TO

HIS MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY,

THE KING.

SIRE,

PERMITTED to lay at Your Majesty's feet this humble tribute of grateful respect, I can only regret my inability to render it as deserving Your Majesty's patronage, as, gifted with the power so to do, my inclinations would suggest. On the utility of such works to all ranks of Your Majesty's subjects, it is unnecessary for me to expatiate; and the numerous editions which the work of the late Lieut. Col. Paterson has already passed through, furnish ample proof of the estimation in which the book, as originally constructed by that gentleman, was held.

That the present may not be found wanting in additional claims to Your Majesty's favour and protection, I beg permission to state, that it has been entirely reconstructed; that it is accompanied, among other novelties, with remarks illustrative of the arts, manufactures, and commerce, of this portion of Your Majesty's dominions, to the energies of which it is in no inconsiderable degree calculated to contribute, from the increased facilities of communication it presents, between the various manufacturing and commercial towns throughout the kingdom. It will on this account, however, I feel persuaded, be not the less acceptable to Your Majesty; while an enumeration of the antiquities, natural curiosities, the splendid mansions of the nobility, rich in statuary, and decorated with the choicest productions of foreign and native artists, added to the repeated occurrence of an enchanting and almost endless variety of scenery, are, taken in the aggregate, incontestable evidence, that this island presents a coup-d'œil at once grand and interesting, and of which it may with truth be averred, there is no parallel in the empire of any other sovereign.

That Your Majesty may long continue to reign in the uninterrupted exercise of your royal prerogative in the enjoyment of these realms, and crowned with every blessing, is the sincere prayer of

YOUR MAJESTY'S

Most humble,

And most dutiful Subject and Servant,

EDWARD MOGG.

THE additions to the present edition consist of an Appendix of considerable interest, added in 1828, to which are annexed such additional roads as have been executed subsequent to that period.

As to pass unnoticed the various communications the Editor has received, upon the subject of seats, would be to treat with apparent neglect a class of contributors to whom he is under obligations for their several favours, he avails himself of the present occasion to say, he anxiously awaits the opportunity, which time alone can afford him, of evincing in return his gratitude.

It now, therefore, merely remains for him to remark, that, actuated by a desire to render his book the most complete of its kind, his endeavours to that effect will continue unremitting, and his exertions to merit a continuance of the patronage he has hitherto experienced cease only with his existence.

PREFACE.

By the death of the late proprietor, and consequent transfer of the property to other hands, the task of Editor to the present edition of PATERSON'S ROADS has devolved on me, a circumstance that will account for the materially altered appearance of the work, in which a change so complete has been effected, as will be found, upon investigation, to have left little of the original save the name.

From the moment it was confided to my care, until the hour of its completion, a period of nearly three years, it has engaged my almost undivided attention. I commenced by an arrangement of the materials collected, upon a plan which, from its simplicity, I considered could not fail to be clear and intelligible, and that should immediately present to the eye of the reader the whole of the roads, marked in a manner completely characteristic: for this purpose it was necessary to re-model the Book, and the system adopted being briefly noticed, I shall refer for an explanation of the same to another place.

The plan of the present edition is simply this: it is an attempt, as far as the nature of the work will allow, to Map the ground; and so closely has it been acted upon, and faithfully followed, that instead of meeting with seats, as heretofore, mixed up in one confused and heterogeneous mass, they now succeed each other, with very few exceptions, arranged in the precise order in which they occur upon the road; and thus, in this part of the work, it will, I trust, be readily admitted, has a great improvement been attained.

The turnpike gates and bridges, objects in themselves imposing upon every road, are here given in a form calculated to impress upon the traveller a more correct idea of his relative situation than would probably occur to the most intelligent, from the simple notice of the name of a river, or the more imperfect substitute of the letters T. G.: to these have been added the hand, which, as the universal symbol of direction throughout the kingdom, cannot, I conceive, fail to mark the coincidence of place, far more effectively than the small single letters r or l, characters of themselves so very inefficient, not to notice their indistinct appearance, as will, it is to be hoped, readily reconcile the reader to the change.

The very striking manner in which every road in the Book is at present designated, marking, at the same time, if from London, the point of admeasurement, and upon all occasions, the principal places passed through, is an improvement that, it is presumed, will pointedly arrest the reader's attention, as giving, in a manner completely original, the route described by its distinguishing features, as BATH by Calne, or BATH by Devizes

I shall next proceed to notice the alteration adopted in giving the distances, and my reasons for a departure from the old, and introduction of the present system. To do this effectually, I must refer to the former editions of Paterson, where the figures, marking the points of admeasurement, are given in two columns; the first denoting the number of miles from one village to another, the second the total from London: in the present edition the last-mentioned has been considered to be sufficient for the information of the traveller, whose arithmetic will, it is to be apprehended, suffer no very severe taxation in the calculation of distance between "Popham Lane 51", and "Sutton 59"; and though every case is perhaps not equally clear, when the divisions run into halves and quarters of miles, yet he may, by discarding the fractions at each point, and taking the mile figures only, arrive, as nearly as is necessary upon all occasions, at the intermediate distance from place to place. The appearance of the two columns, side by side, as in the old edition already noticed, though intended to elucidate, in the clearest manner, the object of enquiry, was perhaps not always in its effect as successful as might be wished; an association of figures, if not fatiguing, is certainly not the most pleasing subject upon which the eye can repose: and as such, I deemed it expedient to adopt a separation. But if, in the abandonment of one feature of the work, the necessity for which is at least questionable, I shall, in the estimation of some, be considered as guilty of an infraction, I have the vanity to hope that the introduction, in the present edition, of the back distance, in a form completely novel, will be viewed as an important improvement, and, as an advantage unpossessed by any work of a similar kind, be esteemed an addition of no inconsiderable value. By this arrangement, the utility of which is clearly manifest, the traveller is, at any given point, presented with the actual distance already performed, and that remaining to be executed for the completion of his journey; in other words, the book, thus constructed, works, to use a common expression, backwards and forwards, and thence becomes as useful in returning from, as convenient in travelling to any place in the kingdom.

Another striking feature in the present edition, is a descriptive sketch of every city and market town throughout the work, and though this may to some, perhaps, appear matter of no real utility, it will, when duly considered, be found to possess advantages that a very slight investigation of the subject will render sufficiently obvious. For example, the character of the soil on which they stand is not marked by features of greater variety than, upon examination, will be proved to exist in the several cities and market towns herein described; a forcible illustration of which (and many may be adduced) occurs in comparing the city of St. David's, in Wales, a mere wretched village, with the elegant city of Bath, in England; or the spacious market town of Guildford, in Surrey, with the very insignificant town of Southall, in Middlesex; the former justly considered respectable, whether viewed in regard to the opulence of its inhabitants, its substantial buildings, or the business there transacted; the latter a country village of the inferior order, and remarkable only for its cattle market. These contrarieties admitted to exist, it follows as a matter of course, that, to obtain information upon such points must necessarily become a desideratum with every traveller, as enabling him to regulate a journey, whether of business or pleasure, accompanied by less of delay and disappointment, and under circumstances far more advantageous, than could be expected to attend the uninformed, when travelling in complete ignorance of the road or its accommodations, and who, so circumstanced, would probably encounter all the inconveniences of bad beds, bad stabling, and a long train of evils, the occurrence of which he is enabled, by a previous cou-

sultation of these articles, on many occasions to avoid, and in most instances to prevent.

To relieve the work from the dull, dry tedium of detail, and to render it at the same time acceptable to the reader of taste, I have annexed an account of the principal seats, as they severally occur, subject to such general arrangement as I deemed calculated to improve the descriptive part, without deranging, or displacing, by a too distant removal, the order of succession in which they stand. Of these, while in the relation I may in some instances be considered to have travelled too far, I have much greater reason to suspect that, with the majority of proprietors at least, I shall stand condemned for not having sufficiently extended my labours; to such complainants I answer, that in the execution of this portion of the book, I have kept strictly in view the doing ample justice to every subject; that to describe, as might be wished, by the possessors of the various seats herein enumerated, would far exceed the limits of any work intended to form the companion of the tourist; and that these considerations on the one hand, and limitation of space precluding the possibility of further extension on the other, must, for such charge of delinquency, plead my excuse. Of this, however, the reader may be certain, that to ensure a strict accuracy on these subjects, as in every other part of the work, has been my chief aim, and for which purpose the best and most expensive works have been consulted. That the several accounts of prospects, antiquities, curiosities, historic events, anecdotes, &c. &c. with which this edition is enriched, exclusive of such as have been the result of my own personal observation, are all drawn from the most esteemed writers, is a fact that will be best substantiated by a mention of some of the authors consulted for that purpose. These to particularize, a bare enumeration of which would far exceed the limits of a preface, must be considered superfluous; I shall therefore content myself with observing, that among a multitude of others, extracts drawn from the pens of Britton, Brayley, Gilpin, Shaw, Marshall, Maton, and Warner, as tourists, and the more elaborate works of Polwhele, Ormerod, and Dallaway, as historians, have supplied me with subjects, the originality and sterling value of which, given under such authority, furnish the best proofs of an undoubted and legitimate source.

Of the materials consulted in the machinery, if I may be allowed the expression, or, in other words, the arrangement of the several roads, and adaptation of seats throughout the work, to the extent thereof, my own Map of the Country Forty-five miles round London, recently completed in a style of unusual beauty, and at once worthy of the subject it embraces, has formed the basis; for the more distant lines, my Survey of the High Roads (the first part of which is already before the public), the documents collected for a large Map of England, recently completed, together with, I believe, an assemblage of almost every work, whether book or map, of modern and respectable authority, aided by a very considerable number of new measurements, executed under my own immediate eye, and at an unlimited expence on the part of the proprietors, together with the adoption of the few lines which remain unaffected by change in the original work, form, collectively, the foundation upon which has been erected the present superstructure.

In obtaining the very respectable and extensive collection of names which, either as owners or occupiers of seats, grace the pages of this work, I feel it necessary to state, the utmost diligence has been used, and that the whole have been supplied by persons whose residence among, and immediate knowledge of the parties, place beyond the possibility of doubt the authenticity of their several communications, which, it will readily be perceived, has enabled me to submit (making the allowance for unavoidable errors) an enumeration of proprietors on a most extended scale, at once consistent, and of undoubted originality.

I have now arrived at a point, the execution of which I find attended with more of embarrassment than has hitherto presented itself in all the difficulties I have encountered in the progress of this laborious work, and to which indeed I confess myself utterly incompetent, — the ability to convey to the minds of all to whom I have had occasion to apply for assistance and information, the sense of obligation with which I feel impressed for the many and invaluable favours conferred upon me, and which by their liberal communication have mainly contributed to the advance and improvement of this undertaking. Felicity of expression is a talent rarely attainable, and the lot of few, and the powers of eloquence are perhaps never less successfully exercised, than in an attempt to describe the feelings of gratitude. Influenced by these sentiments, and desirous to acknowledge, if incompetent to discharge, the numerous obligations I am under, in many instances, to persons known only by the generous freedom with which they have answered my enquiries, I can alone regret the impossibility imposed by separation of personally acknowledging their kindness, the effect of which no lapse of time can ever efface from my recollection.

To the Right Honourable The Earl of Bridgewater I have to express my obligations, enhanced by the very handsome manner in which the same was conveyed, for the communication of the new line from North Church to Dunstable, executed at His Lordship's sole expence, an example well worthy of imitation, as it afforded employment to the labouring poor during a period of severe pressure, and effected at the same time a public improvement of great and acknowledged utility.

To Sir Henry Parnell, Bart. M. P. for the communication of the Parliamentary line from London to Holyhead, my best thanks are due, not alone for the matter, but also for the manner in which every particular was conveyed, as well as for the zeal and avidity evinced by him in contributing for the information of the public, through the medium of this work, much valuable and original information.

To Thomas Telford, Esq., a gentleman whose works as an engineer continue to panegyricize his name, I am alike obliged for his extreme politeness upon all occasions, and liberal supply of materials, which, while exhibiting a series of improvements, the effect of his genius, carry with them the conviction of superior ability, and incontestably prove that to his perseverance no obstacle, however formidable, proves insurmountable.

To John Loudon M^cAdam, Esq. I am indebted for the communication of an entirely new line from Sheffield to Manchester, as also to his son, Loudon M^cAdam, Esq. for the details of the same, together with other improvements, the particulars of which arrived too late for insertion.

To Henry Walter, Esq. of Holyport, near Maidenhead, I take this opportunity of publicly expressing the very great obligation I am under for a large mass of materials, granted in a manner that at once do honour to his liberality, and which derive an additional value from the certainty that, in the district alluded to, an extent of many miles, PATERSON'S ROADS, but for his kindness, had never arrived at its present state of perfection.

I shall now consign the book to its fate, accompanied with this remark, that, disdaining to build a reputation upon the imperfections of others, and far more desirous of an indulgence for my own, I have, in its construction, deserted the beaten path, and, by decreasing the number of references with which the original abounded, and adopting a methodical arrangement throughout, have endeavoured to attain something at least in the way of improvement, and am thence induced to hope that the plan which, by the explanation, is rendered perfectly intelligible, being once defined, will succeed in convincing the reader I have reduced to a degree of comparative simplicity, a work necessarily complicated in its nature, but which, thus constructed, becomes clearly and readily understood.

EDWARD MOGG.

TO THE EIGHTEENTH EDITION.

THE increasing demand for this work, and general estimation in which it is held, afford a gratifying proof to the Editor that his endeavours to render it an agreeable travelling companion have proved successful; and he trusts may add, that, allowing for the manifold subjects it embraces, to the fidelity and general accuracy that have hitherto characterized its pages, he may reasonably assign the very extensive patronage with which, while under his superintendence, it has been so highly honoured.

If the preceding editions were deemed worthy of public favour, and that is happily placed beyond a doubt, the present will be found to possess still stronger claims to consideration, from the increased degree of interest infused throughout, by the introduction of much valuable, novel, and original information; this has been obtained from a variety of sources, all of undoubted authenticity, but is chiefly the result of an enlightened and extensive correspondence.

Briefly to notice the additions made to the present volume will suffice to show that the Editor's endeavours have been unremitting to attain perfection; and by the insertion of every thing in the shape of information, leave no subject untouched, that to the intelligent traveller might seem desirable; in this light he trusts, among other novelties, will be viewed the table annexed to the work, wherein will be found the population returns, arrival and departure of the mail, &c. &c. : he has also been enabled to make considerable addition to the roads, many of which are new, and are, together with various other improved lines of communication, now first presented to the public; an improved map of the country in the vicinity of the Lakes has likewise been added.

The topographical sketches of the several cities and market-towns have been for the most part re-written, the whole of them revised, and all rendered accordant to the latest period of information.*

The list of seats, which now boasts an addition of upwards of one thousand, is given with the same attention to accuracy that has distinguished the preceding editions of this work ; and as, in the table before alluded to, a correct return of the population will be found, so upon its pages may be traced with equal truth, not only the mansions and family seats of the nobility, but also the residences of the gentry, upon a scale far more extensive than any that, he has reason to believe, has hitherto appeared : thus improved, this work, heretofore considered as a travelling companion only, will now be found to assume a new character ; and, as containing the country address of every gentleman in the kingdom, be henceforth found as useful in the office of the legal professor and commercial trader, as convenient in the carriage of the pleasure tourist.

In conclusion he begs to convey the assurance that his best efforts have been used to render his book complete, and will, he hopes, ensure for it a continuance of the patronage it has hitherto experienced. That occasional errors may be found he feels it impossible to deny ; but these, when compared with the immense catalogue of names that grace his pages, and variety of subjects with which they are charged, will prove few in number and of trifling import ; and he takes pleasure in the announcement, that by the liberal assistance and generous support that have greeted him from all quarters, he is enabled to send forth the present volume into the world, in a state as nearly perfect as the nature of the subject will admit.

It now only remains for him to confess his obligations to the noblemen and gentlemen who have honoured him with their several communications during its progress, and to whose generous aid, he is proud to acknowledge, the present work is indebted for many valuable improvements. To express the sense of gratitude with which he feels impressed for all the favours he has received, would far exceed the power of language, and his pen falls paralysed in the attempt ; simply to enumerate them, from the very extensive correspondence in which, during the progress of the work, he became engaged, would lead him far beyond his present limits ; he cannot, however, omit the opportunity of returning his humble yet grateful thanks to The Most Noble The Marquis of Bristol ; Rt. Hon. The Lord Rolle ; Rt. Hon. The Lord Cawdor ; Rt. Hon. The Lord Clifford ; Rt. Hon. R. Peel, M. P. ; Rt. Hon. W. Huskisson, M. P. ; Rt. Hon. W. Sturges Bourne, M. P. ; Rt. Hon. Sir J. Nicholl, M. P. ; Rt. Hon. W. Fremantle, M. P. ; Rt. Hon. R. P. Carew ; Sir M. Cholmeley, Bart. ; Sir C. Cockerell, Bart. M. P. ; Sir H. Parnell, Bart. M. P. ; Sir

* It may not be improper to observe that some of these were written in the summer of 1825, and consequently prior to the period of general distress which subsequently pervaded the country. It falls not within the province of the Editor to attempt a divination of this so sudden change ; political discussion he utterly disclaims, and trusts he may reasonably be excused an opinion upon a subject that appears to have alike puzzled the philosopher, statesman, and political economist ; indeed he had passed unnoticed, though not unregretted, these instances of unfortunate occurrence, but that the articles alluded to were produced under very different circumstances than those in which certain districts have since been placed ; and it is simply with the view of apologizing for whatever of inconsistency might be deemed apparent in the account of manufacturing towns where represented as flourishing, that he has been induced to submit the foregoing remarks. He cannot, however, quit this subject without expressing his earnest hope that under the guidance of Providence this kingdom will still continue to flourish ; that his most glowing pictures of trade and prosperity may ere long be more than realized ; and that, in common with every well-wisher of his country, he may speedily witness it in the full and complete resumption of its well known and wonted dignity.

H. Martin, Bart. ; Sir B. Codrington, Bart. ; Admiral Sir T. B. Martin, M. P. ; J. Calcraft, Esq. M. P. ; R. Hart Davis, Esq. M. P. ; W. Rickford, Esq. M. P. ; T. Whitmore, Esq. M. P. ; D. Sykes, Esq. M. P. ; O. Williams, Esq. M. P. ; D. Gilbert, Esq. M. P. ; M. Ure, Esq. M. P. ; W. Dickinson, Esq. M. P. ; C. Taylor, Esq. M. P. ; E. Rogers, Esq. M. P. ; R. S. Paul, Esq. ; Gen. Marriott ; Col. Dalrymple ; Col. Campbell ; G. H. Cherry, Esq. ; W. Williams, Esq. ; D. Giles, Esq. ; J. F. Barham, Esq. ; A. Donovan, Esq. ; A. Goddard, Esq. ; W. Rashleigh, Esq. ; E. Divett, Esq. ; and H. Vizard, Esq. ; for the condescension extended towards him in reply to his solicitations, and to whose powerful influence he is bound to acknowledge his book owes much of originality, and no inconsiderable share of improvement.

He is not less obliged to the kindness of a host of friends, whose zeal to serve him is evinced in their several valuable contributions distributed throughout the work, and to whom he regrets that limitation of space precludes the possibility of individually returning his thanks.

To the public he owes a heavy debt of gratitude, for the unbounded patronage with which they have honoured his book ; and in acknowledging it, he avails himself of the opportunity to say, that as no pains or expense have been spared to render it the most complete work of the kind, no effort of his will hereafter be wanting that can possibly conduce to its future improvement.

ADVERTISEMENT.

It has already been observed, (see Preface, p. [9],) that in collecting the names which are annexed, as owners or occupiers, to the several seats throughout the work, the utmost diligence has been used, and that the Editor's exertions have been unremitting to obtain upon this subject the very best information : it is also submitted that the work will evince in this department considerable amendment, and that the present edition will be found, as it regards consistency, infinitely superior to the original, in which, it must be acknowledged, there was great room for improvement. That his book is, however, wholly free from error, he is far from wishing to anticipate ; on the contrary, among the multitude of names that do honour to its pages, he is well aware that, in defiance of his best efforts to prevent them, occasional inaccuracies will nevertheless arise ; he is, however, consoled in the reflection that, by the candid reader, perfection, in no case attainable, will scarcely be expected in a work of this kind, which, from its very nature, becomes subject to perpetual change. Time and the force of circumstance are hourly interfering with his arrangements, as exhibited in the fate of Wanstead and Fonthill. The Patrons of this work are therefore entreated, that upon the detection of error or change of residence, a notice of the same may be transmitted to the Editor, who declines receiving, for obvious reasons, all anonymous information, but begs leave to add, that communications, accompanied by name and address, will be thankfully received, and meet immediate attention, if directed to

EXPLANATION. — ABBERFORD is in Yorkshire ; has a market on Monday ; the direct road to it will be found at page 228 ; the inn which supplies post-horses is the Swan ; and its direct distance from London is 186 miles. Abberford will be found among the Cross Roads at page 447.

Where there is more than one road leading to any place of note, the different routes are all pointed out ; as ABERGELEY is in Denbighshire ; has a market on Saturday ; the route by Chester is at page 193, and the distance from London is 224 miles ; the route by Shrewsbury is at page 161, and the distance from London is 220 miles. There are no cross roads to or from Abergeley.

ABERGAVENTNY is in Monmouthshire, has a market on Tuesday and Saturday ; the inns which furnish post-horses are the Angel and the Greyhound ; the route by Mitchel Dean and Monmouth is to be found at page 141, and its distance is 146 miles ; that by Ross and Monmouth is at page 121, and the distance from London is 151. The cross roads which pass through Abergavenny are described at pages 352, 490.

II.

Explanation of the Roads.

The general plan of the different routes is explained immediately before the commencement of the road from LONDON to DOVER; but in order to be more explicit, the following example of the road from LONDON to WOOLWICH is given by way of illustration, accompanied with such observations as will, it is presumed, render the whole perfectly plain and intelligible.

VAUXHALL Vauxhall Gardens. The time when this enchanting place of amusement was first opened for the entertainment of the public, is not easy to be ascertained; but in the reign of Queen Anne, it appears to have been a place of great public resort; for in the Spectator, No. 383, dated May 20, 1712, Mr. Addison has introduced his friend Sir Roger de Coverley, as accompanying him in a voyage from the Temple Stairs to Vauxhall, then termed Spring Gardens. Of late years the season commences in June, and terminates in August, during which the Gardens are open 3 nights a week, viz. Monday, Wednesday, and Friday; the price of admission is 4s. Vauxhall Gardens are unquestionably the most celebrated public gardens in Europe, and, under the management of the present proprietors, have received many very considerable alterations, by which they have been greatly improved.	10 $\frac{1}{2}$	10 $\frac{1}{2}$

PECKHAM, in the village, The Clock House, John Dalton, Esq.
WOOLWICH. Here is an extensive dock-yard, containing accommodations for 4000 individuals, the number frequently employed in war time, independent of several hundred convicts, who are stationed in hulks moored in the river. The church, from its situation on an eminence, commands a fine view of the dock-yard and the river Thames; and the town also possesses several dissenting meeting-houses and charitable institutions, besides a small theatre. The royal arsenal, formerly called the Warren, is, in time of peace, the grand depot of naval ordnance; it includes nearly 60 acres, and contains various piles of building, among which are the foundry, and late Military Academy; nearly adjoining the former is the laboratory, where bombs are charged, cartridges made, &c. The new Military Academy, about one mile from the town, is a noble castellated building, with wings, erected from designs by Wyatt; and the Artillery barracks, on the northern brow of the common, form, together with their offices, a most extensive and magnificent pile.

The measurements, which are taken in miles, halves, and quarters of miles, are arranged in two columns: that on the right hand, which is to be used in travelling out of town, showing the distance of every place in the road from London; while that on the left hand, intended to be used on the return only, exhibits the distance calculated from the last place on the road, from whence

it is remeasured in the same way back to the metropolis, as shown in the preceding example, where, in the right hand column, Woolwich appears to be $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles from London, and in the left, Hyde Park Corner, as measured from Woolwich, is of course $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles; thus far the two extreme points serve for an explanation of the whole; but as the traveller will not always have the advantage of a complete road under his eye, the following illustration will serve to develop the plan of the work throughout, as exemplified in the above road, where the figures on the right show Camberwell Green, by this road, to be $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from London, while by the figures on the left it appears on the return route, to be $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles distant from Woolwich, and this plan is adhered to throughout the work, whether the measurement be from London, as in the Direct Roads, or from some noted city or town, as in the Cross Roads. The following characters, that have been introduced to render more impressive the occurrence of the several objects, are thus explained:—the hand  which is here used in place of the letters r and l, shows, like the finger-post on the road, that, whichever way inclined, a road in that direction branches off. It is also to be observed, that in all cases where there is a turning out of the road to any place lying off the direct line, the notice of such turning is printed in Italic type, as in the specimen, near the commencement of the road from London:—“To Chelsea, 1 m. ;” but where the hand points at a turning in the road to the next place, on the line, the name of that place is printed according to its character, thus: “ to GREENWICH, Ship Tavern.” The Italic type is also used to denote the precise point of admeasurement, as in the last mentioned instance, the “Ship Tavern,” at Greenwich, and to express the names of the counties in which the different places on the road are situated, as “Vauxhall, Surrey.”

The next character, the bridge , is here used to show that wherever placed, the traveller crosses a stream or river by a bridge, to which the name of the river is always attached, as at Vauxhall Bridge, in the specimen above:—“Cross the  river Thames;” where the character is omitted, the passage is effected by means of a ferry.

The last character made use of is the gate , which implies the arrival at a turnpike, to which the name, if it has one, is generally annexed, as “Hatcham  Turnpike.”

THE THIRTEENTH EDITION of Colonel Paterson's Roads, was the first book that ever gave the lateral distances from the main roads, amounting to upwards of twenty thousand; and as this was a work of very considerable trouble and attention, the Editor of Paterson was apprehensive that these distances, like many other of his labours and improvements, would be copied by some contemporary author, and published as original;—time has shown that his apprehensions were well founded.

These lateral distances have been particularly useful in compressing the work, and have afforded an opportunity of giving the road to a place of note which lies a little out of the main road, so as not to interrupt the principal route. Thus, from LONDON to DOVER (see pages 1, 2, and 3 of the Roads), the road by lateral references is continued to CHATHAM, MILTON, and FAVERSHAM; and of course they are not afterwards repeated. These places are printed in the same characters as the rest, only in smaller type; but the figures of distances are dropped short, and the total placed in the centre column. This plan, which is peculiar to the last editions of Paterson's Roads, is extended to the Cross Roads. Thus, if the traveller turns to page 360, where the road from BATH to CHELTENHAM is given, he will find not only the route to Cheltenham, but to CHIPPING SODBURY, TETBURY, MINCHIN HAMPTON, and GLOUCESTER, which lie out of the main road.

It may be necessary to remark, that the roads which are pointed out by the hands, as branching to the right and left, are in general turnpike roads; but the distinction is not expressed; and as travellers are frequently deceived, by the natural expectation that turnpike roads should be good, it is therefore recommended to make previous enquiry into the state of them; as many of the cross turnpike roads are, in winter time, and often after wet weather, rendered almost impassable.

III.

Arrangement of the Roads, with the Standards from which they are measured.

I. The KENT Roads (with the exception of the road to Woolwich, through Vauxhall,) are measured from the Surrey Side of London Bridge through Great Dover Street.

II. The PORTSMOUTH Road, and those branching from it, are measured from the Stones' End in the Borough, near the King's Bench, according to the mile-stones; but our distances are given from the Surrey Side of London Bridge, through Newington.

III. The ISLE OF WIGHT Roads are measured from Cowes, and the distances given in the General Index are from London through Portsmouth, taking the distance from London to Cowes through Portsmouth at $84\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

IV. The CROYDON, REIGATE, EPSOM, and BRIGHTON Roads, are measured from the Surrey Side of Westminster Bridge, and from the Standard in Cornhill. The mile-stones are generally numbered from both these places. The distances from Cornhill being nearly one mile more than those from Westminster Bridge, our distances are reckoned from Westminster Bridge.

V. The WINCHESTER and SOUTHAMPTON, DORSETSHIRE, DEVONSHIRE, CORNWALL, WILTSHIRE, SOMERSETSHIRE, and all the Roads in the south-west of the kingdom, are measured from Hyde Park Corner through Brentford.

VI. The UXBRIDGE, EDGEWARE, BIRMINGHAM, SHREWSBURY, and most of the Roads in the north-western parts of the kingdom, are measured from Tyburn Turnpike at the top of Oxford Street.

☞ The HIGHGATE and HAMPSTEAD Roads are measured from Holborn Bars, near Gray's Inn Lane, and from the bottom of Oxford Street, where St. Giles's Pound formerly stood.

VII. The BARNET Road, all the Roads in the north, and some of the roads in the north-west of the kingdom, are measured from the place where Hicks's Hall formerly stood; viz. at the end of St. John's Lane, St. John Street, West Smithfield. A stone in the front of one of the houses has an inscription pointing out the spot.

VIII. The WARE and HUNTINGDON Roads, with the branches therefrom, are measured from Shoreditch Church; but the mile-stones are numbered from this standard, no farther northward than Alconbury Hill, where these Roads join the Great North road, as measured from Hicks's Hall.

IX. The ESSEX Roads are measured from Whitechapel Church.

IV.

Directions for finding the Roads.

I. The DIRECT ROADS. — To find the Road from LONDON to any city, town, or remarkable village, in England or Wales, look for the name of the place in the GENERAL INDEX to THE ROADS, and the figures to the right hand thereof refer to the page in which is that part of the road containing the place looked for: Thus, from LONDON to DURHAM, the Index refers you to page 278, where you find Durham, with its distance from London, &c. though the description of the road in which it is situated (being that from London to Edinburgh)

begins in page 179 and ends in page 280. Thus the road between Durham and Boroughbridge is contained in pages 278, 277 and 276; between Boroughbridge and Barnet in pages 228, 227, 226, 225, 224, and 223; and between Barnet and London, in page 179; hence the whole route from Durham to London, or from London to Durham, is traced. To avoid every possibility of mistake, we shall give a similar instance where the distance is shorter, and consequently where the road is divided into fewer parts. Thus to find the road from LONDON to CHERTSEY in Surrey, the index refers you to page 53, where you will find the road in the following form :

From Chertsey		From London
21 $\frac{1}{2}$	From HydeParkCorner to * KINGSTON, Surrey,
	page 52	10
11 $\frac{1}{2}$	Thames Ditton	11 $\frac{3}{4}$
9 $\frac{3}{4}$	* Esher	14
7 $\frac{1}{2}$	Forward to Guildford, 15$\frac{3}{4}$ m.
6	To Hersham 	15 $\frac{1}{2}$
3	Weybridge	18 $\frac{1}{2}$
	* CHERTSEY	21 $\frac{1}{2}$

By which it appears that you are referred to page 52 for this road as far as Kingston (the last remarkable place on the great road, or the last place you pass through before the road turns off); thence the remainder of the road to Chertsey is given, after the above form, in page 53, to which you are directed by the Index. These references are made use of, in order to prevent the numberless repetitions which otherwise would unavoidably occur in a work of this kind, and swell it to a very inconvenient size.

II. The CROSS ROADS branching from principal places are arranged alphabetically, as BATH to BRIDGEWATER; BATH to BRIDPORT; BATH to CHELTENHAM; BATH to CHESTER; BATH to DONCASTER, &c. In such cases the roads are easily found, even without referring to the Index: but by looking for Bath in the Index, after the word Cross, all the pages wherein Bath is to be found, are given, as 358, 359, 360, 362, 364, 368, 371, 372, 374, 376, 377, 379, 380, 381, 428, 486; and if the desired route through Bath be not found in some one of these pages, it is not contained in the book. The same rule must be observed with respect to other places. When the route is wanted from a place of considerable note, to one of less importance, it is generally recommended to look in the Index for the place of least consequence, because it has fewer roads leading through it. Suppose the route from BATH to LEDBURY was wanted; by looking in the Index for Ledbury, after the word Cross, it will be found at pages 362, 485, and 493, and no where else; whereas had Bath been looked for in a similar manner, it would have occurred sixteen times.

The maps which accompany this edition are entirely new, engraved from original drawings, executed for the purpose. These embrace the line of coast from Margate to Southampton and Lymington, together with the Isle of Thanet, the Isle of Wight, and the country comprehending the Lakes of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire, and a General Map of England and Wales, on a scale sufficiently large to render the principal Places, and the Roads leading to them, clear and distinct.

* * Gentlemen who may be desirous of providing themselves with a larger Map of England than the one prefixed to the work, are respectfully apprised that such may be had of the editor, EDWARD MOGG, 14 Great Russell Street, Covent Garden.

GENERAL INDEX

TO THE

DIRECT AND CROSS ROADS OF ENGLAND, WALES, &c.

COMPREHENDING

All the CITIES, MARKET TOWNS, Boroughs, Villages, and Post Stages, in the Direct and Cross Roads, with their Distances from LONDON; to which are annexed the Inns that supply Post Horses.

The first column contains the Distances of the places from LONDON: the second Column contains the Places, the Counties in which they are situated, their Market Days, the Pages wherein the Roads (both Direct and Cross) are to be found, which lead to, from, or through, the several Places and the Inns which supply Post Horses.

In stating the Distances, the fractional parts are dropt where they do not amount to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile: where they do, the $\frac{1}{4}$ is added. Thus KENDAL, which in the route p. 222, appears to be 261 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles from London, is given in the Index as 262. Where the same place occurs in different routes, the difference of distance is not noted, unless the place is of some consequence, and the difference amounts to 2 miles. In all other cases the first Distance only is set down.

The Boroughs are distinguished by this mark †; the Number of Members being noted by the Number of Obelisks. The Cities are printed in Roman Capitals, (as BATH,) the Market Towns in Italic Capitals, (as ABBERFORD,) the Villages in Roman, (as Abinger,) and Places which supply Post Horses have an Asterisk prefixed, as in the Roads; and where a single Inn on the Road supplies Post Horses, it is printed in Italics: also, where there are more than one Inn, they are inserted alphabetically, in order to avoid partiality or preference.

EXPLANATION.

I.  This character implies that at such a point you arrive at a Turnpike, which word is not unfrequently attached to it; but in many instances, where contraction has been found necessary, the letters T. G. are used, instead of the word, in conjunction with the character.

II.  Wherever this character is placed, the Traveller crosses a stream, or river, by a bridge, to which the name is attached; but where it is omitted, the passage is effected by means of a ferry.

III.  This mark is used in place of the letters r and l, which in the old work implied right and left, but in the present edition they are disused, and the  whichever way pointed, shewing that in that direction a road branches off, is substituted in their stead.

IV. The names of Cities are printed in ROMAN CAPITALS, as (*CANTERBURY); the names of Market Towns are printed in ITALIC CAPITALS, as (ABBOTSBURY); and the names of Villages, &c. are printed in small Roman, as (Crayford). Places which supply Post Horses have an asterisk prefixed, as “ Shooter’s Hill, * ROCHESTER, * CHATHAM,” &c.

V. M. H. signifies Market House, and P. O. Post Office; the words in Italics, immediately following the names of Places, shew the exact point at which the measurement terminates; as “North Fleet, Queen’s Head,” shews that the measurement is taken from London Bridge to the Queen’s Head at North Fleet, &c.

VI. The Italic type which occurs between the Towns, Villages, &c. on the road, points out where the roads lead to which branch off to the right and left, with the number of miles to the nearest Market Town or remarkable Village, and other useful information. This mark  shews, as above explained, right and left of the road; thus, at New Cross, the road on the right leads to Bromley, which is six miles and a quarter distant from New Cross; at Blackheath a road turns off on the left to Woolwich through Charlton, &c. The letter m. following the figures is an abbreviation for Miles.

VII. Places which lie contiguous to the road, and through which the main road does not pass, have their total distance placed in the centre column, as MILTON, which lies half a mile to the left of Chalkwell; FEVERSHAM, one mile to the left of Ospringe, &c.

VIII. The centre column shews the several places passed through. The right-hand column of figures shews the distance of each place from London, and is to be used in travelling to any place; while the figures in the column on the left-hand shew the distance from such place, and are intended to be used on the return only: they are not, however, wholly useless in going; the figures ranged on the right-hand shewing the traveller the distance he has already completed, while a reference to the left-hand, if he is desirous of ascertaining the fact, denotes the number of miles remaining to be performed, for the completion of his journey. To prevent the possibility of mistake, each column of figures is surmounted by the words (From London) on the right-hand, and from the end of the road, on the left, as (From Dover). The Cross Roads are arranged in like manner.

IX. The Seats of the Nobility and Gentry, the Description of Places, Prospects, &c. &c. are placed as near their situation in the line of road or point of sight as possible, and will be almost invariably found upon the same page; these are arranged in the precise order in which they occur, those on the right-hand of the page being situated or seen in that position, while those on the contrary side of the road, as being in an opposite direction, occupy the left-hand column; and this plan is adhered to throughout the work, except as it regards the topographical sketches of cities, towns, or remarkable villages, which, as the road generally passes through them, have been placed to the right or to the left, as convenient space offered.

A new large map of England, intended to accompany and illustrate this work, has just been completed, and may be had of the Editor, E. MCCA, No. 14, Great Russell Street, Covent Garden.

feathers: the gallery on the north side of the house was also fitted up by Sir A. Newton; it measures 76 feet by 16, and the windows are adorned with painted glass. The park and pleasure-grounds comprise about 70 acres, and include some beautiful scenery. — Charlton Grove, John Balfour, Esq.

SHOOTER'S HILL. Sir T. W. Blomefield, Bart; H. R. Willett, Esq.; and Shrewsbury House, unoccupied.

WELLING. Belvidere, Lord Eardley. This elegant mansion commands a most delightful view of the river Thames, continually diversified by crowds of shipping, beyond which the eye ranges over a vast extent of country. The views on the other side are of a character totally different though not less beautiful; and the home scenery is rendered peculiarly interesting by the judicious manner in which the grounds have been laid out. The house is erected on the site of another of less extensive dimensions, the only part of which, that is attached to the present building, is a noble drawing-room, built by his lordship's father. Among the interior decorations is a fine collection of pictures, many of them the productions of the best masters. — 1½ m. beyond, Brampton Place, Capt. Edmeads; and 1 m. farther, Lesness House, unoccupied.

GRAVESEND is the first port in the Thames, and, by a grant of Richard II., enjoys the privilege of conveying passengers to and from London: the vessels depart from Billingsgate every tide at high water, on the ringing of a bell, and from Gravesend every flood: but the use of these have been in a great measure superseded by the introduction of steam-boats, several of which are engaged in the undertaking. All outward-bound vessels are obliged to bring-to here, till they have been examined by the proper officers, and receive their clearances: here also all foreigners are detained on arriving from abroad, till they have obtained permission from the Secretary of State's office to proceed; and all foreigners departing, must receive their clearances from the Alien Office here. The church, which is an elegant building, was erected in 1731. Opposite the Block-house, on the Essex shore, is Tilbury Fort, having a strong battery. Market on Wednesday and Saturday.

are three large and elegant apartments. The grounds were laid out by the celebrated Brown, who also formed a spacious sheet of water in the park, which exhibits some flourishing plantations. The wings of the house were subsequently pulled down, and a large pile of stabling and offices erected. — Blendon Hall, John Smith, Esq.; and Bridgen Place, Rev. — Frith.

CRAYFORD. The name is derived from an ancient ford over the river Cray, or Crouch, which produces excellent trout, and falls into the Darent a little below the town. Here are some considerable calico printing-grounds, and a manufactory for slitting iron and rolling it into hoops. In this and the adjoining parishes, are a number of deep caverns, artificially cut out of the chalk-pits, concerning the origin of which various conjectures have been formed. The church stands on an eminence, and is ornamented with a beautiful altar-piece. A battle was fought here in 457, between the Saxons, commanded by Hengist, and the Britons, in which the latter were defeated.

DARTFORD is a market-town, deriving its name from an ancient ford over the river Darent. Here are to be seen the remains of a magnificent nunnery, founded by Edward III., which, at the Reformation, was converted into a royal mansion. A branch of the old Roman Watling-street passes through this town. The parish church is situated in the main street, which is wide and commodious, with a good bridge over the Darent. In the neighbourhood are some gunpowder-mills, much esteemed for their produce. Market on Saturday.

HORN'S CROSS. Mount Pleasant, — Collier, Esq.; and beyond Horn's Cross, Stone Castle, Robert Talbot, Esq.

NORTH FLEET is situated on a high chalk hill, commanding a very extensive view of the river Thames and the county of Essex. The church is a spacious building, and contains several monuments of the fourteenth century. On the north wall is a beautiful alabaster monument to the memory of Dr. Brown, eminent for his skill in natural history, and physician to Charles II.

The centre of the building was planned by Inigo Jones, and was new-cased with brick, and sashed, by the late Earl Darley; so that its appearance is not uniform with the wings, which formed part of the residence of the Cobhams. The furniture and decorations of the apartments are of the most costly and elegant nature, enriched by a variety of beautiful sculpture, and a fine collection of pictures. The park, which is nearly 7 m. in circumference, is beautifully diversified, and abundantly wooded. The oaks are particularly luxuriant, and many of them are very large and venerable. On the south side, leading from the house, is a noble avenue of lime-trees, consisting of four rows, and extending to the length of upwards of 1000 yards. On an elevated site, toward the southern extremity of the park, is an extensive building, visible from the road, erected as a mausoleum, or chapel, at an expense of 9000 l. , and designed for the sepulture of the family.

Barrett, Esq. This elegant mansion was new-modelled some years since, at a considerable expence, by Mr. James Wyatt, and now forms one of the happiest examples of his skill in Gothic architecture: great improvements have also been made in the disposition of the apartments, among which is a very beautiful library, finished in the most perfect style of Gothic taste; the entrance to this apartment gives the idea of a small oratory, or chantry-chapel, which is also supported by the character of its various elegant decorations; its general plan is an ellipsis, formed into eight compartments, by clustered shafts, from which springs the tracery of the dome, whose centre admits the light that falls upon it from the windows in the spire above, softening it by means of stained and semi-transparent glass. The three fronts of the house somewhat resemble a small convent, that has been partly modernized, and adapted to the habitation of a gentleman's family; and the gently spreading trees, and the adjoining rivulet, seem to correspond with it, and form a site selected by monks with a view to retirement and meditation. The drawing-room, dining-parlour, and other apartments, are enriched with a choice and valuable collection of paintings by the best masters; and the park, laid out with considerable taste and judgement, has a fine undulating surface, and allows the eye to wander unconfined over the adjacent scenery, its own boundaries being altogether concealed.—1 m. beyond, Higham, Rev. C. ELTHAM. Here are the remains of a royal palace that was for several centuries a favourite retreat of the English sovereigns; the time of its erection is unknown, but it must have been prior to 1270, when Henry III. kept a grand public Christmas here, accompanied by his Queen, and all the great men of the realm. This edifice, the abode of sovereigns, and the birth-place of princes, was gradually deserted on the rise of Greenwich, and the change it has since undergone is exceedingly striking: it is now a farm, and the beautiful great hall, where parliaments were held, and entertainments given in all the pomp of feudal grandeur, is now used as a barn. This hall, a most noble remain, is 100 feet long, 56 broad, and about 60 high; its windows were extremely elegant, but are now bricked up; and the roof, which is of timber, is curiously wrought in the manner of that of Westminster Hall.	16 $\frac{3}{4}$ 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ 5 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ 2	Forward to Dartford 11 $\frac{1}{4}$ m. The church is dedicated to St. Mary; it has a shingle tower, and small octangular spire. GREENWICH. The principal object here requiring notice is the Royal Hospital for decayed seamen, which was founded in the reign of William III. and is an extremely magnificent structure, chiefly composed of Portland stone, and consisting of four distinct quadrangular piles of building, with its grand front opening on a terrace that extends 865 feet along the bank of the Thames. The magnificence of the hall and chapel, but more particularly the latter, attracts a great number of visitors: the confined limits of this work, however, preclude the possibility of a description of this national establishment, yet a very pleasant day may be passed in an examination of it, and in exploring the rich scenery of its small, though very beautiful park, which contains the Royal Observatory, that was founded in the reign of Charles II. in order to afford a greater facility to the attempts at discovering			CHARLTON. Charlton House, Sir T. Marryon Wilson. the longitude. From hence the prospect is uncommonly beautiful, particularly of the metropolis, the county of Essex, and the serpentine windings of the Thames, animated by the crowds of shipping that are continually navigating its busy stream: Greenwich Hospital is immediately under the eye, and with the adjacent country and river, and London in the distance, presents as interesting a coup-d'oeil, as can well be imagined. There are no inns at Greenwich, at least none deserving the name of such; but the Ship Tavern, of long and deserved celebrity, furnishes accommodation from the small and social circle, to the more numerous and gay parties, in a style not to be surpassed by any tavern in the metropolis. Market on Wednesday and Saturday.

MEASURED from LONDON BRIDGE.	LONDON TO SHEERNESS.		THROUGH GRAVESEND and ROCHESTER.
SHEERNESS, the principal place in the Isle of Sheppey, is an important maritime town, that has been at different times so much improved, augmented, and strengthened, that no enemy's ship can now pass, without the hazard of being sunk, or blown out of the water: for the greater protection of the Medway, several smaller forts have likewise been constructed, higher up, on both sides of the river. Adjoining the fort is the king's yard, and docks, which have recently been considerably enlarged and improved. The chapel, a modern structure, was erected by government for the use of the garrison; but all marriages, burials, &c. are performed at the church at Minster. The hulls of several old ships of war are here placed on the shore as break-waters, and altogether present a very singular appearance, the chimnies being raised of brick from the lower gun-decks. The garrison and inhabitants of Sheerness for a long time experienced a great scarcity of fresh water, but towards the end of the last century, a well was sunk to the vast depth of 328 feet, which has ever since produced a never-failing supply. There is a good conveyance by water from Chatham to Sheerness, for eighteen-pence each person.	From Sheerness 48½ 10½ 10 8¾ 7½ 5¾ 3¾ 2½ 1	From the Surrey Side of London Bridge to Key Street, Kent, page 3 Forward to Dover 33¼ m. To Maidstone 9¼ m. ☞ ☞ to Bobbing Bobbing Street Iwade Cross the West Swale and enter the Island of Sheppey. King's Ferry Neat's Court A little farther, ☞ to Queenborough 1 m. London to QUEENBOROUGH, 4½ m. To Halfway House ☞ Forward to Minster 1¾ m. ☞ to Mile House SHEERNESS	From London 38 38½ 39¾ 41 42¾ 44¾ 46 47½ 48½ QUEENBOROUGH was formerly called Cynynburgh, from belonging to the Saxon kings, who had a castle here, near the western entrance of the Swale, which was afterwards denominated the castle of Sheppey: on or near the site of this fortress, a new, more extensive, and magnificent castle was erected towards the end of the reign of Edward III.; but of this fabric, the moat that surrounded it, and the well, are the only objects which remain. The town consists of one wide street, principally made up of modern buildings, inhabited by fishermen and oyster dredgers. The church, formerly a chapelry to Minster, is dedicated to the Holy Trinity; it consists of a nave and chancel, and has a tower at the west end, of a more ancient date than the rest of the building. Queenborough is a free borough, and sends two members to parliament, which it has done ever since the 13th of Elizabeth, at which period it consisted of 23 inhabited houses only. This is worthy of remark, as furnishing a singular proof of the original inequality of our parliamentary representation. Market on Monday and Thursday.

This town is a borough by prescription, and returns two members to parliament; it extends from north to south about a mile, and from east to west rather more than three quarters, and consists of four streets, intersecting each other, with lesser ones branching off at right angles. The High Street is spacious, and, for the most part, well built; and the public buildings are of a very respectable character: they consist principally of the church, a spacious and handsome structure, being one of the largest parochial edifices in the kingdom; the free grammar school; the shire hall, in which the assizes for the county are held; a gaol for the western division of the county; a substantial stone bridge of seven arches over the river; a good stone conduit; and a small but neat theatre. The trade of Maidstone is extensive and flourishing, and is greatly facilitated by the convenience of water carriage on the river Medway: hops form the staple commodity; besides which, grain, timber, &c. are dealt in here to a considerable extent; and the weekly and monthly markets are abundantly supplied. William Woollett, the eminent engraver, was a native of this town.

house, about a mile and a half from Folkstone, on the road to Dover, on a clear day, the harbour of Boulogne, with the flag on the pier head, and vessels entering and leaving the port, may be distinctly seen. The natural defences of Folkstone are very formidable, which being strengthened by batteries and martello towers, may bid defiance to invasion from a marine force; and the construction of a spacious and safe harbour has greatly increased the trade and importance of the place. This extensive undertaking, though not quite finished, is rapidly approaching completion, under the fostering influence of government, and is now considered by experienced judges to be a very safe retreat for vessels on this coast. The piers extend a considerable distance into the sea, and encircle about 19 acres, forming an excellent harbour, capable of accommodating three hundred vessels from 100 to 300 tons burden. The country about Folkstone is extremely beautiful, which, together with the salubrity of the air, renders it a place of great resort in the summer. Second Road. DORRINGSTONE. BROMLEY derives its name from the quantity of broom by which it was formerly surrounded; its situation is pleasant and healthy, and the town has a very respectable appearance. The Bishops of Rochester have a palace here, situated about a quarter of a mile from the town, on the brow of a pleasant hill, looking towards Beckenham; in the grounds is a chalybeate spring, called St. Blase's Well, which is secured from the mixture of other waters, and affords to the midding and poorer sorts of people great relief in many infirmities and diseases. The church is a spacious building, consisting of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with an embattled tower, surmounted by a cupola, at the west end; it contains numerous sepulchral memorials, and the font is apparently of Norman origin. An excellent institution, called Bromley College, was founded here in the year 1666, in pursuance of the will of the Rev. John Warner, Bishop of Rochester, which, by means of subsequent bequests, has been enlarged into an establishment of considerable utility and importance. The market-house is a large old building, standing on wooden pillars; and the market, which is held on Thursday, is respectably attended, and well supplied.	59	To Rushy Green ☞ South End	6

MORANT'S COURT HILL. From the summit of this delightful eminence a most enchanting prospect is enjoyed, which includes some of the richest scenery in the county of Kent.

SEVENOAKS. B. Heron, Esq.; and Knowle Park, Lord Whitworth, and Duchess of Dorset. The magnificent and immense pile which graces the demesne of Knowle, exhibits specimens of the styles of different ages; the most ancient is probably coeval with the Marshalls and Bigods, who formerly possessed this domain; the most modern is of the erection of Thomas first Earl of Dorset, in the beginning of the reign of James I.: many subsequent improvements have however been made; and the building is now of a quadrangular shape, chiefly in the castellated style, with square towers, and two large embattled gateways. This edifice covers a space upwards of five acres in extent: the magnitude and feudal style of the building conveys most forcibly to the mind, the idea of days long since past, when baronial pomp, and romantic chivalry, shone in their meridian splendour; nor is the charm broken on entering the hall still ornamented with all the paraphernalia of its original decorations. The apartments are splendidly fitted up, but their most attractive ornaments are the invaluable collection of pictures they contain. Among the portraits are many of the principal nobility and statesmen who lived in the reigns of Henry VIII. and his children; some of them are by Holbein: the collection also contains the finest productions of Titian, Corregio, Vanduyck, Rembrandt, and Sir Joshua Reynolds. Here is likewise a collection of antique busts, mostly purchased in Italy by the late Duke of Dorset. The park, between five and six miles in circumference, presents a richly diversified surface, abounds with fine timber and woods, and contains numerous herds of deer. — Beyond this is The Wilderness, Marquis Camden.

TUNBRIDGE is supposed to have derived its name from the bridges over the different streams of the Medway, which flow on the south side of the town, and are five in number. Many of the houses are respectable erections, they are chiefly disposed in one long and wide street, that is kept particularly clean; and at the entrance from London is a stone causeway. The church, a large and handsome fabric, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, contains some good monuments of different families. The poor inhabitants of this district have been materially benefited by the bequests of different persons, but the principal charitable institution is the Free Grammar School, a capacious structure, at the north end of the town, which was founded and endowed by Sir Andrew Judde, a native of Tunbridge, about the beginning of the sixteenth century. The masters of this seminary have, in general, been men of eminent abilities; but though the annual income arising from the endowments of the school is considerable, yet the number of boys educated on the foundation is very small. Tunbridge is a flourishing town, it has a weekly market on Friday, and once returned members to parliament.

BODYHAM BRIDGE, near, Bodyham Castle. The magnificent ruins of this noble pile are situated near the village of Bodyham, on the river Rother. It is supposed to have been built by one of the Dalyngriges, a family of great consequence in Sussex, in the 14th and 15th centuries; and, after passing through many noble families, became, by purchase, the property of Sir Thomas Webster, with whose other estates, it descended to Sir Godfrey. This castle, encompassed with a large and deep moat, now stagnant, is nearly square, having a round tower at each angle, gates on the north and south fronts, and a square tower in the centre of the east and west sides. The grand entrance, in the middle of the north front, was approached by a kind of causey, defended by an advanced gate, some remains of which are still left. The great gate is extremely grand; it is flanked by two square machicolated towers; over it are three escutcheons of arms, and the iron portcullis yet entire. The inner gate of the south gateway is demolished, and a cottage built on its site. The east and west walls, from centre to centre of the corner towers, measure 165 feet; those facing the north and south, 150. The lodgings and offices were parallel to the main walls, leaving in the centre an open area of 87 feet by 78. The chapel, the hall, and the kitchen, of large dimensions, may yet be distinguished. WINCHELSEA is a borough and market town. The whole of Old Winchelsea was swallowed up by the sea in a tempest, which also completely destroyed its spacious harbour. The new town was built by Edward I.; it was encompassed by a wall, and made a member of the cinque ports; but subsequently fell to decay, from a circumstance the very reverse to that which had proved the destruction of the old town: the sea deserted its neighbourhood, and left in its place a dreary marsh; the channel which led to the harbour became choaked, and being by degrees abandoned by the merchant and trader, it fell to ruin; and a town which once covered a surface two miles in circumference, is now reduced to a few houses. It still, however, continues to enjoy its ancient charters and privileges, is governed by a mayor and twelve jurats, and sends two members to parliament. A part of one of its churches is all that remains out of three which it formerly possessed: the chancel and three aisles are left entire, and this is used by the inhabitants for the purposes of divine worship. This beautiful remain is tastefully ornamented with ivy, the stems of which proclaim their antiquity, and spring from what formerly was the interior of the building; it is kept in a state of peculiar neatness, and presents a singularly interesting and highly pleasing object. The market, which is very insignificant, is held on Saturday. About two miles north-east of the town stands the ruins of Camber Castle, built by Henry VIII., at an expense of 23,000*l.*; they consist of a large circular tower, serving for the keep, surrounded by

The houses are principally built of brick, but most of them old-fashioned. The church is of stone, and accounted one of the largest parish churches in the kingdom; it contains nothing worthy of particular notice; but a most extensive and beautiful prospect is obtained from the top of the tower, in which the old gate at the entrance of Winchelsea, and the scenery around it, forms a very picturesque object. The ruins of Camber Castle are also seen to considerable advantage from this point of view. In the Lower Street is the free grammar school, a curious brick edifice, erected and endowed in 1636, by Thomas Peacock, one of the jurats. There is also a good free-school for the instruction of poor children; and a handsome market-place and town-hall, situated in the principal street, nearly in the centre of the town. Dissenters are very numerous here; the Methodists have a handsome chapel, and the Baptists a neat meeting-house. Ipress Castle, so named after its founder, is a strong square pile, with a round tower at each corner; it was originally erected for the defence of the town, and is now converted into a prison. The trade of Rye consists principally in its fisheries, large quantities of herrings, mackerel, and flat-fish, being taken here, and sent to the London market. Corn and malt are likewise exported hence; and several sloops belonging to the town are constantly engaged in the conveyance of chalk from the cliffs near East Bourne, for the purpose of being burned into lime. The old harbour having become useless from being nearly choked up with sand, a new one has been formed by cutting a large canal in a more direct line to the sea, sufficiently spacious to admit vessels of 200 tons	From Rye 64½ 19¾ 16¾ 14¼ 12¾ 11¾ 10¼ 7 4½ 3¾	From the Surrey Side of London Bridge to Flimwell, Kent, page 12 to Rye 18 m. To Tunbridge Wells 12 m.  Forward to Hurst Green Turn  pike, Sussex To Burwash 4 m. } To Heathfield 10 m. }  To Lewes 24 m. } 1 m. farther, to Rye, by Silver Hill, 16¼ m. * Robertsbridge To Robertsbridge, by Tunbridge Wells, Frant, and Ticehurst, 51 m. See the road from London to Hastings, page 18. John's Cross Vine Hall To Battle 3¼ m.  to Cripp's Corner { to Beckley, by Staple Cross, 5 m. Broad Oak  Turnpike To Brede 1 m.  to Beckley 3 m. Udymer Direction Post To Winchelsea 3 m.  London to * WINCHELSEA 63¾ m. * RYE, Strand Gate	From London 44¾ 47¾ 50¼ 51¾ 52¾ 54¼ 57½ 60 60¾ 64½ HURST GREEN TURN-PIKE, 1 m. before, Boorzel, John Roberts, Esq.; and a little farther, Pashley, Rev. The various apartments are decorated with some pictures by Vandyke, Lely, and other masters: the park contains much fine timber, and is well stocked with deer; and among the various embellishments which the pleasure-grounds received from the late venerable proprietor, was the addition of a large sheet of water, which contributes greatly to their attractions. The parish church stands at a short distance from the mansion, and in the Ashburnham chancel are several magnificent monuments for the family from whom it is named. In the vestry are preserved the shirt, stained with some drops of blood, in which Charles I. was beheaded; his watch, which he gave at the place of execution to Mr. John Ashburnham; his white silk knit drawers; and the sheet that was thrown over his body: these relics were, in 1743, bequeathed by Bertram Ashburnham, Esq. to the clerk of the parish and his successors for ever, and they are exhibited as great curiosities. up to the quay, on the north side of the town, a mile and a half from the entrance. This town was formerly the centre of the clothing trade, which was originally established, and carried on to a very considerable extent, in the wealth of Kent: this important branch of manufacture was introduced into England through the policy of Edward III., who induced a number of Flemings to emigrate and settle here, in the tenth year of his reign, to whom he gave the most liberal encouragement: the revolutions of succeeding ages have, however, entirely removed this trade to other parts of the kingdom, and not any branch of it is at present carried on in Kent. The town principally consists of one street, about three quarters of a mile in length, with others branching from it at right angles. The church is a large building of good proportions, with an embattled tower; in the chancel are various military trophies, and in the other parts of the church are several good monuments. Besides the church, Cranbrook contains four dissenting meeting-houses, a writing school for poor children, and a free grammar school for all the boys in the parish. The market, which is held on Saturday, is in general well supplied with corn, hops, meat, and other provisions.

ROCHESTER, a city situated on the banks of the river Medway, over which is a bridge of stone, built towards the conclusion of the 14th century, may boast of considerable antiquity, having been one of the splendid cities of the Romans; but of its history little is known previous to 597, when it was raised to a bishop's see by Ethelbert, the Saxon king of Kent. It was surrounded by walls, and considered a strong military station, the remains of which are still visible in the ruins of its once impregnable castle, erected in a situation extremely favourable for defence; and the fortifications were constructed with considerable ingenuity and skill, according to the military architecture of the Normans, of which it affords a curious specimen. The exterior walls of the keep, or great tower, erected by Bishop Gundulph, are still in good preservation, though attempts, originating in sordid motives, have been made to destroy them; but they were found to be composed of materials so durable, that the expense necessary to remove them was more than their value, and consequently the scheme was abandoned. From the opposite side of the river it presents a very picturesque ruin. The cathedral is situated at a little distance to the south of the High-Street: its form is that of a double cross, consisting of a nave and aisles, two transepts, and a choir, with a low tower and spire, exhibiting specimens of architecture of four distinct eras, and containing many ancient and curious monuments. The west entrance of this interesting pile is peculiarly striking, notwithstanding the ravages of time, and the many incongruities of more modern architects, considerably mar the purity of the original design. The principal door-way opens into the centre, on the western side of the building, and this portion of the exterior is elegantly and profusely decorated, but every other part of the edifice, externally, is singularly plain, and almost entirely destitute of ornament: the decorations of the interior are of a similar character to those generally adopted for the like purposes, according to the different styles of architecture in vogue at the time of the erection of each separate portion. Among the monuments are many which

This gentleman is now engaged in erecting a new mansion on the site of Holwood House, which has been levelled with the ground; it was beautifully situated amidst fine scenery, and is remarkable as having been for many years the favourite retirement of the late Mr. Pitt, the celebrated Prime Minister of England, who made some additions to the mansion, when the grounds also received many judicious improvements under the superintendance of Repton. On the west side of Holwood Hill, on Keston Down, are the remains of an extensive encampment, supposed to be of Roman origin; its form is nearly circular, and it is surrounded by treble ditches and ramparts, of vast height and depth, which, on the east and north-east sides, are thickly invested with wood, while those towards the west, and south-west sides, remain nearly in their original state. The outer circle measures nearly two miles, and the road formerly passed through it; but during the residence of Mr. Pitt at Holwood, it was carried round the western side of the camp for his accommodation. Roman curiosities, and coins of the Middle and Lower Empire, have been found here; notwithstanding which, various opinions have been entertained as to the probable origin of this strong post. WESTERHAM. The manor was given to the abbey of Westminster by Edward the First, for the performance of certain religious services for the repose of the soul of Queen Eleanor. The privileges of free warren, &c. accompanying this grant, were confirmed by Edward the Third, who also gave the abbots permission to hold a weekly market, which is still continued, and held on Wednesday. Subsequent to the surrender of church property at the dissolution, the town of Westerham and its appurtenances have descended through the noble family of Gresham, by purchase, to the Wards, and are now the property of John Ward, Esq. The entrance gateway consists of a centre, flanked by round towers; it is strongly machicolated, and defended by a portcullis. The inner buildings form a quadrangle, enclosing a court, and the hall still retains vestiges of its ancient festive splendour. The great staircase is lighted with windows of painted glass; it conducts to the various chambers, and to a long gallery, having a curiously ornamented ceiling in stucco. At the upper end of this gallery a part of the floor lifts up, and discovers a narrow and gloomy descent, said to extend to the moat, called the Dungeon. assembly rooms, a chapel, a neat though small theatre, and the public gardens or parades, in which the company assemble and pass an hour or two in walking, being serenaded at the same time by a band of music. Another species of amusement here consists in forming parties to the high rocks, which are situated about a mile and a half southward from the wells, and are composed of a great number of eminences, beautifully romantic and sequestered,
PENSHURST. South Park, R. Allnutt , Esq.; and Penhurst Place, Sir John Shelley Sidney , Bart. Penhurst Place is an extensive pile, chiefly disposed in the form of a quadrangle, inclosing a spacious court, and comprehending a great hall, chapel, and numerous apartments: it is one of those castled dwellings which immediately succeeded the more gloomy residences of the 13th and 14th centuries, though some few parts are of a later period. The state rooms are splendid, and the various apartments are decorated with very curious, rare, and valuable portraits, and other paintings. The park includes more than 400 acres; it is finely diversified by gentle eminences, lawns, and woods: most of the oak, beech, and chestnut trees, are of luxuriant growth and fine character; and the S.E. side of the park is nearly approached by the united streams of the rivers Eden and Medway. Here is also a noble sheet of water, called Lancup Well; and at a short distance above it, stands the famous oak, said to have been planted at the birth of Sir Philip Sydney , and now more than 22 feet in circumference.	64 $\frac{1}{2}$ 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ 31 $\frac{1}{2}$ 31 28 $\frac{3}{4}$ 26 $\frac{3}{4}$ 26 22 $\frac{1}{4}$ 21 $\frac{1}{4}$ 19 $\frac{1}{4}$ 18 $\frac{3}{4}$ 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ 16 13 $\frac{1}{2}$	30 33 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ 35 $\frac{3}{4}$ 37 $\frac{3}{4}$ 38 $\frac{1}{2}$ 42 $\frac{1}{4}$ 43 $\frac{1}{4}$ 45 $\frac{1}{4}$ 45 $\frac{3}{4}$ 48 48 $\frac{1}{2}$ 51 64 $\frac{1}{2}$
TUNBRIDGE WELLS derives its celebrity from some mineral springs of a strong chalybeate quality, that are said to have been discovered in the reign of James I.; and the agreeable distance of this place from the metropolis, together with the virtues of its waters, and the purity of its air, have caused it to rank among the best frequented watering places. The term Tunbridge Wells is applied to all the buildings that have arisen in this neighbourhood, principally shops, and lodging houses for the accommodation of the visitors; but the centre of both business and pleasure is the immediate neighbourhood of the wells, where are situated the

The general aspect of the country is romantic, and the houses are partly situated in a sandy bottom, and partly on two fine elevations, called Mount Ephraim, and Mount Zion. The original springs issuing from the earth are received in two handsome marble basins, perforated at the bottom, and having openings at the sides, to discharge the superfluous stream. The trade carried on here is similar to that of the Spa in Germany, and consists chiefly of toys, and useful domestic articles in wood: the elegance of these goods is universally admired, and great quantities of them are sold to the company, and likewise transmitted to different parts of the kingdom. It is a corporation by prescription; is governed by a bailiff, jurats, and commonalty; and a member of the cinque ports, being joined with Romney. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in fishing, and other maritime employments; and the fishery is said, formerly, to have been very extensive; smuggling is also reported to be carried on here to a considerable extent. The church is a large edifice, dedicated to All Saints, and consisting of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with a massive tower, ornamented with pinnacles: it contains numerous monuments, and among them many brasses. About four miles from the town, on Dungeness Point, stands the light-house: this building is partly on the model of the Eddy-stone; it is 110 feet high, and composed principally of brick, with stone door and window frames, and is the property of Mr. Coke, of Norfolk, to whom it is said to produce 4000l. per annum. This place certainly ranks as a market-town, though it now enjoys little more than the name, the market being almost wholly disused; it is, however, a place of considerable respectability, as being the abode of many persons whose families have derived affluence from the grazing business carried on in the neighbouring marshes. Tenterden enjoys a pleasant situation on elevated ground; and the church is a large and handsome fabric, with a lofty tower at the west end; it contains many sepulchral memorials, and is dedicated to St. Michael.

PORTSDOWN HILL is 447 feet perpendicular height, and runs east and west nearly 7 miles. The prospects from the summit, on which is a monument to the memory of Lord Nelson, are beautifully varied and extensive, embracing a noble view of the British Channel, animated by multitudes of ships navigating its surface, and enlivened by the charming scenery of the Isle of Wight, over which the eye ranges through nearly the whole of its length. The New Forest adds a sombre dignity to the scene towards the western horizon, and on the north side the prospect is richly and beautifully contrasted by the extensive vale of the forest of Bere, not, as it anciently appeared, impervious and gloomy, but shining in all the radiance of civilized cultivation. In the distance, the graceful spire of Chichester cathedral forms an interesting object, rising above the wolds of Sussex.

MEASURED from LONDON BRIDGE.	LONDON to ARUNDEL.		THROUGH GODALMING and PETWORTH.
GODALMING, a market town delightfully situated in a valley on the south side of the river Wey, which is navigable from hence to its junction with the Thames at Weybridge, consists of a principal street running nearly east and west, and several smaller ones. The bridge over the Wey was originally private property, and open for carriages only in time of flood; but with the consent of the proprietor it was removed, and the present structure opened, as a county bridge, for public use, in 1783. The church is a neat building, and the town is remarkable as having been the scene where the famous impostor, Mary Toft, puzzled even the faculty for some time, by pretending to conceive and bring forth live rabbits.	From Arun del 60$\frac{1}{4}$ 26$\frac{3}{4}$ 25$\frac{1}{4}$ 23$\frac{1}{4}$ 20$\frac{3}{4}$ 20$\frac{1}{4}$	From the Surrey Side of London Bridge to * GODALMING, Surrey, page 22 Milford, entrance of To Petersfield 19$\frac{1}{2}$ m. ☞ A little farther, To Haslemere 6$\frac{1}{2}$ m. ☞ ☞ to Witley, end of North Bridge ☞ T. Pitt's Hill, C. Mitford, Esq.; and Petworth Park, the magnificent seat of the Earl of Egremont. The mansion stands close to the town of Petworth, the back front opening into the church-yard. It was erected on the site of the ancient house, by the Duke of Somerset. The front, of freestone, adorned with statues on the top, is singularly handsome, forming one unbroken range, having twenty-one windows in each story. The interior arrangements are remarkable for magnificence and elegance, all the principal apartments being decorated with paintings, antique statues and busts, many of which are of first rate excellence. The park is very extensive, the wall being upwards of 12 miles in circumference. In the front of the mansion is a sheet of water, formed with the springs collected from the neighbouring hills, from which, by a simple and ingenious contrivance, every part of the building is abundantly supplied, as well as the whole town of Petworth, with excellent water; this improvement was effected at an expense of 30,000l. In case of fire, from the arrangement made in the mansion, an immediate and plentiful supply of water can be obtained, which, without the assistance of engines, may be thrown in profusion on any part of the building. This park commands views picturesquely varied, extensive, and delightful, both in home scenery, and on the beautiful Downs of Sussex and Surrey; and is also well stocked with game. This noble seat combines the elegant with the useful, great improvements having been made therein, particularly that of enclosing the deer-park, which previously was an entire forest-scene, over-spread with bushes, furze, some timber, &c.: it is stocked with Saxon, Devon, and Herefordshire cattle, and flocks of the South Down, Spanish, Leicester, and Romney breeds.

BURY, beyond, Parham Park, Lord De la Zouche. The mansion, though considerably modernized, is a fine old structure, with two principal fronts, situated in a rich park, abounding with stately groups of oak and other timber: the entrance leads into a handsome stone hall, about 40 feet by 24, and proportionably lofty, with an ornamented ceiling of roses and fleurs-de-lis; the walls are hung with various paintings; and the large transom windows exhibit some beautiful painted glass, representing subjects in sacred history. The handsome dining-room on the right hand likewise contains some good portraits and other paintings, as do also the library and old dining-room. The gallery at the top of the house is very curious, being upwards of 50 yards long, with a coved and ornamented ceiling. The church, a very small ancient edifice, stands in a grove about 300 yards from the front of the house, and has a chapel on its south side, almost covered with ivy, which is the burial-place of the Bishop family.	10$\frac{1}{4}$ 8 7$\frac{1}{2}$ 5$\frac{1}{2}$ 4$\frac{1}{4}$ 2$\frac{3}{4}$	☞ to Byworth Street Fittleworth ☞ to Pulborough 3 m. Fittleworth Bridge Cross the river Arun Bury Turn ☞ pike Here you join the Road to Arun del, through Pulborough. Bury, White Horse Houghton Hill, summit of $\frac{3}{4}$ m. farther, ☞ to Steyning 12$\frac{1}{2}$ m. To Chichester 11 m. ☞ * ARUNDEL, Church	50 52$\frac{1}{4}$ 52$\frac{3}{4}$ 54$\frac{3}{4}$ 56 57$\frac{1}{2}$ 60$\frac{1}{4}$	BURY TURNPIKE. The city of Chichester, situated near an arm of the sea, on a gentle eminence, nearly surrounded by the little river Lavant, is a place of great antiquity, dating its origin before the Roman invasion, when it became an important station of those conquerors. The city principally consists of four spacious and well-paved streets, meeting in a centre, and named from their situation after the four cardinal points of the compass. At the end of each street was formerly a gate; and the city is surrounded with a stone wall, supposed, with the exception of the bastions, to be the work of the Romans. Chichester has six parish churches within the walls; it had also two without, but the inhabitants demolished them, to prevent their being occupied by the parliament forces, who besieged the city in the reign of Charles I. The mansion is of great extent, having a singularly handsome front, 173 feet in length; it is in the best style of architecture, by Battesla Leoni, who was much employed about the beginning of the last century. A venerable residence, built in the reign of Elizabeth, was partly destroyed by fire, and the present structure was begun by Sir W. Goring, in 1723. J. Bid-dulph, Esq., who succeeded to it, brought it to completion, externally; and within these few years, the apartments have been fitted up with judgement and taste. The saloon is a remarkably fine room, 46 feet by 30. The site is extremely beautiful, in a large park, picturesquely diversified, and intersected by a succession of small lakes falling into each other. Fronting the south aspect, the bold headlands, which divide the county, rise majestically: Duncton Hill, and Lavington Down, are immediately opposite, and are broken into knolls, richly invested in groves of low wood. NEWPORT, 1 m. before, Fairlee, J. White, Esq.	15	From * Cowes to		PIDFORD. Pidford House, Sir L. T. Worsley Holmes, Bart.
NEWPORT, generally considered the metropolis of the Isle of Wight, is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the island, on the west bank of the Medina river, which is navigable up to the quay. The houses are mostly built of brick, disposed into streets, crossing each other at right angles. The church is a chapel of ease to Carisbrook; it is a spacious but low building, having an embattled tower at the west end. Newport has a theatre, two elegant assembly rooms, and a handsome modern built town-hall; it sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Wednesday and Saturday.	10	* NEWPORT	5	NITON, 1½ m. distant, Blackgang Chine, a rude chasm that commences on the S.W. declivity of St. Catherine's Hill, and forms a very striking object, when seen from the shore, owing to the impending and overhanging cliffs, and the dark hue and nakedness of the mouldering precipices: its appearance is rendered particularly impressive and awful after heavy rains, and during stormy seasons, when the stream is seen hurrying down a steep channel for about 200 yards, and then falling in a perpendicular sheet of 40 feet; but in dry weather the grandeur of this view is much lessened from the want of water.

THE NEEDLES are a number of sharp-pointed rocks at the western extremity of the island, and obtained their name from one which resembled a needle in shape, and stood 120 feet high above low water mark; but this singular object was undermined and thrown down by the force of the waves about 60 years ago, and totally disappeared. The cliffs here are remarkably high, many of them being 600 feet above the level of the sea; and, when viewed from the water, present a very picturesque appearance, being perforated by deep caverns and chasms, from whence issue, in many places, springs, which form small cascades, rippling down to the sea: they are also frequented by numerous flocks of various marine birds; these the inhabitants take, by descending from the tops, by means of ropes fastened to irons driven into the ground; which perilous occupation is the employment of many, who derive profit from the sale of the birds, the feathers to the merchants, and the carcasses to the fishermen to bait their crab pots.	14	Calbourne	6	SHORWELL. NEWTOWN appears formerly to have been a place of considerable extent and importance, and although now reduced to not more than ten or a dozen cottages, is still a borough, returns two members to parliament, and is governed by a mayor and corporation. The haven of Newtown is very secure, and at high water will admit vessels of 500 tons burden. Here are several salterns.	12 $\frac{1}{2}$	From * Cowes to		SHALFLEET. CARISBROOK. Carisbrook Castle. The origin of this ancient fortress is uncertain, but it is mentioned in the Saxon annals, as having been besieged and taken by Cerdic, in 530; it is situated on a commanding eminence, and occupies near 20 acres of ground: it appears to have been the residence of the lords of the island from the very earliest period; and since it became the property of the crown, has been the constant seat of the captains and governors. From the walls of the ancient keep, a most beautiful prospect is obtained of the island and parts of Hampshire. This castle was the prison of the unfortunate Charles I. for a period of three months, during which time several vain attempts	5 $\frac{1}{4}$	Newtown	7 $\frac{1}{4}$	were made to effect his escape; the ruins of the apartments occupied by the king are still shown. Here is a well 200 feet deep, which supplies very pure water for the use of the castle. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the fortifications were strengthened and improved by new works, raised partly at the expense of the inhabitants, those who could not afford to subscribe money contributing labour. The village of Carisbrook lies at the bottom of Castle Hill, on the banks of a small rivulet; it was once a market town and the capital of the island, but few vestiges of its ancient importance are now existing. The principal remain is its church, which was formerly more extensive than at present, the north aisle and chancel having been destroyed: this structure occupies the site of a still more ancient edifice; it consists of a body and south aisle,

		The Needles	5½

THE ISLE OF WIGHT is included within the jurisdiction of Hampshire, but separated from it by a channel of varying breadth, from two to seven miles. It is supposed that this island was formerly connected with the main land, but that the isthmus has been washed away by the violence of the sea. Its form is an irregular lozenge, and it contains a surface of about 100,000 acres. The face of the country is beautifully varied and romantic, comprising a charming combination of diversified landscapes, enriched by some of the most animated and interesting marine views in the kingdom ; while the salubrity of the climate, approximating to the mildness of more southern regions, and the flourishing state of its luxuriant vegetation, certainly entitle it to particular attention. The land round the coast, on the southern shore, is singularly picturesque ; and indeed a tour through the Isle of Wight will amply gratify the traveller. The time necessary for visiting the most remarkable objects in this island is about a week ; and the best method is to make the town of Newport head-quarters, where there is a certainty of obtaining lodgings, the charges at the principal inns being very extravagant : hence excursions may be made, and the whole island surveyed by means of easy routes.

BRIGHTON, a sea-port and market town, deriving its celebrity partly from its proximity to London, but principally from being the fashionable resort of persons of distinction, for the purpose of sea-bathing, is situated on an eminence that declines gently towards the south-east, with a regular slope to the Steyne, from whence it again stretches with a moderate ascent along the cliffs, to a considerable distance. The amphitheatrical range of hills by which it is protected from the north and north-easterly winds, are of easy access, and covered with an agreeable verdure, their summits commanding a good view of the weald of Sussex. The air is particularly salubrious, and the soil naturally dry, which united advantages, together with the distinguished honour it has attained as the residence of royalty, and the numerous amusements provided by the inhabitants, have latterly caused, during the season, an influx of beauty and fashion unparalleled in the annals of watering places. This observation is borne out by the well-known fact, that since the year 1811 its population has more than doubled; and still Brighton, like the metropolis, is extending itself in every direction, in order to afford sufficient accommodation for the company, which evidently increases every year. It has recently, in one instance only, experienced the addition of 400 houses, all of	15	Rice Bridge Cross a branch of riv. noble dimensions, in a place bearing the name of Kemp Town, which stands at the extremity of the East Cliff. The original buildings are chiefly composed of flint-stones and mortar, with brick-work for the door and window cases; but the majority of the more recent erections are extremely elegant and commodious, particularly those in Bedford and Regency Squares, the Royal Crescent, the Old and New Steyne, Marine Parade, Kemp Town, and numerous detached residences. The town is of a quadrangular form, the streets intersecting each other at right angles; it is furnished with several hotels, and two sets of assembly rooms; besides which, it contains a number of good boarding-houses; a very handsome theatre; various hot, cold, and air-pump water baths, some of them on a new construction, combining all the luxuries of the baths of the east, and highly salutary in many diseases; and numerous machines on the beach, for the use of those who prefer the rough embraces of Neptune to the more insipid attractions of artificial places of immersion. Here are likewise libraries, supplied with all the newspapers and periodical publications; two banks; and a club, consisting of 200 members, all peers, members of parliament, or members of clubs in London.

The Pavilion, belonging to His Majesty, who has shewn his superior taste by considerably enlarging and im- proving the building, which, till within these few years, might rather be considered as a cottage ornée, than an edifice worthy of a sovereign, and capable of sus- taining the splendour necessa- rily attached to a court. The present very magnificent palace is situated on the west side of the Steyne, and, together with the attached pleasure-grounds, (laid out from the designs of Repton,) occupies about 7 acres, much of which is well planted with trees, so judiciously placed as to add considerable beauty to the scene. The walls are of brick, covered and ornamented with the patent mastic, which is of the most delicate stone col- our: the cupolas and minarets are framed and covered with iron, but also finished with a coating of mastic: and it must be satisfactory to learn that du- rability has not been made sub- servient to beauty; for, as His Majesty has, in the erection of this terrestrial paradise, placed on British ground the most origi- nal, unique, and perhaps mag- nificent structure in Europe, it would be matter of deep regret were it liable to a speedy decay. number of niches which have recently been elegantly furnished with glass cases, and stored with a splendid collection of the literature of this country, including the library that His late Majesty had in his palace at Kew. The dome over the centre of the building is fitted up as a billiard room, it is entirely surrounded by windows, and supplied with a number of telescopes and other optical instruments, so that the visitors of the Pavilion may here either amuse themselves with that noble scientific game, or enjoy at their ease the beautiful prospects over the surrounding country and the sea. The whole of the furniture and ornamental finishings of this magnificent palace are in the Chinese style, and the extraordinary splendour of the state apartments is only equalled by the peculiar refinement of taste by which they were designed and arranged. Among the numerous embellishments of the Pavilion may be mentioned the very costly and truly unique vases and beautiful Chinese figures, that are placed in niches and recesses made for their reception; the former, of large dimensions, are of rare and extreme beauty, and the latter, the size of life, almost unequalled for execution. To this establishment a royal chapel has also been added, which was consecrated in the presence of His Majesty and a large assemblage of the nobility, on the 1st of Jan. 1822; the interior is fitted up in a style of suitable magnificence, and does infinite credit to the taste and ability of the person by whom it was designed. Our magnanimous Monarch has likewise here erected some very spacious and splendid stables, which are situated on the northern side of the grounds, and contain beautiful stalls for 68 horses; these surround a circular area of nearly 100 feet diameter, surmounted by a magnificent dome, only 20 feet less in span than that of St. Paul's cathedral.

REIGATE is situated at the foot of the ridge of chalky downs that crosses the county, and consists of two streets, the principal, or the High Street, running nearly east and west, and the other, called Bell Street, from north to south: it is supplied with excellent water from wells dug in the rock, which is composed of a beautiful white sand, said not to be equalled for colour by any in the kingdom. The church stands at the eastern extremity of the town, and contains several costly monuments: it is constructed of better materials than the generality of these buildings throughout the county, being of squared chalk, or lime-stone, probably from the neighbouring quarries; and has two aisles extending through the chancel nearly to the east end of the nave, and an embattled tower of hewn stone. The market-house was erected about the year 1708; it is a small brick building, with piazzas below, and a room above for the purposes of a town-hall; and contiguous to it is a place called The Clock House, that was designed as a prison for felons and others, who are brought to the Easter Sessions, held at Reigate. Behind the principal street, on the north side of the town, stood the castle, but no part of the building now remains. Reigate sends two members to parlia-

The red hall entrance, though small, is elegant, and contains several pictures; the drawing-room, on the first floor, is an octagon, ornamented with a variety of small paintings, and commanding a prospect of Norwood, Shooter's Hill, Hampstead, Highgate, and part of London. Lord Derby subsequently added a large brick building at the west end, with four towers at each corner; and a similar erection at the east end now renders the structure uniform. The grounds and plantations are about two miles in circumference, and contain a number of ancient beeches. The approach to this house is thought to equal any thing of the kind in the kingdom: from the lodge, which is on the summit of the hill leading to Reigate, the road winds beautifully down the park for a mile, amid woods and groves of fir, presenting here and there, through breaks, some enchanting views of the country below. From the south front of the house the prospects are rich, various, and extensive. At the foot of the sloping eminence on which it is situated, is a fine lake of 40 acres, enriched with 2 beautiful well-planted islands, the haunts of swans and other aquatic fowls. The adjacent country is finely broken, and diversified by wood-crowned hills and luxuriant vales.

convent of Augustine canons was founded here, some trifling remains of which are still to be seen,
but the site is occupied by a cop-

printed cottons. In this convent, in 1236, was held the parliament
in which were enacted the fam-

parish church appears from the style of its architecture, to have been coeval with the convent.

considerably heightened by the

richly cultivated valley, which is finely contrasted with the bold

the magnificent seat of the Duke of Norfolk.ARUNDEL is pleasantly situated on the declivity of a commanding hill on the north-west bank of the river Arun, and
consists of two principal streets,
one of them running north and south, and the other westward
from their common centre; the houses are in general of a respectable character, and many of those belonging to the Duke of Norfolk have been rebuilt in the Gothic castellated style. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, stands at the northern extremity of the town; it is a handsome Gothic edifice, with transepts, from the centre of
which rises a low square tower,
surmounted by a small wooden
spire, and contains several beautiful monuments of the Earls of Arundel, but the chapel, which has for ages served as the burial-place of the noble owners of the castle, is in a ruinous state.
Arundel has a small but neat theatre, and a stone bridge of three arches over the Arun; it is not a place of much trade, but sends two members to parliament, and has two weekly markets, on Wednesday and Saturday.From

to the summit, in the progress
of which he has an opportunity of witnessing the most pleasing varieties in the landscape that gradually expands itself to the view, while the upland prospect,
still varying in perspective, increases in effect, till at length
the summit, on which the tower
stands, is attained: hence the eye ranges over a boundless and truly enchanting scene, displaying the rich and highly cultivated country, by which it is surrounded, to singular advantage; the whole, enlivened by the ever-varying tints of nature, and animated with lively villages, appearing to the enraptured eye of the spectator like a
map. To the south, through an opening in the downs, called Beding Gap, the blue water of the ocean is distinctly visible at a distance of 30 miles; to the north, over Box Hill, the cupola
of St. Paul's is seen at 26 miles distance; and towards the east,
the tower in Heathfield Park
forms an interesting object in the landscape. Nettled, in Oxfordshire, portions of Hants, Berks, Bucks, Herts, Kent, and Essex,
are also distinctly visible; and
with the assistance of a glass, part of Wilts is likewise included in the view. Leith Hill Tower was built in 1766 by R. Hull, Esq., who then resided at Leith Hill Place: on the demise of this gentleman, according to an injunction contained in his will, his remains were
deposited under the tower,
which was subsequently repaired,
heightened, and the entrance
bricked up; it is now, however,
in such a rapid state of decay, as
must, at no distant period, terminate in its total demolition unless it be rescued by the public spirit
of the surrounding nobility and gentry, from whose estates it forms so fine an object in the view, not to mention its general
utility to mariners as a sea-mark.BILLINGHURST, just

TURNHAM GREEN. Sutton Court, Hon. Col. Cavendish; Corney House, John Hobbs, Esq.; Grove House, Mrs. Lowth; and Chiswick House, Duke of Devonshire. The central part of this edifice was planned and executed by Lord Burlington, of whose fine taste and architectural judgement it remains a lasting memorial: the wings were subsequently added by the late Duke of Devonshire. The exterior appearance is extremely beautiful, and the interior has numerous claims to admiration, the effect of which is considerably heightened by a profuse distribution of choice and valuable paintings. Here the Rt. Hon. C. J. Fox breathed his last, in Sept. 1806. The gardens, originally laid out in that taste which prefers regular figures, and multitudes of sculptured decorations, to the more natural modern method of embellishing nature by a judicious distribution of her own beauties, are yet sufficiently varied to give them a very pleasing appearance; all the subsequent alterations being introduced in such a manner as to preserve the original design. Many of the statues, &c. are antique; and the flower-garden, forcing-houses, and conservatory, are extremely beautiful and extensive.

This mansion stands nearly on the same site formerly occupied by a noble seat that was erected in 1663 by Webb, a pupil of Inigo Jones, and was for some years inhabited by Princess Amelia, aunt to his late Majesty. — Near the above is the seat of Major Morrison.

SALISBURY, 3 m. before, Clarendon Lodge, unoccupied. This seat was long the residence of royalty: the ruins of the old palace are still to be seen, but in such a decayed state, that no idea can be formed as to the magnitude or style of the building. Here many of our sovereigns held their courtly residence in all the pomp of feudal splendour; and in the reign of Henry II. a council was held, in which those laws respecting ecclesiastical authority were enacted, which are called "the Constitutions of Clarendon." About 1 m. from the ruins is situated the Lodge, a modern edifice, surrounded by extensive and beautiful grounds, abundantly wooded, and enlivened by an expansive lake. — At Salisbury, Laverstock House, Sir *J. during the civil wars, when it was garrisoned for Charles I., but was afterwards completely repaired by Col. Francis Fulford: it is described by Westcote and Prince, as being—"without, well accommodated with gardens, fish-ponds, and a park; within, with a beautiful oratory, neatly wainscotted and seated, and richly paved with white polished marble, as is the great hall chequer-wise with white and black marble. The staircase, a piece of exquisite workmanship, diversified with various kinds of wood, artificially inlaid, the carved ceiling of which is exceedingly well executed, conducts us to a noble dining-room, or drawing-room, very handsomely furnished. In this drawing-room is to be seen a portrait of Charles I. seated in his royal robes. This picture was painted by Vandike after his Majesty's condemnation, and given to Sir Francis Fulford, Knt. as a testimony of royal approbation. Here too, is a very large picture, representing the battle of Graveline in 1558." The variety of fine paintings and carvings throughout the rooms are indeed very numerous. The approach to the house from the lodge, is about a mile through the park, which abounds with a variety of forest-trees, and presents a great inequality of surface, that, combining with many views of distant country, renders the scenery greatly diversified, and highly interesting.

CROCKERNWELL. The neighbourhood of this village is finely wooded, and the banks of the romantic river Teign, which are more peculiarly attractive, are thus described by the learned and intelligent Mr. Polwhele:—"The wildness of wood and rock, now washed by the Teign, now starting from the sides of the hills, seems, in a word, the discriminating feature. To instance one of the wildest spots: where the Teign runs at the base of the 'Moving Rock,' we descend into the valley, amidst vast masses of granite; and looking back, when we have reached the river, we see them, as it were, bursting asunder, and only prevented from falling by their chains of ivy. In other places, enormous ledges, overshadowed by oaken foliage, appear like the ruins of a castle. This is particularly the case in the vicinity of the cromlech, where the berry of the mountain-ash, here remarkably luxuriant, has a beautiful appearance from chasms of rock encrusted with pale moss. The views from this spot are delightful: the eye reposes with pleasure on the richness of the woods of Whiddon, after contemplating precipices that seem ribbed with iron; and follows the receding hills, wave after wave, till they are lost in azure."

The mansion stands in the midst of a finely wooded scene, and some years since received considerable additions, at which time the grounds were likewise planted and much improved; but what more particularly enhances the beauty of the place, is a large and very fine piece of water, called the Loe Pool. The scenery surrounding this lake is exceedingly picturesque, combining almost every characteristic excellence necessary to form a good picture. The rocks start abruptly from its margin, and the sides of the neighbouring hills are clothed with a fine hanging wood. On the south, the prospect is only terminated by the faint streak which seems to unite the sea with the firmament; and on the north, hill retiring behind hill, in aerial perspective, catching the fleeting but beautiful effects of light and shade, and always presenting a new appearance, cannot fail to please every admirer of nature; while additional beauty is imparted to the view by the number of distances, the wavy outline of the hills,

MARAZION, or MARKET JEW. This town enjoys a peculiar degree of salubrity from the nature of its situation at the foot of a hill, by which it is completely sheltered from the cold winds, and open only to the genial breezes of a western climate; its principal trade consists in the importation of timber, coals, and iron, for the use of the neighbouring mines; and the weekly market is held on Saturday. This place formerly derived its chief support from the numerous pilgrims and religious devotees, who, during the dark ages of superstitious ignorance, resorted to that celebrated scene of popish priestcraft, St. Michael's Mount, which is situated about a quarter of a mile from the town, and is one of those rare productions of nature the sublime character of which is calculated to strike the mind of the beholder with reverential awe. The mount is an isolated rocky promontory, which, together with the tower of the chapel, erected on the summit, rises to the height of 250 feet from the level of the sea, and presents the appearance of a pyramid; a few scattered plantations of firs also give a sombre finish to the scene. This interesting spot is almost as eminently distinguished in the page of history, for its military, as PENZANCE, the most westerly town in England, is situated on the N. W. side of Mount's Bay. The seasons here are extremely mild, and the land in the neighbourhood so uncommonly fertile, that in some instances it has been let at upwards of 12l. an acre; and averages generally, round the town, at 7l.: these circumstances have considerably augmented the population, and increased the size and respectability of the town, which is paved, contains some good houses, and has a market on Thursday. Penzance enjoys the advantages of a considerable export trade in tin and pilchards, to facilitate which, a new pier was erected about 50 years ago, at the expense of the corporation. This is the principal port of departure for the Scilly Islands.

religious importance, and, either viewed at a distance, or minutely explored, is inexpressibly grand, and claims particular attention from the admirers of the sublime and beautiful; the views from the summit are likewise extensive and magnificent, including the entire view of the bay, the several towns and villages that skirt the coast, and an immense extent of sea, which "raises the most sublime emotions, as the waves of the British, Irish, and Atlantic seas, all roll within the compass of the sight."

NEWLYN. Castle Hornick, unoccupied.

THE LAND'S END. This is the most westerly promontory on the English coast: it is composed of huge and rugged rocks, the sight of which, forming a barrier amidst the tremendous and ceaseless roaring of the waves, cannot fail to impress the observer with sentiments of the most exalted admiration. Several masses of rock appear above the sea, at a distance of one mile from the Land's End, called the Long Ships; on the largest is erected a light-house, to warn the mariner of this dangerous point; notwithstanding which, a number of melancholy accidents happen here.

STONE HENGE. The true origin of this stupendous structure yet remains a matter of doubt; it is a subject on which our antiquaries widely differ in opinion: but the majority have pronounced it to be the ruins of a Druidical temple. Seventeen huge stones are now standing, which, with seven others, lying on the ground, form the outward circular, or oval range: the inward circle is about eight feet from the outward one, and has eleven stones standing, and eight fallen; between these two circles is a walk of about 300 feet in circumference, the appearance of the whole from which is singularly awful and surprising. MERE, though now only a small market-town, was formerly of considerable importance, and had a castle belonging to it, which occupied the summit of an adjoining eminence; very few traces of the fortress, however, now remain, but the knoll on which it stood is still denominated Castle Hill, in memory of its ancient appropriation. The houses are both indifferently built and ill arranged. In the centre of the town stands a small cross or market-house; but the only building here worthy of notice is the church, a spacious edifice, with a handsome square tower attached to the west end. The inhabitants of Mere are principally occupied in the manufacture of dowlas and bed-tick, which likewise furnish employment to many persons in the neighbouring villages and hamlets. It is said to have been, in the year 1612, a mile in circumference at the top, having four trenches, and between each an earthen wall, encircling an area of 20 acres, full of ruins and relics of old buildings. Many Roman coins have been found here, and among other works of antiquity, a silver horse-shoe is mentioned by Stow. A part of these ruins is denominated King Arthur's Palace. The rampart is composed of large stones covered with earth, it has but one entrance, which faces the east, and is guarded by several ditches: there are various opinions respecting the origin of this place, but the most probable conjecture appears to be that of attributing it to the Romans.

stones are from eighteen to twenty feet high, from six to seven broad, and about three feet thick; round it are numerous barrows, covered with earth, raised chiefly in the form of a bell. Many of those which have been opened have contained human skeletons, urns, and military weapons. From Stone Henge, an avenue, about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. long, between two ditches, leads to the cursus, which is 2 m. in length, and enclosed by two ditches, 350 feet asunder, having a bank, or long barrow, at each end. Dr. Stukely fixes the date of the erection of Stone Henge, 460 years before Christ.

At about 85 $\frac{1}{2}$ m., Yarnbury Castle, a fine specimen of ancient fortification.

ZEALS GREEN. Stourhead House, Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart. The mansion was erected about the year 1721, by Henry Hoare, Esq., ancestor of the present possessor. Various alterations have subsequently been made; the most considerable of them being the erection of two wings in 1798; one of which is appropriated to a picture gallery, the other to a library; and these, together with the other apartments, contain an exceedingly valuable and choice collection of paintings, drawings, books, and curiosities. The pleasure-grounds of Stourhead have an exalted claim to our attention, being replete with sylvan beauties, and picturesque varieties. The scenery, naturally grand and diversified, consisting of ridges of hills, deep narrow valleys, and rivulets, has been most judiciously cultivated. The sides and summits of the eminences are clothed with wood; one of the valleys is filled with water, by means of an artificial dam; and the woods and groves are enlivened throughout with walks, temples, seats, &c. From the house a close avenue of laurel-hedges leads to the brow of a precipice, beneath which is seen the village church, and a few neat cottages in a dale; beyond this, another hill rises equally rapid, covered with wood; and from this spot a path, winding through a fine plantation, conducts to a spacious lake, which, though formed by art, presents a beautifully wild and diversified appearance; in some places, forming narrow creeks, and at others spreading its expansive bosom "to the garish eye of day;" in many parts it is also enveloped in hanging woods, through which several temples appearing, greatly increase the beauty of the coup-d'œil. From the contracted limits of this work but a very faint idea can however be given of the numerous beauties contained in these extensive and truly delightful gardens. Within the grounds is an encampment of a circular form, consisting of a double ditch and vallum, with entrances towards the east and

Its form is triangular, with round towers at each corner; and it is 160 feet high; a flight of steps, on the inside, leads to the top, which commands a most extensive and richly diversified prospect.

HONITON stands in a delightful vale, upon a rising ground on the south side of the river Otter, and commands a fine view of the surrounding country, which presents to the eye a variegated extent of corn and pasture, beautifully interwoven. The town consists principally of one broad handsome street, running from east to west, and another crossing it at right angles: through the former flows a small stream of clear water, from which the inhabitants are supplied by a dipping-place opposite almost every door. The buildings are mostly modern, and covered with slate, an improvement that originated from two dreadful fires with which the town was visited during the last century. The chief article of manufacture is broad lace, and edgings, considerable quantities of which are disposed of in the metropolis. The church, situated on a bold eminence, about half a mile from the town, was originally a small chapel for mendicant friars, but was enlarged about the year 1482; it has a curious screen which separates the chancel from the nave, and contains several ancient monuments. POOLE. In Poole Harbour, on Brownsea Island, Brownsea Castle, Sir Charles Chad, Bart. This island is of an irregular oval shape, about one mile and a half long, by three quarters of a mile at its extreme breadth, and considering the sandy nature of the soil, much has been done in the way of improvement, by planting and rendering arable many acres. It is productive of several curious plants.

HAMPTON COURT, a royal palace, was originally built by Cardinal Wolsey in a style of superior magnificence to any thing then existing: such was the magnitude, and so various and costly were the decorations bestowed on this mansion, (it contained 280 silk beds for visitors,) that it far exceeded all the royal palaces, and thence created much envy against the Cardinal, who, to screen himself from its effects, presented the palace, enriched with all its costly furniture, to Henry VIII., and it has continued a royal demesne ever since. The palace consists of three quadrangles; the first and second are ancient, but the third, comprising the royal apartments, was built by King William, under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren. The grand façade, towards the garden, extends 330 feet, and that facing the Thames, 228 feet. The portico and colonnade of the grand entrance, and indeed the general design of

This seat was purchased by government, in 1816, for the country residence of the late Princess Charlotte, and her illustrious consort: the sum paid for it was 69,000*l.*, full 30,000*l.* less than it cost the famous Lord Clive for the erection of the grounds, and the improvement of the grounds, both of which were executed by Brown. The present structure forms an oblong square of 44 yards by 34, it occupies a well-chosen situation, commanding many fine views, and on the principal front a flight of 13 steps leads to the grand entrance, under a pediment resting on Corinthian columns: there are eight spacious rooms on the ground-floor, besides the entrance-hall and great staircase. The home-demense contains about 430 acres; the park, and other parts of the estate, about 1600 acres, in several farms. A small Gothic building that was erected in the garden for the Princess, has, since her demise, been converted into a mausoleum, dedicated to her memory; it contains a fine bust of her Royal Highness, and the windows are ornamented with beautifully painted glass by Backler.

During the progress of the workmen, the die of a seal was found, which, on being cleaned, proved to be the seal of the Commonwealth of England, and was supposed by the artist Vertue, who saw it in 1760, to be the identical seal that Oliver took from the Parliament. WINCHESTER, a city of high antiquity, enjoyed all the advantages, and experienced all the vicissitudes, incidental to the seat of government, and principal royal residence, from the union of the Saxon kingdom, under Egbert, till during the reign of Edward the First, when, the increasing importance of London occasioning the removal of the court, it began to decline. The city is agreeably situated on the declivity of a hill, gradually sloping to the river Itchin; it is not a place of much trade; but the principal business of the county of Hampshire is transacted here, which occasions a considerable influx of strangers; and it is the residence of many respectable families: it possesses also the advantage of an immediate communication with the sea, by means of a navigable canal. Among the public buildings which embellish the city of Winchester, its ancient and venerable cathedral stands pre-eminently conspicuous. This edifice exhibits an excellent school for the study of our ancient architecture, in its progress through the styles respectively denominated Saxon, Norman, and English. It also obtains an imperative influence, from the importance of the scenes that have been transacted within its walls, and the monuments to distinguished charac-

ROMSEY is situated on the river Test, which falls into Southampton Bay; and the canal from Southampton to Andover, passes through the town: it was formerly noted for its monastery of Benedictines, founded by King Edgar, of which little remains, except the church, a noble edifice, built in the form of a cross, and arched with stone of beautiful Saxon architecture: it contains several curious and ancient monuments; but the most singular curiosity is an apple-tree growing on the leads of the roof, which produces good fruit; the origin of this tree is not remembered by the oldest inhabitant. The college at Winchester was founded by Bishop Wykeham, between the years 1387 and 1393; its buildings occupy a considerable space of ground, and retain the venerable aspect of the date at which the foundation was completed. Of the more modern erections, the town-hall, the infirmary, and the county gaol, upon the plan of the celebrated Howard, are the most considerable. The churches and chapels were formerly not less than ninety in number, of which there are now remaining scarcely twelve. Here is a neat theatre; and occasional music-meetings are held at Winchester, which has also its winter assemblies, concerts, balls, races, and every other fashionable amusement. The church is a lofty ancient fabric, and has a fine embattled tower. This town sends 2 members to parliament. Corfe Castle is built on a steep rocky hill, and is surrounded by walls of such considerable thickness, as to have made it one of the most impregnable fortresses in the kingdom previous to the invention of artillery. On the summit of the hill, though not in the centre of the fortress, is the citadel, which commands a boundless view of the north and west. It is supposed to have been built by King Edgar, who here kept his court; and King John kept the regalia of his crown in this place; it has been the residence of several Saxon Princes, and the unfortunate Edward the Martyr was murdered here.

WEYMOUTH is a place of considerable antiquity, but was small and indifferently built, till within these last 30 or 40 years, when, from being much resorted to as a bathing-place, it became greatly enlarged, and has now many elegant buildings. The church is a low edifice, consisting of 3 aisles; the altar-piece is universally admired. Weymouth formerly carried on a considerable trade, and was the principal port of the county, but it is now rivalled by Poole. Being sheltered by the surrounding hills, possessing a pure air, a fine beach of sand, and a calm bay, formed by a semi-circle of more than 2 miles, it is well adapted as a bathing-place: near the centre of the town is a commodious hot salt-water bath; there are likewise private cold baths. The theatre is neatly fitted up, and has a good company. The assembly-room is very spacious and lofty, and the

The port is defended by two castles, Sandford, and Portland. The fashionable promenade is on the esplanade, which is about half a mile long, and 30 feet broad. The look-out on the Weymouth side of the river, is another pleasant and much frequented walk, commanding a beautiful prospect of the bay, and Portland isles; and in the vicinity is a battery of heavy cannon, and some cavalry barracks. The abbey church was a very extensive and truly noble structure, of which but a trifling fragment remains, though a great portion of it was standing so late as the year 1770. Mr. Weld, the present proprietor, has been at the expense of clearing away the rubbish, and erecting a building, the style of which corresponds with the ruins, for the convenience of those persons who may occasionally visit this place; the walks also have been planted with rows of trees, and the fish-ponds cleaned out, and re-stocked. LYME REGIS is a noted bathing place: it stands on the slope of a hill, and contains many very handsome modern buildings. This borough, which sends 2 members to parliament, stood a regular siege in the year 1644, against the royalists. The Duke of Monmouth landed here, June 11th, 1685; and that year Lyme witnessed the execution of 12 individuals, who fell victims to the barbarous judicature of the infamous Jeffreys, by whose influence, it is affirmed, no less than 600 persons were executed, and their quarters set up in the various towns and highways. The chief public structure is the cobb, or pier, which is of the greatest importance on this coast, as there is no other shelter for shipping between Star Point and the Portland Road; and although at this place the sea rages with great violence, vessels ride as securely as in a wet-dock. Thomas Coram, the benevolent patron and projector of the Foundling Hospital, was born here about the year 1668; he died in his lodgings, near Leicester Square, in 1751, and was buried, at his request, under the chapel of that foundation.	From Exmouth 168	From Hyde Park Corner to * BRIDPORT, Dorset., page 45 Chidiock Charmouth To Axminster 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. ☞ ☞ to * LYME REGIS To Axminster 5 m. ☞ Cross the  river Axe Colyford, Devonshire To Colyton 1 m. ☞ London to * COLYTON 150 m. 3 m. farther, To Colyton 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ m. ☞ 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. beyond Colyford, To Ottery St. Mary 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. ☞ Sidford Forward to Exeter 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. Castle, Earl of Digby. This beautiful seat is of singular structure, both in its external appearance, and internal arrangement; the building is in the form of the Roman letter H, and was erected at various periods under different proprietors; the centre, which is the most ancient, was built by the renowned Sir Walter Raleigh. The apartments contain several fine paintings, among which, is the celebrated procession of Queen Elizabeth, ascribed to Marc Gerrard, her Majesty's painter. The park, containing 340 acres, nearly surrounds the mansion, and is abundantly wooded. The grounds are highly picturesque, and diversified by several sheets of water and groves, one of which is said to have been planted by the unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh, and still retains his name. — Leaving Sherborne, West Hall, Col. YEOVIL is a large flourishing town, situated on the river Yeo, or Ivel, (whence it derives its name,) which passes here under a stone bridge of three arches. It contains about twenty streets and lanes, some of the former are wide and open, and the houses are in general good, many of them built of stone. The church is a fine old Gothic structure, and contains a beautiful altar-piece, supported by fine fluted pillars, surmounted by Corinthian capitals. The market house is 70 feet long, and is well calculated for the extensive business done in it on Friday, which is market-day. The country round this town is greatly diversified by hill and dale, which are both in a state of very high cultivation.

YEOVIL. Berwick House, J. Neuman, Esq.

CREWKERNE is delightfully situated in a valley, it receives considerable shelter from various cultivated hills, and is rendered truly interesting by the surrounding scenery. The church is a noble Gothic structure: in its centre rises a fine lofty embattled tower, surmounted by small turrets. The whole of this building, but more particularly the windows, are ornamented with carved work. The town chiefly consists of five streets: it has a market on Saturday, which is well attended. — Four miles from this place, towards Chard, the British and Bristol Channels are distinctly visible.

The church contains several curious monumental erections, and is a spacious and ancient edifice of stone, consisting of a nave, north aisle, chancel, and chapel on the south side, together with a tower and small steeple at the west end. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of fine broad cloths, many thousand pieces of which are annually made in this parish. AMESBURY, a small market-town, situated in the valley of the river Avon, is a place of great antiquity, and had formerly an abbey, the site of which, it is supposed, was afterwards occupied by Amesbury House, where, in the society of the Duke and Duchess of Queensbury, the poet Gay passed some of the happiest years of his life. Amesbury consists chiefly of two irregular streets, and the houses are indifferently built, and mean in their appearance: the chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the expenditure of travellers, and persons attracted here to visit Stone Henge, which is about two miles distant. The parish church, an ancient and curious edifice, thought to have been attached to the abbey, is built of stone and flint, and consists of a nave, with a south aisle, a chancel, a transept, and a tower rising from the centre. Repeated alterations and repairs have defaced many of the ancient features, but it still presents some parts that cannot fail to arrest the attention of the architectural antiquary. SHEPTON MALLET, like most manufacturing towns, is chiefly composed of narrow dirty streets and lanes. The manor of Shepton having been for many generations in the possession of the Mallet family, thence took the additional name of Mallet: the church is a large building; at its west end is a square tower, surmounted by a fine lofty spire. Near the centre of the town stands the market cross, an extremely curious piece of architecture, consisting of 5 arches, and supported by pentagonal columns: in the centre, a flat roof is supported by a large pillar, standing on 2 rows of steps, over which is a lofty pyramidal spire, crowned by an oblong entablature, on which is represented our Saviour on the cross, between the 2 malefactors; there are also some figures of saints. On a brass plate affixed to the central pillar is an inscription, by which it appears, that this cross was erected in the year 1500. Market on Friday.

is a spacious Gothic structure in the form of a cross, 380 feet long, and 130 wide: the west front has a very noble appearance; it is decorated with a great variety of carved figures of exquisite workmanship, placed in niches, and supported by elegant slender pillars of beautiful polished marble; over these are hierarchies, popes, princes, and bishops; and the whole is surmounted by finely executed images of the 12 apostles; the remainder of the front is occupied by a curious representation of the resurrection, and other scriptural pieces, pourtrayed in groups of high relief: one of the windows also contains some beautiful specimens of painted glass. The cloisters adjoining are spacious and elegant, and the chapter-house, in the form of a rotunda, is supported by a pillar in the centre. The episcopal palace is said to be the handsomest in the kingdom, though small: the pious bishop Kidder, and his lady, were killed here, in their bed, by the palace falling in, during the great storm, in 1703. The parish church of St. Cuthbert is a handsome building in the Gothic style, and is surmounted by a lofty square tower. This city returns 2 members to parliament, and has a market on Wednesday and Saturday. In that part called East Wells, which lies without the city liberty, the annual races are held.

SOMERTON was formerly the residence of several Saxon monarchs; and John, King of France, was confined here after his removal from Hertford. This town is supposed to have been a Roman citadel; but history is silent concerning it previous to the heptarchy, when it is said to have been of considerable extent, and strongly fortified. The church is an ancient edifice, having, at its south end, an octangular embattled tower, 63 feet high. Near the church is an excellent free-school; the town has also a well endowed alms-house for 8 poor women; and in the centre of it stands a hall for holding petty sessions. Every thing in this place conspires to restore health; the atmosphere being very salubrious, the soil dry and fertile, and the surrounding scenery particularly beautiful: the rich and very luxuriant vallies are also sheltered from the winds by highly cultivated hills. WINTERBOURN STOKE, 2 m. beyond, Yarnbury Castle, a fine specimen of ancient fortification, and well worthy of notice.

CASTLE CARY had formerly a castle, which William Lovell, its lord, defended during the civil wars in King Stephen's reign, against that monarch's forces. From this period no further mention is made of it in history; so that the place on which it stood is scarcely known to the inhabitants of the town, being only marked by an intrinched area of about 2 acres, called the camp, from which implements of war and bolts of iron have been frequently dug up. Castle Cary has a charter for holding markets, but they have been discontinued for many years, except occasionally, from Alhallow-tide to Easter. Here was also a manor-house, now almost entirely demolished, in which Charles II. sheltered himself after the battle of Worcester. This place contains a church, which, though of small dimensions, has a very pleasing appearance, being situated on an eminence, and kept in excellent repair. It consists of a nave, a chancel, and side aisles, and has an embattled tower surmounted by a spire. The country around Castle Cary is extremely beautiful, and the society to be found there so respectable, that it is deservedly considered as a place of very agreeable retirement.

TIVERTON. Collipriest House, Rev. Thomas Carew.

TIVERTON, a town of considerable antiquity, is pleasantly situated on the slope of a hill, and contains four principal streets disposed in the form of a quadrangle, inclosing an area of gardens, in the centre of which is a fine bowling-green. The principal buildings here are the castle, the church, and the free grammar school: the former stands in the west part of the town, and from its remains appears to have been a fortress of considerable strength; it was several times the scene of military operations during the reigns of Stephen and Charles I. The church is situated on an eminence at the N. W. end of the town; it is a more respectable Gothic pile than any in Devonshire, except St. Peter's at Exeter, and, though the work of different and distinct ages, is more regular than might have been reasonably expected. The south side is ornamented with some curious sculpture, and over the windows of the adjoining chapel, is a cornice of fine white marble, on which are represented many incidents in the life and actions of our Saviour. This church contains several costly monuments to the memory of illustrious individuals, and possesses an altar piece that has been much praised as a fine painting. The view from the church-yard is strikingly picturesque, and attracts the attention of most strangers: from the west wall hanging gardens are seen on the declivity; the Exe, in a serpentine course, 4 m., the hams, a fertile plain of pasture on its banks; the buildings of Westex; and, beyond all, the rising hills: the ruins of the castle, surrounded by a group of venerable trees, appear on the right; and the prospect is bounded on the left by Exe bridge. The tower, contiguous to the church, within a short distance of the west wall of the church-yard, likewise merits attention; it is a strong plain stone building, 27 feet square at the base, 100 feet high to the top of the battlements, and 16 feet higher to the top of the pinnacles, above the vanes: from the summit of this pile, a beautifully diversified prospect is enjoyed, that will amply reward the labour of ascending it. The free grammar-school is a fine building, cased with Purbeck stone, and divided into three parts by two arched stone porches; the entrance is through an elegant iron gate, under an arch, above which is an inscription, denoting that the building was erected at the sole cost of Peter Blundell, a native of this town. This gentleman also left lands for the maintenance and support of three scholars in each of the universities,

	SOUTH MOLTON , so called to distinguish it from the village of North Molton, is an ancient market and borough town, pleasantly situated on an eminence, near the west side of the river Moule. Previous to the Conquest, it formed part of the demesnes of Edward the Confessor; but in the reign of Edward I., belonged to William, Lord Martyn, who held, by the service of providing a man with a bow and three arrows, to attend the Earl of Gloucester, when hunting in the neighbourhood. The manor afterwards descended to James, Lord Audleigh, on the death of whose heir-male, in the reign of Richard II., it reverted by an entail to the crown. The mayor is assisted in the execution of his office by 18 capital burgesses, a recorder, town-clerk, and two sergeants-at-mace. This town was represented in parliament in the 30th of Edward I., but no return has been made since that period. It is also remarkable for having been appointed the see of a suffragan bishop, by an act made in the twenty-sixth of Henry VIII. The church is a spacious and handsome fabric, containing several good monuments, and a large organ. The guildhall is a convenient building; and the market-place, from which various streets branch out, is extensive and well built. Many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of serges, shalloons, and felts, and in the obtaining of lime from the various kilns in the neighbourhood. The education of the more respectable natives is provided for by a considerable free-school, founded in the year 1614; and those of the more inferior class, by a charity-school: in the former, the late Judge Buller was taught the rudiments of that extensive legal knowledge, through which he afterwards became so celebrated.

DUNSTER is a market town situated on the margin of a rich and fertile vale, opening towards the Bristol channel, and defended on every other side by lofty hills which rise in rapid succession behind each other. The town is at present very inconsiderable, both with regard to extent and population; it consists principally of two streets, one running in a north and south direction, and the other branching westward from the church; the former, by much the largest, is in general well built, and of a tolerable breadth. Dunster formerly sent members to parliament, but has now lost that privilege, yet the parishioners are entitled to vote in the election for the members for Minehead, which is nearly equivalent to a representation of their own. The church is one of the largest Gothic structures of the kind in England; it was built by Henry VII., as a mark of his gratitude for the assistance he received from the inhabitants of this town in the famous battle of Bosworth Field, which happily terminated the disputes between the houses of York and Lancaster. This church is divided into two parts by a tower, which rises in the centre to the height of 90 feet, and is supported by four large pillars. The eastern division is strip of all its furniture, but contains a number of fine monumental tombs, now fast falling to decay; and the other division is used for divine service, though possessing nothing worthy of particular notice.

This town is situated on the Bristol Channel, and consists of a few ill-built houses: the church is an ancient Gothic structure, with a tower at the west end, surmounted by a spire, which experienced considerable damage from a storm in the 17th century. In this building there are some handsome monuments. The scenery around Porlock is delightfully picturesque; towards the shore it is even grand and magnificent: it is defended on all sides by steep and lofty hills, covered with majestic timber, and intercepted by deep hollow glens and delightful valleys. Nature is here arrayed in her wildest and most romantic garb; the bold projecting rocks assume a thousand different forms, and are finely shaded and relieved by the verdant foliage which entwines itself around them. commands an agreeable prospect, and serves as a shade to the grounds below.

HOLFORD. Alfoxton, Langley St. Albyn, Esq.

MINEHEAD is divided into 3 parts; the Quay Town, and the Upper and Lower Towns. The former stands close to the shore, under the brow of a hill, one side of which is highly cultivated to the very summit, and the other is exceedingly steep and rugged; the rocks hang at a prodigious height over the houses, and appear to threaten them with destruction. The Upper Town is situated on the eastern slope of this hill, and consists of several irregular streets. The site of the Lower, or Middle Town, is about ¼ m. to the south-east of the beach. The surrounding prospect is extremely beautiful, consisting of rich luxuriant valleys, finely interspersed with lofty hills; and the climate of this place is so remarkably mild, that vegetation is a month earlier here, than in most parts of England. This cause also induces a number of persons to resort here for sea bathing, which contributes in a great degree to the welfare of the town. The church stands in the Upper Town, and is a large handsome building, 116 feet long, and 40 broad; the north aisle of which is adorned by an elegant alabaster statue of Queen Anne. This place sends 2 members to parliament, and has a market on Wednesday

PORLOCK. About 2 m. to the west, stands the small but singularly romantic village of Culbone, which is surrounded on every side by mountains that rise so high above the vale below, that the sun is not visible during three months of the year; and, for the same reason, it is scarcely possible to approach it on horse-back. These hills are covered with whortle berries, and a variety of mosses; and abound with wild deer, foxes, badgers, martin-cats, &c. The church, a neat Gothic edifice, covered with tiles, occupies the most romantic and delightfully picturesque situation imaginable; it stands in a little narrow cove, 400 feet above the level of the sea, and the surrounding hills rise in an almost perpendicular direction, to the height of 1200 feet, forming a noble amphitheatre at the back of the cove. Nature has here been particularly profuse in rearing trees, and these hills are covered with a great variety of different species. A beautiful rivulet also rushes through a narrow channel in the interior of this cove, and passing the church, forms a succession of cascades in flowing down the rocks into the sea.

At the south side of the church, which is a regular building of itself, is added another aisle 57 feet long and 17 feet wide, with a Gothic roof of free-stone curiously wrought, called Lane's aisle, it being built by John Lane, a clothier of Collumpton, who died in the reign of Henry VIII. At the west end, near the font, lie 2 very extraordinary pieces of oak, excessively hard, of a semi-circular form, and hollow, about 14 feet long, carved so as to represent an heap of grassy turf and human bones promiscuously thrown together. The tower is a beautiful pile of building 100 feet high, ornamented with various figures of lions, eagles, &c., and containing 8 bells and a good set of chimes. The principal trade of the town is the woollen manufacture, and the market is on Saturday.

CREDITON is an ancient and populous town, standing between two hills; it is divided into two parts, denominated the East and West Town; the latter was formerly far more extensive than at present; upwards of 450 houses having been destroyed by fire, in the year 1743. In 1769, a second fire consumed many of the buildings which had been erected on the site of those formerly burnt, together with the market-house and shambles: but these have since been rebuilt in a very handsome manner. The present church is an elegant structure, in the form of a cross; its tower is 100 feet high, and is situated in the centre of the building, on a semi-circular arch, supported by four pillars of uncommon magnitude; the interior is extremely neat, having a raised floor, and the pews being composed of the best wainscot: the east and west windows are very large, and decorated with rich tracery; the altar-piece is a most exquisite performance, representing Moses and Aaron sustaining the decalogue. On one side of the burial ground, formerly stood the cathedral, but no part of it now remains. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied with all kinds of provisions.

CHUMLEIGH is a small town, containing about 330 houses; the church was formerly collegiate, and four prebends are still annexed to the rectory. A tremendous thunder storm, in 1797, threw down the south-east pinnacle of the tower, which, falling on the roof of the church, did considerable damage. Here is a market on Friday.

NEW BRIDGE, 2 m. beyond, Tawstock Court, the seat of Sir Bouchier Wrey, Bart. The principal part of this mansion having been consumed by fire in the year 1787, it has since been rebuilt from the designs of Sir B. Wrey, who also greatly improved the grounds, and the whole does honour to his taste and judgement. The stately appearance of this place from the high road on the opposite side of the river Taw, affords infinite pleasure to the tourist, owing to the singularity of its situation between two verdant hills, richly skirted with forest-trees, but with a bold descent in front to the river, which meanders delightfully through the vale at the distance of half a mile, the boundary hills widening as they descend. The house is approached through extensive woods and park-grounds: the church near it contains many handsome monuments belonging to the family, and the place itself is remarkable for containing the best manor, noblest mansion, most curious church, and richest rectory, in the county.

BARNSTAPLE, a very ancient and respectable town, is situated on the eastern bank of the river Taw, in a broad and fertile vale, bounded by a semicircular range of hills. Previous to the Conquest, it was a royal demesne, and King Athelstan is said to have constituted it a borough, and to have built a castle here, near the confluence of the north Yeo with the Taw: of this fortress not any thing remains but a high artificial mount. Barnstaple appears to have been incorporated by Henry I.; yet, like Oakhampton, it still retains some traces of feudal jurisdiction; nearly 250 common burgesses claiming a prescriptive right of voting, with the corporate officers, for members of parliament. This right they deduce from the time of King Athelstan, and continue to exercise it, independent of the charters that have been granted to the town by different sovereigns. This town is one of the neatest and most respectable in Devon: the streets are spacious and regular, and the buildings generally good. "The woollen trade, formerly carried on here," observes Mr. Warner, "with considerable spirit, threw a largeness of money into the town, and enabled its inhabitants to beautify it with many very respectable houses: this trade has of late failed; but baize, silk stocking, and waistcoat manufactories, still give life to the place. Besides this source of wealth and population, the pleasing character of the country around, and the comparative cheapness of this part of England, have added to its inhabitants, by inducing many independent families to settle here entirely; a circumstance that renders Barnstaple by far the most genteel town in North Devon. It boasts, indeed, some of the marks of a metropolis, balls every fortnight, and a regular theatre; and nothing is wanting to render it completely agreeable. A noble quay stretches along the river side to a great length, terminated at one end by a handsome piazza, over the centre of which stands the statue of Queen Anne." The river here spreads to a considerable breadth; but, from the great increase of sand in its channel, the port is but shallow, and vessels of greater burthen than 200 tons cannot enter. Over the river is a stone bridge of 16 arches, which tradition reports to have been built by one of the Tracy's, when that family were lords of the town. The church is a spacious building, having a handsome spire, and being furnished with a good organ; before the Reformation it contained several chantries. John Gay, the celebrated author of the Beggar's Opera, and other esteemed pieces, was born in the vicinity of Barnstaple in the year 1683, and received his education at the grammar-school here.

* FONTHILL ABBEY. This seat, justly considered unique, whether viewed collectively, or in its subdivisions, cannot fail to awaken the most delightful sensations. The enclosure measures about 7 miles, surrounded by a stone wall, the internal features of which were diversified with a variety of scenic capabilities; and such was the taste and judgement exercised in the disposition and arrangement of the embellishments, that a journey of upwards of 20 miles might be made without retracing the same steps, in the progress of which, the scenery was equally beautiful, varied, and interesting. From the apex of a hill amidst these once delightful grounds, rises a mansion, called the Abbey, crowned with a lofty tower (visible at the distance of 40 miles), turrets, pediments, and pinnacles, bearing every external appearance of a monastic edifice. It is composed of a tower in the centre, a spacious and lofty entrance hall, and three wings extending from the tower to the east, north, and west, each of which is dissimilar to the others, and each appropriated to the purposes of a commodious and elegant family mansion. This magnificent structure, perhaps unparalleled in the domestic architecture of this country, and probably not surpassed by that of any other, was erected under the superintendance, and partly from the designs of Mr. Wyatt, aided by the genius of W. Beckford, Esq., to whose fine taste and bold imagination it owes its existence, and of which it may be with truth averred, that for magnitude of dimensions, infinity of detail, and novelty in the original idea as a whole, Fonthill Abbey cannot be contemplated without emotions that have never been excited by any building erected by a private individual in modern times. Its furniture and decorations were in a corresponding style of taste and elegance; and enriched with paintings, sculpture, a select and valuable library, and embellished with a profusion of the choicest articles of vertu, it appeared in 1822 (when it became the resort of the fashionable world) a perfect museum, and then obtained the justly merited title of the Wonder of the West. To do justice to the subject would far exceed our limits, and the reader is therefore referred for a further detail to a very beautiful work upon the subject by Mr. Rutter of Shaftesbury. Fonthill, however, appears destined to follow the fate of its predecessors, has not even been so fortunate as to continue the abode of its founder, but has, it is much to be regretted, experienced a lamentable change, the whole having by purchase become the property of J. Parquhar, Esq., was by that gentleman immediately stripped of its decorations, which were, together with its pictures and furniture, consigned to the hammer. In its present state, it may therefore be considered little more than a mere empty shell, its walls dismantled, and its fine gardens, the pride of the surrounding country, now fast hastening to decay.

WINCAUNTON, though small, is a neat town, most delightfully situated on the western declivity of a hill, which is well cultivated, and shaded with wood; it is watered by the river Cale, from whence it derives its original name, Wincalton, and contains several handsome houses, inns, and shops. The church, a pretty large edifice, plain in its exterior structure, but very handsome within, was built at an early period, since which it has undergone considerable alterations; it consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles, with a plain square tower at the west end. This town has a workhouse and poor-house; it carries on a considerable trade in serges and stockings, as also in cheese, large quantities of which are brought here from the neighbouring villages, and sold to the London dealers; and it has a weekly market on Wednesday. At the west end of the town, on the road to Castle Cary, is a handsome stone bridge over the Cale, built and supported at the expense of the county.	11 $\frac{1}{4}$ 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ 4 $\frac{3}{4}$	Gillingham Cucklington, Somerset . BRUTON. The name of this place is derived from its situation on the river Brue, over which there is a good stone bridge. The town consists chiefly of three streets, having a handsome market-house at their intersection, erected at the expense of the farmers, who here hold their market on Saturday. The church is a large building, and has two quadrangular towers, one at the west, and the other at the north aisle; the former is by far the most handsome, being ornamented with elegant pin-	5 $\frac{1}{2}$ 3	Yarnfield  Turnpike, Somersetshire To Frome 7 m. ☞ North Brewham Cross the  Frome canal * BRUTON	106 $\frac{1}{4}$ 108 $\frac{3}{4}$ 111 $\frac{3}{4}$

In the market-place is an ancient cross, of an hexagonal shape, supported in the centre by a large pillar, and by six smaller ones at the angles; the roof consists of the ribs of arches, which, issuing from the centre, diverge from pillar to pillar, and are adorned with beautiful sculpture. The country in the neighbourhood of Bruton is remarkably pleasing. The hills around, though neither bold nor well-shaped in general, are nevertheless extremely interesting to the eye, from their gentle undulating outline, added to the richness of the verdure that covers them. The vales are meadows, the declivities orchards, and the eminences sheep-walks.

WIVELISCOMBE is a moderate-sized market-town, encompassed on all sides, with the exception of a slight opening towards Taunton, by lofty hills, the summits of which are enriched by beautiful woods. This was a place of great importance in the time of the Romans, as appears from the remains of an encampment on a hill near the town, still called the Castle; though the summit of this hill is almost entirely covered with copice wood, yet vestiges of fortifications, and foundations of buildings, have frequently been discovered on its surface: the Danes, during their inroads in Somersetshire, availed themselves of this castle. About the year 1256, there existed a stately palace adjoining the cemetery, which is now completely in ruins: this town does not contain any buildings worthy of notice; it had formerly the advantage of two markets weekly, but now only one, which is held on Tuesday.	38	Chipstable	156

BURROWBRIDGE. Here is a large burrow, or mount, generally considered as natural, but by others looked upon as a sepulchral tumulus, and consequently the work of art. The latter opinion is supported by the fact that this part of the country was the scene of many battles in ancient times, as the variety of weapons found here, unknown in modern warfare, sufficiently authenticate. On the mount are the ruins of a chapel that was appendant to the abbey of Athelney, and is built in the form of a cross. Part of the tower, and the main walls, are still standing, and form a very singular and picturesque object.

ILMINSTER was a place of some note previous to the Nor- man conquest: its name is Saxon, and signifies the church upon the river Ile. The situation of the town is low, but extremely healthy; it consists of two streets, intersecting each other, one of them nearly a mile long; and many of the houses are good stone or brick buildings, though the greater part are form- ed from old walls, and covered with thatch. In the centre of the town stands a market house and shambles of modern erec- tion; the market is held on Saturday, a privilege it has re- tained ever since the time of the Saxons. At the east end of the church is a small vestry-room, that was formerly a chantry chapel; and in the north transept is an ancient tomb, partly built of marble and partly of stone, to the memory of Nicholas Wadham, and Dor- thy, his wife, who were the founders of Wadham College, at Oxford, and died at the be- ginning of the 17th century. Ilminster likewise possesses an excellent free-school, that was founded in the year 1550, and endowed with considerable pro- perty, which has been since greatly increased by the good management of its trustees.

BIDEFORD is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Torridge. About three parts of the town lie on the slope of a pretty steep hill on the western side of the river, and the other part at the bottom of a hill on the opposite shore. In respect to local advantages, few towns in England, and not one in the north of Devon, can challenge a superiority over this. Nothing perhaps can be more picturesque than the view above the bridge. Near the fording place a large wood rises from the side of the river to the summit of a high hill of a square pyramidal form; and at the bottom of that side fronting the town, is a beautiful small meadow, which is a per- fectly natural amphitheatre, and verdant all the year round. This, with a large ancient house close by, gardens and fields in a high state of cultivation, forms a landscape admirably worthy the attention of the eye of taste. CHUDLEIGH is a small but neat town, the houses of which are chiefly disposed in one long street, having, at its western extremity, a small white-washed church, containing some monuments of the Courtenay family. Here was formerly a Benedictine monastery, and a palace of the Bishop of Exeter. Chudleigh Rock, about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. from the town, is one of the most imposing in the island: when viewed from the west, it exhibits a broad, bold, and almost perpendicular front, apparently one solid mass of marble; from the S. E. a hollow opens to the view, with an impetuous stream rushing over the rude stones that attempt to impede its progress, and forms, during its course, a romantic waterfall, foaming, and whirling its eddies around. From the highest part of the rock, the scenery is composed of fine hanging woods, and in some places, the branches of the picturesque oak form a canopy for the contemplative spectator, while he surveys the rich surrounding country. Midway down the cliff is a large cavern, the gloomy recesses of which are traditionally said to be inhabited by Pixies. The entrance to this cavern is by an arch 10 feet high, and 12 wide, the passage is about the same dimensions for the space of 20 yards, when it suddenly diminishes to about half the size, and continues decreasing about 15 yards farther: here it expands into a spacious chamber, which divides itself into two parts, and runs off in different directions; neither of these can be pursued far, owing to the dropping of the rock; but tradition asserts that a dog, put into one of them, came out of an aperture in Botter rock, about three miles distant. Market on Saturday.

IVY BRIDGE is beautifully situated in a romantic dell, and excites the admiration of every traveller, from its fine picturesque appearance. It derives its name from a bridge, with one arch, covered with ivy, which here stretches across the river Erme. This impetuous mountain-torrent, after forming various cascades, and dashing through many rocky chasms, overhung with fine mossy woods and straggling roots and trunks, passes on to the English channel.

a centre and two wings, resembling Buckingham House, in St. James's Park, though on a reduced scale: it stands on an eminence, and commands various extensive and highly picturesque views; the apartments are elegantly fitted up, and the library contains a valuable collection of books, manuscripts, and a fine cabinet of medals. The grounds are embellished with plantations, in the centre of which, on Penhill, a castellated building is erected to the memory of Gen. Lawrence, from whence the views are diversified and magnificent, embracing the English channel, the cliffs of Beer and Seaton, the Quantock hills, the course of the Exe, from Exeter to the sea, with all the various scenery of the intermediate country. — 1 m. distant from Clopton Bridge, Dunchidock House, — Pitman, Esq.; and 3 m. beyond Clopton Bridge, Whiteway, *F. ASHBURTON is situated in a valley nearly encompassed by hills, it consists of one long street, through which the high road passes from London to Plymouth. The church is a handsome structure, built in the form of a cross, its tower is 90 feet high, terminated by a small spire: it was formerly collegiate, and several of the stalls are now standing. This place sends 2 members to parliament; the number of voters are about 200; but as the freeholds, which give the right of election, are in private hands, this number is merely nominal. Market on Saturday.

The church is a spacious and handsome edifice, but it deviates considerably from the usual east and west direction; it has a spire about 134 feet high, which is more modern than the body of the structure. Modbury contains two dissenting meeting-houses, and had formerly an alien priory of Benedictines. Here are also the ruins of Modbury House, sometimes called the Court House, which was formerly inhabited by the Champerounes, proprietors of the manor, who lived here in great splendour from the time of Edward II. till the end of the 17th, or beginning of the 18th century.

DARTMOOR FOREST contains many eminences, whose altitudes are from 1500 to 1800 feet. It is an extensive waste, comprising upwards of 80,000 acres; and some attempts have recently been made to cultivate this sterile tract, the result of which has proved that flax of a tolerable good quality may be produced. On this moor is a large military prison, of a circular form, appropriated during the late war to the confinement of French prisoners.

TAVISTOCK is a neat town, though many of the houses have the appearance of age; and it is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Tavy. The church is a spacious building, and contains many handsome monuments, among which, one to the memory of Judge Glanville, is particularly worthy of attention. Tavistock had formerly a rich and flourishing abbey, the remains of which are in many places still visible, though now incorporated with other buildings in such a manner as to leave us only room to form a conjecture as to the architecture or magnitude of the edifice. This place sends 2 members to parliament, and has a market on Friday.

area of 135 feet by 170. The principal suite of apartments, on the ground-floor, are elegantly fitted up, and adorned with an extensive and valuable collection of pictures; the upper apartments are also embellished with a number of fine drawings, by the most celebrated ancient masters, and some good portraits. The grounds possess many singular attractions: an extensive diversity of landscape and massy wood, Plymouth Sound, the Town, Citadel, Mount Edgecumbe, the Sea, and Harbour, with its endless variety of amusement. The internal beauties of Saltram are also extremely numerous: a bold irregularity of surface characterises the grounds, and renders the variety unceasing. Myrtles are here seen flourishing all the year in the open air, and oranges and lemons are brought to maturity, and produce ripe and perfect fruit.

BRENT TOR, is a mass of craggy rock rising in the midst of an elevated down to a considerable height; and is a prominent sea-mark to mariners in the British channel, though upwards of 20 miles distant. Upon the very top of the rock, within a few feet of the edge, on its abrupt side, upon a base of little more extent than the building, stands the church, in which is appositely inscribed from Scripture, "Upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against me." It is said of the inhabitants of this parish, that they make weekly atonement for their sins; for they cannot go to church without the previous penance of climbing up this steep; and the worthy pastor is frequently obliged to humble himself upon all-fours, previous to his being exalted in the pulpit. Though the summit is frequently enveloped in clouds, yet in clear weather the prospect is very extensive and interesting, and the ships in Plymouth harbour may be distinctly seen.

LIDFORD. The scenery in this neighbourhood is singularly romantic; but the most prominent objects of curiosity and admiration, are the bridge and 2 cascades. The former consists of 1 rude arch, thrown across a narrow rocky chasm, which sinks 80 feet below the level of the road. A little below the bridge, the fissure spreads its rocky jaws, and the struggling river rolls through a winding valley, confined within magnificent banks, which alternately swell into bold promontories, and fall back into deep recesses. The singularity of this scene is not perceived by merely passing over the bridge; its character can only be appreciated by viewing the bridge, chasm, and roaring water, from different projecting crags. The cascades are formed by the precipitation of the water through ragged fissures in the rocks, from whence it rushes over stony ledges, furnishing ample scope for the pencil of the landscape-painter. The portrait, of which the cascades form a feature, is most particularly interesting: the side screens are thickly mantled with hanging woods, interspersed with grey-crested rock; in the middle are seen the parish church and the embattled castle; beyond these a ridge of the Dartmoor hills are immersed in the fleeting clouds; and beneath the feet of the spectator is seen the river Lid winding through its narrow channel.

FOWEY. This is an irregu- lar built town, but possesses a handsome church, whose tower is highly ornamented with car- ved work. It was formerly a place of considerable importance; and was made a member of the cinque ports by Edward III. for whose wars it appears to have furnished 47 ships, which was a greater proportion than was sup- plied by any other port in the kingdom. The town stands on the west side of a river of the same name, which here falling into the British channel, forms a harbour capable of containing vessels of 1000 tons burden at all times of the tide; this is de- fended by three batteries, erected at its entrance, which are so high, that no ship can bring her guns to bear upon them. Fowey is an ancient borough, it sends 2 members to parliament, and has a well supplied market on Saturday. The scenery around this town is very beautiful; the high rude rocks and broken cliffs, the picturesque wildness of the neighbouring hills, the old castle, and the ruins of St. Saviour's chapel, together with the broad expanse of ocean, have an appearance at once awful and magnificent.	10 $\frac{3}{4}$ 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ 8 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ 3 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{4}$	Cross the SW river Seaton St. Martins EAST LOOE Cross the SW river Looe West Looe Talland POLPERRO Carneggan Tredudwell Trevorder Bodinnick, entrance of Cross Fowey Harbour FOWEY, Church OR, From Hyde Park Corner to * LOSTWITHIEL, Cornwall, page 92 ☞ to FOWEY	232 $\frac{3}{4}$ 233 $\frac{3}{4}$ 234 235 $\frac{1}{2}$ 237 240 $\frac{1}{2}$ 241 242 243 $\frac{1}{4}$ 243 $\frac{1}{2}$ 240

A beautiful grotto has been erected at the end of a narrow valley; the materials of which it is con- structed, are, mostly, chrystals, pebbles, and shells: this also contains the most curious speci- mens of organic fossils, agates, jaspers, &c., the whole of which were scientifically arranged by the late proprietor.

ST. COLUMB is a small market town, pleasantly situated on the brow of a hill, commanding some interesting views over the adjoining country; it for the most part consists of ancient buildings, and the pavement is rough and uncomfortable. The church is a fine Gothic edifice, dedicated to St. Columba, the Virgin, and consists of three spacious aisles, and two transverse, or cross aisles, with a stately tower. The interior exhibits a great many curious specimens of early workmanship, besides numerous monumental erections, and altogether cannot fail to attract the attention of the most indifferent spectator. This town has also meeting-houses for the Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists. Market on Thursday and Saturday.

The houses, or rather cottages, in the time of Browne Willis, amounted to 30; and the number of voters was proportionable as the right of election is possessed by all the inhabitants paying scot and lot; but since the borough came into the hands of the present owner, the cottages have been pulled down as fast as they became empty, till the whole was reduced to the present number.

COLNBROOK. Richings Lodge, Rt. Hon. John Sullivan; and farther to the right, Iver Lodge, — Boswell, Esq.; and Iver Grove, Lord Gambier.

At 19 m., Langley Park, Sir R. B. Harvey, Bart. The mansion is a fine stone building, delightfully situated in a park, abounding with a variety of nobletimber. At the foot of a sloping lawn, in the front of the house, containing some beautiful clumps of trees, is a spacious sheet of water; and a noble lake ornaments the centre of the Black Park, which is situated on a rising ground, at the west extremity of the park, and is almost entirely covered with firs, having a few sequestered walks cut through it, possessing many of the beauties of alpine scenery. — Near this is Langley Lodge, J. SLOUGH. See Windsor Castle, His Majesty; and Eton College. This college was founded by the unfortunate Henry VI, and is advantageously situated in a healthy and fertile valley, near the river Thames, which rolls its pellucid stream at a short distance from the walls, greatly contributing to the beauty of this interesting scene. The institution supports 70 scholars, with officers and assistants; besides which, there are seldom less than 300 gentlemen, sons of the nobility and gentry, who board with the masters, and receive their education at this seminary. The college consists of 2 quadrangles, one appropriated to the school, and the lodging of the masters and scholars; the other contains the apartments of the provost and fellows, and also the library, which is considered one of the finest in Europe: some very valuable drawings, paintings, and oriental manuscripts, are among its curiosities. The chapel is a fine structure, ornamented with large abutments, pinnacles, and embasures; and is similar, in the disposition of its parts, to that of King's College, Cambridge. — Near Slough, Burnham Grove, Sir W. Johnston, Bart.

Atkins*, Esq.; Cannon Hill, Mrs. E. Law; and Braywick Lodge, Admiral West. This neat edifice stands on a gentle eminence, and commands some delightful views. The prospect on one side is heightened by the town of Maidenhead and the village of Taplow, backed by the noble woods of Clefden and Hedsor; and on the other side it is rendered truly delightful by the proud Castle of Windsor, and the picturesque forest scenery.

SALT HILL Stoke Park, J. Penn, Esq. The mansion, one of the most magnificent residences in this part of the county, consists of a large square centre, and two wings, whose north and south fronts are ornamented by a colonnade: the latter front is 196 feet in length, and its whole interior is occupied by an elegant and valuable library of the best authors. The park is rather flat, but commands some fine views, particularly to the south, whence the eye ranges, over a large sheet of water, to the majestic castle of Windsor, beyond which the forest has a very noble appearance. A neat stone bridge is thrown over a large lake which winds itself round the east side of the building. This immense temple, in its perfect state, must have presented an appearance at once solemn and impressive; as, according to Stukeley, it originally consisted of 650 stones, independent of a large cromlech about 1 mile to the north. The ruins consist of several very large stones, some standing erect, and others lying on the ground; these are inclosed by a deep and wide ditch and a lofty vallum.

Medmenham abbey was remarkable in the last century as being the retiring place of a society of men of wit and fashion, under the title of Monks of St. Francis, whose habits they assumed: whatever were the real principles of this fraternity, many of their transactions were undoubtedly vicious and dishonourable: their motto, "Fay ce que vou-dras," still exists over the door.

The house is large, and stands in a bottom, on the south side of the river, which washes the lower extremity of the park. Here a fine large pavement was discovered in the year 1730, two feet under ground, but it was destroyed in 1733. This pavement seemed to have formed the floor of a temple; its dimensions were 41 feet by 33, and consisted of a variety of elegantly coloured figures, among which were those of Apollo, playing on his harp, and four females, mounted on beasts, representing the seasons.

PANGBOURN, across the Thames, Walliscote, Lady Simon; and Combe Lodge, S. Gardiner, Esq.

LAMBOURN, a town of high antiquity, is pleasantly situated in an open country; it contains a spacious and handsome Gothic church, and has a weekly market on Friday. — About 3 m. hence, on the side of a steep hill, is the figure of a white horse, whose dimensions occupy about an acre of ground: this is certainly of great antiquity, but writers differ materially respecting its origin; for while some affirm that Alfred the Great ordered it to be made, as a trophy of the signal victory he obtained in this neighbourhood over the Danes, others suppose it to be a work of the Britons, and defend their opinion with much ingenuity; observing, among other things, that the figure of a horse, similar to that now under observation, frequently occurs on British coins, and also that the white horse ceased to be the Saxon standard in the time of King Alfred: but it should be remembered that the battle of Ashdown was fought in the year 871, during the life of Ethelred, at which time Alfred acted only as lieutenant to his brother; and likewise that, in all probability, the banner was not altered till 883, when Pope Martin II. is said to have transmitted from Rome a portion of the true cross of our Saviour: besides, though antiquaries differ respecting the place where the battle was fought, yet a great variety of circumstances tend to strengthen the opinion that the Danes were encamped at Uffington Castle; and that Hardwell Camp, about half a mile lower, and nearer Ashbury, on the brow of a hill, was occupied by the Saxons: and it is perfectly consonant with ancient practice, that Alfred should set up his banner for a token, after having obtained such a complete victory.

BATH, beyond, Prior Park, W. Thomas, Esq. This stately mansion stands on a terrace about 400 feet above the city of Bath, it is built of Bath stone, and consists of a front 150 feet long, with 2 pavilions, and 2 wings of offices attached to the centre by arcades, altogether forming a continued line of building about 1300 feet in front; the style is Corinthian, raised on a rustic basement and surmounted by a fine balustrade. From the centre projects an extremely grand portico, supported by 6 elegant large columns. Fielding laid the scene of the early years of Tom Jones at this place, and has given a picture of the delightful situation of the mansion, whose former occupier, Mr. Allen, is the Allworthy of his novel. Making allowances for the fancy of an author, in an imaginary river, sea, distant island, and ruined abbey, the description is tolerably correct, at least, many of its most agreeable features are real. "The house stood," says he, "on the S.E. side of a hill, but nearer the bottom than the top of it, so as to be sheltered from the N.E. by a grove of old oaks, which rose above it in a gradual ascent of near half a mile, and yet high enough to enjoy a most charming prospect of the valley beneath." He then describes the extreme beauty of the grounds, and their various ornaments, and also notices the different objects which embellish the surrounding diversified scenery: but the chief circumstance he has omitted in his enumeration of the particulars of the prospect, are the splendid Palladian bridge at the bottom of the pleasure-grounds, and the more distant view of Bath; the latter of which, before the recent addition to the town, must have been strikingly beautiful.—And farther, Midford Castle, Charles Conolly, Esq.

GLASTONBURY. Two streets crossing each other at right angles form the principal part of this town. At the point of intersection stands the cross, formerly a very handsome building, but now in a decayed state. This town has a small market on Saturday. Here are 2 churches, St. John the Baptist, and St. Benedict. The former is a very handsome building, surmounted by a fine lofty tower, and contains many ancient monuments; the latter, a venerable edifice, was erected by Abbot Beer, whose initials are inscribed on a shield over the north entrance. Glastonbury and its neighbourhood abounds with religious monuments: the most conspicuous of which is the Tor, or St. Michael's Tower, standing on a high hill to the north-east of the town. The original buildings on this spot, consisting of a magnificent church, monastery, and dwelling-houses, were destroyed by an earthquake, in 1271: the church was shortly afterwards splendidly rebuilt; its tower, however, only remains, which is an object highly deserving the attention of the traveller, and has a very grand and impressive appearance from the plains below. This town has derived its celebrity from its abbey, which, during 600 years, surpassed in value and authority every other in England, except Westminster; and the grandeur of its ruins still conveys to the beholder an idea of its ancient magnificence. The abbot lived here, in all the state of regal splendour, enjoying an income of near 40,000*l.* per annum. The last abbot, on his refusing to surrender the abbey to Henry VIII., was, with 2 of his monks, drawn on a hurdle to the Tor, near the town, and there hanged. The ruins of the monastery contain the ashes of many kings, nobles, and prelates, among whom was the illustrious King Arthur, who was buried under the front of the high altar.

EXETER. This is a city of great antiquity, and has been, for many centuries, a place of considerable importance in the west of England. It is pleasantly situated on the acclivity of an eminence, on the banks of the river Exe, over which is a handsome stone bridge, erected at an expense of near 20,000l. The city is about 3 m. in circumference, intersected by 4 principal streets, well paved, which unite near the centre. The streets and buildings have most of them an appearance of antiquity. In 1697 a canal was constructed, which, by means of flood-gates, &c., admits vessels of 150 tons to the quay near the city walls. The city of Exeter is a county in itself, enjoying extensive privileges and charters, and was one of the first cities which sent members to parliament: it is governed by a mayor, 24 aldermen, 4 bailiffs, a recorder, chamberlain, sheriff, town-clerk, &c., and sends 2 members to parliament, the right of election being vested in the magistrates and freemen. It has also 13 companies of incorporated trades, and a market on Wednesday and Friday. The principal employment of the inhabitants is in the woollen trade, from which the city derives immense profits. In the north-east part of the city are situated the ruins of the Castle of Rougemont, which appears to have been a very strong fortress, and of considerable extent:	From Exeter 58½	* SHEPTON MALLET To Wells 5½ m. } To Glastonbury 9 m. } To Frome 12 m.	From London 122½	STREET ON THE FOSSE. Among the numerous public buildings within the city of Exeter, its ancient and venerable cathedral claims particular notice. The extent, beauty, uniformity, and grandeur of the design, together with the propriety, taste, and richness displayed in the decorative ornaments, render it a truly interesting specimen of ancient English architecture. BATHFORD TURNPIKE, 1 m. before, Shockerwick, J. Wiltshire, Esq.

BATH EASTON, $\frac{2}{4}$ m. distant, Catherine House, J. Eckersall, Esq.; and beyond Bath Easton, Bailbrook House, — Adams, Esq.

NEWTON ST. LOE, $\frac{1}{4}$ m. beyond, Kelston House, Sir John Caesar Hawkins, Bart.

KEYNSHAM consists chiefly of one street about a mile in length; it is built on a rock on the north side of the river Avon, over which there is a good stone bridge of 15 arches. The church is a handsome Gothic structure, with a tower at its west end: this building contains many monuments worthy of observation, particularly one in honour of Sir Thomas Bridges. Market on Thursdays.

KEYNSHAM, beyond, Hanham Hall, J. B. Hill, Esq.; and Samuel Whittuck, Esq.

BRISLINGTON, beyond, Mrs. Hurle.

BRISTOL, $\frac{2}{4}$ m. distant, Stoke Gifford Park, Dow. Duchess of Beaufort. On a natural terrace, in an extensive and diversified park, stands the mansion, which is spacious and elegant, and commands a delightful prospect over the vale of Bristol. This house was originally erected in the reign of Elizabeth, but was embattled and altered into its present castellated form at the end of the last century.

Near this is Stapleton House, Isaac Elton, Esq.; farther to the right, French Hay, Edward Brice, Esq.; and Begbrook House, Mrs. Lovell; 1 m. beyond Bristol, Redland Court, Sir Richard Vaughan; St. Vincent Lodge, Lord Viscount St. Vincent; Redland House, A. Foulkes, Esq.; and Beaufort Villa, J. M. Gutch, Esq.; $\frac{2}{4}$ m. beyond Bristol, Westmead, Sir H. Protheroe; and Hen-leaze, John Savage, Esq.

WESTBURY, Westbury College, J. R. Lucas, Esq.; and Southmead, Richard Lawson, Esq.; $\frac{1}{4}$ m. beyond Westbury, Braintree House, John Cane, Esq.; and farther to the right, Pen Park, —. On this estate stands a very beautiful

UNICORN, 2 m. beyond, Llanwrn House, Sir Thomas Salusbury, Bart. This elegant modern mansion occupies a fine lofty situation, it is surrounded by good pleasure-grounds, and forms a conspicuous object from the great Newport road and the adjoining marshes.

NEWPORT, $\frac{3}{4}$ m. beyond, Kings Hill, Watkin Homfray, Esq.

TREDEGAR HOUSE is the seat of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. In a flat part of the park stands this magnificent mansion, which is constructed of brick, and contains many spacious apartments; some are curiously decorated in the antique style, particularly one called the Oak-room, an apartment 42 feet long, and 27 broad, the fittings up and flooring of which is composed of the timber produced from one tree; this astonishing expansion of a single acorn affords the contemplative mind a pleasant subject for meditation. The extensive park is well stocked with deer, and the grounds are diversified by gentle acclivities, covered with excellent plantations of oak, beech, and Spanish chesnut.

BLACK ROCK INN, $\frac{1}{4}$ m. distant, St. Pierre House, Charles Lewis, Esq.

PORTSKEWIT. Near this village are the remains of a Roman camp.

PONTYPOOL. Pontypool Park, Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq. The mansion is a good substantial edifice, beautifully situated on a rising lawn, skirted by large plantations on the one side, and by fine irregular acclivities, covered with hanging groves, on the other; beyond the latter rise a number of swelling eminences, whose soft varied lines form a fine contrast to the harsh and irregular features of the surrounding country. To the west the prospect is truly romantic; here the rude torrent of the Avon Lwyd rushes through its rocky channel, accompanied by delightful scenery; and beyond this rises the bold though bare eminence called Mynydd Maen.

UNICORN. Wentworth Lodge, Duke of Beaufort.

CAERLEON. Lantarnam Abbey, Sir Henry Protheroe. This elegant mansion is now fast going to decay, and its present dilapidated state forms a sad contrast to its former magnificence, of which the beholder may form some idea from the paintings of several English sovereigns contained in the hall, and also from the decorations of the windows with the royal arms; these subjects lead us to imagine that in former days it was honoured with royal visits. The surrounding park is diversified by gentle eminences, interspersed with venerable trees and fine thick plantations; the effect of which is considerably heightened by the Avon Lwyd, here seen to great advantage, flowing near the grounds.

NEWPORT. Malpas Church. This was formerly the chapel belonging to a religious house for monks of the Cluniac order;

a cromlech of large dimensions; its roof consisting of one stone 24 feet long, and varying in breadth from 17 to 10 feet. The same field contains two other large stones similar to those employed in this rude erection, one of which is used as a style. About three quarters of a mile to the south-east of the above mansion is another cromlech, called Greyhound Bitch Kennel; it is of smaller dimensions than the former, the covering stone not being more than 14 feet long and 12 wide.

BONVILSTON, 1 m. beyond, Llantrithyd Park, an elegant domain, belonging to Sir John Aubrey, Bart.; at 5 m. distance, Fomon Castle, the magnificent mansion of Rob. Jones, Esq.; and the ruins of Bewper Castle, a large Gothic edifice, now occupied by a farmer, and one of the most ancient residences in the county.

COWBRIDGE, beyond, the ruins of St. Lythian Castle.

EWENNY BRIDGE, 1 m. before, at 4 m. distance, Dunraven, Mrs. Bennett. This seat stands on a rocky promontory on the sea-shore, which situation is in many respects beautiful and romantic, enjoying several very fine sea-views, and surrounded on all sides by rocky scenery of great grandeur; but it does not seem well adapted for a permanent residence, the adjacent country being almost entirely destitute of trees, and particularly bleak in the winter season. The mansion, of modern erection, is an elegant and spacious edifice, in the Gothic style, occupying the site of an ancient structure. Dunraven, probably the oldest residence in Wales, is satisfactorily ascertained to have been the abode of Caradoc, the celebrated Caractacus of British and Roman history, and also of his father Brán ab Llyr. In the cliffs on the shore near this place, some very large and curious excavations have been formed by the percussion of the sea; one of them, extending parallel with the coast, resembles a colonnade, whose pillars have not received their last polish: another, penetrating the rocks to a great distance, is called the Wind-hole, from some apertures in the ground, through which, in certain states of the tide, the air is forced up in a current of considerable strength. — Near Ewenny Bridge, Ewenny Priory, R. T. Turbeville, Esq. Here are the remains of an elegant and very curious pavement, which appears to have formerly covered the whole of the floor, and was probably constructed at the time the church was built: this plain Norman edifice has a fine square tower in the centre, and is deserving the attention of the antiquary on it is built of unbewn stone, and is elegantly decorated: from many of its ornaments we are inclined to attribute its origin to the Saxons, though from the doubts of some historians respecting their having ever been in possession of this part of the country, its real history is involved in much obscurity. — 2 m. distant from Newport, Malpas House, Rev. Peter Moody.

HALFWAY HOUSE. Rupperrah, Charles Morgan, Esq. This building was the production of Inigo Jones; but the whole of the interior having been consumed by fire, nothing more than the walls can now be ascribed to that eminent architect. The loftiness of the situation affords very fine prospects, particularly to the south, where the hills of Devon and Somerset, and the country between it and the Severn, are extremely rich. — $\frac{1}{4}$ m. farther, Cefn Mabley, Col. Tyntc.

ROATH. Roath Court, unoccupied.

CARDIFF. The Castle, Marquis of Bute. This building retains much of its original grandeur; and the west front, with its bold octagonal tower, has a very noble appearance from the road. On an elevated mound stand the ruins of the keep, from which the prospect of the surrounding country is delightful and extensive; the ditch has been filled up, and the whole of the ground laid down into a fine level lawn, which presents a remarkable contrast to the ruined buildings. In the tower of this castle, Robert, duke of Normandy, son of William the Conqueror, was confined, by order of his brother, William II., for a number of years. — 1 m. from Cardiff, Llandaff Court, Walter Coffin, Esq.; and Gabalva, unoccupied.

COWBRIDGE is a small but well-built town, divided in the centre by a stream, which, at a short distance hence, falls into the sea. It contains a good town-hall, an excellent grammar-school, and a singularly shaped church, which latter building, when seen from a distance, resembles the embattled turret of an old fortress. This town has a good market on Tuesday, and, together with Swansea, Llantrissant, &c., has the privilege of returning one member to serve in parliament.

account of its monuments. Adjoining the church stands the old mansion-house, which has been rendered an extremely commodious dwelling by the thorough repairs it has lately undergone.

BRIDGEND is partly situated on each side the river Ogmogmore, and is connected by a good stone bridge. The town is well built, and contains many very respectable inhabitants, who are well supplied with every article of provision in the market here held on Saturday. That part of the town on the eastern side of the river, is called Oldcastle, that on the other, Newcastle. The former derives its name from a fortress which formerly stood near the chapel, and appears to have been dependent on the neighbouring castle of Coity: the latter is so called from a fortress of later erection, whose remains, situated above the church, command a most extensive prospect.

NEWBRIDGE, before, see the ruins of Ogmogmore Castle; on the western bank of the river Ogmogmore, Candlestone, unoccupied; and at Newbridge, Merthyr Mawr, the elegant modern residence of the Rt. Hon. Sir John Nichol.

ABERAVON. This small town is but indifferently built, but has the privilege of a weekly market, and also partakes with Cardiff, Swansea, &c. in returning a member to parliament.

BRITON FERRY. Briton Ferry House, Earl of Jersey. The house is a neat edifice, constructed more for convenience than splendid appearance. Its situation is extremely delightful. The grounds consist of gentle eminences, covered in some parts by a rich verdure, and in others by luxuriant oaks, that spring out of the rocky precipices which defend them from the sea. The landscape embraces some rich woodland scenery, intermixed with delightful views of the river, whose beauty is considerably heightened when the channel is filled by the tide.

COWBRIDGE, $\frac{1}{4}$ m. beyond, Penlyne Castle, Earl of Clarendon. Within these few years an elegant castellated mansion has been erected on the site of part of this ancient edifice; it commands a vast extent of beautiful scenery, and forms a prominent feature in the surrounding landscape.

BRIDGEND, 1 m. distant, the ruins of Coity Castle; and on the river Ogmogmore, and its tributary streams, Court Colman, unoccupied; New House, Morgan Smith, Esq.; Coetrehen, M. P. Traherne, Esq.; and higher up, among the mountains, Pant-unawel, R. H. Jenkins, Esq.

MARGAM PARK, C. R. Mansell Talbot, Esq. The park is about five miles in circumference, has been kept in its original state, and is abundantly stocked with deer; the pleasure and ornamental grounds have received also considerable attention. In the midst of these stands the conservatory, an elegant Doric edifice, measuring 330 feet in length by 82 in width. This contains one of the finest collections of orange-trees in the kingdom. At each end of the building is a large square room, containing many curious models, fine statues, and other antiques of exquisite workmanship. There is no mansion attached to the park, but here is a very curious old Saxon church, which has been restored at great cost, and with equal taste, wherein are some splendid monuments of the Mansell family.

ABERAVON, 2 m. beyond, Baglan Hall, Thomas John Llewellyn, Esq.

NEATH is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of a river of the same name, which is navigable as high as the town-quay for vessels of 200 tons burden. The town contains a number of fine houses, occupied by gentlemen of opulence, and is embellished by a spacious and handsome church, with a good square tower at one end, surmounted by an embattled parapet. This town shares with Cardiff, Aberavon, &c., the honor of returning a member to parliament, and has a well supplied market on Wednesday and Saturday. Near the town are the picturesque ruins of its castle, whose mouldering walls, together with a handsome gateway, have a very sombre appearance.

NARBERTH. This neat little town is pleasantly situated on an eminence, in a narrow vale, and chiefly derives support from its contiguity to the great western road, along which the mail passes and re-passes daily. The privilege of holding a market on Thursday was granted to this place in the reign of James II. Here was formerly a spacious and well-fortified castle, but few of its remains are now in existence; yet these have a fine picturesque appearance, and afford some idea of its original consequence.

MID-COUNTY HOUSE, 1 m. beyond, Pieton Castle, R. Bulkeley Phillips, Esq. This noble edifice was erected about the time of William Rufus; it is remarkable as having always been occupied, and still retains its embattled figure, notwithstanding the various alterations and additions of successive inhabitants. The extensive grounds are judiciously laid out, and, besides being richly wooded, contain every advantage of water-scenery from the approximation of two noble streams which flow into Milford Haven. — Near this is Slebech Hall, the elegant mansion of E. CAERPHELLY consists of a number of straggling, but in general well-built houses; it has a market on Thursday, and to the antiquarian holds out considerable attractions in the remains of its ancient castle, which is one of the most extensive pieces of antiquity in this description in the kingdom. These ruins occupy a moderately elevated situation, and the main body of the castle is surrounded by a strong wall, supported by buttresses, and defended by square towers, communicating with each other by an embattled gallery. Near the South-east angle of this building stands a place called the Mint, close to which are the remains of a tower, leaning 11 feet out of the perpendicular; this bulky fragment is about 80 feet high, of a prodigious thickness, and has maintained its present position for many centuries. The external view of the western	From M. Tydvil.	From London	MERTHYR TYDVIL. This is a large town, but very irregularly built; it derives its importance almost wholly from the immense iron-works carried on in its immediate vicinity. The chief of these belong to Messrs. Crawshaw , and consist of 6 blast furnaces, which are blown by means of a steam-engine of 50 horse power, and an overshot wheel above 50 feet in diameter, whose force equals that of the steam-engine; this was invented by a mechanic employed about the works, named Watkin George , who has since been deservedly rewarded for his talents. Each of these furnaces is capable of producing about 60 tons of iron per week; but they are seldom all in use at the same time, one at least being generally extinguished and under repair. This establishment usually employs about 1800 workmen, and the monthly payments are supposed to be about 5500l.

This town is divided by the river Gwendraeth, and is situated at a short distance from Caermarthen bay; its divisions receive the appellations of New and Old Town, and are united by a good stone bridge. The parish church stands in New Kidwely, it is a fine building, with a tower at its west end, surmounted by a handsome spire 164 feet high. This place contains some iron and tin manufactories, and carries on a considerable trade in coals, with which the neighbourhood abounds; it has also the privilege of a market on Tuesday and Friday: but the main object of attraction is the castle, standing on a bold rocky eminence, and possessing a grand and imposing appearance. This building is in a more perfect condition than any similar structure in the principality; its form is nearly square, with a strong round tower at each of its angles, and the walls forming the inclosures are farther defended by towers of smaller dimensions. Many of the apartments, with their arched roofs, are entire, and the staircases are still in good condition. This spacious and very elegant mansion stands in the centre of an extensive lawn, terminated by swelling hills, partially covered with timber. The rides over the hills and through the woods display all the beautiful scenery of the vale, and the prospect is rendered truly delightful by the serpentine windings of the river Thames. In the time of the civil wars this place suffered verely from the troop of horse, in the interest of Charles I., that was quartered here, who, not content with littering their horses with sheaves of good wheat, wantonly tore the books in the library to pieces, and lighted their tobacco with valuable manuscripts, court-rolls, and title-deeds of the estate. — Near Fawley Court, Greenland Lodge, Lady E. Here is no staple manufacture of any consequence; but the making of lace prevails to some extent, and forms the chief employment of the labouring females. In addition to the remoteness of water-conveyance, the badness of the neighbouring roads, which are perhaps the worst in the county, acts prejudicially on commercial speculation: but the spirit of the inhabitants appears to be little depressed by these repulsive circumstances; and efforts are gradually making to ameliorate the chill and gloomy aspect of the principal avenues. WOODSTOCK. Blenheim, the magnificent seat of the Duke of Marlborough. The mansion was erected from the designs of the celebrated Sir John Vanbrugh: its north or grand front has a very august and noble appearance; its extent from wing to wing is 348 feet, and the centre is supported by pillars of the Corinthian order. The opposite front is a fine elevation: it is ornamented with a handsome portico, over which is placed a colossal bust of Louis XIV., taken from the gates of Tournay: the whole of the interior is of corresponding elegance; the apartments are spacious and lofty, the furniture superlatively rich, the paintings extremely numerous and executed by the first masters, and the library alone, containing 17,000 volumes, is said to be worth 30,000*l.* The gardens are extensive and delightful, interspersed with secluded walks, and boundless extents of rich and captivating landscapes, whose beauty is heightened by the occasional appearance of a fine lake, its wooded banks partaking strongly of the picturesque. The artificial ornaments are few, but they display a refinement of taste whose spirit is consonant to the place they are intended to adorn; among these is a magnificent copy of the fountain in the Piazza Navona, at Rome, at the extremities of the rock supporting the obelisk are ornamented by four river-gods, emblematical of the Nile, the Ganges, the Danube, and La Plata. The approach to the front of the mansion is over a magnificent bridge, crossing a fine expanse of water; near this stands a stately column, one of the greatest ornaments of the domain: its altitude is 130 feet; on the faces of the pedestal are inscribed the character, and most eminent exploits of the great Duke of Marlborough, whose colossal statue crowns the pillar. The park consists of about 2,700 acres, and contains a variety of plantations, interspersed with a considerable portion of venerable timber; the prospects from these grounds include all the various beauties of animated nature.

KIDDINGTON TURN-PIKE. Ditchley Park, Earl of Normanton. The mansion, consisting of a centre and two wings, is entered by a flight of stone steps, with a handsome balustrade and large vases on each side. The quantity of deer is very great, which adds much to the beauty of the scene. The house itself was originally a good specimen of ancient magnificence, but has been much modernized; first, in the early part of the last century, under the tasteful superintendance of Lord Burlington, who was always happy when his friends gave him a house to build, or to alter; and since that, in 1778: but it is a curious fact, that notwithstanding these efforts of noble taste, three of the principal apartments were actually destitute of fire-places, so as to leave it, in that respect, a most complete summer residence. STOW ON THE WOLD is a small market-town, irregularly built, on the summit of a high hill, the base of which is about 3 miles in diameter. From this elevated situation it is generally said to want three elements out of the four, fire, earth, and water. Air it possesses in plenty, and though uncommonly sharp, it is reputed to be very healthful. Water is scarce, especially since the decay of a horizontal windmill at the north end of the town, which formerly raised it from a very deep well, and forced it through pipes to the houses, which are mostly low, built with stone, and have generally a very ancient appearance. The church is a strong and well-built edifice, apparently the workmanship of different periods during the 14th and 15th centuries. It consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with an embattled tower on the south side, 81 feet in height, which, from its lofty situation, constitutes a principal object through a circumference of many miles.

Several monuments and inscriptions to the memory of the Chamberlaynes, are contained in this edifice; and in the midst of the chancel is a large altar tomb, in memory of Duke Hastings Keyt, of Ebrington, an officer on the side of Charles I., who died in the year 1645: his effigy, arrayed in armour, is engraved on the slab which covers the tomb. The principal charitable institutions are an almshouse for 9 poor persons, and a free-school. Market on Thursday.

As the High Street draws towards the south, it progressively expands, and in the broad area is preserved an extent of green sward, through which is formed a wide and handsome gravel walk, leading to the church. Few towns, containing so many inhabitants, and possessing such a number of substantial buildings, maintain an aspect of so quiet and rural a character. ROSS is situated upon a rock, considerably elevated above the river Wey, and on its eastern bank: to those who travel over the causeway from Hereford, it assumes a very commanding and picturesque appearance; scars of the rock jut out from the green banks, and the whole is surmounted by the church, which is surrounded by lofty trees, and exhibits its "heaven-directed spire" from the highest point of the eminence. The annals of this town record no events of eminent historical interest; yet the adventitious lustre which it has obtained from its inhabitant, John Kyrle, the celebrated "Man of Ross," has given it a degree of attraction far beyond its local importance. The house in which Mr. Kyrle resided is now the King's Arms, a respectable inn, near the entrance of the town from Gloucester. The Prospect Ground, as it is called, adjoining the church-yard, and the walk that extends thence for nearly a mile to the southward, were formed by his liberality, but they are not preserved in the order which his memory demands. The church is a handsome building, having a tower, and well-proportioned spire, rising from the west end; it contains several monuments of the Rudhalls. The views from the church-yard, and contiguous Prospect Ground, are much celebrated; immediately below the eye the river forms a fine semi-circle, at one of the extremities of which are the ruins of Wilton Castle, and beyond it an extensive and luxuriant vale, terminated by the distant mountains of Pembrokeshire. Since the beauties of picturesque scenery have engaged so much popular attention, this town has become a kind of favourite resort for the numerous summer parties who visit the Wey; and boats, &c. are kept here for the accommodation of those who make excursions down the river.

WHITCHURCH. Symonds Yate. The summit of this rock is crowned by an ancient encampment, and a fine bird's-eye view of the surrounding country may be here obtained, including the serpentine windings of the river Wye, which, together with the contiguous iron-works at the New Weir, and the heavy din of the tremendous hammers here employed, awaken the most interesting thoughts in the mind of the spectator. The channel of the river between Symonds Yate and the Doward Hills is intersected by one of the most sublime cascades imaginable; the chasm is situated between 2 lofty ranges of hills rising almost perpendicularly from the waters, and alternately craggy and barren, with some large trees occasionally bursting from the ungenial soil; the water here rolls with terrific sounds over large fragments of rock that in vain attempt to arrest its progress, and then loses itself amidst woods which rise majestically above, and uniting their immense branches, impart a deep solemnity to the whole. This interesting and truly beautiful spot attracts numerous visitors; and to those who are gratified in beholding nature, clad in all her sombre beauty of rude uncultivated wildness, this scene will furnish a luxuriant treat, and amply compensate for the trouble and delay of exploring it.

To the west of the town, on the road to Brecon, are the picturesque ruins of a fine castellated mansion, consisting of a Gothic gateway and part of the wall. GOODRICH. In this neighbourhood are the remains of Goodrich castle, which was alternately possessed by the parliamentary forces and the royalists in the time of Charles I., and was nearly destroyed after the siege it sustained against the former at that time. This spacious pile appears to have been of extreme strength; its exterior walls are about 7 feet thick, which, together with the sides of the gateway and the draw-bridge, was pierced with loop-holes, and had rows of machicolations in the vaulting over-head, for the purpose of pouring boiling lead, &c. on the assailants. The remains of the hall and the state-apartments exhibit traces of their former magnificence, and the whole of the ruins are in fact very grand; the massive towers and parts of the walls are finely invested with ivy; the ditch contains a number of fine forest-trees; and the various crumbling portions of the building present one of the most interesting scenes on the banks of the river Wye.

by wooden piers about 40 feet high, which were jointly kept in repair by the counties of Gloucester and Monmouth, but stone piers have been substituted on the Monmouthshire side; and the carpentry of the remaining ones of timber is ingeniously contrived, and supposed to be in imitation of the Roman bridges. Shortly subsequent to the Conquest a priory of Benedictine monks was founded at Chepstow, the chief remains of which are the present parish church; this originally formed part of the chapel belonging to the priory, and still exhibits a tolerable good specimen of early ecclesiastical architecture, although it is now in a mutilated condition. There is nothing, however, either in Chepstow or its neighbourhood, that is by any means so interesting as the remains of its castle, which was formerly of considerable extent, but suffered materially in the 17th century; its magnificent ruins receive a very picturesque appearance from the spreading ivy with which they are overrun. ABINGDON consists of several streets that diverge from a centre in which stands the market-house and town-hall, a very handsome building, composed of rough free-stone, supported by arches and lofty pillars. The town contains two churches, respectively dedicated to St. Nicholas and St. Helen, the former was erected about the close of the 13th century; the latter, standing near the river, appears to have been altered and enlarged at different periods, and is surmounted by a tower ornamented with pinnacles, above which rises a handsome lofty

The mansion has a handsome stone front, which is joined by inflected corridors to the projecting wings; and its vestibule, though small, contains many fine casts of antique statues: the back of the building has a noble bow window in the centre, supported by handsome Ionic pillars. This elegant edifice is situated on the rise of a hill, with its front towards the ascent; on this side are some fine groups of spreading elms, which have rather a sombre appearance, and present a striking contrast to the extensive and delightful prospects enjoyed from the back of the house. LECHLADE is a small market-town, pleasantly situated on the north side of the river Thames, which here becomes navigable; and has a handsome church with an embattled tower, erected about the middle of the 15th century. The market is held on Tuesday: the chief trade of the town consists in the navigation of the Thames and the canal which here joins this river with the Severn; most of the Wiltshire and Gloucester cheese consumed in the metropolis being conveyed by these means to London.

The church is a handsome edifice, and forms a considerable ornament to the pleasure-grounds in which it is situated: these consist of about 40 acres, and are diversified by walks alternately leading through the recesses of thick groves, and opening to the luxuriant beauties of rich and extensive scenery. The gardens are interspersed by a variety of statues, temples, grottos, and busts, which give them an interest seldom to be met with. FAIRFORD. This town derives its chief celebrity from its church, which is a very elegant specimen of the architecture of the 15th century, and consists of a nave, chancel, and side-aisles, with a tower in the centre, ornamented by buttresses, having at their bases rudely sculptured statues as large as life. The whole of the building is embattled, and also supported by buttresses. The architecture of the interior is particularly fine, and the embellishments are of a very superior order, among which are a variety of handsome monuments to the memory of departed worth, well deserving the attention of the traveller: two rows of light fluted pillars divide the nave from the aisles, and an elegant carved oak screen surrounds the chancel, with stalls of the same kind; added to these the chequered pavement and the pews have a very fine appearance. TETBURY is a large and respectable town, situated on a pleasant and commanding eminence, and consisting principally of four streets, meeting in the centre, where stands a large market-house, at which great quantities of yarn are sold. On the south side of the town were traces of a strong camp, now completely destroyed, and here was also a castle, traditionally said to have been built in the British times, but no authentic particulars are recorded concerning it. The church is a handsome fabric, consisting of an ancient tower and a modern body; the former is terminated by a spire of good proportions; the latter is a successful imitation of the pointed style, appearing externally as a single nave, with cloisters, but within side divided into aisles by a very light arcade and clustered columns. 		THAMES AND SEVERN CANAL. This important and highly interesting line of communication was completed between the years 1783 and 1792, when the first vessel passed from the Severn into the Thames. The canal was executed by Mr. Robert Whitworth, an able engineer. It begins at Wallbridge (at the place where the Stroud navigation ends), near Stroud, and proceeds in a devious course to Lechlade, where it joins the Thames, including a distance of thirty miles. The general breadth of the canal is forty-two feet at the top, and thirty feet at the bottom, but in many places, where the ground is a dead level, it is considerably wider. The tunnel at Sapperton is nearly two miles and a half in length, being lined with masonry, and arched over at top, with an inverted arch at the bottom, except at some few places, where the solid rock being scooped out, rendered it unnecessary. The union of the Thames and Severn by means of this canal, and its connexion with the internal parts of the kingdom, by the Oxford and Coventry canals, thereby opening a ready intercourse between many of the great manufacturing towns and the metropolis, is certainly a work of the greatest national importance.

Yate, and Cromhall, are rocks of a very compact and ponderous stone, which from its colour is called the White Lays: it is a species of marble, and makes most excellent lime. Broken small, it wears as smooth as a gravel walk on the public roads, and is very durable. The calamine stone, and some lead ore, have also been found in these places. This part of the country is blest with plenty of pit-coal, which is of great advantage to the inhabitants, and seems not to be counterbalanced by any natural inconveniences, except that grain is usually something dearer than upon the hills, because the lands here are chiefly used in grazing and dairy, many of which were formerly corn fields, as appears by the ridges still remaining. The town principally consists of one long street, having the privilege of a weekly market, held on Monday, and yearly fair, first granted in the reign of King Edward I. The church is a handsome structure, dedicated to St. Mary, with an aisle on the north side, and a well-built tower at the west end. It stands on an eminence, at

there is another free-school for teaching to read, with a salary

was originally apprenticed to a House, Lord Falkstone. This elegant mansion was designed by the celebrated Inigo Jones,

and is the most perfect specimen
of architecture erected under the superintendance of that great master. It is a fine elevation in the form of an oblong square,
pleasantly situated on a lawn.
The general character of the interior is heavy, with a profusion of gilding and carved mouldings. The park and grounds are laid out with great
taste, according to the present
system of landscape gardening,
and its varied surface adds diversity to the scene, assisted by the meandering of the river
Cole. From many parts of the grounds, the beauty of the landscape is heightened by a fine view
of the busy town of Highworth.

MALMESBURY. This is a very ancient borough, originally incorporated by Edward the Elder, as early as 916; it now returns two members to parliament, and is governed by a mayor and body corporate. The town is pleasantly situated on a peninsular eminence formed by two streams: some remains of the wall by which it was formerly surrounded still exist at the entrance of the town from Cirencester, which furnish a sufficient specimen of its original strength; it was also defended by a castle, but no relic of the building now remains; yet, from the many hard struggles and bloody contentions on several occasions in its defence and capture, it must have been a fortress of considerable importance. Malmesbury consists of three parochial divisions, which include the borough and parish, comprised in four respectable streets. A small market for provisions, &c. is held on Saturday, and a large and well attended cattle-market on the last Tuesday in every month; but the principal support and opulence of the inhabitants are derived from the cloth trade, which is here carried on to a considerable extent. The town appears by the records to have been much larger than it is at present, and to have had several churches, only one of which now remains: it has undoubtedly been the theatre of several important events connected with history, and the ruins of its once splendid abbey convey an idea of its former extent and grandeur: the abbey-house and market-cross are also objects well worthy the attention of those who have a taste for architectural antiquities.

There is a very respectable free- school situated in Newport Street. The market is held on Monday, weekly, for corn and other commodities; and on every alternate Monday for cattle, which last is called the Great Market. Here are besides five annual fairs; and the petty sessions for Swindon division of the hundred are held in the town. KILGARRON consists of one irregular built street, straggling about half a mile from the church, which is said to have been formerly in the centre of the town. The chief object here worthy of attention is the castle, the remains of which occupy the summit of a naked rock, rising proudly from the bed of the river Teivy. The surrounding scenery, when viewed from the river, is surpassing grand: the neighbouring rocks are finely contrasted to the noble hanging woods, while delightful groves sometimes overhang the stream, and then again recede, affording room for a narrow strip of meadow; the proud walls of the castle appear backed by a range of well wooded hills, while that on which it stands is boldly broken with projecting rocks, and surrounded by diversified objects: this fine combination of rock, wood, and water, is animated by the many coracles employed in catching salmon.

This mansion furnishes an excellent specimen of the style of building which prevailed at the commencement of the 17th century. The lovers of poetry and admirers of genius and patriotism will feel a lively interest in the contemplation of this venerable mansion, when they reflect that it was the residence of Addison, who here breathed his last, and the spot where the renowned Fox first imbibed those principles of patriotic independence, which will ever render him illustrious in the annals of his country. town, situated on an eminence, from the appropriation of which it is supposed to derive its name:
the houses are chiefly built of flint and brick, and disposed in four streets, from their direction
assuming the form of a cross.
The church is a neat structure,
with a tower at its west end; it contains, along with many others, the ashes of the celebrated Edmund Burke; in the church-yard also lie the remains of the famous poet Waller.

stands on a gentle eminence,
and is a very spacious and elegant building; its south or principal front is about 300
feet long, and consists of a colonnade and loggia over it,
painted in fresco, and filled with busts and statues: that on the opposite side is decorated with four three-quarter
columns supporting a pediment.
The apartments are spacious and lofty; they are superbly
furnished, and the ceiling of the dining-room represents the council of the gods; the cornice
of this apartment is also curiously carved and gilt, and the frame of the door is formed of variegated marble; the staircase
is of richly inlaid mahogany,
and the mansion generally is furnished with a collection of paintings. The grounds are extensive, and contain a variety of sylvan beauties; but the most prominent feature in the landscape is the lake, which spreads
its waters over an extensive surface, and is adorned with several islands, planted with fine forest-trees, spreading their immense branches in a wild and luxuriant manner. A few elegant ornamental buildings and cascades are also interspersed through these grounds,
affording considerable animation
to the noble woods which embellish this demesne. The various prospects obtained hence
are extremely picturesque, embracing among other objects the town and church of High Wycombe, the mausoleum near the church of West Wycombe, and the meandering river with the delightful vale in which the former are situated.

The mansion is a massive stone structure, with a circular tower at each of its angles, the intermediate spaces being occupied by flat ranges of building, and the whole is surmounted by an embattled parapet, and surrounded by a deep moat; the approaches are over 3 draw-bridges, and the principal entrance is guarded by a porticulis. The interior is superbly furnished in the modern style, with the exception of the armoury, a capacious room, on whose sides are hung various pieces of mail, shields, tilting-spears, and offensive weapons of modern as well as ancient date. Here are two large libraries, well stocked with valuable books, and adorned with paintings and sculpture: among the various portraits, is an original of Catherine Parr, Queen to Henry VIII., and in the lower part of the frame, under a glass, is carefully preserved a lock of her hair, which is of an auburn colour, and exactly corresponds with that depicted on the canvas. The park embraces about 60 acres, and contains a spacious conservatory built of stone and cast iron, and near it, is a pleasant retired spot, in an elegant pavilion for the reception of the flowers during the genial months of summer. — $\frac{1}{4}$ m. beyond Postcombe, Adwell House, Mrs. Frances Webb.

This stupendous edifice was almost entirely destroyed during the civil wars, when it was garrisoned for the royal cause, and sustained a siege of ten weeks ; after which the numerous tenants in the vicinity conveyed away great quantities of stone for the construction of farm-houses, barns, &c. : not less than 23 different staircases were taken down by these depredators ; yet the remains are of sufficient extent and strength to be still capable of forming a very commodious habitation.

PONTYPOOL, 3 m. distant, is an immense mountain called Mynydd-Maen, abounding in steep and abrupt acclivities, at whose south-western extremity a swelling eminence arises, about six miles in circumference at the base, having on its summit an elliptical encampment, with a circular tumulus or artificial mound at its east end. This is surrounded by a deep fosse, and is by some conjectured to have been a beacon, by others a place of sepulture. From the summits of these eminences the prospects enjoyed are of such a grand and diversified cast, as amply to reward the traveller for the fatigue he has undergone in ascending them : to the south there is a fine view of the levels of Caldecot and Wentlog, with the broad Severn losing itself in an expanse of sea ; also the town of Newport, and the tower of Christchurch rising amidst hills and forests ; turning towards the east, the cultivated parts of Monmouthshire burst upon the eye, swelling into numerous undulations, fertilized by the meandering Uske. To the north and west these delightful prospects are finely contrasted with a wild and waving range of mountains stretching themselves beyond the confines of Glamorganshire and Brecknockshire.

USKE is situated on a tongue of land formed by the confluence of the rivers Olway and Uske : it is a place of great antiquity, and was formerly of some importance, though it does not now contain more than 150 houses, which are disposed nearly in the form of a square, having its area made up of gardens and orchards. The church appears to be of the Anglo-Norman era. The river is here crossed by a good stone bridge of five arches, and is remarkable for containing fine salmon. The chief object worthy of attention is the ruins of the castle, which stands on an abrupt eminence to the east of the river, and consists chiefly of the shell, enclosing an area or court, and some outworks to the west, formed by two straight walls that converge towards each other and are strengthened at their union by a round tower. From the terrace, under the tower, on the outside of the castle, a curious bird's-eye view of the town is enjoyed, the beauty of which, with the adjacent scenery, is considerably heightened by the river Uske. This town has a weekly market on Monday, and, together with Newport and Monmouth, sends one member to parliament.

TILLINGTON. Creden Hill, the Magna Castra of the Romans. On the summit of this steep eminence there is a camp, surrounded by extensive and almost inaccessible works, which are broken in several places, and the ditches also are partly obscured. The declivity of this hill is covered with wood, and has a fine appearance from the summit, which commands an extensive and beautiful prospect over great part of Herefordshire. — 2 m. from this place is the site of the Roman station of Kenchester. Its area is raised above the level of the adjoining country, and was originally surrounded by a wall, some traces of which still remain, though overgrown with trees and hedges. Numerous foundations and ruins of buildings have been met with here, also a variety of coins, urns, tessellated pavements, an hypocaust, &c. At the east end is a large fragment, consisting of rough stones embedded in an almost indissoluble cement: this is generally supposed to be part of a Roman temple.

KNIGHTON, or, as it is called in Welch, Tref-y-Clawdd, that is, the town upon the dyke, derives its name from its situation on the celebrated earthen rampart that was raised by Offa, as a line of partition and defence between the dominions of the Welch princes and the kingdom of Mercia: it stands on the southern bank of the river Teme, at the head of a deep vale surrounded by high hills well clothed with wood and verdure, and consists of several handsome but steep streets that open to various picturesque objects in the adjacent country. A castle formerly occupied a commanding situation above the town, but it is now so completely destroyed, that no vestiges of the walls can even be traced: this town contains a good modern-built church; it has a market on Thursday, and a voice in the election of a parliamentary representative for New Radnor.	11¼	Cross the SW river Arrow Byton Lane	154

			PRESTEIGN is pleasantly situated in a fertile district near the little river Lug or Llugwy: it is without exception the handsomest and best-built town in the county, and may be considered as its metropolis: the principal public buildings are the church and the town-hall; the former is a very fine structure, and is surrounded by a cemetery of considerable extent, having several public walks passing through it; in the town-hall the assizes for the county are now held. Presteign has likewise a well endowed free-school, a good market on Saturday, and formerly possessed a voice in the return of a member to serve in parliament for the town of New Radnor. To the north of the town there is a circular hill of moderate elevation, called the Warden, which both from its name and appearance might be supposed to have once been fortified, but it is not recorded that any vestiges of walls have ever been traced on it: this eminence is ornamented with promenades and plantations laid out with great taste, and forms a very agreeable appendage to the place. STEEN'S BRIDGE, 1 m. distant, Henner House, Mrs. Poole. LEOMINSTER stands in a rich and fertile vale that abounds with hop-grounds, orchards, fine meadows, and arable lands; the river Lugg flows on its east and north sides, two smaller streams pass through the town, and three others run within half a mile of it. The town extends nearly one mile from north to south, and half that distance from east to west: it is of ancient date, and many of the houses have a singular appearance, being ornamented with curious grotesque carvings, and coloured white and black. The church was in a great measure destroyed by fire

BROMYARD. This is a small indifferently built town, the major part of the buildings being of wood, though a few of more modern erection, composed of red brick, are here and there mingled with them: the church, which is situated on the north-east side of the town, is of Saxon architecture, and retains many of its original ornaments, but a thorough repair having been lately bestowed upon it, has considerably improved the appearance and comfort of the interior: the river Frome passing within a short distance adds much to the effect of the surrounding scenery, which, towards the south in particular, is extremely rich and beautifully varied. Market on Monday and Tuesday.

DOCKLOW. Buckland, Captain W. G. Cherry.

STEEN'S BRIDGE, 3 m. distant, Hampton Court, the magnificent seat of John Arkwright, Esq. The mansion was built in the time of Henry IV., and is situated on a very extensive lawn; the buildings surround a quadrangular court, with the principal entrance towards the north: this front is ornamented with a grand square tower in the centre, and two smaller ones at the extremities, near the most eastern of which is the chapel, a building retaining much of its original appearance, and displaying very appropriate embellishments. In many of the apartments there are excellent paintings by the best masters, and also much of the ancient furniture which constituted the magnificence of the nobility about two centuries ago; in the library is an elegant casket, said to contain the identical handkerchief which was applied to the wound King William received at the battle of the Boyne; one of the apartments is also preserved in the same state as when used by that monarch, who here visited Baron Coningsby, a nobleman distinguished for his bravery at the battle already mentioned. The park and grounds include an extent of about eight miles, and contain some fine timber and excellent plantations, through which a variety of walks are made, embracing the most delightful prospects imaginable. During the floods, which frequently occur here in the rainy seasons, a fine cascade is formed by the rushing of the water over a mass of broken rocks, which adds considerable beauty to the scene.

in the year 1700, owing to the carelessness of the plumbers employed to repair the leads, but has since been rebuilt in a handsome manner at an expense of more than 16,000*l.*; it is an irregular structure, both in form and architecture, but exhibits a number of very suitable embellishments, and contains an elegant altar-piece by Rubens, representing the Last Supper. Here are also places of religious worship belonging to different sects of dissenters, besides several charitable institutions, and a good town-hall, or butter-close as it is commonly called; this latter is a singular building, composed of timber and plaster, erected about the year 1633: it is supported by 12 oak pillars that rest on stone pedestals, and the brackets and spandrilts of the arches above the pillars, as well as the upper parts of the building, exhibit much carving; besides which, the numerous square and angular compartments formed by the disposition of the beams at the ends and sides of the structure, likewise present the several shields of arms of those who helped to defray the expense of raising it. The whole of this fabric was thoroughly repaired some years ago, at which time the weight of the roof was likewise considerably lessened. About the middle of the last century a new gal was built here; and in the year 1803 a small but neat market-house of the Tuscan order was erected at the expense of the corporation; this building is ornamented with pediments and a cupola, and stands in a small square to the east of the High Street. The clothing, hat, and other trades, are here carried on to some extent; and the wool, cyder, and hops, produced in the neighbourhood, are generally preferred to those of other districts. Leominster sends two members to parliament, and has an excellent market on Tuesday and Friday.

BUALT is a small town delightfully situated on the southern bank of the river Wye, in a charming vale that is surrounded by abrupt and lofty hills, which abound with magnificent scenery, and, as well as the neighbouring woods, contain an abundance of game: the streams are likewise well stocked with salmon, trout, &c., and the atmosphere of the place is extremely salubrious: these united desiderata have caused Bualt to be much resorted to of late years, and many respectable families have now fixed their residences in its vicinity. The town consists chiefly of two streets, running in a parallel direction. At the western extremity of the lower one, near the bank of the Wye, which is here crossed by a good stone-bridge of six arches, stands the church, a building of modern erection, with the exception of the steeple, and certainly possessing considerable beauty. Bualt was almost wholly destroyed by fire in the year 1691, when that devouring element raged uninterrupted for upwards of five hours, and destroyed property to the amount of about 13,000l. The market is held on Monday, and is attended by the inhabitants of the neighbouring districts, for the distance of 8 or 10 miles. WOODSTOCK, a town of high interest in many points of view, stands on a fine and healthy eminence: the houses are chiefly built of stone, and none of them bear marks of great antiquity; but such as appear to have stood two centuries, like all provincial tenements of the same age, are irregular in construction and mean in character. The town-hall is a handsome stone building, with a piazza beneath, used as a market-place: it was erected about the year 1766, from a design of Sir W. Chambers, at the sole expense of the late Duke of Marlborough. The south part of the present church is a fragment of a more ancient foundation, and on this side is a round-headed door-case ornamented with chevron-work: the northern face was rebuilt about the year 1785, and at the same time a tower was erected at the west end, which latter is of fair proportions, and charged with modest yet sufficient ornaments. The interior of the church is arranged with decorous and respectable simplicity, a character of architecture, perhaps, best suited to buildings devoted to sacred purposes. Adjoining the church is a grammar-school, founded and endowed in 1585, by Mr. Cornwall, a native of this place. Woodstock has two manufactures, those of polished steel and gloves, from which it derives considerable benefit. This town sends two members to parliament, and has a weekly market on Tuesday and Friday.	From Shrewsb. This may with propriety be looked upon as the most curious memorial of antiquity in the county. Respecting its origin much has been said, and many conjectures have been formed, yet none of the different hypotheses can be considered as perfectly satisfactory: we have duly weighed the opinions of those gentlemen who have written on the subject, and are inclined to favour those of Dr. Stukely, who attributed its foundation to the Druids. These stones are disposed in a circle, and appear to have been originally about 60; but from having been mutilated and removed by succeeding generations, they are considerably reduced, and the number now standing one foot above the level of the earth, only amounts to 24; these generally are about 14 inches in thickness, and though varying in height, none of them exceed five feet, except that occupying the precise north point, which is about 7 feet 4 inches high, and of considerable yet unequal breadth. To the north-east of the circle, at the distance of 84 yards, stands another stone, about nine feet high, called the King Stone, and to the east are the remains of five others, which by many have been termed the five knights; all these appear to have been taken from an adjacent quarry, and, in their rough and unornamented state, to have been placed in their present situation. its southern bank, in a rich pastoral valley, deserve to be noticed. The bridge was constructed at Colebrook Dale, and is on the Schaffhausen principle, the outer ribs rising to the top of the railing, and being connected with the lower ones by means of dove-tailed king-posts. The abbey church is a fine cruciform building; the centre of the cross is surmounted by a massive tower, and the whole of the interior is highly ornamented with carved work. These magnificent remains present, with their ivy-remanted walls, noble pillars, and arches, darkened as they are by their narrow windows, a gloomy contrast when compared with the lively verdure surrounding them, backed by rich woody banks. BANBURY is a well-built town, containing many very respectable buildings, besides the church, which is a modern edifice, whose interior is remarkably neat. The town is watered by the river Charwell, and the Oxford and Coventry canal passes here, and is a source of much advantage to the inhabitants, who have no staple manufacture, but receive a great portion of support from their trade in cheese: this is reckoned extremely good, and finds ready sale in the weekly market held on Thursday, and allowed to be one of the best frequented in the county. Banbury received its first charter of incorporation from Queen Mary; it returns one member to serve in parliament, who is elected by the corporation. Here was formerly a castle of great strength, which sustained two severe sieges during the civil wars that agitated this country in the 17th century. Of this building no remains are in existence, except a small portion of the wall, which is connected to a tenement belonging to a gardener who rents the site of the premises.

UPTON. Upton House, Capt. John Russell.

EDGE HILL derives its name from the circumstance of a number of eminences which here rise from a level plain to a strongly marked and highly exalted ridge. It was here that the unfortunate Charles I. first gave battle to his subjects, which he appears to have done with reluctance, though convinced that bloodshed was unavoidable. The conflict took place on Sunday, the 23d of October, 1642, and after various advantages, the different armies desisted from the contest, each claiming the victory, and both remaining under arms during the night; but the parliament army, which was commanded by the Earl of Essex, first withdrew from the field and retired to Warwick, while the king with his troops remained near the scene of action for some time.

opinion that this place was formerly a Roman station. Numerous vestiges of the Romans have been found here at different times, consisting of old foundations of buildings, Roman bricks, coins, and urns containing fragments of human bones and ashes that have evidently passed through the fire. Alcester is situated at the confluence of the rivers Alne and Arrow, and its buildings prove the commercial respectability of the place in the 16th and 17th centuries; but though its chief houses have been new fronted in the modern style, yet the interior of many remain unaltered, and display the massy timbers and abundant carvings of former times. This town contains a neat church, market-hall, and free-school; it has a weekly market on Tuesday; and derives great benefit from the manufacture of needles, which is calculated to employ about 600 persons.

ALCESTER. Ragley Park, Marquis of Hertford. The present mansion was erected about the middle of the last century by Lord Conway, but has since received very important alterations under the superintendance of the late eminent Mr. Wyatt: it is a spacious and very elegant structure, situated on a commanding elevation, and displaying four fronts, all of which possess great architectural beauty; the interior exhibits a series of noble apartments, whose decorations are of a superior cast, and well calculated for the purposes of state and pleasure; they contain many good pictures, and the spacious entrance-hall is embellished with much fine stucco-work. The park and grounds are very extensive, they abound in majestic oak trees and fine plantations, which are judiciously disposed, and preserved with scrupulous care; a large sheet of water also enlivens the park, which is in every respect a worthy appendage to this truly noble seat.

COUGHTON. Coughton Court, Sir George Courtenay Throckmorton, Bart. The mansion is a very elegant structure, and was originally of a quadrangular form, but being found gloomy and inconvenient, it was deprived of one of its sides, by which means far more delightful prospects are now enjoyed over a diversified tract of country, receiving additional beauty from the serpentine course of the river Arrow.

seat has belonged to the same family since the year 1541, when it became the property of Lord Windsor by the unjustifiable conduct of Henry VIII., who peremptorily ordered that nobleman to receive it in exchange for his seat at Stanwell, Middlesex, to which the monarch had taken a liking, and he was obliged to accede to the king's determination, notwithstanding the latter seat had belonged to his ancestors for many generations. The mansion, after having been in a dismantled state for a considerable period, was, some years since, re-furnished in the most elegant manner; it is a handsome specimen of architecture, and has two fronts, one of which is 127 feet long, and the other 109: the surrounding park receives considerable beauty from the number of gently swelling hills it contains, and also from a fine lake of clear water covering about 30 acres; the plantations have likewise a very fine effect, they are on a large scale, and abound with oaks in every stage of growth. — About 3 m. distant, at Beoly, Beoly Hall, Thos. BROMSGROVE is a large town, containing some good houses and numerous shops; its inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of nails, needles, and coarse linens. The church, standing on an eminence, is ascended by 50 steps; it contains a number of handsome monuments, and has a highly ornamented tower and spire, whose antique beauty is not surpassed by any others in the country. MUCH WENLOCK is chiefly indebted for its celebrity to the remains of an ancient abbey, originally founded here about the year 680, but having fallen into decay, was rebuilt soon after the Norman conquest, and converted into a monastery for Cluniacs: it was a very magnificent building, situated in a deep valley, on the south side of the town, near the church-yard: the remains consist chiefly of a large portion of the church, which exhibits a fine specimen of the pure early Gothic of the 13th century; the shell of the chapter-house is also yet standing, and many traces of cloisters and domestic parts of the edifice, may likewise be discovered. The town consists chiefly of two ill-built streets, but is a very ancient corporation, said to have been the first that sent members to parliament by a writ from Edward IV. in 1478, when it returned one member, but now, together with Broseley and Little Wenlock, it returns two, who are chosen by the free burgesses. Much Wenlock was as famous for its copper mines in the time of Richard II. as it now is for its quarries of lime-stone. Market on Monday.

From the high part of the town to the bridge there is a curious walk, which is hewn 20 feet through the depth of the rock, and although the descent is very great, it is rendered easy by steps and rails. This town carries on a considerable trade in cloth, stockings, iron tools, &c. &c.; it sends two members to parliament, has a good market on Saturday, and contains two churches, besides various dissenting meeting-houses. A short distance from the town there is an extremely fine terrace above a mile long; it occupies an elevated situation, is entirely open, and sufficiently wide to admit six carriages abreast. On one side, the river Severn is seen extending itself for several miles, together with the hanging rocks over it, down to Bridgenorth bridge on the east end of the town, and several of the mountains on the south side of the river: the country is open on the other side to a vast distance, and towards the west the view is bounded by the Wrekin, which is situated about 15 miles distant. MONTGOMERY was formerly surrounded with walls, and possessed a castle, which stood upon the extremity of an eminence at the north side of the town. The origin of this fortress is attributed to Baldwyn, Lieutenant of the Marches to William the Conqueror. In the time of the civil war it was garrisoned for the king, by Lord Herbert, of Chirbury, who commanded the forces, but on the approach of the parliament army, he immediately surrendered. Shortly after, the king's troops advancing, a dreadful battle was fought here, in which the royal party was defeated. The castle then met with a fate similar to that of other fortresses that had been defended for the king, being dismantled by order of government. From the existing vestiges of this building, it is almost impossible to ascertain its original extent. Not far from the castle, situated on a hill, is a stupendous fortified camp, and at the bottom of the hill is a small fortification, with a raised artificial mount in one part of it. This town is pleasantly situated in the hollow of an eminence; it is clean, principally built with brick, and by no means inelegant; it has not any trade, neither is it a thoroughfare to any place of consequence, which circumstances may account for its diminutive size as a county town; but it is well calculated for the residence of persons possessed of small fortunes, who are friendly to retirement, and	14 Stretton	160 $\frac{1}{4}$

The remains of this monastic establishment are situated near the sea-shore, and consist of the refectory, under which appears to have been cells, and over it the dormitory, with the conventual church; part of the latter is at present used for parochial service, and, together with the present mansion-house and the ruinous refectory, forms one connected building, occupying three sides of a square court, open towards the east. The church externally furnishes nothing striking, but the interior will be found highly interesting to the antiquary.

* LLANRWST is a small town, pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the river Conway, but presenting nothing of a very striking appearance, as its houses are irregularly built, and the streets in general narrow, with the exception of that in which the spacious market-hall is situated. This place was formerly celebrated for the peculiar manufacture of Welch harps, which are now become scarce and valuable; and it may be said to monopolize the chief trade of the surrounding district, owing to its central situation, in a vale far distant from any other mart. The church has a mean appearance, both externally and internally; but the chapel, near it, is an elegant structure, containing some monuments to the memory of the Wynne family, that are deserving of attention; they are brasses, but each of them displays, besides an inscription, a portrait of the individual to whose memory it was formed; and it must be considered as somewhat remarkable, that as they are fine specimens of the enclashing practised in the 17th century, the names of those by whom they were executed, have never been recorded in the annals of the fine arts. Four of them were done by Sylvanus Crew, but that most admired for its execution, is a half length figure of Dame Sarah Wynne, by William Vaughan. The chapel was erected in 1633, from the designs of the celebrated Inigo Jones, as was also the bridge here crossing the Conway, which latter is a handsome structure, consisting of three arches, the central being the † ABERCONWAY, or Conway, a large picturesque, but anciently fortified town, is situated near a river of the same name, that was noted for being a pearl fishery, even in the time of the Romans, and was the boast of the country in succeeding ages, but is now held in little estimation, although the species of muscle producing them is still found in the sandy bed of the river. This place is nearly of a triangular shape; it was formerly surrounded by high massy walls, strengthened at intervals by 24 circular and semi-circular towers, great part of which, with the four principal gateways, yet remain in a tolerable state of preservation. The church is an indifferent looking building, containing some modern monuments belonging to the Wynne family; and an inscription on a flat stone, in the nave of the building, notifies that it covers the remains of Nicholas Hookes, the 41st child of his father, and who himself, by his wife Alice, was father to 27 children; he died March 20, 1637. The history of this place commences with that of its castle, which was erected in 1284, by command of Edward I., as a security against the insurrections of the Welch; it is scarcely possible to believe that a more beautiful structure than this ever existed, and its equal cannot certainly be found in Britain; its form is nearly a parallelogram, extending along the verge of a precipitous rock; the walls were of great thickness, flanked by eight vast circular embattled towers, each having a slender machiolated one issuing from the largest, and measuring 60 feet in the span, but one of the collateral arches is said to have been built by an inferior architect in the year 1703. From hence the prospect is extensive, diversified, and truly enchanting: the thick woods and towering hills that skirt the Conway on both sides, are enlivened with the busy animation presented on its surface, by the vessels continually passing to and from the adjacent village of Trefriew, and the diminutive coracles employed in fishing for salmon and smelts, great numbers of which are taken in their respective seasons. This vale in fact presents the most variegated assemblage of beauty in the power of the pencil to delineate, and has been eulogized by Mr. Burke, who is generally allowed to have been a very competent judge of the sublime and beautiful. Petty sessions are held at Llanrwst, as is also a weekly market on Tuesday.

† PENMAEN MAUR MOUNTAIN is an immense rock that protrudes itself into the sea, and rises above its level to the height of 1540 feet; the pass over it was formerly both rugged and dangerous, and could scarcely fail to impress the traveller with emotions of fear, naturally arising from the impending precipice hanging over his head, and momentarily threatening by its shivering aspect to overwhelm or hurry him down headlong into the dreadful abyss a hundred fathoms below, where the roaring ocean foamed against the perpendicular base of the mountain on which he stood. In the year 1772 application was, however, made to parliament, and liberal assistance granted for improving and securing this part of the road to Holyhead. A voluntary subscription was likewise entered into, in which the city of Dublin bore a distinguished part, and under the judicious superintendance of Mr. John Sylvester, civil engineer, a road has been made that will hereafter perhaps be considered as one of the most sublime terraces in the British Isles. This road winds round the mountain, and is now protected, towards the sea, by a strong wall about five feet high, which is supported in many places by deep walls below; but even yet, to a timid individual, a scene of horror is presented by the amazingly abrupt precipices of rock, variegated with fragments and ruins, that appear ready to fall and crush the traveller to atoms.

† BEAUMARIS, though a small town, is the capital of the county, and pleasantly situated on a low shore, called Beaumaris Bay; it consists of a number of well built streets, has an excellent market on Saturday, and

top. On the south side there is a tower which has been rent asunder by some of the inhabitants quarrying the foundation for slates; part of it stands erect, but part of it hangs in an oblique direction upon the subsiding rock, and forms a singular instance of a dilacerated building. The interior consists of two courts, bounded by the various apartments, all of which are in a lamentable state of decay, but still exhibit many strong features, expressive of its former magnificence. The port of this town is a dry harbour, frequented only by a few small coasting vessels, and the trade is very inconsiderable, as is also the market, which is held on Friday.

‡ ABER. The passage hence across the Laven sands to Beaumaris is by no means safe, as the sands frequently shift, but the large bell of this village is constantly rung in foggy weather, in the hope that its sound may serve to direct those whom imperious necessity obliges to cross them under every disadvantage. — 2 m. from this pleasing village, following the banks of the stream, which is accompanied by highly picturesque scenery, there is a most romantic glen, and very fine waterfall; the upper part of this cataract is sometimes broken into three or four divisions by the rugged face of the impending cliff, but the lower one forms a broad sheet, and descends about 20 yards in a very grand style.

sends one member to parliament, who is chosen by the corporation. The church is a handsome structure, with a large square embattled tower; it contains a very magnificent monument, highly deserving the attention of the curious. Here is also a good free-school and a handsome town-hall, over which are elegant assembly rooms. This town was surrounded with walls shortly after the erection of the castle, which was built by Edward I. towards the close of the 13th century, and was certainly a very elegant and strong fortress; but from the lowness of the site, the expansive diameter of its circular towers and bastions, together with the dilapidated state of the walls, it does not now possess that prominent character and imposing effect so strikingly apparent in the more proud piles of Caernarvon and Conway. The bay is a fine expansive opening in front of the town, so sheltered by the island of Priestholme, and Great Ormeshead, that vessels of heavy burthen may ride here perfectly secure, during the most stormy weather.

PARY'S MOUNTAIN is thus spoken of by Mr. Bingley, who visited it about twenty-five years ago: — "Having ascended to the top, I found myself standing on the verge of a vast and tremendous chasm. I stepped on one of the stages, suspended over the edge of the steep, and the prospect was dreadful: the number of caverns at different heights along the sides; the broken and irregular masses of rock which every where presented themselves; the multitudes of men at work in different parts, and apparently in the most perilous situations; the motions of the whimsies, and the raising and lowering of the buckets to draw out the ore and the rubbish; the noise of picking the ore from the rock, and of hammering the wadding, when it was about to be blasted; with, at intervals, the roar of the blast in distant parts of the mine, altogether excited the most sublime ideas, intermixed, however, with sensations of terror. I left this situation, and followed the road that leads into the mine; and the moment I entered, my astonishment was again excited: the shagged arches, and overhanging rocks, which seem to threaten annihilation to any one daring enough to approach them, fixed me almost motionless to the spot. The roofs of the work, having in many places fallen in, have left some of the rudest scenes that imagination can paint: these, with the sulphureous fumes from the kilns in which the ore is roasted, rendered it to me a perfect counterpart to Virgil's entrance into Tartarus."

ELLESMERE, near, Oakley Park, Charles Kynaston Mainwaring, Esq.

ELLESMERE is a pleasant town, situated on one side of a spacious lake, whose banks are well-wooded; it consists chiefly of four streets, and contains a handsome but irregular cruciform church, the centre of which is ornamented with a tower. The site of the castle has been converted into a bowling green, from which a most delightful prospect is obtained into nine different counties, including several highly interesting ruins, and a number of very lofty eminences, forming a charming contrast with the fertile vales studded with villages and enriched by pellucid streams. The excellence of the barley in this neighbourhood induced the inhabitants to turn their attention to the malt trade, which is now the principal support of the town, and finds ready sale in the weekly markets held on Tuesday and Saturday. This trade is greatly facilitated by means of the canal.

In the same house which gave birth to the last-mentioned writer, was born Mr. John Ireland, author of "Illustrations of Hogarth," and other works. This gentleman had a great fondness and a refined taste for pictures, prints, and books; he was intimately acquainted with many men eminent in the arts, the bar, and the church; and was the particular friend of Gainsborough, the painter, and the first protector of Henderson, the actor; but was in the latter period of his life afflicted with a complication of disorders, which rendered society irksome to him, and his sufferings were aggravated by pecuniary difficulties. He died at the close of the year 1808, in the vicinity of Birmingham.

FLINT, the deserted capital of the county, is conjectured to have been formerly a Roman British town, as it is formed on the plan of a Roman encamp- ment, rectangular, surrounded with regular entrenchments and ramparts, with four fortified gates; this also appears evident from the vast number of Roman coins, and various instruments, occasionally dug up by workmen. The lines of the streets are now broken and dilapidated, the market has been discontinued, and the place has the appearance of a deserted village; but it nevertheless, in conjunction with Rhyddlan, Overton, Caergwrle, and Caerwys, sends one member to parliament, and is much fre- quented as a bathing-place by persons of fashion. The church, or rather chapel of ease to Nor- thop, is an inconsiderable edifice with a small tower at its west end. The castle experienced a similar fate to many others, having at various times since its erection been garrisoned for different parties, and is now in a very decayed state.	91	To Eyton, Denbigh.	179 $\frac{1}{2}$

This seat is principally known to the world as having been the residence of the late Thomas Pennant, Esq., to whose indefatigable re- searches the topography and natural history of Great Britain are under very many obligations. The year 1657 was erected in the year 1657; it is beautifully situ- ated amidst finely wooded grounds, and is in the form of the letter H, with gabled wings. The gardens and plantations received considerable alterations and improvements under the skilful management of the late owner. Hence are enjoyed many delightful prospects, and a fine sea-view that receives much additional beauty and animation from the numerous vessels entering and quitting the port of Liverpool. The interior of the mansion is particularly commodious, con- taining a number of pictures, principally consisting of subjects in natural history, and a nume- rous collection of choice books occupy the library, which is enriched by many very valuable manuscripts, solely the produce of Mr. Pennant's labour and in- dustry. — About $\frac{1}{4}$ m. from the above, Upper Downing, Mrs. Thomas; and 1 m. beyond it, near the sea, Mostyn Hall, Sir Thos. The castle, from which the town originated, stood on the side of the hill, facing the vale on the west, its remains consist of a few fragments of towers and fallen walls, nearly reduced to the foundation; its area now comprises a meadow, five-court, and bowling-green, from whence the prospects are at once grand and picturesque. The town-hall, in which the great sessions are held, is situated near the market place. The county gaol is also a handsome structure.

FESTINIOG. Near this village, which is situated in a most enchanting vale, are the falls of the Cynfael, one of them about 300 yards above, and the other the same distance below, a neat rustic stone bridge. At the upper fall, the water foams over three steep rocks, into a deep black basin, overshadowed by the adjoining eminences; the other is formed by a broad expanse of water that precipitates itself down a shelving rock about 40 feet high, it then rushes along a narrow rocky chasm, and at last, gaining a smoother bed, winds through the mazes of the vale. Between the bridge and the lower cataract, a singular columnar rock stands in the bed of the river, called Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit, from whence the peasantry inform us that a magician of that name used to deliver his nightly incantations. The vale is particularly salubrious, and abounds with many delightful views; the mountains flanking its sides are mostly covered with venerable oaks, and have their bases fringed with thick brushwood.	103¾		BALA is a neat, clean, and populous town, consisting of one main street, with others crossing it at right angles: it is situated at the lower end of the lake, and is equalled in size and appearance by few in North Wales. This place is noted for its vast trade in woollen stockings, gloves, and Welch wigs, and for its well-attended market on Saturday. Bala is endowed with valuable privileges, but contains no structure worthy particular notice; it is, however, the general rendezvous of gentlemen, who, during the season, resort hither for the purpose of grouse shooting amidst the surrounding heath-clad hills. The lake, situated to the south of the town, is the principal attraction of the neighbourhood; it is the largest in Wales, being about four miles long, and in some places near one mile broad, and its accompanying scenery is not altogether dissimilar to the low hilly views round the lake of Winandermere in Cumberland.

Pontaberglassllyn.—Beyond Tan y Bwlch Inn, over the hill, see an arm of the sea, called Trawth Mawr, a very fine object, with the mountains over it.

PONTABERGLASSLLYN, or the bridge at the confluence of the Blue Pool, is a single arch built over a rapid mountain torrent that divides the two counties of Merioneth and Caernarvon; just above it the river falls down a craggy break about 12 feet high; this is called the salmon leap, and being only a few miles from the sea, is frequented by great numbers who come up the river towards the close of the year for the purpose of depositing their spawn. The surrounding scenery is magnificently grand, the road winds romantically through a narrow stony vale, above which the dark perpendicular cliffs rise on each side, and with their disjointed fragments appear to threaten destruction to the traveller who dare venture through the passage beneath, which was scarcely wide enough for a carriage road, and the bed of the river. This, however, by dint of incredible labour, was lately sufficiently widened to allow carriages to pass each other, and is bounded on the lower side by a stone wall.

invocation. From the summit it seems propped by four buttresses, between which are as many deep hollows, each, excepting one, having one or more lakes lodged in its distant bottom. The best route to the summit of this immense mountain is, to take a boat from Cwm y Glo Llanrug up the lower Llan Beris lake, and land on the little isthmus between the pools; just below the old castle, Doi Badarn, take a guide, and ascend by Caunaut Mawr, the great chasm, where there is a fine waterfall; climb up the south side of the ridge separating Llan Beris Hollow from Cwm Brwynog, another hollow or mountain flat, and proceed, keeping in sight Llyndyr Arddw, which you leave on the right; you then ascend along a steep place called Llechwed y Re, from thence to the celebrated cold spring or well, which is within a mile of the highest peak. The summit of this mountain is 3571 feet above the level of the sea, and not more than 5 or 6 yards in diameter, it is surrounded by a kind of wall of great use to sit upon, and enjoy the extensive prospects around, which on a clear day are the most picturesque and unbounded imaginable; the county of Chester, the hills of Yorkshire, part of the north of England, Ireland, and Scotland being distinctly seen; the isles of Man and Anglesea lie spread out beneath, like a map, with every rill visible; but when the summit is enveloped in a mist, the most alarming sensations are involuntarily felt, by the suggested idea of numbers of abysses concealed by thick smoke, furiously circulating around, and threatening inevitable destruction.

BISHOP'S CASTLE is a small town, situated on the declivity of an eminence, near the river Clun. It is an ancient corporation, and sends two members to parliament, besides having the privilege of a market on Friday. The bishops of Hereford had formerly a castle here, whence is derived the name of the place; it has, however, long since been destroyed, and part of its site is now converted into a bowling-green. The town-house is a neat structure, as is also the church, which stands below the town.

4 m. to the left of Oakley Park, on the road to Kington, Downton Castle, Thomas Andrew Knight, Esq. The mansion is an elegant stone structure, standing on an elevated bank, and ornamented with Gothic towers and battlements. Its interior is fitted up in the most chaste manner possible, and is suitably decorated with a few select pictures by the most eminent artists. The dining room is a circular apartment, about 30 feet in diameter; the ceiling rises to a dome finished by a lantern, from which, and one window looking to the front, it receives all its light. Four recesses are occupied by as many sideboards placed between very large pillars in pairs; in each recess there is also a niche containing an elegant bronze statue. The library is furnished with a good collection of valuable works; and the various other apartments perfectly correspond with those above-mentioned. Downton may be looked upon as one of the most picturesque seats in England; it has the advantage of a fine mountain river, a profusion of wood, some bold rocks, and a variety of distances: indeed nature has here concentrated some of her most delightful charms; and art, guided by true taste, has contented herself with exhibiting the beauties she could not improve. The ground falls rapidly from the house into a beautiful little valley, watered by the Teme, which flows over its rocky bed in a wild and tempestuous current; the opposite bank is finely clothed with luxuriant wood, rising in various shapes to its very summit: the course of the stream is richly diversified; and the wild and solitary path that leads through the woods by its side, opens upon much rich and beautiful scenery. The stream being in some parts shut up between high and narrow banks, foams along its rocky channel with tumultuous rapidity; and near the place where it emerges into the more open valley, overlooked by the mansion, a bridge has been erected, along which the path is continued. The banks are less steep in other parts, and the prospects more extensive, but in all the views they are richly adorned with pendant foliage. The river meanders through the grounds for about three miles, having, through a great part of that distance, its banks fringed with wood that rises to a considerable height. The landscapes are, in fact, peculiarly rich, but perhaps the most eminent is that which includes a mill, between one and two miles below the mansion, and, with its adjuncts, composes a scene of uncommon grandeur and interest.

BARMOUTH is situated at the mouth of the river Maw, which here divides into two channels, having an island between them, called Ynis Brawd, or Friars Island; at ebb tide the water here is fresh, and at flood, salt, a curious circumstance, when we consider its proximity to the sea. The town occupies the sloping side of a very lofty rock, and the first view of it makes the traveller tremble for himself, as well as for its aerial inhabitants; it is not unaptly compared to the town of Gibraltar, and is by some said to be like part of the city of Edinburgh, the houses being built upon ledges one above the other, so that a person standing at his door can look down the chimney of his neighbour: it is the only sea-port town in Merionethshire, and is much frequented in the summer season by respectable families for the purpose of bathing, having machines for the accommodation of visitors, and an assembly twice a week, besides excellent harping for their amusement. The beach also affords a delightful promenade; here the margin of the wide river Afon, which winds among the mountains, is nearly covered with high lands, that are alternately naked, clad with dense woods, and scantily overspread with the wild purple-flowered heath; while in the back-ground is seen the mighty bifurcated Cader Idris, raising its majestic heads, and soaring above the clouds. Many highly interesting excursions may also be made in the neighbourhood, for the purpose of contemplating the various beauties of nature. The market is held on Tuesday and Friday.

the Blue Lion. The castle appears to have been built by *Ed-

ancient fortress; it is now fast
going to decay, but still exhibits
a noble square building, with a circular tower at each corner,
and one bastion on each side the grand entrance, with beautiful
machiolated turrets rising out of the large rounders. This castle is completely unassailable
on the side towards the sea, and the other is protected by an exceeding wide and deep fosse cut through the solid rock; it has
at different times withstood
long sieges, and never surrendered but on the most honourable terms. A market is here
held on Saturday.

DOLGELLY consists of a number of low, irregular built houses, but has a good modern
church, and carries on a considerable trade in coarse cloths,
flannels, and kerseymeres, besides which, here is a well frequented market on Tuesday
and Saturday, and here the summer assizes are held. The town is situated in a vale, on the river
Union, surrounded by mountains, and is justly celebrated for its delightful views and picturesque landscapes. The tourist will do well to make this his central station while he examines the various beauties of the neighbourhood, as there is,
perhaps, no place in the principality from whence so many excursions may be made with advantage, and where nature bears
so rich, varied, and grand an aspect as at Dolgelly.

than that of Snowdon, and from
its summit on a clear day the eye is feasted with a delightfully varied prospect over a circumference of 500 miles; from hence far below the feet are seen, interspersed with lakes, those huge rocks that were before
looked up to with astonishment;
to the north, Snowdon and its
dependencies close the scene;
on the west lies the whole curve
of the bay of Cardigan, dashing its white breakers against the craggy coasts of Merioneth, and bounded at a vast distance by the Caernarvon mountains; the southern horizon is bounded by the Plinlimmon, the channel peeping through the openings of the wards the east, the view is carried over the lake of Bala, the

This is a venerable pile, situated in a well-wooded park, on the right of the road to Montgomery, and occupying an elevated and commanding site, overlooking a vast tract of country, the greater part of which was formerly subject to its lords. It is built of red stone, and approached by two immense terraces, rising each above the other by means of a vast flight of steps, ornamented with vases, statues, antique remains, &c.: these lead, by an entrance through a gateway between two immense circular embattled towers, to an area or court, round which are ranged the different apartments. The principal gallery is 117 feet long and 20 broad; it was formerly much longer, but a large room has been taken from it at one end. This is of a later date than the other part of the building, and is said to have been detached from it about 75 years ago. The lower part of the interior has a sombre appearance, owing to the thickness of the walls; but the saloon and library are well-lighted, and command many very delightful prospects, especially the former, which embraces a view of the rich vale of the Severn, with the Freidden hills in the contrasted background. In a narrow gallery leading to the bed rooms, there are a number of family portraits. A detached building also contains many valuable paintings by the most celebrated masters. The hanging gardens, composed of terrace upon terrace, are ascended by flights of steps cut out of the solid rock, and though not consonant to the present taste, yet they perfectly harmonize with the character and situation of the building. The park, formed of swelling hills with spacious verdant lawns, is well clothed with wood, and abounds with rich scenery.

TREMADOC. This town is situated on a portion of land lately recovered from the sea, by the spirited exertions of William Alexander Maddocks, Esq.; its form is an oblong square, on the east side is the market-house, a handsome building, having the upper story laid out into good assembly rooms. The church is a neat little edifice in the pointed style, and there is also a meeting-house for protestant dissenters, together with a bank, and a good inn. Market on Friday.

CRICKIETH is a contributory borough to Caernarvon, but consists only of a number of low mean-looking houses, built without any regard to relative situation: it is, however, a place of great antiquity, and has a market on Wednesday. On an eminence at the end of a long neck of land that projects into the sea, stand the ruins of the castle, said by some writers to have been erected by Edward I.

This town has a market on Wednesday and Saturday, and is one of the contributory boroughs that, together with Caernarvon, &c. sends one member to parliament. DINASMOUTHY was formerly a place of much more consequence than it is at present, having been the seat of a chieftain, and its vicinity the scene of feats of valour and barbarity. Though possessing the insignia of power, it is now a very poor town, many of the houses having no upper stories, and some of them being wholly without windows; yet the greatest content seems to exist among the inhabitants, whose dress is evidently made for use not ornament. The market is held on Friday. The situation of the town is romantic, singular, and beautiful; it appears to the observer as if suspended upon the side of a mountain, amidst the most diversified scenery. The most remarkable public building is the church, which contains several good monuments, particularly one of a priest. There is a large square well contiguous to the west side of the churchyard, the waters of which are said to be efficacious in cutaneous disorders. The vale of the Dysyni is about 12 miles long, and from the lake of Mwyngol to the sea is one of the most beautiful in North Wales. During the bathing season many respectable families frequent this place in preference to Aberystwith, because of its cheap and excellent supply of provisions. DEVIL'S BRIDGE. Hafod,
The present magnificent mansion was erected by the late Thomas Johnes, Esq., on the site of one equally superb, destroyed by fire in the year 1807. It is a light and airy structure in the Gothic style, with pointed windows and pinnacles: the apartments are of the most pleasing dimensions; the hall is paved with Mona marble, and both the doors of the octagon library have columns of the same. The house, however, formed but an object of minor importance when compared with the grounds, which were transferred from a complete desert to a scene exhibiting all the varieties of the most useful, ornamental, and extensive cultivation. A great number of walks branch off in different directions through the woods, extending altogether to a distance of about eight or nine miles; these were laid out in a most judicious manner, and invariably terminate in some point or object affording considerable delight. Here are a number of cascades of great beauty, and the banks of the Ystwith have a grand appearance, being fringed with the finest woods. A handsome church appropriated to the use of the family, and a beautiful obelisk commemorative of the late Duke of Bedford, afford variety to this extensive tract. The various prospects are beautiful, romantic, and astonishingly grand, and exhibit this noble fertile tract to great advantage when contrasted with some of the barren mountainous eminences also seen from many points.

PENYSTRYWAD, 1½ m. beyond,
Maesmawr, E. Davies, Esq.

LLANYDLOES, though pleasantly situated, is by no means a well built town, as the majority of the houses are formed of timber-frames intertwined with laths, and having the interstices filled up with mud. The church is celebrated for the beauty of its roof, which is formed of curiously carved oak, and bears the date 1542; it is otherwise highly embellished, and, according to a tradition of the neighbourhood, is indebted for many of its ornaments to the abbey of Cwmhir in Radnorshire. The market is held on Saturday. In this neighbourhood there are several manufactories furnished with machinery for carding and spinning wool, which, however beneficial they may be to the proprietors, have caused a considerable increase in the poor-rates.

DEVIL'S BRIDGE. The emotion of astonishment, terror, and delight produced on the mind by viewing the scene here presented, far exceeds the utmost powers of language. The bridge consists of two arches, one thrown over the other; the lower arch or old bridge is said to be indebted for its origin to the monks of Strata Florida abbey, in the reign of William Rufus; and the upper arch was thrown over it in 1753, at the expense of the county, for the greater safety of travellers. The yawning chasm beneath these arches is so overhung with wood that the eye with difficulty catches even a partial view of the gloomy abyss below; this circumstance however heightens the impression of terror which such a scene is calculated to inspire. Those who would wish to form a just idea of the grandeur of this terrific torrent, with the various rocks covered with the thick and almost impervious foliage of innumerable trees on each side the valley, and view all that is entitled to attention, must not merely submit to the direction of the guides of the place, but trust to themselves, and explore the valley in all directions wherever they can find or make a path; by so doing, the dreadful majesty of the various falls, rushing among obstructing rocks, foaming in the deep rocky basins which they have formed for themselves by the incessant percussion of ages, and filling the narrow valley with a cloud of spray, may be seen, but cannot otherwise be adequately estimated or conceived.

TRING, 2 m. before, across the Grand Junction canal, Stocks House, J. Adam Gordon, Esq.

TRING is a small neat town, containing several handsome buildings, and having a market on Friday, which is well supplied with corn. The church is an elegant regular building, consisting of a nave, side aisles, and chancel; the walls are supported by strong buttresses, there is a massive tower at the west end, and the whole building is embattled; the roof and its supporters, together with two beautiful monuments, also deserve attention.

KINETON. J. M. Boulbee, Esq.

KINETON is supposed by Camden to have derived its name from its ancient market for Kine or Cows, but it appears more probable that it is a corruption of Kingstown, as it was formerly a royal residence. At the west end of the town, near the foot of the hill on which stood the castle, said to have been built by King John, there is a well, locally known by the name of King John's well.

COMPTON VERNEY is the seat of Lord Willoughby de Broke. The mansion was erected about the middle of the last century, and is a spacious and elegant structure, standing amidst extensive grounds, ornamented by a fine sheet of water. Near the mansion there is a large handsome chapel.

GUY'S CLIFF, the elegant and truly romantic seat of Bertie Bertie Greathead , Esq. The mansion was built about the middle of the 18th century, and has since received very consider- able additions. The grounds, abounding with natural beau- ties, are laid out with consider- able taste; and the rock that the house and chapel stand upon, and by excavations in which all the out-offices were formed, presents towards the river the most picturesque fea- tures imaginable, being richly clothed with wood and enlivened by the soft flowing Avon pur- suing its serpentine course amidst the most attractive meads. The chapel was found- ed by Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and is a good plain substantial edifice, having near it a rude and now mutil- ated statue of the celebrated Guy, who is said to have passed the latter part of his life in this delectable retreat, and a cave is shown as that inhabited by him, and traditionally reported to be "hewed with his own hands." land enriches the domain, and a fine serpentine walk displays, to the visitor the various beauties of this diversified tract; while several vistas are judiciously formed, casually exhibiting lands unconnected with the estate, but adding to its picturesque beauty.

HAMPSTEAD. This beautiful village is situated on a fine eminence, about 400 feet above the level of the tide, and enjoys a most extensive and truly delightful prospect. The air is particularly healthy, and the broken and undulated character of the hill, overspread by numerous ornamental residences of the wealthy Londoners, renders Hampstead a peculiarly interesting scene. The original attractions of this spot were its mineral waters, which were in high repute about the commencement of the last century, when the place was greatly resorted to, and it then displayed a scene of similar dissipation and gaiety usually met with at such public resorts, but other novelties of a corresponding character springing up, the waters of Hampstead became neglected, and the wells were consequently suffered to go to decay.

HIGHGATE, like its neighbour Hampstead, enjoys a commanding and bold situation, but though it possesses equal claims to admiration in point of prospect, yet is certainly not so conspicuous for beauty in itself, but partakes more of the character of a town, in consequence of the traffic on the great north road; it however contains many highly respectable and pleasant residences, and is much resorted to by visitors from the metropolis to enjoy the salubrity of its air, and the extent and variety of the landscape by which it is surrounded. In excavating Highgate Hill, when the present new road through the archway was formed, numerous fossils were discovered, as septaria, sharks' teeth, petrified fish, nuts resembling the palm nut, and a great variety of shells.

The present mansion was erected about 40 years since, at an expense of 53,000*l*; it is an elegant stone structure, with wings, having two fronts, the principal of which, facing the east, is ornamented by a fine semi-circular portico surmounted by a half dome; there is on each side the doorway of the west front an uniform projection, finished with a balustrade. A classic air pervades the whole of the interior, which is fitted up with considerable taste. A subterranean passage leads from the house to the offices, which, though nearly as large as the mansion, are entirely concealed by plantations of evergreen and other hardy shrubs. The park contains some fine timber, and the pleasure-grounds are well-stocked with fruit trees. — Near this is Colney Cottage, Thomas Porteus, Esq.

Between Barnet and South Mims, an extensive improvement is contemplated by the Parliamentary Commissioners for the Holyhead Road. (See Mr. Telford's Report to the House of Commons, dated 5th June, 1820, pp. 9 & 10.) At present, "the whole is composed of a series of angular turnings and unnecessary hills, to an extent which renders it surprising how such glaring imperfections have been so long suffered to exist, when a sufficiently direct line can be obtained, with no inclination more than 1 in 30."

LEIGHTON BUZZARD is supposed, from the remains of a Roman camp, situated about half a mile from the town, and other circumstances, to have been the Saxon Lygeanburg, that was, with several other places, taken by Cuthwulf from the Britons. The church is a large ancient structure, with a square tower at the intersection surmounted by a spire; this building, from the variety of its grotesque carvings, and being constructed with the same sort of stone, is supposed to have been built at the same time as the cross, which is an elegant pentagonal structure, presumed to have been erected about five centuries ago; it stands near the market-house, and is, including the vane, 38 feet high: the basement story consists of five rows of steps, on which stands an arch, that supports a second story, comprising five niches, each occupied by a statue, and formerly ornamented with pinnacles at the corners; but one of these is now destroyed. STONEY STRATFORD is built on the Watling Street; the houses are of free-stone, and extend for about a mile on each side the road. It originally consisted of a few inns for the accommodation of travellers; but as trade increased, a stone bridge was built over the river Ouse, and additional houses for fresh residents. It suffered greatly by fire in 1742, when the body of the church of St. Mary was consumed, but the tower is yet standing. St. Giles's church was rebuilt, with the exception of the tower, in 1777: near to this structure is a neat market-place; though the principal business is carried on by means of samples displayed by the farmers in public-houses. The market-day is Friday.

The design having been obtained from Italy, the building was begun in 1630, and between that year and the period of its completion, 1636, the proprietor here gave a sumptuous entertainment to their majesties. Originally the columns supporting the corridors were of a different colour to the rest of the mansion; but the whole front having been recently cased with a handsome white stone, it now exhibits a pleasing uniformity corresponding with the regularity of the building.

mented with stone tracery; the windows are enriched with the armorial bearings of the numerous families connected by marriage with the ancient lords

decorations, is curious, as having a large window over it, the smoke being conveyed by two funnels up into the collateral buttresses of the fire-place, by which means the uniformity of the hall, as to windows, is as

the reign of James I, but has since at different times received considerable additions, notwithstanding which, many remains of the monastic building are yet
to be seen, from whence the course of the ancient structure
may still be traced. The several ranges of apartments are of
noble dimensions; they are ele-

suited to the purposes of state
and dignified hospitality; their walls exhibit a very highly interesting collection of paintings

which are portraits of the ill-

After the battle of Prague, when

which they are said to have been stimulated by the extraordinary beauty of his queen,
who some time after resided in England, and is then believed to have been privately married
to the above named nobleman,
though political motives would not allow of the nuptials being made public; it was to this Lord Craven that she bequeathed by will her valuable collec-

many original portraits of dis-

ALLESLEY. Allesley Park, J. Beck, Esq. The present mansion stands on the site of a more ancient edifice. Its principal front has a slightly projecting centre, ornamented with a pediment and vacant tympanum; but in the construction of this building, the least particle of pompous display has been carefully avoided, while every attention has been paid to those internal accommodations that may in any degree conduce to domestic comfort.

SOHO, M. R. Boulton, Esq. This manufactory may justly be considered the first of its kind in Europe, both with respect to the value of its productions, and the extent and grandeur of the buildings in which it is carried on.

In support of the former assertion, it may be observed that, in the early stages of the establishment, the chief wares were similar to those usually made in this part of the country, such as buckles, buttons, watch-chains, &c.; but under the able management of the late Messrs. Boulton and Watt, it was soon extended to plated goods, which have been produced here in the greatest perfection. These were succeeded by elegant fancy articles, manufactured in stone, bronze, or moulu, &c., all of which gave such universal satisfaction, that the proprietors were induced to bring forward an article of more novelty and importance than any of the foregoing; this was plate, wrought by means of machinery, the great beauty of which, and its excellent workmanship, caused the invention to be attended with the most brilliant success, and it now forms one of the principal productions of the place. Lastly, that beautiful and truly valuable machine, the steam-engine, to which the most extraordinary powers have been applied by the proprietors, has not only been called in aid of this vast establishment, but forms in its turn an article of manufacture, and is hence exported in great numbers; and thus has the fame of Soho been firmly established in all parts of the world. The buildings in which this extensive assemblage of the useful arts is conducted, are situated near the base of a considerable elevation, and consist of four squares, that are connected by

Heavy fines were at different times levied on him, his house was plundered, and the marks of a cannon ball are here still visible on one of the staircases. The worthy baronet was too old to be himself serviceable in the field, but his son attended the king in arms, and Sir Thomas had the honour of entertaining his Majesty here for two nights, shortly previous to the battle of Edgehill. This neighbourhood likewise abounds with vast mines of coal, iron-stone, quarry-stone, clay, &c.; and contains several furnaces for smelting iron-ore, besides forges, and slitting-mills worked by steam. A peculiar species of sand, much used in casting metals, is also found here. A very extraordinary phenomenon may be seen at Bradley, a hamlet adjoining the village: this is a fire in the earth, which has continued burning for near half a century, in spite of every endeavour made to extinguish it, and almost six acres of land have been reduced by it to a substance that forms an excellent material for repairing the roads; and the workmen, when collecting it, not unfrequently find large beds of alum of a superior quality. This fire arises from a burning stratum of coal, about four feet thick, and near 30 feet deep, to which, owing to the main coal having been dug out from under it, the air has free access. It is likewise curious that the surface is occasionally covered with such quantities of sulphur as to be easily gathered.

OSWESTRY was formerly surrounded by walls, and had four gates of entrance, which were all taken down about the year 1769, and the town is now fast increasing in size, and already extends considerably beyond the ancient boundaries on all sides, but more particularly on the English side. A castle appears to have been erected here in the reign of King Stephen, but this has now almost altogether disappeared, the only portion existing being on a lofty artificial mount at the west end of the town, from whence the prospect is at once rich and extensive, embracing great part of Shropshire, and some of the adjacent counties. Oswestry was severely harassed during the conquest of Wales by Edward I., and King John burnt the town in the time of his war with the barons; it was afterwards rebuilt, and again destroyed by Llewellyn in the year 1233. The church stands quite out of the town; it is spacious, and was once very handsome; indeed it still retains a bold and venerable appearance, notwithstanding its having been patched up without any regard to style or regularity; the tower, whose sides are beautifully mantled with clinging ivy, has a fine picturesque effect, but the interior is plain, having possibly been stripped of its ornaments. CHIRK, beyond, Chirk Castle, Mrs. Myddelton Biddulph. This very noble castellated mansion is situated on an eminence, and enjoys a varied and most delightful prospect into 17 different counties; it is of a square form, with a stately bastion-like tower at each angle, surmounted by a small turret: the principal entrance leads through another massy tower into a spacious quadrangular court-yard, round which are the different apartments, and on whose eastern side there is a handsome colonnaded piazza; the interior is elegantly furnished, and the picture gallery contains many performances of infinite merit. The park is very extensive, reaching to the foot of the Berwyn mountains, and is partially covered with lofty forest-trees: the plantations are of the first class, and the pleasure grounds are laid out in a very chaste style.

CHIRK is a very populous village, situated on the brow of a lime-stone hill, amidst a number of coal and lime-works. The church-yard contains seven aged yews, and the church many monuments to the memory of different branches of the Myddelton family of Chirk Castle. In the year 1164 this village was the scene of one of the most severe conflicts ever witnessed between the English and the Welch. The surrounding country is remarkably beautiful, and at about two miles distant, on the road to Ruabon, is presented one of the most beautiful landscapes ever beheld. In the immediate neighbourhood of Chirk is the aqueduct of the Ellesmere canal, which is a very curious and elegant contrivance, and notifies in the greatest degree the wonderful ingenuity and skill of Mr. Thomas Telford, the engineer, under whose superintendance this great work was projected and ultimately executed.

LLANGOLLEN, Caer Dinas Bran, or Crow Castle. This interesting ruin occupies the summit of a conical mountain, which is so precipitous as to be almost inaccessible on all sides; but the most accessible part was defended by a trench cut through the solid rock. It appears from the massy fragments of the walls to have been a large and almost impregnable fortress, and was certainly a place of great importance in the time of Owen Glyn-dwr, who had much to fear from it and the adjacent military outposts at the time of his quarrel with Lord Grey de Ruthin, his residence being in the immediate neighbourhood, and this castle being then possessed by the Earl of Arundel, a firm supporter of the Lancastrian cause.—1 m. distant from Llangollen, Dinbryn, late F. Cudiffe, Esq.; and about 2 m. distant from Llangollen, in the road to Ruthin, Valle Crucis Abbey. This grand and highly picturesque ruin is delightfully situated in a vale, receiving an addition to its majestic appearance from the appropriate gloom of the surrounding scenery, which cannot fail to impress the mind of the beholder with reverential awe; it was founded in the year 1200, and notwithstanding the lower part has been converted into a farmhouse, it still retains many of its monastic features. The church appears to have been cruciform; its east and west ends, together with part of the transept, are still in existence, and exhibit a specimen of the pointed style of architecture which prevailed through the whole structure; at the same time that the ivy-clad walls, partly concealed by tall ash-trees growing within the area of the building, afford as fine a picturesque object as the painter could imagine or desire.—Near the above is the Pillar of Eliseg, a sepulchral stone raised by Cencon in the memory of his great-grandfather Eliseg, who was slain in a battle fought with the Saxons near Chester in the year 607. It is a round column, said to have been originally 12 feet high, but does not now exceed 8 feet.—Not far from this are the ruins of the palace of Owen Glyn-dwr, scarcely any vestiges of which are however now in existence, but we cannot allow the spot to pass unnoticed, as the individual to whom it formerly belonged forms so conspicuous a figure in Welch history. He here lived the life without the least appearance of controul; they are in the highest state of cultivation, and contain some excellent plantations with fine gravel walks so judiciously formed as to convey an idea of considerable extent. The prospects from this seat are also of an exceedingly diversified character; in some of them the varied beauties of the grounds are finely contrasted with lofty mountains, and others are rendered additionally interesting from the ruins of Dinas Bran Castle, and the tower of Llangollen church.

CORWEN, a neat small town, situated under a rock at the foot of the Berwyn mountains, on the southern bank of the river Dee, contains a church in which there is an ancient monument to the memory of one of its vicars; in the church-yard is also a very old stone pillar that has been much ornamented, and not far from it stands a good alms-house for six clergymen's widows. Corwen is much resorted to by anglers during the season, as the river abounds with trout, grayling, and salmon. Opposite the town, on the other side of the river, is a British post, called Caer Drewyn, a circle of loose stones upon the summit of a steep hill, about half a mile in circumference, with the remains of circular habitations within. It is supposed that Owen Gwynedd occupied this post while Henry II. was encamped on the opposite side of the vale, and it was afterwards a retreat of the celebrated Owen Glyndwr, whose memory is highly revered in this neighbourhood, long the scene of his military exploits and hospitality. The encampment commands a delightful view of the vales of Glyn-Dwrdwy and Edeirnion, and may be distinguished from the church-yard in the direction of the village of Cwmwyd. of a little sovereign in his own dominions, till a quarrel arose between him and Lord Grey, of Ruthin Castle, which lasted many years; in this Glyndwr was backed by his faithful Welch, and Grey by Henry IV., who sacrificed by his means 100,000 lives, besides burning numerous habitations and destroying immense property, which excited so great a degree of animosity that it is not yet wholly extinguished. — Near to this is Llandysilio Hall, Major Harrison. The mansion is a handsome brick building, consisting of a centre and two projecting wings, containing a number of spacious and elegant apartments. The surrounding scenery is extremely pleasing, including the serpentine course of a river, a fine romantic valley passing among the hills, and a good back-ground of mountains whose bases are well clothed with wood.

LLANGOLLEN is a small town, situated in a vale of the same name. It has a market on Saturday, but contains nothing really worthy of notice except the bridge, which is a handsome and very curious structure, and was erected by John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, in the early part of the 14th century. It consists of five irregular pointed arches, through only one of which the water generally runs; but it has there formed a deep chasm in the bed of the river, which is one continued surface of solid rock. The church is not remarkable for the beauty of its architecture; but the tourist cannot fail to be pleased with the view of the river Dee, obtained from its elevated and spacious church-yard. The neighbourhood of Llangollen has been always celebrated by the lover of picturesque scenery, as one of the most romantic and beautiful in North Wales, and the inhabitants of the town derive no small portion of their maintenance from the influx of wealthy strangers, who take up their temporary abode here, in order to visit the places in the vicinity, and survey the various beauties of its far-famed vale.

BANGOR. This city lies in a narrow valley, at the mouth of the Menai, between two low ridges of slate-rock, with the beautiful bay of Beaumaris to the north. The cathedral, a low, plain building, containing several monuments and other ornaments worthy attention, stands on the site of a more ancient edifice, which at different times suffered severely by the political rage of the contending parties who spread devastation and dismay over this part of Britain. This city is tolerably well built, and contains the Bishop's palace, a very commodious building, besides some good charitable institutions, and a free-school that has long been in high repute as a training seminary for Oxford and Trinity College Dublin. The vicinity of the town is highly cultivated, and some elegant villas are scattered round it; the scenery of the neighbourhood is also particularly beautiful and picturesque; indeed the retirement of the situation, together with its surrounding objects, so well pleased the Rev. Mr. Warner, that he observed, "if he were Bishop of Bangor, the only translation he should covet would be thence to Heaven:" the uncommon cheapness of provisions added to these circumstances, has also induced several highly respectable families to make this their place of residence. The main opening of the bridge substituted for the inconvenient ferry, is 560 feet between the points of suspension; the roadway is 30 feet in breadth, and 100 feet above the level of high water at spring tides.

From Menai Bridge, an entirely new road has been made through the Island of Anglesea, crossing the main ridge at 160 feet below the level of the old road; in the whole distance it passes over a gently waving surface, without one inconvenient ascent or descent; it is broad, smooth, and well protected; and by crossing the Stanley Sands, the circuit by the 4 mile bridge is avoided, and the line to Holyhead rendered very direct.

In the middle of the Island, there is a new and very commodious inn.

deric Molwynog. It lately underwent many alterations from designs by Wyatt, at which time the whole was new fronted with yellow brick, giving it the appearance of stone, and the chapel was removed into a pleasing grove, a few yards distant. The interior of this building is extremely neat, and the chancel elegant; the pulpit is of cedar, with three beautifully carved oak-panels; and the large eastern window contains some brilliant stained glass. The buildings enclose a large area or quadrangle, with gateway, tower, a vast hall, saloon, and many very elegant apartments. The grounds are extensive and well-wooded; they command many uncommonly fine views, receiving additional beauty from the river

Ogwen, which here forms several cascades, seen through the vistas in the plantations from the front of the house. The stables rank among the first in the kingdom in point of elegance and accommodation; they are fronted with patent slate, and the same material forms the fence of the park, which is entered by an elegant and highly finished gateway resembling a Roman triumphal arch.—1*m.* from the above, Lime Grove, James Wyatt, Esq. quadrangular building faces the west, and is of the Ionic order, with a rusticated basement: the interior is fitted up in the most superb and costly style, and many of the apartments are enriched with scarce and valuable paintings by the old masters; the gallery also exhibits a large and highly interesting collection of portraits; the library is stored with a valuable selection of works by the best authors; and a small room at the end of it, fitted up in the Etruscan style, contains 13 fine antique Etruscan vases brought by Lord Cawdor from the Vatican at Rome. The stables constitute the wings of an elegant building whose centre is occupied by the riding-house and tennis-court; these are connected by a colonnade, a quarter of a mile long, with the Duke's private apartments. In the green-house, a handsome building, 140 feet long, there is a great variety of valuable plants, besides some excellent statues, and a grand Bacchanalian vase six feet nine inches high, and six feet three inches in diameter; this superb antique monument was dug up some centuries since from the ruins of Adrian's villa, and was brought into this country by Lord Cawdor about 35 years ago. The park, surrounded by a wall 12 miles in circumference, is well stocked with deer; it contains several fine plantations, and abounds with wood; the grounds are beautifully diversified by an inequality of surface, and the surrounding scenery partakes both of the grand and picturesque. — 2 m. beyond Woburn, at Aspley Guise, Aspley House, Mrs. Smith.

RUGELEY contains many very handsome houses, it carries on a considerable trade in hats and felts, and has a market on Thursday. The church is ancient, with a handsome tower at its west end; several mills and iron forges stand on a small brook that flows through the centre of the town; and in this neighbourhood the Grand Trunk canal is carried over the river Trent by means of a noble aqueduct, a celebrated cold bath also springs from beneath a hill on Camrock Chase, which is situated about two miles to the north of the town.

This building was founded at an early period, but by whom history does not make mention: Bishop Muschamp was, however, empowered by license from King John, about the year 1200, to embattle the castle and make a park here; so that a castellated edifice must have existed here for some years prior to that period. In 1310 it was entirely rebuilt, and established as the principal residence of the Bishops of Lichfield, by Walter de Langton; but his successors do not appear to have occupied it much till near the end of the 17th century, at which time, being perfectly untenable from having withstood a severe siege in the king's cause during the civil wars, it was thoroughly repaired, and the whole of the south front entirely renewed in 1695, and it has ever since been the constant residence of the bishops of that diocese. — ¼ m. distant from Eccleshall, at Brockton, Brockton Hall, unoccupied.

by the abrupt precipice that overhangs the vale of Cheshire: in the time of the civil wars it partook of the changeable fate that attended so many fortresses, and was soon afterwards dismantled by the orders of parliament; the ruins, however, still exhibit strong features of its original strength and beauty. Beeston Castle was formerly proverbial for its immense strength, and forms a conspicuous object for many miles, owing to its situation on the summit of the insulated rock of Beeston, which is composed of sand-stone, very precipitous on one side, but on the other gradually sloping to the general level of the country. The perpendicular side of the rock (the height of which, taken from the level of the sea, and including the castle top, is 566 feet) has a tremendous appearance, and is haunted by a kind of hawk which builds in its clefts: hence the prospect is very extensive on every side, except where interrupted by the near approach of the Peckforton hills; the city of Chester, the estuaries of the Dee and the Mersey, and all the level country of Cheshire, are distinctly seen from it.

HAWARDEN. Hawarden Hayes, W. Smalley, Esq.

HAWARDEN is a large well-built town, containing a neat church, and having a market on Saturday; it seems to be chiefly indebted for its origin to the castle, the remains of which occupy an elevated situation between the town and the river Dee, and chiefly consist of part of the keeps, large fragments of walls, and various buildings, particularly subterraneous rooms, supposed to have been used as places of confinement. This fortress was in the possession of different families, and underwent severe calamities, during the rebellions of the Welch; it also suffered various vicissitudes of fortune in the time of the civil wars, shortly after which it was dismantled, and left in its present untenable state; but in order to form an adequate idea of this once important fortress, Sir John Glynn, ancestor of the present possessor, had the foundations laid open, and great part of the rubbish removed; and it has lately been enclosed for the purpose of defending it from common obstruction.

Mostyn Hall, Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart. The original structure is supposed to be as old as the time of Henry VI., but additions and alterations have almost entirely changed its character; the hall is the most ancient part of the building, it is exceedingly lofty, and has a large fire-place with a masonry chimney-piece, on which are emblazoned the arms of the family and its numerous alliances; the walls are also adorned in a style suitable to the gloomy grandeur of the time, with swords, pikes, guns, and other military weapons; warlike furniture, such as helmets, breast-plates, coats of mail, &c.; together with spoils of falconry and the chase. There are in the different apartments some remarkable portraits of the Mostyn family, and several fine busts that were collected in Italy, besides a number of other antiquities.—

The grounds, naturally diversified, have received all the embellishments that art could accomplish; and a number of ornamental buildings are judiciously placed in corresponding situations; but the view from Baron Hill far surpasses all, and is deservedly the boast of the island of Anglesea.

LUTON is a long irregularly built town, and the only structure worthy of notice is the church, which has a fine embattled tower at the west end, checkered with flint and freestone. The baptismal font is a curious piece of ancient architecture; and the roof displays an allegorical representation of the church defended by baptism from the attempts of the devil. This building contains several very ancient monuments, and the east window displays a fine representation of St. George and the dragon: on the north side of the choir there is also an elegant chapel, founded by John, Lord Wenlock, who flourished in the time of Henry VI. MARKET BOSWORTH stands on a pleasant eminence, in a fertile part of the country; it has a weekly market on Wed- nesday; and contains a free- school and church, which latter is a large, but low building, con- taining a fine old monument of the Dixie family. The chief im- portance of this place is, how- ever, derived from an open plain, called Bosworth Field, situated about three miles distant, which has obtained considerable histo- rical and dramatic celebrity from the memorable battle fought there between Richard III. and the Earl of Richmond, after- wards Henry VII.; and like- wise from Shakespeare's very ex- cellent play of Richard III., in which the character of the tyrant is so admirably pour- trayed. Here the cruel and crafty Richard, who had ex- cited by his arbitrary conduct great discontent among his sub- jects, risked his life and crown against the earl, both of which he lost on the 23d of August, 1485, after a most obstinate and sanguinary conflict, that tended by its issue to give tranquillity to the nation.	18	Osbaston	106 $\frac{3}{4}$

BURTON UPON TRENT derives the latter part of its name from the river on the north bank of which it is situated: the town is of considerable antiquity; it consists of one principal street, crossed by another at right angles; and has the privilege of a market on Thursday. The church, a neat edifice, with a fine tower, was erected in the early part of the last century, when the old one, dedicated to St. Modwena, was pulled down; but the most remarkable object here is the bridge over the Trent, which appears to have been first erected about the time of the Norman conquest; it is 1545 feet long, and is composed of 36 arches, which, as well as the piers, are covered with lichens and mosses, and, aided by the trees that grow immediately near it, possesses a highly picturesque appearance. Here was formerly an extensive and superb abbey, said to have been founded about the year 1002, the chief existing remains of which are the vestiges of the cloisters visible in the old walls near the church; and on the margin of the river, a portion of the abbot's residence may also still be traced in the manor-house, which, however, has been very much altered by modern additions and repairs. Towards the end of the reign of Henry III. this town suffered severely by fire, and during the well built, and it carries on a variety of manufactures, among which, tanning, calico-printing, ale-brewing, and some woollen cloth works, form the leading features: the market is held on Saturday, and is well supplied with provisions. The situation of Tamworth is particularly favourable, being on all sides surrounded by rich meadow land, through which the rivers Tame and Anker are seen gliding, and these rivers being crossed at the town by two handsome bridges, the whole scene is rendered altogether very complete, and may be viewed to the greatest advantage from the castle, which again, from other points of view in the landscape, forms a highly pleasing object. The church is an ancient edifice, supposed by Leland to have been founded shortly after the Norman conquest; it is very spacious, exhibits various styles of building, and is surmounted by a massive tower, with a double staircase, so constructed that the floor of the one forms the roof of the other. Queen Elizabeth founded here a good grammar-school, which is still in a flourishing condition; and Mr. Thomas Guy, the rich bookseller, and founder of Guy's Hospital in Southwark, also built and endowed here an excellent establishment of a similar description.

The mansion is decorated with a large collection of valuable paintings, and the grounds are adorned with ornamental temples, &c.; one of these is consecrated to the memory of Edward Holdsworth, Esq., author of "Muscipula," and "Remarks and Dissertations on Virgil," it contains a statue of Religion, by Rubiliac, holding the book of life in one hand, and a cross in the other; and a cenotaph displays the figure of Genius, in a pensive attitude, Virgil's tomb, bust, and several antique fragments, and also a Latin inscription complimentary to the talents of Holdsworth.

rebellion of the Earl of Lancaster, in the time of Edward II., it sustained considerable damage; it was also several times taken and retaken by the contending parties that unhappily existed in this country during the troubled reign of Charles I. The chief production of the town is ale, and its excellence is deservedly celebrated in most parts of England: a curious practice prevails in the brewing of this article, hard water being used in preference to soft, which certainly makes a great difference in its strength, and is accounted for by Dr. Darwin, on the supposition that some of	From London	113½	STRETTON. COLESHILL is so called from its situation on the ascent of a hill, the base of which is washed by the river Cole; it contains many very respectable erections, besides the church, a handsome and attractive specimen of the decorated Gothic or English style of architecture, with an ornamented square tower at its west end, surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire; in this building there are a number of elegant monuments, many of them commemorating different individuals of the Digby family, and all well worthy of minute examination. 			STONE BRIDGE. Packington Hall, Earl of Aylesford. This seat became the property of an ancestor of the present family, in the early part of the 18th century, by a marriage with the daughter of Sir Clement Fisher. The house has been considerably improved at different times; it is a very spacious and convenient, but not ornamental structure, situated amidst grounds possessing a fine inequality of surface, laid out in such a manner as to exhibit all the beautiful varieties of nature, and abundantly ornamented with wood and water, besides which they enjoy a number of extensive and very beautiful prospects.
			COLESHILL. Maxstoke Castle, Mrs. Dilke; the ruins of Maxstoke Priory; and Blyth Hall, unoccupied. This seat receives much interest from the circumstance of its having been formerly the property and residence of the celebrated native historian of this county, Sir William Dugdale, who, after having trod the path of life for 80 years, here calmly sunk into the arms of death on the 10th of February, 1685-6. It is now the property of Dugdale Stratford Dugdale, Esq., his lineal descendant. The mansion occupies a low situation near the river Blyth, and contains some very interesting portraits, among which are good half-lengths of the eminent antiquary above-mentioned, and his son-in-law Elias Ashmole.

COLWICH is most delightfully situated on the north bank of the river Trent, which here flows through a rich verdant vale, having on its banks a number of elegant villas: Mr. Penant, speaking of this village, says, "It is perfectly prodigal in its beauties, and spreads at once every charm that can captivate the eye." In the church there are a number of monuments of the Ansons and Wolsleys; the burial-place of the former is in the shape of a catacomb, and an inscription to one of the latter, Sir William, informs the reader that he was drowned in his chariot, owing to the bursting of a mill-dam: this accident was the result of a thunder-storm; the four horses were lost, but the coachman, having been conveyed by the torrent into an orchard, remained fast till the flood abated, and by that means escaped.

GREAT HAYWOOD. Shugborough, Viscount Anson; and Haywood House, Col. Master; 1 m. distant from Great Haywood, at Tixall, Tixall Hall, Sir Thos. Aston Clifford Constable, Bart. This respectable edifice stands in the midst of a fine park; it was erected about 40 years since, but contains little worthy of notice; there is, however, a magnificent gateway in front, embellished with three series of columns, Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, immediately behind which, formerly stood the ancient mansion, a building erected in the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., and remarkable as having contained a great number of windows without any two of them being alike. On the heath adjoining the park there are two tumuli, called the King's and Queen's Low, of which nothing is known respecting either their origin or history; but early in the last century two urns were found near them, supposed to be of Roman workmanship. In the time of Henry VII. Sir William Chetwynd was barbarously murdered on this heath by a number of armed villains, hired for the purpose by Sir Humphrey Stanley, who was incited to the commission of the diabolical deed by jealousy that the former met with greater preferment near the sovereign than himself.

The present mansion consists of a centre with two projecting wings of red stone, the right one being continued behind the centre. The stone basement appears by the doors and windows to be a fragment of the old abbey, but every other semblance of the monastic edifice has been destroyed by alterations; notwithstanding which, and the lowness of the elevation, the building (being approached by well-wooded grounds) bursts at once upon the eye in a very striking manner, and its extensive front assumes considerable dignity. A large porch in the centre of the front is the present entrance, from whence a long corridor leads to a flight of stairs that conveys the visitor to an anti-room hung round with the antiers of various animals, and a number of ancient weapons: the windows of this apartment and the corridor below, are decorated with a profusion of stained glass in the ancient style. A door opens hence to the eating-room, and a corresponding one leads over the old wing, through a long gallery, to the different bed-chambers. The drawing-rooms and library are situated beyond the great hall, which is on the other side, and is a magnificent apartment, now used as the principal living-room; it is of very spacious dimensions, and has a coved roof, richly carved in the style of the 17th century; it is altogether far superior to most college-halls, and is also decorated with a large and valuable col-

NORTHWICH has a very antique appearance, and contains a church remarkable for its semi-circular choir, and the curious decorations of the roof of the nave, which consist of numerous figures of wicker baskets, similar to those used in the process of salt-making. The market is on Friday, and is well attended: the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of salt, with which this neighbourhood abounds; it is here obtained both from the natural rock and brine springs, but most plentifully from the former, whose mines, with their crystal roofs and pillars, have a most beautiful appearance, aided by the number of candles burnt therein to light the workmen, who occasionally use pick-axes, but more generally dismember several tons at a time by means of gunpowder. The brine-pits in this neighbourhood produce about 45,000 tons annually, and the rock-salt here delivered from the pits is estimated to be between 50 and 60,000 tons in the same period; but not more than one-fourth of this is refined in England, the remainder being generally conveyed down the Mersey to Liverpool, and thence shipped for various parts of the continent.

WARRINGTON is a large town, situated on the northern bank of the Mersey, over which there is a handsome stone bridge; it, for the most part, consists of long narrow streets, made up of ill-built houses, but some of them, however, are wide, and contain many handsome modern erections, besides the church, in which there are several good ancient monuments; here is a chapel of ease belonging to the establishment, and another in the suburbs; the various denominations of dissenters have also places of worship. The principal manufacture of Warrington is sail-cloth, coarse linens, and checks, the raw materials for which are chiefly imported from Russia into the port of Liverpool, from whence there is a cheap and expeditious water-conveyance to this town; there are also pin, glass, and iron-works in the neighbourhood of Warrington, which, itself, may in some degree be considered as a port-town, the river admitting, with the help of the tide, vessels of 70 or 80 tons burthen. Here is an excellent free-school, two good charity-schools, and a large elegant building, called the Warrington Academy, which was established by some respectable dissenters, and has deservedly obtained considerable celebrity. The vicinity of the bridge that here crosses the river Mersey, was several times the scene of severe conflicts during		Cross the  Grand Trunk canal

BLACKPOOL, as a bathing-place, is wholly of modern date; but the salubrity and beauty of its situation, the purity of its water, and the excellence of the beach, which is half a mile broad when the tide is out, have at length been duly appreciated, and it is now become, during the season, one of the most attractive points in Lancashire. Here are excellent accommodations, good and extensive rides, rational amusements, and an infinite diversity of highly interesting prospects. The time of bathing is generally at flood, a bell then rings for the ladies to assemble, and no gentleman must afterwards be seen on the parade, under the penalty of a bottle of wine; when the former retire, the bell sounds a summons for the latter to enjoy the same invigorating amusement. In the sea, at the distance of about half a mile from the shore, there is a stone, near which tradition states there formerly stood a public house, where travellers were in the habit of drinking their penny pots of beer, and the stone to which they fastened their horses hence received the name, which it still bears, of Penny-stone; it is now covered with sea-weed, and is really a very venerable antique.

The mansion, a venerable structure, was evidently erected at different periods. It contains a fine collection of paintings, among which are numerous portraits; and has a summer-house adjoining the hall, built under the direction of that virtuous and accomplished female, the last Lady Bradshaigh. It is entirely constructed of canal coal, and has a beautiful appearance, owing to the jet black colour of the article, and its capability of receiving the highest polish. — Farther to the right, Whitley, Sir Robert Holt Leigh, Bart.

STANDISH, 3 m. distant, in the road to Chorley, Adlington Hall, unoccupied. The mansion stands in a low situation, on the borders of an extensive park. It is a spacious quadrangular structure, three sides of which are irregular, and still partly consist of timber and plaster buildings, terminating in gables. The principal front faces the south; it is of brick, two stories high, with projecting wings, and a portico in the centre, supported by fine stone columns. The domestic chapel is in the south-east angle of this front; it is fitted up in a very handsome style, and contains many suitable decorations. The great hall is situated in the north front, and appears to have been constructed about the time of Elizabeth.

SOUTHAM has more the appearance of a large village than a town; it is situated on the turnpike road, and contains a handsome Gothic church, with a square tower at its west end, surmounted by a spire. The market is held on Monday, but the chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the expenditure of travellers who pass through the town.

The present mansion stands in an extensive park, the country immediately adjacent to which, in its general appearance, partakes much of the character of the best parts of the neighbouring counties of Stafford and Salop, in luxuriance of vegetation and undulation of surface; and the venerable oaks of the park, including a very noble ancient avenue, gives the place a dignified and impressive appearance. In the south and east fronts are the entrances, the former opening to an old staircase of singular curiosity and beauty that leads to the apartments on the first floor; at the foot of this staircase, in the south-east angle, is the great dining-room, a very noble apartment, which, as well as that on the right, is highly ornamented in the mixed style, and deserves the particular attention of the tourist: the drawing-room, with its enormous marble chimney-piece, also requires notice, and the gallery extending along the whole south front, is decorated with numerous valuable portraits, while the domestic chapel exhibits a fine large painting of the Last Supper, besides two beautiful specimens of ancient stained glass.

			ABBOTS BROMLEY received its first name from the circumstance of an abbey having formerly existed in the neighbourhood; at a later period it was called Pagets Bromley, from the noble family of that name, to whom the abbey was granted at the dissolution. The houses are neatly built; they are disposed in one long street, having the town-hall nearly in its centre. The chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the market, which is held on Tuesday. Here is a good free-school, an alms-house for six poor women, and a spacious church, with a tower surmounted by a lofty steeple. The curious custom called the hobby-horse-dance, formerly prevailed here: it was generally celebrated at Christmas, on New Year's Day, and Twelfth Day, when a person carrying between his legs the UTTOXETER occupies a lofty situation near the river Dove, and is extremely healthy; in its neighbourhood there is some of the most fertile and luxuriant pasture and meadow land in England; here are also a number of iron forges, and an excellent market on Wednesday for cattle, cheese, and every article of agricultural produce. The town is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have been a British settlement previous to the invasion of the Romans: it formerly suffered severely by fire, but is now both large and well built, and contains, besides an old church, several meeting-houses for dissenters, and a good free-school; it has also a noble stone bridge over the river, connecting the county of Stafford with Derby. Here was born Sir Simon Degge, the antiquary, and the late gallant Admiral Lord Gardner, who opposed Horne Tooke as a candidate to serve in parliament for Westminster, and succeeded, though the admiral is said to have been more alarmed at his wit, satire, and eloquence, than at a shower of cannon-balls from an enemy's fleet.

ONECOTE, near, Narrowdale. This place is surrounded by lofty rocks, some of them of so great a height, that, according to Dr. Plot, their tops may frequently be seen, in rainy weather, above the clouds; they are likewise so extremely narrow that the inhabitants never see the sun at all during that quarter of the year that it is nearest the tropic of Capricorn, and when it does begin to appear, it is not visible till about one o'clock, which is called by them Narrowdale noon, and is used proverbially to express any thing done late at noon. The traveller who is fond of enjoying the beauties of diversified and romantic scenery, will do well to ascend some of these eminences, as he will there find an abundance of the most picturesque views imaginable, which are finely contrasted by the sublime and awful appearance of the rocks themselves.

LONGNOR stands near the source of the river Manifold; it has a small church or rather chapel to the vicarage of Alstonfield, and a weekly market on Tuesday, which, though well attended, is remarkable for the short space of time allotted for the sale of its various commodities; about four o'clock in the afternoon the stalls begin to be erected, and the bustle of the market is over, the stalls cleared away, and the people all retired to their different houses in the neighbourhood before the hour of six. This place is supposed to have lain waste at the Conquest, being in so wild a part of the country, and is said not to have been inhabited for a considerable time afterwards. It is not mentioned in Domesday Book, nor in the record called Nomina Villarum, taken in the time of king Edward II.

The different ornamental buildings occupy the most appropriate situations, and their minutiae of decoration have received the greatest possible attention; the Grotto, the Retreat, the Otabeite Scene, and Neptune's Whim, are characteristically marked, and only require to be seen to be admired. From the Obelisk and the Tower, two very handsome buildings, the former of which is surmounted by a fine statue of Sir Rowland Hill, Knt., first protestant Lord-Mayor of London, there is a most extensive and highly diversified prospect obtained over the surrounding country. We must also notice a handsome urn that has been erected near a remarkable cavern, where, in the time of the civil wars, an ancestor of the Hill family was obliged to secret himself on account of his zealous attachment to the king; he was, however, discovered, and the parliament forces who ransacked his house, confined him in the adjacent building called Red Castle, which was shortly afterwards demolished; but its ruins, consisting chiefly of broken walls and turrets, have a fine picturesque appearance.

LITTLE GREEN, 1 m. distant, Hamner Hall, the seat of Sir Thomas Hamner, Bart. The mansion, a handsome modern edifice, has lately received considerable additions and improvements. It stands amidst grounds possessing a fine undulating surface, embellished with woods and plantations, which receive much additional beauty from their situation near a lake covering about 50 acres. — Near this is Gredington, Lord Kenyon; and Bettisfield Hall, Sir Thomas Hamner, Bart.; $\frac{3}{4}$ m. beyond Little Green, in the road to Overton, Penley Hall, *Rev. BANGOR ISCOED. Gwern-haylad, Philip Lloyd Fletcher, Esq. It has been well observed, respecting this mansion, which is situated on a lofty brow, that few have been either so judiciously improved, or command so many rich views. The river Dee runs beneath, with luxuriant meads on its opposite side, and a motley mass of hills in the distance, among which the most conspicuous are those of Caerwyrle and Ruabon, closing the scene. — 2 m. distant from Bangor Iscoed, Overton Brow, Dr. Parker.

MARCHWIAL. Cefn, George Kenyon, Esq.

ST. ASAPH, a small city and bishop's see, is situated on the side of a gentle eminence, the summit of which is occupied by the cathedral; the rivers Clwyd and Elwy flow on its eastern and western sides; they are crossed by handsome bridges, and assist to give the place an imposing effect upon the view of the approaching traveller. The houses are in general low and small, they are constructed of brick, and disposed in one long street, but the town contains little of a public nature worthy the passenger's attention. The cathedral church having been destroyed by fire, was rebuilt by the bounty of Bishop Redman, assisted by voluntary contributions. The church is a plain fabric, with a large pointed window at the east end, decorated with painted glass, by the celebrated Mr. Eginton, of Birmingham. An extensive prospect, including the whole of the vale of Clwyd, is obtained from the tower situated in the centre of the building. The episcopal palace was for a long time very unfit for the habitation of a diocesan; but great part of it having been rebuilt on an enlarged scale, it now forms a very commodious residence. Market on Friday.

MOLD is situated on a fertile plain, surrounded by rugged hills, abounding with mineral treasure: it principally consists of one long and spacious street, containing several handsome houses. On the north side of the town is the site of an ancient castle that was defended by ramparts, and encompassed by a deep fosse; this displays an exquisite view of the surrounding country. The church is a handsome edifice, with a tower at the west end; its interior is rather elegant, and contains a few monuments worthy the attention of the curious. On the summit of an eminence near the town, called Moel Famma, from whence the prospects are extensive and pleasing, there has been a handsome column erected by the inhabitants of Flint and Denbigh, to commemorate the event of his late Majesty having completed the 50th year of his reign. Mold has the privilege of a market on Wednesday and Saturday, which is generally well supplied.

HOLYHEAD. The situation of this place relative to the coast of Ireland has ever rendered it of considerable importance, from the facilities it affords for a communication with that country, the passage being considered much less difficult and dangerous than from any other part of the coast; this circumstance has occasioned the establishment of a number of packets fitted up for the convenience of passengers, which proceed to and from the opposite coast with great regularity, generally performing the voyage in twelve hours or under, if fair weather, though they have sometimes been detained at sea by contrary winds for upwards of three days; the passage has, however, been reduced to a greater degree of certainty since the invention of steam vessels, one of which leaves Holyhead about six o'clock every morning, and another starts from Howth, which is about eight miles from Dublin, at eight o'clock every morning, by which means the voyage is effected in six hours and a half with a tolerable degree of certainty. The principal trade of this port consists in the importation of the agricultural produce of that important portion of the kingdom, denominated the Sister Island; and the exports are chiefly grain grown in the island of Anglesea, which is of a very excellent quality, and generally amounts to 40,000 bushels per annum. Holyhead is undoubtedly of very remote antiquity, and appears from the vestiges of military works still evident, to have been a place of importance in the Roman times. The promontory called the Head presents a most interesting object of curiosity to the traveller, furnishing one of those sublime spectacles which are occasionally met with, formed by the plastic hand of nature, and defying the weak attempts of human art to imitate; it consists of an immense mass of rocks, in which have been formed, by the continual action of the waves, various grotesque and stupendous caverns; one of these, which has received the vulgar appellation of the Parliament House, is particularly worthy of observation: the cliffs and crags above afford protection to numerous birds, among which is to be found the celebrated peregrine falcon: the eggs of some of these birds are considered a most delicious dainty; and much skill and dexterity is evinced by the natives in collecting them. These caverns are only approachable in a boat. The town consists principally of one street, with a handsome embattled church, formerly collegiate, but now parochial, and belonging to Jesus College, Oxford: the churchyard is in the form of a parallelogram, about 220 feet long, and 130 feet broad; three of its sides consist of massy walls, the fourth being open to the harbour, and having only a low parapet laid on the precipitous cliffs; at each angle is a circular bastion tower, and along the walls are two rows of round openings. At Holyhead there is also an assembly-room and baths for the amusement and accommodation of visitors, and a well supplied market on Saturday; but the traveller whose object is pleasure alone, will here find little to interest him.

MALPAS seems to have derived its name from Mala-platea, a term indicative of the steep, narrow, and intricate road by which it was formerly approached; but this has been considerably improved, and the town, consisting of three well-built streets, is now paved; it is pleasantly situated on a high hill, and contains a very handsome church, in which the Cholmondeley family have a vault, where several of their illustrious ancestors lie entombed. The free-school and almshouse were both founded by Sir Randle Brereton, who possessed very considerable property here; the town was also formerly ornamented with a noble castle, but this has long since entirely gone to decay. MOUNTSORREL. This place was originally called Mount Soar Hill, from its situation on a steep craggy hill on the banks of the river Soar. Singularly romantic, indeed, are the natural features of this place: a ridge of high hills extending hence through the midst of Charnwood forest into Derbyshire, terminate immediately on the west side of the town, which extremity is lofty and steep, presenting a variegated face of grass and rock; and on the highest point, called Castle Hill, almost overhanging the town, there formerly stood a fortress, supposed by the learned Mr. Nichols to have been built by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester: the garrison of this castle withstood a severe siege against King Henry III., but it at last surrendered to the sovereign, and was shortly afterwards demolished. Mountsorrel Hill is a rock of reddish granite, of which many of the houses are built, and the streets paved: this stone is of great durability, and after exposure to the air resists all kind of tools; it is often dug up in imperfect cones, and being too hard to be cut or broken, its smoothest face is laid outwards in beds of the excellent lime of Barrow. Here were formerly two chapels, but only one now remains; this is a very neat building, and is subordinate to the church of Barrow: the different denominations of dissenters have also meeting-houses for the accommodation of their several congregations. The parishes of Rothley and Barrow are separated by Barn-lane, at the end

MACCLESFIELD is situated on the declivity of a steep hill, near that bleak and dreary district which still bears the name of Macclesfield Forest, though it has been long since stripped of the greater part of the wood with which it was formerly covered. The chief prosperity of the town has arisen from the manufactures here cultivated, and these have been in a great degree promoted by the quantity of coals and other minerals that may be readily procured in the neighbourhood: here are extensive copper and brass-works, besides mills for the throwing and winding of silk, and extensive manufactories for making buttons, fustians, linen cloth, &c. The town contains two churches or rather chapels of ease to the parish of Prestbury, in which it is situated; the most ancient of these was founded by Edward I. in the year 1279, but was chiefly rebuilt in the 18th century. The other place of worship belonging to the established religion was erected in 1775; it is a very handsome structure, ornamented with a neat tower and pinnacles, and was built by the late Charles Roe, Esq., whose bust, admirably executed by Bacon, stands over the altar: the different sects of dissenters have also meeting-houses for their accommodation. In this town is a spacious and handsome free grammar-school, founded by Edward VI., with a roomy dwelling-house for the head master, and a field for the exercise and recreation of the scholars. Many gentlemen of eminence have received their education here. The market is held on Tuesday and Saturday, and is well attended.	136¼		Cross the  river Bollen	169½	BUTLEY , 2 m. distant, Styerson Park, Richard Leigh, Esq. ; and near it, Shrigley Hall, Wm. The foundation of this building is ascribed by some writers to the times of the Saxon Heptarchy , but others assert that it is indebted for its origin to Thomas Stanley , first Earl of Derby , who built it in the reign of Henry VII. , as a place of protection from the nobility of the country, whose estates he had obtained on their being proscribed as guilty of high treason. The structure appears to have originally consisted of seven or eight towers of great height and strength; but there is only one now in existence, and that is in a very dilapidated condition.
125		Heaton Norris, Lancash.	180¾	GARSTANG is an irregular and meanly built town, situated on the west bank of the river Wyer , which abounds with chub, trout, gudgeon, &c. The church was obliged to be taken down and rebuilt in the year 1746, owing to the great damage its foundations received by the overflowing of the above-named river, which was so swelled with incessant rain, as to inundate the churchyard, situated about a mile to the south, at a place called Garstang Church Town , and break into the edifice. There is no manufactory of any importance in the town, but there are several very considerable cotton-works in the neighbourhood; it is, however, presumed, now the Lancaster canal passes by the town, and thereby opens a communication with so many different places, that the ob-

SHAP is situated near the source of the river Lowther: its church, though modernized in many parts, still exhibits strong marks of the architecture that prevailed shortly after the Conquest, more especially in the windows of the tower. About one mile distant stand the venerable remains of Shap Abbey, the church belonging to which is composed of exceedingly durable white free-stone; the tower and various fragments of the chancel walls still remain, and form fine specimens of excellent masonry; besides which, to the south, the ground is, for a considerable distance, covered with the foundations of cloisters and other conventual buildings. Shap Grange, which formerly belonged to the abbey, stands in rich pastures about a mile to the east, and has around it vestiges of a considerable village. The Hogger family were tenants of this abbey at the time of the dissolution; they were ancestors of that inimitable painter and pourtrayer of real life, William Hogarth, and several of them still continue to reside in the neighbourhood. The long and straggling town of Shap obtained, in 1689, the privilege of a weekly market on Wednesday, which almost sunk into disuse some time afterwards, but has of late years considerably revived.

The designs of the mansion were executed by Mr. James Paine, under whose superintendence a handsome bridge has likewise been thrown over the expanse of water above mentioned. The park is very extensive, and in it, for several successive years, his present Majesty, when Prince of Wales, was entertained with horseracing. BIGGLESWADE. The neat and respectable appearance
of this town may in a great measure be ascribed to a terrible
fire that happened on the 16th
of June 1785, and in a few hours destroyed 150 houses, besides warehouses, &c., all situated
near the market-place: the damage hereby sustained was estimated at full 24,000*l.* Biggles-wade is agreeably placed near
the banks of the river Ivel,
which has been made navigable to the town, and now conveys hither an abundance of coal, timber, and merchandize,
for the supply of the inhabitants
in the neighbourhood. The church, a substantial ancient
edifice, was built in the year 1230, it was formerly collegiate,
and still contains several of the stalls; the parishioners have all
an equal right to any of the seats,
for which privilege, however,
they are constrained to repair or
rebuild the fabric when requisite.
This town likewise contains a meeting-house belonging to the sect of dissenters termed Baptists, several inns affording excellent accommodation, and two good charity-schools; besides
which it has a well supplied
weekly market on Wednesday.

STILTON has long been celebrated for the excellence of its cheese, which not infrequently has been called the English Parmesan: it is asserted that this article was first made by a Mrs. Paulet, of Wymondham, near Melton Mowbray, in Leicestershire, who supplied the celebrated Cooper Thornhill, who kept the Bell Inn in this village, with this new manufacture, which he often sold for 2s. 6d. per pound; and hence it is said to have received its name from the place of sale. This Thornhill was a famous rider, and is recorded to have won the cup at Kimbolton with a mare that he accidentally took on the course after a journey of 12 miles.

HORN LANE TURNPIKE. Exton Hall, Sir Gerard Noel Noel, Bart. This mansion exhibits a fine specimen of that style of architecture which prevailed in the latter part of the 16th century, notwithstanding the great damage it received by a destructive fire that took place on the 24th May 1810, and which totally consumed one half of the south-east wing. The apartments are commodious, but some of them possess rather a gloomy appearance. The park and grounds are of immense extent, and contain an abundance of very fine timber, particularly oak, ash, elm, and beech; they are also enlivened by some spacious sheets of water and a cascade, that have a very good effect, notwithstanding the antiquated style of gardening that here still prevails to a very great degree. Close to the mansion is the village of Exton, which is embosomed in trees, and demands notice on account of its church, the finest ecclesiastical structure in the county without exception: this edifice is in the pointed style, and is surmounted by a tower and spire of elegant proportions; the interior is kept in excellent order; it is strictly Gothic, and its decorations have been carefully preserved in the antique

BRIDGE CASTERTON. This place, which is situated on the Roman Ermine Street, has caused more difference of opinion among antiquaries, than perhaps any other spot in the British empire: some affirm it to be the Gausenna, or Causennis, which others place at Nottingham; and many suppose that it is the Durobrivis of the Itinerary; others again believe that its present name has given an appellation to Kesteven, in Lincolnshire, and nearly all of them in fact differ either with respect to its name or direction. That it was a Roman station, however, there can be no doubt, as the remains of the encampment may still be seen to the south-east of the village; but it is very likely that people had here some more permanent fortifications than mere earth-works, for the foundations of a wall were dug up some few years since in a pasture that still bears the name of Castle-close. Near the bridge, which gives it the adjunct, and consists of several arches, stands the church, an ancient Gothic structure, with a tower and light airy pinnacles: it is not large, but has, however, a nave and two side-aisles, the capitals of the pillars supporting the arches, being richly style; here are a number of curious monuments, commemorating different individuals of the Harrington and Noel families, who have possessed this lordship for several ages. The spandrels of the arches support numerous banners of those two noble houses, accompanied by tabards, pennons, and helmets, from all of which very rich ideas may be formed of Gothic times and manners.

STOKE ROCHFORD. Stoke House, Edmund Turnor, Esq. The present mansion, a handsome structure, was erected in 1794, with the materials of a more ancient edifice that was built by Sir Edward Turnor, about the middle of the 17th century. The surrounding park, though small, is highly picturesque, and contains a cascade, formed by the water of a single spring that rises here from a bed of lime-stone, and discharges full 19 tons in a minute. Neither this spring, nor that at Holywell, in Flintshire, which throws out about 21 tons of water in a minute, have ever been known to freeze.

YORK BAR, near, Cusworth Park, Wm. Wrightson, Esq. The mansion is delightfully situated on the brow of a hill facing the south, from whence it commands a fine clear view of the town of Doncaster, with extensive prospects over the very beautiful country to the east, south, and west, which is embellished with several churches, gentlemen's seats, and other enlivening objects. The interior displays considerable taste in its various decorations, and contains a small but handsome chapel, having over the communion table a fine painting of the Good Samaritan. There is a spacious ornamental sheet of water at a short distance to the south of the mansion, and likewise a very pleasingly diversified park towards the west. — About 1 m. farther, Woodlands, Capt. Elmsall.

APPLEBY. Appleby Castle,
Earl of Thanet. This edifice is generally believed to have been founded previous to the Norman conquest, but was in all probability rebuilt shortly subsequent to
that period, and again progressively re-edified by successive noble proprietors. Of the buildings now in existence, the most ancient is a structure of extensive proportions, that appears to be of Norman origin, although, like many similar erec-tions, it is called Caesar's Tower.
The principal part of the present fabric was built by Thomas,
Earl of Thanet, in the year
1686, from the ruins of the old
castle: it is of a square form,
and contains several apartments
of noble dimensions, which are enriched by a large collection
of curious and valuable family portraits. The magnificent suit of armour worn by George Clifford in the tilt-yard, when he acted as champion to his royal mistress, Queen Elizabeth, is likewise preserved here; it is ornamented with fleur-de-lis,
and is very richly gilt; his horse-armour, used on the same occasion, is equally superb, and lies near it. This castle was for a considerable period the residence of the Clifford family;
and was fortified for the king
in 1641, by Lady Anne Clifford,
who gave the government of it
to her neighbour Sir Philip Musgrave, and he held it out
till after the battle of Marston
Moor, when he was obliged,
contrary to his inclinations, to surrender it to the parliamentarians.

KIRK OSWALD is pleasantly situated in the fertile vale
of Eden, which here opens into a broad expanse, bearing on its bosom a number of rural dwellings and distant villages. The houses are irregularly scattered
on the acclivity of a gentle eminence that ascends from the margin of the river, whose stream gives such animation to numerous beautiful scenes in this part of the county. The church, an irregular structure,
appears to have been enlarged
at different times; it contains,
among others, a very elegant
monument to the memory of Sir
Timothy Featherstonehaugh.
The belfry stands at a distance
from the church, on the summit
of a hill, in order that the sound of the bells may be the better
heard by the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages. From

GRETNA GREEN, or Graintry, more properly speaking, has long been famous in the annals of matrimonial adventure for the marriages of fugitive lovers from England. The persons performing the ceremony are impostors, and have no right to exercise any part of the clerical function. They, as well as all those who either celebrate or are witnesses to the contract, are liable to punishment, if the banns have not been proclaimed; but this does not affect the parties entering into the engagement, which is completely binding, and renders the issue of it lawful children, capable of inheriting the property of their parents.

HAMILTON, before, Pease Bank, Dr. Whithead; and Hutton Bank, — Bryson, Esq. At Hamilton, The Palace, Duke of Hamilton. This spacious pile stands in the level valley between the town and the river Clyde: the interior is extremely splendid; it contains the best and most valuable collection of paintings in all Scotland, which universally attracts the attention of the tourists, and does infinite credit to the superior taste of the late noble proprietor, by whom, previous to his accession to the title, a large portion of them were accumulated: though all these are deserving the most strict examination, yet there are two particularly prominent, which it would be unparadonic not to name: these are Daniel in the Lion's Den, by Rubens; and the Earl of Denbigh going out a shooting, by Vanduyke. The park is well stocked with deer, and contains a number of very stately oaks; in the midst of it, on a rock overhanging the river Avon, stand the ruins of Cadzow castle, the ancient residence of the family; and on the opposite side of the stream is an imitation of the castle of Chateaufort, in Normandy, of which the ancestors of the family were proprietors.

GLASGOW is by far the most interesting object in this part of the country, and must be looked upon as the centre of the manufactures and commerce of Scotland; it is situated on the north bank of the Clyde, and the buildings are erected on ground that rises with a gentle ascent from the river. The houses are in general respectable, and many of them even elegant. In noticing the religious establishments of Glasgow, the cathedral, or high church, naturally comes first under our observation: this is said to have been erected by John Murdo, a Parisian, and is undoubtedly the most entire specimen of ancient Gothic architecture in Scotland: it stands at the upper end of the High Street, and was, till the time of the Reformation, used in the Roman Catholic service, but in 1579, the magistrates having been prevailed upon to destroy this cathedral, a number of workmen were hired to demolish the building, which would soon have been completed, had not the members of the corporations of the city taken arms and threatened with instant death the first individual who dare attempt to violate it; by this interference the cathedral was saved: its internal arrangement was, however, considerably altered without the least attention to taste or ornament; but the passions of the reformers have since had time to cool, and the rude simplicity of their original places of worship have now given place to those tasteful ornaments chamber, prison, house of correction, theatre, and assembly-rooms, besides two churches belonging to the establishment, and several chapels for the use of the different sects of dissenters. Owing to the influx of the tide into the river Nith, Dumfries is a sort of sea-port, to which several coasting vessels belong; but the town has no manufactures of any importance, and chiefly trades within itself; it however has a weekly market on Wednesday and Saturday, several very extensive periodical fairs, and, together with Sanquhar, Lochmaben, Annan, and Kirkcudbright, sends one member to parliament.

The university stands at the east end of the High Street, and has a handsome polished stone front three stories high and 330 feet long; the buildings include halls where the different sciences are cultivated, and residences for the several professors, besides class-rooms and other apartments, and a library containing about 20,000 volumes. Glasgow likewise possesses several other literary, and a number of charitable institutions, a spacious and very handsome theatre, and commodious assembly-rooms; it has also the privilege, in conjunction with Rutherglen, Renfrew, and Dumbar-ton, of returning one member to the British parliament.

ASHTON UNDER LYNE is a large town, consisting of several narrow streets, and occupying a high bank which rises from the river Tame. It appears from an ancient manusc- ript, still in existence, to have been formerly a borough, and its ancient lords enjoyed peculiar privileges, among which was a right of life and death over their tenantry; and to perpetuate the memory of some act of tyranny, said to have been exercised by one of them, an annual cere- mony, called riding the black lad, is performed every Easter Monday. On this occasion an effigy of straw, in the human form, is placed on a horse, and exhibited through the streets, after which it is hung up at the cross in the market place, and there shot at. The church is a large old building; it exhibits some ancient carvings and painted glass, and covers the remains of many individuals of the Ashe- ton family, the former lords of the town. RICHMOND is situated on the banks of the Swale, and has one of the greatest corn-markets in the county. Being seated on the utmost verge of the district in which grain is produced, the cornfactors and millers repair hither from Swaledale, Wens- sleydale, and other parts of the moors, to lay in stock for the consumption of that large ex- tent of country, where grazing is the chief or only pursuit of the farmer. The town of Rich- mond is small, but the situation is delightful; and the houses, most of which are of stone, are well built, and many of them spacious. It stands on a lofty eminence, boldly rising from the river Swale, which winds round the town and the castle in a semi-circular direction. The market-place is large and hand- some, being surrounded by good shops and houses; and the	23 $\frac{1}{4}$		whole has a very agreeable ap- pearance. The castle, which yet appears majestic, though in ruins, is situated on the south side of the town, overlooking the Swale, which runs in a deep valley beneath. The keep is about 100 feet high, and the shell almost entire; the walls are eleven feet thick: the lower story is supported by a vast column of stone in the middle, from which spring circular arches closing the top: the staircase extends no farther than the first chamber, the rest of it being dilapidated, and the floors of the two upper rooms are fallen in. The country round Richmond is extremely picturesque; the valley of Swaledale is in many places skirted with perpendicular rocks almost covered with trees and shrubs; and from the hills on the north-west side of the town, the eye is regaled with the most magnificent prospects. Rich- mond and its castle, though seated on a precipitous hill,

The market house is a neat edifice of modern erection, surmounted by a clock, and the market is held twice a week, viz. Monday and Saturday. The district we have just passed through is usually distinguished by the name of The Potteries. They reach from Lane End, on the north-east of Newcastle under Lyme, to Golden Hill, which lies upwards of four miles to the north-west of that town, including altogether an extent of somewhat more than eight miles. This manufactory is perhaps superior to any of its kind in Europe, and does not yield in point of utility to the celebrated potteries of China. As has happened with every other branch of trade, it suffered much during the late war; but its productions now form a very important article of exportation. The parish of Biddulph, situated almost at the north-west extremity of the county, presents some curious remains of antiquity, which are worthy of particular observation, the principal among them are the Bridestones.

CHEADLE is pleasantly situated in a vale, but is surrounded on all sides by bleak and almost barren hills, composed of sterile gravel, distributed in various large heaps. The top of the hill, on the west, affords a bold and commanding view of the highest part of the town. Owing to the public-spirited exertions and judicious management of John Holliday, Esq., lord of the manor of Cheadle, many hilly districts in this neighbourhood have been greatly improved. Cheadle Park, forming the hill just mentioned, is three miles in circumference, and consists of 33 inclosures; these abound in coal mines of considerable value. That part, however, nearest the town, is still sandy and unimproved. This park, from which Lichfield Minster, though 27 miles distant, may be distinctly seen, is much resorted to as a pleasant walk. The hills, north and west of the town, are generally composed of the same materials as the one above noticed, upon an understratum of sand, or sandy rock; and the herbage consists chiefly of broom, heath, whortleberries, mountain cinquefoil, mattgrass, and hemp-seed. Cheadle itself has nothing remarkable, either in its history or remains of antiquity. The church, which is an ancient structure, is dedicated to St. Giles. The trade consists for the most part of copper, brass, and tin works. The market is held on Friday, and is amply supplied with provisions of all kinds. Cheadle has also a free-school with a small endowment, and meeting-houses for methodists and dissenters of various denominations.

PLEASLEY. Rather more than half a mile from this small village, part of which is in Nottinghamshire, and the remainder in Derbyshire, there is a dell that displays the most romantic scenery imaginable, and leads to an extensive range of cotton-works, called Pleasley Forge, which are situated on the rivulet that divides the two counties; though this enchanting spot has not been generally noticed, yet it exhibits all the picturesque beauty and sublime effect of Dovedale and Matlock, and cannot fail to receive the admiration of the traveller.

BARNSELY. This town is seated on the side of a hill, and the houses are mostly built of stone: it is frequently called Black Barnsley, very possibly from the number of forges which are continually at work here in the manufacture of wire, nails, hardware, &c., and which cause the houses to have a smoky and dirty appearance; or else from the barren and black aspect of the adjacent moors. Besides the church, a spacious and handsome structure, here is a good free grammar-school, that was founded and endowed in the year 1665. Barnsley has likewise some extensive manufactories of linen, cloth, check, and glass bottles. The trade and population of the town have considerably increased since the completion of the navigable canal, by means of which communications are opened with Wakefield, &c. Market on Wednesday.

RIPON, 2 m. distant, Studley Royal, the very elegant seat of Mrs. Lawrence. The mansion, a handsome commodious structure, contains a number of apartments of fine proportions, that are adorned with an excellent collection of portraits and other paintings by the most esteemed masters: the drawing room is most elegantly fitted up, the library is well stored with valuable works, and the tapestry room excites universal admiration. The various views enjoyed from this residence are particularly pleasing: the fine undulating surface of the park is enlivened by herds of deer; beyond the extensive woods and plantations, which are judiciously disposed, part of the town of Ripon is seen; and the edge of the moors to the eastward of Thirsk, closes the distant prospect. The chief objects worthy attention at Studley Royal are, however, the pleasure-grounds, the way to which lies through the park. These grounds include all the various features that are necessary to form a truly luxuriant landscape; they contain a number of delightful recesses, most advantageously situated, in which are placed several statues and ornamental buildings, and these are rendered more interesting and beautiful by purling streams and spacious sheets of water, which lend their aid towards the completion of this terrestrial paradise; but their most striking and magnificent ornament is Fountains Abbey: this monastery originally covered about twelve acres of ground; the existing remains abound in objects of great curiosity, and are said to be the most perfect of any monastic edifice in England. A learned writer, who visited them a few years since, observes, that "no depredation has been committed on the sacred pile; time alone has brought it to its present state; it has fallen by a gentle decay, without any violent con-

The church, a handsome Gothic structure, is said to have been built with the ruins of the ancient castle that stood at the south-western extremity of the town, and was destroyed in the reign of Henry II.; it contains a few monumental erections, and three ornamented stone seats, which were, previous to the Reformation, used by the officiating clergy. Here are also places of worship belonging to the Quakers, Calvinists, and Methodists, and two or three small charitable institutions. Both the towns are considered as united in every respect, save that of election; this solely belongs to the old town, which is a borough by prescription, and sends two members to parliament, the right of election being vested in the burghage tenements, now only fifty in number, and the patron is Sir Thomas Frankland, Bart. The mansion is chiefly of modern erection, but still retains some vestiges of the ancient structure; it is situated on an eminence, and commands a fine view of the river Ouse and the surrounding country. Of this fortress, which is said to have been erected by William the Conqueror, little now remains, except the grand entrance arched gateway, which is flanked by two massy bastion towers. The residence of the present noble proprietor is a fine spacious old mansion situated within the court.

ROCKINGHAM consists of one street, and is situated in the midst of Rockingham Forest, which is generally believed to have been formerly one of the largest and richest in the kingdom; it was at an early period noted for its extensive iron-works, and in the reign of Edward I. is described as being 30 miles long by eight miles broad. The church was partially destroyed by Oliver Cromwell, during the civil commotions by which the country was unhappily distracted in the 17th century; but it still contains an ample feast for the admirer of sculpture in the various monuments with which the interior is decorated.

Hall, William Barker, Esq.; and Normanton Park, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Bart. The mansion consists of a white stone centre with wings, and has two fronts, both of which display great architectural beauty. The whole of the interior is furnished in a style of magnificence well suited to the present polished state of society; its hall is adorned with some good statues; and the library is well stocked with literature, but partakes greatly of the character of a dressing-room, being fitted up with sofas, and having the books covered with beautiful chintz curtains. The drawing-rooms display considerable taste in their various ornaments, and the dining-room, likewise a superb apartment, contains the original painting of Lady Heathcote in the character of Hebe, the engraved copies of which are in such high estimation. The beauty of the suite of apartments on both floors is much heightened by having doors which throw open and form a vista from end to end; and the effect is also re-duplicated by large plate-glass mirrors situated at each extremity. The surrounding park includes about 400 acres, and is adorned with large timber trees, but does not otherwise possess much interest, except from the venerable little church, whose small Gothic turret is seen peeping out from amidst a plantation of shrubs. Several fine prospects are enjoyed from different parts of the grounds, which are laid out in a judicious manner; but the gardens, though modern, are not on an extensive scale.

OAKHAM. Catmos Lodge, Sir G. N. Noel, Bart.; and Burleigh on the Hill, the magnificent seat of the Earl of Winchelsea, which is not only by far the most attractive in the county, but may safely rank among the finest in the kingdom. In the reign of James I. this estate became by purchase the property of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, who greatly improved the ancient mansion, and had the honour of entertaining his royal master within its walls; but the parliament party destroyed the house by fire in the civil wars of the 17th century, and it lay in ruins many years, till at last the manor was purchased by Daniel Finch, Earl of Nottingham, and this family (subsequently succeeding to the more ancient title of Winchelsea) have since made it their principal residence. The mansion was rebuilt by Daniel, Earl of Nottingham, and is one of the most spacious and superb, yet chaste specimens of the Doric order, that it is in the power of the imagination to conceive: the north and south fronts are about 200 feet long, while the east and west fronts are of half those dimensions; on the south side there is a superb terrace, 900 feet long, by 36 broad, from whence the prospect over the grounds and adjacent country is beautiful in the extreme; and on the west side is the church, an appropriate edifice, embosomed in trees, that, together with the whole vicinity, unites its neatness with the majesty of the lordly mansion. The proportions of the apartments and their various decorations, are of a character equally elegant with the exterior; and the numerous portraits and other paintings are really deserving of a minute description; but though neither the limits or character of this work will allow even of an enumeration of them, yet the traveller is informed that, among a number of works by the most eminent masters, here is a Madonna, equal, if not superior, to any thing of the kind in the kingdom. The park is enclosed with a stone wall, and is about six miles in circumference; it is covered with noble oak, elm, and beech trees of great value, intermixed with all the varieties of forest timber. The lawns and pleasure-grounds are very extensive, and possess an abundance of rich scenery, with a curious grotto and other ornamental decorations. — 5 m. distant from Oakham, Cottesmore, Earl of Lonsdale.

magnificent mansion consists of
a centre attached to two wings,
and extends upwards of 600 feet
in length; it contains several apartments of noble dimensions,
which are furnished with extreme elegance; of these the hall
and gallery are particularly admired; the ceiling of the latter is supported by beautiful Ionic columns, and the intervening
niches are occupied by fine marble statues. The works of art contained in this princely residence, are both numerous and valuable; the museum is stored
with several fine antiques, and
the various apartments decorated with the most exquisite paintings, by the best ancient masters; but of these no individual performance has attracted more attention than the celebrated picture of Lord Strafford
and his secretary, by Vandyke.
The park comprises upwards of 1500 acres of beautifully variegated ground, richly clothed with majestic timber, and embellished with spacious sheets of water: in different parts of these extensive grounds there are a number of decorative buildings,
well designed, and placed with particular attention to propriety
of effect; the most conspicuous
of them is an august mausoleum, 90 feet high, and consisting of three divisions, erected by the present earl in honour of his late uncle, the Marquis of Rockingham: the first division
is a square Doric basement; the second is of the same form, but
of the Ionic order, each of its
four sides opening into an arch,
and disclosing a very elegant sarcophagus which stands in the centre; and the whole is surmounted by a cupola supported
by 12 columns of the same order.
The interior of the lower story
contains a marble statue of the marquis in his robes, executed

church, a spacious and hand-

bears the date of 1023, and unless the figures have been destroyed by some accident, and again restored by a careless in-

that can boast of a sepulchral

the time of the civil wars by which the country was distract-

had about 100 of their men

SETTLE is a small town, almost entirely built with stone, bricks being seldom used in this district, except for the erection of chimneys; it is somewhat singularly though pleasantly situated, as it lies close to the base of a very lofty and nearly perpendicular lime-stone rock that overhangs the north side of the town in a most awful manner. From the summit of this eminence the prospect is extensive, and exhibits the various beauties of nature in all their native characters. This town has a good market on Tuesday, but does not contain a church, as it stands in the parish of Giggleswick, a village a short distance hence, on the opposite side of the river. There are a number of very pleasant walks to the south of Settle, but they would be still far more agreeable, were it not that all kinds of hedges are here entirely superseded by walls about six feet high, formed of stones placed together without any mortar whatever.

In this handsome village stands the church belonging to the town of Settle; and here also is a very eminent free grammar-school, founded in the reign of Edward VI. and supported by rich endowments. Somewhat less than a mile to the north-west of this place is a spring, remarkable for the irregular periods at which it ebbs and flows; these sometimes occur three or four times in an hour, and at each influx and reflux it rises and falls about 16 inches: the

CLAPHAM. Ingleborough Mountain begins at this place, and is close to the right all the way to Ingleton; and farther to the right is Wharfedale Mountain, the height of which is 2384 feet. Ingleborough mountain is one of the most sublime features of this romantic district, the perpendicular height of which is 2361 feet above the level of the sea. The base of this mountain is an immense mass of limestone; but towards the summit the rock is for the most part a sandy grit. The eastern and southern sides are extremely steep, the latter bending in the form of a crescent, with a deep morass at the bottom. On this side a boggy moor, which extends in front more than the whole length of Ingleborough, and above half a mile in breadth, must be crossed in approaching the mountain from the village of Austwick, by the way of Cromack farm, the nearest road from Settle. The north side of Ingleborough is less steep than the eastern and southern sides; but the western side is the most sloping, and the easiest ascent is from Ingleton. The sides, where not perpendicular, are springy; the ground, indeed, to the very summit emits water at every pore; for this mountain being the first check that the western clouds meet with in their passage from Ireland, is almost continually enveloped in mists, or washed with rains, which occasion an extraordinary degree of humidity. From this cause, however, the soil is covered with verdure, and flocks of sheep graze on the highest parts of the mountain. The top of Ingleborough is level and horizontal; extending in nearly an easterly and westerly direction about half a mile in length, but of a much less breadth. From this stupendous elevation the prospects are romantic, sublime, and extensive. To the east, the picturesque country of Craven presents a confused assemblage of hills, gradually diminishing in height, till they

This island, which is the largest of all those in Winander Mere, is thus described in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1748. "It is covered all over with trees, and edged all round with rocks; at one end rises a mount to a very considerable height above the water, on the top of which is a table and seats cut out of the rock, and agreeably shaded with trees. From this enchanting spot we command a large part of the lake; which, together with the country that incloses it, yields a prospect surpassing all that ever attracted my observation. Powis Castle does not exhibit a view more amazing, nor winds more delicate. The transparent waters of the lake extend themselves many miles before us, round which shade rises above shade, rock above rock, and mountain above mountain, even to the clouds, forming the most stupendous theatre, and presenting the most sublime scenes that human sight can possibly make room for." In Mr. Barlow's time this place would seem, from the representation of tourists, to have been one of the loveliest and most sacred seats of simplicity. He placed two small cannon upon it, by the explosion of which the re-duplications of a remarkable echo were heard with great effect. Mr. English's attempts at improvement are severely reprehended by Mr. Hutchinson; and Mr. West, with bewailing preface, tell us, "The sweet secreted cottage is no more; and the sycamore grove is fled. The present owner has modernised a fine slope in the bosom of the island into a formal garden; an unpleasant contrast to the natural simplicity and insular beauty of the place." Mr. Curwen finished the large house begun by Mr. English, demolished the garden, and, from plans furnished by the late Thos. White, Esq., a celebrated designer of pleasure-grounds, laid out the whole island in a style of great elegance.

The northern and north-western prospects exhibit a mass of mountains; Wharfedale is within the distance of six miles; and Snowdon, Crossfell, &c., are clearly visible. Towards the west, the flat country of Lancashire lies as in a map, and the prospect extends far into the Irish sea, the nearest shores of which are about 24 miles from Ingleborough. JUNCTION OF THE ROAD. From this spot, by Low Wood to Ambleside, the road passes along the banks of Winander Mere, said to be the most extensive lake in England; in a straight line down its middle it is ten miles and a half long, its breadth varies from one to nearly two miles; and opposite Low Wood, its depth is about 30 fathoms. The fish chiefly taken in this lake are common and grey trout, pike, perch, skellies, eels, and char, the latter of which are peculiarly fine, and many of them are baked and sent in pots to London. The scenery surrounding Winander Mere is extremely beautiful; and though its shores are not remarkably bold in any part, yet on every side the distance becomes gradually wild and high, and the range of mountains, from whence the various streamlets of the Rothay and Brathay descend, surround its head with great grandeur and solemnity. — At the Junction of the Road, The Wood, — Gell, Esq.

The road hence passes on the lakes of Rydal and Grass Mere, the latter of which exhibits a most delightful scene; it then proceeds by Thirle Mere, or Lethes Water, at the foot of the Helvellyn mountain, which vast eminence is 3055 feet above the level of the sea, and has a rude and magnificently awful front, stretching in one vast concave ridge, above the distance of four miles; a number of tremendous fragments of rock hang from its sides, to all appearance ready to fall and crush the traveller who has sufficient temerity to ascend its wild and fantastic heights; from its summit, however, the prospect is exceedingly extensive, and the celebrated Cross Fell and Ingleborough mountains, in Yorkshire, are distinctly visible. — 3 m. distant from Rydal, Elterwater Hall, *D. COCKERMOUTH is so called from its situation at the mouth of the river Cocker, which divides it into two parts, and then falls into the river Derwent; the streets, though spacious, are irregularly built, but many of the houses are, however, neat, particularly those on the acclivity leading to the castle. The church, a spacious free-stone structure, was entirely rebuilt in the year 1711, with the exception of the ancient tower. This town contains several charitable institutions for the relief of the necessitous poor; it sends two members to parliament, and has an excellent market on Monday, besides a small one on Saturday. The castle is generally believed to have been erected shortly after the Conquest; it has alternately been the property of those families whose arms appear on the entrance tower, but now belongs to the Earl of Egremont.

WHITEHAVEN. Little more than a century and a half ago this was an obscure hamlet consisting of six huts inhabited by fishermen; it is now, however, a most extensive and exceedingly populous town. The great importance this town has obtained must be attributed to the spirited cultivation of the coal mines in the neighbourhood, under the protection of the Lowther family; the pits are the deepest that have hitherto been worked, and the quantity of coal annually raised from them is about 90,000 chaldrons; of this the greater part is exported to Ireland, and a very fine haven has been constructed for the accommodation of the numerous shipping employed in the trade. Whitehaven is an eligible and well-built town, the streets are regular and spacious, and many of the buildings lay claim to some portion of beauty; it does not contain a church, but here are three chapels belonging to the established religion, besides meeting-houses for the different sects of dissenters, a neat theatre, and some good charitable institutions. To the south of Whitehaven, and nearly midway between that place and St. Bees, is a lofty promontory called St. Bees Head; it has a light-house on its summit, and enjoys almost as fine views as any other place in the kingdom; from hence, the whole shore, with the majority of its bays, creeks, and harbours, may be distinctly seen, besides the Isle of Man and great portion of the Scotch coast. CROMFORD, near, Willersley Castle, Richard Arkwright, Esq. This spacious and elegant castellated edifice stands on the side of a fine eminence, at the foot of which the river Derwent flows in a grand and picturesque sweep: the spot was originally occupied by a large rock, and the late Sir R. Arkwright expended the sum of 3000*l.* in its removal. The interior is furnished in a very elegant manner, and contains every thing capable of contributing to domestic comfort; it is decorated with a few good paintings, among which is a sublime view of Ullswater lake, and a full-length portrait of the meritorious founder of the family, by whom the mansion was erected. The grounds possess a very varied and romantic character; they display from several points various well-wooded eminences, on which, almost concealed by the trees, are some of the domestic and other offices; others exhibit rude rocks rising in solemn majesty, partly bare and uncheerful, and partly covered with fine young trees, of which the late worthy owner is said to have planted 50,000 annually on an average of seven years; these are enlivened by the waters of the river Derwent, and form highly interesting objects amidst scenery that includes almost all the varied beauties of nature.

The buildings of the baths and the adjacent lodging-houses are particularly well adapted to the comfortable accommodation of invalids; and the romantic beauties which adorn and enrich this sequestered spot, will endear it to the man of taste, who may here survey nature in her wildest and most picturesque attire; the philosopher also will find a source of considerable interest and gratification in those objects which only amuse the eye of uninformed ignorance.

CASTLETON, a village situated in a vale near the foot of a steep rock, on the summit of which stands the remains of an ancient castle, only deserves notice as its vicinity exhibits to the admirer of nature an abundance of wild and romantic scenery; the immediate approach to this place from Chapel in le Frith is by a deep descent called the Winnets, or Windgates, from the stream of air that always sweeps through the chasm, and the road, nearly a mile long, is carried in a winding direction, so as to render the natural declivity passable for carriages. Dark, rugged, and perpendicular precipices, about 1000 feet high, are seen on each side of the road, and sometimes also presenting themselves in front, seem to threaten opposition to all further progress; but one of the sudden turns to the left relieves the eye from the tedious uniformity of rude and hideous scenery, and presents it with a delightful view of Castleton Vale, which forms a rich picture of beauty, fertility, and variety.

it was the principal seat of the family till the beginning of the last century, and though not now in very excellent repair, is still extremely interesting to the antiquary on account of the many indications it presents of the festive manners and hospitality of our ancestors; it is a castellated and embattled dwelling, consisting of numerous apartments and offices erected at different periods, and surrounding two paved quadrangular courts. Did the limits of this work allow of so doing, it would be gratifying to lay before the reader a minute and accurate description of this ancient seat of old English hospitality, where, in the time of Queen Anne, no less than seven score servants were maintained; but it must suffice to observe, that all the principal rooms were covered with loose arras, great part of which still remains; this likewise concealed all the doors, but there were large iron hooks, by which it could be held back to avoid the inconvenience of lifting it up every time of passing in and out; the workmanship of these doors is of almost the worst possible description, few of them fit by any means close, and wooden bolts, rude bars, and iron hasps, are, in general, their best, indeed their only fastenings. The park was, about half a century ago, subjected to the purposes of cultivation, but in the vicinity of the mansion there is still a sweeping group of luxuriant old trees. The gardens are solely composed of terraces, ranging one above another, each having a sort of stone balustrade; and the prospects from one or two situations are extremely fine.

BULLOCK SMITHY. Marple Hall, John Bradshaw Isherwood, Esq. This is a very highly interesting specimen of domestic architecture, and when approached from Stockport, bursts upon the eye in the most agreeable manner; it is situated on the edge of a hill, with the romantic stream of the Goyt and some fine woods below it, and raises its dark stone fronts from amidst numerous surrounding offices and stables. The principal front is within a square court; this was originally finished with gables, bay-windows, and a fine tower over the entrance, which opens to the hall, where there is some beautiful painted glass and an ancient heavy staircase, decorated with a number of

The principal of these mills is considered as fire-proof, the floors being constructed on brick arches, and paved with brick; its water-wheels deserve notice, not only on account of their size, but for the manner of their construction; and the shuttles, near the top of which the water falls upon the wheels to work them, are likewise formed in a different manner from those used in similar works. About 1200 or 1300 persons are constantly employed in these mills, for whose accommodation the proprietors have erected a number of neat houses, a chapel, and a Sunday-school for the instruction of the children. Lower down the river, near a mile and a half distant, there are two other cotton-mills, one of them like that described above, a bleaching-mill, an iron-furnace, and a good stone bridge of two arches, all belonging to the same individuals, and erected by them; between 500 and 600 people are regularly occupied at these mills, and here, as well as at Belper, there is a Sunday-school for the education of children. Here the features of the country begin to assume a less bold and prominent appearance; the lands are mostly in cultivation; and the inclosures, instead of being fenced with stone walls, are chiefly encompassed by hedges. At the time of the Norman survey here were three lead mines: the manor was then the property of the Conqueror, and was given by King John to the Ferrers family at the same time with Ashbourn: it was afterwards annexed to the earldom and duchy of Lancaster, of which the manor and wapentake of Wirksworth are still members. The church is a Gothic building, apparently of the 14th century; it consists of a nave and side aisles, a north and south transept, a chancel, and a square tower, supported on four large pillars in the centre; and contains several curious monuments. In the church-yard is a grammar-school, founded by Anthony Gell, of Hopton, in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The lands provided for the maintenance of the school, produce a rental equal to the support of a better establishment than it at present possesses. The same Anthony Gell founded an hospital at Wirksworth for six poor men, and endowed it with 20l. per annum. The Moot Hall is a handsome brick structure, erected in the year 1773. In this building all causes respecting the lead-mines within the wapentake are tried; and here is deposited the ancient brass dish, which is the standard that others are made from to

BUXTON. The warm baths at this place were celebrated, even in the time of the Romans, and have since, from their wonderful efficacy in certain disorders, gradually risen in public estimation, notwithstanding the dreariness of its situation in a bottom surrounded with hills and bleak elevated tracts of moor-land, on which, however, several plantations have been made of late years. During the season, Buxton is now much resorted to by the fashionable world, for whose accommodation there are a number of handsome lodging-houses, besides several inns, and the Crescent, which latter is a very elegant stone building, erected by the late Duke of Devonshire, from the designs of Mr. Carr; it is divided into one house and three hotels, and contains a noble ball, card, coffee, and other rooms for the amusement of those who honour this interesting place with their company: here are also several billiard tables, public libraries, news-rooms, and a neat theatre, besides a pack of good harriers, which are kept by subscription for the diversion of gentlemen. Behind the Crescent, on a rising ground, are the stables, an extensive pile in the form of a circus, supposed by many to be the most complete in Europe; these were also built by his Grace, who is said to have expended 120,000*l.* in the completion of the whole. The baths are six in number, one for ladies, another for gentlemen, and three private ones for persons of distinction, besides a cold bath; these, though all joining each other, are entirely separate and distinct: here is also a bath for the use of the poor, who are not only exempted from any charge, but also meet with great assistance from the charitable contributions of the company. The temperature of the water as it rises at the baths is about 82 degrees of Fahrenheit, it is however about half a degree colder at St. Anne's well, where it is usually drank; this is an elegant little building in the antique style, and looked upon as one of the seven wonders of the Peak, from the circumstance that both hot and cold water is obtained, within 12 inches of each other, from a double pump situated on the opposite side of the building to that which contains the basin.

DERBY is situated on a fertile district, on the banks of the river Derwent, which is navigable hence to the Trent, and is here crossed by a handsome stone bridge; it contains, among other public buildings, a county and town hall, a gaol, an assembly room, and a theatre, which are all handsome buildings: here are also, besides meeting-houses for the different sects of dissenters, five churches belonging to the established religion: of these, All Saints church alone requires particular notice; this is a very handsome structure, though far from being of an uniform style of architecture; the tower rises to the height of 170 feet, and its upper part is richly ornamented with tracery, crockets, high pinnacles, and battlements, and the interior is particularly light, elegant, and spacious; it contains several monuments well worthy of examination. The contiguity of the river has rendered Derby an extremely favourable spot for the institution and carrying on of manufactures requiring the aid of water; and accordingly here are extensive silk, cotton, and other works, to which machinery has been adapted with astonishing success: one of these, called the Silk Mill, is situated on an island in the river Derwent; it is the first and largest of its kind that was ever erected in England, and is composed of full 14,000 wheels, all set in motion by a single water-wheel 23 feet in diameter; words are incapable of conveying a just idea of this very curious machine; it requires to be seen to be understood, and that for a longer period than is usually allowed to the casual visitor; suffice it then to say, that here all the operations are performed which are necessary for preparing the silk for the weavers. Derby also contains manufactures where all kinds of ornaments are made with the marble, spar, and petrifications that abound in this neighbourhood; besides which here are large porcelain works that produce an article capable of vieing with that of China, both for fineness of texture and brilliancy of colours. This town sends two members to parliament, and has well supplied markets on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday.

CLITHEROE occupies an insulated eminence on the eastern bank of the river Ribble, at one end of which, on an elevated limestone rock, are the remains of its ancient castle. This was a post of the royalists in the latter part of the civil wars in the time of Charles I., but was dismantled by order of parliament in 1649, and now only consists of a square tower, distantly surrounded by a wall. The church, a chapel belonging to Whalley, is of considerable antiquity. Clitheroe has an excellent grammar-school situated near the church-yard; it has a market on Tuesday and Saturday, and has sent two members to parliament since the year 1559. At a short distance hence is Pendle Hill, an elevation 1803 feet above the level of the sea.

The mansion, an ancient embattled structure, occupies a low situation on the banks of the river Calder, and according to the learned author of the History of Whalley, combines the picturesque effect of the castellated mansion with some degree of internal lightness and convenience.

BURNLEY is a thriving market town, occupying an advantageous and central situation; like many other towns in the county, it has increased considerably both in size and population within little more than the last half century, and besides the cotton manufacture, which, in all its branches, is now fully and extensively established in Burnley, there are several fulling, corn, and other mills, on the two rivers immediately in its vicinity. BURNLEY. Towneley Hall, Peregrine Edward Towneley, Esq. The principal parts of this venerable mansion form three sides of a quadrangle, and have two square and embattled towers at the inner angles, besides a buttress at each corner, which is both useful and ornamental: the fourth side of the quadrangle was removed rather less than a century ago, but the mansion must, when this was its existence, from the style of its architecture combining with the general shape and extent, have assumed a grand collegiate-like appearance. Parts of the walls are constructed with grout-work, and are more than two yards in thickness. The interior is decorated with a regular series of family portraits, from John Towneley, Esq., who lived in the reign of Elizabeth, to the present proprietor; besides which here is a beautiful painting of the first Lord Widdrington, who was killed in Wigan Lane. The park has an agreeable undulating surface, and contains a number of fine ancient woods, which abound in oaks of a magnificent growth; from hence

KIRKBY LONSDALE is situated on the west side of the river Lune, and the houses, which are chiefly erected with white polished free-stone, are in many instances rendered extremely pleasant by the fine gardens adjoining them. The church exhibits different styles of architecture, and the churchyard is much celebrated for the various beautifully diversified views it commands. Over the river Lune there is a lofty bridge consisting of three arches, the ribs of which are of singular beauty; the battlements, however, are low, and the structure on the whole inconveniently narrow. The mills belonging to this place deserve notice as being built on the side of a steep bank, and worked by a small brook that is conveyed through the town, the waters of which set in motion seven wheels, one above the other; one is employed for the manufacture of snuff, and another serves a fulling mill, &c. 			LEVEN SANDS. The passage over this bay, or creek, is precarious and the traveller will do well to avail himself of the assistance of a carter, or guide, who is always stationed here to conduct strangers through the bed of the river: the water is sometimes, during spring-tides, 15 feet above the level of these sands, nearly in the midst of which there is a small insulated tract, called Chapel Island , having on it the remains of an ancient chapel or oratory, that was provided with a priest, whose duty it was to offer up prayers daily for the safety of passengers. The united waters of the Creke and Leven pass to the sea about midway between the shores, these have a smooth sandy bottom, and are fordable when the tide is out. The surrounding scenery is diversified, grand, and awful, and assumes an almost endless change of effect, when seen under the varied influence of clear, cloudy, or stormy weather: to the north the rugged shores and lofty mountains interspersed with tracts of woodland and heath, form a scene of much grandeur and sublimity; while the retiring noble arched rocks, craggy, broken, and fringed with wood; over these, hanging woods, intermixed with cultivated inclosures, covered with a back ground of stupendous mountains. As a contrast to this view, from the other end of the gravel walk (between two culminating hills, covered with tall wood), is seen, in fine perspective, a rich cultivated dale, divided by hedge-row trees; beyond these, hanging grounds cut into inclosures, with scattered farms, and above them all, a long range of waving pasture ground and sheep walks, shining in variety of vegetation."

Near the above is Bardsea Hall, belonging to the same gentleman.

DALTON, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. distant, Furness Abbey, the property of Lord G. A. H. Cavendish.

CARTMEL is pleasantly situated in a well-wooded vale, almost wholly surrounded by bold hills. The streets are narrow, the houses irregularly built, and the chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the expenditure of the numerous persons who visit this place in the summer months, on account of the medicinal properties of its spring or well, which is situated at the base of a projecting rock, about three miles to the south of the town. Here is a well endowed free grammar-school, and an elegant church, which latter building formerly belonged to a priory that was founded in 1188, by the Earl of Pembroke; it was purchased after the dissolution by the inhabitants, and was then made parochial: it has a tower in the centre, consisting of two squares, one placed diagonally above the other, and the choir displays several handsome stalls, which are elegantly decorated with carved work; the interior is otherwise highly ornamented, and contains a number of handsome, or rather superb, monuments. Market on Tuesday.

sea to the south, with the different sized vessels floating on its surface, presents scenery of a very different character, but at the same time equally deserving of admiration.

BOOTLE is pleasantly situated amidst fertile and well cultivated lands; it contains an ancient church, in which there is a curious old octagonal front. In this neighbourhood there are several druidical arcades and other remains of antiquity; and about a mile hence the ascent to the mountain called Black Comb commences; this eminence is 1919 feet above the level of the sea, and may, on a clear day, be distinctly seen from Talk on-the-hill, in Staffordshire, which is nearly 100 miles distant: its summit also commands, under like circumstances, a view into 14 counties of England and Scotland, besides the Isle of Man, and several mountains in North Wales.

RAVENGLASS, near, Muncaster Castle, Lord Muncaster. The late noble owner of this seat devoted great part of his time and attention to agricultural improvement, and by his exertions the neighbouring bleak hills have been covered with forest-trees, several different breeds of cattle introduced, and many excellent alterations made in the management of the adjacent farms: he also greatly enhanced the value of his estate by the system of irrigation he practised upon it, and the park is well stocked with deer. About a mile and a half to the east of Muncaster Castle, and on the opposite side of the Eske, are ruins of considerable magnitude, called the city of Barnscar, highly deserving the attention of the antiquary, but of which no historical documents appear to be in existence.

HAWKSHEAD is a small town, situated in a vale near the lake of Estwaite, and is protected from the bleak winds by the overhanging fells of Coniston. As it is the principal town of Furness-fells, so is it the centre where all business is transacted; and though it has no staple manufacture, yet there is a very considerable market on Monday, weekly. Here is a good town-house and free grammar-school, besides a church which was formerly a chapel under Dalton, but made parochial by Edward Sandys, a native of this place, and archbishop of York about the year 1580. At a short distance from the town are the remains of a house, where the representative

WASTDALE. At this place the pellucid stream of Wastwater expands itself among the mountains, which rise on both sides of the dale to a great height, and in many instances almost meet at their bases. The lake is by no means easily attained, unless it be from the side of Egremont; and though some of the mountains are here seen leaning their rocky heads towards each other, yet the vale appears from the heights that lead to it, a most charming recess, but sunk far below the common level of the earth. It possesses altogether a very rural character, and every thing in it exhibits the true style of pastoral beauty and simplicity.

EGREMONT, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. beyond, Gill Foot, Thomas Hartley, Esq.

ENNERDALE. The lake called Ennerdale Water is situated near this village, and spreads itself among the mountains towards Whitehaven. It is guarded on all sides but the west by wild, craggy, and almost impassable heights: there are, however, on its eastern shore, a few small farms, which in some degree alleviate the gloominess of the scene; yet, on the whole, the mind is rather apt to be depressed than enlivened, when viewing these sequestered habitations, which are for many months shut out from the sun's benign influence.

PONSONBY. Ponsonby Hall, G. Edward Stanley, Esq. This handsome mansion occupies a fine elevated situation, near the banks of the Calder; it was erected towards the latter end of the last century, and commands a number of beautiful and extensive prospects, particularly over the sea; and, on a clear day, the Isle of Man and the mountains of Wales may be readily distinguished from hence. WORKINGTON. Workington Hall, the chief seat of J. C. Curwen, Esq., is beautifully situated on an elevation on the banks of the Derwent, near the east end of the town. It is a large quadrangular structure, and still exhibits tokens of considerable antiquity, notwithstanding its having undergone various alterations within the last 60 or 70 years. The walls are said to be so remarkably thick, that when some improvements were made a few years ago, a passage was excavated through one of them lengthwise, leaving on each side a sufficient thickness to answer every purpose of strength. When the beautiful and unfortunate Queen of Scots took refuge in England, she landed at Workington, and was very hospitably entertained here by Sir Henry Curwen, till the haughty Elizabeth obliged him to resign his royal guest. The apartment in which she slept is still called the Queen's chamber. The extensive park and pleasure-grounds have been rendered particularly pleasant by the recent alterations and improvements they have received.

The ruins of this beautiful monastic edifice stand on the north bank of the river Calder, in a deeply secluded vale, whose sides are clothed with hanging woods, and through which the waters of that river meander from the bleak mountains of Cald Fell; they consist chiefly of the remains of the square tower of the church, which is supported by pointed arches sustained on four finely clustered columns of exquisite workmanship, whose capitals are ornamented with a roll: several fragments of different sepulchral figures may also still be seen against the walls, which, from the devices on the shields, and the remains of the sculpture, appear to have been erected to the memory of eminent individuals. This picturesque ruin belongs to Capt. Iruin, who has an elegant mansion a short distance from it, and pays great attention to its preservation.

LEADENHAM, Leadenham Hall, Col. Reeves. COLEBY. Coleby Hall, Charles Mainwaring, Esq. This fine old structure, surrounded by plantations, has of late years received several additions in a more modern style of architecture. The grounds are entered through an arch, intended to imitate the ruin of a Roman gateway, and the gardens are embellished with two temples, one of which stands upon the terrace, and is a small but neat building of the Doric order, dedicated to the memory of the late Earl of Chatham; the other was erected from the designs of the late Sir W. Chambers; it is a model of the temple of Romulus and Remus at Rome, and is said to be the first building ever erected in England that displayed the superior taste of that eminent architect. GRANTHAM is a place of considerable antiquity; it contains a spacious church, which displays the style of architecture that prevailed in the 13th century, and has a handsome square tower at the west end, surmounted by an octangular spire, justly celebrated for the beauty of its proportions and ornaments; the internal decorations of this religious structure are extremely appropriate, and, as well as the several handsome monuments it contains, cannot fail to receive the approbation of the visitor. Beneath the south aisle is a subterraneous vault, or crypt, of much greater antiquity than the superstructure, and now used as a charnel-house. Grantham formerly contained several religious houses, sundry remains of which are still in existence; and King Edward I. erected a very elegant cross to the memory of his Queen Eleanor on St. Peter's Hill, near the south entrance to the town; this being one of the	From Lincoln	From London	battled parapet. This town sends one member to parliament, and has a market on Saturday, held in what is here called the market sted, in which stands a cross, bearing a cube at the top, and on its four sides different carved figures emblematic of the crucifixion.

This town was incorporated in 1463 under a charter granted by Edward IV., and the jurisdiction of the corporation extends over the whole soke; the sheriff of the county having no authority within the soke and district thereof: it sends two members to parliament, has a weekly market on Saturday, and contains a handsome guildhall, which was built in 1787, by a rate levied upon the soke, and 600 pounds, given by the Duke of Rutland, and Lord Browlow, to erect a large apartment for the occasional accommodation of the corporation, and a general assembly-room for the use of the town; several charitable institutions, and a free-school, which latter building attracts attention as having been one of the places of education of that transcendent genius Sir Isaac Newton. A canal, to which the town gives name, extends from Grantham to Trent-bridge, within half a mile of Nottingham, a distance of twenty-five miles, upon which is carried on a very considerable traffic in corn and coals.

GAINSBOROUGH stands on the east bank of the river Trent, and consists principally of one long street that runs in a parallel direction with the river, which is here navigable for ves- sels of 150 tons burthen, and enables the inhabitants to carry on a considerable trade, not only to the coast and the Baltic, but likewise, by means of canals, to several inland counties. The church is a neat modern struc- ture, but displays such archi- tectural incongruity as is quite offensive to the eye; not so the bridge, which was completed in 1791, and consists of three fine elliptical arches. The town-hall stands in the market-place; it is a brick building, occasionally used as an assembly-room, and has shops underneath, besides a dismal place called the gaol. Here is a curious edifice called the Old Hall, or Palace, which forms three sides of a quadrangle, and is open to the south; it is chiefly composed of oak timber framing, but its western exterior consists of a stack of large brick chimnies; there is an embattled tower at the north-east corner, and a small handsome building on the north side, that was formerly the chapel; the arches in the hall have niches occupied by figures of kings, warriors, &c., and the whole building, though in a de- cayed state, is deserving of par- ticular attention. A sun-dial at the south end of the east wing bears the date 1600, whence some have supposed it to be erected at that time, but though it is evidently much older, yet in all probability it was built since the time of John of Gaunt, whose palace it is said to have been. This town is celebrated in history as the place where the Danish ships anchored, when that san- guinary tyrant, Sweyne, plundered and laid waste many parts of the country. The former is spacious and handsome, has a beautiful lofty tower, and contains several ancient monuments; the latter appears to have been garrisoned for the king in the year 1644, but was reduced by the opposing party after a siege of two days, and in April 1646 was ordered by parliament to be dismantled. The only remaining vestiges of this fortress are the ditch and part of the walls, together with the lofty artificial mound formerly almost covered by the circular keep. BISHOP AUCLAND, Auckland Castle, belonging to the Bishop of Durham. This edifice stands at the north angle of the town, and extends itself, together with the courts and offices, over about five acres; it was, with the exception of the chapel, erected at different times, and is therefore of an irregular form. In the 17th century, this place was bestowed by the parliament on Sir Arthur Haselrigge, who being attracted by the beauty of the situation, determined to make it his principal residence, and therefore pulled down almost all the buildings erected by his predecessors, and built a very elegant mansion with the materials; but on the Restoration the munificent Cousins, the former bishop, was recalled to his diocese, and though a magnificent palace was ready for his reception, his excessive piety would not allow him to make use of it because the stone of the ancient chapel had been sacrilegiously applied towards the erection of this late habitation of fanaticism; he therefore had it taken down, and restoring the materials to their former use, built the present very elegant chapel, under the floor of which his remains are interred. The entrance to the castle from the town is through a handsome new Gothic gateway and screen, designed by James Wyatt, that extends 310 feet, and from thence a Gothic porch and vestibule leads on the right to the chapel; the roof of this building is supported by rows of clustered pillars; it contains a handsome monument by Nollekens to the memory of Bishop Trevor, and a fine picture of the Resurrection, by Sir Joshua Reynolds. On the left, the vestibule leads into the hall, a very elegant apartment, and to the staircase of the anti-room and great drawing-room; the latter is 60 feet long by 30 feet broad; its internal finishing, together with part of the anti-room staircase, and vestibule, was lately executed, at the expense of the present bishop, from the designs of Wyatt. In the dining parlour, 54 feet long by 24 broad, there are several fine paintings, among which the Cornaro family by Titian, and Jacob and the twelve patriarchs by Joseph Ribera, otherwise Spagnoletto, deserve particular notice. The attached park, and grounds include about 800 acres; that portion nearest the mansion has been very tastefully and SUNDERLAND BRIDGE, Croxdale Hall, W. T. Salvin, Esq. The mansion stands in a lofty situation, at a short distance from the river Wear; it enjoys a very rich prospect towards the south-east, and is rendered far more desirable by the beauty of the pleasure-grounds and the adjacent wood and plantations. A small rivulet called Croxdale Beck flows round the western extremity of the pleasure-grounds, and its channel is a romantic but contracted dell, of such extreme depth, that the rays of the sun scarcely ever penetrate into it. — Near the above, Burnhall, E. J. Salvin, Esq.

ELDON, beyond, Windlestone Hall, Sir Robert Johnson Eden, Bart.

MERRINGTON, a long irregular village, standing on the ridge of a hill, contains a cruciform church, which possesses many of the characteristics of antiquity. From this church a wonderfully extensive and extremely beautiful prospect is enjoyed, that includes the finest landscapes, in the county of Durham: these are seen in a kind of bird's eye-view, owing to the gradual mount or ridge on which the edifice stands. The eastern end of the ridge, being bounded with hills of almost equal elevation, affords but a short prospect; the western termination is at the village of Westerton, distant about a mile. The valley, through which runs the river Wear, lies open to the view, graced by the rich scenes near Bishop Auckland, extending up to Witton, and along the winding channel of the river, almost as far as Wolsingham: to the right is Brancepeth Castle and its environs; to the left, the prospect is bounded by the distant eminence of Cockfield-fell, above Raby. On the north, in the bosom of the vale, with majestic aspect, rises the city of Durham, graced with a variety of woodlands; on every side of the city, villages, seats, and hamlets are scattered; and the view is terminated by the mounts of Penshaw and Warden-low, which form a pleasing break in the horizontal line. To the south-west, the Yorkshire hills

judiciously laid out in slopes and terraces, so as to enjoy a great variety of prospects. The bottom of the lawn is washed by the river Gaunless, which is crossed at some distance by a stone bridge that was erected in the year 1757; the nearer landscapes comprehend wild and irregular woodlands, and bold cliffs and eminences, mingled in the most picturesque manner; and the more distant prospects are composed of rich cultivated lands, animated by the windings of the river Wear. — 3 m. distant from Bishop Auckland, Helmington Hall, Rev. Robert Spencer; 2 m. beyond Bishop Auckland, Old Park, Middleton Wharton, Esq.; and 1 m. farther, at Whitworth, Whitcomb Park, Robert Eden Duncomb Shafto, Esq.	ferred by many travellers to the Northallerton road. The stages from Boroughbridge are, to Leeming Lane 12 m., to Catterick Bridge 11 m., to Pierce Bridge 11 m., to Bishop Auckland 10 m., and to Durham 10 m. The inns will be found in the Index. It may be proper to observe here, that our distances are perfectly correct, though they do not exactly agree with the charges of the innkeepers; for it is but 10½ m. from Catterick Bridge to Pierce Bridge; and 9½ m. from Pierce Bridge to Bishop Auckland.	above Barmingham form the horizon, southward of which is the spacious plain wherein lie Northallerton and Thirsk, and with a glass, it is said Crake Castle and York Minster are discernible. Hamilton and Cleveland Hills extend eastward, stretching their cultivated skirts into the vale of Tees: the peak of Rosebury, all the chain of mountains to Hunscliffe, and the environs to Flamborough Head, are comprehended in the prospect, together with the Tees mouth, and a wide expanse of sea. On the intermediate ground, Sedgefield, Hardwick, and the sweep of country to Elwick and the Beacon, are distinctly seen; the scene narrows towards the north, yet many other objects are beautifully disposed in the valley.

The parish is extensive, and the living is worth 2000l. per annum. Near Stanhope, on the north, there is a cavern of considerable length, said to abound with stalactites and to extend nearly a mile; and on the west, an eminence, called Castle Hill, the southern foot of which is washed by the river Wear, whence it rises to the height of 108 feet. The summit is 30 paces wide, of an oblong figure, and divided by a ditch into two irregular parts; another ditch defends the northern and eastern acclivities, where the ascent is easiest. From the remains of foundations discovered a few years ago, it is also supposed that a strongly cemented wall of ashler work was carried round the whole summit. This place is denominated the castle of Stanhope in a grant of lands made by Bishop Beck; but no other records are extant concerning it, though tradition reports it to have been a fortress of remote origin, that was demolished during the incursions of the Scots.	<table border="0"> <tr> <td style="vertical-align: top;"> From Aldstone 282¾ 37¼ 35 32¾ 30¾ 29¾ 26¼ 23¼ 20½ 18 14¾ 13¾ 6¼ </td> <td style="vertical-align: top; text-align: center;"> From London 245½ 247¾ 250 252 253 256½ 259½ 262¼ 264¾ 268 269½ 276½ 282¾ </td> <td style="vertical-align: top;"> From London 245½ 247¾ 250 252 253 256½ 259½ 262¼ 264¾ 268 269½ 276½ 282¾ </td> </tr> </table> From Hicks's Hall to West Auckland, Durham, page 274 To Bishop Auckland 3 m. ☞ ☞ to Barnard Castle 11¼ m. HEXHAM is supposed to have been in the possession of the Romans, and is mentioned in the Saxon history; it formerly had an abbey of vast extent and extraordinary magnificence, many vestiges of which are still in existence. The church is in the form of a Greek cross, and has a tower in the centre, more than 100 feet high: the Gothic and Saxon styles of architecture are here completely intermixed; the choir is roofed with timber, but the side-aisles are arched with stone, and a double gallery, opening with Saxon arches, runs round the whole structure. The choir, which is now used as the parish church, though crowded with inelegant pews and galleries, certainly contains several productions of the pencil that merit attention. Hexham is pleasantly situated on the south side of the river Tyne, and consists of different narrow, irregular streets; it contains a good free-school, has a weekly market on Tuesday, and various leather, hat, and glove manufactories, in which many of the inhabitants are employed.

thing can be more beautiful. — Near the above, is Lambton Hall, John George Lambton, Esq. The seat occupies an elevated situation on the north bank of the river Wear; it is a modern edifice, erected by Bonomi, but displays considerable incongruities, both in design and execution. The library is a quadrangular apartment of good proportions, and has a neat gallery round it; here are, besides an excellent collection of literature, several good family paintings, and among them a full-length of Gen. John Lambton, by the celebrated Sir Joshua Reynolds. The grounds are pleasant, and the ride through a hanging wood on the south bank of the river is particularly fine.

school here; and a charity-school was built in 1725, in which twenty boys and six girls are clothed and educated. The bridge of Berwick was swept away by a flood in 1199; it was re-edified of wood, of which material it consisted till the time of James I., in whose reign the present elegant structure was commenced; it is of stone and has 15 arches. The town-hall was built in 1754; it is covered with slate and lead, and the whole edifice is elegantly finished by a turret 150 feet high, containing eight musical bells. Berwick sends two members to parliament, has markets on Wednesday and Saturday, the latter of which is well supplied; and exclusive of its trade in salmon, exports great quantities of corn and eggs to London; but its foreign commerce was never extensive, and its harbour in many places abounds with low and dangerous rocks: a noble pier is, however, now constructed at its mouth, on the site of an old one built by Queen Elizabeth, but long since destroyed. The most remarkable objects of antiquity this town at present affords, are the extensive ruins of the Castle, once a place of high importance, but now almost levelled with the ground; and a pentagonal tower, situated about 1200 feet to the north of it, called the Bell Tower, deriving its name from a bell it contains, which was rung at the approach of an enemy.

and James IV., in which the former was victorious. This battle is sometimes called the battle of Brankston, as the main scene of action was near that village, but more generally the battle of Flodden, because the Scots, who were encamped on Flodden Hill, were drawn out of their entrenchments to fight, by the Earl of Surrey secretly marching through the narrow defiles about Crookham, and cutting off their retreat. The success of the English, who are said to have lost only about 1500 men, was attributed to their artillery and bowmen; but the loss of the Scots on that occasion was, according to some, 8000, but others say 12,000 common men, besides innumerable knights and gentlemen, and several titled personages. The body of King James, who fell near Brankston, was found the next day by Lord Dacre: it was embalmed at Berwick, brought to England, and buried at Sheen, where, at the dissolution, it was tumbled into a lumber-room: his sword and dagger were given to the Herald's college, where they still remain. The standards and ordnance were carried to Etal the next day, and the Scotch standards were afterwards deposited by the Earl of Surrey in Durham cathedral. There is a natural rock on the highest part of Flodden hill, called the King's Chair, from whence he had a good view of both armies and the country; and in Brankston West-field, a rough upright column of basalt, six feet seven inches high, has been erected as a memorial of the victory.

DALKEITH is said to derive its name from the Gaelic language, in which it signifies a plain between two rivers; and if this be the fact, it is perfectly descriptive of the situation of the town, which stands on a narrow stripe of land peninsulated between the north and south Esk; whose banks are here beautifully wooded and embellished with the seats of several families of the first distinction. KELSO is situated on the north bank of the Tweed, over which a handsome bridge has been erected, in lieu of a former one, destroyed by an inundation of the river. It is a handsome town, containing many good houses and a spacious marketplace. The town-house stands in the square, as do also the principal houses and shops, many of which would be far from creditable to the capital of any country. Kelso has a weekly market on Friday, which is well attended, and abundantly supplied with grain, here sold by the sample, as is usual in other Scotch towns, except Haddington and Dalkeith. This place is a sort of provincial capital to the surrounding fertile country. Kelso contains the remains of an abbey, founded by King David in the year 1128, and which is well deserving attention, as it displays, in all its parts, that plain unadorned style, called Saxon, or early Norman, so EDINBURGH, near, the King's Park, which was formerly considered as a sanctuary for criminals, and still affords an asylum to insolvent debtors; it is an extensive piece of ground almost entirely composed of rocks, precipices, rude and lofty hills, morasses and bogs, among which are several sequestered spots, that exhibit in some degree the wild and solitary characteristics of an uncultivated territory, though positively situated in the midst of a populous country, and within a mile of the city of Edinburgh. From many of the hills in this park numerous varied and extensive prospects are enjoyed; but though the public, as well as those residing in the sanctuary, have the right of rambling at large through this district, yet, as it has been of late years subdivided by stone walls into inclosures of moderate size, much of that benefit has been lost; steps and stiles have, however, been made for the use of those who wish to go from one field to another, but they are so formed as to render it at all times difficult to pass over them, and in winter dangerous.

prevalent at the time of its erection. This town occupies a most delightful situation near a large river, at the foot of a tract of country gradually descending from the heights of Lammermoor to the Tweed, and at the upper part of the rich valley called the Merse, which extends from the sea-coast at Berwick to this place. The neighbouring scenery is particularly beautiful; it abounds

TOWTON. A memorable battle was fought here on Palm Sunday, the 29th of March, 1461, between the armies of York and Lancaster, the former, consisting of 48,660 men, was commanded by Edward IV., and the latter, amounting to 60,000, was led on by the Duke of Somerset: this dreadful conflict lasted from morning till night, and the victory was contended for by both parties with the greatest obstinacy; but at length the Lancastrians were put to flight, and then a most dreadful slaughter ensued, for Edward had made proclamation before the battle, that no quarter should be given, notwithstanding which, however, one prisoner was taken, Thos. Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire, but only spared to put him to a more inglorious death on the scaffold. The carnage of that dreadful day is said to have been so great, that the waters of the Wharfe were dyed with blood, and indeed this cannot be thought strange, since it is affirmed that no less than 36,776 men were killed in the battle, and such was also the hurry and confusion attending the flight, that vast numbers, in endeavouring to pass the Cock, a small river running into the Wharf, were drowned, and in their misfortune formed a bridge for some of their companions. The place where this dreadful battle was fought is a ridge of high ground between the villages of Towton and Saxton, from whence there is an extensive and beautiful prospect; and it is supposed that the two wings of the Lancastrian army extended to those places, having its centre posted on the heights about mid-way between them.

DRING HOUSES. Bishop-

erected by Walter de Grey, and the gardens contiguous to it
were almost entirely laid out at the expense of Archbishop Sharpe; but the former has been several times altered and repaired by succeeding prelates,
though the most considerable improvements were made by Archbishop Drummond, who built the stables, coach-houses,
&c. in 1763, and in the autumn
of the same year laid the foundations of the gateway and porter's lodge, which were completed in 1765. In the following year, the additions to the palace
were begun, consisting of a servants'-hall, large drawing-room,
vestibule, audience-room, &c.;
the drawing-room and vestibule
are finished with great taste,
in the Gothic or rather Anglo-Norman style of architecture,
and the former contains a fine
chimney-piece of statuary and Sienna marble: these apartments, together with the elegant
front and portico, were completed in 1769, under the direction of Mr. Thos. Atkinson, architect, of York. Many alterations were made in the lodging-
rooms at the same time, and a grand Doric-columned chimney-
piece of veined marble fixed in

WOOLER, formerly a barony consisting of several manors, was given by Henry I. to Robert de Muscamp, whose successor Robert, in the reign of Henry III., was the most powerful baron in the north; the manor afterwards passed through the hands of various individuals, till at length it became the property of the Earl of Tankerville, its present possessor. Here was formerly an hospital dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen, and there is an old tower standing on a round hill near the town, that was probably the chateau-fort of the Muscamps. Wooler was destroyed by fire in the early part of the last century, and has since been much improved; still, however, it is nearly all thatched, and though beginning to flourish, has but an indifferent appearance. The church, a modern structure, is said to have been formerly a chapel to Fenton church, the ruins of which are situated on the north side of the river Till. This town contains five or six dissenting meeting-houses, and has a market on Thursday. There are several remarkable entrenchments and cairns in this neighbourhood; one of which, at a place called Cattlewell, is named Maiden Castle, and another, Trodden Gazes. At Humbledon-burn, a mile north-east from Wooler, is Green Castle, a large round camp, with a cairn, on a hill, cut in terraces; and near the toll-bar, on Redrigs, stands a whinstone pillar, pointing out the spot where Henry, Lord Percy, and George, Earl of March, defeated 10,000 Scots, under Earl Douglas, in the year 1302.	176$\frac{1}{4}$ 170$\frac{1}{4}$ 387$\frac{1}{4}$ 155$\frac{1}{2}$ 92	Thornton in the Street * NORTHALLERTON, M. This seat belonged to the Earl of Moira when commander of the forces in Scotland; it was erected after a plan of the late Sir William Chambers, at the expence of 30,000l., and is unquestionably a beautiful specimen of Grecian architecture, though occupying rather a low situation: the surrounding grounds and plantations are also laid out with considerable taste; there is an extensive lawn in front of the house, surrounded by rising wood, and the whole is enlivened and beautified by an artificial stream of water from the loch; and the prospect of Arthur's Seat, rising 700 feet above the plain, and Craigmillar Castle, on the south, contribute much towards the interest of this cultivated spot, which forms a striking contrast to the bold natural scenery of the surrounding territory. — Near the above is Duddingston House, Adam Hay, Esq.

BELSAY CASTLE, Sir Charles Miles Lambert Monck, Bart. This building has a grey appearance: it consists of a venerable tower, to which extensive additions were made about the beginning of the 17th century, and is situated on a rising ground beautifully interspersed with single trees, and thick groves of wood: above the castle there is an ancient stone cross, and in a field towards the south a domestic chapel. The proprietor of this seat paid particular attention to Grecian architecture in his travels through Turkey in Europe, and has erected a spacious new mansion in a style of the greatest elegance.

WALLINGTON, Sir John Trevelyan, Bart. The mansion is a spacious and handsome structure of white free-stone, having a large gateway behind it, and on the east, west, and north sides, thick groves of luxuriant forest-trees: the river Wansbeck washes the bottom of the lawn, and is crossed by an elegant stone bridge with three arches and open battlements. About a mile towards the east there is another stone bridge over the same river, at the south end of which, on both sides of the road, are the grass-grown ruins of a considerable village.

JEDBURGH, the only royal borough in this county, was, about 70 years since, surrounded by a well wooded country, of which only a few old oaks, elms, beeches, &c. now remain, but the wood that begins to rise from the old stocks on the banks of the Jed, forms, together with a variety of new plantations, a beautifully romantic scene on the road hence into Northumberland. This place makes a conspicuous figure in the history of the border wars; it was, as may well be supposed, the theatre of many calamities, having been several times taken and burnt by the English. In one of these incursions, the English nearly demolished its ancient and beautiful abbey, which stands on the west side of the river Jed, near the place where it falls into the Tweed, but it was subsequently put into a state of repair, and part of it is now used as the parish-church,

EDINBURGH, which has within the last 50 years risen to almost unrivalled elegance, originally occupied the ridge of a hill, about a mile in length from east to west, terminating on the west in that bold and rugged rock on which stands the castle, and having a small valley towards the east adorned by the abbey and palace of Holyrood-house. The new town is situated on an elevated plain, to the north, and on the opposite side there are likewise a great many modern buildings. The attention of every stranger is strongly attracted by the singular situation and appearance of the old town; a long and very magnificent street extends itself over the ridge of the hill from the castle on the one side to Holyrood-house on the other; a vast number of lanes and alleys, there called wynds and closes, pass from off this street, like slanting ribs; so that in its general appearance it approaches to what it has been, not unaptly, compared, a turtle; the head of which is formed by the castle, the ridge of the back by the main street, the shelving sides by the wynds and closes, and the tail by the palace. The castle, from its situation, might, if properly supplied with provisions, be considered as wholly
