human applause - our care to conceal our faults rather than to correct them - our negligent performance of - fome relative duty - our imprudence in conversation, especially at table - our inconfideration - our driving to the very edge of permitted indulgences --- let us keep these -let us keep all our numerous items in fmall fums. Let us examine them while the particulars are fresh in our memory, otherwife, however we may flatter ourfelves that leffer evils will be fwallowed up by the greater, we may find when we come to fettle the grand account that they will not be the lefs lefs remembered for not having been recorded.

And let it be one fubject of our frequent enquiry, whether fince we laft fcrutinized our hearts, our fecular affairs, or our eternal concerns, have had the predominance there. We do not mean which of them has occupied most of our time, the larger portion of which must, neceffarily, to the generality, be abforbed in the cares of the prefent life; but on which our affections have been most bent; and especially how we have conducted ourfelves when there has arifen a competition between the interests of both.

That general burft of fins which fo frequently rufhes in on the confciences of the dying, would be much moderated by previous habitual felf-examination. It will not do to repent in the lump. The forrow muft be as circumftantial as the fin. Indefinite repentance is no repentance. And it is one grand use of felf-inquiry, to remind us that all unforfaken fins are unrepented fins,

To

To a Christian there is this fubstantial comfort attending a minute felf-examination, that when he finds fewer fins to be noted, and more victories over temptation obtained, he has a folid evidence of his advancement, which well repays his trouble.

The faithful fearcher into his own heart, that " chamber of Imagery," feels himfelf in the fituation of the Prophet*, who being conducted in vision from one idol to another, the fpirit, at fight of each, repeatedly exclaims, " here is another abomination !" The prophet being commanded to dig deeper, the further he penetrated the more evils he found, while the fpirit continued to cry out, " I will fhew thee yet more abominations."

Self-examination by detecting felf-love, felf-denial by weakening its powers, felf-government by reducing its defpotifm, turns the temper of the foul from its natural bias,

* Ezekiel.

controls

Digitized by Google

controls the diforderly appetite, and, under the influence of divine grace, in a good meafure reftores to the man that dominion over himfelf, which God at firft gave him over the inferior creatures. Defires, paffions, and appetites are brought to move fomewhat more in their appointed order, fubjects not tyrants. What the Stoics vainly pretended to, Chriftianity effects. It reftores man to a dominion over his own will, and in a good meafure enthrones him in that empire which he had forfeited by fin.

He now begins to furvey his interior, the awful world within; not indeed with felfcomplacency, but with the control of a Sovereign, he ftill finds too much rebellion to indulge fecurity, he therefore continues his infpection with vigilance, but without perturbation. He continues to experience a remainder of infubordination and diforder, but this rather folicits to a ftricter government than drives him to relax his difcipline.

This felf-infpection fomewhat refembles the correction of a literary performance. After

SELF-EXAMINATION.

After many and careful revifals, though fome groffer faults may be done away; though the errors are neither quite fo numerous, nor fo glaring as at first, yet the critic perpetually perceives faults which he had not perceived before; negligences appear which he had overlooked, and even defects start up which had paffed on him for beauties. He finds much to amend, and even to expunge, in what he had before admired. When by rigorous caftigation the most acknowleged faults are corrected, his critical acumen, improved by exercife, and a more habitual accquaintance with his fubject, ftill detects and will for ever detect new imperfections. But he neither throws afide his work, nor remits his criticism, which, if it do not make the work perfect, will at leaft make the author humble. Confcious that if it is not quite fo bad as it was, it is still at an immeasurable distance from the required excellence.

Is it not aftonifhing that we fhould go on repeating periodically, " Try me, O God," while while we are yet neglecting to try ourfelves? Is there not fomething more like defiance than devotion to invite the infpection of Omnifcience to that heart which we ourfelves neglect to infpect? How can a Chriftian folemnly cry out to the Almighty, "feek the ground of my heart, prove me and examine my thoughts, and fee if there be any way of wickednefs in me," while he himfelf neglects to " examine his heart," is afraid of " proving his thoughts," and dreads to enquire, if there " be any way of wickednefs" in himfelf, knowing that the enquiry ought to lead to the expulsion.

In our felf-inquifition let us fortify our virtue by a rigorous exactnefs in calling things by their proper names. Self-love is particularly ingenious in inventing difguifes of this kind. Let us lay them open, ftrip them bare, face them, and give them as little quarter as if they were the faults of another. Let us not call wounded pride delicacy. Self-love is made up of foft and fickly fenfibilities. Not that fenfibility which melts at the the forrows of others, but that which cannot endure the leaft fuffering itfelf. It is alive in every pore where felf is concerned. A touch is a wound. It is carelefs in inflicting pain, but exquifitely awake in feeling it. It defends itfelf before it is attacked, revenges affronts before they are offered, and refents as an infult the very fufpicion of an imperfection.

In order then to unmask our hearts, let us not be contented to examine our vices, let us examine our virtues alfo, " thofe fmaller faults." Let us fcrutinize to the bottom those qualities and actions which have more particularly obtained public effimation. Let us enquire if they were genuine in the principle, fimple in the intention, honeft in the profecution. Let us afk ourfelves if in fome admired inftances our generofity had no tincture of vanity, our charity no taint of oftentation? Whether, when we did fuch a right action which brought us credit, we should have perfisted in doing it had we forefeen that it would incur cenfure ? Do

Do we never deceive ourfelves by miftaking a conftitutional indifference of temper for Christian moderation ? Do we never construe our love of ease into deadness to the world? Our animal activity into Christian zeal? Do we never miltake our oblinacy for firmness, our pride for fortitude, our felfishness for feeling, our love of controverfy for the love of God, our indolence of temper for fuperiority to human applause? When we have stripped our good qualities bare; when we have made all due deductions for natural temper, eafinefs of disposition, felf-interest, defire of admiration, when we have pared away every extrinsic appendage, every illegitimate motive, let us fairly caft up the account, and we shall be mortified to fee how little there will remain. Pride may impose itself upon us even in the shape of repentance. The humble Christian is grieved at his faults, the proudman is angry at them. He is indignant when he difcovers he has done wrong, not fo much becaufe his fin offends God, as because it has let him fee that to make himfelf believe.

It is therefore more neceffary to excite us to the humbling of our pride than to the performance of certain good actions; the former is more difficult as it is lefs pleafant. That very pride will of itfelf ftimulate to the performance of many things that are laudable. These performances will reproduce pride as they were produced by it; whereas humility has no outward ftimulus. Divine grace alone produces it. It is fo far from being actuated by the love of fame, that it is not humility, till it has laid the defire of fame in the duft.

If an actual virtue confifts, as we have frequently had occafion to obferve, in the dominion over the contrary vice, humility is the conqueft over pride, charity over felfifhnefs, not only a victory over the natural temper, but a fubfitution of the oppofite quality. This proves that all virtue is founded in felf-denial, felf-denial in felfknowledge, and felf-knowledge in felf-examination. Pride fo infinuates itfelf in all we do. do, and fay, and think, that our apparent humility has not feldom its origin in pride. That very impatience which we feel at the perception of our faults is produced by the aftonifhment at finding that we are not perfect. This fenfe of our fins fhould make us humble but not defperate. It fhould teach us to diftruft every thing in ourfelves, and to hope for every thing from God. The more we lay open the wounds which fin has made, the more earneftly fhall we feek the remedy which Chriftianity has provided.

But inftead of feeking for felf-knowledge, we are glancing about us for grounds of felf-exaltation. We almost refemble the Pharifee who with fo much felf-complacency delivered in the catalogue of his own virtues and other men's fins, and, like the Tartars, who think they possible the qualities of those they murder, fancied that the fins of which he accused the Publican would swell the amount of his own good deeds. Like him we take a few items from memory, and a few more from imagination. Instead of pulling down the edifice which pride has raifed.

SELF-EXAMINATION.

raifed, we are looking round on our good works for buttreffes to prop it up. We excufe ourfelves from the imputation of many faults by alleging that they are common, and by no means peculiar to ourfelves. This is one of the weakeft of our deceits. Faults are not lefs perfonally our's becaufe others commit them. Is it any diminution of our error that others are guilty of the fame ?

Self-love being a very industrious principle has generally two concerns in hand at the fame time. It is as bufy in concealing our own defects as in detecting those of others, efpecially those of the wife and good. We might indeed direct its activity in the latter instance to our own advantage, for if the faults of good men are injurious to themfelves, they might be rendered profitable to us, if we were careful to convert them to their true use. But instead of turning them into a means of promoting our own watchfulnefs, we employ them mifchievoufly in two ways. We leffen our refpect for pious characters when we fee the infirmities infirmities which are blended with their fine qualities, and we turn their failings into a juftification of our own, which are not like theirs overfhadowed with virtues. To admire the excellences of others without imitating them is fruitlefs admiration, to condemn their errors without avoiding them is unprofitable cenforioufnefs.

When we are compelled by our confcience, to acknowledge and regret any fault we have recently committed, this fault fo preffes upon our recollection, that we feem to forget that we have any other. This fingle error fills our mind, and we look at it as through a telescope, which, while it clearly shews the object, confines the fight to that one object exclusivel. Others indeed are more effectually shut out, than if we were not examining this. Thus while the object in question is magnified, the others are as if they did not exist.

It feems to be established into a kind of fystem not to profit by any thing without us, and not to cultivate an acquaintance with any

SELF-EXAMINATION.

any thing within us. Though we are perpetually remarking on the defects of others, yet when does the remark lead us to fludy and to root out the fame defects in our own hearts? We are almost every day hearing of the death of others, but does it induce us to reflect on death as a thing in which we have an individual concern? We confider the death of a friend as a loss, but feldom apply it as a warning. The death of others we lament, the faults of others we censure, but how feldom do we make use of the one for our own amendment, or of the other for our own preparation *?

It is the fashion of the times to try experiments in the Arts, in Argiculture, in Philosophy. In every fcience the diligent profession is always afraid there may be some fecret which he has not yet attained, some occult principle which would reward the labour of discovery, something even which

* For this hint, and a few others on the fame fubjea, the Author is indebted to that excellent Christian Moralift, M. Nicole.

. VOL. I.

the

the affiduous and intelligent have actually found out, but which has hitherto eluded bis purfuit. And shall the Christian stop fhort in his fcrutiny, fhall he not examine and enquire till he lays hold on the very heart and core of religion ?

Why fhould experimental philosophy be the prevailing ftudy, and experimental religion be branded as the badge of enthufiafm, the cant of a hollow profession? Shall we never labour to establish the distinction between appearance and reality, between fludying religion critically and embracing it practically? between having our conduct creditable and our hearts fanctified ? Shall highest motives, and elevate our aims with enter into the holieft by the blood of Jefus ?

Natural reason is not likely to furnish arguments fufficiently cogent, nor motives fufficiently 6

we not afpire to do the best things from the our attainments? Why should we remain in the Veftibule when the Sanctuary is open? Why fhould we be contented to dwell in the outer courts when we are invited to ficiently powerful to drive us to a close felfinfpection. Our corruptions foster this ignorance. To this they owe their undifputed possession of our hearts. No principle fhort of Christianity is strong enough to impel us to a ftudy fo difagreeable as that of our faults. Of Christianity, humility is the prime grace, and this grace can never take root and flourish in a heart that lives in ignorance of itfelf. If we do not know the greatness and extent of our fins, if we do not know the imperfection of our virtues. the fallibility of our beft refolutions, the infirmity of our pureft purpofes, we cannot be humble; if we are not humble we cannot be Chriftians.

290

But it may be afked, is there to be no end to this vigilance? Is there no affigned period when this felf-denial may become unneceffary? No given point when we may be emancipated from this vexatious felf-infpection? Is the matured Chriftian to be a flave to the fame drudgery as the novice? The true anfwer is — we may ceafe to watch, when our fpiritual ritual enemy ceases to affail. We may be off our guard when there is no longer any temptation without. We may cease our felf-denial when there is no more corruption within. We may give the reins to our imagination when we are fure its ten-We may dencies will be towards heaven. difmifs repentance when fin is abolifhed. We may indulge felfishness when we can do it without danger to our fouls. We may neglect prayer when we no longer need the favour of God. We may cease to praise him when he ceafes to be gracious to us. - To discontinue our vigilance at any period short of this will be to defeat all the virtues we have practiced on earth, to put to hazard all our hopes of happiness in heaven.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

(FORD

Strahan and Prefton. Printers-Street, London.

292