impregnable previous to the invention of artillery; but, according to the present mode of warfare, it is utterly incapable of standing a regular siege. The magnificence of the High-street is considerably enhanced by several public buildings, the architecture and display of which are in the highest degree creditable to the taste of the inhabitants of this northern city. The palace terminating the street is a superb structure in the form of a square; its various decorations are extremely elegant, and the many curiosities it contains are well worth examination. The numerous religious establishments here are eminently calculated to accommodate their different congregations; by far the greater number of them also possess considerable architectural beauty; among these the most prominent is St. Giles's church, which is by many considered as one of the most remarkable objects in Edinburgh; it is an ancient Gothic fabric, in the form of a cross, with a lofty square tower rising from its centre, from which a kind of turret ascends, of exquisite workmanship, resembling an imperial crown: under the roof of this building are four different places of worship. Among the various other public buildings deserving notice, Heriot's and Watson's hospitals claim priority; they both derive their origin and whole support from the individuals whose names they bear; the former is a very elegant Gothic edifice, erected from the designs of Inigo Jones, and at the present time supports, clothes, and educates about 180 boys; the latter is as well endowed as the former, but though in itself very handsome, is far behind it in point of architectural beauty. The charitable institutions are numerous, bespeaking the humane character of the inhabitants generally; and there are perhaps few cities in Europe where the receptacles for the indigent of every description are more comfortable than here. The characteristic features of the New Town are regularity, elegance, and grandeur, for all which united, its equal is scarcely to be found: it consists of two parts, one of which was designed by Mr. James Craig in 1767, and is now completed; the other will comprehend a number of streets situated to the north and east of the former. The first of these divisions occupies the horizontal ridge to the north of the Old Town; it is of a parallelogramic form, and has three principal streets running parallel with each other; of these the centre one is of unrivalled beauty, and is terminated at each end by a square, the buildings of which are uncommonly superb; the other two are terraces; the one overlooking the North Loch and Old Town, and the other commanding a fine view of the

Frith of Forth, the coast of Fife, and the distant hills of Stirlingshire and Perthshire. St. George's and St. Andrew's churches, the Excise and Register offices, and the Physicians' Hall must likewise all be noticed as majestic structures, and will not fail, severally, to call down the admiration of the beholder. Edinburgh has been described as "a hot-bed of genius," and as "the Athens of the North;" and it is most certain that every Scotsman feels a pride in the unrivalled eminence of his capital in all kinds of useful and scientific knowledge; but the honourable station this city now holds among the seats of learning in Europe, has been comparatively but lately obtained; for literary acquirements were almost entirely confined to the clergy, previous to the Reformation: and it was not until the union of the two crowns in the person of James VI. and that of the kingdoms in the time of Queen Anne, that the great obstacles to the extension of knowledge were removed. The buildings now appropriated to the cultivation of science are numerous, and all of a superior class: they receive every attention from the literati of the day, and are much frequented owing to the celebrity of the different professors, who are obliged, their salaries being small, to exert themselves, and thereby gain reputation and an increased number of students, from whom some of them derive a very large income. amusements of Edinburgh are rather distinguished by the taste and elegance they display, than by their number, variety, or splendour: here are plays, concerts, and assemblies; the former are exhibited in a theatre, which in point of size and accommodation, is far inferior to that of many provincial towns; and the two latter are generally held in the assembly-rooms in George Street, the interior of which are particularly elegant, and contain every possible accommodation. Calton hill, lying to the east of the town, is a favourite resort of the inhabitants, and commands such rich, extensive, and diversified prospects as are very rarely to be met with: this delightful spot is attained by passing over the Regent's bridge, the act of parliament for the erection of which passed in the year 1814; its foundation was laid in September, 1815, the work commenced in August 1816, it was completed in March 1819, and now stands a proud specimen of adjacent architecture, that with the adiacent buildings, may safely be said to vie with the most majestic structures of the kind in Europe. There is likewise an extremely beautiful walk from the north of the city, along the water of Leith, to St. Bernard's well, which has long been celebrated for the medicinal virtues of its waters. Edinburgh sends one member to parliament, and has a market daily, that is well supplied with all kinds of provisions.

LAUDER, the only royal borough in the county, is nothing more than a small inland town, totally destitute of manufactures; but since the early part of the last century, when it was a very miserable place, it has certainly greatly improved, in common with the whole country, and also in consequence of this road having been carried through it. Copper ore has been found here, but none wrought; and the hills furnish abundance of peat and turf, which are the ordinary fuel. Spanish, Scotch, and English coins, and many fragments of swords, bows, and arrows pointed with flint, have been dug up here. Lauder is noted for being the scene of

Few places in the kingdom can convey to the tourist so perfect an idea of the fortifications of former times as this town; for here may be seen, though in rather a decayed state, a long extended wall, strengthened at intervals by bastions, some of them of a square form, others rounded, and the remains of Sallyports defended by turrets. Of late years, Hartlepool has been much frequented for sea-bathing during the summer months, and various additional buildings, and other accommodations have been erected for the reception and convenience of the visitors. The church, or rather chapel, as this town is included in the parish of Hart, is an irregular building, of various ages and styles of architecture, the most ancient parts of which are the nave and tower; there are also some very old but mutilated monuments in the church-yard, said to have belonged to the Bruces, one of whom established here a monastery for Grey Friars in the 13th century, the ruins of which are still visible at a short distance from the church. Hartlepool also contains a town-hall, free-school, and custom-house; it has a considerable fishing business, and a good weekly market on Saturday. The Dean (which is in Saxon written Den or Dene, and signifies a valley or woody place that suddenly sinks from the common level of the country, and cannot be seen till the spectator is close upon the borders,) extends about three miles from its entrance on the sea-shore, takes a waving course, and constitutes some of the finest scenery in the county, being deep, rocky, and sylvan. The rocks here in many places approach so nearly with correspondent angles, and tally so exactly in their strata, that it appears probable they have been torn asunder by some great convulsion of nature; and various detached masses that seem rent from the summit, now lie in the bottom with trees and brush-wood growing upon them. The fishermen, who are almost the only inhabitants of Hartlepool, except during the bathing season, are an athletic and courageous race, always ready to brave the violence of a storm, to rescue their fellow-creatures in case of shipwreck, which not unfrequently occurs on this coast, and a life-boat has lately been established here to aid their intrepid exertions. The scenery in this neighbourhood is extremely interesting, and the rocks skirting the coast to the north of the town, being excavated and rendered cavernous for some distance, by the violence of the waves, afford many pleasant and romantic retreats at low water. The harbour is formed by two piers, situated on the north and south sides of the river, near the extremity of the former of which an elegant circular light-house was built about 20 years ago. The imports of Sunderland are numerous, as are also the exports; but of the latter, the principal article is coal, the trade in which furnishes employment for about 500 vessels, independent of nearly the same number of keels, which are employed in conveying the coals from the staiths to the ships. It is stated that the quantity of coals annually exported from this place, amounts to about 590,000 chaldrons. Market on Friday.

This noble fabric originated in the genuine patriotism of Rowland Burdon, Esq. of Castle Eden, who, assisted by that able engineer Mr. Thos. Wilson, invented and obtained a patent for the plan on which it is constructed, and also most liberally subscribed 23,000*l.* towards its erection, which cost the sum of 27,000*l.* The iron-work was cast by Messrs Walker, of Rotherham, and the whole was put together and thrown over the river in the short space of ten days, after which it was opened for public use, Aug. 9. 1796, with a very splendid ceremony and procession, at which it is supposed 80,000 people were present.

Benedict Biscop, or Biscopius, an Englishman, who has the credit of having been one of the first persons who introduced the useful and ornamental arts into this kingdom, and whose followers, from his name, obtained the appellation of Benedictines. Soon after laying the foundation of this abbey, it is said that Biscopius went to France, and engaged a number of masons, who came over and built his church with stone after the manner of the Romans; he afterwards sent agents into France to procure some glass-makers, a kind of workmen totally unknown to the Saxons at that period, and they not only glazed the windows of this church and monastery, but also taught the Saxons the art of making glass for windows, lamps, drinking-vessels, &c. This place has partaken in the increasing prosperity of Sunderland, and its population and buildings have received considerable additions within the last 60 years; it is composed of two parts, respectively called the Town and Shore, and the labouring class of men are chiefly employed in ship-building and its dependent branches, for which purpose several yards have been established here.

SOUTH SHIELDS ranges along the south bank of the Tyne, near its junction with the sea, and, together with North Shields on the opposite side of the river, in Northumberland, forms a considerable maritime port. The eminence on the south point of the harbour, (part of which is now occupied by a building called the Law-house, from whence one of the grandest sea-views in the kingdom is enjoyed,) was formerly the site of a Roman station, and various altars, coins, and other relics of that people have been found here at different times. South Shields, has chiefly derived its present importance from its very favourable situation for commercial purposes: most of the streets are narrow and inconvenient, and the houses indifferently built, except those in the market-place and on the Bank Top; and the appearance of the town is rendered extremely singular by a vast number of lofty artificial hills, some of them built upon, that extend along the south and east sides of the town, and are formed by the refuse of the glass-houses, the cinders from the salt-works, and the Thames gravel brought hither as ballast by light colliers, and afterwards thrown out near the banks of the river. In this town there are also three glass-houses for the manufacture of crown-glass, four for that of bottles, and one white-glass manufactory. It is said, that about 80 years ago, no more than four ships belonged to this town, but they now amount to upwards of 500. A respectable town-house, erected in the year 1768, occupies the centre of the market-place, which is a spacious square. The chapel is parochial, under Jarrow; the interior is neat, and contains, as well as the church-yard, several monuments deserving notice; on the chain, above the chandelier in the church, an elegant model of a life-boat is preserved; this was presented by Mr. H. Greathead, the inventor, whose name will long be remembered on account of the great benefit he has conferred on mankind by the produc-	From Tynemo.	Cross the  river Wear Monk Wearmouth, Wheat Sheaf Fulwell Inn To Fulwell $\frac{1}{4}$ m. The most ancient part of the town is a long narrow street near the river, which, for dirt, bustle, and confusion, bears a great resemblance to Wapping; this is, however, strongly contrasted by Dockway Square, an extremely neat place, whose inhabitants are chiefly wealthy ship-owners: here are also several new streets, a public library, a new market-place on the side of the river, charity-schools on the improved systems of education, and an elegant inn built by the late Duke of Northumberland, who was one of the earliest patrons of Mr. Greathead's life-boat, and had one constructed at his own expense to be kept at this place. SCARBOROUGH is seated in the recess of a beautiful bay, on the borders of the German Ocean, and occupies almost a central position between Whitby and Flamborough head; it rises from the shore in the form of an amphitheatre, and has a picturesque appearance on the concave slope of its semicircular bay: to the east are seen the ruins of its ancient castle, whose venerable walls adorn the summit of a lofty promontory, while to the south a vast expanse of ocean exhibits a scene of the highest magnificence, almost constantly enlivened by innumerable sails. The recess of the tide leaves a spacious area upon the sands, equally convenient for exercise and sea-bathing. The shade of the neighbouring hills, and the refreshing gales from the ocean, give an agreeable temperature to the air during the sultry heats of summer, and produce a grateful serenity. The town is well built, and various circumstances concur to render it a charming retreat. The pier is very commodious, and the harbour, which is the only port between the Humber and Tynemouth-haven, is easy of access. Here are gardens with public walks, an elegant assembly-room, and a handsome theatre. estimation. Scarborough formerly contained four churches, three of which are, however, destroyed, and the remaining one, dedicated to St. Mary, anciently belonged to the Cistercian monastery here established. This town likewise contains meeting-houses belonging to different sects of dissenters; it sends two members to parliament, has a good market on Thursday and Saturday, and though chiefly supported by the influx of visitors, is by no means destitute of trade and commerce, for besides the articles exported and imported, here is a good sail-cloth manufactory, three rope-walks, and several ship-yards, from whence are occasionally launched vessels of 600 tons burthen. The adjacent country is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and exhibits a variety of romantic scenery: vast tracts of elevated moors raise their bleak and barren summits towards the north, and form a sublime and striking contrast to the cultivated country towards the west, while a grand and extensive line is presented to the south and south-west by the Wold-hills in the East Riding.

The hall and saloon are finished in the most correct classic taste, and are universally admired; the former, 60 feet long by 40 broad, is surrounded with 16 fluted Corinthian pillars, and ornamented with 12 busts of the Greek and Latin poets, large medallions of the twelve Cæsars, statues of the gods and goddesses, &c.; the saloon, about 88 feet by 25, is formed in three divisions by Ionic pillars, and elegantly embellished with family pictures and antique statues; on one side of the door next the garden, is the bust of Tully, on the other, that of Horace. The various apartments are decorated with a choice and valuable collection of very beautiful paintings, the productions of the first masters. The ornamental grounds are laid out with superior taste, and possess uncommon beauty: there is a terrace in the garden adjoining the house which affords many delightful prospects; it has an Ionic temple at one end, from whence a great variety of landscape is beheld. This temple is a circular room terminating in a dome; the ornaments are white and gold, in mosaic, and it is likewise adorned with four statues, placed in niches; it stands at the point of an elevated promontory, ornamented with fine plantations, and projecting into a winding valley, which also enjoys an abundance of sublime and beautiful scenery; the whole, has, in fact, the appearance of fairyland, and it is only ocular demonstration that can convince the spectator of the real existence of such an assemblage of beautiful scenery.

			HAYTON, 2 m. distant, Everingham Hall, Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, Esq. This is a spacious and lofty modern-built brick mansion, with three fronts, towards the east, south, and west; the two former are facing the park, which is of very considerable extent; but as the surrounding country is perfectly flat, the house does not command any prospect, except from the upper stories, whence there is a view of the western edge of the Wolds, as well as over the levels towards York and Howden. On the north side, art, however, has created a landscape which nature has improved: between the house and the gardens there is a fine canal, resembling a natural river, with an island of considerable extent in the middle, that divides it into two branches, over which are two wooden bridges, and the whole produces a very pleasing effect. A Saxon font that was formerly in the parish church, stands near the entrance into the gardens: it is a venerable piece of antiquity, of a circular form, with uncouth figures of animals, &c. rudely carved on its outer side. The house contains an excellent full-sized portrait of Charles I. on horseback, by Vandyke, which is valued by connoisseurs at 1000 guineas.

STAMFORD BRIDGE, 1 m.

STAMFORD BRIDGE. This place is famous for one of the most decisive and sanguinary conflicts recorded in British history, between the English and Norwegians, the former commanded by Harold II., King of England, and the latter by Harfager, King of Norway, and the banished Earl of Northumberland, the English King's brother. The force employed upon this occasion is stated to have been upwards of 60,000 men on each side, and so complete was the overthrow of the invaders, that twenty very small ships were sufficient to carry back to Norway the wreck of this formidable army, with which the King of England suffered them to depart. Vast treasure was found in the enemy's camp, and the King of Norway and Earl of Northumberland were both slain in the battle.

SEWERBY. Sewerby House, John Greame, Esq. The mansion stands in a lofty and pleasant situation: it commands a magnificent view of the bay towards the south; and of a considerable extent of coast;— beyond Sewerby, at Marton, Marton Hall, R. Creyke, Esq. The mansion occupies an agreeable situation, commanding a view of the sea to the northward of Flamborough Head. The adjacent country is elevated, and pleasant, and the plantations near the house are in a more thriving condition than might be expected in a situation so near the coast.

FLAMBOROUGH, a place of considerable antiquity, was formerly of some consequence, though now only a large fishing village; it stands in a hollow, nearly in the centre of the promontory; and the fishermen, who with their families constitute more than half the population, carry on their business with great spirit and activity, but chiefly confine themselves to their own coasts, seldom sending more than four boats to the herring fishery at Yarmouth. The church is an ancient structure, and contains a curious monumental inscription to the memory of Sir Marmaduke Constable, Knt. who lies interred under a tombstone in a place formerly used as a vestry, but afterwards as a school. At the west end of the town there is an ancient ruin called the Danish Tower, now almost wholly demolished. In the time of Edward the Confessor, the lordship of Flamborough belonged to Harold, Earl of the West Saxons, and afterwards King of England, who was slain at the memorable battle of Hastings.

SLEDMERE. Sledmere Park, the highly ornamental seat of Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart., is situated in a spacious vale, in the centre of the Yorkshire Wolds, and may be considered as the ornament of that bleak and hilly district. The mansion was erected by, and from the designs of, the late Sir Christopher Sykes, Bart., and is planned and executed in a style of superior elegance; the library, in particular, is a spacious and magnificent apartment, with a superbly finished ceiling. The green-houses, hot-houses, pavilions, and other ornamental buildings, are all in the most elegant and appropriate style; and a lofty arched gateway, that has been erected over the present and ancient Roman road from York to Bridlington, has a very fine effect, and is seen at a considerable distance from every quarter. The superior taste of the late proprietors is evinced by all the surrounding scenery: the circumjacent hills are adorned with elegant farm-houses, that resemble villas erected for rural retirement; the farms are also in as high a state of cultivation as the soil will admit; and, together with the numerous and extensive plantations skirting the slopes of the hills, and the magnificent mansion, with its ornamented grounds, in the centre of the vale, form a luxuriant assemblage little to be expected in a country like the Wolds. — Beyond Sledmere, The Castle, John Evans, Esq.

			NORMAN CROSS. Beyond Norman Cross you have a fine view of Whittlesea Mere , which is an extensive sheet of water about two miles long, and something better than a mile across; it is situated in a fenny part of the country, but affords excellent sailing and fishing, and is much frequented by parties of pleasure in the summer season; it is, however, occasionally agitated by the wind in a violent manner, even during fair and calm weather, which some have considered to be the effect of evaporations breaking forcibly out of the bowels of the earth. This mere was so frozen over in February 1739 , that two prizes were run for on it. THORNEY, anciently called Ankeridge , derived its present name from the thorns and bushes that grow in its vicinity: it is a small market town, beautifully situated on an eminence surrounded by low and fertile grounds in a very complete state of drainage; it formerly contained an abbey, the church belonging to which is said to have been at least five times as large as it is at present, but was in a great measure destroyed at the time of the dissolution, and the existing portion of the edifice was only saved by being made parochial and fitted up for divine worship. The most perfect part of the ancient building is the west front, which is the entrance to the church; the recess for the door-way, and the arch of the west window, are pointed, and over the latter is a row of nine statues of saints, placed in pointed arches, and occupying the space between two octagonal towers that rise from each side the front nearly to the height of 20 feet. Several urns and coins of the Emperor Trajan have been dug up near the abbey, some remains of the cloisters belonging to which are supposed to constitute a portion of the school-house. The possessions of this abbey were granted in the time of Edward VI. to John Earl of Bedford , whose descendant, the present Duke , is not only owner of the town, but also of 19,000 acres of the surrounding lands.

was erected in the time of Henry VIII., by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, to entertain that sovereign in his progress through this part of the kingdom. The great hall was fitted up to receive a suite of hangings, made of goblin tapestry, that the duke became possessed of by his wife Mary, Queen of France: the east, west, and south fronts, which have embattled turrets at the angles, were also erected about that time. The north front, which is the handsomest part of the building, was however erected about the year 1723, from a design by, and under the direction of, the celebrated Sir John Vanbrugh; it consists of two lofty wings, balustraded at top, and having a pinnacle at each corner. In the north-west tower there is a beautiful chapel, and the north-east tower contains the kitchen: the offices are on the ground-floor of the east front, and over them is the principal dining-room, which is ornamented with a fine collection of portraits and other paintings: the south and west fronts contain numerous smaller apartments. This magnificent edifice stands in a fine park about 16 miles in circumference, and on the north side of the castle is an avenue that extends three quarters of a mile; to the south lie the gardens and pleasure-grounds; to the east there is a fine view which embraces the hamlet of Grimsthorpe and the lordship of Edenham; and towards the west is a beautiful sloping lawn that descends to two lakes, comprising about 100 acres; beyond which a rising ground is terminated by a grove of forest-trees.

MARKET DEEPING is a small town that derives its name from its situation, the land to the east of it being said to be relatively the lowest in the whole county. Ingulphus observes that Deeping signifies a low meadow, and also states that a lofty artificial bank was raised here in the time of William the Conqueror, to confine the waters of the river Welland, which before used frequently to overflow; a number of houses were also erected on this bank, and formed a large village. But there is an earlier notice of this place on record; for a valiant soldier, in the time of the Saxons, gave the manor of Deeping to the abbey of Croiland, and the grant was confirmed by the King of Mercia in the year 860. This town has a weekly market on Thursday, besides five annual fairs.

DUNSTON PILLAR is a plain quadrangular stone shaft, of a pyramidal shape, that rises to the height of about 100 feet. It was erected when the roads were intricate, and the heath was an extensive waste, and was then of great utility; but as the lands have since been enclosed, and other improvements made, it can now only be considered as a monument of the public spirit of the individual by whom it was constructed.

This town is extensive and pleasant, and the entrance from the Driffield road is remarkably fine; a spacious street, containing many elegant houses, terminates at an ancient gateway, through which lies the road into the town; the streets are in general broad, and the houses large and well built; the market place is also spacious and beautiful. The church of St. John, or the Minster, as it is commonly called, is a most superb edifice, and altogether displays a magnificence equal to that of some cathedrals; it contains several monuments of the ancient earls of Northumberland. The church of St. Mary is also a large and handsome structure; and the vicinity of the town towards the west is elevated and pleasant, diversified with woods and villages. Beverley has good weekly markets on Wednesday and Saturday, sends two members to parliament, and has an advantageous communication with the Humber by means of a navigable canal that has been cut from the river Hull.

BARTON is pleasantly situated on the southern side of the river Humber, about three quarters of a mile from its margin; the manor belongs to the crown, and though there is but one parish, there are two large churches; the one dedicated to St. Peter appears, by the tower, to have been erected about the time of the Conqueror, but the body of the church was rebuilt after the introduction of the pointed arch; to this St. Mary's church, which is very spacious, and evidently a more modern structure, is generally considered as a chapel of ease; and the idea that the town contains two parishes has probably arisen from the two churches being repaired by separate districts. Barton is in an improving state; it carries on a considerable trade in corn, and has several flour and other mills in its vicinity; but it is chiefly noted as the place where the great north road passes the Humber to Hull, and it has

The green-houses, &c. contain a large and splendid collection of exotic plants and flowers, and the pleasure-grounds are extremely beautiful, but if these, instead of being chiefly confined to the valley, were extended to the hills, they might be rendered sublimely romantic; still it must be allowed that the whole is planned and executed in a very superior style of elegance; yet it is much to be doubted, whether any artificial embellishments would be considered, by an admirer of nature and antiquity, as at all superior to the original and very beautiful scenery of Hackness.	From Whitby	A little farther, To Kilham 3¼ m., thence to Brillington 8 m. } ☞ London to * BRIDLING- TON 209 m. town-hall, or rather court-house, as it is called, in the upper rooms of which the quarter sessions, &c. are held; the lower part of the building, agreeably to the will of the founder, Mr. John Holstan, is let out for shops, and the rents appropriated to the use of the poor. Spalding, member of the port of Boston, has enjoyed a good carrying and coasting trade since the river Welland has been made navigable to the town, by which means barges of about 40 tons burthen can now proceed to the very centre of the place, where there are good quays, with spacious store-houses; but vessels requiring a large draught of water cannot come nearer than Boston Scalp, which is about nine miles distant. Various attempts have been made to introduce manufactures into Spalding, but all to no purpose; and the chief support of the inhabitants is derived from agriculture, and the numerous extensive grazing concerns that are carried on in the neighbourhood; wool, however forms a very prominent feature in its trade. Market on Tuesday.

LINCOLN, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. beyond, Sudbrook Holme, Sir Richard Sutton , Bart. MARKET RASEN derives its name from its situation upon the Rase, a stream that flows into the river Ancholme; it is a small town containing nothing worthy of notice, unless it be the peculiar form of the upper windows in the embattled tower of the church. These are similar to those of Yarborough church, near Louth, and it is probable that both were erected at the same period; for on the south side of the tower of each, there is a representation of our first parents on the branch of a fruit-tree, which has in its trunk the dart of death, alluding to the effects of eating the forbidden fruit. This vicarage is in the gift of the crown, and the vicar is, by the endowment, entitled to the unusual tythe of ale. This town has a weekly market on Tuesday, and also contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a meeting-house belonging to the Methodists, a small free-school, and an hospital for four poor men. GREAT GRIMSBY, so called to distinguish it from a village of the same name, is a town of considerable antiquity, and still enjoys many immunities. This sea-port was formerly fortified with two block-houses, of which, however, no traces are left; and it also possessed at one time two churches, St. Mary's and St. James's, the former, which was a handsome building, and its steeple a good land-mark for mariners, has long since been taken down; and the latter, though still a spacious structure, with a tower in the centre, was originally of greater extent, a part of the choir having fallen down about the year 1600. The steeple, a beautiful specimen of English pointed architecture, appears to have suffered less from the depredations of time, than other parts of the edifice, but the alterations here made at different periods, by no means correspond with the original style of the building. In the interior, there are many ancient monumental erections, some of which seem to have been removed from the three monasteries that were formerly in the town. Castor has a small weekly market on Monday; and in its church a very curious ceremony, respecting a peculiar tenure, takes place every Palm Sunday. A person enters the church-yard with a green silk purse, containing two shillings, and a silver penny tied at the end of a cart-whip, which he cracks three times in the porch, and continues there till the second lesson begins; when he goes into the church, and cracks the whip again three times over the clergyman's head. After kneeling before the desk during the reading of the lesson, he presents the minister with the purse, and then returning to the choir, he waits the remainder of the service. GREAT GRIMSBY, 1 m. before, and 1 m. distant, Weelsby House, Richard Thorold, Esq.

The market-place is of considerable breadth, but the market, formerly held here on Monday, has been discontinued many years. The church was formerly celebrated for its lofty spire, or broach, which was a well known sea-mark, till about the commencement of the last century, when having become ruinous, it was blown down by a hurricane. Hornsea-mere begins about 100 yards from the west end of the town; it is remarkable as being the only lake in Yorkshire, except the Malham Water in Craven, and includes an area of near 440 acres, having some of its banks planted with alders, &c.	From Hornsea 9$\frac{1}{4}$ to Ganstead 8$\frac{3}{4}$ To Coniston Mill 8$\frac{1}{4}$ Coniston 5$\frac{3}{4}$ South Skirlaugh Forward to Bridlington 20 m. 4$\frac{1}{2}$ To Rise 2$\frac{1}{2}$ Sigglesthorne, Church 1$\frac{3}{4}$ Seaton Along Hornsea Mere, to HORNSEA, Church  The above road is Turnpike no farther than South Skirlaugh.	From London 178$\frac{1}{2}$ 179 179$\frac{1}{2}$ 182 183$\frac{1}{4}$ 185$\frac{1}{4}$ 186 187$\frac{3}{4}$ the late Wm. BEVERLEY. Pennyman House, James Walker, Esq. LEVEN. Leven Grange, Rev. George Lampton. FLAMBOROUGH HEAD, one of the greatest curiosities this kingdom can boast, is really a magnificent object: the cliffs are of amazing grandeur and stupendous height, rising perpendicularly from 300 to 450 feet; they are composed of a mouldering limestone rock, of snowy whiteness, and there are several extensive caverns at the bottom, either formed by some unknown cause of distant origin, or by the turbulent violence of the ocean. Of these excavations, the most remarkable are Dove Cote, Kirk Hole, and Robin Lyth's Hole; but the latter far surpasses the others in dimensions and grandeur; it has two openings, one communicating with the land, the other with the sea; the first is low and narrow, and the entrance into the cavern is here surrounded with a tenebrous gloom, which however gradually disperses, and then the magnificence becomes unfolded, and excites the admiration of the exploring stranger: the floor is a solid rock formed into broad steps of an easy descent, and the stones at the sides are curiously variegated; the finely arched roof is nearly 50 feet high in the centre, and this great elevation, together with the many projecting ledges, and fragments of suspended rocks, give it a majestic, but at the same time awful appearance: on approaching the eastern extremity, a noble vista is also formed by its opening to the sea, which has a very grand appearance on emerging from the gloom of the cavern. The huge masses of insulated rocks, of a pyramidal form, that raise their broken	From Bridlington 206$\frac{1}{2}$ 23$\frac{1}{2}$ 21$\frac{1}{2}$ 21 20 18 16$\frac{3}{4}$ 15$\frac{1}{2}$ 15 14$\frac{1}{4}$ From London 183 185 185$\frac{1}{2}$ 186$\frac{1}{2}$ 188$\frac{1}{2}$ 189$\frac{3}{4}$ 191 191$\frac{1}{2}$ 192$\frac{1}{4}$ BRIDLINGTON. The situation of this town is both pleasant and salubrious; to the north the country rises with a gentle ascent for more than a mile, and to the south gradually slopes into a beautiful valley, watered by a considerable rivulet; at the west end of the town fertile meadows and pasture grounds lie along the edge of the vale and towards the east a small plain extends to the sea. This town consists chiefly of one long street that extends along the southern declivity of a small elevation, and had formerly a priory; at the time of the dissolution its endowments were considerable, but were confiscated to the crown as the last prior was executed at London for treason. Though only a fragment of the ancient priory church remains, there is sufficient to show that it was once a noble Gothic structure, and the date 1106, that may be seen over the entrance, is supposed to mark the period of its foundation; but the walls and fortifications that once enclosed the priory are entirely destroyed, except an arched gateway that stands above 360 feet from the west end of the church, and has a large room over it, now used as a town-hall; in the lower part of this structure, there are also some gloomy cells which serve as places of confinement for petty delinquents. Bridlington was formerly a considerable mart for corn, which was brought hither from the adjacent country for exportation, or to be conveyed coastwise to London, but this has greatly declined, owing to the central situation of Driffeld, and the opening of the navigable canal to that place. About one mile to the south-east of the town is the Quay, a healthful and pleasant spot, to which many respectable persons resort in sum-

These immensely elevated cliffs are the rendezvous of myriads of aquatic and other fowls in the summer, that resort hither to build their nests and rear their tender offspring: at that season, they seem altogether animated, being covered with innumerable birds of various plumage, and present an interesting scene of bustle and agitation. Those who are capable of appreciating the united beauties of the wild, grand, and sublime, will be highly gratified to view from the sea, in calm weather, this immense region of birds, and the diversified scenes of the stupendous promontory. When a gun is wantonly or cruelly fired, all within reach of its sound rush from their stations, and the eye is then almost dazzled with the waving of innumerable wings brightened by the rays of the sun, and the ear is stunned with the variety of their croaks and screams: indeed the strange dissonance of tone resounding in the air from so vast a collection, together with the solemn roar of the waves dashing against the rocks and reverberated by the caverns, form a concert altogether rude and extraordinary, that affects the mind with unusual sensations. The neighbourhood of Flamborough, Bridlington, and the Quay, constitute on the whole a range of highly interesting and agreeable scenery, in which the sublime and beautiful are finely blended and strikingly contrast-	From Bridl. 12$\frac{3}{4}$ 10$\frac{1}{4}$ 8$\frac{3}{4}$ 7$\frac{3}{4}$ 6$\frac{1}{2}$ 3$\frac{1}{2}$ 1$\frac{1}{2}$	to Warley Cross Hill, Guide Post Beeford Lissit to Turnpike, and Bridge Cross the to Old How Drain Lissit Chapel Barmston, Church Auburn House Hilderthorpe To Bridlington Quay $\frac{3}{4}$ m. Forward to * BRIDLINGTON to Hunmanby $8\frac{1}{2}$ m. The harbour is defended by two piers; on the northernmost of which there is a promenade that commands a fine view of Flamborough Head and the bay; the scene is likewise sometimes peculiarly animated by the numerous coasting vessels that are detained here by contrary winds; the entrance to the port is narrow, and therefore rather difficult of access, but the harbour is defended by two batteries from the approach of an enemy, and the bay is generally considered as the safest and most commodious anchoring place on this coast. PENISTONE is a small market-town: the market is on Thursday, but it is not much frequented, and principally noted for the number of moor-sheep sold. The environs of Penistone have a dreary and melancholy appearance, especially to the westward, where nothing presents itself to the eye, but bleak and barren moors, covered chiefly with heath or ling. In other places the soil is variable, but for the most part wet and spongy. Some of the land in the vicinity of the town is enclosed, and produces oats, with a small quantity of wheat: the moors to the westward are all unlimited common. The climate, as well as the soil, is cold, and unfavourable to vegetation. * This noble family residence was erected at different periods in the last century, partly under the direction of Sir Robert Taylor; it contains many apartments, equally conspicuous for size, elegance, and that air of close domestic comfort so extremely desirable in the ever-varying climate of this country; these were highly adorned by the refined taste and liberality of the late proprietor, and exhibit, besides a select and valuable collection of paintings, numerous Etruscan vases and other antiquities from Herculeum and Pompeii, about 4000 specimens of choice minerals, scientifically arranged, and a beautiful cabinet of maple-wood, in which there is a vast number of scarce and estimable shells. The paintings of the staircase, executed by Lanscroun, a pupil of Verrio, in 1723, and representing the triumphal entry of Julius Cæsar into Rome, and the apotheosis of that hero, are in good preservation, and may be considered, with the exception of those in the royal palaces, the best staircase decorations now remaining in Middlesex. Several of the principal apartments are fitted up in a costly but delicate style: there is a fine chimney-piece of Sicilian jasper in the dining-room, which was executed in Italy, and comprises a beautiful mask of Apollo, in statuary marble; the chimney-piece of the drawing-room is likewise of Sicilian jasper, and this apartment is adorned with pillars and pilasters, imitative of the same material. The attached grounds include about 100 acres; they are adorned with venerable timber, and watered by the New river, which has here an accession of beauty as it flows through a wider channel than usual: several fine prospects are also enjoyed, and the rural character of the scenery is scarcely interrupted by any building except the majestic dome of St. Paul's cathedral, which mingling with the grey of the horizon, climbs into notice above the utmost rise of a distant hill. Near the mansion is a fine display of the more hardy exotics, and the noble range of hot-houses contains a vast assemblage of beautiful and curious plants from every quarter of the globe.

† The mansion was erected after the designs of Mr. John Nash: it is a regular building of the Ionic order, and exhibits a fine example of that beautiful style, having three of its fronts decorated to the heights of the order that prevails throughout, and ornamented with columns of stone; but the one least embellished is appropriated to the offices, which are well concealed by a plantation and conservatory. The entrance is attained by a flight of stone steps, and is enriched by duplicated Ionic columns. In the arrangement of the interior, strict attention has been paid to modern refinements: the breakfast-parlour, eating-room, drawing-room, and library, are en suite, and the doors through the two former into the drawing-room, command the window of that apartment and the prospect from it, which view, on returning to the breakfast-room, is repeated by the glass over the chimney. The doors from the drawing-room to the library open into the jambs, and lay both these apartments together; and looking-glass is likewise inserted in the doors from the library to the conservatory, to reflect the prospect of the east window of the drawing-room. The surrounding grounds have a fine undulating surface, which falls gradually to a beautiful sheet of water, having a large coppice-wood bending over its margin, and beyond it a bold swell of land crowned with venerable timber: recent ornamental plantations have also been placed with considerable judgement, in different parts of the grounds.

town are dirty and ill-built, but the modern one possesses a number of fine buildings, some of which equal those of the New Town of Edinburgh. Though Ships can only at full tide enter the harbour, which is here formed by a stone pier, yet the roads afford at all times, very excellent anchorage for vessels of every description. Ship-building and several manufactures are carried on here, among the principal of which may be mentioned several very extensive rope works, and canvas manufactories, six or seven glass-houses, sugar-houses, soap-works, breweries, iron-works, a vinegar manufactory, a card manufactory, with a wire drawing apparatus, a manufactory for agricultural implements, and an extensive distillery; and the place has also the advantage of a frequent intercourse with London, besides a considerable trade with many foreign ports: it is accommodated with an extensive basin, wet and dry docks, and a light-house with reflecting lamps, which latter has been erected on the end of the pier. This town consists of two parishes, called North and South Leith; these are united by a drawbridge thrown across the harbour, but the greater part of the town is situated in South Leith, where there is an ancient but spacious and handsome Gothic church, besides a few other places of worship, a prison and custom-house, none of these are however, in any way deserving of particular notice. North Leith has also a parish church, but the most remarkable object here is the citadel, the remains of a fortification erected by Oliver Cromwell, the strong entrance gate to which still exists, and

The grounds near the mansion are rather flat, but they possess every embellishment that fine timber, well disposed sheets of water, ornamental buildings, and the river Cam, are capable of affording; they also contain a noble avenue of majestic trees about two miles and a half long: the whole has been greatly improved, the plantations and gardens have assumed a new appearance, the inclosures have been much extended, and many more acres of land brought into cultivation.

ELY stands on a considerable eminence in the Isle of Ely, a large tract of high land encompassed with fens that were formerly overflowed with water, and is indebted for its origin to an abbey founded here at an early period. Near the close of the 11th century was laid the foundation of the magnificent conventual church, a building characterised as one of the most curious monuments of ecclesiastical antiquity in the kingdom; it has, at different periods, undergone very important alterations, and was converted into a cathedral in the year 1541; this fabric now exhibits a singular admixture of various styles of architecture, but notwithstanding the dissimilarity of its parts, it must unquestionably, when considered as a whole, be looked upon as a very superb structure. The interior view of the great west tower is particularly beautiful; the choir, with its various decorations, also deserves notice, as well as the chapels attached to the north and south aisles, and the many ancient monuments here to be seen, but which latter have been much damaged, and the carving

filled up by a thick coat of white-wash. Trinity church, formerly St. Mary's chapel, stands near the east end of the cathedral, on the north side; it was begun in the reign of Edward II., and is one of the most perfect buildings of that age; but the sculpture of the interior was much damaged by the fanatical soldiers of the commonwealth, and what escaped them is so miserably clogged with plaster, that all the finer parts of the carving are obliterated. The cloisters and other buildings belonging to the monastery have long since been destroyed, except the refectory, now the deanery, and an elegant little chapel. The western gate of the college is also still standing, it is of brick, with battlements and low towers; and in the prebendal houses may likewise be traced considerable remains of the first Saxon church, of which they have been formed. Ely is the only city in England not represented in parliament; its streets are irregular, and, except the principal one, are neither paved or lighted; many of the houses are of stone, and some have a very ancient appearance; the inhabitants are chiefly employed in gardening, here carried on to a great extent, and Cambridge, St. Ives, and even London, receive considerable supplies of vegetables from hence. SOUTHERY. Robert Martin, Esq. STOW BARDOLPH, 1 m. beyond, Wallington Hall, Mrs. Ball. SOUTH RUNCTON, 1½ m. beyond, Watlington Hall, C. This ancient family mansion was erected in the time of Henry VII., and is now in a ruinous condition; but is of great antiquarian interest, and requires notice for its entrance gateway, and as having been the seat of the distinguished family of Le Strange, one of whom, Sir Roger, the founder of the hall, is commemorated by an altar-monument standing in the centre of the chancel of Hunstanton church.

BURNHAM WESTGATE. Near this place is Burnham Thorpe, which will ever be memorable in the page of history, as having been the birth-place of that eminently distinguished and ever to be lamented individual, the late Admiral Lord Nelson, whose father was many years rector of this parish, and also of Burnham Sutton. This distinguished hero in the annals of greatness, was born in the year 1758, and first sent to school at Norwich, and afterwards removed to North Walsham. In the year 1770 he was appointed a midshipman on board the Reasonable, of 64 guns, which was commanded by his maternal uncle Captain Maurice Suckling. When the voyage of discovery towards the North Pole was undertaken by Lord Mulgrave, young Nelson solicited to attend as coxswain to Captain Lutwidge, who, though an order had been given to take on board no boys, yet, struck with the ardour of the youth, was induced to receive him in that capacity. He afterwards served under the valiant Captain Farmer of the Sea-horse. Having passed the ordeal of lieutenantancy, and obtained the rank of post-captain, June 11, 1779, he was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke. In 1796 he was made a commodore, and hoisted a broad pendant. For his conduct under Sir John Jervis against the Spanish fleet off Cape St. Vincent, he was created Knight of	26 $\frac{1}{4}$	Gaywood	BURNHAM WESTGATE. Burnham Hall, C. J. Hawtayne , Esq.

In the unfortunate affair at Teneriffe he lost his right arm by a cannon-shot: he now obtained a pension of 1000 l. per annum; and the memorial on that occasion details some incidents of a life filled with enterprise, difficulties, and danger: "That he had been in four actions with hostile fleets; in three actions with frigates; in six engagements against batteries; in ten actions in boats, employed in cutting out vessels &c. During the war he had assisted at the capture of seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers, and taken and destroyed 50 sail of merchant-vessels: that he had been engaged against the enemy upwards of 120 times." Of his exploits in the battles of the Nile, of Copenhagen, and Trafalgar, history will amply record; and heraldry has already emblazoned the honours so justly conferred by his late Majesty on this meritorious officer, as Baron and Viscount Nelson of the Nile and of Burnham Thorpe, which honour, by his premature death in the year 1805, with the addition of an earldom, at present attach to his elder brother.

WEST RUDHAM. Houghton Hall, Marquis of Cholmondeley. This stately fabric, erected in the early part of the last century by the celebrated Sir Robert Walpole, is well calculated to fill the mind with every thing that magnificence can inspire, and when contemplated, naturally excites strong images of the power, grandeur, wealth, and enlarged ideas of the illustrious founder; it is a noble free-stone structure, with two principal fronts, ornamented with a cupola at each corner; the west front presents a double balustraded flight of steps, and has an entablature over the entrance supported by four Ionic columns. The wings, containing the offices, are connected with the fronts by handsome balustraded colonnades. The numerous and magnificent apartments are fitted up with the greatest taste, and in the most sumptuous manner. The gallery at Houghton will ever be memorable for the unrivalled collection of pictures that once adorned its walls. The whole were, however, it is much to be regretted, sold by a late Lord Orford, in 1779, to Catharine II. Empress of Russia, for 40,000l., which, exclusive of presents, cost 100,000l. These invaluable and noble specimens of the art have thus, by a miserable parsimony, been lost to the country for ever, and are now gone to assist the slow progress of the arts, in the cold unripening regions of the north. EAST RUDHAM, 2 m. beyond, Rudham Grange, James Buck, Esq. HOLKHAM PARK, Thomas William Coke, Esq.	From Wells	From London	At about 113 $\frac{3}{4}$ m. This parish formed one lordship in conjunction with Old Walsingham, and obtained great celebrity for centuries, owing to a small chapel in honour of the Virgin Mary, similar to the Sancta Caza at Nazareth, that was founded here by the widow of Ricoldie Faverley, about the year 1061. The lady's son not only confirmed the endowments, but made an additional foundation of a priory for Augustine canons, and erected a conventual church, which religious house obtained considerable wealth, but was most wastefully destroyed after the dissolution, though the ruins still exhibit several interesting relics of architectural antiquity. The church of Walsingham is a spacious and interesting pile, that exhibits in its architectural ornaments, monuments, and very elegant font, much to interest and gratify the antiquary; the latter, one of the finest specimens of the kind in England, is of an octangular form, and the whole of its base, shaft, and projecting upper portion, is covered with sculpture; it is elevated on a plinth of four steps, the exterior faces of which are likewise decorated with tracery mouldings. ST. IVES, a small town pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Ouse, was in a great measure destroyed by fire in 1689; its lower parts have also been several times inundated, owing to their being situated directly on the banks of the river; here is a good stone bridge of six arches, having over one of the piers, near the centre, an ancient building, probably intended for a chapel, but now occupied as a dwelling, whose upper part, which suffered by the fire above mentioned, is traditionally said to have served as a light-house to persons navigating the river. In the north-east part of the town the barn and dove-house belonging to an ancient priory are yet standing, but they do not exhibit any thing remarkable: the church is a light neat structure, with a handsome tower at the west end, surmounted by a spire, the latter has, however, been twice blown down; the chancel is the oldest part of the building; most of the windows are divided by mullions, and ramified above; and the sepulchral memorials are numerous, both here and in the church-yard, but not deserving of particular attention. St. Ives also contains places of religious worship belonging to the dissenters, and has a weekly market on Monday, one of the largest in the kingdom for beasts, sheep, poultry, pigs, &c. and said by the inhabitants to be only second to that of Smithfield, in London; besides which two well-frequented fairs are held annually at Whitsuntide and Michaelmas.

MARCH, an extensive hamlet in the parish of Doddington, contains a spacious and elegant church, and is situated nearly midway between Chatteris and Wisbeach, on the banks of the river Nen, whence it enjoys the advantages of a considerable trade. In 1730, when the road from this place to Wisbeach was made, three urns were discovered, full of ashes and burnt bones; and a pot was likewise dug up, containing 160 Roman denarii, of all the emperors from Vespasian to Antoninus Pius, but more especially of the latter. Many other coins have been found in this neighbourhood; an altar, 21 inches high, was discovered at Elm; and at Welney, different coins have been found in urns within reach of the ploughshare. Market on Friday.

WALPOLE is said to have been so called from its situation near a Roman wall or bank, and a small pool of water; and in the year 1727 numerous Roman bricks, and an aqueduct formed of earthen pipes, were found here by a person digging in his garden: this village gave name upon, but the adjacent grounds still retain vestiges of their ancient appropriation. This is a considerable village, pleasantly situated, and possessing an air of cheerful cleanliness not often seen; it consists chiefly of one street, about three quarters of a mile long, crossed at right angles, near the upper end, by a second but much shorter one. The church, a spacious and noble edifice, stands on a fine gravelly eminence; it has a substantial embattled tower at the west end, and two porches, now disused, at the sides: the chancel, the oldest part of the building, is apparently of the time of Henry III., and has several lance lights, besides those of the east window, which is divided into three large ones, and has a small column running down the middle of each division. Near the altar, in the south wall, is a double piscina, and a triple graduated stone seat, separated by light shafts, and having pointed headed arches above. This church is built of stone, and is in good repair; excepting the chancel, it is covered with a thick stucco partly composed of small gravelly pebbles, and contains several ancient brasses and other monuments deserving notice. A mineral spring was discovered here towards the middle of the last century, but its virtues are now little noticed; and about the year 1731, two urns, containing several Roman coins, were discovered in a piece of fen-land belonging to Wm. Thompson, Esq., and situated near the road leading from this place to Chatteris.

At a place called Cross-keys, in this parish, there is a passage, for horses and carriages, over the Washes to Long Sutton, in Lincolnshire; the channel is narrow at low water, and the distance over the sands is two miles.

BURY, near, at Upwood, Upwood House, Admiral Sir Richard Hussey Bickerton, Bart. RAMSEY formerly contain- ed an abbey famous for its school and library; it stood at the upper part of the town, towards the south, and at a little distance from the present church; but a ruined gateway is the only portion of it, of any consequence now in existence; this is, however, a very fine fragment of beautiful architec- ture, of the more florid kind, but in a lamentable state of decay. The church, a spacious and elegant fabric, has a well- built, embattled, and otherwise ornamented tower at the west end; the interior possesses con- siderable beauty, the windows are large and handsome, and appear, by the remaining frag- ments, to have been once finely adorned with stained glass of very rich hues; but the sepul- chral memorials are neither numerous nor of particular inter- est. Ramsey was visited by the plague in 1665-6, and was partly consumed by fire in 1731; it consists of one long street, with a second branching off northwards along the banks of the river from the bridge; the houses are mostly of brick, and the market, on Saturday, is in tolerable repute. The vicinity of Ramsey has been described as a rich arable soil, abounding with fruit and corn, planted with gardens, and fertile in pastures; in its neighbourhood there are likewise several lakes and fenny meres, producing a variety of fish and water-fowl; one of them, called Ramsey Mere, exceeds all the others in beauty and fertility, and is said to afford a most delightful prospect from that part where it flows gently along its sandy shore, and where the largest wood is most abundant.	96½	Hartford	58¾

		CROWLAND, or Croylad, a place of very remote antiquity, particularly interesting to the antiquary on account of the ruins of its once extensive and splendid abbey, and its singular triangular shaped bridge, is now reduced to the size of a large village that possesses little more than the ruins of its former splendour. The chief existing remains of the abbey are the skeleton of the nave of the conventual church, with parts of the south and north aisles; the latter of which is covered over, pewed, and fitted up as with the parish church. The trian- gular bridge in the middle of the town, may be looked upon as one of the greatest curiosities in Britain, if not in Europe; it is of stone, and consists of three pointed arches springing from as many abutments, that unite their groins in the centre, where three roads meet, with a steep ascent from each point, owing to which latter circumstance, carriages and horses generally go under it, but it is easily passed by foot passengers. Crowland being so surrounded by fens, is inaccessible, except from the north and east, in which directions the road is formed by artificial banks of earth, and from this singular sit- uation it has been, not inaptly, compared to Venice. The inhabi- tants are chiefly employed in grazing, attending geese, and the business of the dairy, but many also derive their livelihood from the sale of fish and wild fowl. Market on Saturday.

EPPING, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. before, Copped Hall, Henry J. Conyers, Esq.
This is a neat building composed of white bricks, and much admired for the excellent style of workmanship in which it is executed; it is situated in the middle of a large park surrounded by a demesne embracing an extent of about 4000 acres. The park is finely broken into hills, the tops and sides of which are clothed with ornamental plantations of luxuriant trees; indeed nature has been particularly liberal of her beauties in the decoration of this spot, and from many situations in the park some extensive and very fine prospects are obtained.—

leys, — Banbury, Esq.; and near est eminences in the county, and their present whimsical name is of uncertain derivation; on their tops is a triple entrenchment with two ditches, rudely circular, supposed to be of British origin; within the entrenchment which encloses an area of about 13 acres, is the mansion and grounds: the former is an irregular brick building, and the gardens, from recent improvements, have become extremely pleasant, and are ornamented with a small sheet of water in the centre, supplied from a well by means of a machine; from this reservoir, the house is furnished with water, there being no springs within a considerable distance.

After you pass the 51 mile stone, Ely Cathedral rises to the view, at a distance of 18 miles in the scene, and the house is surrounded on all sides by pleasure-grounds, interspersed with plantations and watered by canals. — 2 m. beyond

Newport, Audley House, Lord
Braybrooke. This magnificent mansion was built by the Earl of Suffolk in 1616 ; it was formerly much larger, it being then the fashion to construct buildings more for extent and magnitude than elegance and utility; it is said to have cost $200,000$ l., and although some very considerable portions of it have been removed, yet suffi-very handsome edifice; the interior is in a style of correspondwith a fine collection of pictures.

The park is extensive and finely wooded, pleasingly diversified with hill and dale, and enlivened by the river Granta, which flows through it, forming a canal in the front of the mansion crossed by a handsome bridge. On an eminence to the west of the building, called Ring Hill, is a

This is a brick mansion most delightfully situated in an extensive and beautiful park, in which that essential attribute to sylvan scenery, water, has been most judiciously displayed. The view to the west is over a fine lake, comprising near 30 acres of water, in which a venerable wood of oaks appears to form an island; to the north-west a fine lawn spreads its enamelled bosom, tastefully skirted by a serpentine river issuing from the lake.

This venerable seat is a peculiarly interesting remnant of ancient domestic architecture; it is of brick, altogether resembling Queen's college, Cambridge, and was originally of a square form, surrounding a court or quadrangle, 118 feet long by 92 broad, round which the apartments were ranged. The entrance is by a bridge, over a moat, through an arched gateway, between two majestic towers 80 feet high, the western one of which contains a winding brick staircase, beautifully turned and the other is divided into four stories: over the arched entrance gateway is a large handsome room, with one window to the north, and two bow windows to the south; these windows, and indeed the whole exterior of this part of the building, appear to be in their original state. The floor of the great room is paved with small fine bricks, and the walls are covered with very curious tapestry that appears to be of the age of Henry VII., who not improbably occupied the apartment when he visited Oxburgh, as this is called the King's room. BRANDON is pleasantly situated on the Little Ouse, which is navigable from Lynn to Thetford, and is here crossed by a bridge; it has a ferry a mile lower down for conveying goods to and from the Isle of Ely. The town, which gives title of Duke to the family of Hamilton in Scotland, is well-built, and its church is a good structure; in the neighbourhood are some extensive rabbit-warrens, that contribute largely to the supply of the London markets, one of which alone is said to furnish no less than 40,000 in a year.	33		72¼

built by the late Sir Andrew Fountaine, who rendered both himself and the place celebrated by cultivating the friendship of Pope and other literary characters of his day; it was at that period not only the rendezvous of living genius, but a repository for works of learning and art.
The mansion contains a fine collection of paintings, a good library, some ancient painted earthenware, bronzes, coins, &c.; here is also a large collection of old china, several pieces of which were painted by Raphael; among the latter are two very large cisterns of fine form and execution, measuring 3 feet by 18 inches each. — Near the above is Narborough Hall, Sam.
Tyssen, Esq.; and at West
Acre, the ruins of the Abbey.RAINHAM HALL, Marquis Townshend. This seat is delightfully situated by nature, and the grounds were a few years since greatly improved.
The building was erected in 1690, under the superintendence of the celebrated Inigo Jones, and is rather in the style of a good and commodious, than magnificent habitation: it contains a few paintings, among which is the famous one of Beli-sarius, by Salvator Rosa, and a very fine portrait of Mary de Medicis, by Rubens. — Near this is the residence of Lord
Charles Townshend.WELLS. Holkham House, T. W. Coke, Esq. This spacious and magnificent residence, the plan of which was first devised by the Earl of Leicester and the Earl of Burlington, assisted by Mr. Kent, from the designs of Palladio and Inigo Jones, was begun in 1734, and completed in 1760. The central part, of white brick, is connected to four wings or pavilions, by rectilinear corridors or galleries, and each of the two fronts, therefore, exhibits a centre and two wings;
in the centre of the south front,
which has an air of lightness and elegance, arising from the justness of its proportions, is a bold portico, whose entablature is supported by six Corinthian columns; but the grand or principal entrance is the north front, which exhibits different though handsome features. The wings, partaking of similar characteristics, have, however, been thought to detract from the general magnificence of the building, by being too much detached to be consistent with unity, and also by the want of uniformity of style with the south front. The centre, 345From

SWAFFHAM, a large and respectable town, occupies an elevated situation in a part of the county that is generally allowed to be particularly salu-brious; the houses are distributed over a considerable space, having near the centre a large open area, in which there is a pool of water. The principal public edifice is the church, a spacious and handsome fabrick, that appears to have been erected about the time of Henry VI.
or Henry VII.; it has a lofty well-proportioned tower, surmounted with enriched embrasures, and purified pinnacles;
the nave is lighted by 26 cleristory windows, still exhibiting some remains of the stained glass with which they were formerly charged; and its inner roof is ornamented with carved wood, figures of angels, bosses, &c.; it also contains some handsome monuments, curiously carved pews, and a library in which is preserved a fine missal. A cross was erected on the market-hill in 1783 by the late Earl of Orford; and an extensive heath near the town forms an admirable race-ground, where races are annually held about the end of September; coursing matches are also frequent here, and the grey-hounds are as regularly entered for the purpose, and placed under the same restrictions as the running horses. The weekly market on Saturday is well supplied with provisions.

feet long and 180 deep, includes the principal apartments, and each wing has also its respective destination; and while it is admitted there may be more spacious, uniform, and magnificent mansions than this, yet human genius could scarcely contrive any thing in which convenience could be more apparent than it is here; for by means of the hall, statue-gallery, and saloon, four general suites of apartments communicate with the dining-room. The interior is fitted up in the most splendid and tasteful manner; the entrance hall forms a cube, and has a gallery round, it supported by 24 Ionic columns; the statue-gallery consists of a central part 70 feet long and 22 wide, that opens by an handsome arch to two octangular ends, each 22 feet in diameter, one of which is furnished with books, the other with statues, &c.; the saloon, 40 feet long, 28 wide, and 23 high, is appropriated to paintings, and contains many by the most eminent masters; but exclusive of these, a vast collection is distributed over most of the apartments throughout the house. The ceilings of many of the rooms are of curious gilt, fret, and mosaic work; the Venetian windows, ornamented with handsome pillars, are also profusely gilded; and the marble chimney-pieces are very handsome. The agate tables, marble side boards, silk furniture, rich tapestry, beds, &c. are all equally elegant. The prescribed limits of this work render it impossible to give a good and ample description of the pleasure-grounds and park, with the various objects which environ

The grand entrance to the park and pleasure-grounds, which are of an highly ornamental character, is by a beautiful triumphal arch, whose effect is heightened by several clumps of trees surrounding it: crossing the turnpike-road, a narrow vista through a plantation one mile and a half long, exhibits an obelisk situated on an eminence; and at the bottom of the hill are two small but neat lodges. On ascending the hill through a fine plantation near the obelisk, several fine vistas exhibit the south front of the house, Holkham quay, the town of Wells, Stiffkey hills, Thorpe Lodge, Overy Quay, the triumphal arch, and the village church: on the north side of the park, a lake, covering about 20 acres, extends in nearly a rectilinear direction for 3168 feet; it includes a small island, and has a bold shore finely clothed with wood.

WATTON is a small town, situated near what is called the Filand, or open part of the county; it has a good weekly market on Wednesday, and has become a place of considerable thoroughfare since the making of the turnpike road through the hundred. The church, from its appearance, is thought to have been erected as early as the time of Henry I.; it stands at a distance from the town, near the site of the old manorial house, and was undoubtedly so placed, to accommodate the tenants of the different hamlets belonging to the manor.

HOLT, a neat market town, pleasantly situated on rising ground, was formerly much inconvenienced for want of water, which was necessarily fetched
from a considerable distance:
it was in a great measure destroyed by fire in the year 1708, since which period many good houses have, however, been erected, and the sessions-house is now occasionally used for holding subscription assemblies. Here is a large free-school, that was founded in 1556, by Sir Thos. Gresham, who placed it under the perpetual direction of the Fishmongers'
Company in London. This Sir Thomas Gresham was born here in 1507, and connecting himself with his brother Sir Richard, an eminent merchant, became a distinguished character; he served the office of sheriff for the city of London, the same year his brother filled the mayoralty; he was in the confidence of Queen Elizabeth, and obtained the appellation of
"merchant-royal;" he materially assisted the great Lord Burleigh, by borrowing money for the service of the state, and by advising him respecting commercial relations; and in conjunction with his brother he projected the erection of the Royal Exchange in London, which was afterwards completed by his nephew, Sir John Gresham.

The church, built in the col-structure, with a tower in the centre; but in the reign of Henry VII., this being considered as not strong enough to support the heavy bells, a large tower, called the New Clocker, was erected about 60 feet from the Chancel, on the south side of the church-yard.

There is a fine monument of white marble in the north transept of the church, to the memory of the poet Cowper.
Here also is a curious and handsome font, that was erected in 1468; it stands upon an octagon pedestal, consisting of 2 flights of steps, the upper of which is ornamented with roses and quatrefoils: the centre or shaft is enriched with full-length figures of eight of the apostles, and at the angles un-with their respective symbols;

the upper part is also carved with the crucifixion of Christ, and the seven sacraments. East

The interior of this structure is of a corresponding character; the apartments are fitted up with great taste; they are decorated with some good pictures, and the ceilings are beautifully painted. An ornamental building, that is detached from the house, and occupies the site of an old mansion, constitutes the stables. The park is extensive, and well stocked with beautiful spotted deer; it also abounds with game of every description, and contains a square obelisk of free-stone 96 feet high, with an ascent in the interior to the top, which is surmounted by a globe, encircled with rays; the base of this interesting monument is surrounded with iron railing; two of its sides bear appropriate inscriptions, and the whole forms a pleasing object, seen to a considerable distance in passing up and down the river. — Beyond Copdock is Hill House, *N. well paved, but rather narrow and irregular. It is said that this place at one time possessed 21 parochial churches, but the number at present is no more than 12; these are, however, in general, respectable edifices, and in some instances present pleasing specimens of pointed architecture, and likewise contain interesting monuments. Ipswich has a free grammar-school, and places of religious worship belonging to different sects of dissenters; its numerous charitable institutions, reflect great credit on the liberal spirit of the inhabitants; and its new market-place is of a peculiarly eligible character. Here is also a theatre, assembly-room, and race-course; a custom-house, barracks, town-hall, and various prisons; besides two yards employed in ship-building. The principal trade of this place is in malting and corn, the exportation of which articles is facilitated by the estuary of the Orwell, navigable for light vessels up to the town itself. The markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday. Vessels fitted up for the accommodation of passengers, sail every tide from hence to Harwich, and back again; an excursion that is rendered particularly delightful by the beauty of the scenery: the Orwell, for its extent, being reckoned one of the finest salt-water rivers, in the kingdom, it is bordered almost the whole way, on both sides, with gently rising hills, enriched with gentlemen's seats, villages, churches, woods, parks, and in fact almost every object that can give variety to a landscape. In the passage from Ipswich, the view is terminated in front by the main ocean, on the right with a prospect of Harwich and the high coast of Essex; on the left with Langrard fort; and the high land of Walton and Felixtow cliffs behind it.

STOKE, beyond, at Thornham Magna, Major House, Lord Henniker.

EYE is nearly surrounded by a small rivulet, and is thence said to derive its name, which signifies an island; the streets are narrow, and the houses in general mean, but the church is a spacious and handsome structure: the town sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Saturday. Eye formerly contained a castle, and to the east of the town may still be seen the ruins of the benedictine monastery.

The house, approached by two draw-bridges, is completely surrounded by a moat filled with water, which, as well as the basin in the park, is frequented by vast numbers of wild fowl, of different species, that are almost tamed by the encouragement they receive. The park, including about 400 acres, contains some of the finest oaks in this part of the kingdom, many of them of great age: it is also abundantly stocked with deer. The church, situated by the side of the park, is embosomed in wood, and, together, with a cottage inhabited by a person who takes care of the vault and splendid monuments of the Tollemache family, forms a beautifully picturesque object.

SCOLE INN. This remarkable house was built in the year 1655, by John Peck, Esq. a merchant of Norwich; it was a large structure, decorated with a profusion of carved work, the size of life; but the sign was more particularly singular, being a considerable mass of wood carving, consisting of an assemblage of images surrounded by the arms of the chief towns and families in the county. Among the very numerous figures seen on the north side, was an astronomer seated on a circumference, which, by a secret device, acted as an hygrometer, turning towards the north in fine weather, and in wet, facing the quarter whence the rain proceeded.

ROMFORD. The name of this populous market-town is by some referred to the Saxon appellation of an ancient ford over a rivulet, which flows through the west side of the town; while others consider it as a contraction of Roman-ford, and at the same time look upon it as the Duroilitum of Antoninus. The town consists principally of one long and wide street, ranged along the high road, near the middle of which stands the market-house and town-hall; these were rebuilt a short time since, and in the latter are held the quarter-sessions for the liberty of Havering Atte Bower. The chapel, under Hornchurch, is dedicated to the Virgin Mary and Edward the Confessor; it stands in the centre of the town, and is a spacious stone edifice supported by rows of pillars, with a tower at the west end; it appears to have been erected about the year 1407, and contains a few good monuments deserving of attention, besides a painting on glass in the east window of the chancel, representing the whole-length figure of Edward the Confessor. Two charity-schools were established here in the early part of the last century: a new work-house was also erected in 1787 for the reception and employment of the poor; and barracks were built adjoining the town, on the west, in 1795, for six troops of cavalry. Market on Monday, chiefly for calves; on Tuesday for hogs; and on Wednesday, a general market for corn, cattle, &c.

At the beginning of the last century, a very destructive breach was formed in the banks of the Thames at this place, by the violence of the wind and tide, which was, after various unsuccessful attempts, completely stopped by the ingenious Captain Perry. While the works were carrying on, a very extensive stratum of moor-logs, or rotten wood, of various kinds, was found about 4 feet below the surface of the marshes; it was about 10 feet in depth, and appeared to consist of whole trees and brushwood, with little intermixture of earth. A pool of 40 or 50 acres still remains within the embankment.

TILBURY FORT was originally built as a kind of block-house by Henry VIII., but converted into a regular fortification by Charles II., after the Dutch fleet had sailed up the river in the year 1667, and burnt three English men of war at Chatham: it has a double moat, the innermost of which is 180 feet broad; with a good counterscarp, covered way, ravelins, and trebuchets. Its chief strength, on the land side, consists in its being able to lay the whole level under water; and it is mounted with a great number of guns, from 24 to 46 pounds each. Some traces of the camp that was formed here in the time of Queen Elizabeth, to oppose the threatened descent of the Spanish armada, are still visible.

The parish church is about a mile and a half to the north of the town, and forms the most prominent object in the extensive landscape seen from Billericay upon the Horndon side; but in Billericay itself there is a chapel which appears to have been founded about the reign of Edward III.: the tower is apparently of that age; but the body, a plain brick structure, is more modern. ROCHFORD is situated on the Broomhill river, over which there are two small bridges; the houses are in general irregular and ill-built, and the market-house, of timber, stands near the centre of the town, and bears the date of 1707. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew, and has a lofty brick tower at the west end. Market on Thursday.				NORTH SHOEBURY. Mrs. Jones.

but its consequence in after-times was certainly owing to an abbey, which is said to have been the first convent for women established in this kingdom: scarcely any vestiges of the buildings are, however, now in existence, though the site of the abbey-church may still be seen just without the north wall of the present church-yard, at the entrance to which there is an ancient square embattled gateway, with octagonal turrets, also embattled, rising from the ground on each side. The town is situated on the river Roding, commonly called Barking creek, which, about two miles lower down, runs into the Thames, from whence various articles are brought up in vessels for the supply of the adjacent country. It is principally inhabited by fishermen, has a weekly market on Saturday, and contains a spacious and convenient work-house, a penitentiary on Howard's plan, a market-house, and a parochial church, which latter building is dedicated to St. Margaret, and has a square embattled tower at the west end: it contains a number of monuments, but particularly one against the south wall of the chancel, to the memory of Sir Charles Montague, brother of the first Earl of Manchester, who died in the year 1625. Barking and its neighbourhood supplies the London markets with vast quantities of vegetables, particularly potatoes, the profits arising from the growth of which are considerable, as the produce is abundant, owing to the mode of cultivation, and the excellent quality of the soil.

From the summit of this hill a most delightful prospect is obtained over the river Thames, which is here seen to singular advantage spreading its expansive bosom for many miles in extent, continually enlivened by the numerous vessels which are constantly navigating this important portion of the noblest river in the world; while the scene is rendered truly enchanting by the broken range of the coast of Kent, whose undulating surface, clothed with the softest verdure, and bespangled with flourishing villages, forms a sylvan back-ground to the view; the whole presenting to the enraptured eye of the spectator a combination of beauties rarely to be met with.

SOUTHEND is eligibly situated on the acclivity of a well-wooded hill, at the mouth of the Thames, nearly opposite to Sheerness; it has within these few years obtained some repute as a bathing-place, and has since continued to rise in importance: the soil is sandy, and the shore flat and shallow, but at full tide the view is admirable; the air is dry and salubrious, and the water, notwithstanding its mixture with the Thames, is clear and salt: besides the machines, which are neat and commodious, here are two warm-baths. The terrace, commonly called New Southend, stands on a considerable eminence, and is a handsome range of buildings, finished

The chapel occupies the right wing, it is elegantly fitted up, and adorned with a fine painting of the Nativity, brought from Rome. The park and grounds exhibit a few fine views, they are well-stocked with wood, and many of the trees are of great rarity and value; the menagerie is also a charming spot. BOWERS. The principal parts now remaining are two towers at the north-east and south-east angles; these are circular on the outside, but the interiors, each consisting of five apartments, are of an octagonal form; and in the latter, over what appears to have been a fire-place, are some thin bricks, disposed in a herring-bone manner. GOSFIELD Gosfield Hall, — Barnard, Esq. CLARE, formerly of considerable note, but now much reduced in importance, is situated on the river Stour, and consists of a number of mean-looking houses, formed into broad but unpaved streets: it was in ancient times distinguished for a castle of great magnitude and splendour, which is thought to have been originally founded during the Saxon heptarchy, but was probably rebuilt shortly after the Norman conquest: it was at one time the property of the noble family of York, afterwards elevated to the throne, and the few remaining vestiges of it, situated on the south side of the town, though they do not afford many architectural features, are so widely distributed, that they convey an excellent idea of the former commanding character of the edifice. The parish church, an ancient and beautiful structure, with a square tower, is now the principal ornament of the town; it contains a stone font, which, from its form and decorations, is evidently of the same age as the edifice; which is the resting-place of many persons, formerly of considerable note. GREAT FINBOROUGH. Finborough Hall, the property of Roger Pettward, Esq., occupies one of the most delightful situations in the county: it is an elegant structure of Woolpit brick, and was erected in 1795; in the centre of the front is a projecting bow, ornamented with a pediment resting on four columns, likewise of brick, which were formed in moulds made expressly for the purpose. The park, including about 200 acres, slopes gently from the mansion into a valley that nearly forms a circle from west to south, and through the greater part of which a river, that rises in the parish of Rattlesden, winds its course to join the Gipping below Stow Market. Beyond the river the park again rises to the north, and is skirted by a wood; it is diversified by clumps of very fine timber, and also contains an embowered walk, which, winding behind the house on the top of the hill, leads to the church, an edifice that contains several handsome monuments of the Wollaston family, who were formerly proprietors of this seat.	39½	Little Waddingfield 1¾ m. farther, To Bildeston 3¼ m. ☞ London to BILDESTON 63½ m.	58½

BOTESDALE, an abbreviation of Botolph's Dale, is a market-town, but ill built and small. It receives its name from a chapel dedicated to St. Botolph, the mother church of which is Redgrave, about 2 m. distant. This chapel having been for many years disused, has by means of the subscriptions of the inhabitants and the neighbouring gentry, been substantially repaired and fitted up for divine service; besides which a provision has been made for a salary to the master of the free grammar school for a sermon and prayers on Sundays. This school was founded about the year 1576, by Sir Nicholas Bacon, and is, with the dwelling-house, at the west end of the chapel. The master and usher are to be elected from Benet College, Cambridge, where Sir Nicholas was educated: he also bequeathed 20l. a year to that college, for six scholars out of this school, to whom likewise Abp. SOUTH TOWN. See, across the river, the Norfolk column, or Nelson's monument; it is situate at the mouth of the harbour, upon the south denes, and intended to perpetuate the fame of Lord Nelson, to whose memory it was erected, by the contributions of his countrymen of Norfolk, of which county he was a native; there is a flight of steps on each of the four sides of the pedestal, which forms a promenade round the shaft. The ascent in the interior, which conducts to the lantern, is by means of a winding staircase of 217 steps, and the entire height is 144 feet.

FRAMLINGHAM is a town of high antiquity, its name being composed of the Saxon words fremding and ham, which imply the habitation of strangers: it is pleasantly situated on an eminence, near the source of the river Ore, which rising from the hills to the north of the town, falls into a large lake, and then, passing through the town, proceeds southward to Orford. The church, a spacious and stately edifice of black flint, with a steeple 96 feet high, is well paved and pewed, and contains several fine monuments, commemorating persons of distinction, which are well worthy of an attentive examination. Here are also some good alms-houses; a spacious market-place, nearly in the form of an equilateral triangle; and an excellent free-school. But the greatest ornament of Framlingham, and the most remarkable feature in the town, are the remains of its majestic castle, which have been justly said to look more like a fortress than the ruins of one, though the outer wall is all that is left of the venerable edifice: this wall is of a somewhat circular form, 44 feet high, and eight thick; it is flanked with 13 square towers, 14 feet higher than the ramparts, and is altogether in tolerably good preservation: the principal gate-way and entrance is on the south side; and part of the area is occupied by a work-house, and kind of alms-house, which have been erected with some of the rubbish of former magnificence. Market on Saturday.

SOUTHWOLD is pleasantly situated on an eminence overlooking the German ocean, but almost surrounded on every other side by the river Blythe, which here discharges itself into the sea; it contains a number of good houses, and is a place of considerable maritime trade, that received great advantage, about the middle of the last century, from an act for the improvement of its haven, under the sanction of which two piers were constructed. As the beach at Southwold is well adapted for bathing, it has of late years derived some benefit from the strangers who resort thither during the summer season for that purpose. The parish church, a noble fabric, has a tower steeple, about 100 feet high, which is a fine piece of architecture, beautified with free-stone, intermixed with flint of various colours: the whole of the exterior is richly decorated, and the internal parts still afford many objects of antiquarian curiosity. There are two batteries on the cliffs; one of them is a regular fortification, with a good parapet and six guns; but the other has only two. Market on Thursday.

LOWESTOFT stands upon the most eastern point of the English coast, on a lofty eminence that commands an extensive view of the German ocean, and forms a remarkably beautiful object when beheld from the sea: it chiefly consists of one principal street, occupying the very summit of the cliff, and intersected by several smaller avenues; the declivity is formed into gardens interspersed with alcoves and other ornamental summer retreats, at the bottom of which a line of buildings, appropriated to the curing of fish, extends the whole length of the town. The church lies about half a mile from the town, towards the west; it has a tower surmounted by a spire, that rises to the height of 130 feet; and the interior is fitted up in a very neat and appropriate manner. Lowestoft has of late years been in considerable repute as a bathing-place, and is now the occasional resort of several distinguished families, for whose accommodation many new houses have been erected; and a public reading-room has recently been opened, which latter enjoys a most delightful view of the sea. The shore, being composed of a hard, firm sand, intermixed with shingle, is peculiarly favourable for walking and bathing: here are several excellent bathing-machines, a spacious theatre, two light-houses, a neat chapel, situated on the west side of the High-street; contiguous to which is the corn-cross, with the town-chamber above, used for the transaction of the business of the place, and likewise as a school-room. Lowestoft has a weekly market on Wednesday; and its chief commerce is derived from the herring fishery, here cultivated to great advantage.

BECCLES, a large well-built town, situated on the river Waveney, which is navigable from Yarmouth, consists of several streets, that terminate in a spacious area, where the weekly market is held on Saturday. The church is an elegant Gothic edifice, with a steeple standing at some distance from the south-east corner of the chancel; the porch is a fine specimen of what is called the florid Gothic; and the cemetery occupies an elevated situation, commanding a remarkably beautiful prospect. In the south part of the town may still be seen the ruins of another parish church, called Endgate, which was demolished by order of Queen Elizabeth. Here is likewise a handsome town-hall, in which the quarter sessions are held; besides a gaol that has recently been much im-	proved, and a well-endowed free-school and grammar-school. An extensive common, including about 1400 acres, also belongs to the town, and is particularly beneficial to the poor, who are allowed to turn cattle upon it on very easy terms.

BRAMFIELD, near, Bramfield Hall, Thomas Sherlock Gooch, Esq.	HALESWORTH is situated near the river Blythe, which has been navigable up to this place; but though a well-built town of considerable antiquity, it does not contain any object deserving attention, except a handsome Gothic church, and a charity school. Between the two churches may be seen the ruins of a Benedictine nunnery, and at Bungay there are likewise the remains of a very strong castle, which was so strongly fortified in the reign of King Stephen, and occupied such an advantageous position, that it was considered as impregnable: it was, however, demolished in the time of Henry III., and now strikingly evinces the mutability of human affairs, as a great number of hovels have been raised against its walls, and the former residence of the great and powerful is at present the habitation of the lowest class of people. ORFORD, situated near the confluence of the rivers Alde and Ore, is a small and ill-built, but corporate town, sending two members to parliament, though it is not a parish, the church being only a chapel of ease to the adjacent village of Sudbourn. The object here most deserving notice is the castle, seated on a rising ground, that is reported to have been at one time the centre of the town; the only existing remains, however, of this edifice is the keep. The walls are of considerable strength, and the structure itself forms a necessary sea-mark, especially for ships coming from Holland. Orford contains a mean town-hall, and a plain brick-built assembly-house, which latter structure was erected about half a century since.

Sudbourn Hall, Marquis of Hertford, is a plain quadrangular edifice, covered with white composition, and was rebuilt by Wyatt about 40 years ago: the staircase is executed with his usual skill and taste; but the general appearance of the mansion conveys an idea of simplicity rather than elegance; and it is mostly used as a sporting residence, the park and neighbourhood abounding with game.

The appearance of this elegant structure, which stretches over the river Taff, and rises from its steep banks like a rainbow, is exceedingly beautiful and picturesque from every point of view in which it can be seen. It consists of a single arch 140 feet in the chord, and 35 feet in height above the level of the river at low water, and forms the section of a circle of 175 feet in diameter. The bridge, on account of the high ground on each side, is not visible from the turnpike road, and many travellers have, in consequence, passed it by unawares, and been disappointed of the pleasure of beholding it. In ascending the vale, it is approached by a road which turns abruptly to the left over the canal, a short distance above the Bridgewater Arms. The architect of this bridge, which formed, at the time of its erection, with very few exceptions, the largest arch in the world, was William Edwards, a self-taught genius, who never received the least assistance or instruction in his craft from a master.

This town, which is well built, has been the scene of many remarkable actions and events. EATON HALL. This superb mansion, with the exception of the vaulted basement story, and part of the original hall, has been lately re-erected, from the designs of Mr. W. Porden: it is built with a light-coloured stone, and has two fronts, both of which consist of a spacious centre of three stories, finished with octagonal turrets, buttresses and pinnacles, placed between large wings finished in a similar manner; the entrance to the western front is under a lofty vaulted portico, that admits a carriage: on the eastern side there is a magnificent flight of steps, terminating in three rich and airy arches, that form the middle of an exquisitely beautiful vaulted cloister, which spreads along the whole centre, and connects the wings with each other. The entrance to the grand saloon is through these arches; this very noble apartment looks down upon a terrace upwards of 350 feet long, from whence is seen one of the richest landscapes that the river Dee presents during its course through this highly interesting county. The prevailing style of the edifice is the pointed gothic, but the plan of the house is not formed upon that of any kind of either castellated or religious building, or upon that of the domestic architecture of a later date; neither has the style of any particular period been exclusively attended to in the form of the arches; for though the architect proposed to himself generally that of the reign of Edward III., yet he did not scruple to depart from it for the sake of producing what he deemed a better effect. A noble flight of steps leads from the vaulted portico in the western front to the great hall, which is a spacious and lofty room rising to the height of two stories, and having a vaulted ceiling, ornamented with family devices, at the intersection of the ribs; it is paved with variegated marbles, arranged in Gothic compartments, and has on each side four niches with pedestals and canopies, over ornamented chimney-pieces, between which there are beautiful paintings by the celebrated West, of the dissolution of the long parliament by Cromwell, and the landing of Charles II. The saloon contains three large windows, the upper parts of which are decorated with the most brilliant specimens of painted glass, executed by Collins, from designs by Tresham. dimensions; they are magnificently furnished, and also contain an abundance of stained glass; besides which their ceilings are decorated with all the ramifications of fan-shaped tracery. The library adjoins the drawing-room; this is very tastefully fitted up with elaborately carved Gothic book-cases of English oak, abounding with ancient and valuable manuscripts, besides an exquisite collection of the most esteemed authors. The grounds, enlivened by an artificial inlet of the Dee, have also received the more congenial features of modern gardening, under the superintendance of the present noble proprietor, whose superior taste is here rendered evident. A venerable avenue, situated westward, has been spared, and continued in that direction to a Gothic lodge in the hamlet of Belgrave, about two miles distant from the mansion. There is another lodge, similar in design to the former, approached by a road, that diverges from the avenue in the direction of Chester, and crossing the park, winds amidst the plantations, affording occasional views of the Broxton and Welsh hills, which, with the addition of so rich a foreground, are seen to singular advantage. The most favourable views of Eaton are from the Aldford road, and from the bank of the Dee, where the great quadrangle of the stables is seen in perspective beyond the mansion, and assists in forming a picture of unusual architectural grandeur, aided by the disposition of the pleasure grounds in front, and the stately elms of the avenue, which close up the distance. The grounds and mansion will, however, in every point, gratify the visitor's expectations; and his pleasure cannot fail to be materially heightened by the reflection, that this stupendous pile, and the church of Ecclestone afforded employment and support for a vast number of the poor of Chester, during one of the most calamitous periods of the late war.

PONT RONTHA, beyond Castella, Thomas Smith, Esq. LLANTRISSENT occupies one of the finest situations in South Wales, being placed on the brow of a high hill, which overlooks an extensive range of the most beautiful and fertile parts of the vale of Glamorgan. The streets are steep and narrow, but some of the houses are well built, and the town-hall and market-place are handsome modern erections. The church is large, and from being dedicated to three saints, gives name to the town, which enjoys its share in the privilege of returning a member to parliament for Cardiff. The market is held on Friday.

ABERYSTWITH TO HOLYHEAD, THROUGH DOLGELLY.

CAERNARVON, about 5 m. distant, Plas Newydd, Marquis of Anglesea. This seat lies near the banks of the Menai. It is an elegant modern edifice, and possibly, without exception, when the situation and adaptation of the building to it, are conjointly taken, exhibits, in a noble residence, though on a confined scale, as great a display of judicious taste as any in the united kingdom. The front consists of a centre and wings, an octagonal turret rises from the basement, above the embattled parapet, several feet, terminating in a small spire. The height is three stories; the front is still farther extended by an elegant Gothicised servants' hall, over which is a chapel on nearly a similar plan; and the whole presents a beautiful coup-d'œil. The interior is of a corresponding character, comprising a lofty entrance-hall in the Gothic style, and an extensive dining-hall, the walls of which are decorated with various family portraits and other paintings. The drawing-room is in the centre of the front; it is lined with painted silk, and appropriately furnished; the parlours, billiard and anti-rooms, correspond in elegance, and the library is handsomely finished. The stables, built in the same	From Holyhea. The house, as seen from the water, assumes an imposing appearance, rising out of a dense wood, and a parapetted bastion wall, built as a sea-defence, along which runs a handsome terrace in front of the sloping lawn, together with the sea baths on the left, and an elegant green-house emerging from the trees on the right, add considerably to the fascinating effect. The prospect from the windows is picturesque and extensive, and the views both up and down the magnificent and river-like Menai, are extremely fine. In the summer of 1821, the Marquis of Anglesea had the high honour of entertaining His present Majesty at Plas Newydd, when on his way to Dublin. The park is not very extensive; yet from being so well clothed with antiquated woods and modern plantations, and having the rides and walks tastefully laid out, exhibits very considerable diversity. At a small distance from the house, are two cromlechs standing contiguous to each other: one of which is said to be the largest monument of the kind existing in the kingdom.

CAERNARVON. The situation of this town on the Menai Strait secures to it a considerable advantage; the harbour is good, and capable of accommodating vessels of 700 tons burden; it is however difficult of access, owing to sand-banks; the principal exports are slate, great quantities of which are shipped here to various parts of the united kingdom, and the imports consist of wine, coals, porter, groceries, &c.; and for the accommodation of the merchants there is a good quay, and convenient custom-house. From the top of a rock, behind the hotel, is a fine view of the town and castle, embracing, on a clear day, a vast extent of prospect, in which the isle of Anglesea, Holyhead, and Paris Mountain, may be distinctly seen: but the most attractive object is the noble castle built by Edward I.; this magnificent fortress presents a bold and imposing appearance, the external walls are nearly entire, and furnish a good idea of the original shape and extent; they are from eight to ten feet thick, and above the embattled parapet numerous towers of dissimilar proportions and dimensions rise in majestic grandeur; two of these are more lofty than the rest, one, called the Eagle Tower, has three elegant turrets issuing from the top; an apartment in this tower is shewn as the room in which Edward I., the first Prince of Wales, was born. The principal entrance is peculiarly grand, beneath a massy tower, having on its front the figure of Edward I., in a menacing posture, with a sword half-drawn. On the outside of the town walls, a broad and pleasant terrace extends from the quay to the north end of the town; this is a fashionable promenade in the evening. Among the public buildings are the County Hall, in which the sessions are held, the County Prison, and Town Hall, the new Market House, and the sea-water baths. Market on Saturday.

Lewis. LLANARTH. Noyadd, HAVERFORDWEST ranks among the largest of the towns of South Wales; it spreads over a considerable extent of ground; was constituted by the act of union a county of itself, and is on many accounts entitled to be considered as the modern metropolis of the county. The situation of this town is such as to render its appearance, when approached by the Narberth road, very pleasing and picturesque; it is built on the steep declivity of a hill, with the houses rising in a striking manner above each other in succession to the summit, while the castle, placed upon a conspicuous eminence above the river, communicates to the whole an air of much grandeur: the interior is however, in many respects inconvenient and disagreeable. The streets are in general very narrow and crooked, and some of them, including the main thoroughfare, so exceedingly steep that they cannot be traversed on horseback or in carriages without some danger. Haverfordwest comprises three parishes, St. Mary's, St. Thomas's, and St. Martin's. This town contains a number of good houses, occupied by substantial tradesmen and merchants, opulent professional men, and families of fortune. The principal public building is the guildhall, a modern erection, situated in the upper part of the town. The charter under which the corporation now exists was granted by James I.: it provides for the appointment of a mayor, 24 common-councilmen, two sheriffs or bailiffs, two sergeants-at-law, with other inferior officers. There is here no manufacture entitled to notice, and the commerce of the place is inconsiderable, being created chiefly by the demands of the surrounding country for English manufactured goods, and other articles of merchandize furnished by the shopkeepers. 			BLANEPORTH. Ty-Llwyd, John Vaughan Lloyd, Esq. PRENDERGAST, 2 m. before, Withylush Lodge, Rev. Thomas Martin. MILFORD is a neat town of recent origin, most eligibly placed in one of the finest parts of the haven, and occupying a point of land sloping on all sides towards the water, by which it is almost surrounded: the principal streets, running in parallel lines nearly due east and west, and in the direction of the shore, are intersected by shorter ones crossing them at right angles. The church occupies a very commanding situation at the eastern extremity of the lower street; it is a fine handsome structure, with a lofty tower at the west end, that forms a conspicuous object from the water in sailing up the haven; and consists of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles. The custom-house, a plain edifice, well adapted to its destined purposes, stands at the lower end of the town, in a convenient situation by the water side. The dock-yards, situated on the shore, immediately in front of the town, also form an important feature of this place. Milford has a noble quay, and a weekly market on Tuesday and Saturday; but the trade of the town is very inconsiderable: it is bounded on the west by a creek or inlet called Priory Pill, on the opposite shore of which stands the village of Hakin, sometimes called Old Milford, between which place and Hubberston a handsome observatory has been erected, that is under the superintendance of the astronomer royal of Greenwich. Milford haven forms an object of great interest regarding merely its picturesque attractions, its vast expanse of water, and the delightful scenery that ornaments its shores; but it has excited most attention, perhaps, from the purposes of more substantial utility, which, in a national point of view, it has been thought adapted to answer: it is justly deemed the finest harbour in the kingdom, being sufficiently capacious and well sheltered to hold all the navy of England in perfect security. Milford maintains a daily com- on which the town is built, is navigable as high as the bridge for ships of small burden, and convenient quays have been constructed for the accommodation of the trade. The remains of the castle consist of the keep, in itself a noble pile of building, that has latterly been converted into a county gaol. Haverfordwest sends one member to parliament, and has a market on Tuesday and Saturday.

CRICK, Crick House, —

ABERGAVENTY occupies a gentle slope at the foot of the Dery, on the north bank of the Uske, where that river is joined by the Gavenny, which skirts the eastern side of the town; and from this confluence the name is derived. The castle is in a very dilapidated state; most of the walls are fallen, the principal remains, consisting of a round and a pentagonal tower, which, with their rugged sides, fractured perforations, and menacing attitudes, on an eminence sternly overlooking the river Uske, form a picturesque ruin. The castle formed the southern termination. Of the four gates, only the western one remains; it is denominated Tudor's gate, and is a massy portal in the pointed style, with a groove in the archway for a portcullis. The view through this gate is extremely fine, and the group or tout ensemble perhaps unrivalled. Coxo observes, "A more pleasing assemblage of picturesque objects never entered into the composition of a landscape; the whole harmonizes together, and produces an effect which neither the pen nor pencil can adequately delineate." The church of St. Mary was the chapel belonging to the ancient priory. It appears to have been originally built cruciform; but it has undergone so many alterations, that the regularity of the structure is destroyed. Though as a specimen of architecture, this edifice displays little that will strongly interest the lovers of that noble science, yet from the connection with remote times, and the numerous monumental mementos of characters who proudly figured on the theatre of life, and stand honourably recorded in the an-

ABERGAVENTY, near, the Sugar Loaf Mountain. The most easy way of ascending this eminence is from the east side of the Dery, which is one of the confederated hills that sustain the towering cone; and as the sides of the mountain are covered with heath, moss, &c, to the height of a foot, a light carriage might with the greatest ease be driven to the base of the Sugar Loaf itself, which is not more than 100 paces from its top: neither do any impediments offer themselves in the ascent of the cone, from the summit of which the various prospects are extensive, magnificent, and exquisitely diversified, including the counties of Radnor, Salop, Brecknock, Monmouth, Glamorgan, Hereford, Worcester, Gloucester, Somerset, and Wilts, the various beauties belonging to each of which, when contrasted with others, cannot fail to excite the peculiar admiration of the beholder. This elevated point is 1352 feet perpendicular above the mouth of the Gavenny, and may readily be distinguished from Bidcombe-hill, near Longleat, in Wiltshire, and from the Stiperstones in Shropshire, near the borders of Montgomeryshire.

The free grammar school was founded in the reign of Henry VIII., and endowed out of a portion of the revenues belonging to the priory, which are held in trust by the corporation. The market on Saturday is well attended. The prospects from this town are extremely beautiful, embracing a fine view of the vale, with the noble hills that divide this county from Glamorganshire.
SWANSEA, from its importance and commercial importation, is entitled to be ranked as the metropolis of the county of Glamorgan, if not of the principality of Wales. It lies on the western side of the river Tawe, which is here navigable for ships of large burden, and has extensive quays, with every necessary accommodation for shipping and unloading the cargoes. It extends in length about ¼ m., or 2 m. if we include the suburb of Greenhill; the greatest width does not exceed ¼ m. The streets are numerous, and contain a large proportion of well-built houses, occupied by opulent individuals. The town-hall is a spacious and handsome modern edifice, built on a part of the castle inclosure in the middle of the town; and here is also a very commodious theatre. The whole of the town of Swansea is comprised in one parish; the church, which is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a handsome modern edifice; it consists of a middle aisle, and two side aisles, with a large square tower at one end. There are several other places of worship, belonging to the various denominations of dissenters from the established church; and the Presbyterian meeting-house is one of the oldest in South Wales. The remains of the castle consist of a lofty circular tower, from the summit of which, a fine view is commanded of the circumjacent country and of the bay. On the eastern side of the tower, a large part of the original building is yet standing, the habitable apartments of which are converted into a poor-house, and a gaol, principally used for the confinement of debtors. ALDBOROUGH, formerly denominated Aldeburgh, derives its name from the river Alde, and is charmingly situated in the valley of Slaughden, sheltered by a steep hill that runs north and south the whole length of the principal street, about three quarters of a mile: it was about two centuries since a place of considerable importance; but the great and repeated incroachments of the sea have reduced it to the rank of a small fishing town. Within the last few years, however, owing to several families of distinction having visited it for the pleasures of sea-bathing, its appearance has totally changed, and the clay-built cottages are now mostly superseded by neat and comfortable mansions. The church stands on the summit of the hill at the northern extremity of the town, and is an ancient building, though much intermixed with modern work; there are some stones apparently of great antiquity in the churchyard, which, from its elevated situation, commands a delightful view of the ocean; the magnificent terrace on the hill behind the town also affords a prospect that partakes strongly of the sublime and beautiful. fashionable watering places can boast: the strand, to which the descent is remarkably easy, is not more than 50 yards from most of the lodging-houses, and during the ebb-tide, and frequently for weeks together, it is peculiarly adapted for walking and sea-bathing, the sand being hard and firm, and the machines affording the greatest security and comfort. This borough sends two members to parliament, and has a small market on Wednesday and Saturday; it is abundantly supplied with every necessary, and most of the luxuries, of the table; and the native inhabitants are chiefly fishermen.

ALNWICK TO WHITTINGHAM.

LEMINGTON. Lemington
Hall, John Allan Wilkie, Esq.

ALNWICK, the county town of Northumberland, is an ancient borough, and was formerly surrounded by a wall having three gateways, towers of which still remain. The church, a Gothic structure, is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Michael; its south aisle contains three ancient recumbent effigies of persons unknown, and the chancel, which is sustained by two rows of elegant fluted pillars with flowered capitals, has a large open space behind the altar.
At the head of Pottergate stands a tower, that was erected in 1786, at the expence of the borough, in imitation of that of St. Nicholas, in Newcastle; it was intended for a ring of bells, but has since formed a clock-house.
Here is also a town-hall, two good free-schools, and two charity-schools, besides one on the

ALNWICK. Hulne Abbey, Duke of Northumberland. Hulne Abbey stands in a woody and delightful solitude, in Hulne Park; it was founded by Ralph Greyburn, a Northumberland gentleman, who had signalized himself in the crusades. The foundation was laid in 1240: its outer walls and gateways are still very entire; but its numerous chapels,

The buildings and outworks, including the entrenchments, appear to have occupied about 15 acres of ground: the ruins present a striking appearance, and occupy a commanding situation.

ATHERSTONE TO BIRMINGHAM, THROUGH COLESHILL.

SHUSTOCK. Ed. Croxall, Esq.; and beyond, Maxstoke Castle, Wm. Dilke, Esq. This noble building was chiefly erected in the reign of Edward III., by William de Clinton, Earl of Huntingdon, who also here founded a priory, some remains of which are still visible, and receive a solemn picturesque appearance from the varieties of evergreen foliage, by which they are enveloped in almost every direction. Maxstoke Castle was visited by that tyrannical sovereign Richard III., when on his march towards Nottingham, previous to the battle of Bosworth Field. The castle is in the form of a parallelogram, with an hexagonal tower at each corner, having embattled parapets; its noble machiolated gateway is strengthened on each side by a tower, also of an hexagonal form, and the gates, covered with plates of iron, display the arms of the Duke of Buckingham. Though a portion of the interior of this building was accidentally destroyed by fire, yet the greater part of it still remains, and forms a very interesting specimen of the architecture of the 14th and 15th centuries: among these are the venerable chapel, the spacious hall, and a large dining-room, the door and chimney of which are curiously ornamented with carved work. The walls of the great court still contain the caserns or lodgments for soldiery.

by Guido, and the spire is the loftiest in the county. Near the church is a handsome free-school, built of stone; the town hall is a large building, beneath which is a cistern, whence the inhabitants are supplied with water. It was first incorporated as a borough by King John, who built a castle here, and it was one of the first towns seized by the barons in the reign of Henry III., being then considered of great importance. The Duke of Monmouth was here proclaimed king, and lodged some time in the castle; but being betrayed by Lord Gray, and his army consisting chiefly of raw countrymen, he was defeated by the royal army, on a moor near Weston, 3 m. distant, when 1000 were killed, and 1500 taken prisoners; and here Judge Jefferies and Colonel Kirk had most of the survivors executed. The houses in general are irregular, but the streets are wide, and well paved. It sends two members to parliament, and has a market on Tuesday and Saturday; at the former cattle of all kinds are sold, and cheese in great quantities; and provisions of all sorts are plentiful. The midsummer county sessions are held here, and the assizes every other year. Through the convenience of its navigation, it has chief or rather the only manufacture: Here was formerly a hunting-chase belonging to the kings of England. The village of Cheddar lies about 2 m. to the S. E. of Axbridge, at the foot of the Mendip. It is situated in a parish of the same name, which extends from the middle summit of the hills, a considerable way into the moors. The soil and surface are as various as can well be imagined. The lofty Mendip raises his rugged brow on the one hand, and forms a fine contrast with the rich extensive level on the other. The slopes of the hills are every where diversified. Here immense caverns, enormous chasms, and bold protuberances, are mixed together in awful variety; indeed nothing can exceed the grandeur of the scenery which this parish displays. The chasm, called Cheddar cliffs, is certainly one of the most striking objects of its kind in England.

This town derives its name from its situation between two branches of the river Brit, which, joining below the town, falls into the English channel; and forms a good harbour, for the improvement of which an act was passed in 1822, and it will now admit vessels of two or three hundred tons burden: it is situated in a vale, about 1 m. north from the sea, surrounded by hills: the soil is deep and miry, and on each side of the town the streams are crossed by two bridges, one denominated the East, and the other the West bridge. Bridport appears to have been a very considerable town before the Conquest, and is noticed in Doomsday-book, but received its first charter of incorporation from Henry III.: several succeeding monarchs confirmed the charters, but that now in force was granted by Charles II. The earliest return to Parliament was made in the 23 Edward I.: the right of election is in the inhabitant householders paying scot and lot; and the number of voters is about 160, who return two members. This place is not remarkable for any historical transaction, having always been of inconsiderable strength, and as such, alternately the quarters of the royal and parliament troops during the civil wars. It is large, and has a very respectable appearance: the principal streets are broad and spacious, and many of the houses new brick buildings: the inhabitants are mostly engaged in the manufacture of seins and nets of all sorts, lines, twines, small cordage, and sail-cloth. In the centre of the town stands the market house and town-hall, and there is also a charity school, three alms-houses, and a gaol. The church is a large ancient pile of building, in the form of a cross, with a tower in the centre of the structure, adorned with pinnacles and battlements. Market on Saturday. BEAMINSTER is a town of considerable antiquity, situated on a fertile spot, on the banks of the river Brit. The only history of any importance that attaches to this place respects its sufferings by fire, and the sword of civil war. The last time it fell a prey to the destructive element was in March 1781, when in the course of three hours, upwards of 50 dwelling-houses, besides barns, stables, and other buildings, were reduced to ruins. Great part, at this period, was however fortunately insured; and the contributions of the benevolent to those who had not taken that precaution, soon restored every thing with additional improvement. Beaminster makes a very respectable appearance, many of the houses being modern and good buildings; and the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in trade and manufactures. The principal public buildings are the chapel, the free-school, and the almshouse. The former, a chapel of ease to Netherbury, is a stately structure, with a tower nearly 100 feet high, ornamented with carvings from scripture history; and the interior contains several handsome monuments of the Strode and other families. The free-school was founded by Mrs. Frances Tucker, in 1684, for the education of 20 of the poorest boys in Beaminster, 3 or 4 of whom are to be bound apprentice every year; and 1 at least, if not 2, to be apprenticed to the sea. The Rev. Samuel Hood, father of the Lords Hood and Bridport, was master of this school in 1715; he was afterwards prebendary of Wells, and died in 1777. The almshouse was built and amply endowed by Sir John Strode, of Parnham, Knt., for the maintenance of six poor persons. This village is situated on a pleasant eminence, forming part of a range of sweeping hills, which bound a fertile and delightful valley, and are clothed with fine beech-wood: it has obtained a considerable degree of celebrity, from the various Roman antiquities that have been discovered here and in the neighbourhood; the most splendid of these are the remains of a Roman villa, of very considerable extent and beauty of decoration. From the appearance of the ruins, this building is supposed to have been destroyed by fire; these consist of tessellated pavements, broken columns, mutilated statuary, &c., together with the complete foundation of the building, which has been ingeniously traced and very ably described by the late Mr. Lysons, who imagined it to have been the residence of the Roman governor of this part of the province, and perhaps occasionally of the emperor himself. This magnificent relic of Roman ingenuity is doubtless the most extensive and costly of the kind ever discovered in this country.

BIRDLIP HILL. This considerable eminence commands a very extensive prospect, in which thick and noble forests are intermixed with neat and busy villages; and the flat portions of the country are finely contrasted with the lofty mountains of Malvern. The Roman road hence to Gloucester has also a curious appearance from the uninterrupted right line which it pursues.

CHELTENHAM, before Charlton Park, —; and 2½ m. distant from Cheltenham, Southampton House, Miss De La Bere.

CHELTENHAM is beautifully situated in a rich and fertile vale; it enjoys a fine mild air, being sheltered from the chilling north-east blast by the Cotswold hills, and is so much celebrated for the salubrity of its medicinal water, that it has become a place of most fashionable resort: it consists chiefly of a number of commodious houses, which are disposed in one spacious street nearly a mile in length; but many detached new buildings have been raised in the vicinity, particularly in Cambray and in the meadows leading to the wells. The spring or spa was first observed to possess medicinal properties in the year 1716; it has since proved an increasing source of prosperity to the inhabitants, and so great has been the demand for water, that it would have been wholly incapable of supplying a sufficiency had not new springs been discovered equally congenial to health with the former. The waters are cathartic and chalybeate: they are said to be beneficial in a vast number of diseases, and in some measure to resemble those at Harrogate. The path leading to the spa passes through the church-yard, which has been rendered somewhat pleasant and agreeable by being shaded with double rows of lime-trees; from thence a fine gravel walk conducts to the church-mead, and after crossing the drawbridge over the river Chelt, there is a magnificent promenade, shaded by venerable elms, whose embowering tops and verdant foliage exclude the fierce rays of the sun: this conducts the visitor to the pump, which is covered by a dome supported by four arches, and has a commodious room near it for the reception of company. Cheltenham is visited at all times of the year, but most in summer, the waters being found to be stronger and more efficacious in dry weather; and the best and most usual time of the day for drinking them is early in the morning. The church is a spacious and by no means inelegant fabric, in the form of a cross, with a lofty octagonal spire in the centre: here are likewise handsome assembly-rooms and good hotels, where every accommodation may be obtained; and

This building is situated in Cambray Mead, and forms no inconsiderable ornament to the place: it is a spa-

WORCESTER, the capital of the county, has the general reputation of being one of the best-built and most agreeable cities in the kingdom; its situation is greatly favourable to the display of its buildings and the comfort of the inhabitants. Placed on the banks of the Severn, its spacious streets rise gradually from the margin of that river, whilst they are sheltered from the chill and injurious blasts of the east by a well-wooded hill. The circumference of the city is about 4 miles; the streets are in general broad and well paved, and continual improvements are taking place. The cathedral is of Anglo-Saxon origin, but the cathedral buildings have twice experienced the desolating effects of fire, and now present few relics of architecture more ancient than the early part of the thirteenth century. The church is an elegant and spacious structure of Saxon origin, but having undergone many alterations, has lost some portion of its original character. This town has a good market on Tuesday, and formerly sent two members to parliament, but surrendered that privilege on the plea of inability to support them.

fabric was dedicated in the presence of King Henry III., and many of the principal nobility, in the year 1218, but was considerably augmented and improved in various succeeding ages; the last alteration of importance taking place about the year 1380. In regard to the exterior, this edifice displays little ornament, but constitutes an object of great beauty, on account of its dignified proportions, and the elegant lightness of its architecture. The interior presents an august architectural display, in which the pointed style almost universally prevails. The choir is extremely magnificent, and affords in its different parts many instructive examples of the progressive modes adopted in English architecture. The monuments are very numerous, and many of them of great interest; among these must be noticed the tomb of King John, which is the most ancient royal monument now remaining in England. On the south side of the cathedral is a capacious cloister, constructed about the year 1572. The adjacent chapter house is a beautiful structure, erected nearly at the same time with the cloister. This building, which is worthy of minute inspection, now serves the double purpose of a council-room and library. The palace of the bishop stands near the cathedral, on a commanding site, upon the banks of the river Severn. The parochial churches are ten in number, and several of them are highly respectable as architectural objects. The Guildhall is a spacious and handsome structure, finished in 1723, from a design of White's, a native architect; and the bridge over the Severn, rebuilt in 1781, is an erection of considerable elegance. The commerce of this city is very great, arising not only from the surplus products of the county and its own manufactures, but from the great conveniences resulting from its very extended water-carriage. The principal manufactures are those of a beautiful species of porcelain, and of gloves, which are much approved, and are exported in large quantities. Worcester contains various alms-houses, charity schools, a neat theatre, new county gaol, and a public infirmary; it sends two members to parliament, has an excellent market on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; and the hop-market, in the season, is one of the most considerable in the kingdom.

CHESTER is an ancient and populous city surrounded by walls, and pleasantly situated above the river Dee, on a rocky eminence, half encircled by a sweep of that river: it was formerly a Roman military station, as is evident from the frequent discoveries that have been made of coins, statues, altars, hypocausts, and other remains of antiquity belonging to that nation, many of them bearing correlative inscriptions. The town consists principally of four streets, diverging from a centre towards the cardinal points, these are intersected by various inferior ones that cross the others at right angles. The houses are singularly constructed, owing to the excavations in the rock that form the streets: they have low shops or warehouses on the level, and above them a balustraded gallery on each side, which appears curious to strangers, who, when walking on them, can with difficulty persuade themselves that they are not up one pair of stairs. This city sends two members to Parliament, and has a market on Wednesday and Saturday; it contains an excellent infirmary, and carries on a considerable linen trade with Ireland; besides which, vast quantities of cheese and other articles are exported hence. The castle, said to have been erected by William the Conqueror, stands near the S. W. angle of the city walls; its upper ward, which occupies a very elevated situation, was thoroughly repaired subsequent to the year 1784, and its lower ward was, about the same time, totally demolished, and a series of buildings erected on its site, which are as remarkable for their strength and simplicity, as for their classical elegance, and may stand in competition with the most magnificent of the kind in the kingdom; they consist chiefly of an armoury, barracks, court of justice, offices of the palatine, county gaol, shire-hall, &c., in the front of which latter edifice there is a most elegant portico supported by 12 massy pillars, each being a single stone 32 feet high and three feet in diameter. Under the castle is the bridge, a long fabric of red stone, extremely dangerous and unsightly. The origin of St. Werburgh's abbey is involved in much obscurity; but it is generally supposed to have been founded in 660, by a king of the Mercians; the bishop's palace, a very handsome structure, occupies one side of its court, and on two other sides there are several very handsome houses: the church of the dissolved abbey was, about the year 1541, converted into the cathedral, and is an elegant and highly ornamented structure, with a handsome tower in the centre supported by four massy pillars; the choir is extremely neat, and behind it is St. Mary's chapel; the transepts are very dissimilar in form; the north one is the most spacious, and constitutes the parish church of St. Oswald; the chapter-house is a most beautiful edifice; it stands in the east walk of the cloisters, and appears to have been erected in the time of Randle, the first Earl of Chester, whose remains, together with those of his uncle and several of his successors, were deposited here. Besides the above, here are eight parish churches; but of these St. John's is the most worthy of notice; it stands on the east side of the city, without the walls, and is said to have been founded by King Ethelred in 689.

P E R S H O R E is most advantageously and beautifully situated on the north bank of the Avon: it is a handsome, well-built town, has a good market on Tuesday and Friday, and formerly sent members to parliament. The principal trade of this town is in the stocking manufacture, but the beauty of its situation, and the salubrious and healthy temperature of the atmosphere, has occasioned a considerable influx of respectable strangers, many of whom have made Pershore their permanent residence. This place had formerly a monastic establishment on a very extensive scale, enjoying a large share of reputation for the fame of its miracles, and the piety of its conductors; but by whom founded is uncertain: many vestiges of it, however, remain, particularly a large portion of the original church, which appears to have been very elegant. The neighbourhood of this town abounds with rich and beautiful scenery, in which the river Avon and Bredon-hill are conspicuous objects. At a place called Aylesborough, situated on a hill about 1 m. north of the town, this interesting assemblage of natural beauties is seen mingled in an ever-varying landscape to considerable advantage.

B I R M I N G H A M. This important manufacturing town is distinguished in the commercial annals of Great Britain, for a spirit of enterprise united with habits of perseverance; for the rare association of a genius to invent and a hand to execute. The first writers who notice Birmingham, mention the success with which the inhabitants cultivated the manufacture of articles of an iron fabric; and Mr. Hutton, the historian of this populous and most industrious town, labours to establish the belief of such a trade existing here as early as the time of the ancient Britons. In the disastrous civil war of the 17th century, Birmingham sided with the parliament. The restoration of monarchy in the person of Charles II., is the period from which Birmingham dates its great rise in commercial prosperity: implements of husbandry, tools used in carpentry, and such coarse articles of iron manufacture, had, till now, chiefly engrossed the attention of the artisan. This reign, a long holiday after the troubles of civil contest, produced a relaxation in public manners, and a demand for those embellishments of luxury which may be termed the playthings of elegant habit. At this period, the toy trade was first cultivated in Birmingham. Industry, the great basis of successful effort

From Bath was already the possession of the natives; encouragement stimulated genius, and the trade has since been carried to an extent unprecedented in the annals of manufacture, and productive not only of local wealth, but of national pride. Birmingham is approached on every side by an ascent, except from the north-west; and, as scarcely any of the streets lie on a dead flat, every shower conduces to cleanliness and health. As the chief parts of this immense town are of comparatively modern erection, the examiner will be induced to expect that the great errors of antiquity, in respect to formation of streets and character of domestic architecture, are here avoided; and in a general point of view, he will find that his anticipations were correct. The inland situation of Birmingham was unfavourable to the first views of commercial interchange on a large scale; and not any navigable river flows near the confines of the town: but industry and art have supplied every deficiency, and by the introduction of canal navigation, greatly accelerated the commerce of the place. By this mode of conveyance a communication is effected on easy terms with the metropolis, and most of the principal trading-places in the kingdom. A town not possessing a charter of incorporation, fails to present such a variety of public structures as would appear suited to its magnitude or resources; it however contains three churches, besides chapels, for the exercise of the established religion; meeting-houses for various classes of dissenters; a Jewish synagogue; several charity-schools; a general hospital; an asylum for the deaf and dumb; a handsome theatre, and assembly-rooms; public libraries; a philosophical society; and a new prison, with spacious rooms, used for the meetings of the county magistrates, and for other business of a public nature.

DONCASTER is a town of very considerable antiquity, and is believed to have been a Roman station; but it is remarkable that few vestiges of that people have been here discovered, with the exception of a votive altar of exquisite workmanship, which was found in the year 1781, when digging a cellar in St. Sepulchre's gate. Notwithstanding the situation of this place is on the south bank of the river Don, which renders it an important pass in a country that is so well calculated for the marching of armies, yet it does not appear to have ever been the scene of any great military transaction; and, not being a fortified town, did not partake much of the calamities by which the country was agitated during the reign of the unfortunate Charles I. Doncaster is unquestionably one of the most eligible and genteel towns in the north of England; when entered from Bawtry the effect is particularly striking: at first are seen the race-course and the elegant stand that was erected for the accommodation of company by the corporation. Shortly afterwards a range of very handsome houses present themselves to the view, together with that fine obelisk called Hall-cross. The high-street, through which the north road passes, with Hall, French, and Marsh gates, extends nearly a mile from Hall-cross to Mill-bridge, and like the other parts of the town, consists chiefly of well-built houses. Here are also a number of commodious and really ornamental dwellings, besides the public buildings, all of which are calculated to excite the minute and deliberate attention of the topographer; but more especially the church dedicated to St. George, which is a superb structure occupying the site of a castle, that is imagined to have been erected shortly after the Norman conquest; it is in the pointed style of architecture, and has an elegant tower 141 feet high, which was evidently built at a much later period, very possibly during the reign of Henry III. The interior of this edifice is extremely beautiful; it contains several objects worthy the attention of the an-

BAKEWELL is an ancient town, situated on the western bank of the river Wye. The parish is the most extensive in the county; its length, from north-west to north-east being more than twenty miles, and its breadth upwards of eight. The church occupies an elevated situation, and is a fine old structure, in the form of a cross, with an octagonal tower in the centre, surmounted by a lofty spire; it contains several monuments deserving notice. The neighbourhood abounds in coal; there are also several stone quarries, and lead and zinc mines in the vicinity, and these, with a large cotton manufactory situated in the town, furnish the chief employment of the inhabitants; the market is held on Friday. The Rutland Arms at Bakewell, allowed to be one of the best inns in the kingdom, is much frequented by anglers during the summer season, who resort hither in pursuit of the trout, preserved by the Duke of Rutland in the rivers Wye and Lathkill, both celebrated by old Izaak Walton, the latter in particular as the purest and most transparent stream he ever saw.

113 ROTHERHAM is pleasantly situated in a valley near the conflux of the rivers Rother and Don; it is by no means a handsome town, but contains a spacious and rather elegant parish church, of Gothic architecture, that was erected in the reign of Edward IV. Here is likewise a meeting-house for dissenters, and another for methodists. This town is in a very thriving condition; its inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in coals, and other articles by the river Don; and have the benefit of a very excellent weekly market

tiquary; among which is a font, still used for the purpose of baptism, that is said to have formerly borne the date of 1061, but the figures are now obliterated; it is of a hard sort of free-stone, and the design and execution sufficiently prove its high antiquity. The mansion-house is likewise a magnificent structure; it stands nearly in the centre of the town, and was erected by the corporation at an expense of full 8000*l*. There are not any manufactures of consequence cultivated at this place; but the inhabitants enjoy considerable trade with the numerous opulent families in the neighbourhood, and with the country people, who frequent the periodical markets from a great distance; it should likewise be observed, that the corporation possesses a revenue of 7000*l*. a year, which is liberally expended for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants. The market is on Saturday: it is well supplied, and held in spacious but irregular areas. Here are several charitable institutions, a good town-hall, and a neat theatre. Doncaster has long been celebrated for its races; these generally take place the last week in September, and continue five days; they are invariably attended by the first families in the north, and the race-course upon these occasions presents an assemblage, with some few exceptions, perhaps unrivalled, for its brilliant display of rank, beauty, and fashion, who attracted by the sport, flock to the enjoyment of this gay and dazzling scene, attended by trains of servants, and in the most splendid equipages; indeed it is much to be doubted, if upon the whole, Doncaster will admit of a rival; for if not dignified like Ascot with the presence of majesty, it seldom fails to be honoured by the attendance of royalty; and if unequal in point of numbers with that great source of attraction Epsom, it must be conceded that it is infinitely more select, and may perhaps be not inaptly compared to Newmarket, which, however, as greatly exceeding in numbers, though not in respectability, it may rather be said to represent upon an extended scale. The following list of the plates, stakes, &c. annually run for at Doncaster, sufficiently proves there is no want of attraction at these celebrated races; they consist of the King's plate, the Fitzwilliam stakes, two Produce stakes, Foal stakes, Champagne stakes, All Age stakes, Doncaster stakes, Corporation purse, gold cup value 350 guineas, Gascoigne stakes, Doncaster racing club stakes, one hundred pound plate, exclusive of others of minor importance, handicaps, matches, sweepstakes, &c., and lastly the great St Leger stakes.

CONISBROUGH. This place is remarkable for its ancient castle, and its delightful situation on the top of a hill of considerable height, on the south side of the river Don, commanding extensive and beautiful views of a finely variegated country. The castle of Conisbrough is one of the most curious remains of antiquity to be met with in this part of the kingdom. It has been a large and massy pile of building, standing on the summit of an eminence, but much overtopped by the hill on which the village is situated. The ground-plot of the castle is of an irregular but rather oval form, about 700 feet in circuit, surrounded by a fosse 40 feet deep from the foot of the walls, full of very large ash and elm trees. The counter-scarp of the fosse is 20 feet steep, but towards the river it has been levelled by the plough. The lower part of most of the outward wall, and several rounders by which it was strengthened, still remain; the foundations of the inner wall are in some places visible, and the strong tower or keep, which is 78 feet in height, is almost entire. In digging the foundations for a house in 1792, leaden pipes were found, which communicated with the castle, and, it is supposed, brought water to it from the town well. The time when this castle was built, or when it began to fall to decay, cannot now be ascertained. Tradition gives it a very remote antiquity, and fabulous history stamps it with a spurious fame. It is not improbable that there might be a fort here before the coming in of the Normans; but the castle was most probably built by William, the first Earl of Warren, to whom this estate was given by the Conqueror. It became the property of Richard, Earl of Cambridge, who was named Richard de Coningsburgh, because he was born at SOUTHAMPTON is a borough town, consisting of seven parishes, (including Stoneham), situated at the union of the rivers Test and Itchen, which form Southampton bay; many of the streets are handsome and well built. The High-street, terminating at the quay, much resembles, in width and beauty, the High-street of Oxford, and has a charming view of the river and the New Forest. The town is well paved and lighted, and supplied with excellent water. The approach to this place from the London road is exceedingly striking, from the beautiful view of Southampton bay, the Isle of Wight, and the scenery of the New Forest; elegant seats and rows of trees line the road on both sides; and this entrance is still farther heightened by that venerable remain of antiquity, the Bargate. The walls with which the town was anciently surrounded, are in many places quite destroyed, but in others still present a venerable appearance. Southampton contains five parish churches, and these are for the most part handsome edifices. Near the west quay is a range of convenient baths, in which the water is changed every tide; here is also a commodious warm bath: further towards the channel is another suit of convenient and well furnished baths, and several bathing machines have been established at the Cross-house near Itchen Ferry. At the bottom of Orchard street, without the Bargate, is a spring of the nature of Tunbridge Wells, and used with effect for the same complaints. The public-rooms are situated near the baths, and command a delightful prospect. Here is also a neat theatre, several well-furnished libraries, and three respectable banks. This town was made a borough by Henry II., and by King John a county of itself; it returns two members to parliament, and has a market on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

and embellish this mansion during the eventful reign of Charles I., who frequently resided here, and is said to have been particularly partial to Wilton; from that time, however, few alterations were made here till the beginning of the present century, when Mr. James Wyatt was employed to enlarge the building, and adapt it for the better display of its rich stores of ancient sculpture and paintings, than which, united, a more extensive and magnificent collection is scarcely to be met with in the possession of any individual. One of the chief features of this alteration is a large court-yard on the north, surrounded by offices, a lodge and a new side to the house; another considerable novelty was the formation of an inclosed or glazed cloister, or rather gallery, that surrounds an open court, and is attained after passing the vestibule, which, as well as the cloister, is filled with statues, busts, basso-relievos, &c., many of them extremely curious and valuable as productions of art or memorials of antiquity, and altogether presenting an imposing and truly interesting coup-d'œil. The paintings include, besides many family portraits, several by the best masters particularly remarkable for taste, science, and execution, especially a celebrated one by Vanduyck, containing ten full length figures, viz. Philip Earl of Pembroke, and his Countess, who are represented sitting, with their five sons standing on their right hand, and their daughter, and her husband, the Earl of Caernarvon, on their left; before them is Lady Mary Villiers, who was betrothed to Lord Charles Herbert, and in the clouds appear three children, two boys and a girl, who died young. The approach to the mansion is through a triumphal arch, surmounted by a bold equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius, that formerly stood on the summit of a hill in the park, but has been very judiciously removed to its present situation by the noble proprietor, who, though no doubt gratified by being in possession of such rarities of art, must, as a man of true taste and liberality, derive most permanent pleasure from unfolding them to his friends, and the discriminating part of the public.

It enjoys one of the most delightful situations in the kingdom; the windows commanding a complete view of Portsmouth, the Isle of Wight, and the shipping at Spithead, together with an extensive sea prospect. The principal front of the house, which is of brick, faces the west, and consists of a centre, a quadrangular building, connected with the two wings by a low open colonnade of the Ionic order; in the middle of the building is a balcony, sustained by two stages of Ionic columns, and on the summit is a small observatory, crowned with a cupola. In its present state it is a noble pile, in form quadrangular, and surrounding an area of near five acres: it exhibits specimens of various styles of military architecture, and is in sufficient preservation to be appropriated to the purposes of a military prison, for which use it was rented by government of the proprietors, and during the last war 5000 persons were secured here at one time.

HAVANT is a neat respectable town, consisting, principally, of two streets crossing each other at right angles. In the centre of the town stands the church, built in the form of a cross, with a tower rising from the intersection. In October 1764, two distinct shocks of an earthquake were felt in this town, which continued from two to three minutes, each accompanied with a tremulous motion, spreading great alarm, but no damage was done. Market on Saturday.

From an obscure village, the town of Worthing has, within the short space of a few years, risen to its present height of popularity and elegance, which deservedly rank it among the most fashionable sea-bathing places; and, to those who prefer retirement, Worthing is considered superior to Brighton, or any of the more numerous frequented watering places on the coast. The facility it affords for bathing, even in the most stormy weather, and the accommodations in general, together with its vicinity to Brighton, give Worthing a just claim to attention; and that it has not escaped public notice, is clearly evinced by its numerous and respectable visitors during the season. It possesses the advantage of a fine firm level sand, which makes bathing here extremely pleasant; and also affords opportunities for the invigorating exercises of riding or walking, thereby enjoying the advantage to be derived from the sea-breezes, rendered temperate at all times by the lofty range of the Sussex Downs, which exclude the chilling blasts from the north and east. This was a place of great fame and strength in the earliest periods of English history; it became alternately the property of different individuals, and underwent two sieges during the civil wars of the 17th century, from which period it continued little better than a mass of ruins till the late Duke of Norfolk undertook to restore it to its ancient magnificence. Arundel Castle occupies an elevated situation, and commands a fine view over the sea as far as the Isle of Wight; it is embosomed in a luxuriant grove, and presents a singularly beautiful, imposing, and majestic appearance. The building is in the Gothic style, of free-stone, that was carefully selected so as to assimilate in colour with the remains of the ancient fabric. The internal arrangements and decorations of this superb residence are eminently calculated to exhibit the talent and taste of the late noble proprietor; and among the many specimens of the arts with which it is adorned, are several curious paintings of the Howard family, and a large window of painted glass in the dining-room, executed by Eginton, representing the late Duke and Duchess in the characters of King Solomon and Queen Sheba, at a banquet. The city of Bath is justly esteemed the most elegant in England. The hot baths, from which it derives its name, were known in the Roman times; nor was their celebrity lost even in the dark period of Anglo-Saxon history. But the town has been greatly enlarged and decorated in the last century. The waters are used both internally and externally, chiefly in gout, bilious, and paralytic cases, being frequented twice in the year, at what is called the spring and autumnal seasons. Two-thirds of the company are attracted merely by amusement, society, and dissipation; in all of which it is only second to London. But so great are the attractions of this celebrated spot, and the reputation of these waters has so much increased, that Bath has become the constant residence, not only of many opulent invalids, but also of numerous votaries of pleasure. The baths consist of the king's, the queen's, the cross, the hot, the corporation, and the Duke of Kingston's baths. The taste of the water is pleasant, impregnated with a vitriolic principle, which yields, upon evaporation, a small portion of neutral salt, with a calcareous earth and iron. The amusements of this gay city are various, rational, and well conducted. They consist chiefly of assemblies, balls, concerts, card-parties, and public breakfasts, besides the theatre. There are two sets of assembly rooms, termed the Upper and Lower, where the amusements are alternately held: the former of these stands on the walks leading from the grove to the parade; and the latter, on the east side of the Circus. The city, except a little opening to the east and west, through which the Avon passes, is surrounded on all sides by hills. It has an elegant bridge, and the river has been made navi-

CIRENCESTER. The Abbey, Miss Master ; and Oakley Park, the noble seat of Earl Bathurst . The mansion, a very spacious structure, is built in the French style, with a grand hall in the centre, communicating with several elegant suites of apartments: its west front is a fine elevation with wings and a handsome portico; the east front is of free-stone, and of considerable length; the interior is furnished in a princely style of grandeur, and is ornamented with an excellent collection of paintings by some of the first masters. The park and grounds are very extensive; their embellishments consist of a number of terraces, adorned with small buildings, and flanked by noble plantations of shrubs and evergreens. To the south-west of the house an artificial lake gives variety to the scene; the Wood-house also presents an interesting object. In the park is an ancient circular tumulus, called Grismond's Tower , about 20 feet high, in which several urns were found some years ago, containing ashes and burnt bones; here is also an ancient stone-cross, on the base of which appears some rude ornamental carved work. A majestic woodland called Oakley is connected with the park; near the centre, ten extensive avenues diverge, planted in a radiated form, and producing an effect of considerable grandeur. In a deep overshadowing recess stands a ruin, called Alfred's Hall , an inscription over the entrance of which informs the visitor, that this was the place where that glorious ornament of the dawning age of English liberty signed the treaty with Gothrum the Dane ; the	116¼	* TETBURY	28½

CHIPPING NORTON is a well-built town, situated on the rise of a hill, near the bottom of which stands the church, a venerable Gothic structure, with an embattled tower at its west end; this building contains a variety of ancient monuments deserving of attention. Near the church formerly stood the castle, said to have been erected in the reign of King Stephen, but very few traces even of the foundation are now to be seen. This borough sent members to parliament in the time of Edward I. and Edward III., but has not since possessed that privilege; it has, however, a weekly market on Wednesday, which is well attended. About 3 m. from Chipping Norton are the remains of an ancient monument called the Rollrich Stones, supposed to be the vestiges of a Druid's temple.

gable to Bristol. It was formerly surrounded with a wall, of which there still appears some remains, as well as one or two of its gates. Most of the new buildings, and by far the largest and finest part of the city, are without the walls, particularly Queen Square, but a principal ornament is the Circus, the houses of which are built on a uniform plan, with three openings at equal distances, leading into as many streets. On the north and south sides of the town are the North and South Parades. Among the late improvements of Bath, the Royal Crescent forms a striking feature, standing upon an eminence. Behind the crescent is St. James's Square, which, with Lansdown Crescent, Catherine Place, Rivers Street, &c. enjoy every advantage of air, prospect, and scenery. Orange Grove, between the Abbey Church and the lower rooms, is a beautiful open area, planted with rows of elms, &c. The Guildhall is situated in the High-street. Here is a noble Infirmary, or general hospital, for the sick and lame from all parts of the kingdom. The monastery here, of which the cathedral was the church, was a truly venerable pile; the other churches are, St. James, St. Michael, the Abbey Church or St. Peter and St. Paul, Walcot, and Christ's Church. There are several chapels and meeting-houses, as well as hospitals, almshouses, and charity schools. Bath is governed by a mayor, recorder, aldermen, twenty common councilmen, and a town clerk; sends two members to parliament; and, joined with Wells, forms a bishopric, called the diocese of Bath and Wells. The markets are here principally on Wednesday and Saturday, and are plentifully supplied with all kinds of provision. The fish-market, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, far exceeds that of any inland town in the kingdom.

LOUGHBOROUGH may be considered the second town in the county, as in size and population it is only exceeded by Leicester: here is a fine spacious church, with a very handsome tower, which latter was erected by subscription near the close of the 16th century. The different sects of dissenters have also meeting-houses for their accommodation; and the condition of the poor is benefitted by several charitable institutions. This town has suffered considerably from pestilential disorders, among which, in 1557, was a peculiar disease, called in the parish register, "The Swat, alias New Acquaintance, Stoupe, Knave, and know thy Master." In 1742 a modern market-house was erected in the place of an ancient cross, at a short distance from which stands an old structure called the Court Chamber; this is occasionally used as a ball-room, or as a theatre, and the lord's leet is also annually held here. The Loughborough canal has been highly beneficial to the town, and proved a source of considerable profit to the original proprietors, as a dividend of 95l. a year has been paid on shares of 125l. each, and one of these shares has sold for 1800l. LEICESTER. This town, which during the Saxon heptarchy was a city, is fabulously reported to have been built by King Lear; it however lays claim to very remote antiquity, and at the time of the Roman invasion was a place of great strength. It subsequently became a Roman station; and is the Rate of Antoninus; great numbers of Roman coins and other antiquities have at various times been found here. The castle was building of very considerable extent, and was the court of the great duke of Lancaster: its hall and kitchen are still entire; and the courts of justice are held in it at the assizes. In this town there was formerly an abbey in which Cardinal Wolsey died. Leicester contains five churches, which are all worthy of attention, either on account of their antiquity, architectural beauty, the curious monuments they contain, or the elegance of their internal decorations; and one of them, St. Martin's, is esteemed the principal church in the county; in which the bishop of the diocese and the judges occasionally attend divine service; besides these, there are meeting-houses for the different denominations of dissenters, a good town and county hall, several charitable institutions, an elegant modern hotel, and a convenient theatre. The corporation of Leicester consists of a mayor, recorder, steward, bailiff, 24 common council-men, a town-clerk, &c. The chief manufacture of this town is that of stockings, which is here carried on to a very considerable extent; the market is held on Saturday, and Leicester has also the privilege of sending two members to parliament.

LOUGHBOROUGH, 2 m. before, Beaumanor Park, Wm. Heyrick, Esq. The present mansion was erected in 1725, on the site of a more ancient structure; it is of large dimensions, and is situated in a fertile vale on the eastern side of the forest of Charnwood; the apartments contain a number of portraits, among which are those of James I. and his queen, Anne of Denmark: these were presented by the monarch to Sir Wm. Heyrick.

and truly superb structure lies to the left of the great court, and the walls ranged round the other divisions are guarded by ramparts: open flights of stone steps conduct to various turrets, and, with many passages, form a ready line of communication through the whole of the fortress. Towards the river a magnificent but irregular face of the building is displayed, and though it has altogether received many alterations, still much good taste has been evinced in every particular. On the whole, the exterior of this building is chiefly calculated to excite ideas of chivalric hardihood and unpolished baronial pride; but the decorations of the interior, though they in some degree correspond with the antique castellated outlines of the edifice, still their various beauties far surpass the expectations of the visitor. The grand suite of apartments extend in a right line 333 feet; they are furnished in a chaste but magnificent style, and from the windows of each of them various beautifully picturesque prospects are enjoyed: the hall, a noble apartment 62 feet long and 37 wide, is wainscoted, and paved with black and white stone: to the sides are attached various weapons and pieces of armour, interspersed with antlers; and in attention to the usage of the ancient baron's household, where convenience was always studied in preference to delicacy, logs of wood are piled round the wide fire-place; but this is the only room really devoted to so strict a keeping of manners. The pleasure-grounds are arranged with that exquisite order of taste, whose basis is founded on simplicity; and the park, abounding with wood and water, is very extensive, and contains several well-designed vistas, from whence are enjoyed the most lovely and diversified prospects imaginable. The green-house must also be noticed, as containing a very beautiful and exceeding large antique vase, of a circular form, and capable of holding full 163 gallons. — 1¹/₂ m. beyond Warwick, Guy's Cliff, the beautiful and highly interesting seat of Bertie Bertie Greathcad, Esq.

LEAMINGTON PRIORS has become the resort of rank, elegance, and fashion, for whose accommodation a number of handsome buildings have been erected, besides pump and assembly-rooms, baths, libraries, a neat theatre, &c.; of these the new pump-room and adjoining baths claim particular notice, as being, perhaps without exception, the most elegant in Europe: their erection and decoration cost an immense sum, and owing to the ingenious construction of the pipes, the engine is capable of supplying, in a few hours, as many tons of the mineral fluid as would be required to float a man of war: the Regent Hotel is also an elegant structure, and one of the largest in England. The theatre, a very compact and eligible building, situated in Bath Street, is the property of Mr. Elliston, the present lessee of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, whose superior abilities as an actor are universally admired, and have long since deservedly placed him at the head of his profession. To this gentleman Leamington is indebted for the erection of one of the most classical buildings in the kingdom, comprising a very extensive circulating library and reading rooms, a well furnished establishment of musical instruments, together with a musical library, a most splendid concert and ball-room, with suitable card and tea-rooms, and attached to these, three excellent dwelling-houses, the whole of which have been erected at an expense, we should suppose, not less than 20,000*l.* In the rear of these premises, Mr. Elliston's sons have recently added to their establishment by the erection of a noble billiard room, constructed upon an entirely new principle, and opposite to it, in a corresponding and uniform style, a printing office on an extensive scale; and the whole has been greatly improved by the formation of a large and very beautiful pleasure garden, with an immediate communication from the reading room, which is thus rendered by far the most elegant of its kind in the kingdom. This place has also a picture gallery, which has been formed by the exertions of Mr. Bisset. Leamington enjoys a very beautiful situation; the surrounding scenery is rural and attractive, and the walks and rides in the vicinity are well calculated to add to the celebrity of the place. NOTTINGHAM. This town, when seen from several distant points of approach, is particularly prepossessing; and a nearer view does not detract much from it, for the public structures are all found to be uniformly respectable, while many of the domestic buildings are of an eligible character: but in almost every street, however, it

of three delightful valleys, but is, notwithstanding, considerably above the level of the surrounding country, over which it commands many highly interesting prospects. Its front and entrance hall are in the Gothic style, that having been thought to harmonize best with the neighbouring scenery; and in its formation, comfort and splendour have been equally attended to, and indeed few mansions are better calculated for the purposes of exercising the rights of old English hospitality. The apartments are of noble dimensions; they are very tastefully and elegantly furnished; The house is built with stone; it surrounds a court-yard, and displays some curious specimens of painted glass, part of which was brought from the old chapel of Stoke Poges, in Buckinghamshire. A wing extends on the east side of the building, in which there is a very handsome domestic chapel about 58 feet by 30; this is so situated as to screen the offices, the principal of which are on the north side of the building. The park is celebrated for its picturesque beauty; it alternately rises into bold swells, and sinks into fine sweeping valleys, and receives much additional interest from the noble majestic oaks and other forest trees with which it abounds: from different points several eminently beautiful and varied views are obtained, particularly from a precipice called Donington Cliff, near the northern extremity of the grounds, whence there is a view that is much admired for its wild and romantic features: a bold projecting crag, with hanging woods, and enlivened by the pellucid waters of the soft-flowing Trent, constitute a scene that demands the peculiar attention of the landscape-painter; this has, however, been well represented in two large prints, engraved in 1745, by Vivares, from paintings by T. Smith.

will be recognised as a manufacturing town, and there is ample proof that the chief object of pursuit with the inhabitants is convenience rather than elegance. Some exceptions to this remark will be found among the recent improvements; and many of the more ancient domestic buildings will be looked upon as objects of real curiosity, on account of the deep and extensive excavations that have been made in the rock on which their foundations are placed. A castle was either founded or rebuilt here by William the Conqueror, and afterwards became the scene of many important events, but was almost levelled with the ground by order of Cromwell; shortly after the Restoration it was, however, reconstructed by the Duke of Newcastle, whose descendant, the present Duke, is still proprietor. Nottingham contains three churches, besides an extra-parochial chapel, which latter edifice has been recently erected on part of the ground belonging to the castle. Among the buildings worthy of notice in this town are the county-hall, town-hall, new exchange, and gaols, all which are extremely well suited to their several purposes. The market place is one of the largest and handsomest in England. The noble stone bridge here crossing the river Trent, should likewise be mentioned; it consists of 20 arches, and was built towards the close of the 17th century. The town is a county of itself, governed by a mayor, recorder, six aldermen, two sheriffs, two coroners, and two chamberlains, with a town clerk, and other inferior officers. It sends two members to parliament, the returning officers being the sheriffs, and the number of voters about four thousand. The chief manufacture is that of stockings; its other productions consist of coarse earthen-ware, malt, and ale, for which latter article it has long been celebrated; it has likewise a considerable export trade to America and the West Indies. The manufacture of lace has also been latterly introduced here, and the trade therein carried on to an extent, that has considerably increased the wealth, and materially conduced to the prosperity, of Nottingham. WICHNOR. The church belonging to this village forms a conspicuous object for some distance, owing to its situation on an eminence, from whence many delightful prospects are enjoyed. But this place is more particularly deserving notice on account of the curious tenure by which Sir Philip de Somerville held the manor under the Earl of Lancaster, in the reign of Edward III.: this was the obligation to present a sitch of bacon and some corn, to every couple, who, after having been married a year and a day, should willingly make oath that they had not only never quarrelled or desired to be unmarried again, but would, if single, each choose the other in preference to every person in the world, of whatsoever condition they might be. Whether or not the motives that gave rise to this custom were for the purpose of ascertaining the proportion of happy and unhappy married people, we cannot pretend to determine; but it is certainly not much to the honour of matrimony, that only three couples should have obtained the prize since its institution; of whom one was adjudged to return it, on account of disagreement respecting the manner of preparing it for table.	33 $\frac{3}{4}$ 30 27 $\frac{3}{4}$	$1\frac{1}{2}$ m. farther, To Tamworth 8 m. This seat occupies a pleasant and very eligible situation, and is the property of Sir Francis Burdett, Bart., into whose family it passed, by marriage with the Fraunceys, about the year 1697. The present mansion stands on the site of a more ancient structure; it is an elegant stone building, having a double flight of steps on its north and south fronts; the only difference between which is, that the former is decorated with a handsome portico: the interior consists of a spacious hall, running through the building, having on its sides various noble apartments, and a fine wide oak staircase, that leads to the bed-rooms, &c. The grounds are characterised by a fine undulating surface; they contain a number of plantations and majestic oaks, besides which, here are some spacious lawns, studded with noble timber, from whence the prospects are extremely delightful, including a fine view of the silver winding Trent.

POOLE, a town, and county of itself, is about three quarters of a mile long, and half a mile broad, it consists of three or four considerable streets, running nearly from north-east to south-west, besides a cross street, parallel with the quay and several intersecting lanes. The buildings are generally low, but of late the town has received several handsome additions. The old town hall in Fish-Street , was built in 1572, beneath which is the prison; but the new town hall, erected in Market-Street , in 1761, is an elegant building, with convenient shambles underneath. The King's hall, or wool house, is an edifice of some antiquity, that has been partly rebuilt. The great quay is 192 feet long, and at the east end is the custom house; besides which there is a new quay. The harbour, upon the improvement of which 3000 l. has lately been expended, is reckoned the best and safest in the channel, as the ground is every where soft, with water sufficient for vessels of 14 feet draught to come up to the quay. The mansion is a superb, uniform, and magnificent structure, that for grandeur of effect, commodiousness of arrangement, and adaptation for a splendid nobleman's establishment, is equal to any residence in Great Britain; it stands on an open lawn near a branch of the river Frome, which winds through the vale, and adds much to the beauty of the scenery; it is in the form of a parallelogram, 220 feet long, by 180 feet deep; is built entirely of free-stone, and is ornamented with pilasters of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders: it has four principal fronts, each of them surmounted by a handsome balustrade, and on the S. and E. sides are colossal stone statues, which, with the varied turrets and columnar chimnies, have a very picturesque appearance. The principal entrance is on the south side, and on the east is a handsome architectural entrance from the flower-garden; the north also communicates with another flower-garden, surrounded by conservatories, green-houses, and other offices. The interior of this princely mansion is of a corresponding character, every thing being vast, and every part grand: the ground-floor consists of a lofty and spacious hall, libraries, dining-rooms, drawing-rooms, bed-rooms, chapel, staircase, and gallery, with two open courts; and many of the apartments are decorated with numerous portraits and other pictures. The surrounding park, within the plantations, is about 15 miles in circumference; its natural features and artificial embellishments are bold, grand, and diversified; and both nature and art have co-operated to render this place highly important and interesting. Approaching the house from the Warminster road, almost the whole scenery of the domain is gradually unfolded to the spectator; while the entrances from the N. W. and S. are through a level tract of country, the latter being by a straight road nearly a mile long, skirted on both sides by lofty old trees. Here are also various groves and other masses of wood, besides bold hills thickly covered with forest trees, and a broad and luxuriant valley, in the bosom of which is a large sheet of water. The views from many parts of this noble domain, are extensive, varied, and beautiful.

There is also a large and magnificent stone barn, supported by buttresses, standing at a short distance from the gateway, that still receives the produce of the Abbey farm. The parish church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain but elegant structure, in the pointed style, with a lofty embattled tower and four pinnacles, supposed to have been built by the abbots, for the use of the town, about the middle of the fifteenth century. An immense chalk hill, terminated by a mountainous prominence, rises hence, and is crowned by a very large oblong entrenchment, called Trendle Hill, on the declivity of which may be traced a gigantic figure, cut in the chalk, in the manner of the famous white horse in Berkshire; it represents a man holding a club in his right hand, and extending the other: the figure is 180 feet high, and proportionably made.

Dr. Stukeley was induced, from the situation, size, and form of this camp, so much resembling that near Amesbury, in Wiltshire, to suppose that it was made by Vespasian, when the latter was employed in the conquest of the Belgæ; but Camden, Speed, and other antiquaries, ascribe it to the Danes, who besieged Dorchester under King Sweyn.

NEW MALTON, 3 m. dis- tant, Eastthorp Park, Edward Clough Taylor, Esq.; and about 1 m. farther, Castle Howard, Earl of Carlisle. This magnifi- cent mansion was built from a design of Sir John Vanbrugh, in the same style as Blenheim House in Oxfordshire, by the Right Hon. Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle, on the site of the old castle of Hinderskell, which was destroyed by an ac- cidental fire. Castle Howard has a longer line of front than Blenheim House, and its exte- rior is extremely magnificent; the state-apartments are par- ticularly distinguished for gran- deur of appearance; but it is remarked, that the ceilings of the rooms in general exceed the usual proportion in height. The princely collection of paintings, statues, busts, &c. with which this mansion is enriched, affords a high gratification to the ad- mirers of the fine arts, whilst the liberality of the noble pro- prietor, in admitting the public to view this elegant repository, entitles him to grateful applause. The taste displayed in the plea- sure grounds corresponds with the magnificence of the house: the park is beautiful and exten- sive; and the late Earl of Carlisle greatly improved the		NORTH GRIMSTON, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. distant, Birdsall, Lord Middle- ton; and 2 m. beyond, at Set- trington, Settrington Hall, H. 				scenery by the addition of a fine sheet of water, at an ap- propriate distance from the south front. A beautiful intermixture of wood and lawn delights the eye, and the prospects are every where rich and full of pleasing variety. From the north front of the house there is a distant view of the moors. The orna- mental buildings in the park are in a style of grandeur. At the entrance, on the south, is a con- venient inn for the accommoda- tion of strangers. In the centre of four beautiful avenues, bor- dered on each side with lofty trees, and crossing at right angles, stands a stately quadrang- ular obelisk 100 feet in height; and nearly opposite to the grand entrance, in the north front of the house, an elegant monument commemorates the victories of the immortal Nelson. About half a mile to the eastward of the house is an Ionic temple, with four porticos and a beau- tiful interior; and about a quarter of a mile farther, and nearly in the same direction, stands the Mausoleum, a circular building, above 50 feet in dia- meter, surrounded with a hand- some colonnade of Doric pillars.

NEW MALTON, a well-built town, pleasantly situated in a fertile and agreeable country, on an eminence overlooking the Derwent, which is made navigable to the town, and flows along a beautiful vale on its S. E. side. This town has been supposed to be the Roman Camelodunum, and the entrance into it from Scarborough, by a spacious stone bridge over the river, has a fine picturesque appearance, exhibiting on the right hand some remains of the walls of an ancient castle: the main street rises from this bridge with a continued but easy ascent for about half a mile to the west end of the town in the road towards York, and the houses, near 800 in number, are mostly built of stone. Here are two parish churches, St. Leonard's and St. Michael's; the spire of the former is a truncated cone, and has a singular appearance. New Malton sends two members to parliament, has a weekly market on Saturday, and carries on a considerable trade in corn, a vast quantity of which is sent yearly into the western parts of Yorkshire.

ber of majestic oak and elm trees, that occasionally form deep groves, and admit, at intervals, of a variety of extensive and picturesque views over the surrounding very beautiful country. The home grounds, though in a great measure preserved in the antique style, in which they were originally laid out, have nevertheless been subjected to a few alterations, which, with the statues they contain, give them an effect that is extremely pleasing to the eye.

mented with 10 beautiful columns of the Doric order. The gardens are situated on the side of a hill, that rises above the house; they were originally laid out in the formal style, with a regular series of slopes, progressively rising each above the other, and connected by flights of stone steps, but they have been since considerably altered, and now present, the various natural beauties of modern gardening.

This estate was purchased by the ancient family of Fieldings, ancestors of the present Earl of Denbigh, in the reign of Edward VI. The mansion is substantial and commodious, with an ornamental wing projecting on either side. The walls of various apartments are enriched by good family portraits, many of which are by Vandyck; and to these has been added a judicious selection from the old masters. The dependent grounds gain a high interest from their contiguity to the two Roman roads, the Watling Street and the Fosse-way, which intersect each other about 4 m. from Newnham, where a pillar was erected in 1712, by Basil, Earl of Denbigh, and some neighbouring gentlemen.

LUTTERWORTH is situated on the river Swift, about 2 m. from the Roman road called Watling Street, which divides this county from Warwickshire; it contains many good brick houses, but the more ancient buildings are of mud covered with thatch. The church is a large handsome structure, with a beautiful tower and four turrets; it contains some curious old monuments, besides a portrait, by S. Fielding, of the great reformer, Wycliffe, and a fine carved oak pulpit, from which he is said to have addressed his congregation; he was buried here in 1387, but 40 years afterwards the council of Sienna ordered his remains to be dug up, which was done, and they were then burnt, and thrown into the river. The cotton manufacture is carried on in this town to a great extent, and the market is held on Thursday.

and whose son, Sir Henry, from the liberality of his disposition, called the Golden Knight, here erected a capacious mansion, in which he had the honour of entertaining Queen Elizabeth, in August 1564, after her visit to the university of Cambridge. This gentleman dying in 1603-4, was succeeded by his son Sir Oliver, uncle and godfather to the protector, who continued to live in the same splendid style as his father had done, and by that means so injured his fortune that he was obliged from time to time to part with his different estates, and thereby considerably decreased the paternal inheritance of his family. Sir Oliver was several times visited by King James at this seat; but the most splendid entertainment here given by him to that monarch, was when he was on his journey from Edinburgh to London, to take possession of the crown of England, for which occasion he appears to have considerably improved the mansion, and added that very elegant bow-window to the dining-room, which still exhibits the arms of his family in painted glass. It is a curious fact worthy of record, that this Sir Oliver was one of the warmest adherents of King Charles I., to support whose cause he raised an armed force, and expended several large sums of money; but his distinguished nephew, who, however, treated him with great personal respect, at different times levied on him considerable exactions for the service of the commonwealth. Hinchinbrook was sold by Sir Oliver to Sir Sydney Montagu, ancestor of the present noble proprietor, in the year 1627. The mansion is very pleasantly situated on an elevation, commanding some delightful views over a fine expanse of country, particularly of the rich vale, fertilized by the waters of the river Ouse: it is an irregular structure, composed partly of stone and partly of brick, and includes a trifling portion of the ancient nunnery; but by far the greater part of it was erected by the Cromwells in the reign of Elizabeth. The apartments are decorated with an extensive and very valuable collection of paintings by artists of great eminence in their profession, and they are all well worthy of an attentive examination. The great room in which Queen Elizabeth and her royal successor were entertained, still preserves its ancient character; it contains two or three models of ships of war, besides several old carved arm chairs, and other articles, probably of the time of the Cromwells. The park and grounds, though not very extensive, are highly ornamental, and contain several fish-ponds, that appear to have formerly belonged to the nunnery: bordering the road, on the south side, there is a raised terrace, between

HUNTINGDON, the principal town in this county, to which it gives name, is situated on gently rising ground, on the north side of the river Ouse, and is almost connected with Godmanchester, by three bridges and a causeway. Though most writers have placed Durolopite at Godmanchester, yet it is not likely that the Romans would have chosen so low a situation for the site of a fort, in direct opposition to their general system of military tactics, while the short distance of half a mile afforded them such a superior situation. Here was formerly a castle and four religious houses of different descriptions, but almost every vestige of them is now obliterated, and the town, which is said to have been at one time much larger than it is at present, but to have decayed in consequence of alterations made in the river that impeded its navigation, was at an early period possessed of 15 churches: two, however, now only remain, these are St. Mary's and All Saints, the former is the corporation church, and was re-erected in the early part of the 17th century; it has a handsome embattled tower at the west end, and contains several good monuments, as does also the latter, which is a more ancient embattled structure, with a small tower at the N. W. angle, ornamented with pinnacles: the town, notwithstanding, consists of four parishes, that of St. John being connected with All Saints, and that of St. Benedict with St. Mary's. Huntingdon consists chiefly of one street that extends from the banks of the Ouse, in a north-westerly direction, for nearly a mile, and has several lanes branching off from it at right angles; it is paved and lighted, and many of the houses, which are mostly of brick, are respectable buildings. This town being a principal thoroughfare to the north, has a good road-trade, and contains several large inns; it also possesses some manufactures, and is the only borough by prescription in the whole shire. Here are a few good charitable institutions, and a tolerably spacious market-place, with a good modern-built town-hall on its south side, which has a kind of piazza in front and at the sides for the use of the market people, besides butchers' shambles behind it: the assizes are held in the lower part of this building twice a year, and the upper part is disposed in a spacious assembly-room, which is very appropriately decorated. Near the site of the ancient castle, there is likewise an extensive and fertile meadow, called Portsholm, which and the mansion, several skulls and other bones have been at different times dug up. The opening into the court is by a stone entrance-gateway, consisting of a large pointed arch for the admission of carriages, and a smaller one on each side for foot passengers; this gateway is ornamented in the style of the time of Henry VII., and on both its faces there have since been placed two rude human figures, clothed in skins, and having enormous ragged staffs.—Near the above is The Views, John Maule, Esq.

COLCHESTER. This town is principally situated on the summit and northern aspect of a delightful eminence rising from the river Colne, which flows through the town, encompasses it on the north and east sides, and is navigable to a spot called The New Hythe, a long street, passing from east to west, that has been termed the Wapping of Colchester. The space enclosed by the remains of the ancient walls, forms a parallelogram, whose longest sides are towards the north and south, and the buildings on their outer side are very irregularly disposed. The remains of the castle occupy an elevated spot to the north of the High Street, and are very extensive; the vast thickness of the walls is sufficiently indicative of the former importance of this fortress: the grand circular staircase in the S. W. tower leads to a modern room now used as a subscription-library, from whence an arcade, also of modern workmanship, conducts to the ancient chapel, beneath which there is an arched vault used as a prison. The town and suburbs of Colchester comprehend 12 parishes, eight of them within the walls, but some of the churches are destroyed: the remainder, (a few of which will be found worthy of observation on account of their architectural and other ornaments, and the various monumental erections they contain,) with the ruins of St. John's Abbey, St. Botolph's Priory, and the Moot-hall, where the courts are held, and mented by contiguous scenery : the silver Trent rolls its pellucid waters in front of the building, and behind it some fine well-wooded hills rise in abrupt precipices. The park is small, but embraces within its pale much of this charming scenery, and is also well stocked with the antlered natives of the forest. The plantations and pleasure-grounds are, by comparison, more extensive than the park, they contain an elegantly constructed dog-kennel, and exhibit an excellent specimen of modern improvement engrafted on the ancient model.

This chaste and elegant mansion contains few relics of the antient abbey; its exterior exhibits the turrets, balustrades, and minute architectural embellishments that were usual in the early part of the 17th century, to which considerable additions have in recent times been made. The apartments are all elegantly decorated, of noble dimensions, and contain a valuable and extensive collection of paintings: but of these the library is by far the most superb; its ceiling is in the florid Gothic, and its chimney-piece in the same style; the whole fittings up, in panels, windows, &c., are, in short, an elegant modern imitation of that style of architecture. The park formerly constituted part of the extensive forest of Sherwood; it is about 8 m. in circumference, and powerfully excites the attention of the visitor in his approach to the house, as its wood-scenery possesses unspeakable grandeur, and many of the forest-trees, when individually considered, are not only of exquisite pictorial beauty, but likewise claim the attention of the naturalist on account

ANNESLEY. Annesley Hall, John Choworth, Esq.; 3 m. distant, at Papplewick, Papplewick Hall, — Wilson, Esq.; and Newstead Abbey. This seat, for a long time the property of the Byron family, but now belonging to Col. Wildman, claims particular attention on account of the many features it contains of the antient monastic structure. It was founded, as a priory of Black Canons, by Henry II., about the year 1170, and was granted, at the time of the dissolution, to Sir John Byron, who immediately fitted up part of the edifice, but allowed the church to fall to decay, though its south aisle was actually incorporated into the mansion, and at the present time contains some of the most habitable apartments. The front of the abbey church, together with some less important parts of the building, still remains: it is built in the form of the west end of a cathedral, is adorned with rich carvings and lofty pinnacles, and forms a very stately and picturesque ruin. The castellated stables and offices are described as the visitor enters the courtyard, in the midst of which is a curious erection of red stone, in the form of an antique cross: he has facing him the west end of the antient church, and the venerable front of the mansion, with its towers, battlements, and Gothic windows, and to the right some additional castellated buildings, that were originally intended for domestic offices, of their uncommon age and size. The plantations are numerous, extensive, and ornamental; and the grounds are further embellished with a charming lake of large dimensions, besides a magnificent riding-house and stables. — 2 m. beyond, Welbeck Abbey, Worksop Manor, Earl of Surrey.

WORKSOP consists principally of one long street, and another leading to Radford, both of which contain many good houses; it has also the advantage of a considerable trade by means of the Chesterfield canal, which runs close to the north end of the town, and near the little river Ryton. A monastery or priory was founded here in the time of Henry I.; but little now remains of it except the abbey-gate, which, though in a ruinous condition, is a very pleasing specimen of ancient architecture. The present church, deservedly the pride of the town, also belonged to the monastery, and originally formed the west end of the priory church; the two lofty towers of this noble monument of ancient ecclesiastical magnificence, make an impression on the beholder equal to those of Westminster Abbey; but the architectural style of the building, which was originally Saxon, has been greatly mixed with the Gothic on the outside. This church is in the form of a cathedral, and has an exceedingly grand west entrance: the most splendid specimen of antique architecture, however, stands at the S. E. corner; it is a dilapidated chapel, now used as a burying-place by the Froggatt family, and claims the particu-

which, though now in a more dilapidated state than the other parts of the house, yet assimilate well with it, particularly as being overshadowed by the darkening foliage of some lofty elms. The apartments are for the most part fitted up in the antique style; but all alike wear an air of romantic gloom and poetical solemnity. Among the deserted portions of the building is the room in which King Edward III. slept; it still bears his name, and contains a very ancient chimney, that, together with its venerable furniture and decorations, seems to be coeval with the royal visit, and excites the most pleasing emotions in the contemplative mind.

The interior of the body of the church has a very ancient appearance and is highly ornamented; and here, as well as in the church-yard, there are a number of monumental erections chiefly remarkable for their antiquity. Every individual capable of appreciating the beauties of antiquity will, on the whole, here find much to gratify his curiosity; and the solemnity of this venerable ruin, for such it is in part, is in some degree enhanced by being contrasted with the cheerful gaiety of Radford, where it is situated. DOWNHAM MARKET stands on the side of a hill to the east of the river Ouse, over which there is a good bridge; it is in part paved, and has a weekly market on Saturday, which is well supplied with fish and wild fowl, from the adjacent fens. Near the church there were formerly some monastic buildings, particularly a priory of Benedictine monks. This town was kept near the bridge every Monday, and several thousands of firkins were annually purchased during the spring and summer, by factors for London, where it obtained the name of Cambridge butter, from being sent by way of that town; but the article is now taken to Swaffham for sale.

MELTON MOWBRAY, very finely situated, is embosomed in a rich vale on the banks of the river Eye, over which there are two good bridges; the town, though small, is well built, has a market on Tuesday, and has latterly been much improved. The church is a large and handsome Gothic structure, in the form of a cross, whose tower "proves a grateful sight to many a returning sportsman, upon a beaten horse." Melton Mowbray is not a place of much trade, but derives considerable advantage from the expenditure of the gentlemen connected with the Melton hunt, our notice of which must of necessity be brief. The club actually consists of but four members, the present house furnishing sleeping

ing at Kirby Park, the hunting residence of Sir Francis Burdett, two miles from the town; and terminates the first or second week in April, with Croxton Park races; which derive their name from the park in which they are run, an old seat of the Duke of Rutland, distant from Melton Mowbray seven miles. The races afford an excellent day's diversion, and are fashionably and numerously attended. A plate is given by the Melton hunt, to be run for by farmers' horses, for the purpose of improving the breed. The packs of hounds attached to the Melton Hunt consist of three, viz. The Duke of Rutland's, the Quorndon, Mr. Osbaldestone's, and the Cottesmore, Earl of Lonsdale's, two out of the three meeting every day in the season within reach of Melton: the true lover of the sport, will, however, previous to quitting Leicestershire, most probably be induced to have a run with Lord Anson's, whose hunting establishment on the borders of this county, and style in which it is maintained, do honour to the spirit of that distinguished nobleman.

BOSTON TO LINCOLN, BY SWINESHEAD AND SLEAFORD.

LINCOLN. This city lays claim to a very remote antiquity, and has been greatly distinguished at various periods of history. The Romans had unquestionably an important station on this spot, and vestiges of their dignified sway have been discovered in many directions. In the pacific and more estimable annals of this place, we find that the city was often distinguished by royal visits and stately ceremonials. Henry II., who was first crowned at London, celebrated his coronation a second time in Lincoln; and Edward I. held a parliament here in the year 1301. The city of Lincoln is chiefly situated on the top and side of a lofty hill, whose base, towards the south, is laved by the river Witham. The general aspect of this venerable city excites a pensive remembrance of times long since passed, in which the place was visited by our kings of the Norman line, or their more gorgeous successors the Plantagenets, with throngs of attendant barons and knights. It has been truly remarked, that "few places in the kingdom exhibit so many ancient remains as Lincoln." The cathedral is scarcely secondary in extent and magnificence to any English edifice of a similar appropriation. This building was commenced in the year 1086, by the Anglo-Norman bishop Remigius; but the structure raised by that prelate and his immediate successor was destroyed by fire in the early part of the 12th century. The whole was, however, speedily re-edified, but was much enlarged and improved in subsequent ages, the part last erected being finished about the year 1380. The late Earl of Burlington, distinguished for a taste in architecture, supposed the west front of this cathedral to be superior to any thing of the kind in Europe. This city formerly contained not less than 50 churches, of which 11 only remain, exclusive of the cathedral. Few vestiges now exist of the castle built by William the Conqueror; but those which are still observable are curious examples of Norman architecture. The county hospital, established in 1769, and the Blue-coat school, for charitable education, are structures which reflect honor upon the benevolence and public spirit of the inhabitants in modern times. Lincoln is a city and county of itself; it carries on a considerable trade in corn and wool, contains various places of worship for dissenters, and has several charitable institutions, a neat theatre, assembly-rooms, &c. This city sends two members to parliament, has an excellent market on Friday, and gave birth to the late very eminent Dr. Willis, who was so particularly celebrated for his treatment of insane persons.

CLENCHWARTON, Margaretta Farn, Sir Charles Brown.

BOSTON, a place of considerable antiquity, is situated on the river Witham, over which there is a handsome iron bridge, erected in the year 1804; it formerly contained several religious houses, and is now the chief town in the Holland division of Lincolnshire for population and trade; the parish is about two miles long and one mile broad, and the town occupies about half that extent. Boston formerly ranked high as a commercial town, but owing to the navigation of the Witham being choaked with silt, or sea-sand, it lost almost the whole of its trade about sixty years ago: the cutting a new channel from the town to Dogdyke, an extent of twelve miles, has, however, again rendered the river navigable. The many improvements that have been made in this town and neighbourhood, under the direction of the late Mr. Rennie, have materially contri-

with embattled parapets, at its extreme angles; and within the church there are some fine monuments to the memory of the Irvy family, and the Littleburys, both of which formerly resided in the neighbourhood. Among the ancient foundations of this town may be specified an hospital, which was endowed and established by Sir John de Kirton, about the year 1351, and was intended to support a warden, chaplain, and 14 poor pensioners. A free grammar-school was likewise founded here by a licence from King Edward III., who granted certain lands for its support; and another free grammar-school was established here about the year 1669, by George Farmer, Esq., and the revenues for its support have been much increased by subsequent donations and bequests. In the market-place was also an ancient stone cross, supposed to have been raised about the year 1253, near which period Thomas de Malton, Lord Egremont, obtained the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair, the former of which is now held on Thursday. Holbeach has derived some eminence from two of its natives, one of whom was Henry de Rands, called from the place of his birth, Holbech; the other was Dr. William Stukely, whose name and memory are respected by every true lover of English antiquities; and whose literary disquisitions will be always considered curious, and therefore interesting, to a large class of readers.

but to the wealth and population of the place. The export trade is in corn, principally oats grown in the neighbourhood; and the import trade is chiefly coasting, and consists of coal from Sunderland and Newcastle; while the foreign trade is principally to the north of Europe, and consists of imports of deals, battens, hemp, iron, and various other articles. The most curious and beautiful object in Boston is the church, which is an elegant, spacious, and interesting pile of architecture, dedicated to St. Botolph, and supposed to be the largest religious edifice without cross-aisles in the kingdom: the tower is particularly beautiful; it is 281 feet high, is very similar to that of the great church at Antwerp, and may perhaps, without depreciating similar edifices, be pronounced the most elegant in England; the various ornaments of the interior are extremely grand, and the altar which is of oak, in the Corinthian order, is enriched by a copy of Rubens's celebrated picture, "The taking down from the Cross." Boston likewise contains meeting-houses belonging to different sects of dissenters; it has several excellent charitable institutions, a large theatre, a permanent library, and various reading societies. This town sends two members to parliament, has a good market on Wednesday and Saturday, is very respectable in appearance, well paved, watched, and lighted, and gave birth to the celebrated John Fox, the martyrologist.

BOSTON TO LYNN, THROUGH HOLBEACH AND WISBEACH, AVOIDING THE WASH.

WISBEACH, the most northern town in Cambridgeshire, and the second in importance, is so called from its situation on the banks of the river Ouse, or Wis, which flows through it, and falls into the sea at the distance of about eight miles. The castle was erected by John Thurloe, Esq., afterwards Secretary of State to the Protector, from the designs of Inigo Jones. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a spacious and handsome building, but of singular construction, being furnished with two naves and two aisles. The tower is extremely beautiful; it was erected in the 16th century, and not, as is generally believed, in the year 1111: this church contains several elegant monuments, and some epitaphs of peculiar beauty. Wisbeach has been much improved of late: a new custom-house has been erected, and the streets are well paved, lighted, and watched: it contains several meeting-houses, a literary society, theatre, free-school, and two charity schools. No manufacture is carried on here, but the trade of the town has greatly increased from the improved state of the drainage and navigation of the fens, and the consequent increase of the produce and consumption of the country: the chief articles of traffic are coal, corn, timber, and wine; the neighbouring lands are in high cultivation, mostly on the grazing system; and the surrounding country also produces immense quantities of wool, hemp, and flax. The market on Saturday is abundantly supplied; and the trade of the town is further promoted by six annual fairs, for hemp, flax, horned cattle, and horses; vast numbers of sheep and oxen, which grow to a large size, are also fattened here, and sent twice every week to the London market: a communication has likewise been opened with Norfolk, Suffolk, and the western counties by means of a canal that extends from Wisbeach river to the river Nene at Outwell, and thence to the river Ouse at Salter's Lodge Sluice, and which is of considerable advantage to the town.

SOUTHWELL was formerly a place of great importance, and though now much reduced in size, is still extremely interesting on account of its ancient and elegant collegiate church or minster; this building was founded early in the 7th century by Paulinus, archbishop of York, and was endowed with considerable wealth and power through the interest of various succeeding archbishops: in the time of the civil wars it suffered considerably by being sequestered, but was afterwards restored: it has not, however, even yet recovered the damage it received from Cromwell's troops, who converted it into a stable for their horses, destroyed the monuments, and ransacked the graves for lead and other valuables. The prebendal house is a handsome modern structure, and is occupied by the prebendaries in rotation. On the south side of the minster-yard, in what was formerly called the Little or New Park, the archbishops of York had at one time an elegant palace, in which they occasionally resided: it is now in ruins, but being richly mantled with ivy, and embosomed in trees, still contributes greatly to the romantic beauty of the town. The church is an august and venerable fabric of the cruciform description, which will be viewed with additional pleasure, from the circumstances of its great antiquity and excellent preservation; the interior bears a strong resemblance to Rochester cathedral, and the whole of its splendid decorations deserve the most minute attention. The chapter-house is a beautiful specimen of the pointed style of architecture; its exterior, like that of the chapter-house at York, is not very highly ornamented, but all the internal arrangements are of a character truly magnificent. Southwell was the scene of several important transactions during the calamitous civil wars of the 17th century; here it was that the unhappy monarch performed the fatal act of surrendering himself to the Scotch commissioners, The apartment in

SLEAFORD is seated on a small rivulet called the Slea, which rises near the town, and runs to Chapel Hill, where it joins the river Witham. The church, a spacious and elegant fabric, appears to have been erected towards the latter end of the 13th century; it has a tower, surmounted by a spire which rises to the height of 144 feet, and the design and ornaments of the western front are curious, and rather beautiful than otherwise: this front has three entrance doorways, and each of them have a differently shaped arch; over these are three windows, also varying from each other, and the circular style is likewise displayed in part of the façade. The windows, pinnacles, and ornaments, are all greatly diversified, and some of them particularly elegant. In the chancel there are several monuments commemorating different individuals of the Carr family; by one of whom a free-school was erected and liberally endowed in 1603, and likewise an hospital for 12 poor men. This far-famed and very interesting mansion stands in a fine park, well stocked with majestic timber; it is of stone, with a lofty tower at each corner, and a spacious court in front, surrounded by a high wall. The building was erected in the latter part of the 16th century, and forms an excellent specimen of those houses which have so frequently been termed Elizabethan: the apartments are lofty and of vast size, but defective in point of elegance of proportions; many of them are hung with arras, and the majority of the chimneys are sufficiently capacious for a hall or kitchen: the great gallery, chiefly remarkable for its extent, ranges along the whole of the east front, and is 195 feet long. In this mansion the beautiful Mary Queen of Scots passed several years of her captivity, and many of the apartments derive great interest from the furniture and other articles preserved in remembrance of that injured princess; those which the king dined that day is still nearly in its original state; it is on the left hand of the gateway of the Saracen's Head Inn, at the upper part of the church-yard; the removal of the sign some time since discovered the old one of the King's Arms, cut in stone, but which, it is extremely likely, being out of fashion in the days of republicanism, had been covered by that now in existence. Southwell cannot be said to possess any trade; but its market on Saturday is one of the best in the county.

This venerable seat is enriched with a valuable collection of paintings, one of which is a portrait of the above Queen, taken in the tenth year of her imprisonment; she is attired in black, her cheek is faded, her lips are thin, her eyes hollow, and the picture appears to represent the spectre of herself, the shadow of beauty!

BARROWBY TURNPIKE, $\frac{3}{4}$ m. distant, Belvoir Castle, Duke of Rutland. Camden says, "It stands upon the top of a very lofty hill, which seems the work of art, containing from the foot to the top about 200 steps; yielding every way a most delicious and pleasing prospect, being accounted one of the best prospects in the land. I have often viewed this castle from the place where I dwell at Falde, near Tutbury, in the county of Stafford, with the help of a perspective glass, the distance of 32 miles." Situated upon an isolated hill, Belvoir Castle is consequently visible for many miles round; from the rooms may be seen Lincoln Cathedral, at 25 miles distance, perfectly clear; Newark, at 13 miles distance, appears in the centre of the valley; Nottingham, 15 miles distant, is easily discerned; Southwell Minster, at 19 miles distance, is also visible hence, and Mr. Peck among a number of other places names Tuxford, 24 miles distant, as included in the view; but the grand prospect of all, is that which the Duke of Rutland sees from the house; viz. two and twenty manors of his own paternal inheritance; the Duke has also, in this neighbourhood alone, the patronage of almost as many churches, and a landed property of more than 20,000*l.* a year. The Castle was founded by Robert de Todeni, standard-bearer to William the Conqueror; the express purpose of the foundation was to bridle the Saxons; but whether it was a place of any note prior to the conquest is uncertain; the silence of doomsday makes it probable it was not. It is situated upon the confines of Lincolnshire at the termination of a branch of the Leicestershire wolds, extending into the vale of Belvoir to the north, and not only in-

DONINGTON, a small town that has a weekly market on Saturday, is celebrated for the sale of hemp and hemp-seed; it contains a free-school that was erected and endowed in the year 1718. In digging behind the school-house for foundations, a vault was discovered four feet square, built of hewn stone, and containing an urn filled with red earth; and amid the ruins of some ancient buildings a few glazed earthen vessels were found, specimens, it is supposed, of ancient pottery made at Bolingbroke.

COLD HARBOUR. Belton House, Earl Brownlow. This stone mansion stands on a fine lawn, in a richly wooded valley, through which the river Witham pursues its serpentine course; it was erected towards the conclusion of the 17th century, after the design, as it is supposed, of Sir Christopher Wren, and presents four uniform elevations, without any architectural ornaments. The ground-plan of this building, like that of many other houses of the same period, assimilates in form to the letter H, which, though discountenanced by modern architects, certainly possesses very considerable advantages in point of utility and convenience: the apartments are numerous, spacious, and well proportioned, several of them are adorned with excellent carved work by Gibbons, and the chapel is wainscoted with cedar. Some considerable improvements were made to the building in the year 1776 by the celebrated James Wyatt, Esq., under the superintendance of cludes the vale; but reaches over a rich and amazingly extensive country; which from the elevation of the Castle, appears in the several views a dead flat. This noble mansion surrounds a quadrangular court, and has a grand castellated appearance, greatly resembling Windsor both in situation and aspect; the east front is 252 feet long, with balconies over rustic arches at each end; it is adorned with some tapestry, is not celebrated for china, but for plate, in richness and elegance of workmanship, as a collection, it stands perhaps unrivalled. Belvoir Castle contains one of the best collections of paintings in this kingdom, whether considered as regards the variety of schools which are here brought together in one view, or in the judicious choice of the works of each master. The present chapel has neat Gothic windows, and bears the appearance of antiquity; it is floored with marble, wainscoted with cedar, and the ceiling adorned with emblematical paintings of the resurrection and last judgment. The ancient gardens are in a style well suited to the magnificence and extent of the castle, and consist principally of majestic rows of the taller kinds of trees on the declivity of the hills, with spacious walks between them; below are the deeply shaded plantations of yew and fir, and these bounded by more promiscuous clumps and younger wood, which connect the garden with the neighbouring grounds: shrubs and flowers would not harmonize with scenes of this sort, and are only found in a few places, scattered as it were by the hand of nature. Plantations have latterly been made on all the neighbouring hills; and water, so long a desideratum at Belvoir, has at length been obtained by the formation of two reservoirs, which greatly contribute to the beauty of the grounds; and the numerous improvements that have here taken place, may justly entitle it to be considered the most princely residence and best estate in the county of Leicester. It may not be improper to remark, that the distances of the several places herein named as visible from the rooms of Belvoir Castle, are not calculated by the road, which would add greatly to their increase; but are given in right lines; and these are all measured from the several points, as laid down in the trigonometrical survey of the county of Lincoln, &c. recently published.

the late Lord Brownlow, at which time a new entrance was added to the south front. The library is furnished with a choice and very valuable collection of literature, and the rooms are decorated with numerous family portraits and other paintings, many of them by the most eminent Flemish and Italian masters. The founder of this noble fabric obtained a licence from King William and Queen Mary in 1690, to empark his lands in Belton, Londouthorpe and Telthorpe, which he enclosed with a wall five miles in circumference, and adorned with numerous plantations: these are now become noble timber, and constitute one of the greatest ornaments of the place: five years afterwards the same gentleman had the high honour of here entertaining his Sovereign, when on his progress through the northern counties. The gardens were first formed by Sir John Brownlow, K. B., who was created Viscount Tyrconnel in 1718; by this nobleman they were magnificently arranged according to the then prevailing taste of formality; but they have since been modernized, and laid out in a style more consistent with rural scenery. — Not far distant from the above is Syston Park, Sir John Hayford Thorold, Bart.

The church is a handsome building; it had formerly two large square towers at the west end, one of which is nearly down; its interior exhibits a specimen of the early Norman style. FINESHADE, beyond, Laxton Hall, George Freke Evans, Esq.

BULWICK. Bulwick Hall, —; and 1½ m. beyond Bulwick, Deene Park, the seat of the Earl of Cardigan, many of whose ancestors, the Brudenels, have handsome monuments erected to their memories in the neighbouring church. The mansion stands on an eminence at the extremity of the park, and commands a most delightful prospect; it is a low embattled structure with wings, each of them being terminated by a turret; but the apartments are spacious and lofty, more especially the hall, which has a fine timber roof and reaches to the top of the building: its walls are adorned with numerous family portraits, and the windows are emblazoned with the arms of Brudenel and Montague. Here is a small but neat chapel and an excellent library; the latter contains, besides a valuable collection of literature, a number of manuscripts, chiefly relating to the topography of this county, that were collected by the first Lord Brudenel, from records preserved in the Tower, while he was confined there for his loyal attachment to the unfortunate Charles I. The principal apartments exhibit many curious specimens of ancient arrangement, and are decorated with portraits and other paintings of considerable interest. There is a spacious lawn in front of the house, bounded by noble woods, which are relieved on one side by a fine sheet of water, having an island in the centre: the pleasure-grounds are situated on the other side: they are ornamented with plantations, which are interspersed with temples and porticoes; and the park, which is large and well stocked with deer, is beautifully diversified with swelling lawns, and enriched with all the various beauties that wood and water can possibly contribute. — Adjoining the grounds of Deene Park, is Kirby Hall, the ancient seat of the Hatton family, in the occupation of D. Webster, Esq.

COLNE is desirably situated on a dry and elevated ridge, and its inhabitants are chiefly employed in the cotton and woollen manufacture, which have been considerably benefited by the passage of the Leeds canal within a mile of the town. Some authors insist that this was formerly a Roman station, but the last learned and indefatigable editor of the Britannia says, that Colne has no other marks of a Roman station than what have arisen from the discovery of some Roman copper and silver coins, which have at different periods been found here. BRAINTREE, a large straggling town, occupying an elevated situation in an opulent neighbourhood, contains a spacious church, dedicated to St. Michael, which stands on a high spot of ground to the south of the town, and has a lofty spire rising from a tower at the west end, cased with shingle; the body of the edifice is mostly flint. The streets have latterly been much improved, and the town, which abounds with dissenters of various denominations, possesses several charitable institutions of a character highly creditable to the liberality of the inhabitants. The bay and say manufacture, introduced into this town by the Flemings in the reign of Elizabeth, is still carried on here, though not to so great an extent as formerly. The weekly market on Wednesday is well-attended, as is also the annual fair in October, which is remarkable for its excellent supply of hops, cheese, butter, beasts, &c.	24 $\frac{1}{2}$	From * BRAINTREE , Essex, to		CHIPPING HILL, 2 m. distant, Terling Place, Colonel Strutt.

In the church, among other monuments, there is a large tomb to the memory of Judge Heathcote and his lady. Witham has a weekly market on Tuesday, and the chief trade of the town arises from the passage of travellers and carriers. PONTNEATH VAUGHAN. Near this place, amidst a number of natural curiosities, all extremely interesting, is situated Porth Ogor , or the mouth of the cave. This is a cavern of extraordinary dimensions, through which the river Mellte pursues its subterraneous course for 8 or 9 hundred yards, and in its passage is precipitated from a considerable height into a deep pool. When the water is low, the cavern may be entered with safety, and with the aid of torches, explored to a considerable extent; the roof is ornamented with stalactites, and calcareous concretions, which, together with the roaring of the waters, and the general gloom of the abyss, forms a spectacle of a most sublime and awful character.	27 $\frac{1}{2}$	* BRECON,		PONTNEATH VAUGHAN. As there are in this neighbourhood so great a number of objects worthy the inspection of the traveller, it may be proper to observe, that the best plan for him to pursue, will be to take up his quarters at this village, where he may easily procure a guide to accompany him to them all. Without this assistance he will probably miss some of the most interesting; it may also be proper to add (the limits of this work not admitting a description of the several curiosities) their separate names, which will at least put the traveller in possession of subject matter for enquiry, and enable him, according to his inclination or engagements, to pursue his researches at pleasure: they consist of the water-fall of Ysgwd Eionn Gam, the rock of Craig y Ddinas, the waterfall of Cil Hepste, and the cave of Porth Ogor; a visit to any of which will amply gratify the curiosity of the enlightened tourist.

BRENTWOOD being a considerable thoroughfare, contains a number of inns and public houses, but the buildings are in general irregular and mean. The assizes were at one time held here, and in the High-street are the remains of a town-hall and prison: the chapel was founded about the year 1221, at the intercession of David, prior of St. Osyth; it is a small structure, consisting only of a body and chancel. Here is also a good grammar-school, a weekly market on Thursday, but scarcely ever observed, and a manufactory of silk rugs, of extraordinary beauty and durability, that was established by Mr. Webb. The Casarmagus of the Itinerary was supposed by Camden to have been somewhere in this neighbourhood, but his opinion is not supported by other antiquaries. Salmon mentions, however, some patere, and other earthen vessels, that were found on a military way leading from Billerica towards Ongar; and also two Roman lares dug up near Shenfield. At South Weald, on the S. W. verge of Weald Hall Park, there are likewise traces of a circular camp, single ditched, including about seven acres, which is supposed to have been a Castra Exploratorium.

BRIDGENORTH TO BRECON, BY CLEOBURY MORTIMER, TENBURY, LEOMINSTER, AND HAY.

From Brecon		From Bridgen.
WHITNEY. Whitney Court, Tomkyns Dew, Esq. CLIFFORD. Here are the ruins of a castle, which gave name to the Lords Clifford, afterwards Earls of Cumberland. HAY. The Castle, Henry Wellington, Esq. HAY, pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence on the southern bank of the Wye, consists principally of one street running in the direction of the river, with a short cross-street near the eastern end; just beyond which it is divided from the county of Hereford by the little river Dulais, which here discharges its waters into the Wye. The houses are generally of the inferior class; but a few of a better description occasionally occur, that indicate the presence of some more opulent inhabitants. Hay is a borough by prescription, but possesses at present no privileges. The bailiff or chief magistrate, whose official duties are now restricted to receiving the tolls at the fairs and markets, is annually appointed by the lord of the manor, to whom they belong, and who holds a court-leet here annually. The parish-church, dedicated to St. Mary, is most delightfully situated on a precipitous bank of the Wye, on a bold reach of that noble river, and commanding an extensive prospect down the vale. There is some appearance of its having been once separated from the town by a deep ditch, through which the waters of the Wye may have flowed. The church is small, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a tower at the west end, and contains no object of curiosity, excepting the silver chalice used in the administration of the sacrament, which bears the following inscription, "Our Ladie Paris of the Haia," and is of ancient date. The river Wye is crossed near the eastern extremity of the town by a long bridge, constructed partly of stone and partly of wood. It appears, however, only to be a temporary erection; its predecessor, a handsome stone bridge of seven arches, having been destroyed in the year 1795, by a flood. The walls that formerly surrounded the town may yet be seen in some places, and a part only of the castle stands upon an eminence in the town. A dwelling house has been built out of the remains; but a Gothic gateway has been preserved, which	· Cross the  river Teme * TENBURY, Worcestershire  { to Worcester 20 m. to Bromyard 11 m. 42½ Layster's Pole, Hereford. 39½ Kimbolton 38½ Stockton Cross To Ludlow 9 m.  Cross the  river Lugg * LEOMINSTER To Ludlow 10½ m.   { to Hereford 13 m. to Bromyard 11½ m. 1 m. beyond Leominster, To Presteign 13 m.  Near Monkland, Cross the  river Arrow 34½ Monkland 32½ Junction of the Roads To Kington 9 m.   to Hereford 12½ m. 30½ Dilwyn 28½ White Hill Turn  pike  { to Weobly, ¾ m., thence to Hereford 11 m. Bridgenorth to WEOBLY 39½ m. 27 Sarnesfield ¼ m. farther,  to Hereford 12 m. To Kington 7 m.  25 Kinnersley 22½ Cross To Kington 5½ m.   to Hereford 13½ m.  to Willersley, Turn  pike 22½ Forward to Hereford 19½ m. To Winforton  21½ Whitney 19½ ½ m. farther, Cross the  river Wye 17½ Clifford 15½ * HAY, Brecknockshire * BRECON, page 147	LEOMINSTER, 2 m. distant, Eytton Hall, Edward Evans, Esq. MONKLAND, 2 m. beyond, Burton Court, The Misses Evans. DILWYN. This place has been on the decline since the time of Owen Glendower, who committed great devastations in this neighbourhood; it appears also, from the various antiquities found here, to have been of some consequence in the time of the Romans, and to have experienced its share of martial vicissitudes in the contentious struggles between the native princes and the crown of England. The situation of Hay on the borders of the two counties, and in a rich agricultural district, seems to afford it considerable advantages as a mart for inland commerce. At present there is but one market here in the week, which is on Thursday, though formerly it had the right of holding another on Monday. It has five fairs in the course of the year, all of which are well attended, and afford opportunities for the sale of considerable numbers of cattle and horses.

BRIDGENORTH TO BRECON, BY CLEOBURY MORTIMER, TENBURY, KINGTON, AND HAY, WITH BRANCHES TO PRESTEIGN AND NEW RADNOR.

BRECKNOCK. This place is delightfully situated at the confluence of the Honddu, a wild and rapid rivulet, with the Usk, which, with this accession of waters, becomes here a majestic stream, and it is from this junction of the two rivers that the British name of Aber-honddu, by which the town is known to every Welshman, is derived. Sir Richard Hoare has justly observed, that "few towns surpass Brecknock in picturesque beauties: the different mills and bridges on the rivers Usk and Honddu, the ivy-mantled walls and towers of the old castle, the massive embattled turret and gateway of the priory, with its luxuriant groves, added to the magnificent range of mountain scenery on the southern side of the town, form, in many points of view, the most beautiful, rich, and varied outline imaginable." The town itself, however, though possessed of all these advantages of natural situation, is very irregularly built. There are a few tolerably good streets, and several handsome private houses, occupied by very respectable and opulent families. The public walks hold a principal rank among the accommodations and attractions of the place. One lies along the shore of the Usk, under the old town wall, and commands a fine view to the southward of that river; the other is of a more sequestered character, being laid out with great taste through the priory woods, which overhang the Honddu, and add greatly to its romantic beauties. The entire length of the town, including the suburb of Llanvaes, has been estimated at one mile, and its greatest breadth at about 1200 feet. Brecknock possesses the ruins of a noble castle, which stand on a hill to the east, commanding the whole town; they consist of some remains of the keep, and Ely tower, so named from Dr. Morton, bishop of Ely, who was confined here by order of Richard III., and committed to the custody of Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who some time before procured the crown for Richard, but the Duke being disappointed in his expectations of reward from the king, in concert with the bishop, his prisoner, planned, within the walls of this castle, the famous union of the two houses of York and Lancaster, which afterwards brought Henry VII. to the throne of England. Near the castle, on a delightful eminence above the western bank of the Honddu, once stood the priory, of which almost the only vestige now remaining is a portion of the wall that surrounded the premises. Brecknock is a borough town, and sends one member to parliament. The charter, under which the corporation now exists, was granted in the second and third of William and Mary. By this it is provided that the borough shall be governed by a bailiff, aldermen, common-council-men, and other officers usual in corporate bodies. Hats and some inferior cloth are the chief articles manufactured here; but the new canal has given fresh life and vigour to its trade by opening new markets, and yielding increased facilities for the transportation of merchandise. The town contains three parishes: St. John the Evangelist, and St. Mary; and St. David's on the opposite side of the Usk, which is here crossed by a long narrow bridge. The church of St. John the Evangelist occupies a part of the same eminence as the castle, and once belonged to the priory. The present edifice owes its erection to Bernard Newmarch; but it is conjectured, from the Saxon font and some other architectural relics of the same character, which are still preserved here, that it might only have been rebuilt on the site of another church, which had grown to decay. Viewed from some distance, this edifice exhibits rather a striking and venerable appearance; but, on nearer approach, the eye is offended by the tasteless labour of successive repairers, who have miserably deformed its exterior aspect, and rendered it almost impossible to trace the style of its original architecture. Nearly in the centre of the town stands the church or chapel of St. Mary; for the ecclesiastical authorities have not been able to decide by which title it ought to be designated. The period of its erection has been assigned to the latter end of the 12th or the beginning of the 13th century, but the data are not sufficiently explicit and authenticated to determine this point satisfactorily. The present edifice is probably of later date. STOURBRIDGE is a large and populous town, situated on the river Stour, over which there is a good stone bridge; it has a well-attended market on Friday and Saturday, and several manufactories of hardware, &c., but the chief production of the town is glass, which is here made and cut with extreme elegance, and may be truly said to vie with the finest similar productions of all other nations. The church is a handsome brick building, standing at the west end of the town: here are also several meeting-houses, and an excellent free-school, founded by Edward VI., containing a well-chosen and rather extensive library. LEWES. This town stands on the border of the South Downs. Its situation on a declivity washed by the Ouse, surrounded by an amphitheatre of higher hills, is more than commonly beautiful, and highly favourable to commerce. It is a borough by prescription, having returned two members to parliament ever since the 23d of Edward I.: the right of election is vested in the inhabitants paying scot and lot. That Lewes is a place of high antiquity, the numerous relics discovered in the town and neighbourhood, as well as its architectural remains, sufficiently attest. The great gate-way of the castle, said to have been built by the Earl of Surrey in the reign of William the Conqueror, is still entire; many vestiges of the walls, &c. also remain, sufficient to justify the idea of its having been a fortress of considerable strength and magnitude. Some small remains of an ancient religious establishment of a very extensive nature are also visible. Before the Reformation, this town, including the suburbs of Southover and Cliffe, comprehended twelve parish churches, which have since been reduced to half the number. There are, however, besides these, several religious edifices for dissenters. Among the public buildings to be found in Lewes, the shire-hall claims pre-eminence. This building is situated in the high street, and is planned with equal attention to elegance and convenience; here the summer assizes for the county, and the quarter sessions for its eastern division, are regularly held. The house of correction, built about 1794, on the plan recommended by Howard, contains thirty-two cells, a chapel, and other accommodations for the prisoners, besides the apartments of the keeper. Here is also a free grammar-school, established in 1512, a neat theatre, and assembly-rooms at the Star Inn. A library society was established here in 1786; from a small beginning it has gradually acquired a considerable degree of importance, and now possesses an excellent collection of books. The meetings of the Sussex Agricultural Society, instituted in 1796, are held at Lewes. The show of cattle for the premiums offered by this society, generally takes place in the beginning of August, and is numerously attended by the gentlemen and farmers of this and the neighbouring counties. The market is daily supplied with necessaries for the table, but Tuesday and Saturday are the market-days for corn; and every other Tuesday for cattle also. There are two fairs for black cattle, and one for sheep annually; this last is very extensive, not less than eighty thousand sheep being generally drawn together on the occasion. The air of Lewes is considered very salubrious: the town, from its declivity of site, is remarkably clean; the streets are in general spacious, well lighted, and watched. The river Ouse, which runs through the town under a handsome bridge, is navigable for barges to the distance of six miles up the country, and affords a ready communication with the harbour of Newhaven at its mouth. The increase of its trade of late years, has been proportionate to that of its population: and two respectable banks facilitate the transaction of business. On a hill about a mile from the town is the race-course, accounted one of the best in England; and a commodious stand, commanding a view of nearly the whole course, was erected by subscription in 1772. The races, usually held in the first week in August, continue three days, on the first of which the king's plate of 100 guineas is run for. This hill was the scene of an obstinate battle fought on the 14th of May, 1264, between Henry III. and the army of the barons under Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester.

BRIGHTON TO MARGATE, BY LEWES, CRANBROOK, SMARDEN, AND CANTERBURY.

BLACK BOY, 2 m. distant, Framfield Park, Alexander Donovan, Esq.

CANTERBURY, a city, and the metropolitan see of all England, is situated in a pleasant valley, between hills of a moderate height, and easy ascent, among which are several springs. The river Stour passes here, and dividing into several small streams, forms islands of various sizes, in one of which the western part of the city stands. It was the Durovernum of the Romans; and the Britons called it Caer Kent, that is, the city of Kent. It is mentioned as a city in the Itinerary of Antoninus, and its ancient importance appears from the strong military causeways leading to Dover and Lympne through the city, as well as the many Roman vestiges and coins found in and about the neighbourhood; and its archiepiscopal and metropolitan dignity seems also to have been settled very early. This city was given entirely to the bishops by William Rufus; and it was held in particular veneration after the murder of Becket, in the reign of Henry II.; to whose shrine so great were the offerings, that Erasmus says, the whole church and chapel in which he was interred glittered with jewels. The cathedral has been several times destroyed by fire; the present structure was built about the year 1174, but not entirely completed till the reign of Henry V.: kings, princes, cardinals, and bishops, are buried in it. During the great rebellion it suffered much; Cromwell made a stable of it for his dragoons, but after the Restoration it was repaired. The body of the church measures 178 feet from the western door to the choir steps, the breadth, including the aisles, 71 feet, and the vaulted roof in height 80 feet. It was new paved with Portland stone, in 1788. The choir is the most spacious of any in the kingdom, being 180 feet in length from the western door to the altar. The altar-piece was designed by Sir James Burrough, master of Caius Colledge, Cambridge; and the great stained window is the most beautiful of the kind in England. In 1784, an elegant organ was put up, built in the Gothic style. Behind the altar is the beautiful chapel of the Holy Trinity, in the middle of which stood the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket; part of the flat is curiously inlaid with mosaic work, and contains the episcopal chair, composed of 3 pieces of grey marble. In the mint yard, within the precincts of this church, is a public grammar-school, founded by Henry VIII. Christ's-church gate is an elegant structure, built in 1517. From this gate you have a view of Oxford steeple, a tower 130 feet high, with 4 handsome pinnacles; and that stately tower called Bell Harry steeple, being

MARGATE. This extremely fashionable and well frequented bathing place has risen into importance within these last sixty years, prior to which it was only a small fishing village: it is a large town, built on irregular ground; one part of it being considerably elevated, while the other part is situate in a bottom descending to the sea. The general recommendation given by medical men to sea-air and sea-bathing, and the fashion which so extensively spread among all ranks during the latter part of the last century, of spending some portion of the year at a watering-place, have been the grand causes of the extension and progressive improvement of this town. The houses are principally of brick, and many of them large and handsome edifices: at the south corner of Cecil Square stand the assembly-rooms, which form a handsome building of the Ionic order, with Venetian windows, entablature, and cornice, comprising a good billiard and coffee-room, several dining-parlours, with tea and card-rooms, and a handsome ball-room, measuring eighty-seven feet in length, and forty-three in breadth. The bathing rooms are situated on the western side of the High Street, near the harbour, and the bathing-place is a fine level sandy shore, which extends under the cliffs for several miles, and at proper times of the tide forms a pleasant walk. The most fashionable promenade is the Pier, which being finished by a parapet breast high, is perfectly safe, and is the general resort of the company both before and after bathing. On one part of the pier is a marble tablet, with an inscription recording the memorable occurrence of the preservation of the York East India-man, during a tremendous gale. But Margate has latterly experienced a considerable improvement, in the erection of an extensive and very commodious Jetty, upon which persons are landed from the packets at any time of the tide, without the assistance of a boat. The church is a spacious edifice, standing on an elevated spot, on the south-east side of the town; it consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with a square tower at the north-west angle, and contains numerous monuments, many of which are of considerable antiquity. A general sea-bathing infirmary has been established here, by means of which the poor may participate in the advantages of sea-bathing. On the high ground above the town to the north, is 235 feet high; on its top hangs a small bell, called Bell Harry, which is rung every day for prayers, but never tolled, except on the death of a king, queen or archbishop. The four principal streets are disposed in the form of a cross, and divided into six wards. It is called the city, and county of the city of Canterbury, and is governed by a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, 24 common councilmen, with a sheriff and coroner, and four sergeants at mace. It has sent members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward the First. Great improvements have been made here lately, and the city is now well paved, lighted and watched. A slip of land, called Dungehill, of about six acres, having an artificial mount, is now converted into a promenade; the sides are adorned with spiral walks to the top, the old towers with shrubberies, and the old ramparts are also converted into a beautiful terrace. The Guildhall, in High Street, is a handsome and lofty building, adorned with portraits of the city benefactors. Over the Canterbury bank are some large and elegant assembly rooms. Its manufactures are of worsted, silk, and cotton; the latter furnishes employment for several hundred persons, in the fabrication of what is called Canterbury muslins. The city is surrounded on all sides with extensive hop-grounds, and is famed for its excellent brawn. The Archbishop of Canterbury is primate and metropolitan of all England, and is the first peer of the realm; and wherever the court may be, the king and queen are his proper domestic parishioners.

a battery of three guns; from this spot the views are extensive and beautiful. Margate has two weekly markets, which are well supplied, a spacious and handsome theatre, libraries, hotels, lodging-houses, &c. with every other accommodation calculated for the convenience and amusement of its numerous visitors. In proof of the latter assertion, it may be observed, that horse-races are now annually run at Margate; these generally last three days, are conducted by and are under the direction of stewards regularly appointed and chosen from among the principal gentry in the vicinity, and occasionally the county members, who not unfrequently officiate in that capacity. It is much frequented by the inhabitants of the metropolis, owing to the facility afforded by the river Thames, of a safe and pleasant conveyance by water. The sailing packets are conveniently fitted up, but the recent introduction of steam-yachts has nearly superseded them; indeed these elegant and commodious vessels afford every variety of accommodation and amusement; and their performance of the voyage nearly within a certain time, gives them a decided superiority over vessels which must necessarily be delayed by contrary winds or tide: the steam-vessels usually effect the passage in from six to nine hours, according to circumstances. The season begins on the 4th of June, and terminates with the last ball-night in October.

One of the greatest improvements that Brighton has lately received, consists of a magnificent suspension chain-pier, which cost 30,000*l.*; it was erected under the superintendance of Capt. Browne, and opened to the public in the summer of 1823, since which it has become a very fashionable lounge. It is founded on four clusters of piers, has a neat iron railing on each side, is supported by eight chains, the end ones being made fast to the cliff, and is approached from the Steyne by an esplanade of considerable length. On each side of the pier are three cast iron buttresses, or towers, fitted up as shops for the sale of trifling articles, and at the end is a platform, furnished with seats for the accommodation of the company, who can sit there and enjoy the refreshing and salutary sea-breezes, with peculiar pleasure; a band of music stationed in its centre adding to their amusement. The Steyne, an agreeable lawn, dividing the old from the modern town, is the favourite promenade for the visitors of Brighton every evening during the season. A new source of recreation, and a most agreeable place of amusement, has recently been prepared for the patrons of this delightful watering place, by Mr. Ireland, who has expended a vast sum of money in converting a barren piece of ground into gardens that are tastefully laid out with a variety of walks, and ornamented with several judiciously disposed buildings. These gardens include about 12 acres, are surrounded by a high brick wall, and contain a bowling green, racket court, cricket ground, maze, &c. besides billiard and ball rooms; they were opened for the reception of company in the summer of 1824, and have received a due portion of that patronage which a liberal public always confers on the talent and exertion of individuals. Another place of amusement, somewhat after the manner of Vauxhall Gardens, in London, from which its name is derived, is likewise in a state of active preparation, and great forwardness, at Brighton. This town possesses places of religious worship belonging to different sects of dissenters, but, till lately, had only one church, which stands on rising ground at a short distance to the north-west of the town, and is a small neat edifice, containing little deserving of notice; but in the church-yard, which commands some delightful prospects, are several monuments to the memory of well-known and somewhat celebrated individuals. A new church has, however, been recently built in the angle of the road at the entrance of the town, which forms an agreeable object, and was much wanted, as previous to its erection but few of the inhabitants belonging to the established religion could attend public worship, the old church being totally inadequate to their accommodation. About half a mile west of the old church is a chalybeate spring that has of late years been much frequented; its waters are very strongly impregnated with iron, and considered beneficial in all those diseases where tonic remedies are required. The race-ground, about one mile from the town, furnishes a very pleasant airy ride or walk, and from the stand on it, which is capable of containing a considerable number of spectators, the Isle of Wight, and many other beautiful objects, may be distinctly seen; and among the various delightful rides in the neighbourhood, none excel in interest the road to the Devil's Dyke, which is by an ascent of nearly five miles to the north-west, and chiefly over the finest turf: the Dyke itself is well worthy of observation, but will probably not long detain the attention of the visitor, as, from the summit of Dyke Hill, Nature, in her grandest form, lies before him, and he may here survey great part of Sussex, with portions of Hampshire, Surrey, and Kent, the whole interspersed with woods and villages, highly cultivated fields, and distant hills. A constant communication is kept up with the French coast, by means of steam packets, which ply regularly between this place and Dieppe; and it may also be well to observe that there is a regular mail, daily, from hence to Arundel, Chichester, Portsmouth, Southampton, Salisbury, Bath, and Bristol, and stages to East Bourne, Hastings, Dover, Deal, Ramsgate, and Margate.

CROWBOROUGH BEACON. The road, from about a mile beyond Uckfield, (where you quit the London road) to Tunbridge Wells, is very bad; being wholly composed of a deep loose sand; for this inconvenience, however, the traveller is in some degree compensated by the view obtained from Crowborough Beacon. From the summit of this lofty eminence, which is 804 feet perpendicular height above the level of the sea, a most extensive and beautiful prospect presents itself: hence the eye ranges to the north-west over the whole of Ashdown forest, which lies as it were at the feet of the spectator, and thence stretching over a considerable tract of country, the view is terminated by Leith Hill Tower , at the distance of 25 miles; to the north the scene is bounded by Botley Hill in Surrey, with its continued ridge, and the range of hills that extends from near Limpfield in Surrey, to Sevenoaks in Kent; to the south-west, Ditchling Beacon , near Lewes , and the Sussex Downs , terminate the view; which, to the south-east unfolds the extensive plain lying between this place and Pevensay ; stretching still further eastward to Brightling Down in the immediate neighbourhood of Rose Hill Park , the beautiful seat of John Fuller, Esq. , the landscape is terminated by the range of hills that extend in that direction to Fairlight Downs , near Hastings ; in this latter view the tower in Heathfield Park , the elegant domain of Sir Charles Blunt, Bart. , stands boldly conspicuous in the foreground.	45 $\frac{1}{4}$		TUNBRIDGE, 1 m. distant, Postern Park, J. 	33 $\frac{1}{2}$		CHATHAM. This town is situated on the river Medway , and is joined to the city of Rochester , to which it is a suburb. It was built by king Charles II. after the Dutch war; but the dock was began by Queen Elizabeth , and has been so much improved, that it is now one of the first arsenals in the world. The houses of the various offices are well built, and some of them even stately. The dock-yard, including the ordnance wharf, is about 1 m. in length, and some of the store-rooms are nearly 700 feet long. Although the stores of the navy are immense in these magazines, every thing is arranged in the greatest order. Here, during the late war, were upwards of 20 smiths' forges constantly at work, and some of the anchors made weigh near fourteen tons. The new rope house is 1140 feet in length, in which cables are made 120 fathoms long, and 22 inches round. In the yard are four docks for repairing, and six ships for building new ships. The ordnance wharf adjoining was the original dock; the guns belonging to each ship are now arranged in tiers, with the names of the vessels they belonged to marked above them. In 1558 the Chest of Chatham was instituted by the seamen in the service of Queen Elizabeth, each giving a portion of his pay for the relief of the sufferers in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. There is also an hospital for the relief of aged mariners and shipwrights. At the entrance of the town stands the victualling-office, whence his Majesty's ships at Chatham and Sheerness are supplied with provisions; and near it stands the chapel of ease to the parish church: the latter is situated on a hill adjoining the ordnance office; it contains several elegant marble monuments. The Dock-chapel is a neat and elegant building, it was erected in 1811 for the accommodation of the officers, artificers, and their families, and cost 9000*l.* Market on Saturday.

BRISTOL, properly speaking, lies in two counties, Somerset and Gloucester, but was constituted a county of itself in the reign of Edward III. This metropolis of the west of England gradually rose to eminence in the time of the Anglo Saxons, but its origin is very uncertain. The internal streets are high and irregular, with projecting buildings, mostly composed of wood and plaster, which render it close; but the suburbs and external parts are elegant and spacious, principally inhabited by gentry, merchants, and retired tradesmen. This city contains many public edifices of great beauty and importance; here are 19 churches of the established religion, besides places of worship appropriated to nearly all the various denominations of dissenters, and also a synagogue for the service of the Jews. The cathedral church has a fine square tower, ornamented with four pinnacles; this building contains many Gothic beauties; it is adorned with painted windows, and several elegant monuments, particularly that of Mrs. Draper, the celebrated Eliza of Sterne. There is in the back part, a cloister which leads to the library, and the bishop's palace. On the	48¼	Temple Cloud	10¼

AXMINSTER is a large irregularly built town. The carpet manufactory was established here about 1755, and is carried on to a considerable extent; the process of weaving differs materially from that pursued in most other places, as the carpets are here woven in an entire piece, several hands being employed in conjunction at the same loom, working the pattern with needles; the Turkey and Persian carpets are here imitated with great success; but the ordinary patterns are flowers, &c.; and it is not unusual in many large pieces, to copy Roman tessellated pavements, which have an uncommon richness and variety. One loom measures in breadth no less than 27 feet, and the piece woven in it may be extended to any length. The church is a large venerable building dedicated to St. Mary; it exhibits specimens of several kinds of architecture; but it seems doubtful if any part is so ancient as the time of its reputed founder: the interior has a heavy cum-

west side is a most elegant Gothic gateway, said to be one of the finest remains of architectural antiquity in the kingdom. All the churches are neat, beautifully decorated, and many of them contain very handsome monuments; that of St. Mary, Redcliff, is one of the finest in the kingdom, its roof is 60 feet high, arched with stone, which abounds with beautifully carved devices and ornaments; the exterior measurement is 230 feet in length, and the breadth of the nave and side aisles is 59 feet; this truly elegant building contains two monumental statues of its founder, William Canning, who had been five times mayor of the city; in one he appears habited as a magistrate, and in the other as a priest, he having in his latter days taken holy orders; another also, worthy of examination, is to the memory of Sir Wm. Penn. father of the celebrated quaker. Bristol contains many hospitals and charitable institutions, besides an elegant and convenient theatre, pronounced by the late Garrick to be the most complete of the same dimensions in Europe. The quay is above a mile long, extending from St. Giles's to Bristol Bridge. Here is a dock that will contain 10 sail of large vessels, and farther on is another where there is a crane erected on 14 cast-iron pillars, a curious piece of mechanism for loading and unloading ships. On the banks of the Avon, which here joins the Frome, are several dock-yards, and the merchants' floating dock is extremely large. A mile below the city, close to the river, is the Hot-well, the waters of which are reckoned specific for the diabetes, phthisical, scorbutic, and inflammatory disorders: it is a great brous appearance, particularly where the bulky tower, rising awkwardly in the middle of the structure, intercepts the view and gives a disagreeable heaviness to the whole. Some few parts of the building have the appearance of great antiquity, particularly a Saxon doorway that has been removed from the south side to the eastern end of the aisle. In the town is a Roman Catholic chapel, a meeting-house for Independents, and another for Methodists.

resort for invalids during the summer, for whose accommodation and entertainment there are a pump-room, ball-room, coffee-house, taverns, and elegant lodging-houses, both on a level with the well, and in the delightful village of Clifton, which is situated on the brow of a hill, and commands a beautifully romantic prospect; from the purity of the air, and the situation of the place, it has been termed the Montpellier of England. Bristol sends two members to parliament, and gave birth to the celebrated Thomas Chatterton, whose father was sexton to St. Mary Redcliffe. In the markets there is a great plenty and variety of provisions, fruit, and vegetables.

At an early period, this spot was occupied by the nunnery of Whitestone, which afforded accommodation for seven or eight White nuns, but was dissolved by Henry VIII.; its site was then granted to Richard Callowhill, but afterwards became the property of the Cookseys, who here received Charles II. after the fatal battle of Worcester, and for a long subsequent period possessed the gloves and garters which that unfortunate monarch left behind him when he quitted this hospitable abode. The present mansion is of modern erection, and though nearly within the bounds of the city, has a very rural appearance.

This is an ancient brick building, in the form of a square, with a wing at each corner, the whole surmounted with turrets, in the style of Holland House, near Kensington: it contains several ancient family paintings, and in front there is a large court, with high walls and a turreted gateway: the offices are behind the house, and part of the park in front is enclosed with light railing. The park, including about 200 acres, contains much excellent timber, that produces a fine shade, and affords a good specimen of ancient customs; it is also ornamented with a lake of 60 acres, and being laid out, as it were, in rays of planting, from a centre occupied by the house, which stands on rising ground, and is encompassed by trees, mostly oak, forms a rich and stately picture of former magnificence.

The grounds include about 130 acres; they are well stocked with fine timber, and command many very beautiful prospects.

DROITWICH comprises three parishes, exclusive of the Liberty of Dodderhill, and derives its name from its wet situation, and dirty appearance; it is a place of very considerable antiquity and is famous for its salt-springs, which constitute the chief business and wealth of the inhabitants. It was a very populous place in the time of William the Conqueror, and celebrated for the production of salt, mention of which is made in doomsday-book; it had, how-

GLOUCESTER, a city and metropolis of the county, situated on the east bank of the river Severn, gives title of duke, to the cousin of his present Majesty; it is rather a large but not populous place, consisting principally of four spacious streets, meeting each other at right angles nearly in the centre of the town. The city, from its elevated situation with a gradual descent on every side, presents a remarkably clean appearance, is well paved and lighted, and contains besides the cathedral, five parish churches, several places of worship for dissenters, quakers, a Jew's synagogue, two grammar schools, a county infirmary, and several charitable institutions; here is also a magnificent shire hall in which are two admirably formed courts of law and justice, wherein are held the assizes and sessions for the city and county; two commodious market houses, an elegant theatre, a custom house, and a county gaol, erected after the mistaken plan of Howard, upon the site of the ancient castle. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in wool-stapling, rope-making, malting, and the manufacture of pins, of which latter article the annual trade to the metropolis alone, is said to amount to 20,000*l.* This city, which is situated above 30 miles from the junction of the Severn with the Bristol channel, possesses many natural as well as artificial advantages for commercial purposes; by means of its connexion with the great system of canal navigation in the North, and the Thames and Severn canal, which unites the two rivers whence is derived its name, an extensive communication is opened with every part of the kingdom. Here is an elegant and commodious assembly room, a handsome pump room, with hot, cold, and vapour baths, and in its vicinity many elegant houses for the accommodation of visitors; the mineral springs are chalybeate. The cathedral is a very magnificent specimen of gothic architecture; it was begun about the year 1407; in 1551 Abbot Horton built the north aisle and great hall, now used as a library, and succeeding abbots have enlarged and decorated the venerable pile; this magnificent fabric is 420 feet long, and 144 wide; from its centre rises a majestic tower 198 feet high, surmounted by four beautifully ever, very much declined in population and importance till within these few years, when it began again to increase in size, and now contains about 450 houses, exclusive of Doderhill. It has three parish churches, St. Andrew's, St. Mary-Whitton, and St. Peter's; and a neat chapel. This borough is governed by a recorder, town-clerk, two bailiffs, and inferior officers, and returns two members to Parliament, the right of election being vested in the recorder, two bailiffs, and eleven burgesses, who are styled the corporation of the salt-springs of Droitwich. The brine springs are said to be much stronger than those of Nantwich in Cheshire, are continually overflowing, and the salt they produce is esteemed the best in Europe. The brine is pumped up out of the pits by horses into reservoirs, whence it is conveyed by pipes to the salt-works, and discharged into the boilers, which are of wrought-iron, of various dimensions, but all about two feet and a half deep. It takes about twenty hours boiling, when the salt is deposited at the bottom; it is then carried in oval wooden baskets to the stove, where it remains forty hours to dry, and is then fit for use. A canal about seven miles long, navigable for vessels of sixty tons burden, conveys the salt into the river Severn, at Hawford, about three miles and a half from Worcester; and supplies the neighbourhood with coal, of which there is a very considerable consumption. pierced pinnacles; the interior bears a very solemn and impressive aspect; the choir is extremely elegant, and its richly carved stalls are little inferior to those at Windsor: besides the various elegant appendages to this edifice, its numerous monuments deserve attention, the most conspicuous of which are those of Edward II., the Earl of Hereford, and the Duke of Normandy. The corporation of Gloucester consists of a recorder, mayor, 12 aldermen, town clerk, chamberlain, sword-bearer, 40 common councilmen, four sergeants at mace, &c., besides 12 incorporated companies for trades, whose masters attend the mayor on all public occasions. ST. ARVANS, 2 m. distant, the fine ruins of Tintern Abbey, belonging to the Duke of Beaufort, which are justly esteemed, with their appendages, the most beautiful and picturesque objects upon the river Wye. The monastery was originally founded for monks of the Cistercian order, in the year 1131, by Walter de Clare, and dedicated to St. Mary: at the dissolution the annual revenues were valued, according to Dugdale, at 132l. 1s. 4d.; but according to Speed, at 256l. 11s. The site was granted, 28th Henry VIII., to Henry, second Earl of Worcester, in which family it is at present vested. From a spot about half a mile down the river, the whole appears to great advantage, as though standing upon an eminence; the grand east window presenting itself like a portal of a magnificent edifice, embosomed in a dense wood, the sides being clustered with ivy, and the lower part of the building concealed by numerous shrubs; the river, sweeping in front, forms to commemorate a victory obtained over the Britons by Harold at this place; but the rudeness of their form, and other circumstances, prove them of a date anterior to the period in which he flourished; although not a doubt can be entertained but the Britons sustained a defeat near this spot. They are probably British remains of high antiquity, set up as sepulchral memorials, or to designate a place of druidical worship; and the latter opinion is corroborated by other vestiges in the vicinity.

MONMOUTH is pleasantly situated on a tongue of land, formed by the confluence of the rivers Monnow and Wye, having over each a good stone bridge, besides one over the little river Trothy, which here falls into the Wye. The town is extensive, but contains only one principal street, in which are many handsome houses. The town-hall, the county-gaol, the free-school, and St. Mary's church, are all very fine-buildings, and highly deserve the attention of the traveller. Here was formerly a castle of considerable extent, whose ruins present an appearance of dilapidated grandeur, and afford evident proof of its original strength, some portions of the existing walls being above ten feet thick; and various relics still visible amidst stables, outhouses, and tenements, merit attention on account of their massive structure. Monmouth has a market on Saturday, and, together with Uske and Newport, sends one member to parliament. This town gave birth to King Henry V., and also to the celebrated author of British history, Geoffry of Kymyn Hill, in the vicinity of Monmouth, a fine walk has been made, which ends in a delightful plain, crowned with a beautiful wood called Beauieu Grove, through which walks are made, terminated by seats, presenting a most enchanting view of the surrounding country. In the centre of this eminence a pavilion has been erected, two stories high, intended as a naval monument, as well as a place of accommodation for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; its frieze is elegantly decorated with medallions and appropriate devices of the most eminent British Admirals: the upper story has five windows, commanding views embracing about 300 miles in circumference, over Monmouth, Gloucester, and Hereford, besides Somerset, Glamorgan, Brecon, Radnor, Salop, and Worcester. The exquisite diversity of landscape here presented to the eye exceeds in description the power of language.

a very fine fore-ground, whilst the varied lines produced by the contour of the distant hills, constitute a grand and solemn background. This church was built in the form of a cathedral, consisting of a nave, north and south aisles, transept, and choir, with a tower that formerly stood in the centre. The exterior of the building is fine, especially the façade of the western front: but the beauty of the interior must excite the admiration of the most stoical mind, and rivet the attention of the most tasteless observer. On the opening of the western door, the eye rapidly passes along the range of elegant columns which separated the nave and south aisle, and stretching under the sublime arches that once supported the tower, is fixed on the grand eastern window at the termination of the choir. From the length of the nave, the height of the walls, the aspiring form of the pointed arches, and the size of the eastwindow which closes the perspective, the first impressions are those of grandeur and sublimity; but as these emotions subside, and we descend from the contemplation of the whole to the examination of the parts, we are no less struck with the regularity of the plan, the lightness of the architecture, and the delicacy of the ornaments: we feel that elegance is its characteristic, and that the whole is a combination of the beautiful and sublime. Though many of the columns have been demolished, and some of the windows and ornamental objects dilapidated, yet the character of all may be traced; for, as it has been justly observed, in corresponding parts, always one remains to tell the story. To the decorations of art are now superadded the effects produced by time; some of the windows are wholly obscured by large masses of ivy, others are canopied, or the sides partially covered, while the tendrils twine in the tracery of some, creep along the walls, encircle the columns, form natural wreaths round the capitals, or hang down in pendulous tufts from their summits. The numerous mosses and lichens also lend their assistance from the crevices of the stones, to furnish those contrasting tints which tend to give a powerful effect to the appearance of a ruin. The flooring of enamelled figured tiles has been removed, and the earth now constitutes the natural pavement, as the sky does its canopy. On the ground lie scattered in various directions, ornamented fragments of the once elegant groined roof, pieces of columns, friezes, sculptures, mutilated statues, and sepulchral stones sacred to the memory of heroes and religious persons, whose ashes have been deposited within these walls.

CHURCH STRETTON is situated in a valley, or rather a hollow, and apparently closed in by lofty mountains. The church is built in the form of a cross, with a tower in the centre. Here is a small old town-house, and a free-school for twenty boys. On the hills are fed vast quantities of sheep, which produce excellent wool, that is sold to the Yorkshire clothiers. A considerable trade is carried on in malt, and a number of the poor are employed in making a strong linen cloth, called hessens, used in packing hops and wool. The air is remarkably healthy, and the soil is a fine gravel. The rivulets produce excellent trout. Between Church Stretton and Little Stretton is an insulated hill between two others of much greater altitude, with deep encroachments on its summit, called Brocard's Castle. It is a post admirably adapted to guard the pass between the mountains. — ½ m. distant is Carr Caradoc, or the Mount of Carnetacus, at the top of which is still visible the remains of an old British camp, surrounded by a double ditch, from whence the prospect is extensive. MONMOUTH, 1 m. before, Troy House, Duke of Beaufort. This handsome mansion is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Trothy, and is said to have been built by the celebrated Inigo Jones; its interior is extremely commodious, and is far from being destitute of grandeur; but this seat derives its chief importance from the gardens, which are cultivated with a degree of energy seldom to be met with, and produce some of the most delicious fruits this country can boast.

The mansion, which has been considerably enlarged and modernized, stands on an elevated lawn, amidst grounds that are agreeably embellished by woodland decorations. The prospects hence over Wrexham, the steeples of which forms no inconsiderable object, are extensive and highly diversified. In this house was born that infamous character, Judge Jeffries, who was Lord Chancellor in the reign of James II.: he was certainly a man of very great abilities, but wholly destitute of principle, and capable of con- vining at the worst possible ac- tions.

WOLVERHAMPTON is a very extensive and populous town, well-built, and remarkably healthy, notwithstanding its proximity to several coal mines, which circumstance is no doubt to be attributed to its lofty situation. The chief manufacture of the town consists in locks and keys, together with articles of a similar description. These are executed in a very superior style, and are for ingenuity and security perhaps exceeded by no other production of the kind in England. A monastery was erected here about the 10th century, but its site is unknown, unless it was situated near the collegiate church, which is dedicated to St. Peter. This is presumed to have been the case, as there is a large room or vault of very massy construction, now to be seen in rather a southerly direction from this building: it is supported by strong groins, is in a very perfect state, and has the appearance of having formerly belonged to an edifice of considerable magnitude. Notwithstanding the parish is of as great extent as any in South Britain, and is nearly 30 miles in circumference, containing no less than 17 very considerable villages and townships, and about 30,000 individuals, yet here are only 2 churches belonging to the established religion; the one is an ancient edifice, possessing a great degree of elegance, and is situated at the eastern end of the town; it contains many fine monuments, besides a curious font, and a stone pulpit worthy of examination; in the church yard there is also an ancient cross, containing a vast profusion of rude sculpture, but respecting its origin little is known. The other church is a modern stone structure, finished about the year 1776. Besides these, there are, however, 3 chapels appropriated to the celebration of divine worship, according to the acknowledged religion of the country, and numerous meeting houses, belonging to the different denominations of dissenters. The markets are held on Wed-

WREXHAM is a good town, in a flourishing state, which may be attributed to its lying in the high road from Shrewsbury to Chester. The streets are wide, and generally cross each other at right angles; they contain a number of handsome private dwellings, besides a few good public buildings; but the chief pride of the town is the church, which equals in beauty many cathedrals; it was erected on the site of a former building, which was destroyed by fire about the year 1457, and exhibits a specimen of design, proportion, and chaste decoration, not surpassed by any edifice built in the time of Henry VII. During the civil wars, this venerable structure was converted into a prison by the parliamentary forces, at which time the organ was destroyed, and it otherwise received much damage. This beautiful edifice consists of a pentagonal chancel, two collateral aisles, and a lofty quadrangular tower. The interior is highly ornamented, and contains a superb altar-piece, besides a number of monuments of peculiar beauty. The market is held on Thursday and Saturday.

The end and back part of the house are nearly in their original state, but some of the other parts have been much altered, particularly an out-building converted into a sitting parlour, the principal entrance removed, and the area of uninclosed land in front of the house

nesday and Saturday, but the former is by far the most amply supplied. In the outskirts of the town there are a number of trees, situated at regular distances, which serve to mark the limits between the township and the parish. In the vicinity there are also a variety of gardens possessing considerable beauty, the prospects from which are of a very pleasing description, as the country exhibits a scene of great agricultural prosperity; and about 1 mile hence, towards the north, the Birmingham, and the Staffordshire and Worcestershire, and Essington and Wyrley Canals form an union, after having passed through the immediate neighbourhood of the town.

laid out with taste, as a pleasure-ground. The interior has likewise been much altered, but whatever could be traced relative to the king's concealment has been preserved with care. The places in which he was concealed, are chiefly in and adjoining a large chimney; the garret, or, as it is termed, the gallery, entered by a trap-door, was probably one of them. From this there is a descent by a step-ladder to the next hiding place, and from thence to a door near the bottom of the chimney that leads to the garden. The large wainscotted parlour is nearly in its original form. The concealing place behind the wainscot has long been stopped up, and the gloves and garters said to have been left by the king, were lost before the present possessor came to the house. The Royal Oak, said to have sprung from an acorn of the original oak that sheltered the king, stands near the middle of a large field adjoining the garden.

There was formerly a large artificial lake on its south side, but this having burst its dam a few years since, the site has been recently covered with plantations. From the principal front of the mansion, there is a very fine view of the Staffordshire and Macclesfield hills; the intervening space between which and the house has an agreeably varied surface, sloping to the river Dane in one direction, and in another to the steep banks of a sheet of water, situated considerably below the level of the larger lake above mentioned.—Beyond Congleton, Hulme Wallfield, Lady Warburton.	44 $\frac{1}{4}$	Darlaston	115 $\frac{3}{4}$

STONE has considerably increased in size since the formation of the canal between the Trent and the Mersey; it contains some good charitable institutions, and has a handsome church dedicated to St. Weelford; on the north side of the cemetery of which there is a large stone vault with two wings, belonging to the Jervoise family. But this town requires more particular notice on account of the religious institutions it formerly contained: these consisted of a monastery and a nunnery; the former was founded by Wulferus, king of Mercia, who, though brought up in the Pagan worship, became a convert to Christianity after his father's death, but afterwards embraced Paganism, and educated his children in that persuasion; his sons, however, exchanged their religion for that of St. Chad, which so incensed the monarch, that he one day followed them to their devotions, and immediately put them to death; yet the king, at a subsequent period, became a sincere penitent; he once more returned to the true faith, and abolished idolatry from his dominions. The nunnery was established by Ermenilda, queen of the above sovereign; but the female votaries were afterwards removed, and the house converted into a priory, by filling it with canons from Kenilworth Abbey, to which it was made a cell. WOTTON UNDER EDGE is a large and respectable town, standing on nearly sixty acres of ground, near the foot of a ridge of woody hills, from which situation its name has undoubtedly been derived. The old town was burnt down in the reign of King John, and a place called the Brands, is supposed to mark its original site. The church is a large and handsome fabric, containing numerous monuments and sepulchral memorials. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the clothing trade, which is carried on to a considerable extent.	WOTTON UNDER EDGE. The Warren, L. S. Austin, Esq.; and Hill House, W. M. MINCHIN HAMPTON is pleasantly situated on a gradual declivity, with a south-east aspect; and consists of four streets, lying at right angles, but irregularly built. The manufacture of cloths is carried on to a considerable extent in the vicinity of the town, the numerous brooks and rivulets being extremely favourable for the purpose. The church, dedi-	cated to the Holy Trinity, was founded about the reign of Henry III., by the nuns of Caen: it is built in the form of a cross, with side aisles, and a tower springing from the intersection of the nave and transept. The south transept was rebuilt in the year 1382, by Sir John de la Mere, and Maud, his wife. The great window is beautifully ramified; between the buttresses are several other windows, with narrow lancet arches; under the large window are two arcades, with the recumbent figures of Sir John and his lady; the former is represented as a crusader; the latter, in the dress of the age.

During the civil wars, the ancient mansion was garrisoned for Charles the First, and was one of the last places that surrendered, its defenders having repulsed a large party of the parliament forces but a short time before the reduction of Oxford. This attack was attended with a singular circumstance; Sir Robert Pye, the owner of the house, who married Anne, the eldest daughter of Hampden, and was Colonel in the parliament army, being himself the person who headed the assailants. It was in this action that the spire of Farringdon church was beaten down by the artillery. — Beyond Farringdon, at Buckland, Buckland House, Charles Courtenay, Esq.

heads of religious orders. Part of the spire was destroyed during the civil wars: the remainder is but very little higher than the body of the church; within which are several fine monuments; and on the south side, that of the unknown founder. Robert, Earl of Gloucester, erected a castle here in the reign of King Stephen; but the monarch, after some resistance, reduced and levelled it with the ground. The site of it appears to have been granted by King John, in the year 1202, with all its appurtenances, to build an abbey of the Cistercian order. In the reign of Edward VI. the possessions of the abbey, with the manor of Farringdon, &c. were granted to Thomas Lord Seymour; but reverting to the Crown after his execution, were, in the second year of Queen Mary, bestowed on Sir Frederick Englefield. In the immediate vicinity of the town is Farringdon Hill, an eminence rising gradually from the vale of White Horse, and surmounted by a small grove, which forms a kind of land-mark for the surrounding counties, being seen at a great distance in every direction. This charming place commands a rich and extensive view over parts of Oxfordshire, Gloucestershire, and Wiltshire, in addition to the whole of the beautiful and interesting vale beneath. "But the muse of Mr. Pye, who on this spot strung her lyre with melody, has snatched the fruitful subject from the attempts of prose; and, by interweaving the beauties it owes to nature, with the embellishments it receives from art, and the interest it derives from history, has precluded description from all but those who have been permitted to partake of the Heliconian stream." Near Farringdon is a camp of a circular form, 200 yards in diameter, with a ditch 20 yards wide. About 30 years ago, in levelling the north rampart, human bones and coals were found; and human bones are frequently discovered in digging for peat, in the swampy ground about one mile south of the hill. This camp is supposed to be of Danish origin, and the neighbourhood flat, the theatre of the battle in which Alfred obtained his 12th victory.

BRISTOL TO NORWICH, BY SODBURY, MALMESBURY, HIGHWORTH, OXFORD, AYLESBURY, DUNSTABLE, LUTON, HITCHIN, BALDOCK, ROYSTON, CAMBRIDGE, NEWMARKET, AND THETFORD.

AYLESBURY, the Eglesbury of the Saxons, was originally a strong British town, and maintained its independence till the year 571, when it was reduced by Cuthwulf, brother to Cealwin, King of the West Saxons. It is situated nearly in the middle of the county, on a gentle eminence that rises gradually on all sides, and is surrounded by that fertile tract of country called the vale of Aylesbury, which contains some of the richest land in England, and feeds an incredible number of sheep. This town is described as being built with timber in the 16th century, but since then it has been greatly improved, and most of the houses are now of brick, for which it appears to be principally indebted to Sir John Baldwin, who erected several public buildings, procured the assizes to be transferred from Buckingham, and raised a causeway 3 miles long, on one of the approaches to the town, where the road was both miry and dangerous. Aylesbury consists of several streets and lanes, lying round the market-place, in the middle of which is a handsome and convenient hall, where the quarter sessions and Lent assizes are held, but the summer assizes have been restored to Buckingham, through the interest of Lord Cobham and the Grenville family. The county gaol still remains at Aylesbury, and an elegant market-house has lately been erected, after the model of the temple of the winds at Athens. Much profit is derived by many of the inhabitants of Aylesbury, from their ingenious method of rearing young ducks in the winter, which obtain large prices in the metropolis; and lace-making is also carried on here to a very considerable extent. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, with a low tower rising at the intersection of the nave and transept; it is very suitably decorated, and has a curiously carved pulpit, besides which the church-yard is large, disposed into several walks, and planted with double rows of trees: this religious structure becomes a conspicuous object for several miles round, owing to the elevated situation it occupies, in comparison with the surrounding flat tract of country. Aylesbury is an incorporated town, governed by constables, and sends two members to parliament, who, by an act passed in 1804, are elected by the inhabitants of the borough that pay scot and lot, and those of the three hundreds of Aylesbury; the whole together amounting to about 1200 persons. The weekly market, which is held on Saturday, is well supplied with all kinds of provision.

This was formerly called Woodchurch, or St. Giles in the Wood, from having been the site of a Benedictine nunnery, founded in the time of King Stephen: all the papers relating to which, and other valuable MSS. are in the possession of the present proprietor. The mansion, a handsome edifice, stands in a well-wooded park, particularly abounding in beech

DUNSTABLE, formerly a Roman station, and frequently the temporary abode of royalty, stands near the intersection of the Watling and Icknield streets: the houses are mostly of brick, and several of them have an air of antiquity; they are disposed into four streets, nearly answering to the cardinal points. An extensive manufacture of various articles in straw is carried on here, particularly bonnets, which are known by the name of Dunstable all over the kingdom; and employs a great number of women and girls. Henry I. founded a priory here about the year 1131, which was a magnificent building, but it has been almost entirely destroyed, with the exception of the church, now made parochial, and displaying one of the finest specimens of ancient ornamental architecture extant. Dunstable contains several charitable institutions, and is remarkable for the size of its larks, caught here in great numbers, and sent to the London markets: it is also supposed to have been the first place in the kingdom where theatrical representations were held. About 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. distant from the town are the remains of a fortification called Maiden Bower, not far from which are still to be seen vestiges of another, named Tottenhal Castle. BALDOCK is indebted for its origin to the Knights Templars, who built a town here before the reign of Henry III.; the houses, however, which are extremely neat, and occupy a pleasant situation, exhibit very few traces of antiquity. The church, a spacious and handsome structure, is by some ascribed to the reign of King Stephen; but from the style of its architecture it could not have been erected till the 14th century, though it is probable, from the stone coffins in the walls, and other memorials, that it stands on the site of a more ancient fabric; there are several antiquities in this church deserving attention, besides which the neighbourhood itself is interesting, on account of the many vestiges of the Romans that have been here discovered. The inhabitants of Baldock have enriched themselves by the corn and malting trades, here carried on to some extent, and the market is held on Thursday.

ODSEY HOUSE, is the seat of John Fordham, Esq.

ROYSTON consists principally of brick-built houses, disposed in narrow streets; it is situated in a bottom, part in Herts and part in Cambridgeshire, and is crossed in the lower part by the Icknield way. Here was formerly a priory, few remains of which are now in existence, except the church, which was made parochial in the time of Henry VIII., and is dedicated to St. John the Baptist; it contains a few ancient brasses and monuments. In the reign of Henry IV. this town was in a great measure destroyed by fire; it was, however, speedily restored on account of its convenient situation as a market for corn, and for this trade it is still indeed extremely celebrated. At the bottom of the principal street, and immediately under the marketplace is a kind of subterraneous crypt or oratory, called the cave, the interior of which is, with its rude carvings, well worthy of attention. Market on Wednesday.

NORWICH. This is a populous and very flourishing city, occupying a desirable situation on the top and sides of a gentle hill, whose base is watered by the river Wensum: the buildings are most of them interspersed with gardens, which render the place extremely pleasant and healthy, and occasion it to cover a much larger space of ground than any city in the kingdom, comparatively with its population; it contains a cathedral, 36 churches, seven chapels and meeting-houses of various denominations, has five bridges over the river, one of iron and four of stone. The city was formerly surrounded by a wall flanked with towers, and had a castle of vast strength; nearly the whole of the wall is now removed; but the remains of the castle, which was once the pride and glory of the surrounding country, presents an interesting specimen of that style of architecture which connected the palace with the fortress, though they are much injured in effect, by the erection of a prison on part of the site, and connected with the building, in a taste totally dissimilar to the original design of the ancient fabric. The historical events which have taken place in Norwich are numerous, and many of them highly interesting, but the most important was the introduction of the manufacture of worsted-stuffs, by the encouragement given to Flemish artisans, a number of whom emigrated and settled here in 1338. Many improvements have subsequently been made, and the invention of a great variety of fancy goods connected with the woollen and silk trade, had at one period so much increased the demand, that 12,000 looms were constantly employed. The foundation of the cathedral was laid in 1096, and after undergoing various dilapidations from accident and rebellion, which occasioned many considerable alterations, additions, and improvements, it arrived at its present state of architectural elegance: the Norman style generally pervades the edifice; it is composed of a nave with side-aisles, a transept with semicircular ends, and an aisle surrounding it, to which is added various chapels and other buildings. The extreme length of the church is 411 feet, and the nave to the transept, 140 feet: the cloisters form a square of 174 feet within the walls: at the intersection of the nave and transept, rises a lofty tower, surmounted with a spire, the whole height of which is 315 feet. The interior of this edifice is grand and solemn, and the tombs record the memory of many persons distinguished as eminent ornaments of society in the times in which they lived. The

Annesley, Esq.; and Kirtlington Park, Sir Henry Watkin Dishwood, Bart.	216 $\frac{3}{4}$	* BRISTOL, Glouc., to * OXFORD, Oxfordsh., pp. 422 to 424		BUCKINGHAM is an irregular built town of considerable antiquity, situated at the bottom and on the acclivity of a hill, and for the most part consisting of good brick houses. The inhabitants are chiefly occupied in agricultural pursuits, or lace-making. The town-hall is a spacious brick structure, surmounted with a gilt swan, which is the borough arms; its principal floor is reserved for the use of the magistrates, where they hold the parish court every three weeks, and the summer assizes; the gaol has likewise some pretensions to beauty, but the chief ornament of the town is the church, which is proudly situated on the summit of an artificial mount, formerly occupied by a castle; this stately fabric was erected about the year 1780, and is a very elegant free-stone structure, with a tower at its south-west end, which is highly ornamented, and surmounted by a fine proportioned spire; the interior is constructed on the same plan as that of Portland chapel, in London; it displays a number of Doric and Ionic columns, besides a good copy of Raphael's Transfiguration, which embellishes the altar, and was presented to the parish by the Marquis of Buckingham, whose uncle, Earl Temple, contributed largely towards the erection of this edifice. This town suffered greatly by fire in 1725, when 138 families lost property to the amount of 38,000 l. ; it is now, however, fast reviving, and its market on Saturday is very well attended. The church is an ancient, stately and spacious edifice, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and standing on an eminence that commands an extensive view over the surrounding country, which produces excellent corn, and plenty of game. In the churchyard are seven almshouses, built and endowed by a citizen of London, and here is also an hospital that was founded at an early period; besides the advantages of these charitable institutions, the distresses of the poor are alleviated by the application of various donations and legacies bequeathed for that purpose. The dissenters from the established church in this town are principally Presbyterians and Anabaptists, who have each a meeting-house. Over the river Ouse are two good stone bridges, and from that river the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water by an hydraulic machine. Both Leland and Camden have mentioned a castle that formerly stood at Newport Pagnell, but of which no traces can now be discovered, or particulars found, except that it remained a place of strength till the time of the civil wars. The labouring classes are principally supported by lace-making, of which it has been said that more is manufactured here and in the neighbourhood, than in all the rest of England. A ready sale of this article is obtained in the market held for that purpose on Wednesday weekly; and the inhabitants of the town have likewise the benefit of a good weekly market on Saturday for corn and provisions.

ST. NEOT'S is a considerable town, pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Ouse, and connected with the village of Eynesbury, or Aynesbury, by a handsome stone bridge of several arches, two of which are of more than ordinary span; the river being here tolerably wide, and gently meandering through the meadows, forms, together with the surrounding objects, some very beautiful scenes. The houses are mostly built with brick, and the town, which consists of a large market-place and several streets, has a lively and respectable appearance. St. Neot's formerly contained a priory, some trifling remains of the buildings belonging to which are yet visible near the church, an edifice that is generally considered to be the noblest of its kind in the county; its architecture is of the beautiful style that prevailed in the time of Henry VII., and it seems to have been built about the year 1507; its plan is perfectly regular, and at the west end there is a finely proportioned and ornamented tower 150 feet high; the interior is also very neat; and the windows are large and elegant, they were formerly highly adorned with stained glass, and some fragments of draperies still remain. horses, appears to have lain dormant for a long series of years; but was again introduced and encouraged in the reign of James I., from the spirit and swiftness discovered in the Spanish horses thrown on shore from the wreck of the armada; this monarch erected a house here, which was destroyed in the civil wars, but was rebuilt by that distinguished patron of the turf Charles II., and is still the residence of royalty, when the place receives the honour of their visits. The town is principally situated in Suffolk, but the race-course, accounted the best in the kingdom, is in Cambridgeshire. The races here are conducted in a style superior to all others, and the meetings, of which there are seven in the year, are held in the following order. The first is called the Craven meeting, this always commences on Easter Monday, except when Easter falls in March, when it takes place on the second Monday in April; then follow the first and second Spring meetings; the next is the July meeting; this is succeeded by the first and second October meetings; and the racing season concludes with the third October, or Houghton meeting. During the winter season, occasional coursing meetings are also held here. Newmarket is composed of one long wide street, most of the houses are modern and well built, and many of them handsome; it also contains two convenient and well furnished coffee-houses, besides billiard and other rooms for the reception of gentlemen who prefer games of skill or hazard to the more invigorating recreations of the turf. This town has two churches, but neither contain any thing particularly worthy of observation. Market on Thursday.

BRISTOL TO OXFORD, BY BATH, TETBURY, CIRENCESTER, LECHLADE, AND FARRINGDON.

CIRENCESTER is celebrated for the purity of its air and the healthful cleanliness of the town, which consists chiefly of four principal streets. The houses are mostly built of stone, and the superior ones are generally detached erections. Here were formerly three churches, only one of which now remains; it is dedicated to St. John, and is one of the most magnificent parochial edifices in the kingdom; this lofty structure consists of a nave, side-aisles, and chancel, and contains five chapels; it is surmounted by an elegant embattled tower, 132 feet high, ornamented with statues and pinnacles: a noble porch on the south side is decorated in the most sumptuous manner on the outside, by rich sculptured canopies, grotesque figures, carved niches, and fine open worked battlements;

ments; on the inside it is adorned with fine radiated tracery, spreading itself over the roof of eight fan-shaped compartments, rising from single pillars and meeting in the centre, where the lozenges are ornamented with quatrefoils. The painted glass that formerly occupied the different windows having been mutilated, the remains have been collected, and at present ornament the great east and west windows. A variety of ancient monumental brasses are here to be met with, capable of affording considerable gratification to the antiquary. Cirencester contains several excellent charitable institutions; it was a place of considerable note in the time of the Romans, and witnessed the devastation attendant upon civil war in the time of Charles I., but in a mi-

In the neighbourhood, a great variety of interesting antiquities have been found at different times. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the business of woolstapling, and the manufacture of heavy edge tools. Here is a company of weavers, but there is only one clothing-house, which, together

BROMSGROVE TO WOLVERHAMPTON, BY DUDLEY.

HALES OWEN is a neat town, pleasantly situated in a valley; it contains a number of handsome houses, and was formerly celebrated for its monastery, which, judging from the remains, appears to have been a very stately edifice; a farm house in its vicinity is said to have been the abbot's kitchen; it contains several remains of the old building, and, among other things, a number of painted tiles, which formed part of the paving of the abbey. The manufacture of nails and hardware is carried on in this town to a considerable extent, and a market is here held on Monday. The church, surmounted by a spire of exquisite proportions, which is supported by four curious arches, is a very elegant structure.

HALES OWEN. The Leasowes, M. Attwood, Esq. This beautiful seat is indebted for much of its classical elegance to the enlightened taste of the poet Shenstone, who was born here, and spent the latter part of his life, devoting himself to the embellishment of his favourite retirement. The unfettered style of natural landscape gardening was then unknown in England, and the Leasowes, under the direction of this able genius and excellent man, claim the merit of presenting the first model in the taste now universally adopted; subsequent occupiers have made many alterations in these beautiful grounds; yet enough of their original appearance is still left to render them highly interesting; and few persons traveling this neighbourhood omit the opportunity of visiting them. This delightful scene of sylvan beauties forms one of the most charming retirements imaginable, possessing in itself an epitome of every essential requisite to form a beautiful landscape, while the disposition of its various walks, rustic seats, and peculiar situations, afford numberless picturesque and beautiful views over the surrounding country, which is extremely diversified and beautifully romantic. In many parts are to be found numerous inscriptions from the elegant pen of the poet, either applicable to the situation, or tributary to some friend, or departed brother bard, among which an ornamented urn, inscribed to the memory of Miss Dolman, an amiable relative of the poet, stands amidst a beautiful scene, at the termination of what is not inapplicable called "the Lovers Walk," from the soft and pensive scenery which at all points meets the eye, and awakens the soul to the most sensible touches of tender melancholy.

AMBLESIDE, 1 m. distant, Rydal Hall, Lady Le Fleming. The mansion, a spacious old-fashioned structure, enjoys a fine view of Winander Mere, and behind it rises a craggy mountain, called Rydalhead, which is 2911 feet above the level of the sea. The park contains an abundance of majestic oaks; and on the lawn there are several rocky protuberances, covered with elms and other fine forest trees; the little rivulet Gill also runs through the lawn, and there forms cascades, which are, in the opinion of many tourists, unparalleled in their kind. Near this is Rydal Mount, W. Wordsworth, Esq.

AMBLESIDE is a small town, occupying a singularly beautiful and romantic situation at the head of Winander Mere: it is much resorted to in the summer season by those persons who visit the lakes, on account of the excellence of its accommodations; and contains a handsome church in the Gothic style of architecture, that was erected about ten years ago. The market is held on Wednesday.

CONISTON. Coniston Lake, or Thurston Water, is about 7 m. long and $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile broad, its greatest depth is said to be 40 fathoms, and the char it contains is much esteemed for its fine flavour. The shores of this beautiful lake are indented by several small bays, and the scenery by which it is encompassed consists of coppice-woods, small farms, &c., and behind these the rocky mountains rise to a considerable height. The tourist who would wish to view this lake to the greatest advantage, should first survey its southern extremity; then, advancing northward, the various beauties of the surrounding scenery, together with the most interesting features of the water and country, progressively display themselves, till at last the village of Coniston is seen, and behind it those romantic mountains called Coniston Fells.

CAERMARTHEN TO CARDIGAN.

NEWCASTLE IN EMYLYN. This small town is delightfully situated on the banks of the Teifi, partly in Cardiganshire, and the remainder in Caermarthenshire, possessing a market on Friday. Here are the ruins of a castle, which was garrisoned for the royalists during the civil wars; they consist chiefly of a fine arched gateway 14 feet high, supported by two octagonal towers, exhibiting the romantic character of the country beyond to great advantage: but the most interesting object in the scene is the river, which, after nearly reaching the castle in a straight line from the N. E., returns in a parallel line for a considerable distance, and then sweeps majestically round the front, leaving a most beautiful meadow between it and the fortress, and comes down again on the opposite side with features of a very different cast; foaming through a rugged channel, impeded by rocks, and rolling impetuously under the venerable bridge. The decayed grandeur of the fortress, standing on an eminence in the centre of the scene, greatly heightens the effect of the whole. The salmon found in this river is held in particular estimation.	From Cardiga. 26	From * CAERMARTHEN, Caermarthenshire, to Llanelnwhth Church	From Caerma. 3½	CARDIGAN stands on a gentle eminence on the banks of the river Teifi, a few miles above its junction with the sea, over which it has a stone bridge of seven arches: it consists of two streets, containing many handsome houses occupied by families of opulence. The church is an ancient structure, with a handsome tower at its west end; here is also an excellent modern county gaol, a good town-hall, and a free grammar-school. Cardigan, together with Aberystwith and Llampeter, sends one member to parliament; it has also the privilege of a market on Saturday; it possesses no manufactures, but carries on a very considerable coasting trade, in which are employed nearly 300 vessels of various burdens, navigated by about 1000 seamen. The castle was of considerable strength, and sustained a regular siege against the parliament forces during the civil wars, but at last surrendered after a severe struggle: the present remains are very inconsiderable; they consist chiefly of portions of two round towers towards the river, connected by the remains of a wall, having a venerable appearance, and being finely interwoven with ivy.

The building is still large, but was formerly more extensive; it incloses a quadrangular court, and the apartments open into a gallery, the windows of which, overlooking this court, formerly contained a quantity of stained glass; and the bay-window in the hall, which still retains some fine specimens, consisting of various armorial bearings, is very splendid for its glazing, mullions, fan-tracery, pendant, and spandriis, all of which nearly resemble the highly florid example in Henry VIth's	From Harwich 75	From * CAMBRIDGE, Cambridgeshire, to * NEWMARKET, pages 425 and 426 Enter Suffolk. YARMOUTH. The spirit of improvement so evident at Yarmouth, will, it is to be hoped, ere long extend itself, to the shortening the very circuitous road from thence to Norwich; in which a saving of at least five miles might be effected; thereby reducing a distance of nearly 23 miles, to little more than 18. This upon a line whereon a constant traffick is kept up, would be a great advantage to the public, and one in which the town of Yarmouth and city of Norwich would conjointly share, and, it may not be unreasonable to presume, would eventually repay the expense attending so important an improvement, which, from the nature of the ground and its peculiar situation, must necessarily be a work of considerable expenditure.

* * Coaches run regularly from Yarmouth to Norwich, and from Norwich to Yarmouth, every morning and evening; and in addition to these there is a water conveyance by means of steam-packets that navigate the river Yare, and leave each place every morning.

CANTERBURY TO ASHFORD, CONTINUED TO TENTERDEN AND NEWENDEN

ASHFORD is a respectable market-town, situated on a gentle eminence near the confluence of the upper branches of the river Stour. The church is a spacious and handsome fabric, consisting of a nave, aisles, and three chancels, with a lofty tower rising from the intersection of the nave and principal chancel; it is of very remote origin, but was renovated in the reign of Edward IV. by Sir John Fogge, who also founded a college here with a small ecclesiastical establishment, appointed to pray for the souls of the king and several persons of distinction, and also those of his majesty's liege subjects of the county of Kent, who were slain in the battles of Northampton, St. Albans, and Sherborne, in defence of his right, and title. Sir John died in 1490, and his tomb stands on the north side of the altar. On a slab in front of the altar steps is a curious full sized brass in memory of Elizabeth, daughter to Henry, Lord Ferrers, of Grooby, and wife to David le Strabolgie (fourth of that name), Earl of Athol. She is represented in the old French round dress, closely buttoned from the waist; her hair frizzed in three rows of curls surrounding her face, and hanging frizzed over her shoulders. In a small chapel adjoining to the south transept, formerly appropriated to the Smyths, Lords of Westehanger, and owners of this manor, are three sumptuous monuments of that family, composed of various-coloured marbles: these were repaired by the late chief baron Smyth, a descendant, and whose great-grandmother was the Lady Dorothy Sydney, so celebrated by Waller as Sacharissa. On that against the south wall lie the effigies of Thomas Smyth, Esq. and Alicia, his wife, in habits of the time of Elizabeth; and in the front of the tomb are small figures of their children kneeling: he died in 1595. the west side, beneath an arch, is the monument of Sir Richard Smyth, Knt. of Leeds Castle, fourth son of the above, who is represented in armour, lying upon a cushion and mat: in front are his three wives and five children. He died in July 1628. The last monument commemorates Sir John Smyth, Knt., only son of the latter, and Elizabeth his wife, who are kneeling on cushions at a desk: the former is in armour, with a ruff; the latter has also a ruff and large hoop: in front are portraits of their three surviving children. Adjoining the church is a free grammar-school, built and endowed by Sir Norton Knatchbull, in the time of Charles I., and the master is appointed by that family. Ashford contains many large and well-built houses, and the High Street is of considerable width, near the middle of which stands the market-house, a good modern edifice, and at the east end of the town is a stone bridge of four arches crossing the river Stour.

CANTERBURY TO NEW ROMNEY, BY ASHFORD.

THE MILITARY CANAL was cut during the late war, for the express purpose of impeding the progress of the enemy, in the event of a landing being effected on this shore. It extends from Sandgate, in nearly a straight line along the coast, till it passes Hythe, when it crosses the Romney road, and, following the course of the hills which skirt the extensive flat forming Romney and Walland marshes, terminates at East Cliff End, in Sussex; a distance of about 23 miles. Its breadth is about 90 feet, and its depth 18; with a raised bank to shelter the soldiery, and enable them to oppose the foe with better advantage. In addition to this, a long range of Martello Towers was built on the sea

NEW ROMNEY is situated in the midst of an extensive level, comprehending Romney, Walland, Denge, and Guildford marshes. This beautiful expanse of rich pasture-land is a complete flat, shut in on the land side by wooded eminences, on the most conspicuous of which stands the magnificent ruins of Stutfall Castle, and circumscribed by the Military Canal, which pursues a devious course round the margin of the flat. It is defended from the incursions of the sea by an immense wall of earth, of great strength, called Dymchurch wall, which, as it is the only barrier between this valuable tract of land and the sea, is kept in repair by a rate levied upon the whole of it. CANTERBURY TO NEW ROMNEY, BY FOLKSTONE AND HYTHE.

SANDGATE. This village has of late years acquired celebrity as a watering place, and is visited in the season by much company, attracted by the beauty of its situation, and the facilities it affords for sea-bathing; the beach consists entirely of shingle, so that the water is very clear; and by shelving gently from the shore, presents any depth that may be desired. The castle, which was built by Henry VIII., has been converted into a Martello tower, on a very large scale. Here is a good circulating library, and commodious warm baths. The walk on the cliffs to Folkstone is much frequented, and certainly the scenery is of the most delightful and varied description; on the land side it is bold and romantic, forming a fine contrast with the marine prospect, which is bounded by the coast of France, from Blanchness to Boulogne, and greatly enlivened by the numerous vessels which are continually seen navigating this interesting portion of the British Channel. Within half a mile of Sandgate, commences the military canal, cut during the late war, to impede the progress of the enemy, in the event of a landing being effected on this shore. It extends in nearly a WIGTON stands in an open situation, and contains a remarkably neat modern-built church, which was constructed with materials brought from the Roman station at Old Carlisle, situated about a mile hence, where many vestiges of ancient buildings are still very conspicuous. The streets are spacious, and a number of the houses lay claim to some portion of beauty. The principal cause of the increasing prosperity of Wigton, is the number of manufactories established here for cotton goods, and the enclosing of extensive common lands in the neighbour-

CARLISLE TO BOWNESS, IN CUMBERLAND.

CARLISLE, 6 m. distant, Rose Castle, Bishop of Carlisle. This edifice is delightfully situated on a gentle elevation, and commands a number of fine views to the south and east, but is sheltered on the opposite sides by superior eminences. It appears to have been formerly a very magnificent structure, in the form of a quadrangle, and was surrounded by a wall that had turrets in different parts of it; but it now retains little of a castellated appearance, except the gateway, and two towers on the north part. King Edward I. held his court here for some time, while he was engaged in an expedition against the Scots: it was burnt by Robert Bruce, in the time of Edward II., but was again fortified and castellated in the following reign: in the year 1400, Bishop Strickland rebuilt one of the principal towers; and other similar additions were made by various succeeding bishops; but the building was wholly dismantled in the 17th century, while the country was overrun with the calamities of civil war. On the restoration, however, those parts which had escaped devastation were again made habitable, and almost every bishop since that period has contributed, in a greater or less degree, towards the recovery of its former beauty.

CARLISLE TO HOLME ABBEY.

HOLME ABBEY, or Holme Cultram, is a place of considerable antiquity, and formerly possessed an abbey of Cistercian monks, which was extremely well endowed, but pillaged and burnt during the incursions of Robert Bruce; at a subsequent period it was, however, rebuilt with additional splendour, though very little of the monastic buildings are now in existence, as the abbey itself was chiefly dilapidated in the reign of Henry VIII., and the present parochial chapel was erected with part of its remains. Some portion of the church, in its original form, is yet standing; but this structure was considerably damaged, in the year 1600, by the fall of the steeple, which was 114 feet high; and about four years afterwards its ruin was almost completed by an accidental conflagration. Nearly due west from Holme Abbey, in a strong situation, not far distant from the sea-coast, are some small remains of Wulstey Castle, a fortress that was erected by the abbots to secure their treasures, books, and charters from the sudden depredations of the Scots. The coast of this part of Cumberland appears, from various historical records, to have undergone a very great change by the incursions of the ocean, which, in the reign of Edward I. swept away the town of Skinburness.

 KESWICK is situated near the lower end of Derwent-water, on the east side of an extensive and beautiful vale of the same name; the houses are chiefly constructed with stone, and are each inhabited, with very few exceptions, by only one family. The town has a weekly market on Saturday, but there is very little trade carried on here, and the chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the expenditure of those persons who visit the lakes, for whose accommodation this is a good central situation: the number of strangers who came for the above purpose in the summer of 1793, amounted to no less than 1540. Two private individuals in Keswick have museums, which are open

About two miles south of the town, on the summit of the eminence called Castle-Rigg, is a curious druidical arrangement of rude stones, some of them standing upright, others lying down, and some again in an oblique position. The seclusion and sublimity of this situation is particularly well suited to the deep and wild mysteries of the Druids, and the surrounding scenery, when viewed from this spot, is of an extremely grand and solemn character; Castle-Rigg being the central point of three valleys, that dart immediately under it from the eye, and whose moun-

ESWICK. The beautiful lake called Derwent Water, or Keswick lake, as it is not infrequently termed, from its situation to that town, is of an irregular but somewhat oval form, about three miles long, and a mile and a half broad: it contains four or five small islands, and is surrounded by an amphitheatre of rocky mountains, which are in many instances spangled with wood. On the southern side of the lake is the celebrated waterfall of Lowdore, which consists of a series of cascades falling over an enormous pile of projecting crags that oppose its descent, and are in some measure concealed by the arms of trees which extend themselves on either side; the height of this fall is about 200 feet; and when, after a storm, it is assisted with the numerous streams poured forth from the mountains, one stupendous sheet is formed by the mighty mass of rushing element, that presents a most magnificent scene to the eye, and creates an uproar which shakes the very rocks to the foundations. Several writers have assumed this to be the finest lake in the north of England; but though its beauty is exceedingly impressive, yet it by no means equals Ulls Water in the grand, dignified, and peculiarly sublime features that accompany the latter in almost every part of its extent. Of the islands above-mentioned, those called

Lord's and St. Herbert's are well wooded, and adorn the view; but Pocklington's was some years since disfigured by the erection of several incongruous modern buildings, whose appearance but ill accords with the contiguous scenery. To the south of the Derwent Water is the rocky chasm of Borrowdale, a tremendous pass, at the entrance of which dark caverns yawn terrific as the wildness of a maniac, and discover a narrow strait running up between huge mountains that possess almost every possible form of horror. The river Derwent pursues its vehement course through this desolate region, valuable chiefly to the inquirer after the picturesque; and the small and peaceful village of Grange lies in secure humility at the foot of a detached mountain called Castle-crag. We naturally look in such a neighbourhood for the bold and appalling singularities of nature, and here we look not in vain, for nearly opposite to Castle-crag is a gigantic mass of rock, called the Bowderstone: this appears to have once formed part of a contiguous precipice; but it now rests on some fragments of rock, and lies almost hollow, the road winding round its eastern side; in form it bears some resemblance to a large ship inclined upon its keel, and its weight has been computed at nearly 1800 tons.

EGREMONT is pleasantly situated at the distance of 2 miles from the sea, on the north side of a fertile vale that is watered by the river Eden; it consists chiefly of one long and spacious street, many of the houses in which have a piazza in front, and bear the stamp of considerable antiquity; indeed the origin of the town appears to be connected with that of the castle, which was built towards the commencement of the 12th century, and was certainly of great strength, though not extensive: its ruins are situated on a considerable elevation to the west of the town, and form a picturesque feature in the surrounding landscape. Egremont has a market on Saturday, and formerly had the right of returning members to parliament, but was disfranchised on the petition of the burghers, who were of opinion that the expenses of representation

CHAPEL IN LE FRITH TO RIPON, BY HUDDERSFIELD, HALIFAX, BRADFORD, OTLEY, AND RIPLEY.

RIPLEY. Ripley Castle, Sir William Amcotts Ingilby, Bart. Ripley Castle, according to an inscription carved on the frieze of the wainscot in one of the chambers, was built by Sir William Ingilby, in the reign of Philip and Mary; it has been much enlarged of late years, and is now a spacious and commodious mansion, embattled only for ornament; but the lodge and great tower still retain their characteristics of strength and security. The apartments are elegant, and on the great staircase is a superb venetian window of stained glass, ornamented with a series of escutcheons, displaying the quarterings and intermarriages of the Ingilby family, during the course of 450 years, which have elapsed since they were first settled at Ripley.

SOUTH STAINLEY, beyond, Cayton Hall, Rev. I. Walker Harrison.

RIPON is a large market-town, situated on rising ground, near the confluence of the rivers Ure and Skell; it almost entirely consists of narrow and crooked lanes, and these, in the lower part of the town, possess a curious appearance, from being intersected by various small streams. The market-place is, however, a spacious and handsome square, surrounded with good houses, and having a lofty obelisk in the middle; the town-hall must likewise be noticed for the elegance of its architecture, and the church for its venerable appearance. This latter edifice, which is collegiate, is in the form of a cross, with two uniform towers at the west end, and a third in the centre: the entire length of the interior is 270 feet; the different parts display many beauties and peculiarities of ancient architecture, the choir is richly decorated with stalls for the dignitaries, and the great east window is filled with stained glass, that was executed by Peckitt, of York, about the year 1792: the sepulchral ornaments are numerous, and many of them are also highly interesting. Ripon contains a variety of charitable institutions, a remarkably neat theatre, has a good market on Thursday, and may rank among the most ancient boroughs in England, as it sent members to parliament so early as the time of Edward I. Here are two good stone bridges; that over the Ure, of seventeen arches, is very stately. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the woollen trade, and two cotton mills have been latterly erected, that also employ a number of hands. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four assistants. It sends two members to parliament, elected by the burghage holders, the number of voters being about 150, and the returning officer the mayor.

RIPON, 3 m. distant, across the river Ure, Newby Hall. Towards the end of the last century this seat was purchased from the Blacketts by Richard Weddel, Esq., from whose son it passed to the Rt. Hon. Thos. Philip Weddel Robinson, Lord Grantham, the present proprietor. The late Mr. Weddel built the wings, one of which contains the statue gallery; and the dining-room was erected by the present noble owner; but the situation and design of the structure itself are said to have been chosen and made by Sir Christopher Wren, about the year 1705; it is built of brick, and stands on the eastern bank of the river Ure, commanding a very fine prospect over a fertile and well cultivated country, nearly as far as York. The pleasure-grounds, which are likewise extremely beautiful, exhibit many features that are characteristic of the superior taste of the individual by whom they were originally laid out. On each side the portico, there is a particularly well executed figure of a dog in Portland stone, said to be copied from the celebrated dog of Alcibiades, at Duncombe Park. In the entrance hall is a very excellent organ, on the front of which is represented a faun, holding a syrinx; and above it stands a lion, with a cupid on his back, playing on a lyre, and the harmony of the instrument apparently divests this king of the forest of his natural ferocity; this apartment is likewise adorned with some excellent paintings, and a large inlaid table that exhibits 171 specimens of different marbles, and two other tables of Egyptian granite. The library contains a numerous and very valuable collection of literature: the ceiling of the dining-room is divided into compartments, and superbly painted with ancient mythological subjects; it is also supported by four elegant fluted pillars with rich Corinthian capitals; and the drawing-room is hung with extremely rich and very beautiful tapestry, that was manufactured by the famous Gobelins of Paris; this wonderful performance receives the admiration of every visitor; it represents Venus rising from the sea; Venus desiring Vulcan to complete the arms of Eneas; Vertumnus and Pomona; and Diana and Endymion. Here are also two pier-glasses, measuring 100 inches by 60, and two very beautiful verd-antique tables; besides which the ceiling displays some exquisite specimens of painting. The grand staircase is adorned with two elegant marble columns, with pilasters of the same, behind which there is a table of Sicilian jasper, of large dimensions; this staircase, and likewise all the principal apartments, are decorated with a well selected and really magnificent collection of paintings, all of

Of all these foundations the most magnificent is King's college, indebted for its origin to Henry VI., and which would have rivalled the most splendid palaces of Europe, or perhaps the world, had it been completed according to the plan of the royal founder: the chapel, however, has been alone considered as sufficient to ennoble any age; it is a perfect specimen of Gothic or English ecclesiastical architecture, and exhibits an exterior of uncommon solidity, that, together with the height and magnitude of the building, and its numerous ornaments, will inevitably create those sensations which naturally emanate from the contemplation of its sublimity and grandeur. The interior view is still more impressive, and the vast arched stone roof, of elegant workmanship, unsupported by a single pillar, at once astonishes and confounds the spectator. The interior of the senate-house, a magnificent building of Portland-stone, forms one spacious apartment, and contains four elegant statues: the schools surround a small court, and the university library, abundantly stored with the most choice books, curious and valuable MSS. &c. occupies the whole	From Cambrid. 42$\frac{1}{2}$ 40 38$\frac{1}{4}$ 37$\frac{1}{2}$ 33$\frac{1}{4}$ 32 29$\frac{3}{4}$ 27$\frac{1}{2}$ 23$\frac{1}{2}$ 16$\frac{1}{4}$ 14$\frac{1}{4}$ 12$\frac{3}{4}$ 11$\frac{3}{4}$ 6$\frac{1}{2}$ 5	From * CHELMSFORD, Essex, to Broomfield Little Waltham T. Cambridge consists of 14 parishes, and each of them, except one, is possessed of a church, but those only of Great St. Mary, and St. Sepulchre, require notice: in the first, the members of the university attend divine service; the second is of a singular form, but has been much altered since its original erection, and now appears to great disadvantage; its more ancient part is, however, completely circular, and seems to have been erected in imitation of the church of the Resurrection, or Holy Sepulchre, in Jerusalem, of which it is thought to be the best copy in England. The market-place nearly resembles in form the letter L, at the bottom of which stands the shire-hall, divided into two courts, where the civil and criminal causes are tried; and behind this is the town-hall. Cambridge contains several charitable institutions; it extends nearly a mile from north to south, and half that distance from east to west; but the streets are in general narrow and winding, and the houses ill built and closely crowded together: many improvements have been made here of late years, and it is now well paved and lighted. The approach to Epping is through a fine tract of good woodland, called Epping Forest; it was formerly called Waltham Forest, and was then of very considerable extent. A stag is annually turned out on the forest for the amusement of the public on Easter Monday, under an establishment patronized by the principal merchants of the city. The stag-hunt is well supported: the kennel for the hounds, and the building belonging to the hunt, were rebuilt, some few years since, at an expence of several thousand pounds.

CHELMSFORD TO GRAVESEND, BY BILLERICAY.

CHELMSFORD, the county town, is pleasantly situated at the confluence of the rivers Chelmer and Cann, from the ancient ford over the former of which it evidently derives its name. Chelmsford is a respectable town, consisting chiefly of four streets, having nearly in the centre the shire-hall, an elegant and commodious structure of modern erection. In the basement of this building is an open space for the corn-exchange, and apartments for the courts of assize, sessions, &c. Above is an elegant assembly or county room, that extends the whole length of the building, and is furnished with a music gallery. contiguous to the shire-hall there is a neat conduit of Portland stone. The church is a spacious and handsome edifice, and has a square flint tower, with pinnacles at its west end; the body was erected a few years since from the designs of Mr. Johnson, (in lieu of the more ancient part, which fell down in the year 1800,) and in its reconstruction due respect has been paid to the original character of its architecture; but the interior is elegantly decorated in the modern style. Chelmsford contains an excellent free grammar-school, besides alms-houses and other charitable institutions. The bridge over the Chelmer, rebuilt with one arch, in 1787, connects the hamlet of Moulsham with Chelmsford; and near it, on the Moulsham side, stands the county-gaol, a spacious and well arranged stone building of modern erection. The chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the general business of the county, and from the numbers of carriers and passengers who take this road to the metropolis: the adjacent country is extremely pleasant and fertile; and several flourishing hop-plantations are established in the neighbourhood. Chelmsford has a weekly market on Friday; and on Gallywood Common, near the town, there is a race-course, where three plates are run for annually.

CHESTER TO CARDIFF, BY WREXHAM, OSWESTRY, WELCH POOL, NEWTOWN, BUALT, AND BRECON, WITH BRANCHES TO MONTGOMERY AND ABERYSTWTH.

RUABON, Wynnstay, the seat of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., is entered, immediately out of Ruabon, by a plainly but handsome modern gateway, opening into an avenue formed of timber-trees, almost unparal- leled in girth, consisting of venerable oaks, majestic elms, elegant beeches, and spreading chestnuts. Through this, extending a mile in length, a carriage road, in a direct line, leads to a spacious lawn, on which stands Wynnstay Hall. Erected at divers times, and in different styles of architecture, the house cannot be brought in competition with many elegant and more magnificent mansions; being, from the above circumstances, destitute of uniformity. The old part is principally appropriated to menial, and, it may be added, general accommodation. The new part, erected by the first Sir Watkin, though only a portion of the original plan, were it not deformed by the incongruous remainder of the old, might be considered a good plain modern structure, substantially built, and most conveniently arranged. The interior comprises several spacious apartments, in which are some good paintings, principally consisting of portraits, representative of the Wynns, the Williams's, the Seymours, and other families connected with them by consanguinity or affinity. The surface of the park is not greatly diversified, yet being well wooded and advantageously situated, is a most delightful spot; the near and distant views are distinct, and extremely fine; especially those towards the Berwyn chain of mountains, with the majestic natural breach made in it, beyond Llangollen, through which, in turbulent grandeur, rolls the rapid Dee. Considerable improvements have been made by the erection of baths, and the formation of new plantations, and a fine sheet of water, that reflects the images of several peculiarly handsome grown isolated trees on its margin, in front of the house. The waters of several brooks and rills are here made confluent, so as to form a torrent, which, dashing over a lofty ledge of artificial rock-work, covered with mosses and lichens, assumes the appearance of a natural cascade. The rapid stream then winds through the Belan grounds, having its margin skirted with sylvan accompaniments, where, previous to the improvements already enumerated, a sprinkling of stunted hawthorn bushes were nearly sole possessors of the soil. The obelisk is a handsome free-stone column, not seen from the house, but visible from various parts of the country, consisting of a plinth, sixteen feet square, decorated with oak leaves, issuing, as wreaths, out of the mouths of four eagles, one of which guards each corner of the base. The shaft of the column is RUABON, $\frac{1}{4}$ m. beyond, Plas Madoc, Mrs. Nembhard.

RUABON. The traveller will be gratified at almost every step in the highly romantic road from hence to Chirk; but at New Bridge his attention will be pointedly arrested, which ever way he turns his eyes: about a hundred yards above the bridge, such a scene presents itself, that, with the pencil of a Claude, might be sketched, in an autumnal evening, one of the most exquisite landscapes the eye perhaps ever beheld. The river dashes along its rugged bed, and the rocky banks, clad with umbrageous wood, cast a darkening shade upon the stream, where the sombre green of the oak, with all the different hues of the ash, the elm, and hazel, intermingle; and these again diversified by tints of yellow, brown and fawn, so pensively pleasing in the fall of the year, produce a most beautiful variegation. A few cottages beyond the bridge, with the smoke, tinged by the rays of a setting sun, while the distant mountains are dyed with purple by his declining light, add additional effect to scenery at all times possessed of interesting charms.

RUABON. A short distance hence, in the road to Llangollen, is Pont y Cyssyllte Aqueduct, a wonderful effort of ingenious contrivance, and a convincing proof of the incalculable capability of human energy, when wielded by science, and supported by power: it is in length 98 feet, consists of 19 arches, each 45 feet in the span, with the addition of ten feet six inches of iron work in continuation at each end. The supporting piers are stone, of pyramidal shape, measuring at the base twenty-one feet by ten, but diminishing upwards to twelve feet by seven at top; and their height is 116 feet. Over this immense arcade is extended a trough, or large open caisson, made of cast iron, eleven feet eight inches broad, by which the water of the canal is conveyed over the river 1009 feet to the opposite level. Two iron plates are screwed together from centre to centre, of each arch; and along one side of the canal is a towing-path four feet in breadth, with a handsome iron balustrade, as a defence for man and horse.

CHIRK. Chirk Castle, Mrs. Myddleton Biddulph.

CHESTER TO MANCHESTER, BY WARRINGTON.

SUTTON, near, at Halton, Norton Priory, Sir Richard Brooke, Bart. The present mansion occupies the site of the former religious edifice: it is a spacious and very handsome quadrangular building, situated near the river Mersey, the estuary of which forms a fine object on the right, while the Castle and rocks of Halton constitute a very striking feature in the prospect to the left of the front view. Some of the ancient vaults of the priory, and the ornamented doorway leading to them, are preserved in the present edifice; this doorway consists of semicircular arches, resting on pillars with sculptured capitals, and enriched with foliage, chevrons, and other ornaments. The vaults have been latterly much altered and subdivided, but they originally consisted of groined arches, sprung from short octagonal columns with capitals. Norton Priory was besieged by a party of royalists in the year 1643, but they were beaten off by the family with considerable loss. The grounds have been laid out with great taste; they contain a fine old gigantic figure of St. Christopher, and are intersected by the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, the windings of which in some parts add greatly to their natural beauty, though, from the traffic thereon, not to their seclusion. This canal forms the grand communication by inland navigation between Manchester and Liverpool; it may be considered as the first modern public work of the kind executed in England, although completed at the expence of a private individual; and was finished in the short space of five years from its commencement, by the celebrated Duke of Bridgewater, assisted by that uncommon genius for mechanical inventions, Mr. James Brindley. Of the former it would be unpardonable not to praise his attention to public works at an age too often spent in dissipation; and of the latter it may be truly said, that in all his undertakings he was never at a loss; for, whenever a difficulty arose, he removed it with a facility that appeared like inspiration, and that without the least appearance of vanity or ostentation. The canal in question extends more than 29 miles, and the water is kept on a level till its termination, at Runcorn, where it is precipitately lowered 95 feet, by a series of 19 locks, of admirable construction.

FRODSHAM is pleasantly situated on an elevation under the hills that form the northern extremity of Delamere Forest; it had formerly a castle, that stood at the west end of the town which was given by Edward I., to David Llewellyn, who afterwards broke his alliance with the monarch, and having got possession of Heward castle in Flintshire, put the garrison to the sword, for which he suffered death, and was the first person who was executed as a traitor according to the mode now in use. The fortress was burnt down in 1642, and its site is now occupied by a handsome mansion. At a great height above the town stands the church, near which is a school, with an observatory on its summit, and a pleasant walk on the brow of an eminence behind, called Beacon Hill, from whence a very fine view is obtained of the estuary of the river Mersey, and part of Lancashire, which is considerably improved when the tides is high, as numbers of small vessels are then seen hastening in full sail, to and from Runcorn, and the Wever navigation. Market on Thursday.

KELSALL, 1 m. distant, Ash-ton Heyes, Hon. Booth Grey.	101 $\frac{1}{4}$	Boughton	1	LOSTOCK, beyond, Tabley Park, Sir John Fleming Leycester, Bart. The mansion was erected from the designs of Crarr ; it stands on a gentle elevation in an extensive park, and consists of a projecting centre, connected by corridors with wings, the ground plan of which forms the segment of a circle. The stables occupy three sides of a quadrangle, they are on a very extensive scale, and are situated behind the house. In the south front a magnificent flight of steps leads to a lofty portico of the Doric order, which is supported by four columns formed out of single blocks of Runcorn stone. The principal living-apartments are on the first floor, and the three on the western side have been formed into a very noble picture gallery, that receives a considerable degree of variety and richness of effect from the arches and projections that occupy the place of the partition walls. From this point, and the portico, the general view of the park is singularly pleasing, the elevation being sufficient to command a view of the surrounding wooded country, without separating the hedge-rows, that appear in all directions to form a forest with which the timber in the park gradually connects itself. This park is remarkable for the substantial brick wall with which it has been for the most part, if not wholly, surrounded by the present worthy baronet. There is a large lake on the west, that is enlivened with pleasure-yachts, and broken by a large circular tower, and another object of much beauty, but greater interest, the old hall of Tabley , formerly the residence of Sir Peter Leycester . This venerable structure stands on an island within the circuit of the upper part of the lake; it appears to have been originally quadrangular, but only the eastern side remains, the exterior front of which is completely mantled with ivy; the other side, being a part of the interior of the former quadrangle, is composed of timber and plaster. On the east side is the entrance, to the left of which there is a large but low wainscotted hall, one-fourth of which is occupied by a large oak staircase that leads to a gallery, which runs round two sides of the apartment. On the west side of the hall is a chimney-piece richly decorated with fanciful ornaments, dated 1619, and opposite to it a large bow-window in which the Leycester pedigree is emblazoned in stained glass. The island on which the building stands is planted in such a manner as to exhibit the old hall, lake, and surrounding scenery, to the greatest possible advantage. To the south-east there is also a domestic chapel

KNUTSFORD is said to be so called because King Canute , or Knut , passed the ford here with his army, and gained a victory in the adjacent fields. The town is pleasantly situated; it contains some good houses, a handsome modern church, and is divided by a small rivulet into two parts, called the upper and lower town. Many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of cotton, and the making of thread, but their chief support is derived from the market held on Saturday weekly, and the expenditure of the numerous gentry that reside in the neighbourhood. The races annually held here are extremely well attended, and remarkable for the display of fashionable company.	87 $\frac{3}{4}$	1 m. farther, ☞ to Frodsham 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ m.

OLDHAM, though recently advanced to a market-town, is subordinate to the parish of Prestwich; but has a church, a chapel of the establishment, and some dissenting meeting-houses. This town is built on high ground, on a branch of the river Medlock, near its source; and the river Irk also commences its channel near this spot. The peculiar utility of these streams in carrying on the machinery, &c. of manufactories, has occasioned the erection of many; and an immense number of these, with connected houses, have been erected in this part of the county within the last twenty years. Another inducement to settlers, is the abundance of coal that is easily and cheaply obtained here. A free-school was founded here by James Ashton, Esq. of Chader-ton. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the cotton trade.

of brick, with large bow windows at the sides, a pointed window to the east, and a bell-turret at the west end. The interior is very chastely decorated, fitted up with oak desks, and precisely resembles a college chapel. The date, 1675 is still visible over the door.

JUNCTION OF THE ROAD TO WARRINGTON. Tatton Park, Wilbraham Egerton, Esq. The present mansion was begun from the designs of the late Mr. S. Wyatt, but has been completed from those of Mr. L. Wyatt; it stands on a gentle elevation, and is built with stone, having a very elegant portico in the principal front, which is supported by four Corinthian columns, each of them formed of a single block, from the Runcorn quarry. The library is in the centre of this front; it is a large magnificent apartment, opening to the portico, and containing a very valuable collection of literature; the great staircase, and the entrance hall, are behind it, and the latter occupies the centre of the north front. In the east wing, on the right of these, are the drawing-rooms, and on the left is the grand dining-room, which is decorated with family and other portraits; the drawing-rooms also contain several paintings of great merit. The park is near eleven miles in circumference; it is well wooded, commands many highly interesting prospects, and, until lately, contained two lakes or meres, one of which has been recently drained on account of its proximity to the mansion. The style of the offices and grounds is in thorough conformity with that of the mansion; and there are few seats where taste and comfort are more uniformly combined with chaste magnificence.

WORKSOP, near, Worksop Manor, the magnificent seat of the Earl of Surrey. The mansion that formerly occupied the site of the present structure, was accidentally destroyed by fire in the year 1761, and the present one was shortly afterwards commenced, from the designs of Payne; it was originally intended to form a quadrangle, of which, however, only one side has yet been built; but this possesses extreme beauty. The present front faces the north, and was intended, in the general plan of the house, for the back front: it is of handsome white free-stone, and is 318 feet long; from the centre a portico projects itself, consisting of six noble Corinthian columns, which support an elegantly ornamented tympanum and pediment, and the whole of the façade presents a degree of lightness, beauty, elegance, and grandeur. The apartments are numerous, and of exquisite proportions, they are sumptuously decorated, and contain several interesting curiosities, besides an excellent collection of paintings and family portraits, which latter will be considered as more particularly deserving attention by those who recollect the distinguished part borne by many of the Howards, in important transactions that are closely interwoven with our national history. The surrounding park includes a circuit of about eight miles; it is naturally very fine, and contains an abundance of majestic timber, some of it sufficiently venerable to have flourished in the time of the Plantagenets.
EAST RETFORD is tolerably well-built, and contains a good free grammar school, besides a handsome town-hall, in which the sessions for the town and district are held. The church, a neat Gothic edifice, with a handsome square tower, consists of a commodious nave and two side-aisles, which are well lighted; but the chancel is small and gloomy, and tends much to the disadvantageous appearance of the altar-piece, that represents the Last Supper. The market is held on Saturday, and is always very abundantly supplied with every article of provision; besides which Retford enjoys the privilege of sending two members to parliament. On the opposite side of the river is West Retford, which is generally considered as part of the above town on account of its extreme nearness; but in strict propriety it must be reckoned entirely separate and distinct; the place is small, and contains a good hospital for the support of 16 brethren, besides the church, which has a square tower and spire; but otherwise here is nothing at all interesting to the traveller.	21¼ 17½ 15¾ 11 9¾	to Tickhill 9 m. to Blythe 6 m., thence to Bawtry 4 m. CHESTERFIELD TO LIVERPOOL, BY TIDESWELL, BUXTON, MACCLESFIELD, KNUTSFORD, AND WARRINGTON, WITH BRANCHES TO MANCHESTER.

MANCHESTER is supposed to include the site of the Roman station called Mancunium, which, previous to the invasion of the island by that people, belonged to the Britons, and was re-occupied by them about four centuries afterwards, though only for a short time, as they soon relinquished it to the Saxons. Manchester gives title of Duke to the family of Montague, and is an immense manufacturing, mercantile, and trading town; it is situated at the conflux of the rivers Irk and Irwell, and at the extremity of the Bury, Manchester, Rochdale, and Bridgewater canals. On the west side of the Irwell is Salford, which, though a distinct township, and under a separate jurisdiction, may nevertheless be considered a suburb of Manchester, to which it is connected by five bridges; one of these, however, is for foot passengers only: the Irk is also crossed by four bridges, but only three of them are passable for carriages. The collegiate church is a handsome Gothic structure, ornamented with some beautiful sculpture; the tabernacle work over the hall is very curious, and it has a large and powerful organ; it is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, St. George, and St. Dennis. The collegiate body consists of a warden, four fellows, two chaplains, two clerks, four singing men, and four choristers. Here are fifteen other churches, exclusive of two at Salford, also several Roman Catholic chapels, a Quaker's meeting-house, and numerous chapels for different classes of dissenters. This town has also an hospital, a free school, and library, all of them well endowed. The hospital was founded by Mr. Cheetham, and incorporated by Charles II. for the maintenance of forty boys, but now provides for double that number; this gentleman also erected a spacious library, well furnished with books, and settled a salary upon the librarian; and also an annual sum for increasing the collection. The free school was founded by Hugh Oldham, bishop of Exeter: in this, the clergy in the town and neighbourhood receive their early education. Here are also an Infirmary, Lunatic Hospital, Asylum, and various charitable institutions. Amongst the numerous and extensive manufactures with which it supplies the European markets, the most important branch, and indeed chief source of its prosperity, is the cotton trade; and by the improvements therein made, and intermixture of silk in their velvets, they are made greatly to resemble those of Genoa; it is also noted for the manufacture of calicoes, checks, and in short every description of goods, where cotton forms the chief ingredient. A silk manufactory has lately been established here, and that for making and finishing hats is carried on to a great extent. Of all these commodities vast quantities are exported. Here is a spacious and elegant concert room, a new and commodious set of assembly rooms, a neat theatre, and also a circus, which is a very handsome building, constructed for the exhibition of equestrian feats and dramatic performances. Manchester, which may now be considered as next to London and Liverpool in population and extent, is about two miles long and one and a half wide; it contains about six hundred streets, is well paved, lighted, and watched; in appearance it is similar to the generality of manufacturing towns, with the exception of its modern buildings, many of which are very handsome, and some of them elegant. The town is not incorporated, but is governed only as a manor by courts leet and baron. Here is a constant intercourse by water carriage on the Irwell to Liverpool, for vessels of 20 or 30 tons, while the Duke of Bridgewater's canal has opened a passage to the Mersey at 30 miles distance, and by means of these and other canals and navigable rivers, Manchester has now water communication, not only with the whole interior of England, but also with the eastern and western seas.

CHESTERFIELD TO WHITCHURCH, BY LEEK AND
NEWCASTLE UNDER LYME, WITH A BRANCH TO BAKEWELL.

BASLOW. Chatsworth, the noble seat of the Duke of Devonshire, is reckoned one of the wonders of the Peak: it is situated in a spacious valley, near the foot of a lofty mountain, covered with wood, on the highest part of which is the hunting-tower, a square building with a round tower at each angle, from whence a very extensive prospect is enjoyed. The present magnificent mansion was erected on the site of a more ancient structure by the first Duke of Devonshire, at the beginning of the last century; its form is nearly a square of about 190 feet, including a spacious quadrangular court, having a fountain in the centre, with the statue of Orpheus. The fronts which form the quadrangle are decorated with richly sculptured representations of military trophies; and the principal entrance being by a noble flight of steps on the west side, leading to a terrace extending the whole length of the building, has a very fine effect. The interior is gorgeously decorated with painted walls and ceilings, but does not contain many of the more refined efforts of the pencil; it however possesses some attractions of another kind, which deserve the most minute attention of the tourist: these are the numerous exquisite pieces of carving by the celebrated Gibbons. The park is about nine miles in circumference, it is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and adorned in many parts with excellent plantations; beyond these, towards the north, the dusky mountains of the Peak rear their lofty heads to the clouds with extraordinary grandeur and sublimity. The water-works, which, somewhat less than a century ago, gave this seat a celebrity it has not yet lost, are situated to the south and south-east of the mansion; they are still in tolerable order, but do not now excite much interest. The principal of these is the great cascade, and when this is exhibited, a vast quantity of water rushes with considerable violence from the domed roof of a temple at the head of it, and from a number of lions' heads, dolphins, sea-nymphs, and other figures with which it is ornamented, and falling into a basin in front of the building, is discharged from thence over a series of steps or stages down a steep hill, at the bottom of which it disappears by sinking into the earth. The old house at Chatsworth was, for thirteen years, the place of confinement of that beautiful and unfortunate princess, Mary Queen of Scots.

	13 $\frac{3}{4}$	LEEK is a manufacturing town of some importance, the inhabitants of which are chiefly employed in making silks, ribbons, and buttons: it contains a neat church, with a square tower, besides a large handsome chapel belonging to the methodists, and meeting-houses for the use of other different sects of dissenters. There is in the church-yard a dilapidated but curious pyramidal cross; it is about 10 feet high, and is decorated with imagery and fretwork, but its origin is involved in obscurity, as it bears no inscription; several eminent antiquaries have, however, attributed it to the Danes . The market is on Wednesday . In this neighbourhood there are a number of stupendously grand, but rude and rugged rocks, some of which overhang the different precipices, and astonish and terrify the passing traveller with their majestic frown: it would be futile to attempt to account for their origin or formation by any of the operations of nature, though by different writers their present appearance has been ascribed to the "general burst," as the deluge has been emphatically termed, or to some violent earthquake, or volcanic eruption; but the most superficial observer will here readily perceive the wonderful works of the Almighty, and be ready to exclaim with the Egyptian magicians, "This is the finger of God!" A curious phenomenon takes place in this town during a certain time of the year, which is, that the sun sets twice in the same evening; this is occasioned by the intervention of one of those craggy mountains above mentioned. For after setting behind the top of the mountain, it again breaks out on its northern side, which is steep, before, in its fall, it reaches the horizon: so that the inhabitants have within a few miles, the rising sun, when in fact he has passed his meridian, as at Narrowdale ; and the setting sun twice in a few hours, as here at Leek . The Blue hills in this neighbourhood must also be noticed, on account of the saline spring that issues therefrom: it imparts a rusty brown colour to the rocky

WHITCHURCH, 1 m. before, Broughall, ———

NEWCASTLE UNDER LYME, derives its name from a castle that formerly stood at Chesterton, a short distance from the town, but of which scarcely any vestiges can now be seen: here was a monastery for Black Friars, and four churches, but three of the latter were destroyed in the time of the barons' wars, and have not since been rebuilt; the remaining one is, however, a handsome structure, and is adorned with a lofty square embattled tower. This town also contains meeting houses for the different denominations of dissenters, and twenty good alms-houses, built and endowed by the Marquis of Stafford and Lord Grenville. The houses in Newcastle are neat, and uniformly built; they occupy a very pleasant situation, and are inhabited by individuals whose chief support is derived from the clothing trade, the manufacture of hats, and the potteries. Newcastle is an ancient borough; it has sent two members to parliament ever since the time of Edward III., and has a weekly market on Monday. The neighbouring race course, is very dangerous on account of the number of unfilled coal pits by which it is surrounded. Among the curious circumstances connected with this town, may be noticed that of a human skull having been found in a stone dug from a quarry in a place called Gallows-field; and also the surprising strength of God-

PAINSWICK is a small market-town, but not much frequented: it is situated on the southern acclivity of Sponebed Hill, and composed of irregular buildings, chiefly inhabited by persons employed in the clothing trade. The church is dedicated to St. Mary; it consists of a nave, chancel, and side-aisles, with a tower and spire at the west end, rising to the height of 174 feet. This building partakes of that mixed character of architecture, so frequently to be found in religious edifices: the south aisle is modern, having Doric pillars, with corresponding capitals; and the entrance is beneath a portico of the Ionic order. On the summit of Sponebed Hill is an ancient fortification, doubly entrenched, called Kimsbury Castle, King's Barrow, and Castle Godwin; it includes about three acres, and is as nearly square as the nature of the ground would permit. Roman coins have been found here at different periods, together with a sword, and some heads of spears, greatly corroded.

CHIPPENHAM TO SALISBURY, BY DEVIZES.

CHIPPENHAM, a large and ancient borough, is situated in a fine valley, upon the south bank of the river Avon, which makes a bold sweep round the town, and is here crossed by a handsome free-stone bridge. It consists principally of one street above half a mile in length, nearly in the centre of which stands the town-hall, a mean looking building, that forms a striking contrast to the respectable appearance of the houses in general. The church is a large and ancient structure, and consists of a nave, south aisle, chancel and chapel, with a tower and spire at the west end. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the woollen trade, broad cloths and kerseymeres being here manufactured to a considerable extent; and the town also derives no small advantage from its situation on the most frequented line between London and Bath. Chippenham is governed by a bailiff and twelve burgesses, sends two members to parliament, and has the benefit of a weekly market on Saturday.	From Salisbury. 26³/₄ 24 22 21 19 16¹/₂ 7¹/₂ 6	$\frac{1}{2}$ m. farther, to Beckhampton Inn 9 m., thence to Marlbro' 7 m. Chitway Heath to Calne 3$\frac{1}{2}$ m. Rowde Near Devizes, Cross the Kennet and Avon canal To Trowbridge 10 m. } To Bradford 13$\frac{1}{2}$ m. } To Bath 18$\frac{1}{2}$ m. } * DEVIZES To Market Lavington 6 m. } to Marlborough 10$\frac{1}{4}$ m. } Nursteed Lide About $\frac{1}{4}$ m. farther, to Ludgershall 16 m. Red Horn Turnpike Enter Salisbury Plain. 1 m. before Long Barrow Cross, to Amesbury 4 m. To Warminster 14$\frac{3}{4}$ m. Long Barrow Cross to Amesbury 4 m. } To Warminster 15$\frac{3}{4}$ m. } To Bruton 27$\frac{1}{2}$ m. } To Mere 19 m. } Woodford Hut * SALISBURY	From Chippen. 5³/₄ 8¹/₂ 10¹/₂ 11¹/₂ 13¹/₂ 16 25 26¹/₂ 32¹/₂ DEVIZES. Here are two churches, St. John's and St. Mary's; the former is, to the architectural antiquary, one of the most interesting parochial edifices in the kingdom; St. Mary's church, situated in the north-eastern division of the town, has a quadrangular tower at the west end, and from the different styles of its architecture, was evidently erected at various and distinct periods. Devizes also contains a chapel of ease belonging to the establishment; a meeting-house for dissenters; a handsome town-hall of modern erection; a new gaol, with the governor's house in the centre, from the summit of which may be enjoyed a most beautiful prospect towards Bath and Gloucester; a free grammar-school; and a spacious house of industry. The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, eleven aldermen or masters, and thirty-six common-councilmen; it sends two members to parliament, and has an abundantly supplied weekly market on Thursday.

CHIPPENHAM TO WEYMOUTH, BY TROWBRIDGE, FROME, BRUTON, SHERBORNE, AND DORCHESTER, WITH A BRANCH TO POOLE, BY WARMINSTER.

SHERBORNE. This was formerly a bishopric, but in the year 1075 the see was removed to Old Sarum, and then the cathedral was converted into an abbey, which was originally a noble structure, but great part of it was burnt in the reign of Henry VI., owing to a quarrel between the monks and the inhabitants. It was made parochial at the dissolution of monasteries, and is now one of the finest churches in the west of England. It contains specimens of different styles of architecture, and is built with good free-stone obtained in the neighbourhood; the interior is light, lofty, and spacious, having the roof supported by numerous groins, springing from the side aisles. At the intersection of the tracery work are a number of shields, bearing different arms, with roses, portcullises, and other cut devices; among them are the arms of Bishop Neville; the initials and rebus of Bishop Langton; and the letters H. E. connected with a lover's knot, said to be the initials of Henry the Seventh and his queen. The initial of Ramsam's christian name, and his rebus, are carved in many places upon the walls and roof. In the south transept is a very superb monument, erected to the memory of John, Earl of Bristol, who died in 1698; it is composed of various kinds of marble, and bearing an inscription written by Dr. Hough, Bishop of Worcester, who was a sufferer, as well as the earl, during the reign of James the Second. Near this is a tablet to the memory of a son and daughter of William, Lord Digby, charged with some beautiful lines from the elegant pen of Pope. Sherborne and several other lands were presented by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose unhappy family were tricked out of the estate by that mean prince James I., simply to pamper the arrogant power of an obscure minion. The town is pleasantly situated on the declivity of a hill, and is divided into two parts, called Sherborne, and Castleton, by the river Ivel: that part called Castleton had formerly a castle, which was beautifully situated, and experienced in the time of Charles I. all the chequered fortunes at-tenant upon civil war. This was the first place that was besieged by the parliament forces, and the last which held out for that prince; it is now in a very ruinous state, but has the appearance of having been both large and beautiful. The situation of this castle was extremely well chosen; it commanded all the adjacent vale on the north and west, and the whole ridge of hills on the south, and was protected on the northern side by a large moor, that has since been drained and converted into a fertile meadow. The assizes were held at Sherborne till the reign of Edward the Fourth; but have since been only occasionally held here, in cases of epidemical disorder, or other particular circumstances; at present the general quarter sessions for the peace is held at Sherborne once a year, on the Tuesday after Easter. The trade of the town is principally confined to the silk and linen manufactures, which are in a flourishing state, and employ many hands. The markets are well supplied, and are held on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

The mansion, of brick, consists of a square centre, with two wings at each end: the centre was built under the direction of the Earl of Burlington, for a hunting seat, on the site of an ancient palace that was ruined in the time of the civil wars; and the staterooms are comprised in the wings, which were added when it was made a regular mansion. LUDGERSHALL. PORTSMOUTH, the most considerable naval arsenal in the British dominions, is situated on Portsea island, at the entrance of Portsmouth harbour; it is of very remote origin, but first became of consequence, as a sea-port, in the reign of Henry VIII., by whom the royal navy, on its present principles, as a systematic establishment, was first instituted. The convenient situation of Portsmouth, and its proximity to the continent, together with the extent and security of its harbour, caused it to be then fixed upon as the general rendezvous of ships of war; since which period it has continued to increase in extent and importance, every succeeding monarch having added something towards the strength and security of the place, till it has at length arrived at a degree of perfection which has rendered it almost impregnable. On entering this magnificent magazine of our national glory, the visitor cannot fail to be struck with astonishment at the stupendous arrangements here exhibited for building, repairing, and fully equipping, with a celerity truly wonderful, whole fleets of ships of the first magnitude. The effect is certainly considerably decreased since the termination of the war, but suf-

Besides these churches, both of which are parochial, Marlborough contains several dissenting meeting-houses, and a large prison, with two open courts, which serves both as a county bridewell and a town-gaol. Marlborough formerly contained some monastic institutions; and has given title to several individuals immortalized in the page of English history; it sends two members to parliament; and has a weekly market on Saturday; but not possessing any manufacture of importance, is principally indebted for its support to its advantageous situation on the Bath road.

This borough sends two members to parliament: its church is a plain structure, with a tower at the west end, and contains a superb monument to the memory of Sir Rd. Bridges, Knt., and his wife Jane. ficient remains amply to gratify curiosity, and render Portsmouth a place well worthy the attention of the traveller. The fortifications form a noble semi-circular terrace, which is planted with elms, and being kept in excellent order, makes a delightful promenade, upwards of a mile in length. From the platform, which is more immediately the resort of company, is an extremely fine sea-view, including the anchorage at Spit-head, and the isle of Wight in the distance: the more contiguous scenes are scarcely less beautiful. Portsmouth received its first charter from Richard, Cœur de Lion; but that under which it is at present governed was received from Charles I. The public business is mostly transacted at the town-hall, a large building, situated near the middle of the High Street, with an open space for the markets beneath. The church is a spacious building, with a tower 120 feet high, forming a good mark for seamen. This town sends two members to parliament: the market is held thrice a week, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, and is well supplied with all kinds of provision. In Broad Street, which forms part of what is denominated Portsmouth Point, is the custom-house, a large and convenient structure; and at the Point, close to the mouth of the harbour, is a spacious bathing-house. The amusements of the upper classes consist of subscription assemblies, occasional concerts, and the pleasures of the theatre. The town of Portsea, which, till within these last thirty years, was considered only as a suburb of Portsmouth, is situated on what was formerly Portsmouth Common: it originated within the last century from the vast augmentation of buildings necessary for the accommodation of the increased number of persons employed in carrying on the various manufactures, and the different branches of trade established at Portsmouth during the late war, and is now considerably larger than its parent town.

The hall, on the south side of the house, has an open gallery all round it, and a staircase at each end, leading to the gallery by double flights of steps; it is fitted up as an old baronial hall, and is 110 feet long, including the staircase, 25 broad and 25 high: the west wing contains a library 45 feet long and 22 wide; besides a breakfast-room that is remarkable for a very singular cornice, composed of small heads in basso-relievo, supporting the points of groins; though these are 160 in number, and every head is expressive of bearing weight, yet each countenance expresses it in a different way, and there are not any two alike among them all. On the north side of the mansion is the saloon, eating-room, and music-room, the two latter are of the same proportions measuring 36 feet by 24, and 18 high: the saloon, in the middle, is of an octagonal shape, 40 feet in diameter, and 24 high; and it enjoys a very beautiful view of the lawn and water: these three rooms are en-suite, and communicate with the grand picture gallery, hall, and passage. The centre of the new north front is similar to the east end of Henry VIIIth's chapel at Westminster, and its character is peculiarly light and beautiful: its form and component parts are also admirably adapted to this situation: for, by projecting before the regular surface of the building, and having windows in the three outer faces, it thereby gives to the saloon a variety and extent of prospect singularly advantageous: the turrets and flying buttresses are likewise beautiful appendages, and by catching the rays of the sun, when in the east or west, are calculated to illumine the gloom of a northern aspect. The whole of this mansion is decorated with a choice and very extensive collection of paintings by the best masters, which are liberally exhibited to the public every Tuesday and Friday.

The first part was built by John, Earl of Shelburne , grandfather to the present possessor, which, in style of architecture, resembles an Italian villa. The first Marquis extended the building by adding a wing, 300 feet in extent, in imitation of a wing of Dioclesian's palace at Spalatro ; this forms the southern side of two quadrangular courts, which are surrounded by domestic offices. The third portion, to the north of the house, but connected with it, consists of a series of private apartments, which are appropriated to visitors. It is situated in an extensive and beautiful park, greatly diversified by nature, and enriched by skilful and judicious cultivation. The principal front faces the south, and commands the most beautiful and richly variegated prospects. It is ornamented with a large portico, supported by columns of the Doric order, with corresponding entablatures, whence a pediment arises, on which the family arms are sculptured in bold relief. The apartments are fitted up in the most elegant style, and many are ornamented with valuable pictures and drawings. plantations, arranged in the most tasteful and elegant varieties. A noble lake, which covers the space of about 30 acres, expands its pellucid waters in front of the mansion, delightfully heightening the beauties of the surrounding scenery; it is divided into two branches, one of which, after flowing a considerable distance under a fine hanging wood, is lost to the view by a circuitous course round a beautiful mass of plantation; the other recedes behind an elevated part of the lawn. At the northern extremity of the lake is a rock, through which the water issues in several broken streams, which, though artificial, have the wildness and picturesque effect of nature in the most uncultivated state. These united cascades fall in one sheet against some projecting stones of irregular shapes. In these rocks are also contained several subterraneous passages, whose dark openings, being in perfect unison with the noise of the waters and the seclusion of the spot, render this a scene at once sublime and beautifully awful. In the arrangement and distribution of ornaments in these grounds, nature has been suffered to reveal unconfined, guided, but not fettered, by art, only sufficient to render her works, if possible, still more delightful.

COGGESHALL is partly situated on low ground, near the north side of the river Blackwater, and partly on the acclivity of a pleasant hill rising on the same side. The church, pleasantly situated at the upper end of the town, with a good prospect southward, is dedicated to St. Peter, and has a large square tower at the west end: near this building stand three unendowed alms-houses, but the support and education of the poor inhabitants is further provided for by several benefactions.	61 $\frac{1}{4}$		COGGESHALL, 2 m. distant Marks Hall, W. BISHOP'S STORTFORD, rather a large and populous town, is situated on an eminence, and presents upon its approach a somewhat curious appearance, from the number of malt houses with which it abounds; these meet the eye in every direction, and at once bespeak the principal business of the place, and chief employment of its inhabitants; the corn, but more particularly the malting trade, being here carried on to a considerable extent; and these are greatly promoted by a navigable canal, that uniting with the Lea, affords a communication with the metropolis. The town, watered by the river Stort, that flows through it, consists of four principal streets facing the cardinal points. The church, a venerable Gothic structure, stands in a commanding situation at the western extremity of the town, and consists of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with a tower and spire; many monuments recording various branches of noble families ornament the interior. There are no inns at Bishop's Stortford, but the Crown at Hockerill, which may be deemed a suburb to the town, and lies on the great north east line from London, supplies this deficiency; and is well known to all frequenters of Newmarket. 	46	15 $\frac{1}{4}$	HERTFORD gives name to the county, the title of Marquis to the family of Seymour Conway, and is of considerable antiquity; it stands on the Ermine Street, and on a ford of the river Lea, whence its name is supposed to be derived, and is a very healthy, respectable, and improving town, the streets being well-built, clean, and disposed in the form of the letter Y, with the ancient castle standing in the middle of the two horns: this fortress was erected about the beginning of the 10th century, but few remains of the original structure are now left, and these are chiefly confined to the outer walls, which exhibit portions of one round, and some angular towers. This castle was frequently the residence of royalty, and sometimes its prison, and sustained, during a long series of years, every vicissitude of fortune incidental to a building so appropriated. Hertford is governed by a mayor, recorder, ten aldermen, a chamberlain, sixteen assistants, and other officers. The earliest return to parliament was in the 23d of Edward III.; the right of election is vested in the inhabitant householders, resident freeman, &c., the number of voters is about 580. Hertford had formerly five churches; four parochial, and one belonging to the priory; but only two are now standing: these are respectively dedicated to All Saints and to St. Andrew. All Saints, the principal church, is a large edifice, standing in the south-east part of the town, and consisting of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with a low tower and spire. Besides the public buildings in Hertford already mentioned, the sessions and market-house, and town-hall, are handsome brick edifices; and the Blue-coat school, which is situated at the east end of the town, is a large building forming three sides of a quadrangle; and containing accommodation for upwards of 500 children.

COLCHESTER TO ST. ALBANS, BY BRAINTREE, DUNMOW, BISHOP'S STORTFORD, WARE, HERTFORD, AND HATFIELD.

16th and early part of the 17th centuries. Many of the apartments are of noble dimensions, and are adorned with a rich and very valuable collection of paintings, among which are portraits of the Lord Treasurer Burligh, and his son, the first Earl; there is also a very curious painting of Queen Elizabeth, and a singular representation on board, of Henry VIII. and his Queen, Ann Boleyn, at a country fair; the number and variety of figures in this piece, and their dress and occupations, lay claim to particular attention. The park and grounds contain some of the finest timber in the county, and the scenery is rendered extremely beautiful by the great diversity of surface, combined with those picturesque accompaniments, wood and water. — Near the above is Millwads Park, the property of the Marquis of Salisbury; Camfield Place, late Hon. Baron Dimsdale; and near it, Bedwell Park, Sir Culling Smith, Bart.

HATFIELD, before, Bush Hall, Sir Robert Chester.

ST. ALBANS, 2 m. distant, Childwick House, J. Lomax, Esq.; and through St. Albans, Gorbahury, Earl Verulam. This mansion was erected towards the end of the last century, and consists of a spacious stone centre, surmounted by a balustrade and cornice, united to two stuccoed wings: the principal entrance is beneath a handsome pediment supported by well proportioned columns, from whence a flight of steps descends to the lawn. All the principal apartments are of noble dimensions; they are suitably furnished, and decorated with a very rich collection of portraits. The park and grounds are well stocked with fine timber; they include about 600 acres, and have an agreeably diversified surface. A number of deer impart additional interest to the park, the scenery of which forms some good landscapes, to which the contiguity of Prè Wood gives additional interest.

ST. ALBANS. This place is said to be of greater antiquity than even London itself; as it derives its origin from the ruins of the Roman Verulam, which possessed the dignity and privileges of a free city, but was an early sufferer in the war of desolation that accompanied the descent of the Saxons, who called this city Watlingcester, evidently from its connection with the Watling-Street road. An immense number and variety of antiquities, such as coins, vessels, pillars, cornices, monuments of art, &c. have been discovered here at different times, but nothing of the ancient city is now in existence, except the ruins of a few walls, now covered with herbage: these walls are in some places about 12 feet thick. Here was formerly a magnificent abbey, and monastery, for Benedictine monks, of which the abbey-church, and a large square gateway, are now the only remains. This venerable fabric was made parochial in the reign of Edward VI., it is in the form of a long cross, and has a square massive tower, rising from the intersection of the nave and transept, and resting on four large semicircular arches: its entire length, including the chapel of the Virgin, and west porch, is 539 feet; that of the transept 174 feet; the height of the tower 144 feet, of the body 65 feet; and the breadth of the nave 74 feet six inches. The general appearance of this building, when seen from a distance, is dignified and imposing; but on approaching it, part of the effect is lost, owing to the rude mixture of Roman tiles, flints, bricks, stones, &c. which appear in its walls, and excite a stronger idea of dilapidation than the real state of the structure will justify: on entering the church, from the west porch, the interior has altogether a very fine effect, and considerable interest is excited by the variations in the architecture; in fact the parts of the building are so different, that, as a modern writer observes, "little hazard would be incurred by asserting, that the style of every age might be traced in progression from the time of the Normans to the reign of Edward IV.;" and here also may be seen, notwithstanding numerous devastations, several highly interesting monumental erections, besides screens of exquisite workmanship, and other objects, well worthy the attentive examination of the antiquary. This town also contains three other churches, and several places of worship belonging to dissenters, besides a number of well-conducted charitable institutions; it sends two members to parliament, and has an excellent market on Saturday, but receives its chief support from travellers who are constantly passing along this road, in their way to and from the metropolis. St. Albans is also famous as having been the scene of two battles fought during the disastrous struggle between the houses of York and Lancaster, both of which were extremely sanguinary.

nearly east and west, and some smaller ones branching off to the north and south; and contains many excellent houses. The church lies a little to the south of the High Street, and is an extensive fabric, apparently erected in the latter end of the fifteenth, or beginning of the sixteenth century. It consists of a nave, which is continued to form the chancel; a north and south aisle; and has a remarkably substantial tower. The interior contains several handsome monuments, and has a good painting of the twelve apostles for an altar-piece. The manor of Farnham was given by Ethelbald, King of the West Saxons, to the see of Winchester, to which it has ever since belonged. The town sent members to parliament in the 4th and 5th of Edward II., but was probably one of the places which voluntarily relinquished this privilege, in those days considered as a burden. Though not a corporation, it is governed by twelve masters or burgesses, out of whose number two bailiffs are annually chosen. Here is a free-school, good charity school, and market-house. Farnham is remarkable as being surrounded with plantations which produce the most esteemed hops in the kingdom. Market on Thursday.

The form is quadrangular, encompassing an area of nearly 80 feet square; the principal entrance being by a gateway, having a lofty hexagonal turret at each angle, with coins of the yellow brick above mentioned, alternately charged with R. KINGSTON. This town is situated on the eastern bank of the river Thames, over which is a bridge of timber, supposed to be, with the exception of London Bridge, the most ancient on the river. From coins and other antiquities discovered here, this place appears to have been a Roman station, and was either a royal residence, or demesne, as early as the union of the Saxon heptarchy, and here many of the Saxon kings were crowned. The inhabitants of Kingston were remarkable for their attachment to the cause of the unfortunate Charles I., and here the last struggle was made in his behalf. This town once sent members to parliament, but was exempt on petition to the king. The church is a spacious building, with a tower and eight bells, and contains some ancient and curious monuments. In the town-hall are held the Lent assizes for the county of Surrey.	30 $\frac{1}{2}$

Below the brow of the terrace an artificial serpentine piece of water is made to appear as if Walton Bridge crossed it in the distance. A delightful walk through the shrubbery leads to an enchanting grotto, which consists of two superb rooms, encrusted with minerals and shells, and a winding passage, containing a small bath that is supplied by the dripping of a spring through the rocks. The park and grounds are about six miles in circumference.

STAINES. This town, like many other places situated on high roads, is principally composed of houses on each side, forming one wide street: it possesses nothing particular to recommend it to notice, but from its situation is a place of some bustle, and has a market on Friday. The church is situated about a quarter of a mile from the town, and is a building of various ages, with a square brick tower. The Thames is here crossed by a cast-iron bridge, and a stone bearing the date of 1280, that stands above the bridge at Coln Ditch, denotes the boundary of jurisdiction possessed by the city of London on the river.

HULL, or Kingston upon Hull, contains several well-built streets, in which there are many very elegant residences; but it likewise possesses a variety of irregular and disagreeable streets of very confined dimensions, and also exhibits a number of houses that appear to have been built about two centuries ago; the market place is spacious and magnificent, and presents a range of houses and shops, that, for beauty of appearance, and richness of merchandize, are surpassed by few in England, out of London; near its south end there is a fine equestrian statue of William III., and in this part of the town, as well as in that near the banks of the Humber, various improvements have been made; but Hull has been most extended and improved on its north side, and in the parts of the parish of Sculcoates near the dock. The bridge over the river Hull, leading into Holderness, and commonly called the North Bridge, has two handsome freestone arches at each end, and a draw-bridge in the middle sufficiently wide to admit the largest-sized vessels used at this port. A smooth gravel-walk, nearly three quarters of a mile long, extends southward from the bridge along the east bank of the river Hull to the Humber, and at its southern extremity is an entrance to the citadel, close to the south block-house, which is situated in the west bastion, at the acute angle formed by the rivers Hull and Humber; facing the latter river there is a formidable battery, and the embra-

Here are also two other churches, besides several chapels for Protestant dissenters and others; likewise a number of excellent and well-regulated public schools and charitable institutions, a spacious theatre, a large and well selected subscription libra-

STOCKPORT is a town of considerable antiquity, and formerly contained a castle, no remains of which are now in existence; but the late Sir Geo. Warren erected on its site a large circular building with battlements and embrasures: this was intended for butchers' shambles, but not answering, it was used as a cotton manufactory, and has latterly been again altered, leaving it at the present time a kind of mart, or number of shops, for the sale of muslins, and bearing the name of the Muslin Hall. This town is entirely indebted for its present respectable state to the number and extent of its manufatures: here were erected some of the first mills for winding and throwing silk on a plan introduced from Italy, and on the decay of the silk trade the machinery was applied by the ingenious proprietors to cotton spinning, the different branches of which now form the staple manufacture of the town. Stockport is irregularly built, and remarkable for the inequality of its surface. The parish church and market-place are situated on the summit of a hill, affording a level of considerable extent. The ground consists of a solid rock of soft free-stone, with an extremely steep descent on the north towards the Mersey, but easy of access on the other sides. Part of the northern aspect is perpendicular for a height equal to that of the houses, of which a row encircles the base of the hill, having their backs to it, and concealing it from the view of the passengers. Some of these houses have apartments hollowed out of the rock; and the appearance of the whole, when closely surveyed, is very singular. An upper row of houses on the summit of the rock completely encircles the market-place, which is spacious and convenient. From this central part, the town branches off in different directions, and by the late increase of buildings, has extended on every side into the country. Here are a number of charitable institutions, beside places of worship for the different sects of dissenters, and two churches belonging to the established religion; these are St. Mary's and St. Peter's; the former is the most ancient; it appears to have been erected about the 14th century, and is built with a soft red free-stone, which was so worn by exposure to the atmosphere, that it was found necessary a few years since, to carry up additional stonework to support the steeple, which was rebuilt at the expence of the parishioners at the beginning of the 17th century. St. Peter's church is a very neat brick building, erected about the year 1766, at the expence of William Wright, Esq. The market is held on Friday, weekly. In this town and its neighbourhood there are several bridges; the oldest crosses the river Mersey on the Manchester road; this is called the Lancashire bridge, and it stands very high above the water, each end being built upon a rock. By one of the sudden and violent swells to which the Mersey is subject in the upper part of its course, the new bridge, a very noble structure, was carried away on the 28th of August 1798, and it has not since been rebuilt: this bridge consisted of one arch, above 70 yards wide, and 10 yards high. A subterraneous tunnel conveys the water from the river Mersey to an extensive cotton manufactory that has been erected between Stockport and the foundation of the new bridge. The trade and manufactures of Stockport, particularly that of cotton, have much increased of late, and it derives considerable benefit from the canal communication with the rivers Dee, Mersey, Ribble, Trent, &c.

STAYLEY BRIDGE, near, Dukenfield Hall, Mrs. Newton, is situated on high ground, in the western part of the township, and appears to have been originally a large quadrangular building of timber and plaister, surrounded by a moat yet partly remaining. A chapel is attached to the old hall, for which, as a private oratory, a licence was granted to John de Dokenfield, 1398. It is included by Sir Peter Leicester among the chapels of ease in Stockport, and is inserted as such in the present official catalogue of them, but does not appear to have been ever otherwise than domestic. In this chapel, according to Aikin's Manchester, "are buried some of the later branches of the Dukenfield family, under large tomb-stones," the inscriptions on which are stated to be "still perfect," but when the hall was examined in 1817, if any remained they were concealed under litter. Pillesdon Pen, a remarkably high hill, a mile north from the village, has a large and very strong entrenchment on its eastern limit, and forms an eminent sea-mark, as does also Lewesdon Hill, which are severally denominated by seamen, the cow and the calf, from their imagined resemblance to those animals when seen from a distance. MELBURY. Melbury House, Earl of Ilchester. This edifice stands on a rising ground, and occupies three sides of a quadrangle; the principal front is ornamented by six pilasters of the Corinthian order, and faces the east: the path leading to the entrance is conducted over a stone bridge of ten arches. The apartments are both numerous and elegant, and, together with the windows, are ornamented with the arms and quarterings of the Strangeways, who are connected with some of the most ancient families in the kingdom. The ground around the mansion is diversified by nature in beautiful irregularity of hill and dale, of verdant pastures, and venerable woods. At a pleasing distance from the south front, the canal extends itself into the shape and size of a majestic river, whose opposite bank is clothed with a numerous assemblage of lofty forest-trees. These cover the base of a hill, whose summit rises over their tops, and extends in a delightful terrace to the east and west. Hence the eye traverses an immeasurable tract of country. On the east the bold prominence of Bub Down presents the first object; and at the distance of almost 30 miles in the same line, the entrenchments at Hambleton Hill, and the town of Shaftesbury, are distinctly seen. 		DORCHESTER, a borough, and the county town, occupies an elevated situation on the banks of the Frome, and consists of three parishes. The ancient name of this place was Durnovaria, signifying the passage of the river; and it was strongly fortified, having four gates and a deep ditch; and in the time of the Saxons, two mints were established here. The town is built in the direction of the four cardinal points, and the buildings are good. The foundation of the Roman wall appears quite round the town; but to the east there is a street built upon it, and the ditch is filled up. On the south-west side of the wall there is an agreeable walk between a row of trees; but the winding of the river to the north spoils the square of the town that way. It has a newly erected town-hall and market-place, and a commodious county gaol, built after Mr. Howard's plan, on the site of an ancient castle. The streets are neatly paved, kept clean, well lighted, and the houses in general built regularly of stone. Dorchester sends two members to parliament, and the assizes for the county are held here. Several Roman antiquities, and the remains of military ways, have been discovered in this town, particularly a Mosaic pavement, four feet under the surface of the ground. St. Peter's is the only church that

STOCKTON, or Stockton upon Tees, is a place of considerable antiquity, though its early history is very obscure: it was destroyed by the Scots in the year 1325, but soon recovered its importance, and continued in a prosperous state till the civil wars of the 17th century, when it suffered considerably in the royal cause; it again flourished, however, on the return of the nation to tranquillity, and is now one of the most handsome towns in the north of England, as well for the breadth of its principal street, as for the general neatness of its buildings. This street is about half a mile long, and more than 180 feet broad at the market place, which is in the centre, and continues nearly of the same breadth to both extremities, so that the entrance, whether from the north or south, is particularly impressive: several smaller streets branch off in different directions, and at the north-east side is a spa-

15¼ WHITBY, a town of great commercial importance, is indebted for its origin to a famous abbey that was founded here by Oswy, king of Northumberland, in the seventh century. So late as the year 1540, Whitby was only a small fishing-town, containing about 30 or 40 houses, and having two or three small vessels belonging to the port; but even then there were piers for the convenience of such vessels as entered the harbour, though they were so indifferently constructed that they never long resisted the violence of the sea. In the year 1615 some alum-works were erected at Sands End, in this neighbourhood, and they proved so ad-

acious square, that contains some good buildings, and has lately been inclosed and planted. Near the middle of the principal street stands the town-hall, a large square building, partly occupied as a tavern, and containing an elegant suite of assembly-rooms, &c.; at a short distance from which a handsome column of the Doric order, 33 feet high, occupies the spot where an open cross formerly stood, and where the market is now held. The church was erected near the beginning of the last century; it is a handsome brick edifice, with a tower at the west end 80 feet high; the whole of the interior is neat and uniform, and the vestry contains a collection of works on divinity to which additions are occasionally made. Here are also meeting-houses belonging to different sects of dissenters, several charitable institutions, a good market on Wednesday, and an elegant bridge over the Tees, the erection of which cost 8000. Stockton has given birth to several eminent individuals: in its vicinity there is a good salmon-fishery; and to the south of the town, but on the north bank of the river Tees, formerly stood a castle, which was, however, so completely dismantled by order of parliament in 1652, that not a stone remains as evidence of its former splendour; and the only existing relic that appears to have stood within its area is a barn, now indeed converted into cow-houses. The chief manufactures carried on here to any extent are those of sail-cloths and ropes, to which may be added that of damasks, diapers, towelling, &c. Near the banks of the Tees, are two docks for ship-building; besides which the situation of the town is extremely favourable for maritime trade. Stockton consists of two parts, severally called the borough, and the town; they both form one parish, but have each certain peculiar officers. The river flows in a very circuitous course below the town, and expands itself into a large bay above three miles wide, as it approaches the German ocean, where vessels not unfrequently seek shelter during tempestuous weather. Stockton has been greatly improved within the last 50 years, and now possesses all the elegant pleasures of polished life.

vantageous, that two great branches of trade were thereby opened at the port, one for supplying the works with coal, and the other for conveying the alum to distant parts; shortly afterwards new vessels were built here, and the inhabitants, whose ideas began to expand, rose to a state of opulence, and the place became of importance. At a subsequent period the present piers were erected, and the western one now extends nearly 1560 feet; it terminates in a circular head, and has a very beautiful appearance, it has also a battery, with a good parapet, and embrasures for five pieces of cannon, is strengthened by another battery on the east cliff, and a third near the Scotch head, forming together an effectual protection to the town and harbour against the privateers or ships of war of an enemy. Several docks have since been erected, and the roads in the neighbourhood, which were formerly almost impassable, have been made good and commodious; very many of the houses, too, have been re-erected in a style of superior beauty. Whitby is said to be as cold a place as Shetland, and the Orkneys; it is however, salubrious, and agricultural pursuits seem to thrive in the neighbourhood. This town stands on two opposite declivities on the banks of the river Esk, which forms the harbour, and divides the town into two parts, connected by a draw-bridge, so constructed as to allow vessels of 200 tons burthen to pass: the inner harbour, above the bridge, is capacious and secure, but the outer one, though protected by five piers from the violence of the sea, is not so safe. Whitby is closely and irregularly built, and the situation of many of the houses incommodious; most of the streets are also narrow, and some of them ill-paved and steep. The church stands near the top of a hill, on the east side of the town, a little to the north of the abbey, and is approached from the bottom of the vale by 190 stone steps; it was originally of Gothic architecture, but now retains little of its ancient form: here are several monumental erections commemorative of the Cholmley family, and a superb one to the memory of that excellent officer, General Lascelles, who was a native of Whitby. This town also contains a spacious chapel of ease, besides places of worship belonging to different sects of dissenters, a town-hall, poor-house, dispensary, &c. Of Whitby Abbey nothing now remains but the venerable ruin of the church, which occupies a commanding situation on a high cliff, on the east side of the town, of which it enjoys a fine picturesque view, together with the river Esk, and a beautiful country, with the frowning heights of the black moors rising

RABY. Raby Castle, the magnificent seat of the Earl of Darlington, became by purchase the property of an ancestor of the present noble proprietor in the reign of James I.; it stands on the east side of an extensive park, and has on the whole an uncommonly imposing effect; its extent, grandeur, and preservation are likewise strongly calculated to impress upon the mind a vivid idea of the magnificence of feudal ages. The interior is disposed into numerous apartments, many of which are elegantly decorated: the entrance hall is particularly grand, and its vastness and apparent stability excite universal admiration; the arched roof is supported by six pillars, with capitals diverging and spreading along the ceiling. Over the hall is a spacious room, in which the ancient baronial festivals were celebrated, and where 700 knights are recorded to have been entertained at one time; at the west end is also a stone gallery, whence the minstrels used to pour forth their animating strains. In the kitchen there are three chimneys, besides narrow passes in the walls, rocky and precipitous. The cathedral, a superb edifice, rising from the highest part of that rocky eminence which is occupied by the city, bursts upon the eye with commanding grandeur: it was founded in the year 1093, but was not completed in its present form till nearly the close of the 13th century; its architecture is chiefly of the Anglo-Norman character, but many parts, however, exhibit the diversified beauties of the English or pointed style. The see of Durham is one of the richest in the kingdom, and the prerogatives of the Bishop are of considerable importance, he being perpetual justice of the peace within his territories; and, if he comes in person to any court of judicature within the same limits, he sits there as chief; he also acts as lord-lieutenant of the county, and appoints the high-sheriff. This city contains six churches besides the cathedral, has a commodious infirmary: and a small square market-place, with a guildhall on its west side. The castle, now the residence of the Bishop, when he visits Durham, still retains many traces of military harshness, mixed with the elegance and convenience of modern improvements: it stands on the north side of an open area, called Palace Green, from which there is an avenue, leading to public walks; these accompany the windings of the river, and are kept in repair by the dean and chapter. Durham has lately been very much improved, and for public convenience, neatness, and elegance, through which the provisions are imagined to have been formerly served up in the banquetting room; the ancient oven, which was likewise proportioned to the munificent character of its princely proprietors, has been converted into a wine-cellar, and its sides have been divided into ten parts, each capable of containing a hog-head of wine in bottles. The park, plantations, and pleasure-grounds, are equally as extensive and dignified as the castle; many parts of them command very beautiful and enlarged prospects; and the stables and dog-kennels, which are built in an ornamental style, and judiciously situated, likewise form agreeable objects from different points of view. The grounds are abundantly wooded, and one of the terraces is 2250 feet long.

weekly market on Monday; it stands on a gentle ascent, nearly half a mile from the south bank of the river Ure, and is chiefly remarkable for the ruins of its ancient castle, which stand on the south side of the town. This formerly magnificent fortress has been the habitation of kings and princes; it was of considerable strength, but is said to have been wantonly destroyed, and that would appear, from the massy fragments, to have been effected by no less a force than the explosion of gunpowder. The existing remains of this noble monument of art consist chiefly of the keep, which is enclosed by an envelope or outwork, fortified with four towers; and the south-west view of them cannot fail to impress the beholder with considerable awe; he there surveys cumbrous masses suspended on tottering bases, deserted pillars, disjointed stones, and almost floating arches, while the stunted shrub, the pining moss, and veiling ivy, appear to mourn the general wreck, and at the same time lend their aid towards the display of every species of ruin. The many beautiful prospects enjoyed hence, are greatly enlivened by scattered villages, noble woods, and the mazy progress of the river Ure through the extensive meadows on the eastern part of the vale: from these the eye is carried across the great plain of Mowbray, and there loses the power of distinct perception among the hills of Cleveland, bordering on the eastern sea.

CARPERBY, At Askrigg, at Aysgarth, and in the neighbourhood of this place, are the celebrated falls of the Ure, which are said by good travelled judges to exceed in grandeur and sublimity the cataracts of the Nile; but about two miles hence, at Heaning, is an object seldom seen, except by those who narrowly seek amusement, and even little known in the neighbourhood. This is a most curious and beautiful fall of water pouring itself down a low steep gill or ravine of difficult access: when viewed from the bottom, the stream appears like a silver chain, of which the highest link seems to be connected with the clouds, descending through a rich display of hovering branches and shading foliage; and in proportion to the closer or more open interweaving of the boughs, now bursts and then twinkles in a manner the most curious and captivating. In a few words, the most copious language must fail in any attempt to describe the unutterable charms of this superb scene when viewed after rains that give it a full force of water.

The houses are extended over a considerable plot of ground, and though in general irregular, many of them are good brick buildings: the two bridges next the village, on the road to Huntingdon, are likewise of brick. The church is a large light edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with an embattled tower, surmounted by a spire at the west end, and a very large south porch: the latter has strong buttresses at the angles, and monstrous heads, with distended mouths, for water-spouts. The nave, which has a timber roof, is separated from the aisles by five high pointed arches, rising from light shafts, and from the chancel by another large pointed arch, partly boarded up, and exhibiting in front the king's arms: on the south side of the chancel are two stone seats. The windows are mostly divided by mullions into several lights, and exhibit some ornamental tracery. On the tower is the date 1623, which most probably HEMMINGFORD ABBOTS, now a small village on the south bank of the river Ouse, was given to the abbots of Ramsey, by the munificent bishop Ethelric, about the time of King Canute, and it continued in their possession till the period of the dissolution. The church consists principally of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with an embattled tower, surmounted by an octagonal spire, at the west end. The nave is divided from the aisles by four pointed arches, on each side, rising from octagonal columns, and was anciently open to the tower by a high pointed arch. In the chancel are memorials of the Dickens family, of whom Charles Dickens, LL.D., was 47 years rector of this parish; he died in 1794, aged 74. Here is likewise a monument for John Hildersley, Esq., barrister at law, who died at the age of 70, in 1731. ELY TO PETERBOROUGH, BY CHATTERIS, WITH BRANCHES TO ST. IVES, WISBEACH, AND HUNTINGDON.

PETERBOROUGH, a small but well-built city, was distinguished in the Anglo-Saxon annals for its extensive monastery. This was dissolved in 1540, and in the following year King Henry VIII. conferred on Peterborough the dignity of an episcopal see, and converted the conventual church into a cathedral. The style of architecture prevailing in this edifice is that termed Norman, of which the circular arch and large column form the leading characteristics: its plan corresponds with that of most other cathedrals, and consists of a nave with side-aisles, a transept, a choir terminating at the east end semicircularly, and surrounded with a continuation of the side aisles of the nave; the whole terminated at the east by what is called the new building. From the centre rises a tower, which, being open on the inside, constitutes the fabric of perforated masonry, termed a lantern; the west front, formed by a portico of three lofty arches, is richly adorned with sculpture, and was constructed in the latter part of the 13th century; the choir was completed in 1143, and exhibits the simple weighty style of Norman buildings, as does also the transept, which is nearly of the same date; the western part of the nave exhibits growing improvements in architectural design, and was finished about the year 1288, and at the eastern extremity of the choir is a fabric of much florid beauty, called the New Building, erected in the 15th century. Among the illustrious dead who have been here entombed, must be noticed Queen Catherine, the first and rejected wife of Henry VIII., who fell a victim to regal tyranny and caprice, and was here interred between two pillars, on the north side of the choir, near the altar; and here also was solemnized, in 1587, the funeral of the unfortunate Mary, Queen of Scots. The body of the Queen was brought from Fotheringhay castle, where she was beheaded, on the night of Sunday the 30th of July, and at two o'clock on Monday morning, was committed to the vault	From Peterbor. A rich hearse was erected near the grave and the choir and church were hung with black. The performance of the funeral service took place, however, on Tuesday afternoon, and was attended by thousands of spectators, and many of the nobility, the heralds, and other officers of the crown. The remains of the Queen did not rest long in their grave, for, after a lapse of 25 years, they were removed, by order of James I., to their present dignified place of sepulture, the chapel of King Henry VII. at Westminster. The close, situated to the west of the cathedral, presents a source of much gratification to the antiquary; it is nearly surrounded by impressive vestiges of ancient monastic buildings; and to the south of the cathedral are some remains of a spacious cloister, formerly the ambulatory of the conventual institution. St. John's church, near the centre of the city, may likewise be mentioned on account of its altar-piece, painted by R. K. Porter, and a beautiful tablet with figures, executed by Mr. Flaxman, R. A. The streets of Peterborough are in general regular, and many of the buildings are extremely neat; its trade in coal, corn, and timber, is considerable, and the stocking manufacture is carried on here to a great extent. The city is governed by a mayor, recorder, six aldermen, and eight common council; sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Saturday.

TEIGNMOUTH, as its name implies, is situate at the mouth of the river Teign, on a very gentle declivity, and is sheltered on the east and north-east by a chain of hills, near the foot of which stands the pleasant village of Shaldon in front, and the wide expanse of ocean on the east. It is a place of remote antiquity, and is recorded to have been burnt by the Danes; it was also nearly destroyed in the reign of queen Anne, when the French landed and set fire to it. Since that period, however, the town has become of much more consequence, has rapidly increased indeed, is still increasing in population and extent, and is become one of the most fashionable watering places on the western coast; in proof of which may be adduced the uniting of West with East Teignmouth, and junction of the latter with Shaldon, heretofore separated by the Teign, but now approached over a newly erected stone bridge, and thus become as it were a suburb to Teignmouth. The churches of East and West Teignmouth have both been rebuilt, and are handsome edifices, a splendid crescent has been erected fronting the sea, with a handsome set of new public rooms in the centre; a new theatre has been built, new baths constructed, and here are also two respectable libraries. The climate is here so very temperate, that the myrtle, geranium, and hydrangea flourish in the open air. The walk or promenade leads from the rooms towards the south over an extensive flat, between hills, called the Den, on which is a small fort erected for the defence of the town. The Den is now enclosed and planted, and also possesses a circular drive; for the accommodation of pedestrians, seats are placed in the most favourable situations for enjoying views of the sea, the cliffs, the range of the coast, and many interesting objects; the view from hence up the river is extremely beautiful; the ground gradually rising on each side into verdant hills, ornamented with wood, and enriched with cultivation. The cliffs overhanging the sea have a singular appearance; being, with the exception of a few broad patches of verdure, of a deep red colour, and mount in rude irregular shapes to the height of seventy or eighty feet. The prosperity of Teignmouth depends in no small degree upon its summer visitors. Its chief commerce consists in the exportation of pipe clay to Bristol, Liverpool, Staffordshire, and other places; many vessels are however built and repaired here, and upwards of one hundred and twenty sail of shipping belong to Teignmouth and Shaldon. EXMOUTH TO MINEHEAD, BY EXETER, TIVERTON AND BAMPTON.

EXMOUTH, so named from its situation at the mouth of the river Exe, is one of the oldest and best frequented watering places in the county; and though many of the buildings are low and incommodious, yet there are some handsome houses, occupied by very respectable families, who make Exmouth their constant residence, and have the pleasure of meeting in a good assembly-room. This town is well sheltered from the north-east and south-east winds, by some high hills which rise almost close behind it, and supply the place with excellent water. The walks are delightfully pleasant, commanding views worthy the pencils of the best masters. From a hill called Chapel-hill, the eye is presented with a line extending from the city of Exeter to Berry-head, which points include, by estimation, a space of twenty miles; this line is broken by several gentle hills, that gradually ascend from the coast on the opposite side of the river, and are covered with lively verdure and woody enclosures, the village of Starcross skirting their bottoms. Behind these hills some bold towering head-lands of varied shapes and unequal heights spring up, through which appear many woody summits, barren rocks, and other objects of various kinds, gradually diminishing and forming a complete landscape. Here is also a fine view of the ocean, and every vessel that passes to Tor Bay, Teignmouth, Brixham, Dawlish, Topsham, and Exeter. The climate of Exmouth is remarkably mild, which is proved by the fresh verdure of luxuriant trees that border the water; though in most situations so near the sea, vegetation is visibly checked. The air of this place is very favourable to persons labouring under consumptive disorders.

Of the original building dedicated to St. John, nothing now remains; at the dissolution it was granted to Edward Harman, Esq.; by whom the present handsome mansion, termed the Priory, is supposed to have been erected; and having passed through several hands, at length became, by purchase, the property of William Lenthal, Esq., the celebrated speaker of the House of Commons. This gentleman long lived here in dignified retirement, and the building is still the residence and property of his descendant. The house, which is the great ornament of Burford, has received considerable addition, in a style suited to the habits of elegant life, and contains several fine paintings, some of which were brought here from the collection of King Charles the first at Hampton Court, when those pictures were sold by order of Parliament. Adjoining is a chapel built by the Speaker Lenthal. — About 3 m. distant from Burford, near LittleBarrington, Dutton Lodge, unoccupied; and Barrington Grove, C. Greenaway, Esq.; and at Great Barrington, Barrington Park, Lord Dynevor. The mansion is an elegant structure of the Doric order: it is delightfully situated on an eminence, and commands many pleasing prospects. The park is about 3 miles in circumference, and the grounds are a fine specimen of the ferme ornée.

BAMPTON appears to have been a town of some traffic and eminence before the Conquest; but now wears the tranquil appearance of a large village: it has a nominal weekly market on Wednesday, but very little business is transacted; nor has the place any municipal officer of a higher quality than the churchwardens, &c. common to every parish. The church is a large and handsome building, in the form of a cross, with a tower springing from the centre, surmounted by a weighty spire. The interior has lately been adorned by a good organ, placed there by private subscription. The tithes are divided between three portions, each of whom is presented by the cathedral church of Exeter. Not far distant from the church are some remains of a castle, which is said to have been built by King John.

BURFORD. The houses here are ancient in general character, and are, with a very few exceptions, irregular and ill built. This place was formerly much engaged in the manufacture of coarse woollen cloths; and, in the early part of the last century, great quantities of malt were made here, and conveyed to London by the river Thames from Radcot Bridge. But both trades are now falling into entire decay. The great number of malt-houses, either in ruins or converted to other purposes, shew the extent to which the latter branch was once cultivated. Its weekly market and situation on the high road from London to South Wales appear to form the most profitable resources of the town. FAVERSHAM, a town of remote origin, situated on a navigable arm of the Swale, consists principally of four streets, forming an irregular cross, in the centre of which stands the guildhall and marketplace. It is a borough by prescriptive right, as well as by charter, though it does not appear to have ever been summoned to return members to parliament. An abbey was founded here at an early period, the buildings of which were extensive and numerous, but scarcely any thing except remnants of the outer walls of the precincts now exist to point out its site. Faversham has been a member of the port of Dover from a very early period; and its connexion with the cinque ports may probably account for many of the privileges which it has enjoyed from time immemorial. The present church is a spacious and handsome fabric, built of flint, in the form of a cross, and coined with stone: it consists principally of a nave, with aisles, chancel, and transept, with a light tower at the west-end, ornamented with pinnacles, and terminated by an octagonal spire 73 feet high. The outer walls are sustained by strong buttresses, and appear of the age of Edward II. or III.; but the interior parts of the west were rebuilt in 1755.

GAINSBOROUGH TO STONE, BY WORKSOP, MANSFIELD, ALFRETON, ASHBOURN, AND CHEADLE; WITH A BRANCH TO NEWCASTLE UNDER LYNE.

WORKSOP, beyond, Clumber, the truly superb seat of the Duke of Newcastle, which exhibits, in a striking point of view, the wonderful effects that affluence, guided by discretion, is capable of achieving in districts which appear positively to forbid the operations of art. Little more than half a century ago the scene at which the traveller is now arrived, was a black and repulsive heath over-run with rabbits, the only animals that are calculated to live upon so cheerless a soil when in a state of nature. At the present time the plantations cover a vast extent of ground, and a narrow river that formerly meandered in silent obscurity through a marshy vale, is now augmented to a lake of noble proportions; besides which a most magnificent mansion has been erected on a spot that was at one time deemed undesirable, even by the sordid classes of society. The park is about eleven miles in circumference; it commands many highly interesting prospects, and includes two ancient woods, from the largest of which, called Clumber Wood, this seat derives its name. The mansion consists of three fronts, and in the centre of that facing the lake, there is a beautiful light Ionic colonnade, that has a very pleasing effect, and particularly so in that harmonious whole which is seen to most advantage from the lofty bridge that is thrown across the extensive piece of water. In its internal arrangement it has been said to embrace the very dissonant qualities of grandeur and comfort in an equal if not superior degree to any other mansion in this country; the various apartments are furnished in the most superb manner possible, they are otherwise elegantly decorated; and, in short, every thing breathes the essence of taste and the soul of magnificence; but the visitor's attention will be more strongly attracted by the collection of paintings, which is unquestionably the most estimable in the county, and affords a greater diversity of pleasing pictures than is to be met with	From Stone	From	From Gainsbo.

Among the numerous eminences in the neighbourhood of Ashbourn, the most considerable is Thorp Cloud, which rises to a great height, and is formed like a truncated cone. There is a tolerable good descent near this into a deep hollow, called Bunster Dale, which is bounded on one side by a steep acclivity, richly covered with wood, and on the other by a wild uncouth range of lofty crags. At about half a mile distant, this ravine, by a sudden turn, unites with the southern extremity of Dove Dale, a romantic and rocky chasm, to the scenery of which the river Dove gives life and animation while pursuing its winding course, and dashing its waters over the rude masses that have fallen into it from the adjoining cliffs: the entrance of this dale has a sequestered appearance, but it soon displays the most romantic scenery imaginable, which is rendered particularly attractive by its singularity; the valley contracts, and on its sides rise a number of grey lime-stone rocks, that, in their abrupt and gigantic ascent, assume countless grotesque forms, and are clothed with mountain-ash, yew-trees, and numerous mosses and lichens: the narrow and broken path that winds along the river's bank, is occasionally so uncertain that even the foot passenger cannot, but with difficulty, pursue his cautious way. The length of the dale is somewhat more than two miles, and the views are more or less interesting during its whole extent: the numerous waterfalls, with their different

MANSFIELD. This is a very ancient town, and at the first glance, impresses the mind of the spectator with rather an unfavourable opinion; its appearance at a distance presenting but a gloomy prospect; this, however, in a great measure subsides on a nearer approach, as it certainly contains many good houses, and is altogether a flourishing and genteel market-town. The chief manufactures of Mansfield consist of gloves and stockings, both in cotton and silk, double point-net, &c.; here are also several cotton mills, and an iron foundry on a scale of some magnitude: the malting and stone trades are also of great value; and a well supplied market is held on Thursday.

The church is a large and commodious building, of the latter Gothic; it was partly burnt down in 1374, but subsequently re-edified, and is now in good preservation. The Moot-Hall, in which the county meetings are often held, stands in the market-place, and furnishes, besides the suitable apartments for the above mentioned purpose, a good assembly room. There is also a coffee-room, supplied with the London and country newspapers, periodical publications, maps, &c.; a small but well contrived theatre; a good bowling-green; and a handsome cold bath. In the neighbourhood are many domestic excavations in the rocks, inhabited by families, who, like the Troglodytes of old, have their caves, and even their gardens, formed in the bosom of the sterile stone.

forms and appearances, and the varied character of the rocks, distinguish the scenery of this valley from, perhaps, that of every other in the kingdom. About the middle of the dale, in a vast mural mass of detached rock, there is a magnificent natural arch, in shape nearly approaching to the sharply pointed Gothic, this is called Reynard's hole, and the difficulty of reaching it will be amply repaid by the view enjoyed from thence, which, though confined, is extremely beautiful; from hence a large detached solitary rock, craggy and pointed, rises to a great height: this is called Dove-dale church, and is entirely surrounded by a mass of hanging wood that covers the opposite side of the dale.

ELLASTON, before, Calwich Hall, Rev. J. Granville.

CRAKEMARSH HALL, is the seat of Sir Thomas Colton Sheppard, Bart.

ROCESTER. In this village was formerly an abbey for black canons, founded in 1146; not a vestige of which is now in existence. The church is a small modern structure, standing in the middle of a field; and containing several monuments of the Stafford family. In this field is a tall slender shaft of a cross, having the edges rounded, yet not itself perfectly cylindrical. Fret-work runs up each side of it; but from its having no inscription or peculiarity of sculpture, to what it has belonged cannot now be ascertained.

The river is here navigable for barges, and by means of the new Sussex and Surrey Canal, a junction is formed with the river Arun, which communicates with the sea at Little Hampton. This was anciently a royal town, and has often been the residence of our monarchs: the remains of its castle are sufficient to warrant its having been a fortress of great strength and importance; but by whom or at what period it was built is unknown. Guildford gives title of Earl to the family of North, and sends two members to parliament, which privilege it has enjoyed ever since the 23d of Edward I. It consists chiefly of one principal street, near half a mile in length, which, from its spaciousness, and being on a declivity, presents a very striking appearance. Here are three parish churches, a town-hall, small theatre, and a weekly market on Wednesday and Saturday, at which great quantities of corn are exposed for sale: it is also plentifully supplied with all other necessaries. About two miles from the town, eastward, on Merrow Downs, is a fine race-course, where the King's plate of one hundred guineas, is annually run for in the Whitsun-week. On a hill in the parish of St. Nicholas, about a mile from Guildford, and close to the road to Godalming, are the ruins of St. Katharine's chapel, which appears to have been an elegant structure, but by whom it was erected is uncertain. been of great extent; they are of a noble character, particularly an arched gateway of Gothic architecture; and occupy a situation that is not to be surpassed for picturesque beauty. At a little distance from the Abbey are the gardener's apartments, from whence there is a steep and winding path, ascending to a charming terrace which overlooks the ruins, and commands the most beautiful and diversified prospects. At one end is an elegant pavilion ornamented with paintings; at the other, a handsome circular temple, whence appears an extensive valley, richly adorned with wood and water. The north side of the terrace is defended with a thick plantation of firs; and the slopes are covered with a variety of trees and shrubs: the scenery, indeed, is altogether fascinating.

A priory of Benedictine monks was founded here by Richard Mauleverer, in the time of Henry II., which was dissolved about three centuries afterwards by King Henry VI., and its revenues were then settled on King's College, Cambridge. This manor was the seat of the Mauleverer family for more than 500 years, when Sir Richard, the last heir, dying unmarried, left the estate by will to his mother, who afterwards, by marriage, conveyed it to the Arundel family, and from them it became the property of the Hon. Wm. Monkton Arundel, Viscount Galway, whose son, the late Lord Galway, sold it, in the year 1786, to His Royal Highness the Duke of York, who afterwards occasionally resided here with his present Majesty, then Prince of Wales: the whole estate, consisting of 4525 acres, was purchased from the Royal Duke, by Colonel Thornton, for the sum of 110,000*l.*; and was, in 1805, again sold by that gentleman to the late Lord Stourton, father of the present proprietor. The mansion occupies a gentle elevation, it was erected by His Royal Highness the Duke of York, and has since been considerably improved; but the great height of the park wall prevents it from being seen to advantage from the road. The park comprises about 400 acres of very rich land, and is charmingly diversified by a variety of hills, dales, and groves, which are enlivened by, and receive much additional beauty from a very fine expanse of water. An octagonal tower has been erected on a lofty eminence finely shaded with trees; it consists of two rooms, and is entered by a double flight of steps, both of which, as well as the terrace round the HELMSLEY BLACKMOOR, stands on the declivity of a small eminence, gently sloping towards the banks of the river Rye, and is a small market-town, chiefly composed of stone erections, whose inhabitants are supported by agriculture and the linen manufacture. By whom the castle was founded is uncertain, but it was formerly a place of considerable note; and was, in the civil wars of the 17th century, besieged and taken by the parliamentarians, under Sir Thomas Fairfax. The parish of Helmsley lies on the west side of that of Kirkdale, and is contiguous to it throughout its whole length: it extends more than 16 miles from north to south, and comprises, besides the town, 6 distant villages, numerous scattered farms, and the valley of Bilsdale, which stretches its length to the hills of Cleveland. BOROUGHBRIDGE is situated on the south bank of the river Ure, and on the great north road, at nearly an equal distance from London and Edinburgh: the houses have a neat appearance, and there is a handsome fluted column of the Doric order standing in the market-place. This town has a considerable trade in hardware, which is its chief support; it sends two members to parliament, and has the privilege of holding a weekly market on Saturday. At the distance of nearly half a mile to the south-west of this town stand those stupendous monuments of antiquity, called the Arrows: these are of an irregular though somewhat pyramidal form, and appear as if fluted, from having been worn into channels at the top by exposure to the weather: they were, in Leland's time, four in number, but one of them has by some means or other been since destroyed; the remaining three stand nearly in a line from north to south; that nearest the north is about 18 feet high, and is calculated to weigh 36 tons; the one next to it is 22½ feet high, and is supposed to weigh 30 tons; and third is about the same height and weight as the second. These obelisks have given rise to much difference of opinion; but it is now almost universally believed that they are real and not factitious stones; and a variety of concurring circumstances also tend to strengthen the opinion that they are of Roman origin.

YORK, the Eboracum of the Romans, is a place of very considerable antiquity, and has been dignified with the title of "Altera Roma;" it is said to have been a perfect epitome of Rome itself, but afterwards underwent such various revolutions, that it does not now exhibit many remains of that people: the principal of them, however, now in existence, are the arch in Micklegate Bar, and the multangular tower, with the south wall of the Mint-yard; these are certainly extremely curious and interesting memorials, and will, by an attentive examination, be a source of considerable gratification to the traveller of taste, and the lover of antiquity. The city of York is surrounded by walls, and is nearly two miles and three quarters in circumference; it is entered by four principal gates, or bars, and five posterns; of the former, the most magnificent is Micklegate Bar, above mentioned, in passing through which, an old gateway on the right hand side of the street will inevitably attract the attention of the enlightened tourist; it was the portal to the priory of the Holy Trinity, which occupied, within its precincts, that large extent of ground now called Trinity Gardens: behind these gardens there is a place of very high antiquity, but its origin is unknown, though some writers believe it to be the site of an ancient castle, which afterwards was converted into a prison for the archbishop; the mound that forms the area of this ruin corresponds exactly with Clifford's Tower, on the opposite side of the Ouse, and commands a finer prospect than any other place about the city. York is divided into three unequal parts by the rivers Foss and Ouse, the former of which is crossed by five bridges, the latter by one: about 200 yards from the eastern bank of this river (the Ouse) stands the castle, now the county prison, a superb structure, which was erected in the year 1701, on the spot formerly occupied by the ancient fortress. The Basilica, or new county-hall, was opened in 1777; it is a very elegant structure of the Ionic order. The chief pride of the city, however, is the cathedral church of St. Peter, which, though a magnificent structure, has, like York itself, undergone various and tremendous revolutions:

the oldest part of the present edifice is the south transept; this was erected about the year 1228, and affords a complete and very beautiful specimen of the style of architecture that then began to prevail. This cathedral is one of the largest structures of the kind in England, or even in Europe, and is a strikingly beautiful and magnificent structure, on which the tourist will undoubtedly gaze with admiration; but it is so surrounded with houses as to render it nearly impossible to find a station from whence a full and distinct view of it can be taken. The interior also is most abundantly rich in its various decorations, and contains a vast number of memorials of human greatness. Besides the cathedral, there are 21 parish churches within the walls, and three in the suburbs; among which those deserving of particular notice are, All Saints, St. Mary's, All Hallows, St. Dennis, and St. Margaret's; though it is generally thought that of all the religious houses in York, with the exception of the cathedral, the ruined abbey of St. Mary merits the greatest attention. Several of the public buildings in York are elegant and commodious, particularly the mansion-house and the guildhall; the assembly rooms are extremely magnificent; besides which here is a neat theatre, and several excellent charitable institutions. The streets are mostly broad and open, and the whole well paved and lighted. The chief traffick of the city is in gloves, linens, glass, and drugs, and bookselling and printing are here conducted on an extensive scale; it has also a considerable river trade, and vessels of 120 tons burden can come up the Ouse as far as the bridge; but the city also derives very considerable advantage from its numerous and well-frequented fairs, the assizes for the county, the races, music meetings, &c. York is governed by a lord mayor, a recorder, twelve aldermen, two sheriffs, eight chamberlains, twenty-four common-council-men, twenty-two assistants, a town clerk, and other inferior officers, returns two members to parliament, and has a good market on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

PONTYPOOL is singularly situated on the edge of a steep cliff, that overhangs the Aven Llywd , usually a small stream, but in time of heavy rains, it swells into a torrent. The town appears to have risen out of the small village of Trevelthen , the church of which parish is situated about 1 m. distant. The increase of Pontypool may be attributed to the iron-works that were established in the neighbourhood by the late Capel Hanbury , Esq.; but its chief celebrity is derived from the japan manufacture, called Pontypool ware , which is still carried on here, though it has greatly declined, owing to the improvements made therein at Birmingham . The town is large and straggling, but has only two principal streets: it contains many neat houses and numerous shops, but it has no public buildings worthy of notice: the inhabitants are principally employed in the coal and iron works, by which the place is surrounded; and for the convenience of carrying on the necessary operations connected with these establishments, there are rail-roads, and a canal leading hence to Newport , by means of which the produce and manufactures of	35	19

KIDDERMINSTER is a large and populous town, divided into two unequal parts by the river Stour; and though it occupies rather a low situation, is, however, remarkably clean, and well paved. The church, an elegant Gothic structure, has its windows adorned with very rich tracery; it stands on the brow of a knoll, in a commanding situation, at the end of a street leading from the market-place: from the walks in the church-yard excellent views of the town and its vicinity are obtained, in which the busy scene of the canal forms a prominent feature. The town-hall is a gloomy structure, standing in the centre of the market-place; the council-room is on its principal story, but the lower part is used as a market-house, and partly let to small shopkeepers, &c. The town contains several excellent charitable institutions for the benefit of the poor; it formerly sent members to parliament, but does not now enjoy that privilege; it has, however, a good market on Thursday and Saturday, which is well attended, and abundantly supplied. The manufactures of Kidderminster are altogether upon a very extensive scale, but that of carpets is by far the most considerable. The Staffordshire and Worcester Canal, which passes through this place, opens a communication with Hull, Liverpool, Bristol, Manchester, and many other trading towns, and greatly contributes to its trade and prosperity.

STOURPORT, 1 m. before, and 1 m. distant, Moorhill, Mrs. Worthington; and 1 m. distant from Stourport, Hartlebury Castle, Bishop of Worcester. Hartlebury Castle has for many centuries been the residence of the Bishops of Worcester. In ancient times it was defended by a moat and other fortifications; and was literally a castle, whilst the clergy were considered as on a kind of footing with the military barons. In the unhappy reign of Charles I. it was taken by Colonel Morgan in 1646, and sold for little more than 3000*l.*; but, on the restoration of peace and property, the various prelates began and continued its erection, until it became, as at the present day, a very elegant and agreeable residence. Its situation is extremely pleasing; placed on a rising hill, or knoll, it has to the south a most extensive prospect over the vale of Severn; and it occupies a very extended space on the level of the park. Being built of brick, comfort is its principal feature, though many of its windows, being finished with plain Gothic arches, and its roof lined with battlements, with some turrets and belfries, it has altogether an air of grandeur when seen through the breaks in the surrounding woods, which are not, however, very extensive.

HEREFORD is of very considerable antiquity, though the date of its origin is not known: it appears to have been formerly surrounded by walls, vestiges of which are still remaining; and was from its approximation to the Welch frontier, kept in a continual state of

to the Christian faith, which occupied the spot on which the church now stands. Ethelard, viceroy of the Wiccians, gave this town to the bishoprick of Worcester, and it continued to belong to it for several ages subsequent to the conquest. A considerable portion of the early consequence of this place must undoubtedly be attributed to the patronage it received from its mitred lords, who availed themselves of every opportunity of attending to its interests; but though it is now a neat town, consisting of 12 principal streets, yet it has lost much of its ancient appearance, owing to three severe fires, which, at different times, committed great devastations here: the house in which Shakspeare was born is situated in Henley Street, and was some time since divided into two distinct habitations; the one part is now, or was lately, used as a public-house or inn: and the other as a butcher's shop; opposite to this is a public-house bearing the sign of the Falcon, where, according to Ireland, Shakspeare passed much of his time: the house where our great dramatic author spent the latter part of his life, after having gained for himself a comfortable independence, and named by him, New Place, was in the year 1643, the temporary residence of Queen Henrietta Maria. After this the mansion passed through various hands, till it unfortunately became the property of the Rev. Francis Gastrell, who, disliking the importunate questions of travellers, began by laying the axe to the root of a remarkably large mulberry tree, which had been planted by the hand of Shakspeare himself; afterwards levelled the buildings of New Place, on account of some trifling assessment he was compelled to pay towards the maintenance of the poor; and then left the town, amidst the curses of the inhabitants. The approach to the church, which is a very handsome structure, is by a long avenue of lime-trees, whose intermingled branches impart considerable solemnity to the scene: the interior of this edifice is suitably decorated in an elegant manner, and contains a number of monuments and inscriptions: but that chiefly sought by the curious traveller, is to the memory of the renowned bard, whose ashes lie on the north side of the chancel, beneath a stone, bearing an inscription expressive of an abhorrence of the violations of sepulture: on the north wall, about five feet from the floor, is an elegant monument, representing the poet, with a pen in his right hand, and a scroll in his left, having on each side the figure of a boy, the one holding an inverted torch, and the other a spade; this is enclosed between two black marble pillars of the Corinthian order, and is sur-alarm during the 13th century; besides which it has, at various times, witnessed the horrible devastations of war. Of all the public buildings in this great city, the cathedral claims most attention; this magnificent pile lost much of its venerable character by the fall of the west front, in the year 1786, which has been since rebuilt, but certainly not with that regard to consistency of architecture that the original design merited. The building is in the form of a cross, and the interior is ornamented with a profusion of carved work and mouldings of great taste. Besides the cathedral, here were formerly five churches, two of which were destroyed during a siege in 1645; the remaining three are rather elegant erections, but our limits will not allow of their description. Here are also several charitable institutions, a magnificent shire-hall of modern erection, and a neat theatre; which latter building lays claim to some attention, from having been the nursery of a Clive, a Siddons, and a Kemble: its direction was indeed for many years in the Kemble family, who for a long time were inhabitants of this city. A triennial meeting is held here of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, for the performance of oratorios, &c., for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the inferior clergy; in these the choirs are generally assisted by some of the principal performers from London, Bath, and Oxford. The situation of Hereford, on the banks of the river Wye, would be extremely favourable to its trade, if the navigation of that river was less precarious; but it so entirely depends on the state of the weather, that it cannot be made to answer the purposes of regular conveyance. The chief manufacture of this city is that of gloves, which is tolerably flourishing; but some progress has also recently been made in those of flannel and hats. The county generally has long been celebrated for cider, of which the neighbourhood of Hereford furnishes its full proportion; all the hedges in the vicinity being planted with apple trees. There is a stone bridge of six arches over the Wye. The race-course consists of a series of narrow inclosures, in the form of a circle, that were left for that purpose by the commissioners appointed to carry into effect an act of parliament passed in 1774, for the enclosure of about 150 acres of waste-lands situated on the north side of the city. Hereford is in general well built, the streets wide, clean, and spacious; the government of the city is vested in a mayor, escheator, usually called the late mayor, six aldermen, a common council, recorder, &c.; it sends two members to parliament, has an excellent market on Wed-

mounted by armorial bearings, and other suitable embellishments. The other public buildings most deserving of notice, are the chapel, formerly belonging to the Guild of the Holy Cross; adjoining which is the Guildhall, an ancient building, whose upper division is appropriated to the grammar-school, where it is said that Shakspeare received the rudiments of his education. The town-hall also claims attention: it is a fine modern building of the Tuscan order, erected in 1768, and in the next year, when the jubilee was celebrated, was dedicated to the memory of the immortal bard, by David Garrick, who honoured it with the name of Shakspeare's Hall, and presented a good statue of the poet, which now stands in a niche at the north end of the edifice. The chief room of this building is 60 feet long by 30 feet wide, and is adorned with portraits of John Frederick, Duke of Dorset, Garrick, and Shakspeare; the latter is represented as sitting in an antique chair, surrounded by books and manuscripts, and in the attitude of inspiration. The town is approached by a fine stone bridge, erected at the expense of Sir Hugh Clopton, in the time of Henry VII.; it has a good market on Friday; and participated in the commotions which agitated this country during the seventeenth century, when it was alternately in the possession of the royalists and parliament forces. Stratford has not any staple manufacture of consequence, but has a respectable commercial interchange with the neighbouring places: it was incorporated in the seventh year of Edward VI. A fresh charter of incorporation was, however, granted in the sixteenth of Charles II., by which the municipal government is vested in a mayor, 12 aldermen, (of whom the mayor is one), and 12 burgesses. In the year 1769 a festival, termed the Jubilee, was instituted at Stratford in honour of Shakspeare, which consisted of various species of amusement; but the most classical of them was an ode and oration recited by Garrick in honour of the bard; though the weather was wet and unfavourable for the occasion, yet the greatest good humour prevailed, and so great was the assemblage of exalted genius and high rank present at this national tribute, that many were unable to procure beds in the town, and are said to have been constrained to sleep in their carriages.

But from the Wyitch, which is a road cut through the rock, on the summit of the Malvern, the view is grand, extensive, and beautiful beyond description. On a clear day, with the naked eye, fifteen counties in England and Wales, four cities, and the shores of the Irish channel, besides innumerable towns and villages, and two beautiful rivers, are clearly distinguishable.

HOLYWELL is the most important place in Flintshire, and is rendered the great mart of this part of the kingdom by the numerous manufactories and lead-mines in its vicinity, and also by its easy communication with the sea. The town is pleasantly situated on the slope of a mountain, and has considerable pretensions to beauty: the church, standing in a low situation, is a modern structure, with a square tower at the west end. Here are places of worship belonging to the Roman catholics and dissenters; and at the foot of a hill, below the town, is an impetuous spring called St. Winifred's Well; it is said to throw out twenty-one tons of water in a minute, and has never been known to freeze. The lead-mines in this neighbourhood are extensive; they are worked with considerable advantage, and are highly deserving the attention of the curious. Market on Friday.

It was purchased, in 1769, of John, Earl Delaware, together with all his other manors and estates in Sussex, for 31,000*l.*, by John Baker Holroyd, Esq., who, in 1780, was elevated to the peerage as Baron Sheffield. Respecting the first foundation of this house nothing is known. It formerly consisted of two quadrangles ; but such have been the alterations successively made in it, that few traces of the ancient structure are left. It has been enlarged, and a considerable part rebuilt, by the late noble proprietor, in the Gothic style, with a beautiful chapel window; and in a Gothic frieze, which runs round the house, are introduced the arms of all the possessors of this lordship since the Norman conquest. Among the ornaments of the interior are full-length portraits of her late Majesty, when Princess of Wales, the present Earl of Chichester in regimentals, Lord Sheffield, Lord Glenberrie, and Mr. Gibbon. The mansion stands rather low, in a park of between 5 and 600 acres, the entrance to which is under a large Gothic arch, shaded by stately trees. The gardens alone contain upwards of 100 acres. Lord Sheffield's estate, situated nearly in the centre of the Weald, is the most extensive in that tract of country. The soil of this part of the country is remarkably favourable to the growth of timber. Gough relates that, in 1771, two oak trees in Sheffield Park, whose tops were quite decayed, sold standing, at the risk of their being unsound, for 69*l*. They contained upwards of 23 loads, or 1140 feet of square timber. The carriage of them to the water-side, only nine miles, upon a good turnpike-road, cost 30*l*.; each tree being drawn by 24 horses on a low carriage made for the purpose, and travelling only four miles and a half a day. They were floated from Landport, near Lewes, to Newhaven, where they were with difficulty embarked, for the use of the navy at Chatham.

Jack Cade, otherwise called John Amend-all, was discovered in a garden near this place, by Alexander Iden, Esq., then sheriff of Kent, and making some resistance, was killed: his body was afterwards brought to London, a reward of 1000 marks having been offered, by proclamation, to any person who brought him in, dead or alive; and his head was fixed upon London Bridge.

Thomas, Lord Dacre, Earl of Sussex, who sold it to James Plummer, Esq.; he began to build a large seat here, the expense of which having greatly impaired his fortune, it was sold in 1708, to John Fuller, Esq. of Waldron; and purchased of him in 1721, by Raymond Blackmore, Esq., a wine-merchant, of London, who, having nearly completed the mansion begun by Mr. Plummer, sold it in 1742, to Arthur O'Keefe, Esq., (whose monument, in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, tells us that he was descended from some Irish kings), on the death of this gentleman, it passed to his sister and heiress, who, in 1766, sold it to the brave defender of Gibraltar, Lieut. Gen. Elliot, afterwards Lord Heathfield; from whom it derived its present name. This nobleman, after having much improved it, disposed of it in 1791, to the late Mr. Francis Newberry, the fortunate vender of James's powders: of the additional improvements it experienced while in the possession of Mr. Newberry, the most prominent was the erection of an observatory, designated, in honour of his gallant predecessor, by the appellation of Gibraltar Tower. From this building, which is erected on a commanding eminence, and forms a conspicuous object for many miles round, a most extensive and beautiful prospect is obtained, as well over the sea, as the surrounding country. By the tourist who has never visited this part of Sussex, which is indeed not very generally known, the scenery it displays will be viewed with delight: it is of a character grand and interesting in the extreme; abundantly diversified, and richly wooded; and the distant sea-views, which occasionally meet the eye, impart to the whole an unusual and animated variety.

It was occupied, in 1660, by Mr. Edward English, who, at the restoration of Charles II., was a captain in the trained-bands; and whose body lies buried, under a flat grave-stone, within the communion rails of Brightling church: subsequent to this it was inhabited by several families of respectability, till Michaelmas 1697, when it was purchased by Thomas Fuller, Esq.; this gentleman rebuilt the mansion, and in 1705, put his nephew, John Fuller, Esq., in possession of it: he married Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Rose, of Jamaica, with whom he acquired considerable property in that island, and, in compliment to her, gave it the name of Rose Hill; he dying in 1745, was buried at Waldron, his family burial-place, and was succeeded by his eldest son and heir, John Fuller, Esq., who encompassed the house with a park, built additional offices, and the great room; he died in February 1765, and was buried at Waldron: his next brother, Rose Fuller, Esq., who had been many years in Jamaica, succeeded to this estate, from whom it passed to his nephew, the present proprietor. This gentleman represented the county of Sussex in parliament for many years, till the general election in 1812. By Mr. Fuller an observatory has been erected near the house; and under his auspices, an historical account of the three eastern rapes of Sussex, was said to be preparing for publication, chiefly from the large manuscript collection of the Rev. Mr. Hayley, now in his possession, but which it is much to be regretted has never yet appeared. Rose Hill, as the name implies, occupies an elevated site, from whence many beautiful prospects are obtained, over the surrounding country, including a marine view of considerable extent and grandeur. The park is extensive, well-wooded, and pleasingly diversified by undulation of surface.

played; and at the bottom of the hill, you enter a pleasant shady lane, which leads to the town, consisting of two parallel streets of considerable length, running nearly north and south, with an opening to the sea; these are intersected by some lanes, intermixed with gardens; while a suburb extends along the beach. Between the two main streets runs a small stream of water called the Bourne. The present rage for building has extended itself to Hastings, which is now rapidly increasing both in size and population. The town is well paved and lighted, and from its inclination towards the sea is very neat and clean. Here are two churches, St. Clements, and All Saints, which within the last half century have been united into one rectory. The town-hall, or court house, under which is the market-house, was erected in 1700. This town, the principal of the cinque ports, once enjoyed the advantage of a good harbour, formed by a wooden pier, which projected in a south-east direction, below the site of the present fort. About the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign this pier was destroyed by a violent tempest; large pieces of timber, of which it was composed, and vast stones that formed the foundations, are still to be seen at low water. The only method of securing vessels from the fury of the waves at present, is by drawing them up on the beach, which is here called the Stade; at the west end of this is a fort mounting eleven twelve pounders, that serves to defend the town not only against an enemy, but also against the encroachments of the sea in boisterous weather; which nevertheless sometimes occasions considerable damage: the defence of the town, however, and indeed the whole of this coast, has been still farther provided for, by the erection in appropriate situations of different batteries, and construction of martello towers. The trade of Hastings is altogether inconsiderable, compared with that which it formerly possessed. The inhabitants are principally engaged in the fisheries and a little coasting trade; the former, independent of an abundance furnished to the town, supplies the London market with soles, skait, mackerel, and herrings, of which latter, fish to the amount of 900L. have been caught here in a single day. Boat-building also employs a considerable number of hands, and the people of this place have gained as high reputation for their skill in constructing the vessels as for their courage and dexterity in managing them. Hastings, however, derives perhaps its chief source of emolument from the very great influx of fashionable visitors, with which during the bathing

(Hastings continued.) season thence town is invariably honoured. The promenade lately erected by subscription near the sea is a very great improvement, and is much frequented by the company who honor Hastings with their presence, and its interest is increased by two very respectable libraries, each furnished with a billiard-room; both front the sea, and are well supplied with newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and every literary accommodation. The bathing-machines, about thirty in number, stand to the westward of the town, close to the promenade, on which is a small building, called the bathing-room. At low water, a fine level sand extends for a great distance, and the shore has such a gentle ascent, that bathing is rendered safe at any time of the tide; the beach is particularly fine, and the water no where more pure. Convenient warm baths have also been constructed here. The assemblies are held once a fortnight during the season in a suitable room at the Swan Inn. The romantic walks and rides, and the variety of interesting objects with which the vicinity of Hastings abounds, together with the grandeur of its sea views, and general beauty of the surrounding country, all concur to render it certainly one of the most beautiful watering-places in the kingdom, and to which it is to be regretted there should be any drawback; concurring		to Robertsbridge $5\frac{3}{4}$ m., thence to London $50\frac{1}{2}$ m. See page 14		testimony, however, continues to represent it as ruinously expensive. On a lofty rocky cliff westward of the town are the remains of a very ancient castle, which approached in shape to two sides of an oblique spherical triangle, with the points rounded off. The area of the castle is about an acre and a quarter; and the walls, which are no where entire, are in some places eight feet thick. History, however, is wholly silent as to the time when this ruined pile was first erected; it is however undoubtedly very ancient, perhaps coeval with the time when Arrivargus threw off the Roman yoke. Hastings received charters from Edward the Confessor, William the Conqueror, and several subsequent monarchs down to James II., but it was that of his predecessor which gave the corporation its present form. It is composed of a mayor, jurats, and freemen, is exempted from toll, and is empowered to hold courts of judicature in capital cases. This place sends two members to parliament, and has two weekly markets on Wednesday and Saturday. BEAUPORT is the seat of Sir C. M. Lamb, Bart.

HORSHAM TO RYE.

HORSHAM. This town, one of the largest in the county, is situated on the river Adur: it is commonly thought to derive its name from Horsa, the brother of Hengist, the Saxon; but there appears to be no other authority in support of the supposition than the similarity of sound. Horsham is a borough by prescription, and has returned two members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward the First; the right of election is in those persons who possess an estate, by inheritance, or for life, in burghage houses, or burghage lands, lying within the borough, of which there are about twenty-five. The government of the town is vested in a steward, two bailiffs, who are the returning officers at elections for representatives, and two constables; all of whom are annually chosen at the court-leet of the manor, which is the property of the Duke of Norfolk. The church is a fine old structure with a lofty spire of lead and slate, and a large pointed east window. In the chancel is an ancient altar-tomb, wrought round with compartments of plain shields; and upon it is a finely proportioned recumbent figure of a man in armour, with conical head-piece ornamented, and lying upon his helmet, with his arms across his breast, a dagger at his side, and his feet resting on a dog. This monument is supposed to cover the remains of William, Lord Broase, maternal ancestor of the Dukes of Norfolk, though there is neither inscription nor arms to indicate for whom it was erected. Here is also another large altar-tomb, of Sussex marble, richly wrought,	From Rye	63 $\frac{1}{2}$	From		From Horsha.	with canopy, but no figure, arms, or inscription: this is said to be the tomb of a Lord Hoo. On the south side of the chancel is a beautiful altar-monument of white marble, on which lies the figure of a female, in robes, richly carved, her right hand resting on her breast, and her left on a book. On this tomb is an inscription, informing us, that it was erected in memory of Elizabeth, wife of Thomas Delves, Esq., heir apparent of Sir Henry Delves, Bart., who died in 1654. Horsham has a good market-house, and the weekly market, on Saturday, is abundantly supplied with corn and poultry; and on the last Thursday in every month there is another for cattle. Here is also a handsome town-hall, in which the summer assizes are held alternately with Lewes. The county gaol stands at the southern entrance of the town: it is a commodious structure, built partly with stone from the neighbourhood. In front of the building is a small garden, with two spacious court-yards, and gravel-walks surrounding a grass-plot. The wall encircling them encloses the whole prison, which consists of two floors built over arcades; each debtor and felon has a separate room, which are all arched over with brick to prevent confusion in case of fire. On each floor is also a day-room of suitable dimensions; and a chapel in the keeper's house, where prayers are read every day, and a sermon is delivered weekly by the chaplain.

Sudbury, a borough and market-town of high antiquity, and formerly of much greater importance than it is at present, is situated on the river Stour, which is navigable for barges to this place, and is crossed by a well-built stone bridge. It comprehends three parishes, now incorporated, and as many large handsome churches, respectively dedicated to St. Gregory, St. Peter, and All Saints; it formerly possessed a priory of the order of St. Augustine, part of which building, converted into a private habitation, is still standing; and was one of the first places at which Edward III. settled the Flemings, whom he invited over to instruct his subjects in the woollen manufacture. Sudbury is a corporate town; it has a weekly market on Saturday, and has sent two members to parliament ever since the year 1559.	21½	Cross the river Orwell , and turn on right, to

The church stands in the middle of the town, and is a handsome edifice with a spire steeple; an elegant altar-piece was erected in the chancel by Dr. Wilkins, one of the late rectors; and both the church and parsonage-house were greatly improved and beautified by his successor, the Rev. Dr. Tanner; but this religious structure is chiefly noted as the burial-place of Guthram, or Gormo, the Danish chieftain, who embraced Christianity, and died in 889; the tomb, however, which is shewn for his, does not bear the appearance of such antiquity. NEWBY BRIDGE, 1 m. before, Fell Foot, ——— BOOTH, 1 m. before, Bigland Hall, George Bigland, Esq. PENNY BRIDGE, J. P. Machell, Esq. ULVERSTON is pleasantly situated on a declivity about a mile distant from an arm of the bay of Morecambe, called Leven Sands, from whence vessels of 150 tons burthen come up to the port at High Water. In the year 1795 a canal was cut from the east side of the town to the channel of the river Leven, which is well supplied with water, and has been navigated by vessels of 400 tons. The town has greatly improved in appearance of late years, the streets are spacious and clean, and the houses are in general well built: the inhabitants derive their chief support from the coasting trade, and the manufacture of cotton, checks, canvas, and hats. Here is a neat theatre, assembly-rooms, and public subscription library; besides a church, which was almost entirely re-erected in the year 1804. This abbey was indebted for its foundation to King Stephen, whilst Earl of Mortaign, in the year 1127, who also endowed it with princely wealth; and it was secondly only to Fountains abbey, in Yorkshire, in regard to privileges and authority. The military establishment of the neighbouring country was even made subservient to the abbot, and it thus partook of a warlike character which was wholly incompatible with the profession of its inhabitants. The ruins of this monastic edifice are situated on the borders of a small rivulet in a narrow and peaceful valley. The finest view of the ruin is on the east side, where, beyond the vast shattered frame that once contained a richly painted window, is seen a perspective of the choir and of distant arches, remains of the nave of the abbey, closed by the woods.

PENRUDDOCK, 1 m. before, and 3 m. distant, Graystock Castle, H. Howard, Esq. This noble edifice exhibits some remains of the ancient fortified structure; it is beautifully situated on an eminence, and was principally erected about the middle of the 17th century, but has since received very considerable additions. The interior is arranged with great elegance, and is decorated with numerous fine paintings, among which is a portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, representing her in the dress she wore at the time of her execution. The surrounding grounds are extensive, and contain several fine plantations, and ornamental buildings; they are likewise greatly adorned by a small rivulet that flows near the castle walls, and has been made to contribute to the beauty of the scenery, by being collected in reservoirs, and caused to descend in artificial cascades. The upper sheet of water is of considerable dimensions, and is rendered extremely picturesque by a few small islands, and the contiguity of a fine hanging wood, which overspreads the acclivity and summit of a lofty eminence. The park is abundantly stocked with fine deer, and commands several highly interesting prospects. The entrance is on the north side, through an arched gateway, from which a high embattled wall branches out each way, with towers at intervals, and encloses the entrance-court, a fine level lawn, having on each side roads thirty feet broad, leading to the terrace, which is about 85 yards wide, and 170 long. There is also opposite the gateway, a handsome flight of steps, 20 yards wide, by which the terrace may be attained from the entrance court. A rich open porch embellishes the centre of the north front; this conveys to the entrance-hall, which opens to a staircase 90 feet high and 60 feet square, surrounded on each story by arched corridors, that

its most considerable additions from Cuthbert Heron, Esq., in the year 1621, but it was greatly improved and thoroughly repaired soon after it became the property of the present family, at which time the chapel on the lawn was also rebuilt, the gardens formed, and the grounds covered with extensive plantations. The interior of this elegant mansion is superbly decorated, and contains several excellent paintings by the best masters; it is also surrounded by scenery of the richest and most enchanting character, and has a bold and magnificent appearance, when seen from the neighbourhood of Wark, Nunwick and Simonburn. — Beyond Chollerton, Swinburn Castle, R. ALNWICK. Alnwick Castle, the principal seat of His Grace the Duke of Northumberland, became the property of his ancestors in the year 1510, and has since that period shared the fortunes and vicissitudes of this powerful family. The Castle occupies an elevated situation on the south bank of the river Alne, and is supposed, according to Grose, to have been founded by the Romans: it consists of three wards, and contains about five acres within its outer walls, which are flanked with 16 towers, most of them fitted up in a style as suitable to their architecture, as the convenience of modern manners will allow; the battlements of these towers are decorated with grotesque figures of warriors, many of which are ancient, but others were added by a late Duke, who, on his accession, restored the whole edifice from a ruin to its present magnificent state. The saloon in the citadel is 42 feet by 39, and is adorned with paintings of the 9th, 10th, and 11th Earls of Northumberland; the drawing-room is 46 feet by 35; and the dining-room 54 feet by 21, exclusive of a circular recess 19 feet in diameter. The walls of the chapel, which is ceiled in a similar manner to King's College, Cambridge, and measures 50 feet by 21, are painted like the great church of Milan, and the windows, of painted glass, display a considerable degree of lightness and elegance.

The saloon, 60 feet by 30, is in the centre of the south front; on the right and left of this apartment are the dining and drawing-rooms, each 45 feet by 26, which, with the breakfast and billiard rooms, complete the apartments on the south front, from each extremity of which, branching off at right angles, there are arched open cloisters that communicate with the riding-house and stables on the left, and with the kitchen offices on the right; this front is, within the cloisters, about 280 feet long, and the prospect hence extremely beautiful, extending to a long vista of the deer-park, with ancient forest trees and rising grounds on each side. The north front is 420 feet long; and is ornamented with eight lofty towers; it likewise contains a number of elegantly decorated apartments, of noble dimensions; and commands a very delightful view, which opens to Penrith beacon-hill, (lately planted by the present Earl,) to Saddleback, and the Scotch mountains. This mansion is universally allowed to be one of the most splendid specimens of the modern antique; and the park and grounds surrounding it are not, perhaps, to be surpassed in the British dominions, for extent, beauty, diversity of prospect, and richness of scenery.

The town is not very extensive, and cannot, in itself, boast of much beauty of appearance, neither does it contain any houses that can really be called good ones; but it is partly flagged, a convenience not always possessed by towns of greater opulence. Tenbury is, from its situation, often subject to rapid floods from the river Teme, one of which, in the year 1770, threw down the side and middle aisles of the church, swept away all the windows, destroyed the organ, injured many of the monuments, and rendered it in fact a perfect wreck; but it has since undergone considerable repairs. The Gothic tower and chancel still remain, but the body of the edifice, as well as the side-aisles, has been completely modernised. The bridge over the Teme, that stands on the north side of the town, is a very handsome one of stone, consisting of six arches: the market-place is ancient, but there is a new butter-cross which adds greatly to the convenience of the inhabitants. The principal trade of the town is in hops and cyder, and the market is held on Tuesdays. The Leominster canal runs near the town.
STOURPORT is situated at the confluence of the rivers Severn and Stour, and on the basin of the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal, at its junction with the Severn, which opens a water communication from hence to the Mersey, and by means of other canals and navigable rivers, to all parts of the kingdom; the basin here was opened in 1771, since when, Stourport, heretofore a small mean hamlet, has become the general depot of commercial communication between the central and western parts of the kingdom; and has rapidly risen into a handsome and elegant town. The general aspect of this place when seen from any of the surrounding height, with its wharfs, warehouses, masts, &c., seems, as indeed it is, altogether a new creation, and presents the appearance of a maritime town, though seated in the very heart of the kingdom; and such is its real importance, that Stourport is now said to take the lead of all other places in the kingdom, as a mart for hops, apples, and perhaps for corn. The bridge over the Severn is an object, not only of utility, but of beauty; it consists of a single iron arch of one hundred and fifty feet span, and about fifty feet in perpendicular height above the surface of the water. The market is on Wednesday and Saturday.	29$\frac{1}{4}$ 25$\frac{1}{4}$ 23$\frac{3}{4}$ 20 9$\frac{1}{4}$	OR, From * KIDDERMINSTER, Worcestershire, to STOURPORT To Bewdley 3 m. ☞ ☞ to Worcester 11 m. HORNCASTLE is situated on an angular piece of land, formed by a small rivulet, called Waring, and by the river Bain, which is navigable from the Witham to this place: it derives its name from horn, or hyrn, signifying, in Saxon, an angle, or corner, and a castle or fortification. Traces of the latter are still visible, and the whole originally occupied an area of almost 20 acres: it appears by the foundations to have been in the form of a parallelogram, and to have enclosed great part of the present town. The church is situated on the west side of the town; it is an irregular structure, consisting of north and south aisles, and at the end of the latter, which is of much larger extent than the rest of the church, stands the altar. This is the chief town in the southern part of Lindsey division, and the general quarter-sessions of the peace for the district have been held here for upwards of a century. Spilbsy has also a small free-school, a sunday-school, and the right of holding a market on Monday.

LEEDS the largest, richest, and most flourishing town of Yorkshire, is situated on the slope and summit of a hill, that rises from the north bank of the river Aire; over which is a good stone bridge. The streets in the upper part of the town are narrow, but in other parts they are broad, spacious, and well-paved; and many of the houses are not only uniform but elegant, and well suited to the taste and splendour of the inhabitants. Here are seven churches, places of worship for different dissenting congregations; a free school, an infirmary, hospital, and numerous charitable institutions. The chief articles of manufacture here are superfine cloths, kerseymeres, swansdowns, shal-loons, carpets, blankets, cam-blets, and calimancoes; here is also a plate glass manufactory, and a pottery that furnishes large quantities of earthen-ware, not only for home con-sumption, but likewise for ex-ported. The business transacted at Leeds is indeed im-mense; its trade in woollen cloth alone is perhaps the great-est in the world; and for the accommodation of the clo-thiers here are two spacious cloth halls, comprising three thousand stands. Leeds is ad-vantageously situated on the great line of river and canal na-vigation, which extends to Hull and the eastern sea on one hand, and to Liverpool and the west-ern sea on the other; it com-municates with the Yorkshire collieries, and with every great manufacturing and trading dis-trict in the kingdom, and also with the metropolis. The town is governed by a mayor, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four com-mon councillors. Here are a magnificent set of assembly rooms, a commodious theatre, and a philosophical and literary hall, which latter is a neat stone edifice of the Grecian order, containing a museum, lecture-room, and library. Wakefield, Dewsbury, and Huddersfield. Among the differ-ent manufactures carried on here, those of woollen cloth, yarn, cotton, &c. may be men-tioned, on account of the energy with which they are severally prosecuted, and about 3 miles to the south-east of the town there are also iron-founderies and forges on a very extensive scale, which are in general well em-ployed, owing to the abundance of coal and iron-ore found in the neighbouring mines. The traveller, in passing along the road, hears on every side the rattling of the looms, and sees the smoke of steam-engines em-ployed for various purposes; indeed the whole surrounding country exhibits a scene of ac-tive industry; and trade and commerce is likewise here ma-terially assisted by a navigable canal, which is cut from the Leeds and Liverpool canal, and comes up into the centre of the town, thereby affording every possible convenience for the loading and unloading of boats. The houses in Bradford are al-most universally built with stone, and scarcely a brick build-ing is to be seen either in the town or neighbourhood; the church is a spacious though somewhat gloomy edifice, but the new Methodist meeting-house possesses considerable beauty. The environs of Brad-ford are extremely pleasant, and the country exhibits an abundance of fine picturesque scenery, which receives much additional beauty from the various eminences, whose gentle declivities are in many places adorned with elegant residences. The inhabitants of Bradford ad-hered to the parliament party in the time of Charles I., and twice repulsed a large body of royalists from the garrison of Leeds, but were at length made to feel, in their turn, some of the horrible effects that are the inevitable result of civil war. Market on Thursday.

Five horse barracks have lately been erected here, and the mar-kets are held on Tuesday and Saturday.

buttresses, &c. with which it is ornamented; the embellishments of the interior are also of a corresponding character. The mansion stands in a small but extremely pleasant park, with very large gardens, pleasure-grounds, &c., and is surrounded by very extensive plantations, that were entirely formed by the late proprietor: it commands many fine views, particularly of the Humber, that grand estuary or arm of the sea, with the vessels passing and re-passing; on the opposite side of which the well-wooded coast of Lincolnshire, with its villages and churches, is seen rising with a considerable degree of picturesque beauty; and from hence that point may also readily be distinguished where the Ouse and Trent meet almost at right angles, and by their junction form the Humber.

HOWDEN, a small town of considerable antiquity, has a weekly market on Saturday. The only objects worthy of notice here, are the church and the ancient palace of the Bishops of Durham.

LIVERPOOL This town was merely a hamlet to the parish of Walton before the reign of William III; but was constituted a distinct parish by that monarch, and shortly afterwards began to assume a very different character; since which it has advanced in consequence with rapid strides, and may now be considered next in importance to the metropolis. The docks at Liverpool were the first reservoirs and harbours constructed, in this country, for the accommodation of merchandise; the first of them was erected in 1710, since which they have increased to the number of fifteen; these consist of wet, dry, and graving docks; and though in themselves of considerable size, are, nevertheless, diminutive, when compared with those of the port of London. The more ancient streets of Liverpool are narrow and ill built, but those erected in later years are much wider, and contain many handsome houses; among which are a number of public buildings, comprising the exchange, town-hall, custom-house, &c. The former is a spacious and magnificent edifice; it occupies three sides of a quadrangle, the town-hall forming the fourth, and affords every accommodation for the despatch of business; the centre of its area is adorned by a group of statuary in commemoration of the gallant Lord Nelson. Liverpool contains ten churches, but none of them remarkable, excepting that of St. Paul, which is a miniature imitation of the great cathedral of London, and that of St. George, which is an object of considerable architectural interest, as being nearly the first cast iron church erected in the kingdom. Here is also a Welch church, and a Scotch church, besides a number of dissenting meeting-houses and charitable institutions, the latter of which are in general well supported. The places of public amusement in Liverpool correspond with the enlightened taste, and general liberality evinced by its inhabitants: they consist of the assembly-rooms at the town-hall, comprising an elegant suite of apartments. The Athenæum, which consists of a news and coffee room, and a public library, was erected by a subscription of 4,400*l.*, and opened on the 1st of Jan. 1799. The Lyceum is an establishment of a similar nature, built by Mr. Harrison, of Chester, at an expense of about 11,000*l.* The music-hall is a large and handsome pile of building, provided with every accommodation for concerts, &c. and calculated to accommodate nearly 1,300 persons. Besides which, the Union news-room, the Commercial news-room, and the assembly-room at the Liverpool Arms hotel are establishments of a very respectable character. To these must be added a Freemasons' hall, and a good theatre. Here is also a botanic garden, consisting of about five acres of ground enclosed by a stone wall. It is supported by 375 proprietors, who, besides an original advance, pay an annual subscription of two guineas. Liverpool, as a borough, returns two members to parliament, who are elected by the votes of the free burgesses; and of these about 2500 possess that privilege. The town was constituted a borough, 23d of Edward I.; and, in 1729, it was determined that the right of election was vested in the mayor, bailiffs, and freemen not receiving alms. The markets for provisions on Wednesday and Saturday, are amply supplied with necessaries and luxuries, and the corn markets on Tuesday and Saturday are considerable.

The mansion stands on a commanding elevation, in a tract of land formerly part of the forest of Bowland; it is a large pile of building, with a centre, and two wings projecting at right angles from the ends. In the front of the centre is an ornamented façade of three stories, with pilasters of four orders of architecture, and the whole in the fashion of Elizabeth and James the First's reigns. Near an ancient inn, formerly the court-house of Bowland, stands the little chapel of Whitewell: from this spot a most delightful landscape is unfolded to the eye of the spectator. The Holder, brawling at a great depth beneath the chapel, washes the foot of a tall conical knoll, covered with oaks to its top, and is soon lost in overhanging woods beneath. But the pencil alone is adequate to the description of the scene.

The season lasts from May till Michaelmas, and the visitors are accommodated at eight or nine large inns, which are situated on a heath, having each their long-room and ordinary: there are likewise a

This fortress, as well as the town, was garrisoned for the king in the time of the civil wars, and withstood a vigorous siege in the year 1645, but was ultimately obliged to surrender to the parliament. In the following year it was rendered untenable as a fortress, but has ever since constituted a family residence: at the present time, however, neither the house or grounds are conspicuous for beauty or decoration, as the noble proprietor seldom takes up his abode here; yet it should be observed that it commands a pleasing prospect of the town and vale, terminated by ranges of lofty hills; and the varied charms of this extensive view will be in some degree estimated by the reader, when he is informed that the vale of Skipton is supposed to be one of the finest and most fertile in England.

The existing mansion, with the exception of a lofty and sumptuous front which it received from the ninth Earl of Derby, was chiefly erected towards the middle of the 18th century, from designs by Leoni; it possesses considerable beauty, and is a spacious structure, 156 feet by 75, having the offices connected thereto, by colonnades resting on pillars of the Ionic order: the apartments are of noble dimensions; they contain many interesting portraits of distinguished personages, who composed the court of Frederick, Prince of Wales: besides a large library, well stocked with a judicious selection of the most eminent authors. WIGAN is an ancient town, situated near the little river Douglas, on the banks of which the Saxons were completely defeated by king Arthur: it is irregular, but well built, and contains many handsome erections, besides the church, in which latter there are a few old monuments to the memory of distinguished individuals; the living of this parish is very valuable, and the rector is always lord of the manor. Here is also a chapel of ease belonging to the establishment, three places of worship for the use of dissenters, two Roman Catholic chapels, and several excellent charitable institutions. This town sends two members to parliament; it has a market on Friday, and the inhabitants derive their chief support from the extensive trade here carried on in different sorts of coarse cotton goods, and the large brass and pewter works in the neighbourhood. In a field near Scholes Bridge, a sulphureous spring has been lately discovered, said much to resemble the Harrogate spa; and a neat building has been erected near it for the convenience of those who may resort hither, either to drink the water, or use it as a hot or cold bath.

BROCKLESBY HALL is not remarkable for its architecture, but his lordship's father made many additions and alterations to the building and park; among the former was an elegant picture gallery from designs by Tatham. The length of the gallery, which was finished in 1807, is 63 feet, the breadth 48 by 20 feet high; it contains a fine collection of paintings, which were bequeathed to him by the late Mrs. Aufere of Chelsea. The late lord also erected in the park, an elegant chapel and mausoleum, which was begun under the direction of James Wyatt, and completed in 1794. The elevation on which it stands is a tumulus, once a place of Roman sepulture, as appears from the sepulchral urns that have been discovered here. The chapel, which was consecrated by Bishop Prettyman, in June 1794, is an elegant circular building, having fluted Doric columns, supporting a rich entablature, and surmounted by a dome, which is surrounded by an open balustrade, &c. The interior is divided into four compartments, by eight fluted columns of the	28¾	To Great Grimsby 14 m. ☞ Forward to Ludford	8¾

Beneath the chapel is a vault, with compartments and recesses for the coffins; it is also divided by pillars, and has a circular sarcophagus in the centre. GRINGLEY ON THE HILL, beyond, Wiseton Hall, Lord Althorpe. This handsome modern mansion consists of a centre, three stories high, and two wings, of one lofty story each; the whole has a light and airy appearance, and is accompanied by a very commodious range of offices: it is agreeably situated on a gentle swell, with a very extensive lawn of upwards of thirty acres in front, finely belted by trees and ornamental shrubs, and judiciously broken at intervals by well disposed picturesque clumps. The interior of this elegant residence is decorated in the modern style. The arrangement of the grounds has been admirably managed, and a walk extends above a mile, in a circuitous route, round the home plantations, connecting the exterior woods with the domestic scenery: that part which accompanies the canal is particularly pleasing, having a fine prospect of the well wooded eminences on the north and west sides; and a most extensive view over the four surrounding shires of York, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby, and even into Cheshire when the weather is clear; and they also receive additional beauty and ornament from the modern built farm houses that have been judiciously placed on all the surrounding eminences.

BAWTRY, 3 m. distant, Serlby Hall, Lord Viscount Galway, whose family have been proprietors since the commencement of the last century, at which time a very old mansion stood here. The present residence is agreeably situated, and consists of a handsome centre with two appropriate wings; it has a spacious lawn on its south front, beautifully spangled with clumps of trees; whilst from that on the opposite side there is a most charming prospect over some fine luxuriant meadows, that are watered by the little river Ryton. The apartments unite elegance with convenience; they are superbly furnished, and are decorated with a good collection of paintings, among which are two undoubted originals by Hans Holbein, and a fine large picture by Daniel Myton, representing Charles I. with his queen. The grounds are laid out with great taste and judgement; the principal plantations are on the south side; through these, a number of avenues and shady walks have been cut, which open to the most striking objects in the neighbourhood. The terrace also forms a part of the grounds that is always very much admired.

On the western side of the town the ground is elevated and pleasant; but the marshes contiguous to the river, on the eastern side, are subject to frequent inundations: the street through which lies the great north road from London to York is remarkably broad, and contains several elegant houses; its upper part is the market-place, in which are very good shambles. Bawtry, though generally reckoned as belonging to Yorkshire, is, however, partly situated in Nottinghamshire, the line of demarcation being a small stream that runs through the yard of the Crown Inn. The market was formerly held on Wednesday, but has been, within these few years, changed to Thursday. At the distance of one mile to the south of Bawtry, and close to the east side of the great north road, is the village of Scrooby, remarkable for having formerly had a palace belonging to the Archbishops of York, who are always lords of the manor. Scrooby is said to have been a favourite hunting seat of Archbishop Savage, in the reign of Henry VII., and in the next reign it was occasionally the residence of Cardinal Wolsey; it likewise appears that, in the time of Elizabeth, Archbishop Sandys sometimes resided here, one of his daughters being interred in the chancel of the church. The palace occupied a very low and damp situation, close to the confluence of the small river Ryton with the Idle: the large gateway and porter's lodge were taken down towards the end of the last century, and the only remaining part of the edifice is converted into a farmhouse. TICKHILL Tickhill Castle, F. Roche Abbey stone, but cannot be seen from any considerable distance, owing to its being situated in a valley surrounded by plantations and high grounds: its south front is in the pure style of Grecian architecture, and the whole of the interior is of corresponding beauty. The saloon, a very tastefully ornamented apartment, sixty feet long and 22 broad, has a superb chimney-piece, besides works in verd antique, basso-relievos, in the frieze, and a cornice supported by figures. The surrounding park is beautifully adorned with lofty trees, and well stocked with deer; it does not, however, command any extensive prospects, but the whole of the scenery is extremely beautiful. Several vistas have been cut through the park, in a westerly direction, and at the extremity of one of them the spire of Laughton church is seen to great advantage. A spacious lake is situated on the south front, and stretches itself towards the east and west; it is surrounded by fine plantations, frequented by different kinds of birds, which, together with the numerous swans and other aquatic fowl that glide along its surface, and hover over its waters, tend greatly to enliven this sequestered and tranquil scene.

The north front is approached by a square court, enclosed with iron rails, and its general plainness is considerably relieved by a highly ornamented entrance, of a mixed style of architecture, and by two slightly projecting wings, decorated with pilasters and balustrades. The east and west fronts are also plain; but the former is broken by numerous projections, and opens to a terrace, on which there is a very fine conservatory about 120 feet long. The south front has a magnificent portico in the centre, supported by Ionic columns, and is otherwise far more decorated than either of the others. but it received the latter in more modern times, from the circumstance of the shale continually decomposing under the action of the atmosphere, and falling in large quantities into the valley below, which is overwhelmed with its ruins to the extent of half a mile. Its summit is full 1300 feet above the level of the valley, and was formerly occupied with an ancient encampment; a portion of this has been destroyed by the crumbling of the substance, but the greater part remains in good preservation. On the south side of Mam Torr, near the bottom, is the ancient Mine of Odin, thought to have been worked during the Saxon times, and still furnishing employment for a great number of persons; it consists of two levels, running into the mountain, through the upper of which the ore is brought out, the lower answering the purpose of draining the works, which have been carried more than a mile from the entrance: the interior formation and contents of this mountain will amply repay the trouble of exploring it, but the passage is in many places wet and slippery, and it is almost necessary that the flannel-shirt, hat, and trousers of the miner should be worn by those who penetrate its deep recesses. The Peak Cavern, or, as it is more commonly called, the Devil's Cave, is a singularly magnificent curiosity, and truly deserving an elaborate description; it is situated in a grand but gloomy recess, formed by a chasm in a range of rocks that rises perpendicularly on each side to a great height, having, on the left, a rivulet that issues from the cavern, and pursues its foaming way over rudely broken masses of limestone; within the entrance, which is spacious, a number of scattered cottages are seen, inhabited by twine-makers: proceeding onwards about 30 yards, the roof contracts, and a gentle descent leads to the interior entrance of this tremendous hollow, where utter darkness prevails; and the way becoming low and confined, the visitor must proceed, stooping, till he reaches the Bell-House; and thence passing along, the river is attained; here is a boat, into which he gets, and lying at full length, is thus conveyed up a winding stream, till, on landing, he finds himself in a very spacious vault, which appears like an abode for the infernal deities: at the extremity of the passage beyond this place is a projecting pile of rocks called Roger Rain's House, from the circumstance of the water incessantly falling in large drops through crevices in the roof: the next hollow attained is called the Chancel, where the ear is suddenly assailed with slow and solemn, but rather discordant music from above, which at chamber and a singular apartment that displays the arms of James I. over the fire-place, and over them the representation of a stag-hunt in stucco, with other compartments ranged around the room, relating to the killing of the deer, and other incidents of the chase, also executed in stucco, and painted. The great drawing-room is in the north-east angle; it is wainscotted, and has an ornamented ceiling, with arms over the chimney-piece. The domestic chapel is under this apartment. The other part of the mansion comprises the family apartments, which are decorated with numerous portraits, and other valuable paintings: some of them also contain antique marbles, and other curiosities, that were collected by the present proprietor in his eastern travels. The mansion has recently been considerably repaired under the superintendence of the celebrated Mr. Lewis Wyatt, subject, however, to the judicious suggestions of the very intelligent proprietor. The park is exceedingly extensive, it abounds with deer, celebrated for the fine flavour of its venison, and contains a herd of wild cattle, which are the remains of a breed that has been kept here from time immemorial, and is said to be indigenous. A custom was observed here in the last century, says the intelligent historian of the county, "of driving the deer round the park, about midsummer, or rather earlier, collecting them in a body before the house, and then swimming them through a pool of water, with which the exhibition terminated." A large and very beautiful print has been executed by Vivares, from a painting by T. Smith, representing Lyme Park during this ceremony, with the deer in different situations; and in this the surrounding country is very excellently delineated. A monument at Disley states that this practice was first perfected by Joseph Watson, who died in 1753, aged 104, having been upwards of 64 years park-keeper at this delightful seat.

once awakens the mind to meditation, and causes a mingled emotion of fear and pleasure, astonishment and delight. The path now conducts to the Devil's Cellar, thence to the Half-Way House; from this spot another range of arches leads to Great Tom of Lincoln, so called from a concavity in the roof assuming the shape of a bell: at a short distance hence is the termination of the cavern, which is 2,250 feet from the entrance, and 621 feet lower than the surface of the hill. Persons visiting the cavern are here generally saluted with what is termed a blast: this is a small quantity of gunpowder crammed into the rock, and set fire to, the sound of which rolls along the roof and sides, like a heavy and tremendous peal of thunder; the crash being over, they return by the same way to the entrance, where the eye is again regaled with daylight, which it cannot fail to behold without lively emotions of pleasure.

CHAPEL IN LE FRITH, Stoddard House, John Bennett, Esq.

CHAPEL IN LE FRITH is a neat, but small town, standing on the acclivity of an eminence which rises in the centre of a large hollow formed by the mountains in this part of the county. The church was erected at the beginning of the fourteenth century, but contains nothing deserving of notice. The inhabitants are chiefly supported by the manufacture of cotton, and the market is held on Thursday.

LOUTH is a large well-built town, lying in a fertile valley, at the eastern foot of the wolds. This valley runs east and west; it is sheltered by sloping hills on its north and south sides, and has a finely wooded level country towards the east; the rising grounds towards the west also afford numerous and varied prospects. The early history of this place does not include any circumstances of consequence; but here were formerly three religious fraternities, whose funds were granted, in the time of Edward VI., for the purpose of erecting and endowing a free grammar-school; besides which the town contains another free-school for poor boys, also on a very respectable scale; a small but neat theatre; an elegant suite of assembly-rooms; and a town-hall. The church, dedicated to St. James, is a spacious and elegant structure, and has a beautiful tower and spire at the west end, erected in 1635, as the former steeple was entirely blown down on the 11th of October in the preceding year. The tower part of the steeple consists of three stories; it has highly ornamented windows in every face, and octagonal embattled turrets at the top, thirty feet high, whence issue four pinnacles: round the exterior of the tower, at eighty feet from the base, runs a gallery, guarded by a parapet wall; and the battlements commence at the height of 170 feet; these are pierced with embrasures, and separated by the pedestals of three small pinnacles on each side: the centre spire is octagonal; it is connected on four sides to the corner-turrets by spandrels, or flying buttresses, of excellent workmanship, and has small pointed windows in those faces which front the cardinal points. The total height of the tower and spire, the masonry of which is often admired for its execution, is 288 feet. The interior of the church displays many beauties, and the chancel, which is of more modern date than the rest, and perhaps coeval with the justly admired steeple, contains an altar-piece, representing the Descent from the Cross. Louth formerly contained another church, dedicated to St. Mary, which is now, however, totally demolished; its cemetery is still the place of sepulture for the town; as that of St. James has not been used for the purpose for more than half a century. Here are also three places of religious worship belonging to dissenters, a good market on Wednesday and Saturday, and a large soap-manufactory, besides one for carpets and blankets.

The mansion is chiefly of modern erection, it is beautifully situated on the banks of the river Teme, and contains many excellent pictures, among which is a very large one by Weenix, the celebrated Dutch landscape painter, that is considered a chef-d'œuvre of that artist. The grounds, naturally romantic and beautiful, are laid out with great taste and judgement; and the remains of a fine forest of oaks, with the meanderings of the Teme, contribute greatly to enrich the scenery; the prospects in various directions are likewise extremely agreeable, one in particular towards the south-east, comprehending the town and castle of Ludlow, is much and deservedly celebrated.

ST. DAVID'S is an ancient and celebrated city, though not at all calculated to answer the expectations of those persons who visit it with such ideas as are generally associated with that title; indeed no collection of houses aspiring to the rank of a town can exhibit a more wretched and sickening appearance: but, notwithstanding its present squalid aspect, here are still many marks indicative of its former consequence. Among the most prominent are the cathedral, the episcopal palace, &c.: these are inclosed by the remains of an embattled wall, whose principal entrance is on the east, through a handsome doorway, between two lofty towers. The cathedral is a venerable Gothic structure, in the form of a cross, with a lofty square tower, surmounted by handsome pinnacles; this building is elegantly decorated, and contains the bishop's throne, which is of exquisite workmanship; also a variety of ancient monuments to the memory of celebrated persons, many of them very curious specimens of art: the episcopal palace was formerly a magnificent pile of building, containing several suites of elegant apartments, richly decorated, but now in a lamentably decayed state.

ASTON, 2 $\frac{1}{4}$ m. distant, Down-ton Castle, Thomas Andrew Knight, Esq.

ABERYSTWITH is pleasantly situated on an elevated bank, having the Rheidol on one side, which is here crossed by a stone bridge of nine arches, and on the other the bay of Cardigan and the Irish channel. It is the most populous place in the county; and having become a fashionable resort for sea-bathing, the houses are rapidly multiplying; the general aspect of these is respectable, and the new erections, which are of stone, aspire to considerable neatness, and occasionally to elegance. A handsome town-hall stands in the principal street; underneath which is a covered market-place: the bathing houses are numerous and convenient, and considerable pains have been taken to add to the accommodation of visitors by the formation of pleasant walks on the outskirts, particularly on the site of the castle, which commands an extensive sea-view. The church stands near the castle: it is a perpetual curacy in the gift of the vicar of Llanbadern Vaur, in which parish the township is included. Aberystwith is a contributory borough to Cardigan: it was first incorporated by Edward I., and is governed by a mayor, recorder, and common council. Its privileges and immunities were confirmed and enlarged by several charters; but they are at present very limited and ill-defined. The markets are held on Mondays and Saturdays. There is here no manufacture entitled to notice: but a considerable coasting trade is carried on with Liverpool, Bristol, and other parts of England. The chief exports consist of lead from the mines, corn, butter, and oak-bark; besides which the herring-fishery of this place was once of some importance.

LICHFIELD is supposed to be indebted to the Saxons for its origin, and to have risen from the ruins of the Roman Etocetum, or wall; it is very pleasantly situated in a fine valley, surrounded by gentle eminences; the majority of the houses are handsome erections, and many of them are occupied by families of independent fortune. Here was formerly a castle, where Richard II. was confined, when a prisoner, on his way to London; but no vestiges of it are now in existence. The town is divided by a large sheet of water into two portions, the city and the close: the latter district occupies much higher ground than the rest of the town; it was fortified for the king, in the time of the civil wars, and, during that period, withstood several sieges; the first of which was against Lord Brook and Sir John Gell, in March 1643, when the former was shot through the eye by a gentleman of the Dyott family, and the spot where he fell is now distinguished by a pavement of white pebbles, and a marble tablet, bearing an inscription commemorating the event. During these unhappy disputes, the cathedral suffered very considerable damage, not only from the fire of the batteries and musquetry, but also from the rapacity of the republican soldiery. Immediately after the Restoration, Dr. Hackett was appointed to this see; and he, the very morning after his arrival, set about cleansing and repairing his episcopal church; and, by his own large contribution, and the subscriptions he obtained from the neighbouring gentry, was soon enabled to restore this noble pile to its former splendour. In 1788 it again underwent a thorough repair by subscription, under the superintendance of James Wyatt of London. The extent of the whole building from east to west is 411 feet in length, and from north to south 67 feet in breadth. It is a spacious and very elegant structure, surmounted by three beautiful steeples, and displaying on its portico, and north and south entrances, such exquisite workmanship as is hardly to be equalled in England: the interior of this noble edifice is fully equal in splendour and magnificence to the exterior; it contains a fine organ, which is composed of twenty-five different stops, and is highly esteemed for the fullness and beauty of its tones; a number of elegant monuments; and has, on many accounts, an imperative claim on the attention of the traveller. It is walled in, like a castle, and stands so high as to be seen at the distance of many miles. In the north-east corner of the close, stands the bishop's palace, to the west of which is the deanery-house, and near it, several other handsome buildings. The city is divided into three parishes, each possessed of an elegant church; it contains a guildhall, anciently appropriated to the meetings of the religious fraternity of St. Mary and St. John the Baptist, and which the corporation now use for public purposes. It is a neat stone edifice adorned with the city arms, &c., several good charitable institutions, and a new theatre. Lichfield sends two members to parliament, has a market on Tuesday and Friday, and is famous for its ale, the sale of which is considerable and lucrative. Lichfield is a county of itself, containing a jurisdiction extending about twelve miles in compass; it has the power of holding assizes, and determining cases of life and death. It is governed by two bailiffs, chosen yearly out of twenty-four burgesses, a recorder, a sheriff, a steward, and other officers. It has a good free-school, founded by Edward VI., at which many eminent literary characters received the first rudiments of their education; among which was, that celebrated Hercules of literature, Dr. Samuel Johnson, Addison, Ashmole, Woolaston, and Garrick.

LYNN, a place of considerable antiquity, is a large and respectable town, situated about ten miles from the German ocean on the Great Ouse river, here almost as broad as the Thames above London bridge: it is divided into several parts by four small rivers, called Fleets, crossed by eleven bridges, and the whole is encompassed on the land-side by a deep wet foss; and at the north end of which is a platform battery, called St. Anne's fort. enamelled silver cup and cover, still used on public occasions. Here are several public buildings, some of which display curious and fine specimens of architectural antiquity; among these the principal is the church of St. Mary, which, with a priory, founded in the time of William Rufus, still remains a noble pile, though curtailed of its original dimensions; here are also meeting houses for different dissenting congregations, a Roman catholic chapel, Jews' synagogue, and numerous charitable institutions; and among its more recent improvements, since the peace, may be enumerated the erection of an elegant Theatre, nearly three hundred houses, and a new and very commodious fish market. The exchange or custom-house is a very handsome edifice; the guildhall, an ancient building of stone and flint, contains a large stone hall, assembly-rooms, and courts for the administration of justice. This town has sent two members to parliament since the 26th year of Edward I. By virtue of two acts of parliament obtained a few years since, many of the streets have been paved, obstructions and nuisances removed, the town lighted with gas, and the avenue from the south gate altered; so that the approach is now superior to that of most other maritime towns in the kingdom. Lynn is surrounded by very agreeable walks that have lately experienced great improvement. There is an excellent wooden bridge recently constructed over the Eau Brink canal and the Ouse river, that connects the town with Marshland; a new sea bank has also been formed. The harbour is deep and capable of receiving about 300 sail of shipping, but the anchorage is bad; the situation of the port, however, gives the town great commercial advantages; it is open to a communication with all the north of Europe, and by means of the Ouse and its collateral rivers, can extend its navigation into eight counties, exclusive of the other conveyances by land-carriage and canals; it imports annually a vast quantity of coals and wine, with which it supplies the interior, and receives back for exportation corn and various manufactured articles.

CROMER. Cromer Hall, Thomas Fowell Buxton, Esq. and 5 m. distant, Gunton Hall, Lord Suffield.

CROMER. The sea in this neighbourhood, and, indeed, on the whole of the Norfolk shore, is particularly dangerous, which is accounted for, from the situation of the coast, and the course which vessels navigating it are obliged to steer. Between Flamborough and Spurn Heads, and Winterton Ness, the most easterly points of land on this side of the island, except the North Foreland, the land retreats inwards, forming a large bay, at the bottom of which is the metaris-estuarium. If vessels leaving Flamborough Head, proceed southward, and meet with a hard gale from any point between the north-east and south-east; or, if leaving Yarmouth-roads, proceeding northward, they are retarded by the wind blowing hard from the north-east, so that they cannot weather Winterton Ness, they become embayed, and the only chance of safety is to run for Lynn-deeps; in attempting which, they are in danger of foundering on the rocks near Cromer, or stranding upon the flat shores between Cromer and Wells.

THETFORD, a place of much importance in former times, was, according to some authors, first a British city, and afterwards a Roman station; but the arguments adduced in support of these theories are not very conclusive, no decisive evidence having been produced. At the eastern extremity of the town there are still considerable remains of fortifications, consisting of a large artificial mount, or keep, with lofty banks and deep ditches; the former is generally admitted to have been first introduced by the Normans, and therefore was probably added, subsequent to the Conquest, to the fortifications, which were not unlikely the work of the early kings of East Anglia. In the early ages Thetford was more than once destroyed by fire; it was subject to the ravages of the Danes, being the metropolis of that portion of the heptarchy, which lay open to the north of Europe; and was once the seat of the East Anglian kings: it has likewise been honoured with the presence of many of our sovereigns, particularly Henry I. and Henry II.; and was one of the hunting seats of James I. whose palace, since rebuilt, still bears the name of the King's House. The ruins of ecclesiastical and other buildings strongly remind the visitor of the ancient splendour of this place, which, at one time, possessed 20 churches, and 8 monasteries, besides other religious and charitable institutions; but of these the names of some only remain, while the sites of others are marked by a few dilapidated walls. Of the 20 churches 5 are preserved; St. Peter's, and St. Cuthbert's, on the Norfolk side of the river; and St. Mary the Less, in the county of Suffolk. The former, commonly called the Black Church, from its being chiefly constructed of flint, consists of a chancel, nave, two aisles, and a tower; the latter was rebuilt in 1789, when a great part of the church was also re-edified: the battlements on the south side, and the buttresses, are decorated with allusive ornaments, and large letters, inlaid in the flint-work. The greater part of the manery that was founded here in the reign of King Canute, was taken down some years ago, and a new farm-house has lately been built of the materials, the conventual church being converted into a barn; some of the walls, however, with buttresses, windows, &c. yet remain. The priory, or abbey, first erected on the Suffolk side of the town, in the church-yard of the cathedral, was removed to a more convenient spot, on the margin of the river, and was founded by Roger Bigod, for monks of the Cluniac order, in the year 1104; it was suppressed in 1540, when the revenues of the monastery were granted, excepting a small reserved rent, to the Duke of Norfolk, but are at present the property of Lord Petre. The ancient gateway, constructed of free-stone and black flint, with parts of the church, &c. still remain. This monastery was the burial-place of several of the Earls of Norfolk, and also contained numerous monuments of the Bigods, Mowbrays, and Howards; but many of the mortuary remains were removed to Framlingham after the dissolution. The monastery of St. Sepulchre was founded in 1109; its site is called Canons, and part of the conventual church, still standing, has long been converted into a barn; and the gate of the porter's lodge, and some other parts of the buildings, are now likewise in existence. Of four other religious houses, no vestiges remain; but that called Domus Dei, or Maison de Dieu, stood at the corner of Canons Close, and was founded in the reign of William Rufus. On the Suffolk side of the river, near St. Mary's church, is a free grammar-school, and near the town is a mineral spring, the waters of which appear to possess considerable virtues. The present council-chamber, and the apartment for the juries, were erected in the reign of Charles II., the old guildhall, or council-house, being at that time in a dilapidated condition. Thetford has been much improved of late years: a new bridge has been built, the principal street paved, and several handsome houses have been erected; the navigation of the river has also been lately repaired, and, by this communication, some little mercantile business is done in the corn and coal trade, by way of Lynn.

MILEHAM deserves notice as being the birth-place of that great luminary in the legal hemisphere, Sir Edward Coke: he was the son of Robert Coke, Esq., lord of this manor, and born in the old hall, which is now dilapidated. In the early part of his career, he was first made recorder of Norwich, and then of London; he was then appointed solicitor-general to Queen Elizabeth, and speaker of the House of Commons: he was afterwards chosen attorney-general, in which office he continued under King James, who successively appointed him chief justice of both benches: he died Lord Chief Justice of the court of King's Bench, *September 3, A. ELMHAM PARK, is the seat of Hon. G. J. Miles.

SALL HALL, is the seat of Sir Richard Paul Jodrell, Bart.

AYLSHAM, near, James Hunt Holley, Esq.; and Blickling Park, Dowager Lady Suffolk. This noble mansion was built by Sir John Hobart, Knt., and completed in 1628, when the domestic chapel was consecrated: it is an interesting edifice, seated in a bottom, and nearly environed with large old trees; and still preserves, in the general appearance, arrangement, &c. its original characteristics. In Blomefield's History of Norfolk, vol. vi. p. 999, it is described as "a curious brick fabric, four square, with a turret at each corner; there are two courts, and, with a fine library, elegant wilderness, good lake, gardens, and park, is a pleasant beautiful seat, worthy the observation of such as make the Norfolk tour." When speaking of this seat, Mr. Gilpin also observes, that "the moat, the bridges, the turrets, the battlements, are all impressed with the ideas of antiquity. A tale of woe also contributes to dignify this mansion. It was the birth place of the unfortunate Ann Boleyn. Blickling is now very expensively fitted up, and contains many grand rooms, in which the chimnies, ceilings, wainscot, and other ornaments, are in general suitable to the antiquity of the whole." The entrance from the court-yard, on each side of which are ranged the offices; in the same style of building with the house, is over a bridge of two arches, which crosses a moat. After passing through a small inner court, the visitor enters the hall, which measures 42 feet by 33, and 33 in height. This opens to the staircase, which is ornamented with various small figures, carved in wood; and has a gallery at the top. The latter contains statues of Anne Boleyn and Queen Elizabeth. In the different apartments are various portraits of eminent characters; among which are the following:—Full lengths of the late King and his illustrious consort, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; King George II., on horseback; and Judge Hobart, in his robes.

CASTLE ACRE, though now an inconsiderable place, displays the remains of an immense castle, and also some large remnants of a priory. The former occupied the southern side of a gently-sloping hill, and consisted of three parts or divisions, all connected, but each separately fortified with valla, fossa, and walls. The earthworks are still very bold, and large masses of the walls remain. At the north-west angle was a lofty keep, nearly circular, with steep glacis, the summit of which was crowned with a wall of great thickness and strength. Branching from this to the south, is a large area of an oblong shape, surrounded by a lofty bank, with a wall and deep ditch. To the east was an entrance, which was guarded by projecting bastions; and to the west was a very large area or outer ballium, also encompassed with bold cstramentations. At the conquest this place belonged to the great Earl Warren, who is stated to have erected, upon the site of the older works, a circular castle. The whole fortifications comprise about eighteen acres of ground, environed by an embattled wall, seven feet thick. Though the founder had one hundred and forty lordships in this county, yet he made this his chief residence. He also erected here a Priory for monks of the Cluniac order, in the year 1085, and made it a cell to the abbey of Lewes in Sussex. The annual revenues, at the dissolution, amounted, according to Speed, to 324l. 17s. 5½d. From the foundations of the ruined walls, which enclosed the buildings of this monastery, the site is estimated to have contained twenty-nine acres, two roods, and ten perches. A part of the prior's apartments has been converted into a farmhouse; and the remains of the priory, with its conventual church, form, perhaps, the finest and most venerable ruin in the county. Great part of the west front remains, some large columns of the nave, the walls of the transepts, and very considerable remnants of the domestic apartments, to the south of the church, still serve to show the extent of this monastery. The sizes of the cloisters, the refectory, the great hall, and of many other rooms, may be ascertained. At some distance from the north-west angle of the church, is the porter's lodge. The parish church is a large building, and displays some ancient and curious specimens of architecture; also various pieces of stained glass, and a few ancient monuments.

The library measures 125 feet in length, by 22 in breadth. The park and gardens comprehend about 1000 acres of land, and are abundantly decorated with old forest trees, and a fine piece of water; which latter extends in a crescent-shape, for about one mile in its greatest length, by nearly 400 yards in extreme breadth. About one mile from the house is a stone mausoleum, built in the form of a pyramid, in which are the remains of the late Lord Buckinghamshire and his first lady.

being, beyond all doubt, the best in England for the smith's forge, on account of the intense heat which it produces. Here likewise is found that peculiar species of iron-ore denominated blond metal, used chiefly in the manufacture of nails, horse-shoes, axes, and tools of a similar description. Some spots also abound with that sort of reddish earth employed in painting or glazing vessels of different kinds, which is known by the appellation of hip. The church, an elegant building in the pointed style of architecture, adorns the summit of the hill on which the castle above-mentioned was situated; it has a handsome tower at one end, that supports a lofty spire of unusual beauty; and is divided into a chancel, nave, and north and south aisles, the latter being separated from the nave by a range of very neat arches that rest on octagonal pillars, but a singular and very awkward effect is produced by one arch being intersected by another pillar. In the chancel are several prebendal stalls, ornamented with most exquisite carved work. Here are a number of monuments commemorating various individuals, and among them several in honour of the ancestors of the families of Lord Dudley and Lord Harcourt. The church-yard is surrounded by a large graff, in

MANCHESTER TO BIRMINGHAM, BY WILMSLOW, CONGLETON, BURSLEM, THE POTTERIES, STONE, STAFFORD, AND WALSALL.

The GRAND TRUNK or Trent and Mersey canal commences at the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, about a quarter of a mile from Preston on the hill, and about five miles south of the river Mersey, at Runcorn Ferry in Cheshire. From the Duke of Bridgewater's canal it proceeds southward, by Preston on the hill, Northwich, Middlewich, and Sandbach, and leaving Cheshire near Church Lawton, on the southern boundary of that county, enters Staffordshire a little to the northward of Clough Hall, near Talk on the Hill; it then proceeds under ground for a mile and a half, when it emerges at the distance of a mile and three quarters above Burslem, to which place its course is direct, and thence by Stoke upon Trent, and Stone; from the latter place there is a branch to Newcastle under Lyme. From Stone it proceeds to Rugely, from whence, pursuing a course nearly due east, it passes within a mile of Burton upon Trent, to which place there is a branch, and quitting Staffordshire at Clay Mills near Stretton, then enters Derbyshire near Monk's bridge, and crossing the southern extremity of the county, falls into the Trent near Shardlow, a distance of ninety-three miles. This great work, in a commercial point of view, may justly be regarded as inferior in importance to none in the kingdom; for, as has already been shown, it unites, by means of the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, the Mersey in the west with the Trent that falls into the Humber in the east; while by the aid of the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal it is connected with the Severn, and by the Birmingham, Warwick and Birmingham, and Warwick and Napton canals, with the Grand Junction Canal, and by the latter with the metropolis; thus uniting the ports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Hull, and thereby affording not only a communication with the principal manufacturing and commercial towns, but also with the four grand seaports of the kingdom.

			SANDWICH stands on the river Stour, about 2 miles from the sea; its site is extremely low, and all the surrounding country, with the exception of the range of high ground on which Richborough castle stands, towards the north-west, is, to a considerable extent, similarly situated. The town is very irregularly built, and has an appearance of greater antiquity, perhaps, than any other in this county: the streets and lanes are mostly narrow and inconvenient, though some considerable improvements have been made here under an act passed in 1787, for new paving, lighting, watching, &c. Sandwich is a borough by charter, returning with several good portraits, and a curious print of the embarkation of Henry the Eighth for France. It has also a neat assembly room, a theatre, and two circulating libraries. Here were formerly seven churches, but five of them have long since been demolished; those remaining are dedicated to St. Mary the Virgin, and St. James: the former was built by the prior and convent of St. Martin's, for the use of the inhabitants, and the foundation of its tower was built upon the remains of an ancient Roman bath. The church of St. James anciently belonged to the castle, and in it the Courts of Chancery and Admiralty for the Cinque Ports are still occasionally held. In the reign of Henry the Third a large religious house was founded by Hubert de Burgh, Earl of Kent, at the end of this town, called the Maison Dieu; but at the Reformation it was converted into a victualling-office, for which purpose it is still used. Dover has been celebrated in history as a place of the greatest importance, ever since the Norman Conquest. Its ancient castle is supposed to have been built by Julius Cæsar. Henry the Second, about the year 1153, is said to have enclosed it with a new wall. The present entrance is on the south side of the main tower, by a grand flight of steps round the eastern side to the third story, or the governor's apartments. These steps were secured by three strong gates, at each of which was a chamber, or guard-room, and a dungeon for prisoners, in which several persons of distinction have been confined at different times, but now used only for disorderly soldiers. These entrances, before the use of gunpowder, were impregnable, the walls being 18 feet thick. Without the Duke of Suffolk's gate are commodious barracks, and wells, about 370 feet deep, which supply the garrison with water. After this castle was surrendered to William the Conqueror, it was considerably strengthened, and made more secure by the erection of 2 exterior walls from the Saxon fortification to the very edge of the perpendicular cliff, and additional towers. In the exterior wall of the castle are 17 towers, most of them named from the persons under whom they were erected. In the reign of Charles I. this strong fortress was taken by surprize, by a few men in the night. One Drake, a zealous republican, formed a plan to seize the garrison; and, accompanied by 10 or 12 men, at midnight, by the assistance of ropes and scaling ladders, he reached the top of the high cliff undiscovered. Having dispatched the sentinel, they threw open the gates, and the garrison, who were few in number, in the confusion, supposing themselves to be attacked by superior numbers,

The interior likewise exhibits some good workmanship, and here are also several ancient wooden stalls, besides numerous sepulchral inscriptions. The other two churches contain several ancient monumental erections, but are not otherwise deserving of particular notice. Sandwich possesses several charitable institutions, and has two markets weekly, on Wednesday and Saturday.

HYTHE. That Hythe was anciently of far greater importance, as a maritime town, than at present, is demonstrated by its being one of the principal Cinque Ports. The houses are chiefly situated in one long street, running parallel with the sea, but having two or three lesser ones branching off at right angles; near the middle of the principal street, is the court-hall and market-place, which has been lately rebuilt; and in one of the streets leading towards the beach, on the opposite side, is a small theatre. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard, and occupies a very elevated situation on the acclivity of the hill above the town: it is built in the form of a cross, with a tower at the west end. The interior is neatly fitted up, surrendered up the castle to this handful of desperadoes. Under the castle, to the north of the town, Captain Smith, the father of the gallant Sir Sidney Smith, erected a pleasant though whimsical residence, called The Cave; it is hewn out of the solid rock. Near the edge of the cliff is a piece of brass ordnance, 24 feet long, cast at Utrecht, in 1544, called Queen Anne's Pocket Pistol; it was a present from the States of Holland to the queen, and was said to be capable of carrying a twelve-pound shot to the distance of seven miles. This town is a great thoroughfare for persons passing and re-passing to and from France, the channel here being only nine leagues across to Calais, and with a fair wind, the voyage is often made in one tide. The harbour has been considerably improved of late years, and will now admit vessels of five hundred tons burden; and it is in contemplation to add farther to the improvement of this port by the erection of a chain pier. The piers which form the haven are very costly works, defended by strong batteries. The market-days are on Wednesday and Saturday.

From Margate and has a very striking and impressive appearance. Beneath the chancel, is a large crypt or vault, the entrance to which is on the south side, and originally another doorway opened into it from the church-yard on the north side, but this is now completely choked up to the very crown of the arch. In this vault is an immense quantity of human skulls and bones, which form a pile about 28 feet long, and between 7 and 8 feet high. These are traditionally said to be the remains of an invading army, which was discomfited upon this shore many years ago; yet the fact is not corroborated by any historical testimony; in many of the skulls are large clefts, as if made with a battle-axe. The church-yard commands a fine view of the sea, and coast of France. Besides the Martello towers that have been recently erected along this coast, there are several small forts on the beach in this vicinity, which were built shortly after the commencement of the late war.

It was made a theatre of war by the Danes for more than a century and a half; and likewise suffered severely during the contentions between King Stephen and the Empress Maud: it was alternately possessed by both parties, during the civil wars of the 17th century; and in the year 1762 was in a great measure destroyed by fire, from which, however, it rose to greater advantage than before. Wareham occupies an elevated situation, and forms almost a long square; its buildings are mostly constructed of brick, and the streets are spacious and open, intersecting each other nearly at right angles. The area on which it stands is enclosed, except on the south side, by a high rampart, or wall of earth, and the space between the wall and the town was anciently covered by houses, the foundations of which still remain; but it at present consists chiefly of extensive garden-grounds, divided into regular quadrangles, whose holders are entitled to vote for members of parliament for the borough: a large proportion of the vast supplies of vegetables here produced is sent to Poole and Portsmouth by water. Wareham had formerly eight churches, but only three of them now remain; the principal one dedicated to St Mary, is a lofty fabric, and one of the most spacious and ancient in the county; the chapel in its south aisle is also supposed, from its antiquity, to have been the burial-place of the Saxon kings. The building that was at one time St. Peter's church, is now used as a town-hall, school, and gaol: here are also two meeting-houses for dissenters, and a handsome bridge of Purbeck stone across the river Frome. The port of Wareham was formerly considerable, but is now nearly choked up; the quay lies on the south side of the town. The chief traffick here is in pipe-clay, which is dug in the neighbourhood, and sent coastways; there is also some trade in stockings, iron, and coals. This town sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Saturday.

WINSTER has a weekly market on Saturday, and is chiefly inhabited by persons employed in the mining business, and in the inferior branches of the cotton trade. In the vicinity are several curious rocking stones.

in an almost circular direction, so that the above eminence, with its dependant masses, is almost insulated, and the spectator who is desirous of surveying all its varied beauties, will, therefore, be compelled frequently to change his station. At the distance of about one mile from Buxton, the dale contracts, and leaves little more than sufficient space for the passage of the stream; each side is bounded by elevated rocks, some of them nearly covered with ivy, yew, and ashwood, and others completely bare of vegetation; this place is called Lover's Leap, from a vast craggy precipice, forming one side of a narrow chasm, from the summit of which a desponding lover is said to have flung herself into the rocky gulf below. A circular road of about three miles, at a short distance from Lover's Leap, is also much resorted to by the company; many of whom likewise frequent a new drive, between the Macclesfield and Manchester roads, and adjoining the latter, about three miles from Buxton.

NANTWICH, or Nantwich, is divided into two parts by the river Weaver, that here flows through a most luxuriant vale, which contains some of the finest dairy-land in the county; it is one of the largest and best built towns in Cheshire, the streets regular, and many of the houses handsome. The salt springs lie mostly on the banks of the river. Large mines of rock-salt were also discovered here in the beginning of the 18th century. The salt-quarries, with their pillars, and crystal roof, extend over several acres, and afford a very pleasing and picturesque appearance. The church is in the form of a cross: it is ancient, and has an octagonal tower in the centre, surmounted with battlements, and eight pinnacles. Nantwich suffered severely during the destructive conflicts that agitated this country in the early part of the 17th century; the town adhering to the parliament, underwent the horrors of a siege, but the royalists were totally defeated by the army under Sir Thomas Fairfax. This place contains several good charitable institutions, it carries on a considerable trade in cheese, salt, cotton, and shoes, and also possesses the advantage of water communication with the rivers Dee and Severn. COMBERMERE ABBEY. This building was founded early in the twelfth century, by Hugh de Maubane, and continued to flourish till the 34th year of Henry VIII., when its site, together with the church, lake, cemetery, &c., were granted to George Cotton, Esq., in whose family they have ever since remained. The mansion is situated on a romantic spot, on the banks of a large lake, that winds like a natural river, in a rich and well-wooded country, sufficiently undulating to possess a picturesque beauty, in the immediate vicinity of the abbey; but, at a short distance, rising into elevations that command many noble and extensive prospects over Cheshire, Shropshire, and North Wales. A part of the conventional buildings are said to have been preserved in the mansion which the Cottons erected here after the dissolution; among these was the refectory, supposed to form a part of the present library, and which was probably approached by a large flight of external steps, similar to those at Vale Royal and Norton. The walls of the old mansion are preserved in the present fabric, but their appearance is destroyed, and their architecture concealed, by the recent alterations that have taken place in imitation of the pointed Gothic style.

This building was originally quadrangular, but its western side has been removed by the present proprietor, who has also added much to the imposing effect of the building, and taken down the long gallery that extended along the top of its eastern side. The first appearance of this mansion is unusually striking; it exhibits a long and lofty line of irregular buildings, of timber and plaster, situated on a considerable elevation, between two deep valleys, near the bank of a meandering rivulet. A porch leads from the court into the great hall, which still retains its bay window, marking the site of the high table; from hence a spiral staircase composed of solid blocks of oak, leads to the drawing-room, an elegant apartment, about 36 feet square, and wainscoted nearly to the top; above the wainscot are ornaments in stucco, and the arms of the different alliances of the Davenports; the mantle-piece rises to the top of the room, and displays the arms of Elizabeth; and the walls are decorated with a fine series of family portraits. Beyond this is the plaster-room, so called from the materials composing the floor; this is surrounded with buff coats, military weapons, and imperfect suits of armour.

AUDLEM has a weekly market, and fair on the eve, day, and morrow of St. James the Apostle; it was granted to Sir Thomas de Aldelym, in the 24th of Edward I., and after having long fallen into disuse, has been recently revived by Mascie Taylor, Esq. From the silence of Domesday-book, it is most probable that the church of Audlem was not in existence at the time of that survey, and that the townships, whose inhabitants now resort to it, were comprised in Wybunbury, or some adjoining parishes. A grammar-school, free only to the parish, was founded, and chiefly endowed, in 1655, by Sir William Bolton and Mr. Gamull, citizens of London. The church, dedicated to St. James, consists of a nave, with side-aisles, a chancel, and a tower; it stands in the middle of the town on high ground, which falls rapidly away from it on the south and east sides, and gives it an unusual and picturesque appearance; the windows being	23 $\frac{3}{4}$	Hinstock	18 $\frac{1}{2}$

All Saints church is nearly circular; it has a lofty and very elegant steeple, and the interior is beautifully fitted up; St. Andrew's and St. John's churches are also neat buildings. Here are likewise many dissenting meeting-houses, an extensive and well-endowed infirmary, an hospital for lunatics, and one for lying-in married women, besides numerous other charitable institutions: the Keelman's Hospital also deserves notice, as it was erected, and is entirely supported, by small subscriptions from the daily earnings of that numerous class of labourers, the keelmen, or coalworkers. The houses in Newcastle are of various characters; some of stone, others of brick, and a great many of timber: the bridge was finished in 1781, at an expense of 30,000*l.*; it is an elegant structure, of nine arches, supporting a street of houses, and occupying the place of a more ancient one, that was destroyed by a flood together with 22 houses. have been recently made by the pulling down and widening of the narrow parts of the town; and Newcastle is also adorned with a handsome theatre, and a set of assembly-rooms. The exchange is a noble structure, from which the wall of the town runs parallel with the river, leaving a spacious piece of ground before it, between the water and the wall, and this being well wharfed up, forms a commodious quay. There is a set of very handsome baths on the outside of the west-gate; and without the walls, on the west, is the Firth, formerly a bowling-green, but now an agreeable promenade. The higher classes occupy the northern part of the town, which is by far the most pleasant, and has many level, spacious, and well-built streets. Several extensive manufactures are carried on here, among which are those of glass, broad and narrow cloth, hardware, wrought-iron, earthenware, &c.; but for the coal trade this is one of the first ports in the kingdom, as it has sometimes exported and sent coastwise more than 600,000 chaldrons in the year. Many excellent vessels are also built at Newcastle; and here are several banks, and a handsome mansion-house for the mayor. Newcastle gives title of Duke to the family of Pelham Clinton, returns two members to parliament, and has a market on Tuesday and Saturday.

LANCHESTER is a small straggling village, but has obtained some celebrity from its contiguity to the Roman station Glannibante. This station is one of the most perfect in the kingdom, and has evidently been of considerable importance. Numerous monuments, altars, coins and other relics, have at various times been found here, and even now discoveries being made, by the plough, of some memorable vestige of Roman piety. Many of the inscriptions furnish the antiquary with matter for speculative argument, from which useful inferences have been drawn, tending to establish certain facts relative to the history of the Roman empire in Britain. The station occupies a fine eminence, about half a mile south-west from the village of Lanchester; but the

NEW MALTON TO GREAT DRIFFIELD.

SLEDMERE. Sledmere Park, the beautiful seat of Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart.

GREAT DRIFFIELD, a pleasant market-town, is beautifully situated in a fertile plain, at the southern foot of the Wolds, and consists principally of one long and broad street, that runs nearly from north to south, and has, parallel to it, and about 150 yards to the east, a beautiful and considerable stream of transparent water, that murmurs over a gravelly bottom, amidst straggling houses and small enclosures; this brook is enlarged into a navigable canal, at the southern extremity of the town, and, passing through Wansford, where there is a considerable cotton and carpet manufactory, at length joins the river Hull. THORNTON STEWARD, before, Jerveaux Abbey , Marquis of Aylesbury . This abbey appears to have been founded in the year 1141; its inhabitants at first underwent many distresses, which, however, they at last surmounted, and then continued to reside here in great splendour for almost three centuries and a half, when the period of the dissolution arriving, this religious foundation was, like most others, destroyed with a considerable degree of alacrity; and its site, having become almost entirely overgrown with rough wood and briars, hardly any vestige remained of it, as a building, with the exception of the tops of a few arches, nearly level with the ground, and some portions of broken walls, that were over-run with ivy, till at length, in the year 1805, this place was visited by the late Earl of Aylesbury , whose steward, while making various improvements on the estate, dug to the bottom of one of the arches, which proved to be the entrance of the abbey, and led to a very beautiful floor of tessellated pavement. The whole of the ruin has been since cleared out, and the abbey-church, and choir, 270 feet long, chapter-house, and other attached buildings, have been discovered, together with several stone coffins, bearing inscrip-	51¾	To Enter Common 7 m., thence to Stockton 13 m. }

REDMIRE, near, Shunner Fell. This eminence is one of the highest of those bordering Swaledale; and the view from its summit will be allowed, by every admirer of the grand scenes of nature, to be an ample compensation for the trouble of ascending to so lofty a region. To the west, the eye, after wandering over that tract of country called Swaledale Forest, but where scarcely the vestige of a tree is now to be seen, has an extensive view over Westmorland; and the prospect is finely bounded by the lofty mountains of Cumberland, amongst which Cross Fell and Skiddaw are easily distinguished. Towards the south the prospect is more confined; but the various forms of the mountains on the borders of Lancashire, by which it is obstructed, amply supply the defect, in exhibiting a diversity highly picturesque and pleasing: for though the view on every side is mostly composed of mountains, yet those to the south are seen to the greatest advantage, rising in a manner extremely bold and majestic. Some of the mountains near Dent also add to the beauty of the southern prospect. In the eastern view, the romantic valley of Swaledale appears to great advantage: the eye, after ranging over the hills which rise on each side of the dale, overlooks a great part of Yorkshire, with the southern part of the county of Durham. It is even said, that, in very serene weather, the German ocean may be distinguished, opposite to the mouth of the Tees. To the north are seen Stainmoor's wintry wastes, with the county of Durham stretching far to the right; and still farther to the north, the view is extended to the wilds of Northumberland, the mountains of which are lost in the distance.

NORTH SHIELDS TO MORPETH.

MORPETH, situated on the northern bank of the river Wansbeck, is supposed to have derived its name from some path to it over a moor; and, though a place of some antiquity, nothing is recorded of it, at an early period, except that, out of hatred to King John, it was burnt by its own inhabitants in the year 1215. The only remains of its castle now in existence, are some fragments of the outer wall, and part of the gateway tower: the north-east and south-east corners of the tower had formerly angular turrets, that communicated by an open gallery supported on corbels. At a short distance from the castle, on its north side, there is a round mound of earth, situated on a natural mount, whose height is greatly assisted by art, and which was probably a malvoisin in some blockade. Morpeth was a second time destroyed by fire in the year 1689, and the loss was then estimated at 2500*l*. At present it is a neat town, pleasantly seated among woody undulating hills. It is a prescriptive borough, governed by two bailiffs and seven burgesses. It first sent members to parliament in 1553. The markets on Wednesday and Saturday afford the chief supply of fat cattle

The town-house was erected in 1714, at the expense of the Earl of Carlisle, from designs by Vanbrugh: the parish church stands on Kirk hill, about a quarter of a mile from the town, but there is a good ring of bells in a square tower near the market-place; and at the bridge-end is a chapel; adjoining which, in an old chantry, is an excellent free-school, founded by King Edward VI. This town contains the county gaol for Northumberland, and has given birth to two or three eminent individuals.

HINGHAM is a small town, but contains a handsome church, with a large and lofty spire: this building was erected in the reign of Edward III.; it was formerly more profusely decorated, but many of the ornaments have been removed or destroyed. In 1605, Robert Perk, who was then rector of the church, possessing a violent schismatical spirit, committed many serious dilapidations on the building, for which, being prosecuted by the bishop, he fled to New England, accompanied by many of his parishioners, who there erected a town and colony, which they named Hingham. W. part of the county; their names are Kinderscout and Azedge : the height of the former has not been ascertained; but the latter, which is supposed to be the least, is 1756 feet above the level of the sea, and commands a very extensive prospect. In the road hence to Chapel-in-le-Frith, about three miles distant, in a pasture on the right of the road, is situated a natural curiosity, called Marvel-Stones : this is a rock nearly 180 feet long, and 80 broad, rising about three feet from the surface of the ground: its face is deeply indented with innumerable channels, or gutters, of various length, breadth, shape, and depth, from five inches to five feet wide, and from nine inches to thirteen feet long: it also contains a vast number of irregular shaped holes, of different sizes; all these, after rain, are filled with water, and none of the channels, which run in a north and south direction, go quite across the stone. The whole area is indeed covered with these indentions, scarcely four feet square being found free from them in any part. The stone is solid and compact throughout, and has several irregular shaped stones at its east and west ends, standing a few inches from each other, the interstices filled with earth and grass.
CHAPEL IN LE FRITH. The High Peak, situated in this neighbourhood, is a region of bleak barren heights, and long-extended moors, interspersed with deep vallies, through which the small streams take their course. Here the scenery is in many parts romantic and sublime; but, on the whole, inferior in picturesque effect to that of other mountainous countries. Beauty, indeed, is only resident in the vallies; the high ground appearing dreary, and destitute of entertainment: and in many situations not a single house or tree is seen, to divert the eye of the traveller, or relieve the tedium that arises from the contemplation of sterility and nakedness. Unpleasing, however, and even disgusting to the imagination, as the moors are, they yet serve by way of contrast to heighten the beauty of the dales and vallies by which they are intersected; and the sudden changes which these occasion in the appearance of the country, at once surprise and interest: admiration is excited by the comparison; and the mind readily admits that its pleasure would have been less perfect, if the preceding scenes had been more beautiful. The Low Peak abounds with eminences of various heights and extent. Brassington-Moor, Aldwark, near Wirksworth, and Crich-Cliff, are the most elevated, and command very extensive prospects: from Alport, on a clear day, the Wrekin in Shropshire may be distinguished.	62 $\frac{1}{4}$	to Eastwood 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ m.	6

The river is here crossed by two good stone bridges, one on the road to Thrapston, and the other on that leading to Yaxley; the latter is called the North bridge, and is worthy of notice, from the number of its arches, and causeway leading to it. Oundle possesses an almshouse, and free grammar-school; and has a weekly market on Thurs- day.
GREAT WELDON, more commonly called Weldon in the Woods, is a small town, that had formerly a weekly market, now, however, discontinued: the market-house, over which are the sessions chambers, sup- ported by columns of the Tuscan order, was erected by Lord Viscount Hatton. This parish is celebrated for its quarries of rag-stone, a kind of marble which takes a high polish, and is much esteemed for chimney- pieces, slabs, &c.; and it is here traditionally asserted that St. Paul's cathedral, which was de- stroyed in the fire of London, was constructed of Weldon stone. In this neighbourhood some fragments of tessellated pavements were discovered in the year 1738, one of which was 96 feet long, and 10 broad.	18$\frac{1}{4}$ 14$\frac{3}{4}$ 12$\frac{1}{2}$ 10$\frac{1}{4}$ 9$\frac{1}{2}$ 8 5$\frac{3}{4}$	Upper Benefield Great Weldon To Stamford 13$\frac{1}{2}$ m. ☞ ☞ to Kettering 8$\frac{1}{4}$ m. Corby, Church Junction of the Road To Uppingham 7$\frac{1}{4}$ m. ☞ ☞ to Kettering 7$\frac{1}{2}$ m. Forward to Division of the Road To Cottingham $\frac{3}{4}$ m. ☞ ☞ to East Carlton Wilbarston	5$\frac{1}{4}$ 8$\frac{3}{4}$ 11 13$\frac{1}{4}$ 14 15$\frac{1}{2}$ 17$\frac{3}{4}$

Among the portraits at Liscombe are several of the Lovett family; a half-length of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, with a pink in his hand; the first Earl of Bedford, a half length, on board, dated 1555; Sir Nicholas Crisp, in armour; Sir Edmund Verney, standard bearer to King Charles I., who was slain at Edgehill; Archbishop Sancroft, Titus Oates, &c. In the parish church are some monuments of the Lovetts. The impropriate rectory, which formerly belonged to Woburn Abbey, is now the property of Lady Lovett. The curacy, or donative, is in the gift of the crown, but the Lovett family have been allowed to enjoy the patronage ever since the year 1642, when Sir Robert Lovett left the sum of 40l. per annum, as an augmentation of the curacy, to be paid by his heirs, on condition that they should be allowed to nominate the curate, whose salary was before only 8l. per annum. Bedford suffered severely in the time of the Saxons and Danes, and was also in a very decayed state in the reign of Henry VII., but is now by far the most important town in the county, and contains five parishes, with as many churches; that dedicated to St. Paul is, however, the only one requiring notice: it was formerly collegiate, and is adorned with a handsome octagonal stone spire. The principal manufactures are those of lace, and straw plait; it has also a considerable trade in corn, coal, timber, and malt. Here are several good public buildings, a lunatic asylum, an infirmary, and other charitable institutions; that, however, from which the poor have derived most benefit was founded by Sir W. Harpur, in the latter part of the 16th century, and is now, by a singular increase of the value of the gift, and from having been managed by persons of judgment and integrity, well calculated to become the basis of a fair structure of wide-spreading utility. Bedford gives the title of Duke to the Russel family; it has an excellent market on Monday and

Reading is situated on two small eminences, whose declivities fall into a pleasant vale, highly improved by the branches of the Kennet, which flow through it, and unite with the Thames at the extremity of the town; the surrounding country is also agreeably diversified with an intermixture of hill and dale, wood and water, and ornamented with a number of elegant seats; and the prospect from the Forbery, a beautiful out-work on the N.E. side of the town, is very extensive, commanding a fine view over a great part of Oxfordshire. The houses are mostly built with brick, and the streets are paved; but some of them are very narrow and inconvenient: the inhabitants follow the different occupations of tradesmen, farmers, agricultural labourers, and manufacturers; and the poor receive the benefit of several excellent charitable donations. Here are 3 churches, dedicated to St. Mary, St. Lawrence, and St. Giles: the first is considered the most ancient, and is generally admired for its tessellated tower; and the latter, which was much damaged by the cannon of the parliament army, affords a tolerable idea of the devastation which this town experienced during the siege in 1643. A large stack of chimnies, in brick-work, variously ornamented, evidently exhibits the remains of a much more ancient residence; but a few years since the house itself was fitted up, and all the ornaments restored, as they were in 1636, so that it now presents a curious specimen of the style of decoration then in use. — 1 m. distant from Aldermaston, at Padworth, Padworth House, the seat of T. The scenery is picturesque, the views being diversified by large groves of the finest forest-trees, particularly oak, ash, and beech, interspersed with thorns, beautifully luxuriant and large. The house, which is situated towards the eastern boundary of the park, is encompassed by about 100 acres of pleasure-grounds, disposed into lawn, terrace, shrubbery, and a noble wood. It was originally a lodge, built in Queen Elizabeth's time, and used as a place of meeting for the company assembled for the purpose of hawking, and as a banqueting-room after the sport was over. This lodge now forms the central part of the building, which, after a variety of additions and alterations, has arrived at its present excellence.

Induced by the peculiar amenity of the place, his son, Wm. Hayley, Esq. considerably enlarged it as a villa, and passed there many years of a life dedicated to literary pursuits, previously to 1800, when he sold it to Wm. Huskisson, Esq., M. P. for Chichester, late secretary to the treasury, who has greatly enlarged the mansion-house, in a style of accommodation and elegance; having likewise extended and made alterations in the immediate environs. The present estate includes about 300 acres. This originally unextensive domain was embellished by its late owner, in the simple and genuine taste of the ferme ornée, as first introduced into this country by Shenstone, at the Leasowes. Eminent English poets have exemplified their powers of creating beautiful scenery, in the several places where their good fortune gave them a scope for their genius, in what has been termed 'landscape gardening.' Pope led the way at Twickenham; Shenstone followed more rural beauties at the Leasowes;

During the residence of the last mentioned, the Grove of Earham was made 'academic' by the frequent visits of the first literary characters of that day, and as the favourite retreat of Cowper 'in his happier hour.' The grounds are laid out with good effect, and afford a singular diversity of pleasing objects; several points command very beautiful and enlarged prospects, where woods sweep over the acclivities of the downs; and in front, a diversified and rich tract of country is bounded by the sea and the Isle of Wight: few places, indeed, of similar extent, can boast of a surface more varied, or scenery more interesting."

A high earthwork, which is continued from the camp in the Broil, traverses the woodlands in a direction for the rivulet at Ashling. The more probable conjecture is, that it was a road or causeway, made to procure a supply of water, for the Roman army during their summer encampment. The salubrity of the air is so remarkable, that this district may be justly styled the Montpellier of England."

This formerly belonged to canons regular of St. Augustin; but the original buildings having been destroyed by fire, the present extensive and very noble mansion was erected on its site, about the commencement of the 17th century: it has since, at different times, received various additions and improvements, in all of which the ancient baronial character of the edifice has been scrupulously preserved; the same may be said of the gardens and pleasure grounds, whose monastic features will still be viewed with particular interest, as no innovating hand has ever been allowed here to obtrude. The interior of the mansion is tastefully furnished, and contains a very elegant library, that was erected after a plan by Smirke; and a fine chapel, which was beautified by the first Earl of Guildford: the various apartments are decorated with a valuable collection of ancient family portraits, including a complete series of the Lords North, from their origin, in the reign of William and Mary, to the present Earl of Guildford: many of these noble individuals, and some of the Pope family, who were afterwards created Earls of Downe, have magnificent monuments erected to their memory, in the church of Wroxton.

MANCHESTER, an extensive parish, comprehending the township of Atherstone, and the hamlets of Oldbury and Hartsbill, is a small village, but must be viewed with high interest, as occupying a part of the site of the Roman station of Manduessedum. The Watling Street passes in the close vicinity of the village, on the north-east; and on this road are the remains of a camp, which are divided into nearly equal parts, by the transit of the street. The mean length of the whole level surface, or area within the earthworks, is 627 feet; and the mean breadth 438 feet; the total of contents being 6 acres, 1 rood, and 4 perches. Fragments of buildings and Roman coins have been frequently found in the neighbourhood.

ATHERSTONE consists chiefly of one street; it contains several good and substantial houses, and is situated on the Roman Watling Street: it was a place of little importance at the time of the Conquest, but was, at an early period, bestowed by Hugh, Earl of Chester, on the monks of Bec, in Normandy, who procured for it the grant of a weekly market, held on Tuesday, and to whose patronage the town appears to be indebted for its first steps towards prosperity. The market, when once established, rapidly augmented in traffic; but the monks shared the fate attending most alien religious institutions, and surrendered their possessions in the reign of Henry IV. This place attains much interest, in an historical point of view, from its connection with the celebrated battle that ended the war of the rival roses. Atherstone is not more than nine miles distant from the tract of land usually termed Bosworth Field; and the troops of the Earl of Richmond entered this town on the 20th of August 1485, and halted here for the night. They were encamped on a meadow to the north of the church, since denominated, from that circumstance, the Royal Meadow. It was during this busy and portentous night, that a meeting took place at Atherstone, between Richmond and the two Stanleys, when those measures of co-operation were concerted, which occasioned the defeat of King Richard's army, in the battle fought at Bosworth Field on the following Monday, August the 22d, 1485. Here is a chapel of ease to the parish church of Manchester, which partly consists of an ancient building, formerly a friary church, to which a south aisle has been added, and some other alterations made, which, though they may have contributed to the convenience of the inhabitants, have certainly detracted much from the original symmetry of the building. The trade of Atherstone is princi-

NUNEATON was, at an early period, a place of some importance, owing to the foundation of a monastery by Robert, Earl of Leicester, in the time of King Stephen; this building has, however, long since been entirely destroyed, with the exception of an arch, and some fragments of walls that are still to be seen to the north-west of the town. The church is a neat Gothick structure, but not sufficiently large for the accommodation of the inhabitants. A manufactory of ribbons is carried on in the town; and here is also a good free-school, and a market on Saturday.

HINCKLEY soon after the Conquest was created a barony; and had a castle, not the slightest vestige of which is now in existence; the ditch may, however, be traced in some places, with remnants of the town wall; and here are also some remains, supposed to be of Roman origin; these consist of a mound near the river, and the ruins of a bath near the church. The parish is of considerable extent, and includes four hamlets, which are distinct villages, one of them situated in the county of Warwickshire. The town, under its original lords, certainly enjoyed the privileges of a borough; but having taken a decided part in favour of the house of Lancaster, in the civil contest, its privileges were forfeited to the conquering monarch of the house of York. The civil government of Hinckley is vested in the mayor, constables, and headboroughs: the principal trade is the manufacture of stockings, which is here carried on to a very considerable extent; the goods produced are principally of the commoner description. This branch of manufacture furnishes employment for a vast number of persons in the town and adjacent villages. The market is held on Monday, and on the 26th of August is an annual fair, which is mentioned by Shakspeare in the second part of Henry IV. The parish church is an ancient edifice, with a steeple 120 feet high, containing a good set of bells. The length of the church, from the chancel to the western door, is 66 feet: the width, near the chancel, 78 feet; in the body, 55 feet. The roof is composed of beautiful old oak, having the beams supported by large pendant cherubins, and ornamented with a number of grotesque faces. At a short distance from Hinckley, on the road to Lutterworth, is a spring, called "The Holy Well," originally dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and once known by the name of "Our Lady's Well;" and good mineral waters are also found in this vicinity, at Cogg's Well, Christopher's Spa, and the Priest-Hills.

The library contains a valuable collection of litera- ture, and the different apart- ments are decorated with an excellent collection of paintings, among which those representing the meeting of Hector and An- dromache at the Scaean gate, and Cleopatra with an attendant holding a vase supposed to con- tain the asp, are particularly de- serving attention. The grounds are tolerably well wooded; they command several interesting prospects over the surrounding country, and receive additional beauty from a fine ornamental fish-pond, situated at a short distance from the mansion. — At Osmaston, John Beresford, Esq.

OXFORD TO GOSPORT, BY ABINGDON, NEWBURY, WHITCHURCH, AND WINCHESTER, WITH BRANCHES TO SOUTHAMPTON, AND PORTSMOUTH; AND BY NEWBURY, ANDOVER, AND WINCHESTER.

WHITCHURCH is a small straggling town, but possessing the rights of a borough, and returning 2 members to parliament; the number of voters is about 70: it is situated in a bottom, under chalk hills, on a small stream celebrated for the excellence of its trout, and much frequented by anglers. Market on Friday.

HIGHCLERE STREET. Ivy House, J. Hall, Esq.; and Highclere House, Earl of Caermarvon. The mansion occupies an elevated situation, in a noble park, more than 13 miles in circumference; it is a brick structure, stuccoed, in a modern style of architecture, more distinguished for elegance than splendour of appearance, and containing a number of apartments of large dimensions, decorated with various portraits, cabinet pictures, and other paintings, by the most esteemed artists. But the chief glory of this seat is the park and pleasure grounds, of which, it may be truly observed, that few places of similar extent in the inland parts of the kingdom can boast of surface more varied, or scenery more interesting. The most striking feature is Sidon Hill, the ascent of which begins about half a mile to the south of the house, thence boldly rising to a summit of upwards of 400 feet in perpendicular height above the level of a neighbouring valley, and crowned with a ruined arch, backed by venerable woods; its sides are clothed with plantations, disposed with great beauty, and the drives that wind along to the summit present various extensive views over the park and surrounding country. Beacon Hill, to the south-east of this, and just without the park gate, forms a striking contrast to it, not a single tree appearing thereon. The entrance into the park from Winchester, is between these hills, by an arched gateway, bearing a trophy of arms over the principal arch. On the opposite side of Sidon Hill is a castellated lodge, bowered high in tufted trees, of a triangular form, with a turret at each angle. The view from Tent hill, a bold elevation on the northern side of the park, with a grove on its summit, is very extensive, and embraces, among other beautiful objects, a most luxuriant display of wood and water. Extensive rides, admitting most delightful prospects, have likewise been formed through the woods and plantations, and several ornamental buildings have been erected in different parts of this demesne, which possesses many other beauties deserving of minute examination, but not here noticed, owing to the contracted limits of this work.

ANDOVER, a large, respectable, and ancient town, situated on the verge of Salisbury Plain, near the river Anton, is supposed by Dr. Stukeley to be the Androcon of Ravennas, and probably with truth, as several ancient encampments may be traced in the vicinity; the Roman road from Winchester to Cirencester also passes near the town, and is yet visible in Harewood Copse. The church, a spacious structure, standing at the north end of the town, consists of a nave, side-aisles, and chancel, with a transept on the north, and a low tower rising from the centre. This edifice existed in the time of William the Conqueror, by whom it was given to the Abbey of St. Florence, at Salmur, in Anjou, and afterwards made a cell to that foundation. On the first dissolution of the alien priories, in the reign of Henry V., it was given to St. Mary's college, near Winchester. The corporation boasts an antiquity as remote as the reign of King John; but however this may be, the charter under which it is now governed, was granted by Queen Elizabeth. The corporate officers consist of twelve capital burgesses, (from whom a bailiff, and two other magistrates, are annually chosen,) and twelve assistants: here is also a steward, recorder, and town clerk. Andover sends two members to parliament: the earliest return was made in the time of Edward I.; the right of election has long been assumed by the corporation, and the number of voters amounts to twenty-four. The town, from being situated on the great Exeter roads, derives no inconsiderable advantage from the expenditure of travellers; it has likewise some trade in shallons and malt, and has also the be-

The chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the grammar-school that was founded here by Lawrence Sheriff; in the time of Queen Elizabeth: this establishment was formerly of a very humble nature; but the lands left for its support, which are situated near the Foundling Hospital, in London, have since so considerably increased in value, that the trustees have lately been enabled to build a very splendid school, with houses and apartments for the masters and assistants: in compliment to the memory of the founder, this structure is in the style that prevailed in the latter part of the sixteenth century; the principal front faces the south, and is 220 feet long; it resembles a college in appearance, and now ranks among the first public schools in the kingdom. This seat lays claim to particular notice, as having formerly been the residence of the celebrated Addison, whose writings contributed in such an eminent degree to improve the manners of the nation. The house, a spacious but irregular structure, is entered by iron gates that lead to a venerable porch; it contains a number of fine apartments, and stands in a retired spot, commanding several interesting prospects. The house and grounds remain nearly in the same state as when that eminent poet dwelt here; as do also the gardens, which are rather extensive, and still exhibit all the ancient formality of long straight lines, and massy hedges of yew: two ponds are situated in the lower parts of the grounds, having delightfully sequestered seats on their sides; and in the northern division there is a long walk, that was formerly the chosen retreat of Addison, when wishing to indulge in contemplation; this was rendered more accordant to his meditative mind by the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and by being deepened with lines of trees, among which were a number of Spanish oaks, raised from acorns planted by his own hand.	24	* Dunchurch	42¾

OXFORD, situated at the confluence of the rivers Thames and Charwell, and on a gentle elevation, in the area of an amphitheatre of hills, presents a grand and interesting spectacle from all the neighbouring heights. The chief approaches are particularly good, and the High Street presents a scene unusually attractive. This noble thoroughfare derives an indescribable interest from the curved direction in which it is formed. Owing to this circumstance a fresh display of architectural grandeur takes place at almost every step. The street is well paved, and its sides are adorned by the colleges of University, Queen's and All Souls. It will be readily supposed that the learned have taken great pains to trace this "seat of the muses" to a very remote origin; their utmost labours, however, terminate in plausible conjecture; and judicious history takes its best foundation in the year 727, at which time a monastery was erected here by Didan, an Anglo-Saxon nobleman. The city speedily acquired importance as the seat of public schools; and throughout every age subsequent to the Norman Conquest, has been progressively rising in national estimation. The period at which the university was founded, has not been correctly ascertained; but it is usually believed that Alfred the Great first established at this place certain schools for students in grammar, arts, and divinity. These wise and benevolent institutions of King Alfred suffered greatly from the incursions of the Danes, who three times destroyed Oxford by fire. The learned establishments appear, however, to have revived with the city, after each assault, and the university attained a flourishing aspect shortly after the coming of the Normans. Previous to the reign of Henry III., the teachers and scholars lodged and studied in buildings, which they rented of the citizens. In the time of this king, houses were erected by affluent patrons of literature, and bestowed on the votaries of learning. Unexpected advantages were derived from so laudable an example; for the custom of founding and endowing colleges progressively supplanted the taste which had long prevailed, for the foundation of monastic structures. Gradually enriched with buildings, endowed for the encouragement of learning, and well provided for the reception of stu-

COVENTRY. This city was constituted a county of itself by Henry VI., and the charter was confirmed by Edward IV. The houses are in general ancient; many of them as old as the 15th century, have projecting upper stories; they occupy a gentle elevation, and form an interesting subject for the antiquary; many of them also receive additional interest from local circumstances, while others that have been new-fronted, still possess in their interior an abundance of carved work, that evidently shows the prosperity of the place during the reigns of the latter Henries. Coventry has been frequently the temporary residence of royalty; it contains several public edifices, of considerable beauty, and highly deserving the attention of the traveller, particularly St. Michael's church, which is surmounted by one of the most elegant spires in Europe: St. Mary's Hall, used by the corporation for the purposes of civic festivity, is also a very noble structure, and is decorated with paintings of great merit. This city, the streets of which were narrow and badly paved, has recently been much improved: it contains several charitable institutions, sends two members to parliament, has a market on Friday, and is distinguished for its extensive manufacture of watches and ribands. The Oxford and Coventry canals, the head of which is near Bishop Street, afford great facilities to traffic, and largely contribute to the prosperity of the place. The great road from London to Holyhead, and also to Liverpool, passes through this city; the benefits from which are likewise considerable and evident. With such advantages of manufacture and interchange, although the city may not appear as captivating to the traveller as when enriched by all its structures, fresh in aspect and flourishing in character, it may still with confidence rely on its own efforts for attaining an intrinsic superiority to the proud height which it gained in the days of the third Edward and the sixth Henry.

OXFORD. In the preceding road, an attempt has been made to convey to the mind of the reader, in a brief sketch of the same, a general description of this classical, and truly splendid metropolis of the county; and though perhaps exceeded in length by none in the work, is from the contracted space to which these observations are necessarily confined, of a more limited nature than, left to the freedom of choice, would have governed the editor's arrangement of this article; upon the consideration of which he revisited the university in May 1822. The result of this last investigation was productive, in his mind, of the following conviction, and in which he feels the certainty of corroboration,—that volumes written on this head would be unequal to do justice to the subject, and, in a few words, that the powers of the pen are as inadequate to describe, as are the creations of the pencil incompetent to delineate the resplendent beauties of the city of Oxford.

NORTHAMPTON, situated on the north bank of the river Nen, gives title of Marquis to the family of Compton, and is a large, spacious, and handsome town. It formerly contained seven churches within the walls, and two without, but the whole place having been nearly destroyed by a conflagration in 1675, the number is now reduced to four. The principal church, dedicated to All Saints, stands nearly in the centre of the town, at the junction of four streets, having a stately portico of eight Ionic columns, and surmounted by a statue of King Charles II. The church of St. Sepulchre, of a circular form, is supposed to have been built by the Knights Templars, from a model of that erected over the Holy Temple in Jerusalem. St.

The church of St. Mary, situated on the north side of the High-Street, is a fine and attractive structure, with a square tower, and a taper spire. The city of Oxford with its suburbs, consists of fourteen parishes; but only two of the parochial churches, after that mentioned above, demand notice in regard to architectural character. The buildings for municipal and other uses connected with the city are of a very eligible character. Oxford has lately experienced the addition of a noble market place. The corporation consists of a mayor, high steward, recorder, four aldermen, eight assistants, two bailiffs, a town clerk, two chamberlains, and twenty-four common-council; and the city and university send each two members to parliament. By means of the Thames it has water communication with the metropolis, and by that river and the Thames and Severn Canal with the river Severn; by the Thames, Wilts. and Berks., and Kennet and Avon canals, with Bath and Bristol, and lastly by the Oxford canal, and various other branches, with the great manufacturing and mining districts, the Trent, the Humber, and the Dee.

BRACKLEY is situated on a descent, near a branch of the river Ouse, and derives its name from the brakes, or fern, with which the adjacent country is said to have formerly abounded. The houses are chiefly built of stone, ranged in one street, extending from the bridge up the hill: it was formerly a very considerable town, and is one of the oldest bo-

Giles's has nothing remarkable, and St. Peters deserves notice only as a curious relic of ancient architecture. Here are also places of worship for quakers, methodists, presbyterians, and baptists. The town may be said to be divided into four nearly equal parts, by two streets running in the direction of the cardinal points. Both these streets are wide and spacious, and each extends nearly a mile in length. The street called the Drapery, though not the longest, is nevertheless the finest in the town, for its breadth and the handsome appearance of its shops. At the east end of the Drapery is the market-place, it is a square of 600 feet, surrounded by handsome shops and neat private dwellings. Most of the houses are built of a reddish coloured stone dug in the neighbourhood, the others are of brick. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in trade and manufactures, principally in those of shoes, stockings and lace; of the former great quantities are sent to the metropolis, as well as exported; and the whole is greatly promoted by the Northampton Canal, which uniting with the Grand Junction Canal, gives water communication to the principal manufacturing and mining districts, the ports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Hull. The markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday. The horse fair held here is indeed considered to excel every other in the kingdom, for saddle and carriage horses; the town, from its central situation, being the general rendezvous of the horse dealers of London and York. Northampton has sent two members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward I. The number of voters is about thirteen hundred, and the returning officer the mayor. It is governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, four aldermen, twelve magistrates, a recorder, town-clerk, common-council and forty-eight burgesses. The town is well paved, watched, and lighted, and contains a very handsome sessions-house, a town gaol, a county gaol upon Howard's plan, an elegant shire-hall, a neat theatre, a grammar-school, a noble infirmary, and numerous charitable institutions.

This delightful seat was entirely renovated, and received considerable additions, a few years since: it is a large pile of building, standing on the brow of an eminence, with its principal front facing the south, which is approached from Yardley Chace, by a wide avenue, above three miles long. The mansion surrounds a spacious quadrangular court, having a screen two stories high on its south side, erected from a design by Inigo Jones, and consisting of a piazza at bottom, with a long gallery over it. The south-east and south-west angles of the court are occupied by two lofty octangular towers, whose pinnacles, as well as that of the court elevation, are formed of stones cut in the shape of letters, ranged to repeat the following text, "Nisi Dominus edificaverit quoniam in vanum laboraverunt quia edificavit eam." The dates, 1625 and 1635, are seen in the balustrades of the turrets, and mark the time when the screen was erected, and the upper part of the house finished. The great hall is on the north side of the court; it has a gallery at each end, and contains a number of fine portraits. In the park there are some artificial plantations, and a large lake, which were formed by the celebrated Brown. At a short remove from the mansion stands the church, a very neat building, with a curious ancient porch on its north side; here is a fine old altar-tomb, with the statue of a cross-legged knight in chain-armor, and a brass, on which is engraved the figure of a priest, or monk, and the representations of ten saints.

mous John Winscomb, generally called Jack of Newbury. This town was formerly celebrated for its extensive manufactories of woollen cloth, which furnished the inhabitants with employment for several centuries; yet scarcely any thing but serge is now made here, the clothing trade having been carried to the more western parts of the kingdom. In the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., this business was particularly flourishing in Newbury; and the above named Mr. Winscomb is reported to have been the greatest clothier in England, during the early part of the reign of the latter monarch, who, according to tradition, was, together with Queen Catherine, and many of the nobility, splendidly entertained by that gentleman, at his manufactory. The public spirit of this individual was so great, that, on the breaking out of the war with the Scots, he joined the king's army with 100 of his men, all armed and clothed at his own expense. Newbury carries on a considerable traffick, in malt and flour, by means of the Kennet and Avon canal, and the Kennet, Thames, and Avon rivers, which connect the town with London, Bath, and Bristol. The corporation consists of a mayor, high steward, recorder, six aldermen, and twenty-four	From Salisbury. A fine sheet of water flows before the mansion, over which is a three-arched bridge, built in the Chinese style. The entrance to the park from the high road has a handsome lodge on each side: a spacious road leads thence through a wood to the open grounds, where a variety of pleasing views immediately present themselves. The park and grounds are judiciously ornamented with woods, and the whole presents a combination of simplicity and beauty.

ISLINGTON. This village, though once described as a "pleasant country town," is now only separated from London by name, since a continuation of buildings positively unite it with the metropolis: it is situated on a rich gravelly and loamy soil; and chiefly composed of the dwellings of retired citizens, and other persons engaged in mercantile pursuits. It yet retains much of the character of an ancient place, in the display of a considerable number of old buildings, formerly inhabited by distinguished persons, but now almost generally converted into retail shops, and houses of public entertainment. The well-known salubrity of the air tends much to increase the population of Islington, which is composed of many substantial terraces and streets; and numerous detached residences, with ornamental gardens, give an agreeable diversity and greatly enliven the neighbourhood; while the delightful meadows in its immediate vicinity, commanding many beautifully rural prospects, and embracing several gardens for public entertainment, render Islington a very desirable place of retirement from the toils and fatigues of business. The parish church is a handsome structure, composed of brick, with coigns, cornices, and other ornaments of	From Snarresb.	From Paddin.

It is not remarkable for any historical transactions of importance: but seems to have been a place of much fashion and consideration in the 16th and 17th centuries, which appears from the parish books, where mention is made of several of the nobility, and many eminent characters being then resident in the parish. Early in the 18th century, Hackney became the favourite resort of wealthy citizens, whose numerous residences, ornamented with gardens, &c. present a very lively and agreeable appearance. The village occupies a flat site, and chiefly consists of four streets, principally composed of respectable buildings, among which will be found many residences of a superior class. Within these last twenty years, many ancient buildings, which formerly gave interest to Hackney, have been destroyed, together with the old church, with the exception of the tower, which still remains. This is a square building composed of stone, with an embattled parapet and graduated buttresses: and appears to have been erected in the 14th century. The new stone. At the west end a spire, of some elegance, rises from a square tower, embellished with a balustrade and vases. The great entrance, is by a circular flight of steps, and a portico of the Tuscan order. The interior comprises a chancel, nave, and two aisles; the roof being supported without pillars. Over the communion table is a picture of the Annunciation. The furniture is decorous and pleasing; and received, in 1772, the addition of a fine organ, which cost four hundred pounds. The length of the building is 108 feet, and the width 60: the interior is embellished with numerous monuments and inscriptions. Islington contains several manufactories, on an extensive scale, among which, those of white lead, floor-cloth, and fur for the fabrication of hats, are the most considerable. The Regent's Canal, which connects the branch of the Grand Junction Canal at Paddington, with the Thames at Poplar, passes through this parish, and is conducted under the village by means of a tunnel, nearly half a mile long.

From Paddin. church stands at a short distance from the site of the old one : the building was commenced in May 1792, and was consecrated on the 15th of July 1797. It is principally composed of brick, above the plinth, which has a casing of Portland stone, and there are stone imposts to the piers, forming the arched recesses of the windows and doors. There are five entrances, each opening into a spacious vestibule ; the principal one is on the north, and is protected by a semicircular Ionic portico of Portland stone. Over the north vestibule rises the steeple : it is composed of brick, with an exterior of Portland stone ; this, together with the portico, was added to the building, in the years 1812 and 1813. This church is very spacious, and calculated to be capable of containing 2500 persons in the pews and open seats ; and the aisles will admit many more.

 PEMBROKE is pleasantly situated in a rich country, on the shore of a navigable creek. The town consists chiefly of one long street, and has two churches, St. Mary's and St. Michael's ; besides a third, dedicated to St. Nicholas, situated in the suburbs. It is watered by two small rivers, over which are handsome bridges. This borough has a market on Wednesday and Saturday, and, together with Tenby and Whiston, sends one member to parliament. The castle stands on a rocky point of land to the west of the town, and, in extent, boldness of situation, and variety of architecture, may justly be said to rank among the most splendid monuments of antiquity in South Wales. Many of the apartments are in tolerable preservation, and some retain strong features of their former elegance.

LEICESTER. In the neighbourhood of this place are the Charnwood Hills, which are too striking a feature to be passed without notice. They are thus described by Mr. Marshall: "Like the Malvern Hills, their style is singular; but the style of one is very different from that of the other. The Malvern Hills, seen from a distance, bear a most striking resemblance to the Atlantic islands, towering up high and ragged; and, on a near view, appear as one large mountain fragment. The Charnwood Hills, on the contrary, seen obscurely, appear as an extensive range of mountains much larger, and of course much more distant, than they really are. When approached, the mountain style is still preserved; the prominences are distinct, sharp, and most of them pointed with ragged rock. One of these prominences, Bardon Hill, rises above the rest; and though far from an elevated situation, comparatively with the more northern mountains, commands, in much probability, a greater extent of surface than any other point of view in the island. It is entirely insulated, standing every way at a considerable distance from lands equally high. The horizon appears to rise almost equally on every side; it is quite an ocean view, from a ship out of sight of land; at least more so than any other land view I have seen. The midland district is, almost every acre of it, seen lying at its feet. Lincoln	27 $\frac{1}{4}$	{ to Norman's Cross 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ m. { to Oundle 9 m. To Stamford 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. verned by a constable, chosen annually at the court-leet. From 26 Edward I. to 12 Edward IV. Bramber was joined with Steyning in the writs for electing two burgesses to serve in parliament; but since that period, they have each returned the same number. The right of election is in the persons paying scot and lot, and inhabiting houses built on ancient foundations. The burgage-holds, thirty-six in number, are the joint property of the Duke of Rutland and Lord Calthorpe. It is related that, in the election contest in 1786, the tenant of one of the cottages of which this borough consists, had the integrity to reject the offer of 1000*l.* for his vote. On the north-east side of Bramber Street are the ruins of the ancient castle, the only relic of the former consequence of this place. History, which is remarkably sterile on the subject of this castle, no where records when, or by what means, it was reduced to its present condition. Its ruins attest that it was once a strong and extensive edifice; but the only remains now to be seen, are a lofty piece of what is supposed to have been a gateway, and some low fragments of walls on the west side. It appears to have completely covered the top of a ragged eminence, which commands a fine view of the adjacent country and the sea, and to have been surrounded by a triple trench now overgrown with trees and bushes. Grose observes, that, on considering the vast thickness of the remaining fragments of walls, and the small effect which time and weather have produced upon it since Hollar's view was taken, there is reason to suppose that it was demolished by gunpowder, perhaps for the sake of the materials.

of the weather. The discovery was accidentally made in July 1811, with the plough, on a field known by the name of Oldbury; the largest of these pavements, and the first that was laid open, is in an apartment 31 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet by 30, in the centre of which is a small hexagonal vapour-bath, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide from the outward stone coping, forming six seats, with two steps to the arena, or basement, which is only two feet four inches wide, and has a leaden pipe or flue in the middle. In a compartment contiguous to one of the sides of this bath is a complete figure of a Bacchante; and in another a similar figure perfect down to the waist; the other sides had undoubtedly the like ornaments, but of these no traces are left. In the other principal division of this floor, which is circular, is a spirited representation of the rape of Ganymede. The limits of this work precluding the possibility of a description sufficiently detailed to satisfy the antiquary on this very interesting subject, he is referred to the elaborate history of the county of Sussex by the Rev. Mr. Dallaway, where, illustrated by plates furnished from the drawings of Mr. Lysons, and aided by that gentleman's account of the same, he will obtain the very best information relative to this truly splendid memorial of antiquity.

PLYMOUTH. Across the Cremil Passage, Mount Edgecumbe, the seat of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe. This truly magnificent mansion is situated on the side of a beautifully wooded hill, in a spacious lawn, bounded with rich old timber, growing down to the water's edge. From its northern and eastern fronts, it commands extensive, and finely diversified prospects, including Plymouth, Devonport, and the dock-yard, the citadel, the shipping in Hamoaze, and the surrounding country, bounded by elevated hills. It was completed in the reign of Queen Mary, and is built of lime-stone, covered with stucco. Its form is nearly

PLYMOUTH is a place of considerable antiquity, that was inhabited principally by fishermen, till the reign of Henry II., but is now one of the largest maritime towns in England, for which distinction it is indebted to the goodness of its haven, formed by the conflux of the rivers Tamar and Plym with the sea. The streets are in general ill constructed, narrow, irregular, and dirty; but the town is defended by a citadel and several strong batteries; and its harbour and trade constitute the chief pride of the inhabitants. The harbour comprehends three divisions, termed the Catwater, Hamoaze, and the Sound: the former is a square, with an octagonal tower at each corner, and battlements at the top. The hall occupies the centre of the house, and rises to the second story: this room is fitted up in the Grecian style of architecture, and is handsomely decorated. The rest of the apartments are equally splendid, and contain a number of portraits, and a well-furnished library. The grounds occupy an area of about three miles in circumference, which includes the whole of the peninsula, formed by the Tamar on one side, and the open sea on the other, and connected by a very narrow isthmus to the main land. The deer-park is on the summit of the hill; and, besides the views described, the house commands extensive prospects southward, over Cawsand Bay and the Channel. The Edystone light-house is also visible in the horizon. At the principal western entrance of the park stands the parish church of Maker, the views from the tower of which are nearly unparalleled for their variety and picturesque grandeur. The southern side of the hill is an abrupt rocky cliff, covered with every sort of evergreen tree and shrub, among which myrtles thrive with great luxuriance, and grow to an extraordinary size. A terrace, midway up the hill, runs through the midst of these plantations; and a walk, in a zigzag direction down the rocks, conducts to numerous points of view, exhibiting an extraordinary variety of romantic scenery, which is equally beautiful in all seasons of the year. — 2 m. beyond Plymouth, Manudon, Sir W. large basin at the mouth of the river Plym; Hamoaze is a still more extensive expanse, at the estuary of the Tamar; and the latter, the capacious bay formed by the conflux of the sea with both the above rivers. Its trade is also considerable, but chiefly depends on the royal navy, though it is otherwise of some extent and importance. Here are two spacious churches; one of them is dedicated to St. Andrew, has a tower at the west end, ornamented with pinnacles, and contains several curious and ancient monuments: the other is consecrated to the memory of Charles I., and is called Charles' Church. This town also contains a number of dissenting meeting-houses; it has a large and handsome theatre, almost entirely constructed of cast-iron, a spacious guildhall, of modern erection: several institutions for the relief of the poor; besides an extensive hospital for sick and hurt seamen, and marines; and various societies or clubs of a literary nature. That most stupendous work, the Break-water, in the Sound, is also highly deserving the tourist's attention. Plymouth sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Monday, Thursday, and Saturday.

BODMIN, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. before, Kirland, George Barlowe, Esq.

DEVONPORT, heretofore called Plymouth Dock, one of the most important maritime places in the kingdom, received its present appellation on the 1st of January 1824, and is one of the largest towns in the county; it stands on the eastern bank of Hamoaze, and is altogether of modern date, being indebted for its origin, and rapid increase, to the establishment of the dock-yard, and naval arsenals. Devonport is situated on a pleasant eminence, between Stonehouse Creek and Hamoaze, and consists of regular, wide, and well-built streets, the footpaths of which are paved with marble obtained on the manor. The town and dock-yard are defended by fortifications, and are separated from each other by a wall of slate and lime-stone, in some places 30 feet high: the latter is entered from Fore-street, and is most particularly deserving attention, as the diversity of employments, ingenuity, and manual activity, exhibited in the various departments, present a very interesting spectacle to those who are not accustomed to appreciate the effects of human industry on a grand scale. The numerous ships laid up in ordinary in Hamoaze during peace, will also be viewed with peculiar pleasure, being then divested of all the "pomp and circumstance of war," and forming an assemblage of floating castles, immense in size, and majestic in character. The town has one church, two chapels, and several dissenting meeting-houses, besides an extensive poor-house, capable of containing 300 persons, within the precincts of which, a good infirmary, a council-room for the magistrates, and some other buildings, have been erected. The theatre is tolerably spacious, and the internal decorations merly to have had a cathedral, priory, and thirteen churches; only one of which, however, remains, and that is not entire; the spire having been destroyed by lightning; this is a large irregular built edifice, destitute of any architectural excellence. The summer assizes and Michaelmas quarter-sessions are held here. The new county goal and bridewell form a handsome building, and are well adapted for their different purposes. The principal trade of Bodmin is in wool, great quantities being washed and sorted here, and spun in the neighbouring parishes; it has also some manufactories of common serge, a good market on Saturday, and sends two members to parliament. On a down in this neighbourhood are some monumental stones, called the Hurlers, supposed to be the remains of a Druids' temple.

neat; the promenade, called Richmond Walk, at the southern side of the town, immediately above the sea-shore, commands a fine view of Mount Edgcumbe, &c.; and the elegant assembly-room, at the Fountain tavern, is generally well attended. The market-place is of recent erection, and, for extent and accommodation, is fully equal to any in the west of England; and the market, though not chartered, is held three times a-week.

The woods on this estate are embellished with very noble timber: the Spanish chesnuts, in particular, here attain an immense size, and, spreading their huge limbs, form, with the intermixture of rock and wood which overhang the river, the most romantic scenes imaginable. At the bottom of one of the grand sweeping hills, stands a small Gothic chapel, erected by Sir Rich. BLANDFORD is one of the most handsome towns in the west of England: it is situated in a fruitful neighbourhood, on a bend of the river Stour, (which flows on its south and west sides,) and contains an elegant church, 120 feet long, that is built in the Grecian style of architecture, and consists of a chancel, body, two aisles, and a tower. This edifice cost 3200l.; it is constructed of a greenish-coloured stone; but the windows, door-cases, and ornaments are of Portland stone; the tower, 80 feet high, is surmounted with a cupola; and the interior, which is extremely neat, contains several handsome monuments. The hall leads to an octagonal staircase, in the centre of the house, that is surrounded by a gallery, formed by eight scagliola columns and eight pilasters, which have, with other well chosen ornaments, a beautiful effect. The apartments are finished in an elegant style, and are generally admired for their proportions as well as decorations. Great improvements have been made in the walks and plantations; and a fine cliff that extends itself from the house to Blandford bridge, in a semi-circular direction, having its base washed by the river Stour, forms a noble object from this seat, together with the town of Blandford, advantageously seen. — 5 m. distant from Blandford is Milton Abbey, the elegant seat of Lady Caroline Damer, and the most prominent object in this part of the county. The mansion is a magnificent pile of building, standing on a knoll at the junction of three vallies, whose sides are beautifully adorned with hanging woods: it was built from designs by Sir William Chambers, on the site of a monastic edifice, and, together with its offices, forms four sides of a quadrangle, being cased externally with a fine white stone. The apartments are numerous, many of them furnished with peculiar elegance, and adorned with a collection of paintings by the ancient masters. On the south side of the house is a venerable old room, called the Monk's Hall: it was once the refectory, and has a fine oak roof, painted and gilt, with a richly carved screen of a corresponding character. Blandford has been benefited by very extensive charitable donations; its inhabitants derive their chief support from the resort of travellers, the expenditure, &c. of the surrounding gentry, the weekly market on Saturday, and the manufacture of shirt buttons. of this ancient religious institution are situated on the acclivity of a hill rising from the Southampton water, and tastefully covered with wood, most advantageously disposed to give effect to the scene; the far-famed beauties of which attract every visitor of Southampton to the spot. The best method of proceeding thither is by water; a boat may be hired at a moderate expense, and, if discharged on landing, the visitors may range at leisure through the grounds, and then return by a foot-path-way through Netley wood and the grounds attached to Woolston House, which command some fine views, to Hitchen ferry, and thence to Southampton, being altogether a pleasant walk of about three miles. Netley Abbey, formerly called Letley, or Pleasant Place, is supposed to have been founded by Henry III.; its inmates were of the Cistercian order, and at the dissolution the possessions were valued at only 100l. 1s. 8d. per annum. The principal parts of the ruins now standing consist of the fountain-courtyard, the refectory, the pantry and kitchen, a large vaulted room with a curious fire-place, opposite to which is a subterraneous passage supposed to lead to the fort; the chapter-house, and the abbey church, the beautiful eastern window of which is universally admired.

Several opinions have been entertained with respect to the origin of this entrenchment. It has been most generally ascribed to the Romans; but Camden supposes it a Saxon work; concurring testimony, however, renders it extremely probable, that Badbury Rings were originally of British origin.

PRESCOT TO BOROUGHBIDGE, BY WIGAN, CHORLEY, BLACKBURN, BURNLEY, SKIPTON, AND HARROGATE.

PRESCOT. Knowsley Park, Earl of Derby. The mansion stands on an elevation in the park, and has evidently been erected at different periods; its most ancient part is of stone, and has two round towers: this is said to have been raised by the first earl of Derby for the reception of his son-in-law King Henry VII., on whose head the crown taken from the tyrant Bosworth-field, was placed by this nobleman, who had been one of the main instruments of Richmond's victory. In consequence of this royal visit, not only were various grand preparations made in enlarging and decorating the mansion, but a road was purchased leading from Sankey and Winwick to the river, and the handsome stone bridge that now crosses the Mersey at Warrington was erected, and a causeway thrown up across the marshes to the rising ground on the Cheshire side, all which were kept in repair by him and his successors till the time of William, sixth Earl of Derby. James, tenth earl, retired to this seat some time previous to his demise, and made great additions to the house; though some say he rebuilt it. This interesting mansion is decorated with a large and very valuable collection of paintings by the old masters, besides which here are a number of portraits of the ancient and honourable family of the Stanleys, Earls of Derby, many of them not only curious as works of art, but rendered particularly interesting as serving to perpetuate the likenesses, costumes, &c. of individuals who eminently distinguished themselves for their bravery, magnanimity, loyalty, and sufferings. The surrounding park is extensive and beautiful, it enjoys many charming views, and is abundantly wooded, though many of the finest trees lean towards the north-east and are almost stript of their foliage and smaller branches.

CHORLEY is a neat town, situated near the river Chor, from which it takes its name; the Yarrow also flows at a short distance from the town, and gives motion to a number of mills that are erected on its banks, and which, together with the printing and bleaching grounds in the neighbourhood, and the large cotton manufactories, communicate an aspect PRESCOT occupies a lofty situation; it chiefly consists of one long straggling street, and contains a spacious church with a tall handsome steeple; the neighbourhood abounds with collieries, and supplies Liverpool and other adjacent places with coals at a very cheap rate. The market is held on Tuesday and Saturday. This place has long been celebrated for its manufacture of watch-tools and movements; besides which large quantities of coarse earthenware, sail cloth, and cottons, are made in the neighbourhood; but the plate-glass works at Ravenhead here require particular notice, as being by many considered the most extensive and complete in the country; these works were established and incorporated by act of parliament in 1773; but, though neither labour or expence was spared, yet the proprietors failed in about 20 years; a new company was, however, established and incorporated in the same year, who, by many improvements in the manufacture, are enabled to produce mirrors, both convex and concave, and cast plate glass, of sizes and qualities, at least equal, if not superior, to any that have been imported from the continent, of which various specimens may be seen at the company's warehouse near Blackfriars' Bridge, London.

BLACKBURN is divided into two unequal parts by a rivulet, whose ancient name, Blakebourne, has long been absorbed in that of the town, which, though extensive, is by no means regularly built; it contains two churches belonging to the establishment, and several other places of religious worship, besides a grammar-school founded by Queen Elizabeth, and different charitable institutions for the instruction and support of the lower classes. The population and trade of this place have been greatly increased since the formation of of extreme bustle and industry to the whole district. The church has lately been separated from the parish of Croston, and is now parochial; it is an ancient Saxon edifice, and its walls are ornamented with several coats of arms and old inscriptions, besides which the windows are decorated with various paintings. Chorley also contains several dissenting meeting-houses, a grammar-school, poor-house, 6 alms-houses, several Sunday-schools, and other charitable institutions. The market is held on Tuesday and Saturday, and is well supplied with all kinds of provisions.

The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in trade, and in spinning cotton, by means of which the manufacture of calico has attained a great degree of excellence: indeed, as a recent writer well observes, "to such a state of perfection are the arts of spinning cotton, and printing calicoes, now brought in this county, that a pound of cotton can be spun into 900 hanks, each 640 yards in length, and sold for 18 guineas; and a furniture pattern be printed, which, in the execution, requires 448 blocks to produce the required figure and colours." portico, supported by Doric pillars. This chaste and elegant villa commands two pleasing views of the Darwen, (whose banks are diversified with swelling knolls, well planted with thriving woods,) and is screened from the north by the sombrous hill of Billinge, the termination of that chain of hills which extends from Yorkshire into this part of Lancashire. The elevation of this hill, above the level of the sea, is 633 feet; and from its top may be distinctly seen, in clear weather, the mountains of Ingleborough and Pennigant, in Yorkshire, Blackcombe, in Cumberland, the hills near Frodsham, in Cheshire, and the whole coast of North Wales.

Near this is Woodfold Park, H. Sudell, Esq. The mansion, of recent erection, is a very magnificent edifice of bluish grey stone, having in the centre a flight of steps, with a portico, supported by four massy columns of the Corinthian order. The attached grounds have been improved, at a vast expense, by the proprietor, who has embellished them with considerable expanses of wood and water; and the park, which is surrounded by a wall of hewn stone, contains some romantick glens, and fine plantations of old and young trees. This house commands two views, which require particular notice: that from the principal front is bounded by a hilly outline, in which a rock of considerable height and breadth forms a striking feature. This rock rests upon a bed of aluminous earth, and has been exposed to view, by the labour of man, in search of that substance; the ground about it is wild and irregular, and forms a good contrast to the cultivated park which makes the fore-ground of the landscape. A little to the west of the rock, and a mile or two beyond it, stands, on more elevated ground, and on the very summit of the precipice, the old mansion of Hoghton Tower, which is fast falling to decay, but presents to view an object at once picturesque, grand, melancholy, and venerable. The west side of the house commands a soft and rich view of the vales of the rivers Ribble and Darwen, which mingle their streams below the village of Walton. The banks of both these rivers are well clothed with woods, and adorned with several handsome buildings, some of which the eye catches in pursuing the course of the Ribble.

KING'S CROSS. Pye-Nest, Henry Edwards, Esq.

HALIFAX, a spacious, populous, and flourishing town, is seated in a deep valley upon a branch of the river Calder, which flows about two miles south of it. This parish is nearly twenty miles in length, and from six to eight in breadth, and contains twenty-three townships and a number of villages, in which there are thirteen chapels of ease to the mother church. The town stretches along a gentle declivity for three quarters of a mile from east to west, its streets are narrow, but the houses are handsomely built of brick and stone, and the whole is well paved, lighted, and watched. The mother church, a venerable gothick structure, stands near the east end of the town, but this having been found too small, a large new church in the Grecian style was erected in 1798; besides these, there are meeting houses for different classes of dissenters, and numerous charitable institutions. From the favourable situation of the place, abundance of coal being found in the neighbourhood, and the many rivulets that water this parish and its vicinity, extensive mills and machinery have been erected for the manufacture of cotton, the trade in which is rapidly advancing. The woollen manufacture has long been established at Halifax, and in addition to the cloths wrought here, the inhabitants have introduced the weaving of shalloons, florentines, serges, moereens, tannies, callinamcoes, &c., of all which goods large quantities are manufactured, and find a ready sale, not only in home consumption, but as articles of exportation to the Turkey market, and South America. For the convenience of the manufacturers, an elegant edifice has been erected, called the Piece-hall; it is in the form of an oblong square, having 315 distinct rooms for the lodgment of goods, which are open for sales once a week. By means of the Calder navigation Halifax communicates with Hull and the east, and by the Rochdale canal, with Manchester, Chester, Liverpool and Lancaster in the west, and by means of other lines to which it afterwards becomes united, with the whole interior of the kingdom, the port of Bristol, and the metropolis. The town contains a neat theatre, and the market on Saturday is one of the best in the north of England.

WAKEFIELD is a large well-built town, pleasantly situated on the side of a hill, that slopes gently to the river Calder; it is one of the most handsome and opulent in the West Riding of Yorkshire, the streets being, in general, regular and spacious, and many of the houses large, lofty, and elegant. The parochial church is a capacious Gothick structure in the pointed style, having a spire that is generally said to be the most lofty in Yorkshire: a very elegant new church was erected some few years ago in an eligible part of the town, and is, as well as the domestic buildings by which it is surrounded, universally admired for beauty of site and excellence of plan. Wakefield likewise contains places of public worship belonging to the different classes of dissenters, a large and handsome house of correction, an excellent free grammar-school, a neat theatre, and numerous charitable institutions. The neighbourhood of the town is rich in natural beauty and fertility, and at its south entrance

there is a handsome stone bridge over the Calder, a little above which is a dam that forms an admirable cascade. This place has long been noted for its manufacture of woollen cloths, and stuffs, and of late years the increased prosperity of its trade has largely contributed to the improvement of the town, the whole of which is well paved, watched, and lighted. The numerous manufactories here and in the neighbouring villages, principally supply the markets at Leeds and Huddersfield; it has also a considerable traffic in corn and coals. Wakefield is from its locality, admirably situated for trade, the town forming, as it were, the centre of the manufacturing and mining district of Yorkshire; and to this may be added the advantage of canal navigation, whereby it is enabled to maintain communication with the rivers Humber, Trent, Mersey, Severn, and Thames. The market, at which there is a considerable trade in wool and grain, is held on Friday.

All that art could accomplish has been done here, and the embowering plantations, rising in thriving luxuriance round the mansion, now vie with the rich spread of scenery by which they are surrounded. The delightful and far-famed Thames confers a tranquil sweetness on the scene, presenting here the appearance of a lake, on the pellucid bosom of which the rich foliage from the Berkshire side of the river is reflected with considerable effect, thereby increasing the beauties of the charming scenery over which the eye ranges till it is lost in unlimited distance.

READING TO WINCHESTER, BY KINGSCLERE AND WHITCHURCH; OR BY BASINGSTOKE.

BASINGSTOKE is a large, ancient, and populous town, occupying a pleasant situation, in a well-wooded part of the county, and enjoying a good trade, principally in corn and malt, which is greatly facilitated by the canal to which the town gives name; by means of which, and the rivers Wey and Thames, a line of navigation is opened between Basingstoke and the metropolis. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and side-aisles, with a low square tower. The government of the town is vested in a mayor, recorder, seven aldermen, seven capital burgesses, and other officers. Situated on the line of road from London to Southampton, Winchester, and Poole, and also at the point of division, on the road to Salisbury, Exeter, Plymouth, and the Land's End, Bridgewater, Barnstaple, and the northern part of Devonshire; Basingstoke is consequently a very great thoroughfare, and participates not only in the advantages resulting from the expenditure of travellers, but also from large establishments of horses and men in the employ of the several coach proprietors, engaged in working the western mails and other stages, and whose several concerns in this town are conducted upon an extensive scale. On an eminence at the northern extremity of the town a beauti-

The mansion is an elegant structure, with two handsome wings, situated on an eminence that commands a very extensive and diversified view of Berkshire and the adjacent counties. The attached grounds include about 500 acres; they were laid out in their present beautiful form by Lord Cadogan, a former proprietor, assisted by the superior abilities of that excellent landscape gardener, Capability Brown: in the front of the house is a beautiful lawn, leading to the river, and in the park will be found every variety that can regale the taste, and gratify the sight. The ancient mansion occupied a situation somewhat nearer to the Thames than the present edifice, and in front of it were three avenues of trees; the centre one called the Queen's Walk, in remembrance of Anne of Denmark, Queen of James I, who was entertained here, when on her journey to Bath; and a second, termed the King's Walk, in honour of Charles I, who when a prisoner at Windsor, was allowed to visit this seat, where all his children, then in England, resided, in the custody of the Earl of Northumberland.

HIGH WORSALL Worsal Hall, Thomas Place, Esq.
YARM stands on a narrow neck of land, washed on three sides by the river Tees; its situation is extremely low, and it has thence suffered severely by inundations, two of which not only laid the town under water, but also destroyed a vast quantity of shop-goods, furniture, and other property, and during one of them many of the inhabitants were taken into boats from the tops of their houses; subsequent to these floods, the place has been incommoded by others, though in an inferior degree, and without any serious injury to the inhabitants; but it is to these alarming visitations that the decline of the trade and importance of the town must be ascribed, for it has not now any manufacture of consequence, and the principal part of its commerce consists in corn, hams, butter, bacon, and pork, sent by shipping to London. Yarm consists principally of one spacious and open main street; but its beauty is much injured by the shambles and tolbooth which stand in its centre, and have a ruinous and unseemly appearance. The church, a small, neat, modern structure, lies a little to the west of the town; its chief ornament is an elegant window of painted glass, in which the principal figure is a full length representation of Moses delivering the law from Mount Sinai. From the county of Durham the entrance into the town is by a bridge of five arches, built about the year 1400, but since repaired and widened for the purpose of abating, if possible, the frequent inundations. A cast-iron bridge was erected here a few years since, on the plan of that over the Wear, at Sunderland, but owing to the insufficiency of the abutments to resist the great lateral pressure of the arch, the whole architecture unfortunately fell about two years afterwards. WINDSOR is situated on the river Thames, and is connected with Eton by a neat bridge; it contains six principal streets, and several inferior ones; the houses in the former are chiefly built of brick, and the town is well paved and lighted. The guildhall is a stately building, supported by columns and arches of Portland stone; the room wherein the corporation meets for the transaction of business is adorned with portraits of several of the English sovereigns, and two niches are occupied by fine statues of Queen Anne, and her consort Prince George of Denmark. The church, an ancient and spacious fabric, contains some handsome monuments, and a good organ, which was removed from St. George's chapel, and presented by his late Majesty to this parish. The town also contains an elegant little theatre, some commodious barracks, and a good free-school; it returns two

WINDSOR. Windsor Castle. This magnificent pile is delightfully situated on the summit of a commanding hill, surrounded by the most luxuriant and beautifully diversified country imaginable, through which the silver Thames, alike celebrated for beauty and utility, winds its serpentine course, washing the foot of the hill on which stands this noble palace, deservedly the residence of a British monarch; this honourable distinction it has enjoyed with little interruption, since the reign of its founder, William the Conqueror, to the present time. The importance of this castle as a fortress is entirely superseded, except in appearance, the remaining appendances of which appear to be retained merely as objects of ornament. The most remarkable part of the building is the keep, or round tower, built on a lofty artificial mount, in the centre of the castle. The beauty and variety of the views from the summit of this building, extending over a boundless landscape, enriched with the most luxuriant and highly cultivated scenery, are almost indescribable. The state apartments are magnificent, and fitted up in a very superb style of elegance; the furniture is rich, many of the ceilings are beautifully painted, and a great number of pictures by the most eminent masters, adorn the different rooms, among which are the celebrated cartoons of Raphael. In the year 1824 a grant of

The chapel of St. George, after having undergone various alterations, received its present form from Edward IV., and its completion from Henry VII. This chapel contains the stalls of the knights of the garter, and the ceremony of installation is here performed with great state and solemnity. Adjoining the east end is a free-stone edifice, built by Henry VII. as a burial-place for himself and successors; but afterwards altering his purpose he began the more noble structure at Westminster; Cardinal Wolsey subsequently obtained a grant of it from Henry VIII., and began a stupendous monument for himself, whence this building received the name of Wolsey's Tomb House; but the cardinal soon after falling into disgrace, the monument was left unfinished. His late Majesty George III., in the year 1806, had this building completed in accordance with the original style, and a mausoleum erected within it, as a burial place for the royal family. The little park occupies the north and east sides, under the terrace, and its grounds are composed of a pleasing inequality, diversified by groups of stately trees and other woody scenery, extending to the village of Datchet, and declining towards the Thames.

(Salisbury continued.) arrangement of its buildings, many of which are of an eligible character; the principal streets are laid out at right angles, and through each is conveyed an unfauling stream of water. Salisbury consists of two marked and discriminating features; the Close and the City: the first is occupied by the cathedral, the bishop's palace, the houses of residential clergy, and many capacious private dwellings: the part arbitrarily denominated the City is almost three quarters of a mile square, and independent of a spacious and very noble market-place, which forms its finest feature, has five principal streets running from north to south, and the same number in a direction east and west. The erection of the cathedral was begun in 1220, and was nearly completed (with the exception of the spire) in 1253; it is remarkable as being the most elegant and systematic structure of the kind in England. The exterior possesses an air of sedate grandeur, and is uniformly arranged in every part except the west front, the upper part of the tower, and the whole of the spire. The west front is not only more highly finished than the other divisions of the building, but is likewise enriched with numerous statues, niches, and other embellishments, peculiar to the ancient English mode of design: the tower is also sumptuously decorated, and surmounted by a beautifully ornamented spire, the highest point of which is 400 feet from the ground. The interior presents an august and uniform display of the early English style of architecture, and the ornaments are made subservient to an intended sublimity of general effect. Many recent alterations have however been made, and some of them are productive of considerable beauty; among these are two windows at the east end, filled with coloured glass of great excellence: the stalls, bishop's throne, and organ-screen, are also of modern date; and the numerous sepulchral monuments are deserving of an attentive examination. On the south side of the church are spacious cloisters, that communicate, by means of a vestibule, with the chapter-house, a light and elegant fabric, of an octangular form, containing some curious specimens of ancient sculpture; and near the S. E. corner of the cathedral stands the bishop's palace, a large and irregular edifice, with extensive gardens. This city contains three good parochial churches, and an elegant council-house, erected at the sole expense of the Earl of Radnor, to whose munificence and public spirit Salisbury is indebted for several other valuable improvements; it is situated in the market-place, and has all the apartments on one floor, consisting of two courts, a council-room, a grand-jury-room, rooms for the different officers of the corporation, a waiting room, and a vestibule: here is also a free-grammar-school, where, in former times, Addison, of late years, Dr. Maton, (who has obtained no small degree of celebrity from his "Observations on the Western Counties,") and many other gentlemen distinguished for superior acquirements, received the rudiments of their education. Salisbury has also a neat theatre, a set of assembly-rooms, a noble infirmary, and several charitable institutions; it sends two members to parliament, has a weekly market on Tuesday and Saturday, and possesses extensive manufactories of flannels and fancy woollens. This place is also celebrated for its cutlery and steel goods, which are probably superior in workmanship to any in the kingdom. The races, which are held on the plain, about three miles from the city, are generally run in the month of August; they last three days, are well attended, and the amusements usually conclude, on each evening, with a concert or ball at the assembly-rooms.

			STITT. Stiper Stones. This eminence is the most elevated peak of an assemblage of lofty hills, stretching for a considerable distance between this road and the vale of Montgomery ; its summit is extremely craggy, of the camp is circular, and of great extent, defended by three trenches, with high mounds or ramparts, which, in some places, have been planted with firs, by order of the proprietor, the Earl of Powis. These, as they grow up, tend to interrupt the continuity of the trenches, and to destroy the character of the place, a circumstance which every antiquary who visits it will doubtless regret. From this eminence a grand and varied scene presents itself: on one hand is seen Clun, with its ruined castle, situated in a dreary wild, bounded by bleak heights; on the other, the town of Bishop's Castle, with the interjacent valley, displaying several gradations of culture and fertility. In other parts the prospect is enlivened by occasional glimpses of rich pastoral landscape, rendered more delightful by contrast with the bold and naked hills that overlook them. Among other encampments in this neighbourhood, there is one between Purslow and Basford Gate; it takes in the whole compass of a hill, called Borough Hill, in form somewhat resembling a heart, and is fortified with a single foss in some parts, and in others with a double or treble area, according as the ground is more or less accessible; and where there is the advantage of a precipice, there is neither ditch nor rampart: the foss is grown over with trees. About three miles south of the Bury Ditches is the Caer Caradoc, designated by Camden as the scene of the contest between Caractacus and Ostorius.

TITLEY. Titley Court, W. Greenly, Esq.

KINGTON is a small market town situated on the river Arrow, and the Kington canal, which communicates with the Severn, under Bradnor Mountain, on the western borders of Herefordshire, where is carried on some clothing trade. It is built upon the site of a castle constructed for the defence of the marshes, but now extinct. The church is a very irregular structure, with a detached tower, and a spire resembling three hollow cones one placed over the other. At the entrance of the town is a free-grammar-school, erected and endowed by a Lady Watkins. Market on Wednesday.

and overspread with enormous loose blocks of quartz, that at a distance appear like the ruins of a fortress of considerable magnitude. In height it is rather superior to the Wrekin, and forms the abrupt termination of a line of mountains that hence extend south-west into Radnorshire. In the time of Edward the Confessor, Griffydd, a reigning Prince of the Welch, rendered himself so formidable by his predatory incursions, that his name had become a terror to the English. Harold undertook an expedition against him by land and sea; his light-armed troops and cavalry pursued the hardy Britons into their fastnesses, and harassed them so effectually, that they sent to the victorious chief the head of their prince as a token of subjection. In memoirs of his achievements, great trophies of his conquests, great piles of stones were erected on many of the mountains of Wales and Shropshire; and there is a doubtful tradition, that the rude heaps of rock, called by the Britons Carneddau tewion, on the ridge of the Stiper Stones, were thrown together as monuments of his triumph.

NEW RADNOR was formerly surrounded by a wall, having four gates of entrance, many traces of which are now to be met with; and the foundations of several of the streets are also visible among the gardens in its immediate vicinity. The town itself has at present nothing to recommend it, the houses being poor, miserable, and covered with thatch, and none of them possessing any thing respectable in their appearance: it had a weekly market on Tuesday; but about a century ago, this was discontinued, owing to the thinness of its attendance, and all the attempts since made to restore it, have been ineffectual: here was formerly a castle of great strength, the destruction of which is ascribed to Owen Glendwr; at the same period the town is also said to have sustained irreparable injury. The church, parts of which appear to have been constructed on the foundations of an earlier edifice, is a respectable building, standing on the side of the hill that rises above the town on the north; it consists of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, extending altogether 114 feet in length, by 33 feet in breadth, and having a large square tower at the west end. New Radnor, together with the contributory boroughs of Knighton, Rhayadergwy, Cefn, Llys, and Cwclas, sends one member to parliament.

The man- sion, a venerable structure, situ- ated on the acclivity of an emi- nence, notwithstanding the considerable alterations it has lately undergone, still exhibits that style of architecture that prevailed in the reign of Eliza- beth : it consists of a brick cath, containing a number of large windows, to each end of which is attached an arched stone projection, having four windows, separated into pairs by a flat square column : over the entrance there is a very hand- some tower, also projecting from the building, and surmounted by an elegant balustrade ; ano- ther, similar to which, passes along the whole length of the front, several feet beneath this elevation ; a small erection rises from a base within this balus- trade, somewhat resembling an observatory, and very likely was used as such by its ancient pro- prietors. The surrounding pleasure-grounds are exten- sive, and abundantly wooded ; here are a number of majestic oaks, of immense size, and a variety of noble walks, many of which terminate on the skirts of the wood, while others enter it for a considerable distance, and receive from its umbrageous shade a degree of solitude well suited to the contemplative mind.

STAFFORD TO SHREWSBURY, BY NEWPORT AND WELLINGTON; OR BY PENKRIDGE AND IVETSEY BANK.

STAFFORD, 2 m. beyond, Creswell Hall, Rev. T. Whitby.

STAFFORD, the county-town, is situated on the north bank of the river Sow, at the distance of three miles from its junction with the Trent. The first mention of this town, which can be relied on, is in the year 913, when, it appears from the Saxon chronicles, Ethelfleda, Countess of Mercia, sister of Edward the Elder, erected a castle here, but no traces of the building now remain. A second castle is recorded to have been built here by William the Conqueror, which seems to have been shortly afterwards destroyed; another, however, speedily rose on its site, which flourished till the contentions between the house of Stuart and the Parliament, in which struggle it was demolished. The remains occupy the summit of a singular hill, remarkable for its smoothness, and regularity of ascent on all sides: the chief portion of the castle now standing is the keep, which contains three separate apartments, with fire-places in each, and also steps leading up to loop-holes. Stafford, though placed in a low situation, is extremely pleasant; the streets are well paved, and the houses, for the most part, built of stone, in a regular and compact manner, and interspersed with a variety of public buildings worthy of notice: the county-hall, situated near the centre of the town, is a very spacious and neat modern edifice, containing a number of elegant apartments, appropriated to different purposes: behind this structure is a convenient market-place. The county infirmary, the county gaol, and the free-school, are all respectable buildings, and appear well adapted to answer the various purposes for which they have been erected. St. Mary's church is a large building in the form of a cross, and consists of a nave, two side-aisles, a transept, a chancel of three aisles, and an octagonal tower: the interior of this edifice is decorated with ornaments, comprising a singular mixture of architecture, interspersed with a number of ancient and modern monuments. The other church of Stafford is a very old structure; it is dedicated to St. Chad, and its architecture is an imitation of the most ancient Saxon plan, which assigned one half of the whole dimensions to the nave, one quarter to the tower, and the remainder to the chancel. The chief trade carried on here consists in the manufacture of boots, shoes, and cutlery, and a considerable tanning business. The borough of Stafford is governed by a mayor, recorder, ten aldermen, twenty common-councilmen, a town clerk, and two serjeants-at-mace: it returns two members to parliament, and has done so since the twenty-third year of the reign

This elegant mansion was considerably enlarged, and received the addition of a handsome portico, a few years since: the grounds are embellished with a number of statues and ornamental buildings, and the neighbouring scenery, over the enchanting vale of Shugborough, varied by all the beauties that nature and art united are capable of forming, and watered by the rivers Trent and Sow, conspire to render this spot a complete terrestrial paradise: here are seen the various specimens of Athenian, Grecian, Chinese, and Gothic architecture dispersed amidst lands in the highest possible state of cultivation, and animated with numerous herds of cattle. This mansion is the more interesting, as having been the birth-place of that very distinguished naval commander and circumnavigator, Lord Anson, who closed a long series of eminent services to the country, by safely conveying the late Queen Charlotte to England, after a very rough and tedious passage, on Sept. 7, 1761. — 1½ m. beyond Stafford, Tillington House, W. These interesting ruins stand on a rising ground, backed by an extensive forest: the front commands a very rich and expansive view over the great plain of Shrewsbury, including the town and castle, and the fine demesne of Sundorn House. The abbey was founded in the year 1100, being the last of King William Rufus, by William Fitz Allen; it is now totally deserted, except by the crows and martlets that fit around its mouldering battlements, but much care is taken to preserve it by the present owner. Of the abbey-church, the nave only remains, but the chapter-house is entire, having a roof of fine oak: the entrance is by a richly decorated round arch, with a window on each side, divided into two round arched compartments, by slender short pillars. South of the chapter-house are remains of the refectory, and beyond, a large building, consisting of a spacious hall, on the north side of which is a curious antique fire-place: this apartment communicates with another, about the same size, which appears to have been formerly divided into two, above which has evidently been an upper story. This range of buildings is conceived to have been the abbot's lodging. SPREAD EAGLE, 2 m. distant, at Stretton, Stretton Hall, Lady Ross.

SHREWSBURY is a populous and very healthy town, chiefly situated on two gentle eminences, and surrounded on three sides by the river Severn, whose banks are ornamented with several elegant mansions: it was formerly surrounded by a wall, defended by several towers, and had three principal gates of entrance, but the latter have altogether disappeared, and not many vestiges of the former are now in existence: the north side of the town was also protected by a castle of considerable strength, which was stripped of much of its warlike appearance about the time of James II.; this has of late years become private property, and now forms one of the most magnificent mansions in the country; the area of its large court has been converted into a beautiful garden; and a small watch-tower, situated on a wall near one corner, has been rebuilt, in a very tasteful manner, as a prospect-room, enjoying a complete panoramic view of the town and adjacent country. Shrewsbury has several times, for short periods, been the residence of royalty; and parliaments have also been held within its walls. It is rendered famous in history for the two severe sieges it has sustained; besides which the neighbourhood has at different times been the theatre of much war and bloodshed. The town itself contains many public buildings of considerable elegance

(Shrewsbury continued.) and utility, among the foremost of which rank the different churches, and other edifices appropriated to religious worship, the town-hall, the Salop infirmary, the house of industry, the free-grammar-school, the county-gaol, the market-house, &c.: the two handsome bridges which here cross the Severn, and the beautiful public promenade to the west of the town, called the Quarry, likewise deserve notice; the latter occupies about twenty acres; it enjoys all the beauties of the river on the one side, and commands a fine view of the town on the other, besides which, various highly picturesque prospects over the surrounding country may be obtained from different parts of this charmingly secluded spot. The theatre is said to have been formerly part of a palace belonging to the princes of Powisland: it is a red stone building that exhibits exteriorly several features of high antiquity, but being fitted up as a modern theatre, does not contain many of the original appurtenances. Shrewsbury is a corporation by prescription, and has received several grants of charters and immunities; it sends two members to parliament, and has a market on Wednesday and Saturday, for corn, cattle, and provisions, besides one on Thursday, for Welsh cottons, flannels, baize, &c. The heavy expense attending the carriage of coal for the supply of the town, induced the inhabitants to have recourse to canal navigation, and the obstacles which were before thought insurmountable, have been conquered by the ingenious invention of inclining planes, and iron railways. The entrance of the town from London is ornamented with a beautiful column of free-stone, surmounted with a statue of Lord Hill, erected to commemorate the gallant achievements of his lordship during the late war, and which cost 6000*l.*

STOCKTON TO CARLISLE, BY DARLINGTON, BARNARD CASTLE, AND BROUGH.

PENRITH stands in a pleasant vale, at the foot of an eminence, within the district called Inglewood Forest, which extends as far as Carlisle: it was disafforested by Henry VIII.; and is now nothing more than a wide dreary moor, bounded by lofty hills, and interspersed with a few stone cottages and farm-houses. The town is formed with little attention to regularity of arrangement, but contains many convenient and well-built houses, whose inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of fancy waistcoats and checks. The church, a plain but very commodious structure, was chiefly rebuilt with red stone early in the eighteenth century; its internal ornaments are extremely appropriate. That curious monument of antiquity called the Giant's Grave, concerning the origin of which so much has been said by different antiquaries, stands in the churchyard; it consists of two stone pillars, eleven feet six inches high, and about five feet in circumference at the bottom, situated at the opposite ends of the grave, about 15 feet asunder. This town contains a number of charitable institutions; it has a market on Tuesday and Saturday, the stations for the sale of the various commodities at which are singularly disposed in different parts of the town. On an inconsiderable elevation to the west of Penrith are the ruins of a castle that appears to have been of a parallelogramic form, fortified with a very deep foss, and walled rampart: no records are in existence, by which the time of its original erection can be ascertained, but it is supposed that no part of it is older than the time of Edward IV. Richard III., who resided here when Duke of Gloucester, repaired and strengthened this fortress for the purpose of aving the Lancastrian party; he also at the same time constructed several additional towers: it was entirely dismantled in the time of the commonwealth, and the present remains are rather inconsiderable; they are, however, well worthy the attention of the curious traveller. Towards the north of Penrith there is a square stone building, called the beacon, which is with difficulty attained, on account of its situation on an eminence, but the fatigue is more than compensated by the extensive and beautiful prospects enjoyed therefrom: hence a great variety of very delightful views are presented to the eye; Cumberland is spread before the sight like an immense map; on which may be pointed out, with ease, the situation of the most considerable places: the majestic Cross-fell is seen towards the east, and the extensive range of mountains that terminate near Brampton, stretch themselves on the north; while the city of Carlisle is distinguished in the vale by faint traces of its cathedral; and a dark shade, far beyond it, points out the situation of the hills of Scotland. To the south lies Brougham Castle, and the fine spreading woods of Lowther, with the wide tract of intermediate country, bounded by the mountains from Ingleborough in Yorkshire to Stainmore in Westmorland: the mighty steeps of Helvellyn are on the south-west, and the pellucid Ulswater extends itself at its feet like an azure mirror. Gray-stock castle lies towards the west, with the huge mountain Saddle-back spreading its long shattered ridge towards Keswick, and the very majestic Skiddaw, lifting its head with supreme dignity above the neighbouring Alps.

TAUNTON TO HONITON, CONTINUED TO EXMOUTH.

TAUNTON, a town of high antiquity, and one of the principal in the county, is well built, and consists of wide and airy streets that extend over a considerable portion of ground; most of the houses have small gardens in front, which add greatly to their beauty, as well as to the health and convenience of the inhabitants: the surrounding country is particularly delightful; and the temperature of its climate, and the fertility of its soil, form the continual boast of the natives. Here are two churches, dedicated to St. James, and St. Mary; the former, a strong plain building, with a tower, seems to have been erected in the 13th century, but is far inferior in point of beauty to the latter, which stands near the centre of the town, and is a very elegant and splendid edifice, in the florid Gothic style of architecture; it is extremely spacious, and has a lofty tower at one end, of truly magnificent workmanship, from the balustrade of which a most extensive and delightful view of the adjacent country may be enjoyed. The interior of this church also deserves notice on account of its very curious roof, and beautifully carved desk and pulpit; it is likewise richly decorated, and contains a screen of elegant fretwork, and one of the finest organs in the county. Taunton contains several dissenting meeting-houses and charitable institutions; it has recently undergone many important alterations and improvements, and has a very handsome and commodious market-house, with several apartments in it for different purposes; in the lower part, besides the town-hall, there is a coffee-room, and on the first floor an elegant and spacious assembly-room, above which is a billiard-room; and on each side of the house is a large wing, or arcade, for the use of the farmers and tradesmen, besides an extensive area in front, where temporary butchers' shambles are erected in rows, in the middle of which, towards the north, is a noble pavement of broad stones, called the parade. Ina, King of the West Saxons, erected a castle in this town in the year 700, which, being afterwards destroyed, was again rebuilt about the time of the Conquest; its existing remains are considerable, and appropriated to various uses; and the west wing, still tolerably entire, is thought to have belonged to the original building of King Ina. Taunton sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Wednesday and Saturday: it was the scene of many iniquitous executions in the time of James II., under the direction of those execrable monsters, Kirk and Jeffereys.

TAUNTON TO SIDMOUTH, BY HONITON.

DIVISION OF THE ROAD, 3 m. distant, Netherthon House, Sir John William Prideaux, Bart.
 SIDMOUTH is a fashionable watering-place, situated at the mouth of the river Sid, between two considerable hills, possessing very romantic characteristics, and nearly enclosing it on all sides but the south, which lies open to a beautiful bay of the English channel. The situation of this place lying open only to the genial breezes of the western ocean, renders the climate extremely mild and salubrious, and all seasons of the year, and being free from fogs, is consequently a very desirable place of residence to those, whose constitutions are unable to endure the shocks of sudden changes, incidental to our ever varying climate. It is much frequented by company in the

This extraordinary tract of scenery is described by that elegant tourist, Dr. Maton, in the following animated terms:—"Still proceeding along chasm-like hollows, we at length began to ascend, and came to some elevated ground, whence we perceived rocky precipices at a distance, towards the sea, thickly clothed with wood. We had no idea that our road would soon turn suddenly to the left, and conduct us through this beautiful covert. From the summit to the bottom, the mountains were overspread with oak, the branches below almost bathing in the briny current of the Severn; their brows were at too great a distance above us to be seen through the foliage. In looking downwards to the shore, our apparent height above the main was increased by the occasional projection of rocks, so that imagination had its full scope in the contemplation of this uncommon scenery. Every step was quite on romantic ground. New features, new embellishments, new combinations, continually rose to view. Our rapture rendered us insensible to fatigue; though we had long been obliged to follow, on foot, a devious, indistinct tract, that now sunk with terrific steepness, now ascended with almost insurmountable perpendicularity. At length wood and foliage vanished entirely; and a scene surprisingly grotesque and wild unfolded itself; a valley bounded by large naked rocks, or rather fragments of rocks, piled one upon another. The heights on each side are of a mountainous magnitude, but composed, to all appearance, of loose, unequal masses, which form here and there rude natural columns, and are fantastically arranged along the summits, so as to resemble extensive ruins	From Ilfracombe		From Taunton

An old man, mounted on a mule, who passed, and observed our silent wonder, announced to us that we were in the Valley of Stones. Advancing into this extraordinary valley, we had a grand view of the Severn, through an abrupt opening in the rocks. Taking a retrospect, we caught one of the hills we had passed, retiring behind the mountains to the south, but still showing its conical, wood-enriched summit with the most happy effect. A sort of natural pillar presently attracted our notice, mantled venerably with ivy and moss, and thrusting itself forward from the steep with a bold perpendicularity. Surely, we exclaimed, this must be the work of human hands, which have thus piled these huge rocks on each other for some purpose of superstition: the solemnity of the situation, perhaps, appeared to the Druids well suited to the objects of their sacred ceremonies. On close inspection, however, we were compelled to ascribe the architecture to nature alone; for none but herself could have placed the masses so as to preserve the direction of the grain throughout in such a perfect parallelism, or joined them with such nicety. As she is often fantastic in her workmanship, there is no reason why, at the time of some great convulsion, she should have not erected regular columns, and groups of rocks, in the Valley of Stones narrower. The first idea that offers itself, in speculating on the origin of this extraordinary pass, is, that it must have been the course of a vast and violent torrent, which, from the broad openings towards the sea, and the more craggy torn surface of the mountains, would seem to have poured itself into the Severn at the western extremity.

TIVERTON TO LAUNCESTON, BY CREDITON AND OAKHAMPTON.

CREDITON, before, Fulford Park, R. H. Tuckfield, Esq. OAKHAMPTON, or Okehampton, is a town of considerable antiquity, situated in a valley on the river Oke, from whence is derived its name; it is a borough, returning two members to parliament, and has a market on Saturday. Here are the ruins of a castle, erected by Baldwin de Brionis, to whom this place was granted by William the Conqueror, for his services. This castle, after passing through the hands of various occupiers, was dismantled by Henry VIII., on the attainder of Henry de Courtenay. The ruins remain a lasting monument of reproach, evincing the senseless barbarism of the tyrant, and presenting, in their ivy-clad remains, an interesting specimen of fallen greatness. They are situated about 1 m. south-west of the town, on a high mass of rock, at the foot of which flows the western branch of the river; and the surrounding scenery, consisting of richly wooded acclivities and verdant

The church also stands on an eminence, a short distance from the town, and forms a pleasing feature in the landscape. Within the town there is no building deserving particular notice. The inhabitants derive their chief support from the manufacture of serges, and the expenditure of travellers. Oakhampton, though a borough previous to the conquest, was not incorporated till the reign of James I. It is governed by eight principal burghesses, from whom a mayor is annually chosen, and returns two members to parliament elected by the freeholders and freemen, the number of which is about 182.

tal. There can be little doubt that Pevensey owed its ancient prosperity to its favourable situation for commerce, as a port; and its subsequent decline, to the gradual receding of the sea, from which it now stands at a considerable distance. That it was a place of high antiquity is undeniable. Pevensey is reckoned among the sea-ports ravaged by Godwin, Earl of Kent, in the time of Edward the Confessor: it is also celebrated in history as the place where William the Conqueror landed with his invading army. From Maddox's History of the Exchequer, it appears that in the 6th of John, Pevensey, among other trading towns, paid a quinzieme or tax for its merchandise; and that, three years afterwards, the Barons of Pevensey were fined forty marks for licence to build a town upon a spot between the Pevensey and Langley, which should enjoy the same privileges as the cinque ports, and have a yearly fair to last seventeendays, commencing on the anniversary of St. John the Baptist; also a market every Sunday. Whether the inhabitants ever carried into effect any part of this grant we are not informed. The only relic of the ancient consequence of Pevensey is the castle, on the east side of the town: the name of the builder, and the date of its erection, are alike unknown; but from the quantity of Roman bricks employed in the work, there is every reason to believe that it was constructed out of some Roman fortress: the external walls, which, with the towers, are pretty entire to the height of 20 or 25 feet, are circular, and enclose an area of seven acres. The principal entrance is on the west or land side, between two round towers, in which are considerable layers of Roman brick, some single, others double, about 20 feet from the ground, and four or five asunder. William the Conqueror, having, by the sword, established his claim to the English throne, gave the town and castle of Pevensey to his half brother, Robert, Earl of Mortaigne, in Normandy, and created him Earl of Cornwall. These honours he enjoyed during the life of that king; but having taken part under his successor in an insurrection excited by his brother Odo, Earl of Kent, in favour of Robert Courthose, an army was sent against this castle to reduce him, on which he thought proper to surrender and make his peace. He was succeeded in his possessions by William, Earl of Mortaigne and Cornwall, who, on being refused the earldom of Kent by Henry I., joined in a rebellion with Robert de Belesme, Earl of Shrewsbury. The king, in consequence, seized all his estates, demolished most of his castles, and exiled him from the realm. He gave to Gilbert D' Aquila the town and castle of Pevensey with all their

and the number of fine drawings of every part, in the collection of the late Sir William Burrell, are sufficient, as Pennant remarks, to draw tears from every person of taste who considers the sad change in this noble pile. In form it is very nearly square, the north and south fronts being 206 feet, and the east and west 214 feet long. The whole was surrounded by a deep moat, which has long been dry. The castle consisted of three courts, a larger and two smaller. The great gate-house, in the south front, between two towers 84 feet high, leads into the most spacious of the courts, which is cloistered round. On the north side was the hall, which must have been extremely beautiful; it is described as having nearly resembled those of the colleges of our universities, which have not been modernised; the fireplace being in the middle, and the butteries at the lower end. At the upper, or east end of this hall, were three handsome rooms, one within another, constituting the best apartments in the castle. Beyond them lay the chapel, some parlours for common use, and rooms for the upper servants, forming the east front. On the west side of the hall was the grand staircase, which occupied an area forty feet square. The spacious kitchen beyond it, as well as the hall and chapel, reached in height to the upper story. The offices were ample, and the oven in the bake-house was fourteen feet in diameter. The left side of the south front, beyond the great gate-house, consisted of a long waste-room like a gallery, apparently intended for a stable in case of a siege. Under the eastern corner-tower in the same front was an octagonal room, formerly the prison, having in the middle a stone post with a strong iron chain. Above the best apartments was a suite of rooms in the same style; and in every window of the different galleries leading to the chambers on this floor was painted on glass the Alnat, or wolf-dog, the ancient supporter of the arms of the family of Fiennes. Many private winding staircases, curiously constructed in brick, without any woodwork, communicated with these galleries. The walls are of great thickness; the whole having been entirely of brick, except in the window and door-cases, water tables, and copings, which were of stone. Such is the substance of Grose's description of this venerable edifice, which, till 1777, was the most perfect and regular castellated mansion in the kingdom. The timber being then, upon inspection, deemed so much decayed as to render the repair very expensive, the roof was taken down by the proprietor, the Rev. Mr. Hare, and the interior so completely stripped, that nothing but the bare walls was left stand-dependencies, which, in allusion to the name of the owner, were styled the Honour of the Eagle. In his descendants this honour remained vested for some time; but, being again forfeited to the crown, Henry III. granted it to his son Prince Edward, and his heirs, Kings of England, so that it should never more be separated from the crown. Notwithstanding this proviso, the castle and domain of Pevensey were settled on John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, fourth son of Edward III., upon his surrender of the earldom of Richmond, and they have probably from this period constituted part of the possessions of the duchy of Lancaster. For many years this castle was held by the Pelhams, under a lease from the duchy of Lancaster, till, about the middle of the last century, the Duke of Newcastle resigned it to Spencer Compton, Earl of Wilmington, on his being created baron of Pevensey; and, on the death of the late Earl of Northampton, it devolved to his daughter, Lady Elizabeth Comp-

ing. The materials thus obtained were employed in the erection of some additional rooms in the mansion-house, a neat white edifice, on the west side of the park. This is agreeably diversified; it is still finely wooded with old trees, particularly beech, which are esteemed some of the largest in the kingdom, and well watered with clear streams. Most parts of it command a pleasing view over the adjacent rich level of Pevensey; the sea appears to the south; the hills towards Hastings on the east; while the majestic South Downs rise at some distance to the west. The church, situated near the park, contains some curious monuments of the family of Fiennes.

The remains of the ancient fortress are chiefly confined to an entrance gateway, flanked by round towers, and tolerably perfect; and the artificial mound formerly occupied by the keep. The ruins, at one time surrounded by three moats, have a picturesque appearance, though much of this venerable remain was dilapidated by a late proprietor in order to build a residence attached to the entrance, which has been rendered somewhat conformable to the general character. WARWICK is situated nearly in the centre of the county to which it gives name, and is watered by the river Avon, over which there is a good stone bridge of one arch, erected at the expense of the Earl of Warwick. This town is believed to be of Saxon origin, was formerly surrounded with walls, and contained a fortress of considerable strength, besides several religious houses; but for its present appearance, and the majority of its domestick ornaments, it is in some measure indebted to a dreadful fire, that consumed the greater part of the place in the year 1694. It stands on a rocky hill, having a somewhat abrupt, though not considerable acclivity, and the principal streets, which are well lighted and paved, while they are as level as is necessary for the purposes of traffic, have still a sufficient declination to promote the great object of local cleanliness; the houses are also in general handsome, well-built, and regularly disposed. Here are, besides meeting-houses belonging to different sects of dissenters, two churches, St. Mary's and St. Nicholas, the former has a square tower at its west end, rising to the height of 130 feet, and having between the piers by which it is supported, a passage that allows the transit of carriages; this structure likewise claims the attention of the tourist, as well for the beauty and variety of its ornaments, as for the number of ancient and elegant monuments it contains, commemorating individuals of considerable celebrity. Beauchamp chapel is also a very interesting building, beautifully decorated, and containing, among other sepulchral memorials, a monument to the memory of its founder, that is generally allowed to be surpassed by none in this country, unless it be that of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey. The court-house, county-hall, gaol, bridge-well, and market-house, are all substantial well-designed struc-

The canal, which has a commodious wharf at its head, contributes greatly towards the commercial facilities of the place. Several manufactures are here carried on to some extent, and cultivated with much spirit, particularly those of combing and spinning long wool, with other branches relating to the preparation of worsted for the hosiery trade; the weaving of calicoes, &c., from yarn spun at Manchester, also affords employment to a number of individuals, and there is likewise a mill on the river Avon, at the distance of a mile and a half from the town, for spinning cotton yarns. For the amusement of the inhabitants a small but neat theatre was erected here about the beginning of the present century, and annual races are also held on a convenient plot of ground, lying to the west of the town.

Rosebury Topping has been visited, and the magnificent view from its summit depicted, by several travellers, by one of whom it is thus described:—"Before us lay extended the beautiful vale of Cleveland, with the county of Durham, woods, meadows, and corn fields, interspersed with views of rural villages, farms, and gentlemen's seats, some of which, by their whiteness, gave an animating gaiety to the scene. The river Tees is seen winding through the valley, with stately vessels gliding on its bosom, which give additional beauty and variety to the prospect. To the south the prospect is bounded by a chain of hills, rising behind each other in towering height, which seemed to vie in lofty majesty with that on which we stood; the whole composing such a scene of beauty and sublime grandeur, as can seldom be found united in one view." The extent of prospect from this Yorkshire mountain is, indeed, far inferior to that which is seen from the top of Bardon Hill, in the county of Leicester; but, in beauty, or at least in grandeur, it must be esteemed superior, as it is more diversified, and presents contrasts more striking. Rosebury Topping is certainly one of the most remarkable features of nature, of which this island can boast; and an excursion to its summit will amply reward the labour of the tourist.

TARPORLEY is a tolerably clean and well built town, situated about a mile from the Nantwich and Chester canal; it possesses a handsome church; and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of stockings and breeches. Here the principal gentlemen of the county assemble at an annual hunt; the neighbouring heaths affording very favourable ground for the amusement. It has a small market on Thursday.

The various rooms are decorated with an excellent collection of family and other paintings. The park contains about 350 acres; it is surrounded by a wall, and is well stocked with deer; it adjoins Delamere forest, and, like that, possesses a fine undulating surface, that gradually subsides into the flat part of Cheshire on the south. The grounds have been laid out with considerable taste, and in a shady recess, near a grotto on the south side, there is a Roman altar, and two large fragments of the very ancient cross of Sandbach, but it is to be lamented, that so fine a specimen of Cheshire antiquity as these fragments should have been allowed to remain so long in a state of mutilation.

WELCH POOL, it is not improbable, derived its name from a piece of water formerly situated on a waste, but now enclosed by the boundary of Powis Park; this is of a black colour, and about 300 feet deep, though the ignorant believe it to be bottomless, and place implicit confidence in an old gossip's story, that it will some time overflow and deluge the town. The houses are remarkably neat, and some of them are rather handsome erections; they are situated at the bottom, and on the ascent of a gentle eminence, and the uniformity, and prevailing cleanliness of the place, gives it a very inviting appearance. The church is a handsome structure, but stands so extremely low, that the cemetery almost equals the height of the building. The count-hall has so an elegant appearance; it is a modern erection, with a colonnade, and pilasters of stone, built at the expense of a few gentlemen, who were anxious to ease the county rate. Great quantities of flannel are manufactured here, and a very large supply is also brought down from the hilly countries for the purpose of sale, in the market held on every alternate Monday, for the disposal of that commodity; besides which there is one for provisions on Monday, weekly.

The chapel of ease is a neat building, near which is an equestrian statue of William III., standing on a lofty pedestal, and inscribed to his memory by the late W. Jolliffe, Esq. Petersfield is governed by a mayor and common council; it sends two members to parliament. The right of election, as determined by a committee of the House of Commons in the year 1727, "is in the freeholders of lands or ancient dwelling-houses or shambles, or dwelling-houses or shambles built upon ancient foundations within the said borough;" the number of voters is about 150, but Petersfield has long been considered one of the most rotten boroughs in England: it is in the patronage of Sir	Borden Hill	15

The principal streets, one of them nearly a mile long, though narrow, contain many good houses, and are tolerably well paved; the marketplace is clean and well built, and in the middle of it stands an ancient shire-hall, in which are held the quarter-sessions for the liberty of St. Etheldred. The church, containing several ancient sepulchral memorials, is thought to have been erected in the time of Edward III., and its large and beautifully ornamented quadrangular tower, 180 feet high, forms a conspicuous object at sea. Woodbridge also contains meeting-houses belonging to the quakers and independents: it has a free-

HIGH WYCOMBE, a very flourishing town, and considered the handsomest in the county, is pleasantly situated in a valley, and consists of several streets, containing many handsome houses; its church is a fine stone edifice, with a lofty tower at the west end, which is highly ornamented; the interior is extremely neat, and contains a superb monument of Henry Peiry, Earl of Shelburne, and another of Sophia, first wife of the Marquis of Lansdown. Over the communion table there is a fine painting of St. Paul converting the Druids to Christianity, also deserving of attention. Here is a handsome town-hall, supported by 34 stone pillars, and a good free-granite school. This town sends two members to parliament, and has a market on Friday which is well supplied, particularly with corn.

DARLINGTON. Blackwell Grange Hall, George Allan, Esq.; Poleham Hill, R. Botcherby, Esq.; Beechwood Villa, J. Botcherby, Esq.; and South End, J. Backhouse, Jun. Esq.

DARLINGTON stands on the side of a hill, gently inclining towards the east, the base of which is washed by the river Skern, here crossed by a bridge of 3 arches; it is a large and populous town, of remote origin, and contains a spacious church, situated at the south-west angle of the market-place, erected by Bishop Hugh Pudsey, about the middle of the 12th century. This is the principal ornament of the town; it has a tower and spire rising from its centre to the height of 180 feet, and is constructed with stone, supposed to have been brought from Cockfield-fell, a place about 12 m. distant; the tower springs from uniform arches, supported by clustered pillars, but the arches of the nave and aisles are irregular, and the whole of the interior view is greatly disfigured by the disposition of the pews and galleries; the west door is, however, highly finished with archings and pilasters, alternately of a cylindrical and octagonal form. Darlington, from its situation, excellent market, and the cheapness of provisions, has become a sort of emporium for manufactures; and, besides its woollen, linen, and cotton establishments, has mills for spinning hemp, flax, &c. and one for the grinding of optical glasses. Market on Monday.

BARNARD CASTLE. The town stands on the southern acclivity of an eminence that rises rather abruptly from the river Tees, which is here crossed by a bridge, consisting of two elliptical arches; it contains 415 houses, besides a church, or rather chapel, as this place forms part of Gainsford parish: this building does not, however, exhibit any thing worthy of observation, unless it be an octagonal font of black marble, bearing on its sides devices and inscriptions expressive of its dedication to the Trinity. The manufacture of Scotch camblets, and the tanning and stocking businesses, constitute the principal employment of the inhabitants, who have, however, the right of holding a weekly market on Wednesday, which is in general better supplied with corn than most others in the north of England. The name of this town, and not improbably its origin also, was derived from a formidable castle that was erected here shortly subsequent to the Norman conquest, the extensive ruins of which are situated on the summit of a rocky eminence, and constitute the most interesting architectural feature of the town. It was founded by Bernard, son of Guy Baliol, who came into England with the Conqueror; but, since the reign of Elizabeth, when it sustained a short siege, has fallen into progressive and unheeded decay.

YORK TO BROUGH FERRY BY MARKET WEIGHTON, AND SOUTH CAVE.

	From Bro. Fer.	From	From York
MARKET WEIGHTON is a small town, possessing a respectable trade, which is greatly facilitated by means of a navigable canal, that forms a line of communication with the Humber. The market is on Wednesday. The air in this neighbourhood is salubrious and healthful; and the roads around it are, generally speaking, good. The church contains nothing remarkable. Some antiquaries have considered Market Weighton to have formerly been a Roman station; but there appears no justifiable grounds for such a supposition: near the town, indeed, there are many tumuli, or barrows, containing human bones, and the remains of ancient armour, but these appear to be Danish, from which it is inferred, that this place has been the theatre of a conflict between the Danes and Saxons; but on this subject history is totally silent.	29½	* YORK, Yorkshire, to

The apartments are numerous and spacious, and finished in the highest style of elegance and taste. Many of the ceilings are richly ornamented with beautiful designs by Zucchi and others. The gallery and great drawing-room present such a display of magnificence and art, as it is difficult to describe: the former occupies the west wing, and is 77 feet in length, 24½ in breadth, and 22 feet high. The gardens and pleasure-grounds, laid out by Brown, correspond with the elegance of the mansion: the ground before the south front was originally a rough hill; but having been sloped down with great judgement and art, now forms a beautiful declivity, which gives to that side of the house an air of additional grandeur. The gardens abound with every convenience for producing the finest fruits, flowers, and exotics. YORK TO HULL, BY SOUTH CAVE.

SOUTH CAVE is a small market-town, situated at the western foot of the Wolds, in a very pleasant tract of country, about three miles from the river Humber. The parish is very extensive, and is under the peculiar jurisdiction of the dean and chapter of York. The church is a plain and neat edifice, built, as appears by an inscription on the inside, in the year 1601. The market is held every Monday, at which great quantities of corn are sold, and transported, by means of the Humber and its branches, to many populous towns in the West Riding, in vessels which return laden with coals, lime, flag-stone, free-stone, and various other articles.

ANLABY is a well built and ancient village: it formerly belonged to the family of the Anlaby, who derived their name from the manor. In the year 1100, the heiress of that house carried it by marriage into the family of Legard, which, till nearly the close of the last century, had resided here ever since the conquest.

recorded; it was, however, shortly after rebuilt, but what constitutes the present church appears to be only a portion of a much more extensive edifice: it contains some handsome marble monuments. The situation of North Ferriby is very delightful at the foot of the hills, on a gentle descent, and not far from the river Humber.

INGLETON. In the neighbourhood of this large village there are several objects deserving the particular attention of the admirers of romantick scenery; among them are Thornton Scar and Force, and Yordas and Weathercote caves. Thornton Scar is a tremendous cliff, about 300 feet high, partly covered with wood, and partly exhibiting the bare rock; it runs up a great distance into the mountains, and opposite to it another ridge runs in a parallel direction; these so nearly approximate at bottom, that there is scarcely room for a small torrent to escape through the frightful chasm, over a succession of cascades. A short distance hence is Thornton Force, a fine cascade, that, when seen from below, with the rocks above it, fringed with ivy and a variety of shrubs, presents an extremely beautiful picture. Yordas cave is situated under the mountain called Gleg-roof; its entrance resembles the gateway of an ancient castle, and its roof and walls exhibit a variety of petrifications. Weathercote cave possesses a still more sublime and romantick character, its summit is almost level with the adjoining lands, and the margin is surrounded with trees and shrubs, which afford protection and ornament to the steep and rugged precipices; the cave is divided into two, by a grotesque arch of limestone rock; at the south end there is an entrance into a small cave, and on the right of that a subterraneous passage into the great cave, where the astonished visitor beholds an immense cataract falling above sixty feet in an unbroken sheet, with a noise that stuns the ear; as the water falls among the rocks and pebbles, it disappears, and runs for the distance of a mile through a subterraneous passage. The whole cave is filled with the spray arising from the cataract; and here sometimes may be seen a small vivid rainbow, which, for size, colour, or situation, can hardly by possibility be equalled; but the most sublime features of this romantick district are the mountains of Ingleborough, Pennigant, and Wharnside.

KNARESBOROUGH is a neat, well-built, and tolerably large town, delightfully situated on the banks of the river Nidd, which flows through a most romantic valley, below precipitous rocks. Owing to a gentle descent of the country for the space of several miles on the eastern side of the town, there are, in that direction, a number of the most extensive and rich prospects, overlooking great part of the vale of York, terminated by the bold outline of the moors and wolds; on the opposite side, the views, though less extensive, and of a different character, are equally beautiful. The church appears to have been erected at various periods; it is a very respectable edifice, and contains several elegant monuments. Here are the remains of a castle which was built soon after the Conquest, and was for some time the prison of the unfortunate King Richard II. In the time of the civil wars it was defended for Charles I. with so much spirit and resolution, that the garrison at last gained honourable terms of capitulation; but about four years afterwards, the fortress was rendered untenable by order of parliament, and its massive walls and formidable towers have ever since been mouldering away; yet the existing fragments of its original splendour strike the imagination with the idea of strength and awful importance. Knareborough sends two members to parliament, has a considerable manufacture of linen, and a weekly market on Wednesday, which is one of the most extensive in Yorkshire for the supply of corn. The neighbourhood of the town is rendered additionally attractive by several natural curiosities, the most distinguished of which is the far-famed Dropping or Petrifying Well, situated in the long walk on the banks of the Nidd, opposite the ruins of the castle. This remarkable spring rises at the foot of a lime-stone rock, and after running about 20 yards towards the river, spreads itself over the top of another rock, from whence it trickles down in a number of places with a kind of musical tinkling. The traveller will likewise find the Priory, St. Robert's chapel, cave, &c. to be objects worthy his attention.

YORK TO LANCASTER, BY KNARESBOROUGH, RIPLEY, PATELY BRIDGE, AND INGLETON.

LANCASTER. This place derived its early and most efficient consequence from a strong fortress, of which a considerable portion is yet in existence. Though this structure is now converted into the county-gaol, yet its architectural features and appropriation are entitled to general admiration: it stands upon the summit of a high hill, and forms a very august feature in the general view of the town. The principal division, consisting of a large square keep, is apparently of Norman architecture; and the strongly fortified tower-gateway, or chief entrance, with other subordinate parts, are supposed to have been erected in the 14th century, by John of Gaunt: the county-courts and shire-hall, now attached to this venerable pile, are chiefly of a modern date, and well suited to their respective purposes. The parish church is on the same eminence, and contiguous to the castle; it is a spacious structure, consisting of a nave, two side-aisles, and a handsome tower at the west end. A few of the monkish turn-up seats are still to be seen here, besides which there are several monumental erections worthy of attention. Lancaster is situated upon the river Lune, and though many of its streets are narrow, yet the houses are in general well built, and some of them lay claim to (Lancaster continued.) considerable beauty: it has obtained some consequence as a port, though the river is so much obstructed here by shoals, that ships of large burthen cannot approach the town nearer than a distance of six miles: many vessels are, however, built here, and the merchants are actively engaged in foreign trade; besides which this place has the advantage of a communication with several other commercial towns by means of a canal nearly 80 miles long, which is, at the distance of about a mile from the town, conveyed over the river Lune by means of a grand aqueduct. The new bridge, erected at the expense of the county, cost 12,000*l.*; it is 549 feet long, and consists of five equal arches forming altogether a handsome erection. Besides the public buildings above noticed, Lancaster contains a chapel dependent on the established church, places of worship belonging to the different sects of dissenters, several charitable institutions, and places of public entertainment. The town-hall is also a noble building, ornamented with a bold portico. Lancaster is incorporated under a mayor, aldermen, recorder, bailiffs, &c. sends two members to parliament, and has a market on Wednesday and Saturday.

DIVISION OF THE ROAD, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. before, Swinnow Hall, — Hardy, Esq.

TADCASTER is supposed to have been the Calcaria of the Romans, the distance, which is nine miles south-west from York, also agrees exactly with that given by Antoninus in his Itinerary, and many coins of the Roman emperors have been found here; but Mr. Dodsworth, and some other antiquaries, place the ancient Calcaria at Newton Kyme, about a mile and a half to the west of Tadcaster. This town is neat, well built, and extremely pleasant; it stands on both sides of the river Wharfe, and is partly situated in the ainsty of York and liberty of St. Peter, though the greater portion is in the west-riding, and wapentake of Barkston Ash. On the south side of the river was formerly a castle, the ruins of which are said to have been used in the erection of the present bridge, about the beginning of the 18th century: this bridge is one of the finest in the county, and its centre is the boundary between the ainsty and the west-riding; the river Wharfe, over which it is thrown, rises in a mountainous

Calcaria, or Tadcaster was, from its situation, considered by the Romans as one of the out-ports or gates to their chief military station, the city of York: it was also looked upon as a place of great importance during the civil wars of England; and its possession was frequently contested. Some vestiges of a trench, surrounding a part of the town, may still be seen, probably thrown up during the reign of Charles I.; for the Earl of Newcastle, being, in 1642, appointed to the command of the royal army, he commenced operations by marching from York, with 4000 men and seven pieces of cannon, to attack this place, where Sir Thomas Fairfax was posted; on his arrival a severe conflict ensued, that lasted from 11 o'clock in the morning till 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon, but during the following night Sir T. Fairfax drew off his men to Selby, and

LEIGH has considerable ma- nufactures of cotton goods, and the advantages of extensive canal navigation; and the neigh- bourhood abounds with coal. The church is a handsome structure, with a square tower, in which are eight bells, and the body of the building is supported by two rows of pillars. The dairies round the town are fa- mous for their cheese, which is rich and mild.			WORSLEY. Worsley Hall, R. H. Bradshaw, Esq.

	WARE is an ancient and populous town, lying on the west side of the river Lea, and carrying on a considerable trade in malt and corn. The church is a spacious structure, dedicated to St. Mary, and having an embattled tower at the west end: the roofs are of timber, and were formerly ornamented with paintings and inscriptions, considerable remains of which may still be seen, more particularly in the south chancel or chapel. Most of the ancient brasses have been taken away, but here are still numerous sepulchral memorials. This town contains several alms-houses, and has a weekly market on Tuesday. At the Saracen's Head Inn may still be seen the great bed, said to have been the state-bed of Edward IV. For this curious piece of antiquity, which is 12 feet square, the late Duke of Norfolk offered 100 guineas, intending to take it to Arundel Castle. This sum was however refused. sion is pleasantly situated on the river Tamar: it once belonged to Sir Francis Drake, a kinsman of General Monk's; and subsequently became, by purchase, the property of the first Duke of Northumberland in 1783. The mansion, which is of noble dimensions, and elegantly furnished, is beautifully situated on a bold swell of the southern side of the Tamar, embracing fine views of the park, which is richly diversified, and well wooded, the windings of the river and the Dartmoor Hills in the distance. In the front of the house are two architectural ornaments, standing on elevated ground, one is an artificial ruined castle, and the other a triumphal arch, and near the house stands the parish church, a handsome modern structure.

town; this edifice is entirely composed of granite, and ornamented with some curious carving: at the west end is a lofty tower. Launceston sends two members to parliament, who are elected by the mayor, aldermen, and freemen. The knights of the shire are also elected here; and the winter-assizes are held in the guildhall: it has a weekly market on Saturday. This town was formerly surrounded with walls, parts of which are still to be seen; and had a castle of great strength and importance, which its situation and ruins sufficiently testify: this fortress is undoubtedly of very ancient origin, conjectured to have been founded in the time of the Britons.

REDRUTH TO HELSTON.

REDRUTH is a populous town, consisting principally of one long paved street, situated on the side of an eminence, in the very bosom of the mining district, and consequently occupying a bleak and exposed spot: it is of very remote origin, but does not appear to have risen to any importance till the discovery and working of the copper-mines, which have, however, been the means of increasing its population in more than a six-fold proportion, during the last century. The church, standing about 1 m. from the town, is a neat modern edifice, consisting only of a nave, with a flat ceiling supported by pillars. This town was greatly improved about twenty-five years ago, when many ancient buildings were removed, and the main street laid open and rendered very commodious, it contains several inns and shops, which enjoy a good trade. At the west end of the town commences a delightful gravel walk, which leads to the parish church. The Wesleyan Methodists are very numerous here, and have two meeting-houses in the town; there are also meeting-houses for the Anabaptists and Quakers; and a Latin school, founded in 1803, and sunday schools for boys and girls. The weekly market is held on Friday.

SHEFFIELD TO MANCHESTER, THROUGH GLOSSOP, MOTTRAM IN LONGDEN DALE, AND ASHTON UNDER LYNE.

GLOSSOP is an improving village situated on a rising bank, in one of the deepest vallies in the Peak. The inhabitants are principally employed in spinning and weaving cotton, several factories being established in the adjacent parts. The church is an ancient building; within it is a neat marble tablet, with an inscription to the memory of Joseph Hague, Esq., of Park Hall, near Hayfield, who acquired considerable property by persevering industry, and bequeathed the annual interest of 1000*l.* for ever, towards clothing twenty-four poor men and women, out of the eight townships of Glossop Dale. Above the tablet is a fine marble bust of Mr. Hague, executed by Bacon. Among the sequestered vallies in this quarter of the county, is the pleasant Edale, where, secluded in the bosom of the mountains from the bustle of the world, the inhabitants appear to enjoy all the quiet and security which pervaded the happy valley of Rasselas. The dale is wide and fertile, and better cultivated than most others in the regions of the Peak: the bottom is enlivened by a little rivulet, which flows near the village of Edale, and aids, by its motion, the operations of a cotton factory, established at a little distance. Various other dales branch off from this to an extensive tract, called the Woodlands of Derbyshire, the upper parts of which display some fine oak, fir, and larch trees. The ground of the Woodlands mostly belongs to the Duke of Devonshire, by whose direction the plough has been introduced, and many acres brought into cultivation.

MOTTRAM IN LONGDEN DALE. Old Hall, George Hadfield, Esq.

MOTTRAM IN LONGDEN DALE is situated in the vicinity of the moors of Hollingworth, Tintwistle, and Staley, a romantic district, famed for the diversion of shooting moor-game, or grouse, and on that account greatly frequented in the summer by sportsmen, who resort to these wilds for that purpose. This amusement, which is much practised in the Woods in the north of England and in Scotland, is little known in the more southern parts of the kingdom: it is a healthy, but very laborious exercise. As the scene of action chiefly lies on wild heaths, it is not unusual for parties to erect a tent in order to secure themselves against bad weather, or for the convenience of taking refreshment. The season for this diversion begins about five or six weeks sooner than that of partridge shooting. The grouse somewhat resembles the partridge in shape, but exceeds it considerably in size: its plumage is extremely beautiful, being of a fine glossy variegated tint, displaying a diversity of browns impossible to describe: its eyes are encircled by a very bright scarlet-coloured membrane, and its legs are feathered down to the feet. Its food consists chiefly of bilberries, with the tops and flowers of the ling, or heath. Its flesh is considered as having a finer flavour than that of any other British bird.

The large Cities and Towns which accompany the Metropolis in the following Tables are thus arranged:—Next after London is placed EDINBURGH, as the capital of the ancient kingdom of Scotland. Towns flourishing in manufactures are placed next, in order of their population; MANCHESTER and SALFORD, with the Suburbs assigned thereto in the Reform of Parliament Bill, which passed the House of Commons on the 21–22d September 1831; GLASGOW, as arranged by Dr. Cleland, the well known statistical historian of that city; these places (as well as PAISLEY) are eminent in the manufacture of cottons; BIRMINGHAM (with its Suburbs according to the Reform of Parliament Bill) stands next, eminent in the manufactures which convert all kinds of metal to useful purposes; LEEDS, eminent for woollens; NORWICH, for crapes; and NOTTINGHAM, for the manufacture of stockings.

After these are placed the Commercial Sea Ports: LIVERPOOL, with its Suburb Toxteth; BRISTOL with its Suburbs; ABERDEEN, New and Old; NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, with Gateshead; HULL, with its Suburb Sculcoates; and the flourishing Port of Dundee.

The two great Naval Arsenals, PLYMOUTH and PORTSMOUTH, close this explanatory Catalogue of the great Towns; viz.

CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.

ENGLAND is divided into six Circuits, through each of which two Judges travel twice a year, to hold the Assizes for the administration of justice; viz. in Spring, and in Summer or Autumn.

- I. The HOME CIRCUIT contains, Hertfordshire, Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Surrey.
- II. The MIDLAND CIRCUIT, Northamptonshire, Rutlandshire, Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, and Warwickshire.
- III. The NORFOLK CIRCUIT, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Huntingdonshire, Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, and Norfolk.
- IV. The NORTHERN CIRCUIT, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland.
- V. The OXFORD CIRCUIT, Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Worcestershire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Herefordshire, Monmouthshire, and Gloucestershire.
- VI. The WESTERN CIRCUIT, Hampshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Somersetshire.

The Places at which the Assizes are held, are given in the following Table; where they are arranged in the order in which they are generally attended: but the routes may most of them be varied, at the desire of the Judges.—In order to direct the route, recourse must be had to the roads.

EMPLOYED BY THE

GENERAL POST OFFICE:

WITH THE DAYS ON WHICH THEY LEAVE THEIR RESPECTIVE PORTS; WIND AND WEATHER PERMITTING.

I. FROM DOVER TO CALAIS.*

THE mails for Calais are forwarded by two steam packets, the Arrow and Dasher, which leave Dover every Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. No mail being sent to Calais on Tuesday, the vessel sails on that day to convey despatches from Calais to Dover. The mail from London is received at Dover on Wednesday at half-past 9 A. M.; on Thursday at 45 min. past 5 A. M.; on Friday at 45 min. past 5 A. M.; on Saturday at half-past 9 A. M.; and the packets sail as soon as the tide serves. If the weather permits, the passage is generally performed in about three hours.

II. FROM DOVER TO OSTEND.*

The mails are conveyed to Ostend by two sailing packets the Auckland and Eclipse; they sail every Wednesday and Saturday, as soon as the tide serves and weather permits, after the arrival of the mail from London, which is, on both days, at half-past 9 A. M. The length of time required to effect the passage depends entirely upon the wind and weather, but is sometimes performed in six or seven hours.

III. FROM HARWICH TO HELVOETSLUYS AND CUXHAVEN (HOLLAND).*

A packet sails with the mail from Harwich to Helvoetsluys, and another for Cuxhaven, every Wednesday and Saturday.

IV. FROM HARWICH TO SWEDEN.

The mail for Gothenburg is forwarded by a packet which leaves Harwich every Saturday.

V. FROM FALMOUTH TO LISBON.

The mail packet sails for Lisbon every Friday.

VI. FROM FALMOUTH TO GIBRALTAR, MALTA, AND CORFU.

On the Friday after the first Tuesday in every month, a packet sails from Falmouth with the mail, for Gibraltar, Malta, and Corfu.

VII. FROM FALMOUTH TO MADEIRA AND BRAZIL.

The mails for Madeira and Brazil are forwarded by packets which always leave Falmouth on the Friday following the first Tuesday in every month.

VIII. FROM FALMOUTH TO AMERICA.

The mail packet sails for America on the Saturday after the first Wednesday in every month.

IX. FROM FALMOUTH TO JAMAICA.

The packet which conveys the mail to Jamaica sails from Falmouth on the Saturday after the first Wednesday in every month.

X. FROM FALMOUTH TO THE LEEWARD ISLANDS.

A packet leaves Falmouth with the mail for the Leeward Islands on the Saturday after the third Wednesday in every month.

* In time of peace only.

XI. FROM HOLYHEAD TO HOWTH.

A steam packet leaves Holyhead daily, about a quarter after 6 A. M., with the mail, for Howth, which is about eight Irish miles from Dublin; and the passage, under favourable circumstances of wind and weather, is generally effected in six hours and a half. The packets leave Howth for Holyhead every morning at eight o'clock.

XII. FROM WEYMOUTH TO GUERNSEY AND JERSEY.

The mail is forwarded to Guernsey and Jersey by a sailing cutter, which leaves Weymouth every Wednesday and Saturday at half-past two in the afternoon, and on the average performs the voyage in about twenty-one hours.

XIII. FROM MILFORD TO CORK.

There are four government steam vessels on the Milford Station, which ply daily between Milford and Dunmore, near Waterford, Ireland. The packet leaves Milford with the mail and passengers soon after the London mail comes in, and on their arrival at Dunmore a mail coach departs immediately for Cork. The time of their leaving Dunmore for Milford is regulated also by the arrival of the Cork mail at that place.

XIV. FROM LIVERPOOL TO THE ISLE OF MAN.

The mails are conveyed from Liverpool to the Isle of Man by steam packets, which in the summer months leave the former place every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at 9 A. M., and arrive there from the island on the evenings of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. In winter they go only once a week, departing from Liverpool every Monday at 9 A. M., and returning on Thursday evening. The passage is usually effected in about eight or ten hours.

ADVERTISEMENT.

A VERY material change having taken place in the routes now generally adopted in traversing the south-west district of the kingdom, and in approaching the Principality, in consequence of the improvements that have recently been effected at the Aust or Old Passage Ferry, with the formation of a new road by Tynterne Abbey, and across the river Wye, to Monmouth, through a country proverbial for its beauties, added to the establishment of a new mail-coach to Chepstow, by a route not wholly described in the original work; the Editor has been induced to submit these and other improvements, for the convenience of former purchasers, in the shape of an Appendix, of which the subject matter will, he flatters himself, form an addition of no inconsiderable value to his book. It may not be improper to remark, that the Editor's attention has been particularly attracted to these alterations, by the formation of a committee of the House of Commons on the improvement of the Milford Haven communication with Ireland, who, after a thorough and complete investigation of the subject, have reported, that, compared with the New Passage, the Old Passage, as a ferry, "is the more eligible point for the mail to cross the Severn." A very great change has in consequence been carried into effect by an association of gentlemen at the Old Passage Ferry; new piers have been erected; a steam-boat has been established, and the Passage now rendered certain at all times of the tide. Every objection arising from the delay hitherto experienced in crossing the Severn having been removed, the Old Passage is rapidly rising in public estimation, and the roads in its vicinity are of course much travelled; the Public are relieved from all imposition as to charge; exaction has entirely ceased; and the Ferry is now as open to travellers as a turnpike-gate.

Under these circumstances, he has felt himself warranted in submitting in its present form, the substance of the following pages, and avails himself of the opportunity thus afforded, of acknowledging the sense of obligation with which he feels impressed for the flattering reception his labours have hitherto experienced, and trusts on all occasions to prove himself worthy a continuance of public favour, by his unremitting exertions to make his book keep pace with the extensive improvements at present in active progress throughout the country.

BRENTFORD. A little beyond the 6 m. stone, Kew Bridge, on the other side of which is Kew Palace. Through Brentford, Syon House, Duke of Northumberland. The house stands on the site of a convent of Bridgetines, established here in the reign of Henry VI., and revived by Queen Mary in 1557; but a very trifling remain of the conventual building is now in existence. The present structure is a large quadrangular stone edifice, with embattled parapets, and a turret at each angle. The massive appearance, and solidity of the building, united with its amplitude and dignity, convey an idea of grandeur which excites a peculiar feeling of respect. The hall of entrance is in unison with the external appearance; the floor is of black and white marble, and the sides are ornamented with four antique colossal statues. The vestibule is an apartment of extraordinary magnificence, enriched with columns and pilasters of beautiful verd antique, purchased abroad at an expense of upwards of 20,000*l.*; the other apartments are on a scale of comparative magnificence, decorated with some valuable portraits. The park and grounds are beautifully disposed, and ornamented with a profusion of wood and water, which, added to their situation on the margin of the Thames, unite in composing a most charming tout ensemble.

At 19 m., Langley Park, Sir R. B. Harney, Bart. The mansion is a fine stone building, delightfully situated in a park, abounding with a variety of noble timber. At the foot of a sloping lawn, in the front of the house, containing some beautiful clumps of trees, is a spacious sheet of water; and a noble lake ornaments the centre of the Black Park, which is situated on a rising ground, at the west extremity of the park, and is almost entirely covered with firs, having a few sequestered walks cut through it, possessing many of the beauties of alpine scenery. — Near this is Langley Lodge, J. Jackson, Esq.; and Langley Grove, Mrs. Buckland.

SALT HILL. Stoke Park, J. Penn, Esq. The mansion, one of the most magnificent residences in this part of the county, consists of a large square centre, and two wings, whose north and south fronts are ornamented by a colonnade: the latter front is 196 feet in length, and its whole interior is occupied by an elegant and valuable library of the best authors. The park is rather flat, but commands some fine views, particularly to the south, whence the eye ranges, over a large sheet of water, to the majestic castle of Windsor, beyond which the forest has a very noble appearance. A neat stone bridge is thrown over a large lake which winds itself round the east side of the building.

lars, with officers and assistants; besides which, there are seldom less than 500 gentlemen, sons of the nobility and gentry, who board with the masters, and receive their education at this seminary. The college consists of 2 quadrangles, one appropriated to the school, and the lodging of the masters and scholars; the other contains the apartments of the provost and fellows, and also the library, which is considered one of the finest in Europe: some very valuable drawings, paintings, and oriental manuscripts are among its curiosities. The chapel is a fine structure, ornamented with large abutments, pinnacles, and embrasures; and is similar, in the disposition of its parts, to that of King's College, Cambridge.—Near Slough, Burnham Grove, Sir W. Johnston, Bart.

MAIDENHEAD. Ives Place, T. Wilson, Esq.; and Sir Wm. Herne; at Bray, Henden's House, Mrs. A. M. Trenchard; Kimbers, W. Dodwell, Esq.; Altwood, C. Sawyer, Esq.; Bullocks Hatch, Thomas Athorpe, Esq.; and Down Place, H. Harford, Esq.; at Holyport, H. Walter, Esq.; and Philberds, C. Fuller, Esq.; at Braywick, Braywick Grove, W. Atkins, Esq.; Cannon Hill, Mrs. E. Law; and Braywick Lodge, Admiral West. This neat edifice stands on a gentle eminence, and commands some delightful views. The prospect on one side is heightened by the town of Maidenhead and the village of Taplow, backed by the noble woods of Cliefden and Hedsor; and on the other side it is rendered truly delightful by the proud Castle of Windsor, and the picturesque forest scenery.

MAIDENHEAD THICKET. at a distance, the spire of Shottesbrook Church; near which is Shottesbrook Park, the seat of A. Vansittart, Esq.; at White Waltham, John Kearney, Esq.; and Waltham Place, — Cornerfoot, Esq.; at the end of the Thicket, Woolley Hall, unoccupied.

About 300 yards from the north front of the house, stands a handsome fluted column 68 feet high, surmounted with a colossal statue of Sir Edward Coke, by Rosa. — Beyond this is Stoke Farm, Lord Seston; and Britwell House, Rev. — Evans.

MAIDENHEAD BRIDGE. At Taplow, Taplow House, Pascoe Grenfell, Esq.; Berry Hill, Lord Newry; Taplow Hill, — Lucas, Esq.; and Taplow Lodge, Mrs. Tunno. From the bridge see Cliefden, Right Hon. Sir George Warrender, Bart.; near which is Formosa Place, the elegant seat of Sir Samuel Young, Bart.; Formosa Fishery, unoccupied; and Hedsor Lodge, Lord Boston. This noble mansion stands on an eminence, and commands a very richly-diversified country: the convenient domestic arrangements and internal decorations have rendered it a most desirable and commodious residence. The grounds are formed into high sloping hills and deep valleys, and are ornamented by a well-distributed variety of woods. — Near the above, Dropmore, Lord Grenville.

MAIDENHEAD. Isaac Po-cock, Esq.; The Elms, Mrs. Hall; and The Cottage, — Atkinson, Esq.

MAIDENHEAD THICKET. Stubbings, Col. Brotherton; at a distance, Hall Place, Sir Gilbert East, Bart.; and Bisham Abbey, Geo. Vansittart, Esq.

HARE HATCH, 1 m. before, Bear Hill, Mrs. W. Cavendish; and Bear Place, Sir Morris Ximines. This is an elegant modern edifice with wings, pleasantly situated on an elevated spot in a fine woodland country. The grounds contain a pleasing variety of inequalities, tufted with woods; and the views towards the south and east are extensive and beautiful.

TWYFORD. At a distance, at Shiplake, Rev. — Howman; Shiplake House, Dr. Phillimore; and Holme Wood, Lord Mark Ker.

At 36 m., Holme Park, R. Palmer, Esq.; and farther to the right, Caversham Park, Col. Marsac.

READING, a little beyond, Prospect Hill, Mrs. Liebenrood.

The town is watered by the little river Marlaw, which runs through its centre, and turns several fulling and corn mills. The general appearance of the streets is clean, and the buildings respectable. The market-house and town-hall is a commodious building; and the free-school, which was founded in 1660, under the will of John Bentley, Esq., of Richmond, is an establishment that does credit to its founder. The church is ancient and spacious, comprising a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, with a square tower, ninety-three feet high at the north end, which, together with the body of the edifice, is ornamented with foliated pinnacles rising from the abutments. CHEPSTOW. Hardwick Hill, Dr. Camplin; Hardwick House, unoccupied; and The Mount House, Ralph Carr, Esq.

CHEPSTOW possesses a very cheerful aspect; it is mostly situated on the side of a hill, and contains a number of well-built houses, chiefly disposed in broad paved streets, on the western bank of the river Wye, which flows with great rapidity up to the town, and frequently rises at the bridge to the height of about 60 feet. This river is likewise a source of considerable benefit to the inhabitants, who are thereby enabled to export the productions of Monmouth and Hereford, and to import, in return, useful articles for the consumption of the inland parts of those districts: it is crossed here by a handsome iron bridge. Shortly subsequent to the Conquest, a priory of Benedictine monks was founded at Chepstow, the chief remains of which are the present parish church. There is nothing, however, in Chepstow that is by any means so interesting as the remains of its castle, which is situated on the edge of a lofty precipice of rocks, washed at their base by the rapid tide of the Wye, and bounded by the beautiful woods of Piercefield; forming a more commanding object from several points of view on the road from the Old Passage Ferry than even Tintern Abbey itself. Many parts of this interesting ruin lay claim to considerable antiquity, eight hundred years having elapsed since its original erection by William Fitz-osborn Earl of Hereford. It was formerly of considerable extent, but suffered materially in the 17th century. Its magnificent ruins receive a very picturesque appearance from the spreading ivy with which they are overrun. picturesque shores, completing the peninsula on the West. The new stone pier of the Old Passage Ferry, thirty feet wide, and nearly 500 feet in length, forms a refreshing and commodious promenade; and the sails up the Wye to Tintern Abbey, up the Avon to Clifton and Bristol, up the Severn, or the Ship Canal, to Gloucester, or down the Bristol Channel to Swansea, Tenby, Weston, or Ilfracombe, furnish endless amusement and unceasing variety of scenery. The single fields forming the isthmus between the Wye and the Severn are called the Bullwarks, from the frequent fortification of Beachley. The military importance of this place, in the days of Charles the First, was very great, and it was then the scene of several actions.

BUTTINGTON TUMP, near, Sedbury Park, George Ormerod, Esq. See p. 20.

TUTTS HILL TURNPIKE. Tutts Hill Lodge, J. Evans, Esq.

CHEPSTOW, near, Piercefield, the delightful seat of Nathaniel Lewis, Esq. The mansion is a superb elevation of free-stone, and consists of a centre 3 stories high, and 2 wings; this stands in the midst of a park whose extensive grounds are highly celebrated for their artificial beauty, and the noble woods and plantations they contain, ornamented by several retired seats displaying exquisite taste. A walk near 3 miles long leads through rich plantations, commanding a fine distant view of the river Severn and the adjoining country; it then stretches over lawns, and again passes through the recesses of thick forests; afterwards it winds over the brow of a vast amphitheatre of cliffs; it thence passes again through the imperious gloom of forests, and bursts into fine open groves, ever and anon displaying to the enchanted eye of the spectator the most rapturous scenes, including all the beauties of English landscape, enriched by the noble rivers Wye and Severn: the extensive prospect on one side is closed by the rude and lofty mountains of Wales, while on the other it is wholly lost in distance. Nine of the most picturesque views are from the points named the Alcove, the Platform, the Grotto, the Lover's Leap, Paradise Seat, the Giant's Cave, Halfway Seat, Piercewood Top, and the Double View, which is a natural diorama. By the obliging liberality of its proprietor, this delightful park is open to the public every Tuesday and Friday. — Near Chepstow, St. Lawrence, Richard Walkins, Esq.

PONTYPOOL. Pontypool Park, Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq. The mansion is a good substantial edifice, beautifully situated on a rising lawn, skirted by large plantations on the one side, and by fine irregular acclivities, one called the Oak-room, an apartment 42 feet long, and 27 broad, the fittings up and flooring of which is composed of the timber produced from one tree: this astonishing expansion of a single acorn affords the contemplative mind a pleasant subject for meditation. The extensive park is well stocked with deer, and the grounds are diversified by gentle acclivities, covered with excellent plantations of oak, beech, and Spanish chesnut.

CARDIFF, 4 m. distant, Court-yr-Allen, T. B. Rouse, Esq.; and farther to the left, Sully, Evan Thomas, Esq.

ST. NICHOLAS, 1m. before, and 2 m. distant, Wenvœ Castle, R. F. Jenner, Esq.; and at St. Nicholas, Duffrin House, Hon. W. Booth Grey. In a field near this venerable mansion stands a cromlech of large dimensions; its roof consisting of one stone, 24 feet long, and varying in breadth from 17 to 10 feet. The same field contains two other large stones similar to those employed in this rude erection, one of which is used as a style. About three quarters of a mile to the south-east of the above mansion is another cromlech, called Greyhound Bitch Kennel; it is of smaller dimensions than the former, the covering stone not being more than 14 feet long and 12 wide.

BONVILSTON, 1 m. beyond Llantrithy Park, an elegant domain belonging to Sir John Aubrey, Bart.; at 5 m. distance, Fomnon Castle, the magnificent mansion of Rob. Jones, Esq.; and the ruins of Bewper Castle, a large Gothic edifice, now occupied by a farmer, and one of the most ancient residences in the county.

COWBRIDGE, beyond, the ruins of St. Lythan Castle.

EWENNY BRIDGE, 1 m. before, at 4 m. distance, Dunraven, Mrs. Bennett. This seat stands on a rocky promontory on the sea-shore, which situation is in many respects beautiful and romantic, enjoying several very fine sea views, and surrounded on all sides by rocky scenery of great grandeur; but it does not seem well adapted for a permanent residence, the adjacent country being almost entirely destitute of trees, and particularly bleak in the winter season. The mansion, of modern erection, is an elegant and spacious edifice, in the Gothic style, occupying the site of an ancient structure. Dunraven, probably the oldest residence in Wales, is satisfactorily ascertained to have been the abode of Caractacus of British and Roman history, and also of his father Brian ab Llŷr. In the cliffs on the shore near this place, some very large and curious excavations have been formed by the percussion of the sea; one of them, extending parallel with the coast, resembles a colonnade, covered with hanging groves, on the other; beyond the latter rise a number of swelling eminences, whose soft varied lines form a fine contrast to the harsh and irregular features of the surrounding country. To the west the prospect is truly romantic; here the rude torrent of the Avon Lwyd rushes through its rocky channel, accompanied by delightful scenery; and beyond this rises the bold though bare eminence called Mynydd Maen.

UNICORN. Wentworth Lodge, Duke of Beaufort.

CAERLEON. Lantarnam Abbey, Sir Henry Protheroe. This elegant mansion is now fast going to decay, and its present dilapidated state forms a sad contrast to its former magnificence, of which the beholder may form some idea from the paintings of several English sovereigns contained in the hall, and also from the decorations of the windows with the royal arms; these subjects lead us to imagine that in former days it was honoured with royal visits. The surrounding park is diversified by gentle eminences, interspersed with venerable trees and fine thick plantations; the effect of which is considerably heightened by the Avon Lwyd, here seen to great advantage, flowing near the grounds.

NEWPORT. Malpas Church. This was formerly the chapel belonging to a religious house for monks of the Cluniac order; it is built of unwhewn stone, and is elegantly decorated. From many of its ornaments we are inclined to attribute its origin to the Saxons, though, from the doubts of some historians respecting their having ever been in possession of this part of the country, its real history is involved in much obscurity. — 2 m. distant from Newport, Malpas House, Rev. Peter Moody.

HALFWAY HOUSE. Rupperrah, Charles Morgan, Esq. This building was the production of Inigo Jones; but the whole of the interior having been consumed by fire, nothing more than the walls can now be ascribed to that eminent architect. The loftiness of the situation affords very fine prospects, particularly to the south, where the hills of Devon and Somerset, and the country between it and the Severn, are extremely rich. — ½ m. farther, Cefn Mabley, Col. Lynte.

ROATH. Roath Court, unoccupied.

CARDIFF. The Castle, Marquis of Bute. This building retains much of its original grandeur; and the west front, with its very noble appearance, has a bold appearance on the road. On an elevated mound stand the ruins of the keep, from which the prospect of the surrounding country is delightful and extensive; the ditch has been filled up, and the whose pillars have not received their last polish: another, penetrating the rocks to a great distance, is called the Wind-hole, from some apertures in the ground, through which, in certain states of the tide, the air is forced up in a current of considerable strength. — Near Ewenny Bridge, Ewenny Priory, R.T. Turberville, Esq. Here are the remains of an elegant and very curious pavement, which appears to have formerly covered the whole of the floor, and was probably constructed at the time the church was built: this plain Norman edifice has a fine square tower in the centre, and is deserving the attention of the antiquary on account of its monuments. Adjoining the church stands the old mansion house, which has been rendered an extremely commodious dwelling by the thorough repairs it has lately undergone.

BRIDGEND is partly situated on each side of the river Ogmore, and is connected by a good stone bridge. The town is well built, and contains many very respectable inhabitants, who are well supplied with every article of provision in the market here held on Saturday. That part of the town on the eastern side of the river, is called Old-castle, that on the other, New-castle. The former derives its name from a fortress which formerly stood near the chapel, and appears to have been dependent on the neighbouring castle of Coity: the latter is so called from a fortress of later erection, whose remains, situated above the church, command a most extensive prospect.

NEWBRIDGE, before, see the ruins of Ogmore Castle; on the western bank of the river Ogmore, Candlestone, unoccupied; and at Newbridge, Merthyr Mawr, the elegant modern residence of the Rt. Hon. Sir John Nichol.

ABERAVON. This small town is but indifferently built, but has the privilege of a weekly market, and also partakes with Cardiff, Swansea, &c. in returning a member to parliament.

BRITON FERRY. Briton Ferry House, Earl of Jersey. The house is a neat edifice, constructed more for convenience than splendid appearance. Its situation is extremely delightful. The grounds consist of gentle eminences, covered in some parts by a rich verdure, and in others by luxuriant oaks, that spring out of the rocky precipices which defend them from the sea. The landscape embraces some rich woodland scenery, intermixed with delightful views of the river, whose beauty is considerably heightened when the channel is filled by the tide.

COWBRIDGE is a small but well-built town, divided in the centre by a stream, which, at a short distance hence, falls into the sea. It contains a good town-hall, an excellent grammar-school, and a singularly-shaped church, which latter building, when seen from a distance, resembles the embattled turret of an old fortress. This town has a good market on Tuesday, and, together with Swansea, Llantrissant, &c., has the privilege of returning one member to serve in parliament.

COWBRIDGE, ½ m. beyond, Penlyne Castle, Earl of Clarendon. Within these few years an elegant castellated mansion has been erected on the site of part of this ancient edifice; it commands a vast extent of beautiful scenery, and forms a prominent feature in the surrounding landscape.

MARGAM PARK, C. R. Mansell Talbot, Esq. The park is about five miles in circumference, has been kept in its original state, and is abundantly stocked with deer; the pleasure and ornamental grounds have received also considerable attention. In the midst of these stands the conservatory, an elegant Doric edifice, measuring 330 feet in length by 82 in width. This contains one of the finest collections of orange-trees in the kingdom. At each end of the building is a large square room, containing many curious models, fine statues, and other antiques of exquisite workmanship. There is no mansion attached to the park, but here is a very curious old Saxon church, which has been restored at great cost, and with equal taste, wherein are some splendid monuments of the Mansell family.

is navigable as high as the town-quay for vessels of 200 tons burden. The town contains a number of fine houses, occupied by gentlemen of opulence, and is embellished by a spacious and handsome church, with a good square tower at one end, surmounted by an embattled parapet. This town shares with Cardiff, Aberavon, &c., the honour of returning a member to parliament, and has a well-supplied market on Wednesday and Saturday. Near the town are the picturesque ruins of its castle, whose mouldering walls, together with a handsome gateway, have a very sombre appearance.

MILFORD HAVEN is indisputably the finest harbour in Great Britain. It has sixteen deep and safe creeks, five bays, and thirteen roads; in an hour's time a ship may be out of it, and on her way between the Land's End and Ireland. Increased national advantages are expected to result from the port of Milford, the same having recently been inspected by the Lord High Admiral, with a view to its ultimate improvement, and the report of a select committee

The institution supports 70 scholars, with officers and assistants; besides which, there are seldom less than 300 gentlemen, sons of the nobility and gentry, who board with the masters, and receive their education at this seminary. The college consists of 2 quadrangles, one appropriated to the school, and the lodging of the masters and scholars; the other contains the apartments of the provost and fellows, and also the library, which is considered one of the finest in Europe: some very valuable drawings, paintings, and oriental manuscripts, are among its curiosities. The mansion is delightfully situated on an eminence, sheltered by extensive plantations from the severity of the winds. It is elegantly furnished, and contains an excellent collection of paintings, besides a well-stored and very valuable library. The grounds possess all the features characteristic of beauty: they consist of a fine intermixture of hill and dale, plentifully stocked with woods, and ornamented by several buildings, one of which, a Druid's temple, brought from the Isle of Jersey, is a curious relic of antiquity. A subterraneous passage leads to a valley bordered with cypress, containing a grand representation of a Roman amphitheatre falling into decay. The execution of this ivy-mantled ruin is of a very superior kind. The prospects are delightfully varied and extensive; and the river Thames, seen in many parts to great advantage, considerably heightens the beauty of the scene.—3 m. distant from Henley, Crowsley Park, Mrs. Atkins Wright. The nearest navigable stream is at the distance of 6 miles; a circumstance fatally adverse to the prosperity of the place. Here is no staple manufacture of any consequence; but the making of lace prevails to some extent, and forms the chief employment of the labouring females. In addition to the remoteness of water-conveyance, the badness of the neighbouring roads, which are perhaps the worst in the county, acts prejudicially on commercial speculation: but the spirit of the inhabitants appears to be little depressed by these repulsive circumstances; and efforts are gradually making to ameliorate the chill and gloomy aspect of the principal avenues. In the centre of the town is the market-house, a substantial brick building, erected by Thos. FAIRFORD. This town derives its chief celebrity from its church, which is a very elegant specimen of the architecture of the 15th century, and consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with a tower in the centre, ornamented by buttresses, having at their bases rudely-sculptured statues as large as life. The whole of the building is embattled, and also supported by buttresses. The architecture of the interior is particularly fine, and the embellishments are of a very superior order, among which are a variety of handsome monuments to the memory of departed worth, well deserving the attention of the traveller: two rows of light fluted pillars divide the nave from the aisles, and an elegant carved oak screen surrounds the chancel, with stalls of the same kind; added to these, the chequered pavement and the pews have a very fine appearance. This church was erected at the sole expense of a merchant named John Tame, who purchased the manor of Henry VII: he having taken a vessel laden with painted glass, bound from a Flemish port to Italy, determined on erecting an edifice expressly for its reception; and it was accordingly disposed of in the decorations of 28 of the windows of this church. The subjects are principally scripture and history, and the execution so fine, that Vandyck is recorded to have declared they could not have been exceeded by the best pencil. This town has two handsome bridges over the Coln; it contains several charitable institutions, and has a good market on Thursday.

CAERPHELLY consists of a number of straggling, but in general well-built houses; it has a market on Thursday, and to the antiquary holds out considerable attractions in the remains of its ancient castle, which is one of the most extensive pieces of antiquity of this description in the kingdom. These ruins occupy a moderately elevated situation, and the main body of the castle is surrounded by a strong wall, supported by buttresses, and defended by square towers, communicating with each other by an embattled gallery. Near the south-east angle of this building stands a place called the Mint, close to which are the remains of a tower, leaning 11 feet out of the perpendicular; this bulky fragment is about 80 feet high, of a prodigious thickness, and has maintained its present position for many centuries. The external view of the western entrance of this ruin, with its ponderous towers, mantled with ivy, is particularly imposing.

MERTHYR TYDVIL, Cy-farthfa Castle, William Crawshaw, Jun. Esq.

The distance between London and Merthyr Tydvil is 84 miles shorter by this line of road, than by that through Bristol and over the New Passage; and the river Severn at the improved Old Passage Ferry is less than half the breadth of the New Passage.

MERTHYR TYDVIL. This is a large town, but very irregularly built; it derives its importance almost wholly from the immense iron-works carried on in its immediate vicinity. The chief of these belong to Messrs. Crawshaw, and consist of 6 blast furnaces, which are blown by means of a steam-engine of 50 horse power, and an overshot wheel above 50 feet in diameter, whose force equals that of the steam-engine; this was invented by a mechanic employed about the works, named Watkin George, who has since been deservedly rewarded for his talents. Each of these furnaces is capable of producing about 60 tons of iron per week; but they are seldom all in use at the same time, one at least being generally extinguished and under repair. This establishment usually employs about 1800 workmen, and the monthly payments are supposed to be about 5500l.

the ceiling of the dining-room represents the council of the gods; the cornice of this apartment is also curiously carved and gilt, and the frame of the door is formed of variegated marble; the staircase is of richly-inlaid mahogany, and the mansion generally is furnished with a collection of paintings. The grounds are extensive, and contain a variety of sylvan beauties; but the most prominent feature in the landscape is the lake, which spreads its waters over an extensive surface, and is adorned with several islands, planted with fine forest-trees, spreading their immense branches in a wild and luxuriant manner. A few elegant ornamental buildings and cascades are also interspersed through these grounds, affording considerable animation to the noble woods which embellish this demesne. The various prospects obtained hence are extremely picturesque, embracing among other objects the town and church of High Wycombe, the mausoleum near the church of West Wycombe, and the meandering river with the delightful vale in which the former are situated.

The interior is superbly furnished in the modern style, with the exception of the armoury, a capacious room, on whose sides are hung various pieces of mail, shields, tilting-spears, and offensive weapons of modern as well as ancient date. Here are two large libraries, well stocked with valuable books, and adorned with paintings and sculpture: among the various portraits, is an original of Catherine Parr, Queen to Henry VIII., and in the lower part of the frame, under a glass, is carefully preserved a lock of her hair, which is of an auburn colour, and exactly corresponds with that depicted on the canvas. WITNEY is a cheerful and pleasing town, watered by the river Windrush, and consisting chiefly of 2 streets, the principal of which is about a mile in length. The domestic buildings are uniformly of a respectable character; many are both handsome and spacious, and the whole derive a grateful air of cleanliness and prosperity from a custom which prevails of colouring the fronts with a light and pleasing yellow. As the High Street draws towards the south, it progressively expands, and in the broad area is preserved an extent of greensward, through which is formed a wide and handsome gravel walk, leading to the church. Few towns, containing so many inhabitants, and possessing such a number of substantial buildings, maintain an aspect of so quiet and rural a character. The church

BATH TO CHEPSTOW, BY DOWNEND AND BEACHLEY.

DOWNEND, beyond, Cleeve Wood House, the seat of Stephen Cave, Esq. Cleeve Wood House is situate amid grounds that exhibit great taste in the arrangement, and no inconsiderable share of beauty; the views, which, though not extensive, are extremely pleasing, derive additional beauty from the river Frome, that glides through the domain.

FRENCHAY, E. Brice, Esq.; Hill House, John Haythorn, Esq.; Oldbury Court, and Stoke Gifford Park, Dowager Duchess of Beaufort; and at Stapleton, Stapleton House, Isaac Elton, Esq.

ALMONDSBURY, near, Knowle House, George Gibbs, Esq.; and farther to the left, Over Court, the seat of John Vaughan, Esq.; which being seated on the brow of Almondsbury Hill, enjoys of course all the advantages of a situation so eminently beautiful.

ALMONDSBURY lies at the foot of Almondsbury Hill, the view from whose summit is well known to every traveller of the west, and justly considered the finest in this part of the country, with the exception of Pen Pole at Shirchampton. The prospects hence are rich, varied, beautiful, and extensive; and command the course of the Severn from Gloucester to the Steep and Flat homes at the mouth of the Bristol Channel; with the truly grand and romantic scenery of Chepstow, Piercefield, and Wyndcliff.

CHEPSTOW. The Castle is supposed to have been built nearly 800 years: its original founder was William Fitzosborn Earl of Hereford. In the 13th century it was increased by Roger Bigod, and was partially altered in the 15th century, probably by William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke. For the last three centuries it has been one of the lordly possessions of the house of Beaufort, who acquired it by marriage with the Herberts. In 1645 it was seized by the parliamentary forces, and after being surprised for the King in 1648, and recovered again by the parliament was partly demolished, and settled with the neighbouring estates on Oliver Cromwell. On the restoration of King Charles the Second, it was repossessed by the Marquis of Worcester, then created Duke of Beaufort, and was for many years the place of confinement of Henry Marten, one of the regicides. At Chepstow are the highest tides in England, and the phenomenon of a fine spring of fresh water regularly rising in the well, as the tide of the river falls, and as regularly falling as the tide of the river rises.

The peninsula between the Severn and the Wye at Beachley is devoted to the formation of a new watering-place, to which it is well adapted from its climate and situation, the Bristol Channel being on the south, the bay extending to a beautiful lake, with views of Wyndcliff, Piercefield, and Chopstow, on the north, the new pier with the cheerful scene of the ferry on the east, and the serpentine Wye on the west. The single fields forming the isthmus between the Wye and the Severn, are called the Bulwarks, from the frequent fortification of Beachley. The military importance of this place in the time of Charles the First was very great. It was then the scene of several actions.	12	Frogland's Cross  T. G.	17

CALDICOT CASTLE. The venerable remains of this once important fortress are situate on a flat, called Caldicot Level, which divests them, at a distance, of the advantages possessed by many similar ruins: however, on a nearer approach, this massive remnant of feudal power rises into importance, and becomes still more interesting on a closer investigation. The chief en-	2 $\frac{1}{2}$	Caldicot	5 $\frac{1}{2}$

way appears to have connected the castle with the village. This fortress, from its situation and the massive structure of its component parts, must have been excessively strong: its origin, like many other buildings of a similar character, is involved in obscurity; but the style of architecture is an admixture of the Saxon, Norman, and Gothic, the latter being the prevailing character. The inner area appears to have comprehended a space about 300 feet long, by a width differing from 130 to 225 feet. The walls are composed of coarse grit-stone, and are from five to nine feet in thickness, supported and strengthened by various towers. Opposite the grand gateway is a fine hexagonal tower, through which there is an entrance, with a machicolated roof: withinside are the remains of several apartments, and among them the baronial hall; and on a small mound at the north-east angle stands the keep, a lofty round tower, from whence may be traced ready communications with all parts of the fortress. In 1221, this castle, according to Dugdale, was in the possession of Humphrey Earl of Hereford; it has subsequently experienced all that vicissitude of fortune incidental to an erection of this description, and now forms a part of the duchy of Lancaster, and is held on lease by C. H. Leigh, Esq.

WYNDCLIFF. The Moss Cottage is appropriated by the Duke of Beaufort to the gratuitous accommodation of the picnic parties, and other visitors, who frequent the beautiful neighbourhood of Tynterne Abbey. From this point up the rocky precipice, to the apparently inaccessible summit of the cliff, paths are formed, which, winding through several natural caverns, and over beds of moss variegated with wild flowers, and protected by parapets of rocks or mountain trees, afford at every successive turn a different and still more beautiful view of the landscape below. The view from the summit of Wyndcliff is generally considered one of the most beautiful in England. From the edge of a rock nearly a thousand feet high, the prospect extends into nine counties: the Wye under the feet of the beholder, the Severn beyond it, the narrow separation for several miles between these two rivers, their union at the head of the peninsula of Beachley, the sea in the distance, the mountains of Brecon and Glamorgan, the Gloucestershire and Somersetshire hills, the castle and cliffs of Chepstow, and the rare combination of evergreens, wild flowers, rocks, ruins, woods, hills, valleys, plains, and water, defy all adequate description, except perhaps from the magic pen of the Author of Waverley.

BRISTOL TO ABERYSTWITH, BY CHEPSTOW, RAGLAND, AND ABERGAVENNY.

	From Aberyst.	From Bristol
RAGLAND is chiefly famous for its castle, which is one of the most modern buildings of the kind in this part of the country; the ruins are extensive, and possess a magnificent appearance, being beautifully mantled with ivy, and exhibiting considerable elegance in the fret-work, which is of the finest execution: the stately hall, and the large court beyond it, are richly ornamented, and, together with the mouldings, friezes, &c. on the stone frames of most of the windows, afford a good idea of the manner in which the whole of the interior was fitted up. This stupendous edifice was almost entirely destroyed during the civil wars, when it was garrisoned for the royal cause, and sustained a siege of ten weeks; after which the numerous tenants in the vicinity conveyed away great quantities of stone for the construction of farm-houses, barns, &c.: not less than 23 different staircases were taken down by these depredators; yet the remains are of sufficient extent and strength to be still capable of forming a very commodious habitation. They are now preserved with great care, and much visited during the summer by travellers.	119 $\frac{3}{4}$	From * BRISTOL, Glous., to

ABERGAVENNY, 2 m. before, Coldbrook House, F. Hanbury Williams, Esq.; and near it, Derwyn Cottage, C. Davies, Esq.
ABERGAVENNY, near, the Sugar Loaf Mountain. The most easy way of ascending this eminence is from the east side of the Derry, which is one of the confederated hills that sustain the towering cone; and as the sides of the mountain are covered with heath, moss, &c., to the height of a foot, a light carriage might with the greatest ease be driven to the base of the Sugar Loaf itself, which is not more than 100 paces from its top: neither do any impediments offer themselves in the ascent of the cone, from the summit of which the various prospects are extensive, magnificent, and exquisitely diversified, including the counties of Radnor, Salop, Brecknock, Monmouth, Glamorgan, Hereford, Worcester, Gloucester, Somerset, and Wilts, the various beauties belonging to each of which, when contrasted with others, cannot fail to excite the peculiar admiration of the beholder. This elevated point is 1852 feet perpendicular above the mouth of the Gaveny, and may readily be distinguished from Bitcombe-hill, near Longleat, in Wiltshire, and from the Stiperstones in Shropshire, near the borders of Montgomeryshire.

the eastern side of the town; and from this confluence the name is derived. The castle is in a very dilapidated state; the principal remains, consisting of a round and a pentagonal tower, which, with their rugged sides, fractured perforations, and menacing attitudes, on an eminence sternly overlooking the river Uske, form a picturesque ruin. The castle formed the southern termination. Of the four gates, only the western one remains; it is denominated Tudor's gate, and is a massy portal in the pointed style, with a groove in the archway for a portcullis. The view through this gate is extremely fine, and the group or tout ensemble perhaps unrivalled. Coxo observes, "A more pleasing asemblage of picturesque objects never entered into the composition of a landscape: the whole harmonises together, and produces an effect which neither the pen nor pencil can adequately delineate." The church of St. Mary was the chapel belonging to the ancient priory. It appears to have been originally built cruciform; but it has undergone so many alterations, that the regularity of the structure is destroyed. Though as a specimen of architecture, this edifice displays little that will strongly interest the lovers of that noble science, yet from the connection with remote times, and the numerous monumental mementoes of characters who proudly figured on the theatre of L., and stand honourably recorded in the annals of history, the visitor will find his mind disposed to attend to the "siste viator" of the inscribed or sculptured stone. The free grammar school was founded in the reign of Henry VIII., and endowed out of a portion of the revenues belonging to the priory, which are held in trust by the corporation. Abergavenny was once incorporated, a place of considerable trade, and of the first importance in the county: it is handsome and well built, consisting of several streets, and during the summer is the resort of numerous genteel people.

BRISTOL TO BIRMINGHAM, BY CHEPSTOW, TYNTERNE ABBEY, GOODRICH CROSS, ROSS, MALVERN, AND WORCESTER.

Among the most prominent objects presented to the inspection of the traveller in the course of this road, are the improvements effected to facilitate the passage of the Severn between Aust and Beachley, commonly called the Old Passage. The delay and inconvenience formerly occasioned by the want of sufficient landing-places in crossing this broad estuary, were, for many years, subjects of complaint on the part of the public. It, therefore, became a desideratum of importance to effect by some means an improvement in the communication, not only to expedite and render certain the conveyance of the mails, but also to assist the commercial and agricultural intercourse neces-	From Birmingham.	From * BRISTOL, Glouces., to * Beachley, above * * * See directions for crossing the Improved Old Passage Ferry, at page 5.	From Bristol	12¾ 82½ 12¾

sarily carried on between the whole of the west of England and South Wales. In order to put in practice this national object, a society of gentlemen, under the auspices and with the liberal assistance of the Duke of Beaufort, at their own expense erected stone piers and established a steam packet by which the conveyance of the London and Chepstow mail is greatly accelerated; and upon an investigation of the subject before a committee of the house of commons, the Old Passage, as a ferry, has been reported to the house as the most eligible point for the Milford mail also to cross the Severn. The improvements alluded to have been crowned with considerable suc-

one principal street, in which are many handsome houses. The town-hall, the county-gaol, the free-school, and St. Mary's church, are all very fine buildings, and highly deserve the attention of the traveller. Here was formerly a castle of considerable extent, whose ruins present an appearance of dilapidated grandeur, and afford evident proof of its original strength, some portions of the existing walls being above ten feet thick; and various relics still visible amidst stables, outhouses, and tenements, merit attention on account of their massive structure. Monmouth has a market on Saturday, and together with Uske and Newport, sends one member to parliament. This town gave birth to King Henry V., and also to the celebrated author of British history, Geoffrey of Monmouth. On the summit of Kyrin Hill, in the vicinity of Monmouth, a fine walk has been made, which ends in a delightful plain, crowned with a beautiful wood called Beaulieu Grove, through which walks are made, terminated by seats, presenting a most enchanting view of the surrounding country. In the centre of this eminence a pavilion has been erected, two stories high, intended as a naval monument, as well as a place of accommodation for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; its frieze is elegantly decorated with medallions and appropriate devices of the most eminent British admirals: the upper story has five windows, commanding views embracing about 300 miles in circumference, over Monmouth, Gloucester, and Hereford, besides Somerset, Glamorgan, Brecon, Radnor, Salop, and Worcester. The exquisite diversity of landscape here presented to the eye exceeds in description the power of language.

MONMOUTH, 1 m. distant, Troy House, Duke of Beaufort. This handsome mansion is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Trothy, and is said to have been built by the celebrated Inigo Jones; its interior is extremely commodious, and is far from being destitute of grandeur; but this seat derives its chief importance from the gardens, which are cultivated with a degree of energy seldom to be met with, and produce some of the most delicious fruits this country can boast.

From Bristol. ground. This church was built in the form of a cathedral, consisting of a nave, north and south aisles, transept, and choir, with a tower that formerly stood in the centre. The exterior of the building is fine, especially the façade of the western front: but the beauty of the interior must excite the admiration of the most stoical mind, and rivet the attention of the most tasteless observer. On the opening of the western door, the eye rapidly passes along the range of elegant columns which separated the nave and south aisle, and stretching under the sublime archæ that once supported the tower, is fixed on the grand eastern window at the termination of the choir. From the length of the nave, the height of the walls, the aspiring form of the pointed arches, and the size of the east window, which closes the perspective, the first impressions are those of grandeur and sublimity; but as these emotions subside, and we descend from the contemplation of the whole to the examination of the parts, we are no less struck with the regularity of the plan, the lightness of the architecture, and the delicacy of the ornaments: we feel that elegance is its characteristic, and that the whole is a combination of the beautiful and sublime. Though many of the columns have been demolished, and some of the windows and ornamental objects dilapidated, yet the character of all may be traced; for as it has been justly observed, in corresponding parts, always one remains to tell the story. To the decorations of art are now superadded the effects produced by time: some of the windows are wholly obscured by large masses of ivy, others are canopied, or the sides partially covered, while the tendrils twine in the tracery of some, creep along the walls, encircle the columns, form natural wreaths round the capitals, or hang down in pendulous tufts from their summits. The numerous mosses and lichens also lend their assistance from the crevices of the stones, to furnish those contrasting tints which tend to give a powerful effect to the appearance of a ruin. The flooring of enamelled figured tiles has been removed, and the earth now constitutes the natural pavement, as the sky does its canopy. On the ground lie scattered in various directions ornamented fragments of the once elegant groined roof, pieces of columns, friezes, sculptures, mutilated statues, and sepulchral stones sacred to the memory of heroes and religious persons, whose ashes have been deposited within these walls.

CHURCH STRETTON is situate in a valley, or rather a hollow, and apparently closed in by lofty mountains. The church is built in the form of a cross, with a tower in the centre. Here is a small old town-house, and a free-school for twenty boys. On the hills are fed vast quantities of sheep, which produce excellent wool, that is sold to the Yorkshire clothiers. A considerable trade is carried on in malt, and a number of the poor are employed in making a strong linen cloth, called hessens, used in packing hops and wool. The air is remarkably healthy, and the soil is a fine gravel. The rivulets produce excellent trout. Between Church Stretton and Little Stretton is an insulated hill between two others of much greater altitude, with deep en- trenchments on its summit, called Brocard's Castle. The approach to the house from the Ruabon road is rendered strikingly beautiful by a thick wood, apparently overhanging the banquetting-room, a handsome building standing on the bank of a murmuring brook, that, after having passed through some other parts of the estate, here skirts a spacious lawn of peculiar beauty. — 3 m. distant from Wrexham, Cocau, *E. BRISTOL TO MANCHESTER, BY CHEPSTOW, TYNTERNE ABBEY, MONMOUTH, HEREFORD, LUDLOW, AND SHREWSBURY.

The usual route from Bristol to Manchester, is through Gloucester, Kidderminster, Wolverhampton, Penkridge, Stafford, Stone, and Congleton; but the pleasure tourist will do well to adopt the diversified and very beautiful line of communication here pointed out, which, though a very few miles farther, has the advantage of passing through some of the finest scenery in the kingdom. The delay formerly incidental to the passage of the Severn having been obviated by the recent improvements at the Old Passage, the new road from Chepstow to Monmouth, by Tynterne Abbey, and the Iron Bridge over the river Wye, at Bigswear, has opened an eligible line through that unrivalled tract of country, the western bank of the Wye, the far-famed beauties of which have long been a theme of admiration. In another part of this Appendix, p. 4, the reader will find a short description of the pleasing little peninsula of Beachley, now rising into repute as a summer residence. Passing hence and pursuing the route to Chepstow, the traveller is struck with the magnificent ruins of Chepstow Castle, which from many points of this road are seen to the best advantage. Hence the traveller is conducted, by the same new and excellent road, to Bigswear; where the river Wye is crossed by an elegant iron bridge recently constructed; and thence to Monmouth and on to Manchester, by lines of good travelable road, that will be found amply described at the pages pointed out, in the body of the work.

From this sudden and lofty elevation, the Wye, and the rich scenery of its banks, are beheld to singular advantage; its varied beauties are indeed displayed in many points of view; while in another direction the bold estuary of the Severn presents itself to the eye of the spectator, rolling in majestic grandeur to its junction with the Bristol Channel, which here terminates the prospect. The interior is ornamented with a frieze carried round it, exhibiting medallions of the most eminent British admirals. A pleasing walk has been made to the summit of the hill; this is a level plain, covered with a beautiful wood, through which are cut six vistas, at the extremity of each, on the verge of the declivity, are placed seats, from whence may be enjoyed most delightful views of the surrounding country; but the most complete panorama of the extensive and beautiful scenery visible from hence is obtained from the windows of the banqueting-room in the tower, the extent, variety, magnificence, and grandeur of which exceed all description. HEREFORD TO WEYMOUTH, THROUGH BEACHLEY AND BRISTOL.

The improvements effected at the Old Passage, and the new road between Monmouth and Chepstow, materially facilitate the intercourse between Hereford and the counties of Somerset, Dorset, Devon, &c. The delay in crossing the Severn which long formed the ground of objection to traversing the country in this direction, being now obviated by the improvements above alluded to, the traveller may avail himself of this eligible line of communication through a beautiful part of the county of Monmouth, and save the expence and loss of time necessarily consumed in taking the circuitous route, hitherto usually travelled, by Gloucester, &c.	From Weymo.	From	From Herfor.

LIVERPOOL TO DEVONPORT.

The importance of the leading points on this road, necessarily render it a very interesting line of communication, as uniting in one route all the principal commercial ports in the west of England. The road from Bristol to Liverpool will be found amply described in the body of the work, and repeated again at pages 25 to 29 of the Appendix as here referred to, with this difference, that the traveller is there directed to pursue the new line of road from Chepstow to Monmouth by Tynterne Abbey and the iron bridge over the river Wye, at Bigsweat. The annals of this town record no events of eminent historical interest; yet the adventurous lustre which it has obtained from its inhabitant, John Kyrle, the celebrated "Man of Ross," has given it a degree of attraction far beyond its local importance. The house in which Mr. Kyrle resided is now the King's Arms, a respectable inn, near the entrance of the town from Gloucester. rality; but they are not preserved in the order which his memory demands. The church is a handsome building, having a tower, and well proportioned spire, rising from the west end: it contains several monuments of the Rudhalls. The views from the church-yard, and contiguous Prospect Ground, are much celebrated: immediately below the eye the river forms a fine semicircle, at one of the extremities of which are the ruins of Wilton Castle, and beyond it an extensive and luxuriant vale, terminated by the distant mountains of Pembroke-shire. Since the beauties of picturesque scenery have engaged so much popular attention, this town has become a kind of favourite resort for the numerous summer parties who visit the Wey; and boats, &c. are kept here for the accommodation of those who make excursions down the river.

LEDBURY is situated upon a declivity within a valley, about 1 m. from the river Leddon, and consists of two streets crossing each other at right angles: the houses are mostly composed of timber covered with lath and plaster, and many of them have projecting stories; but the more modern ones are respectable brick buildings. The church is an elegant and spacious structure of Saxon origin, but having undergone many alterations, has lost some portion of its original character. This town has a good market on Tuesday, and formerly sent two members to parliament, but surrendered that privilege on the plea of inability to support them. From the Wytych, which is a road cut through the rock, on the summit of the Malvern, the view is grand, extensive, and beautiful beyond description. On a clear day, with the naked eye, fifteen counties in England and Wales, four cities, and the shores of the Irish channel, besides innumerable towns and villages, and two beautiful rivers, are clearly distinguishable.

MAENTWROG, 2 m. distant near the village of Festiniog, which is situated in a most enchanting vale, are the falls of the Cynfael, one of them about 300 yards above, and the other the same distance below, a neat rustic stone bridge. At the upper fall, the water foams over three steep rocks, into a deep black basin, overshadowed by the adjoining eminences; the other is formed by a broad expanse of water that precipitates itself down a shelving rock about 40 feet high, it then rushes along a narrow rocky chasm, and at last, gaining a smoother bed, winds through the mazes of the vale. Between the bridge and the lower cataract a singular columnar rock stands in the bed of the river, called Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit, from whence the peasantry inform us, that a magician of that name used to deliver his nightly incantations. The vale is particularly salubrious, and abounds with many delightful views; the mountains flanking its sides are mostly covered with venerable oaks, and have their bases fringed with thick brushwood.

TAN Y BWLCH INN. Tan y Bwlch Hall, Wm. Griffith Oakley, Esq. The mansion is a handsome structure situated on the acclivity of a mountain embosomed in woods of luxuriant growth that enrich this part of the country, and form a fine contrast to the bleak and barren tract between this and Pontaberglassllyn. — Beyond Tan y Bwlch Inn, over the hill, see an arm of the sea, called Trawth Mawr, a very fine object, with the mountains over it.

PONTABERGLASSLLYN, or the bridge at the confluence of the Blue Pool, is a single arch built over a rapid mountain torrent that divides the two counties of Merioneth and Caernarvon; just above it the river falls down a craggy break about 12 feet high; this is called the Salmon Leap, and being only a few miles from the sea, is frequented by great numbers who come up the river towards the close of the year for the purpose of depositing their spawn. The surrounding scenery is magnificently grand; the road winds romantically through a narrow stony vale above which the dark perpendicular cliffs rise on each side, and with their disjointed fragments appear to threaten destruction to the travellers who dare venture through the passage beneath, which was scarcely wide enough for a carriage road, and the bed of the river. This, however, by dint of incredible labour, was lately sufficiently widened to allow carriages to pass each other, and is bounded on the lower side by a stone wall.

ference of 500 miles: from hence far below the feet are seen interspersed with lakes those huge rocks that were before looked up to with astonishment; to the north, Snowdon and its dependencies close the scene; on the west lies the whole curve of the bay of Cardigan, dashing its white breakers against the craggy coasts of Merioneth, and bounded at a vast distance by the Caernarvon mountains; the southern horizon is bounded by Plinlimmon, the channel peeping through the openings of the Brecon mountains; while towards the east, the view is carried over the lake of Bala, the two Arennig mountains, the two Arrans, and the long chain of the Ferwyn mountains to the Breidden hills on the confines of Shropshire, where, in the distant horizon, the Wrekin is dimly seen raising its solitary head from the plain of Salop.

From Dolgelly you may travel to Caernarvon through Barmouth, Harleigh, and Tremadock, pages 167 and 168.

BEDDGELEERT, about 4 m. distant, Snowdon, which appears to have been held in as high veneration among the Britons as the celebrated Ida among the Cretans, and Parnassus connected with the classic fame of the Achaians; like that, it is bifurcate, and was doubtless formerly an object of adoration and invocation. From the summit it seems propped by four buttresses, between which are as many deep hollows, each, excepting one, having one or more lakes lodged in its distant bottom. The best route to the summit of this immense mountain is to take a boat from Cwm y Glo Llanrug up the lower Llan Beris lake, and land on the little isthmus between the pools; just below the old castle, Dol Eglarn, take a guide, and ascend by Caunant Mawr, the great chasm, where there is a fine waterfall; climb up the south side of the ridge separating Llan Beris Hollow from Gwm Brynwg, another hollow or mountain flat, and proceed, keeping in sight Llynduyr Arddw, which you leave on the right; you then ascend along a steep place called Lleched y Re, from thence to the celebrated cold spring or well, which is within a mile of the highest peak. The summit of this mountain is 3571 feet above the level of the sea, and not more than 5 or 6 yards in diameter, it is surrounded by a kind of wall of great use to sit upon and enjoy the extensive prospects around, which on a clear day are the most picturesque and unbounded imaginable, the county of Chester, the hills of Yorkshire, part of the north of England, Ireland, and Scotland, being distinctly seen; the isles of Man and Anglesea lie spread out beneath, like a map, with every rill visible; but when the summit is enveloped in a mist,

The celebrated slate quarry near this place is generally allowed to be the greatest curiosity of Caernarvonshire: here the many immense chasms formed by separating and extracting the slate from the main body, excite the astonishment of the beholder, and the wonderful power of machinery will also be viewed with considerable pleasure as exemplified in the iron tram-road, constructed for the more easy and expeditious conveyance of the waggons to and from the quay, at the expence of 170,000*l.* The net profits of these quarries, at a moderate calculation, amount to 15,000*l.* per annum, as no less than 100 tons per diem are conveyed to Port Penrhyn, and from 500 to 600 tons are shipped every week.

CHIRK is a very populous village, situated on the brow of a limestone hill amidst a number of coal and lime works. The church-yard contains seven aged yews, and the church many monuments to the memory of different branches of the Myddelton family of Chirk Castle. In the year 1164, this village was the scene of one of the most severe conflicts ever witnessed between the English and the Welsh. The surrounding country is remarkably beautiful, and at LLANDYGAI. Penrhyn, G. H. D. Pennant, Esq. This elegant mansion appears to have been built in the reign of Henry VI., on the site of an ancient palace belonging to Roderick Molywng. It lately underwent many alterations from designs by Wyatt, at which time the whole was new fronted with yellow brick, giving it the appearance of stone, and the chapel was removed into a pleasing grove a few yards distant. The interior of this building is extremely neat, and the chancel elegant; the pulpit is of cedar, with three beautiful carved oak panels, and the large eastern window contains some brilliant stained glass. The buildings enclose a large area or quadrangle with gateway, tower, a vast hall, saloon, and many very elegant apartments. The grounds are extensive and well wooded; they command many uncommonly fine views, receiving additional beauty from the river Ogwen, which here forms several cascades seen through the vistas in the plantations from the front of the house. The stables rank among the first in the kingdom in point of elegance and accommodation; they are fronted with patent slate, and the same material forms the fence of the park, which is entered by an elegant and highly-finished gateway resembling a Roman triumphal arch. — 1 m. from the above, Lime Grove, James Wyatt, Esq. The mansion is a particularly neat structure, delightfully environed by groves of trees, which shelter it from the winds, and present a very romantic appearance.

CORWEN, a neat small town situate under a rock at the foot of the Berwyn mountains, on the

about 2 m. distant, on the road to Ruabon, is presented one of the most beautiful landscapes ever beheld. In the immediate neighbourhood of Chirk is the aqueduct of the Ellesmere canal, that exemplifies in a very high degree the extraordinary skill and ingenuity of Thomas Telford, Esq., the justly-celebrated engineer, under whose superintendence this great work, originally projected by him, was ultimately executed.

MONTGOMERY was formerly surrounded with walls, and possessed a castle, which stood upon the extremity of an eminence at the north side of the town. The origin of this fortress is attributed to Baldwin, lieutenant of the marches to William the Conqueror. In the time of the civil wars it was garrisoned for the king by Lord Herbert of Chirbury, who commanded the forces; but on the approach of the parliamentary army, he immediately surrendered. Shortly after, the king's troops advancing, a dreadful battle was fought here, in which the royal party was defeated. The castle then met with a fate similar to that of other fortresses that had been defended for the king, being dismantled by order of government. From the existing vestiges of this building it is almost impossible to ascertain its original extent. Not far from the castle, situated on a hill, is a stupendous fortified camp, and at the bottom of the hill is a small fortification, with a raised artificial mound in one part of it. This town is pleasantly situated in the hollow of an eminence; it is clean, principally built with brick, and by no means inelegant; it has no any trade, neither is it a thoroughfare to any place of consequence, which circumstances may account for its diminutive size as a county town; but it is well calculated for the residence of persons possessed of small fortunes, who are friendly to retirement, and wish to make a little property supply many necessary wants. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas, and is an elegant structure, containing a few monuments worthy of observation. The county gaol is a modern strong stone building, situated near the site of the castle; and the guildhall, placed in the upper part of the town, is also a handsome structure, where the sessions are held alternately with Welch Pool. southern bank of the river Dee, contains a church in which there is an ancient monument to the memory of one of its vicars: in the church-yard is also a very old stone pillar, that has been much ornamented, and not far from it stands a good almshouse for six clergymen's widows. Corwen is much resorted to by anglers during the season, as the river abounds with trout, grayling, and salmon. Opposite the town, on the other side of the river, is a British post called Caer Drewyn, a circle of loose stones upon the summit of a steep hill about half a mile in circumference, with the remains of circular habitations within. It is supposed that Owen Gwynedd occupied this post, while Henry II. was encamped on the opposite side of the vale, and it was afterwards a retreat of the celebrated Owen Glyndwr, whose memory is highly revered in this neighbourhood, long the scene of his military exploits and hospitality. The encampment commands a delightful view of the vales of Glyn-Dwrdwr and Edeirniou, and may be distinguished from the church-yard in the direction of the village of Cromwyd. Market on Tuesday and Friday.

LLANGOLEN is a small town situate in a vale of the same name. It has a market on Saturday, but contains nothing really worthy of notice except the bridge, which is a handsome and very curious structure, and was erected by John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, in the early part of the 14th century. It consists of five irregular pointed arches, through only one of which the water generally runs; but it has there formed a deep chasm in the bed of the river, which is one continued surface of solid rock. The church is not remarkable for the beauty of its architecture; but the tourist cannot fail to be pleased with the view of the river Dee, obtained from its elevated and spacious church-yard. The neighbourhood of Llangollen has been always celebrated by the lover of picturesque scenery as one of the most romantic and beautiful in North Wales, and the inhabitants of the town derive no small portion of their maintenance from the influx of wealthy strangers, who take up their temporary abode here, in order to visit the places in the vicinity, and survey the various beauties of its far-famed vale.

WELCH POOL, it is not improvable, derived its name from a piece of water formerly situated on a waste, but now enclosed by the boundary of Powis Park; this is of a black colour, and about 300 feet deep, though the ignorant believe it to be bottomless, and place implicit confidence in an old gossip's story, that it will some time overflow and deluge the town. The houses are remarkably neat, and some of them are rather handsome erections; they are situated at the bottom and on the ascent of a gentle eminence, and the uniformity, and prevailing cleanliness of the place gives it a very inviting appearance. The church is a handsome structure, but stands so extremely low, that the cemetery almost equals the height of the building. The county hall has also an elegant appearance; it is a modern erection, with a colonnade and pilasters of stone, built at the expense of a few gentlemen who were anxious to ease the county rate. Great quantities of flannel are manufactured here, and a very large supply is also brought down from the hilly countries for the purpose of sale, in the market held on every alternate Monday for the disposal of that commodity, besides which there is one for provisions on Monday, weekly.
