of your own in the Kaiserbagh; I presume that they did not know how to manufacture the fusee composition. It was late in the evening when we returned to camp, through roads thronged with at least 20,000 camp followers, all staggering under loads of plunder—the most extraordinary and indescribable spectacle I ever beheld; coolies, syces, kitmutgars, dhooly-bearers, Sikhs, grass-cutters, a flood of men covered with clothing not their own, carrying on heads and shoulders looking-glasses, mirrors, pictures, brass-pots, swords, firelocks, rich shawls, scarfs, embroidered dresses, all the 'loot' of ransacked palaces. The noise, the dust, the shouting, the excitement, were almost beyond endurance. Lucknow was borne away, piece-meal, to camp, and the wild Ghoorkas and Sikhs, with open mouths and glaring eyes, burning with haste to get rich, were contending fiercely against the current as they sought to get to the sources of such unexpected wealth."

24.—Towards the close of this month a sharp controversy was carried on through the newspapers regarding Lord Shaftesbury's statement that mutilation had been frequently resorted to by the rebel Sepoys. Exact inquiry made it appear that, though the most remorseless spirit had been shown so far as the destruction of life was concerned, mutilation could not be established to any considerable extent. The reported cases faded away wherever exact inquiry was set on foot regarding them.

25.—Mr. Roebuck's motion to abolish the Irish Vice-royalty thrown out by 243 to 116.

26.—Mr. Disraeli introduces the new India Bill to the House of Commons. While desirous, with Lord Palmerston, to abolish the Court of Directors, and transfer their powers to the responsible servants of the Crown, he sought to secure the support of the democratic section of the community, by making certain members of the Council elective, and vesting the choice of them in large parliamentary constituencies. Permission was given to introduce the bill, but it met generally with an unfavourable reception, and was abandoned soon after the Easter recess, in favour of a scheme suggested by Lord John Russell, of proceeding by resolution in a Committee of the whole House.

— In the case of Rendall v. Crystal Palace Directors, Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood grants injunction restraining the defendants from issuing tickets to admit persons to the building and grounds on Sunday in consideration of any money payment, directly or indirectly.

27.—Died, at Wentworth-place, Dublin, aged 57, John Hogan, an Irish sculptor of note.

29.—Calamitous fire in Gilbert-street, Bloomsbury, causing the loss of fifteen lives, fourteen being suffocated or burnt in the premises, and one dying of injuries received in leaping from an upper window to the street. At the inquest on the bodies, one of the firemen thus described the calamity:—"As soon as the flames were subdued I assisted in extricating the bodies, and was there until all had been recovered, fourteen in number. They were found, as far as could be judged, among the ruins of the second storey. The first body I discovered at about a quarter past four. It was that of a young man. He was quite dead. I shook him and spoke to him, but there was not the slightest sign of life. I then, in conjunction with others, at the direction of Mr. Gough, the foreman, proceeded to clear away the rubbish, and we soon found the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Smith, and eight children, all huddled, as it were, on each other. The only clothes they had on were their night-shirts, which were nearly consumed by the fire. They were lying with their heads downwards. One boy had on his trousers, with which he appeared to have hurriedly dressed, as if he had been alarmed by the noise or smoke of the fire, and was preparing to escape. This body was the least burnt. Soon after my arrival I observed the front wall begin to bulge, and I immediately gave the alarm that it was about to fall, and within a few seconds afterwards the whole gave way, and the building fell in with a tremendous crash, so that we had a narrow escape."

April 1.—Sir H. Rose's besieging force attacked by Tantia Topee before Jhansi. Without abandoning the investment, he gave battle to the relieving army, capturing eighteen guns, several elephants, and all the camp equipage. The town was stormed and taken, on the 2d, after a struggle in which our loss was considerable. The Ranees fled towards Jaloum.

— At Lerwick, Peter Williamson, merchant, up to this time a quiet well-conducted man, murders his wife and four children by cutting their throats, and then commits suicide in the most deliberate manner by cutting his own. One of his children, a boy, escaped maimed and bleeding from his father's murderous attack, and raised an alarm in the servant's room. By that time the sickening tragedy was completed upstairs. It was noticed the day before that Williamson did not appear quite in his usual way, and talked a good deal to people in his shop about murders and executions.

2.—Capture of Jhansi, by Sir Hugh Rose. It was computed that during the siege and storm the enemy lost 5,000 men. The Ranees made a narrow escape with only four followers.

6.—At the Gloucester Assizes, the Rev. Samuel Smith was sentenced to five years' penal servitude for beating John Leech, road contractor, of Croydon, with intent to do him grievous bodily injury. Mr. Smith made an elaborate defence, in which he admitted the attack, but sought to justify it on the ground that the prosecutor had been for years carrying on a secret adulterous intercourse with his wife. Mrs. Smith, who was also charged as a party to the assault—in so far as she had written the letters which led to the meeting, and induced Leech to accompany her to a lonely spot at Yate, near Bristol—was discharged.

9.—At the Central Criminal Court, Edward Auchmuty Glover was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in Newgate for making a false declaration as to his qualification to sit in the House of Commons as member for Beverley.

— Opened, at the Central Criminal Court, the Special Commission for the trial of Dr. Simon Bernard, charged as an accessory before the fact to the attempt of Orsini and others to assassinate the Emperor of the French. The trial took place under the Statute of the 7th and 8th Geo. IV., c. 31, sec. 7, which enacted that if any subject should be an accessory before or after the fact to the commission of any murder or manslaughter, upon land out of the dominions of his Majesty, the offence was to be tried at the Central Criminal Court under a Special Commission. The Commission included the Lord Mayor, Lord Campbell, the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Crowder, the City Recorder, Commissioner Prendergast, the Common Serjeant, and all the Aldermen, according to their seniority. The Lord Chief Justice thus referred to the evidence in his charge to the Grand Jury:—The depositions clearly show that, whether Bernard was privy to it or not, a wicked plot had been formed in the year 1857 by certain foreigners, who had found an asylum in England, to assassinate the Emperor of the French by the explosion of gunpowder. The two chief conspirators were Felix Orsini and Joseph Pierri. They procured the grenades to be manufactured in England, and to be carried first to Brussels and afterwards to Paris. At Paris, accompanied by Antonio Gomez, a servant of Pierri, and by another foreigner, named De Rudio, who was hired in London to assist them in their enterprise, Orsini and Pierri, armed with the grenades and with revolvers sent to them from England, actually did make the attempt, by throwing the grenades, and causing them to explode, as the Emperor was about to alight from his carriage. Bernard was not present; he was still in England; and there is not in the depositions any direct, positive evidence to prove that he was aware of the purpose to which the grenades were to be applied. But the depositions do disclose serious facts which, till contradicted or explained, may lead to the presumption that he was an accomplice. A few of the most prominent of these I will mention to you. Residing in London, and being very intimate with Orsini, Bernard was instrumental in causing the grenades to be manufactured, and in November 1857 he on two occasions purchased materials from which the fulminating powder for the explosion of the grenades is compounded. When the grenades were completed, in December, he induced the keeper of the Café Suisse in London to carry them secretly to Brussels, on the representation that they were connected with a new invention for the making of gas. In the end of December, when the grenades had been carried over to Brussels, Bernard went thither himself, and there he met Pierri, likewise Orsini, who was passing under the name of Alsopp, and whom he appears to have assisted in obtaining a false passport which enabled him to do so. At Brussels Bernard remained some days, till, with his privy, the grenades were delivered to a waiter of an hotel to be carried to Paris, and Orsini left Brussels for Paris in the same train as the waiter. Bernard then returned to London, and, according to the depositions, was very active in inducing De Rudio, who was then in a state of great destitution and misery, to go over to Paris, that he might there put himself under the orders of Orsini. Bernard procured a passport for De Rudio in the name of De Silva, and when De Rudio had gone over to Paris he supplied small sums of money to De Rudio's wife, and sent her into the country, making use of mysterious language as to how she was to conduct herself if she should read anything in the newspapers about her husband. It further appeared that, to facilitate Orsini's personation of Alsopp at Paris, Bernard, in December, wrote several letters to one Outrequin, a commission agent at Paris, and advised Outrequin of the consignment of a package containing revolvers, which, in fact, had been purchased by Pierri in England, and were to be delivered to Orsini in Paris. The last fact stated in the depositions with which I will trouble you is, that, on the 2d of January, 1858, Bernard himself brought the package containing the revolvers to the office of the South-Eastern Railway, in Regent Circus, directed to "Monsieur Outrequin, 277, rue St. Denis, Paris," making use of language which, although it may indicate the knowledge of some plot against the existing Government in France, yet, if spoken seriously and sincerely, repels the notion that Bernard was then aware that this plot contemplated the assassination of the Emperor." The speeches of counsel, and the examination of witnesses to prove their allegations, occupied six days. On the last day, the jury retired about twenty minutes, and returned with a verdict of Not guilty. The people in court burst into a cheer, which the officers could not repress, and the prisoner himself waved his handkerchief over his head in great excitement. The law officers of the Crown relinquished the other charges in the indictment, and the prisoner was liberated.

13.—Government telegram announcing the fall of Lucknow read in both Houses of Parliament amid great cheering.

— The outbreak in India being, to at least an appreciable extent, connected with religious scruples, the Court of Directors instruct the Governor-General:—"The Government will adhere with good faith to its ancient policy of perfect neutrality in matters affecting the religion of the people of India, and we most earnestly caution all those in authority under it not to afford by their conduct the least colour to the suspicion that that policy has undergone, or will undergo, any change. It is perilous for men in authority to do, as individuals, that which they officially condemn. The real intention of the Government will be inferred from their acts, and they may unwittingly expose it to the greatest of all dangers, that of being regarded with general distrust by the people. We rely upon the honourable feelings which have ever distinguished our service, for the furtherance of the views we express. When the Government of India makes a promise to the people, there must not be afforded to them grounds for a doubt as to its fidelity to its word."

17.—Vice-Chancellor Stuart gives judgment in the case of Brook v. Brook, involving the question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister in a new phase (see Nov. 20, 1857). In 1847, Charlotte, the first wife of William Leigh Brook, of Meltham Hall, near Huddersfield, died, leaving issue a son and daughter. In 1851, Mr. Brook and the sister of the deceased wife went from this country, where they were and continued to be domiciled, to Altona, and were there married. In 1855, Mr. and Mrs. Brook died of cholera within a few days of each other. There was issue of this marriage, one son and two daughters. Mr. Brook, by his will, left all his real and personal property to be equally distributed between the children of both marriages. In 1856, the son of the second marriage died an infant. The question was, who was entitled to his property. If the marriage of his father with the sister of the deceased wife, at Altona, was valid, his two sisters of the whole-blood would succeed to his real estate; and his three sisters of the half-blood and whole-blood would be entitled to the personalty. But if the marriage was illegal and invalid, the deceased son and his two sisters would be illegitimate, and his property would devolve to the Crown; a bastard having, in the eye of the law, neither collateral heirs nor next of kin. That a marriage with a deceased wife's sister is contrary to the law of England was admitted; but it is legal according to the law of Altona; and the next question was, whether the lex loci contractus operated to make a marriage performed there valid in this country. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor was to the effect that, the law of England expressly prohibiting such marriages, no resort to the laws of Denmark, or any other foreign country, can give validity to a contract which the law of England has made absolutely null and void.

19.—Lord Ellenborough, President of the Board of Control, forwards to the Governor-General of India a despatch strongly commendatory of his Oude proclamation (see March 3):—"We cannot but express to you our apprehension that this decree, pronouncing the disinheritance of a people, will throw difficulties almost insurmountable in the way of the re-establishment of peace. We are under the impression that the war in Oude has derived much of its popular character from the rigorous manner in which, without regard to what the chief landowners had become accustomed to consider their rights, the summary settlement had in a large portion of the province been carried out by your officers. . . . Other conquerors, when they have succeeded in overcoming resistance, have excepted a few persons as still deserving of punishment, but have, with a generous policy, extended their clemency to the great body of the people. You have acted upon a different principle: you have reserved a few as deserving of special favour, and you have struck, with what they feel as the severest of punishments, the mass of the inhabitants of the country. We cannot but think that the precedents from which you have departed will appear to have been conceived in a spirit of wisdom superior to that which appears in the precedent you have made. We desire that you will mitigate, in practice, the stringent severity of the decree of confiscation you have issued against the landowners of Oude. We desire to see British authority in India rest upon the willing obedience of a contented people. There cannot be contentment where there is general confiscation. Government cannot long be maintained by any force in a country where the whole is rendered hostile by a sense of wrong; and if it were possible so to maintain it, it would not be a consummation to be desired."

19.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the annual Budget. He calculated the expenditure at 67,110,000*l.*, and the revenue at 63,120,000*l.*, the deficiency to be met by repealing the War Sinking Fund Act, or at least suspending it until the Exchequer Bonds were provided for, and postponing payment of these till 1862-63. He proposed to equalize the duties on spirits, from which he hoped to obtain 500,000*l.*; and to put a stamp on bankers' cheques, which he thought would yield 300,000*l.* The budget was favourably received.

22.—Died, aged 70, Mr. Robert Stephen Rintoul, projector, proprietor, and editor of the Spectator newspaper.

27.—Sir W. Peel dies at Cawnpore, of small-pox.

28.—Mr. Caird's Agricultural Statistics Bill thrown out on the second reading by 241 to 135 votes.

May 1.—Nicaragua and Costa Rica, harassed by filibusters, appeal to the great European Powers for protection.

3.—The Bishop of London intimates to the Rev. A. Poole his intention of withdrawing his licence as curate of St. Barnabas', Pimlico, in consequence of the probability that the course he was pursuing with reference to confession would cause scandal and injury to the Church.

3.—Mr. Locke King introduces a bill, which afterwards passes through both Houses, abolishing the property qualification hitherto required from members of English and Irish constituencies. It was notorious, he said, that the existing law was easily and systematically evaded by means of fictitious conveyances, and that the security which the law purported to give for the character and fitness of the representatives of the people was entirely illusory.

5.—Lord Campbell delivered, this morning, the unanimous opinion of the judges, that there ought to be no new trial in the case of the Manager and Directors of the Royal British Bank. They were also of opinion that the conviction was right, and that the defendants were privy to the fallacious statements of accounts while declaring a dividend of six per cent., and that at the time they well knew the bank to be insolvent and the balance-sheet false.

6.—The French Figaro publishes a jesting paragraph which leads to a series of duels between the sub-editor, M. Pène, and certain sous-officiers of the French army. Writing of a ball given by a Russian merchant, then dazzling Paris by his profuse expenditure, Figaro remarked:—"A marked progress has been made. The inevitable sub-lieutenant in uniform, who tears ladies' laces with his spurs, and makes a razzia on the refreshments—the plague, the inevitable plague of the drawing-room—was not there! People may invite him once, but never twice. The first act of the drawing-rooms, now opened for the season, is to get rid of him; they send him off, as Sixtus V. did his crutches after his election!" This joke gave great offence to the sous-officiers of the French army, and challenges showered in upon the sub-editor, M. de Pène, who was held answerable for the article. It was not known how the angry officers settled the championship; but M. de Pène, attended by the Duc de Rovigo, and M. Courtiel, attended by the sub-lieutenants Hyenne and Rogé, met at Vezimay. The combat was of short duration, M. de Pène wounding his adversary in the hand, and placing him hors de combat. Approaching his disabled adversary, M. de Pène said a few words to him expressive of his sorrow for what had happened, and assuring him that his article was not meant to be offensive. The combatants had hardly shaken hands when M. de Pène was challenged by another officer, M. Hyenne—said to be the fencing-master of the regiment—and run through the body. The unfortunate editor lingered for some days in great danger, but ultimately recovered.

7.—Debate in both Houses concerning Lord Ellenborough's censure of the Oude proclamation, and the discrepancies in the copies submitted to each House—four paragraphs, relating to the acquisition of the province by Great Britain, being omitted in that presented to the House of Lords, on the ground, as admitted by Lord Ellenborough, that it would be inconvenient to publish them. Notices of motion were given for further debate; and for many days it was understood the fate of the Ministry depended on the result.

11.—The Rev. George Ratcliffe, rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, sentenced in the Central Criminal Court to seven years' transportation for forging the signature of a co-trustee to a transfer of 1,028*l.* stock, and for forging a certificate of the death and burial of the person interested.

13.—At the Central Criminal Court, William Lakey, master and part owner of the Clipper, was sentenced to eight years' penal servitude for wilfully sinking his vessel off Dungeness, with intent to defraud the insurance-brokers. Chestney, the cook and steward of the Clipper, deposed that the prisoner asked him to go down to the lazaretto with him, and there the prisoner bored one hole through the vessel, and witness another; afterwards the prisoner bored a third. The mate also deposed that he was fully aware of what was going on—he heard the sound of the auger, and saw the prisoner and the last witness at work. He heard the prisoner give orders to knock out the ballast-port. The prisoner had said that the ship would sink and be a coffin to them all, and that it was better she should sink at once than afterwards. He also said that if she was assisted into port the bill for repairs would come to more than she was worth, and would be the ruin of him. It was also proved that the crime was contemplated before the ship sailed, and that the prisoner had left all his sea-going valuables at home.

14.—In the House of Commons, Mr. Cardwell submits the following resolution censuring the Government for their Indian policy:—"That while this House, in its present state of information, has abstained from expressing an opinion on the policy of any proclamation which may have been issued by the Governor-General of India with relation to Oude, it has seen with regret and serious apprehension that her Majesty's Government have addressed the Governor-General through the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, and have published a despatch, condemning in strong terms the conduct of the Governor-General; and is of opinion that such a course on the part of the Government must tend, in the present circumstances of India, to produce the most prejudicial effect, by weakening the authority of the Governor-General, and encouraging resistance of those who are in arms against us." In the House of Lords, this evening, Lord Shaftesbury's motion, similar in terms to the above, was defeated on a division by a majority of nine in favour of Ministers. It was of these motions Mr. Disraeli afterwards said:—"The cabal, which had itself rather a tainted character, chose its instruments with Pharisaical accuracy. I can assure you that, when the right honourable gentleman who brought forward the motion in the House of Commons, rose to impeach me I was terrified at my own shortcomings, and I listened attentively to a nisi prius narrative, ending with a resolution which, I think, must have been drawn up by a conveyancer. In the other House, a still greater reputation condescended to appear upon the human stage, and, like a Pharisee of old, with broad phylacteries upon his forehead, he called upon God to witness, in the voice and accents of majestic adoration, that he was not as other men were, for that he was never influenced by party motives."

19.—Epsom races. The Derby won by Beadsman (Earl Derby's Toxophilite, second); and the Oaks (21st), by Governess. The adjournment of the House of Commons for the Derby day, in the midst of the Indian debate, forms the subject of a striking section in the Comte de Montalembert's remarkable pamphlet, "Un Débat sur l'Inde au Parlement anglais."

21.—An eruption of great grandeur commences from Mount Vesuvius. It continued for a considerable time, and the magnificence of the spectacle brought crowds of visitors to Naples. No fewer than seven new craters opened in the side of the mountain, whence the lava issued in a broad stream, and fell in cascades down the side.

— After a debate of four nights, Mr. Cardwell consents to withdraw his motion for a vote of censure on the Ministry, many of his supporters having expressed an opinion that the new papers laid on the table of the House shed a fresh light, not only on the discussion, but on the policy pursued by Ministers. In a speech at Slough, on the 26th, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Disraeli) thus described the scene:—"There is nothing like that last Friday evening, in the history of the House of Commons. We came down to the House expecting to divide at four o'clock in the morning: I myself expecting probably to deliver an address two hours after midnight; and I believe that even with the consciousness of a good cause that is no mean effort. Well, gentlemen, we were all assembled, our benches with their serried ranks seemed to rival those of our proud opponents, when suddenly there arose a wail of distress—but not from us: I can only liken the scene to the mutiny of the Bengal army. Regiment after regiment, corps after corps, general after general, all acknowledged that they could not march through Coventry. It was like a convulsion of nature rather than any ordinary transaction of human life. I can only liken it to one of those earthquakes which take place in Calabria or Peru: there was a rumbling murmur, a groan, a shriek, a sound of distant thunder. No one knew whether it came from the top or the bottom of the House. There was a rent, a fissure in the ground; and then a village disappeared; then a tall tower toppled down; and the whole of the Opposition benches became one great dissolving view of anarchy. Are these the people whom you want to govern the country—people in whose camp there is anarchy—between whom there is discord upon every point; and who are not even united by the common bond of wishing to seize upon the spoils of office?"

22.—By great exertion, the rebuilding of the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden (architect Edward M. Barry, Esq.), was sufficiently advanced to admit of its being opened for the season this evening, with the opera of "The Huguenots."

26.—The Conservative electors of Bucks entertain Mr. Disraeli at Slough. In reply to the toast of "Her Majesty's Ministers," he described how they had come into office by the collapse of a Government supposed to be omnipotent, but falling suddenly to pieces in a manner altogether unprecedented. Noticing the successful manner in which the difficulties incident to its position had been overcome, he commented with great severity on what he called the unprincipled opposition with which it was met in the House. "There existed at this moment," he said, "that which has not existed in England since the days of Charles II.—a cabal which has no other object but to upset the Government of the Queen and to obtain its own ends in a manner the most reckless but the most determined. They have succeeded in doing that which no cabal in modern times, I am proud to say, has yet succeeded in accomplishing; they have, in a great degree, corrupted the once pure and independent press of England. Innocent people in the country, who look to the leading articles in the newspapers for advice and direction—who look to what are called leading organs to be the guardians of their privileges and the directors of their political consciences—are not the least aware, because this sort of knowledge travels slowly, that leading organs now are place-hunters of the cabal, and that the once stern guardians of popular rights simper in the enervating atmosphere of gilded saloons. Yes, gentlemen, it is too true that the shepherds who were once the guardians of the flock are now in league with the wolves; and therefore it is that, though we have been only three months in office, though during that space we have vindicated your honour, maintained the peace of Europe, which was in manifest peril, rescued our countrymen from a foreign dungeon, made up a great deficiency in your finances and yet reduced taxation, and laid a deep foundation for your future Empire in the East; innocent people in the country who read leading organs believe we are a Government that do nothing; that we are a weak Government, and not entitled to the confidence of our country."

30.—In the House of Commons, Lord John Russell enters into an examination of the statements made by Mr. Disraeli to his constituents at Slough. He sought to show that the foreign relations of this country were in a most satisfactory condition when the late Government retired from office, and censured the Chancellor of the Exchequer for holding over the House the threat of a penal dissolution if it did not indorse the policy of the Ministry. In reply the Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded the House that information had not only been refused for the reason that it might infuse a spirit of irritation of bitterness and of animosity between the two countries, but that the French Ambassador had actually taken his departure. The following evening Lord Palmerston criticized Mr. Disraeli's after-dinner speech:—"With reference to the assertion that we are a cabal, if the use of that term implies that we are few in number, I have only to say that the result will yet show which of the two sides has the greater number in the House. (Cheers.) But I deny entirely, if we are a cabal in the sense of a party aiming at upsetting the Government, that that is a novel proceeding. To say that there has never been a cabal since the days of Charles II. having for its object to upset the Government, is an assertion I did not expect to hear from a quarter so enlightened. Such a thing is no novelty; but I will tell the right hon. gentleman that which is a novelty. It is not that there should be a cabal in opposition, but that there should be a factious Government carrying into office all the factious feelings by which they were actuated in opposition—(cheers); a Government which publishes libels on the former advisers of the Crown, and on acts of the Crown carried out by those former Ministers—(cheers); a factious Government that sends forth and publishes, not only to Europe, but to India, principles which, if carried into execution, would lead to the dismemberment of our Indian empire; and a Government which, whatever motives it may have been actuated by, publishes to the world a most affronting insult to the highest officer of the Crown in any of her Majesty's dominions." (Cheers.) The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied:—"What has taken place on this subject reminds me of a very unfortunate circumstance that has happened in that country which has been so much the subject of the remarks of the noble Lord. A gentleman of letters, having done, or said, or written something that offended a very powerful army, was called to account by a member of it. He met his opponent without any hesitation, and, in the first instance, conducted himself with fair repute and success. (Ministerial cheers.) But no sooner was this first affair over than another gentleman was sent for—one whose fierce mien and formidable reputation—(laughter)—were such that his friends thought he would put the matter right. (Cheers and laughter.) He, too, demands satisfaction—(laughter)—and he is accompanied by a considerable body of other gentlemen, who seem by their appearance to signify that if the second assailant is not more successful than the first, they will find others to succeed him.

(Cheers.) In short, having somehow or other got into a scrape, they mean to bully him by numbers. . . . The noble Lord is quite horrified that I should have spoken in a booth on matters of State policy. Special announcements on matters of State—on matters of peace or war—should be made at a carousal in a club-room, such as we may remember; when you invite her Majesty's officers who are to undertake operations of warfare, and when Prime Ministers take the chair, and, in what is styled (though not by me) an inebriated assembly, announce for the first time to the country that a great military expedition is to be undertaken. . . . What I call a cabal is a body of men, whether it be in this House or in another house—either a private house, or a house devoted to the affairs of the State—banded together, not to carry out a policy, not to recommend by their wisdom and their eloquence great measures to the approving sympathy of the community, but uniting all their resources, their abilities, and their varied influence—for what? To upset the Queen's Government, without even, in so doing, declaring any policy of their own, or giving any further clue to their opinions than this—that the first article of their creed is place. (Cheers.) It is this conduct which has made the great body of the people of this country look with aversion on these machinations and manœuvres, and has gained for her Majesty's Government the sympathy of all honourable and generous minds. If I wanted to confirm the Government in power, if I wanted to assure a longer tenure of office, I should beg the noble Lord and his friends to continue their practices; I should be delighted, night after night, if they called on me to defend statements made to my constituents, not one word of which I retract, and which I made with that due thought which such statements required. I should wish the noble Lord to continue this course, for I am quite certain that, whatever difference of opinion there may be in this House, or in England, between the Conservative party and the great Liberal party, there is this one point of union between us—that we are equally resolved, both in this House and throughout the country, no longer to be made the tools or the victims of an obsolete oligarchy."

June 1.—Debate in the House of Lords on Mr. Disraeli's Slough speech, the Earl of Clarendon disputing the allegation that war with France was imminent when he quitted the Foreign Office, or that the late Government had neglected the interests of this country in the dispute with Naples. The Earl of Derby adopted the speech, and defended the statements made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not know whether the noble earl had read it with as much amusement as he did; but greater even than his amusement was his conviction of its truthfulness. "I felt eminently convinced that, great as was the wit, great as was the clearness, great as was the humour of that most graphic description, that which most peculiarly appertained to it was its undeniable truth. There was no exaggeration even of colouring, for no exaggeration could be applied to that matchless scene, at which—I shall remember it to the last day of my life—I had the good fortune to be present."

1.—The Committee of Privileges of the House of Lords decide that Henry John Chetwynd, Earl Talbot, had made out his claim to the title, honour, and dignity of Earl of Shrewsbury, as heir male of the first Earl.

7.—Five of the India resolutions having passed the House, Lord Stanley now intimates that a bill founded on them will be at once introduced. It was read a second time on the 24th, and a third time on the 8th July. An amendment, proposed by Lord Palmerston, to limit the continuance of the new scheme to five years, was negatived by a majority of 149 to 115. The bill was also carried through the House of Lords with few amendments, the discussion principally turning on the question of competitive examinations of candidates for the scientific corps of the Indian army. The bill received the Royal assent on the last day of the session (Aug. 3).

8.—Settlement of the Cagliari dispute by the payment of compensation, and the surrender of the prisoners and vessel. The Neapolitan Minister for Foreign Affairs writes to Lord Malmesbury:—"I have the honour of informing your Excellency that the sum of 3,000*l.*, paid into the mercantile house of Pook, is at the disposal of the English Government. As far as concerns the men forming the crew of the Cagliari, now under trial before the Grand Criminal Court of Salerno, and the Cagliari herself, I have it in my power to announce to you that the men and the vessel are at the disposal of Mr. Lyons; they are consigned to him; their departure will depend on him, and orders have been given to the competent authorities. This being settled, the Government of his Sicilian Majesty has no need to accept any mediation, and it delivers up everything to the absolute will of the British Government." This satisfactory termination of the dispute was announced in both Houses of Parliament on the evening of the 11th.

11.—Public meeting in St. James's Hall, on the subject of the use of the confessional by the Rev. Alfred Poole, late curate of St. Barnabas', and others connected with that church. The Hon. and Rev. F. Baring was the chief discloser, his statements resting mainly on the evidence of women of indifferent reputation, who appeared to have attended confession for the sake of the advantage of certain grocery tickets distributed among them. The meeting resolved that the circumstances were such as to demand the fullest publicity. Mr. Poole openly denied every allegation made against him.

12.—Mr. Justice Coleridge formally retires from the Court of Queen's Bench after a parting address to the Bar, full of kindly recollections and tender sympathy. "I hope," he said, "that in your happy meetings you will bear in mind that I desire long to be remembered here. And now, Mr. Attorney-General, Gentlemen of the Bar and Masters, my dear Lord and brethren, earnestly, gratefully, and affectionately, I bid you all farewell, and may God bless you." As soon as his lordship had finished these words he bowed, and rushed hastily out of court, evidently overcome with emotion.

12.—Charles Dickens publishes in his periodical, Household Words, a solemn declaration in his own name and his wife's, that lately-whispered rumours, touching certain domestic troubles of his, were altogether untrue. "Those who know me and my nature," he writes, "need no assurance under my hand that such calumnies are as irreconcilable with me as they are in their frantic incoherence with one another. But there is a great multitude who know me through my writings, and who do not know me otherwise; and I cannot bear that one of them should be left in doubt, or hazard of doubt, through my poorly shrinking from taking the unusual means to which I now resort for circulating the truth."

14.—The Shakspeare autograph attached to the mortgage deed of the Blackfriars property purchased by the British Museum for 315*l*.

15.—Aston Park, Birmingham, opened by the Queen. From the Town Hall her Majesty drove through streets lined with shouting thousands, and up the noble avenue of the park to Aston Hall. She here received the address of the Committee of Management, and appeared on the terrace to declare the Hall and Park open. Her Majesty afterwards returned to Stonleigh Abbey.

— Mr. Brady obtains, with the consent of Government, the appointment of a committee to inquire into the grievance sustained by Mr. Barber, solicitor, in connexion with his wrongful conviction for complicity in the Fletcher forgeries.

— Died, aged 63, Ary Scheffer, French historical painter.

— Massacre of Christians at Jeddah. In revenge for what they considered an insult offered to the Turkish flag, the Moslem section of the population attacked the house of the French consul, seriously wounding him and his daughter, and murdering his wife. The majority of the other Christians in the town afterwards fell victims to the fury of the lawless mob. On the 5th August the town was bombarded by the British war-steamer Cyclops, and after some delay on the part of the Turkish authorities, eleven of the murderers were given up and beheaded near the town in the presence of Turkish and Egyptian troops.

16.—Heard in the Divorce Court, the case of Robinson v. Robinson, and Lane, co-respondent, the latter being proprietor of the hydropathic establishment, at Moor Park. The chief evidence was a diary written by Mrs. Robinson, a woman upwards of fifty, which her husband had discovered when she was lying ill. It consisted of three thick volumes, and described in glowing and impassioned language her supposed amours with Dr. Lane, a man of thirty, with a young wife and children. The diary was admitted in evidence against Mrs. Robinson, but could not be used, the court decided, against Dr. Lane. The defence was, that the diary was not a narrative of actual occurrences, but of imaginary scenes. Various important questions of law arose in connexion with the case; the first being whether the co-respondent could be admitted as a witness, Dr. Lane being prepared to deny on oath that there was any foundation for the charge. He was tendered to give evidence on behalf of Mrs. Robinson. The court decided unanimously that as co-respondent he could not be examined. A second question then arose whether he could not be dismissed from the suit and then called as a witness. When the case came before the court again in December, the judge decided that this could be done; and Dr. Lane gave evidence in detail, showing the illusory character of the diary, on the evidence of which an ecclesiastical court had already granted a divorce, a mensa et thoro.

— The Galway Company's steamer Indian Empire wrecked on Saint Marguerite Rock, in Galway channel.

— At a meeting of the Jerusalem Diocesan Missionary Fund, held in the Library of the House of Lords, a resolution was adopted with reference to the charges made against Bishop Gobat, that those present have "satisfied themselves the aspersions referred to have no just foundation, and that they partly arise from false accusation, and partly from distorted and exaggerated statements of matters of fact." The charges in question, which had given rise to much bitter controversy, had reference primarily to undue facilities given to the successive marriages of Hanna Hadoub, a converted dragoman of indifferent reputation in Jerusalem, whose adventurous career was latterly terminated by a conviction for burglary.

— Heard in the Court of Queen's Bench, the libel case of Hughes v. Lady Dinorben. The plaintiff was nephew of the defendant's husband, and the alleged libels were contained in a series of anonymous letters addressed to the late Lord Ravensworth, the grandfather, and the present Lord Ravensworth, the father, of a young lady to whom, at the time, the plaintiff was engaged to be married; also to the plaintiff himself, and various other persons connected with him. In the present action Lady Dinorben was charged with being the author of these anonymous letters. The plaintiff was, in 1852, the next entitled to the property of the second Lord Dinorben, who was insane, and on whom a commission of lunacy was about to be held. If the plaintiff had no child, the estates would go to Lady Dinorben's daughter and only child; so that she had an interest in preventing plaintiff's marriage. Lady Dinorben was now placed in the witness-box, and denied having either written, or caused to be written, any of the letters founded on. The jury, however, after a consultation of only ten minutes, returned a verdict for plaintiff, with 40*l.* damages against her ladyship.

16.—Rev. D. Sadleir, senior Dean of Trinity College, Dublin, commits suicide in the Phoenix Park, by hanging himself to a tree, while labouring under temporary insanity.

17.—The Commission de lunatico inquirendo upon Sir Henry Meux, Bart., return a verdict that he was at present of unsound mind, but whether he was so or not at the date of the will in dispute, they could not say.

— In pursuance of a motion made by the Bishop of Oxford, Government promise to produce all the papers in their possession relative to the Spanish slave-trade, at Cuba, said to be now carried on in the most open manner, in defiance of treaties.

18.—The Soldiers' Daughters' Home at Hampstead, for 200 girls, opened by the Prince Consort.

19.—Capture of Gwalior by Sir Hugh Rose. The enemy, who held possession of a range of heights in front, made a fierce attack upon our lines, but were driven back; and after a severely contested fight on the plain lying between the heights and the town, they were completely routed; Gwalior was taken possession of by the British troops, and the Maharajah Scindia was again restored to his capital. The rebels left 27 guns. Amongst the slain was the Rane of Jhansi, who died fighting hand to hand with her foes like a private soldier. Our loss was trifling, the men suffering more from the heat of the sun than from the bullets or swords of the enemy. After this crowning victory, the Central India Field Force, which had so greatly distinguished itself throughout the whole campaign, was broken up and distributed into garrisons. Sir Hugh Rose himself returned to the Bombay Presidency.

22.—At the auction mart, one-sixth of an entire thirty-sixth share in the New River Company sold for 3,300*l.*

25.—The Master of the Rolls orders that the policy for 13,000*l.* effected with the Prince of Wales Insurance Company by William Palmer, the Rugeley poisoner, upon the life of his brother Walter, should be delivered up and cancelled as fraudulent and void.

26.—After many tedious delays and evasions on the part of the Chinese plenipotentiaries, Lord Elgin succeeds in completing a treaty of peace at Tien-tsin on the Peiho, whither the fleet had proceeded after leaving Canton. It renewed the treaty of Nankin (1842); authorized the appointment of ambassadors; the residence of one at Peking; British subjects to travel into the interior; British merchant-ships to trade upon the Great River (Yangtze); five additional cities to be opened up for commerce, and generally prescribed the condition upon which intercourse was to be carried on. A separate article annexed to the treaty provided for the payment of two millions of taels, on account of losses sustained by British subjects at Canton; and a second sum of two millions of taels, on account of the expense of the present expedition. At the urgent entreaty of the Chinese plenipotentiary, and to secure incidental advantages not mentioned in the treaty, the 3rd Article, regarding the residence of a British minister at Peking, was afterwards so far modified as to authorize his presence there only when the exigencies of the public service made such a step necessary.

26.—The Agamemnon and Niagara commence laying the Atlantic telegraph. When the ships were about five miles apart, the cable parted on board the Niagara through getting off the pulley. By a preconcerted arrangement, a fresh splice was made, and all went well till about forty miles were paid out, when the electricians reported a rupture of continuity, the cable having parted near the bottom of the ocean. A third splice was made, and by the night of that day 146 miles were paid out. To facilitate the shifting from one coil to another, the Agamemnon's speed was slackened and all for a moment seemed right, when, without any warning, the cable parted close to the ship. She repaired to her rendezvous again, but the Niagara had left, and both vessels then made for Queenstown. The cable was thought to have been injured in a violent storm encountered by the Agamemnon between the 20th and 24th.

28.—Bill abolishing Property Qualification of Members receives the Royal assent.

— Mr. Rarey, the American horse-tamer, exhibits his achievements with the horse Cruiser to her Majesty.

29.—A fire, supposed to have been caused by the spontaneous combustive goods stored in the building, breaks out in the south quay range of warehouses, London Docks, and destroys property of the estimated value of 150,000*l.*

30.—The state of the Thames during this month gave rise to much anxious deliberation. Parliamentary Committees could not sit in the rooms overlooking the river; several of the officers were laid up by sickness; the attendance of members was as brief as possible, and it was at one time even under consideration, whether the House should not adjourn to some more healthy locality. In the Courts at Westminster, judges and juries performed their duties under a sense of danger, and got away as quickly as possible. The peril caused by the condition of the river this season was thought to have given a sensible impulse to the great engineering schemes for the drainage of the metropolis, so long under consideration. The water was of a deep blackish-green tint, the result of the combination of the sulphuretted hydrogen with the iron contained in the clays suspended in the water. The month throughout was the hottest on record, save one; the mean high day temperature being 76°5' or 8°6' above the average, and the mean low night temperature 53°9' or 4° above the average. On the 16th the mean temperature at Greenwich was 76°9', but at certain hours of the day it rose as high as 102°. At Bedford 113°1' was reached, and at Norwich Priory 116°5' was the highest recorded.

July 1.—Compromise between the House of Lords and House of Commons concerning the admission of Jews into Parliament. An Oaths Bill, with this object in view, was introduced by Lord John Russell early in the session, but after being read a third time in the Commons, the clause relating to the Jews was thrown out in the Upper House. The Commons, on the motion of Lord John Russell, refused to accept the bill as altered, and appointed a committee to draw up reasons for their dissent. In the discussions to which this step gave rise in the House of Lords, the Earl of Lucan proposed a solution of the difference by the insertion of a clause enabling either House by its resolution to modify the form of oath. Lord John Russell, while objecting to this method of procedure, agrees to accept the compromise; and a bill, embodying the principle, was this day introduced and passed quickly through both Houses. Baron Rothschild took his seat for the City of London on the 26th.

— Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Secretary of State for the Colonies, introduces a bill to provide for the government of New Caledonia, defining the boundaries of that settlement, and regulating the administration of its affairs for a limited period through the mediation of a local legislature. The measure passed, almost unopposed, through both Houses.

9.—Aristocratic fête at Cremorne, designed for the benefit of certain metropolitan charities. About 2,000 attended, but the weather prevented any enjoyment of those out-door amusements for which this Paphian resort is celebrated.

12.—Mr. Hutt's motion, "That it is expedient to discontinue the practice of authorizing her Majesty's ships to visit and search vessels under foreign flags, with the view of suppressing the traffic in slaves," negated by 223 to 24.

— Explosion at Madame Coton's pyrotechnic works, Lambeth. The house, with the exception of the external walls, was blown into the air; and the rockets and other fireworks falling in myriads on the street, not only injured many of those gathered to assist, but set fire to another work of a similar kind conducted by Mr. Gibson. The explosion here was of the same terrific character as at Madame Coton's. The proprietress herself, three female children, and one man were killed; sixteen were taken into the hospital; sixty were known to have had their wounds dressed by neighbouring surgeons, and over 200 others were more or less injured.

15.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer brings forward the Government measure for cleansing the Thames. The estimated cost of the necessary works was 3,000,000*l.* The Government proposed to enable the Board of Works to levy a special rate of 3*d.* in the pound for forty years. This would yield 140,000*l.* a year, and not only pay for the works, but furnish a sinking fund to liquidate the advances. The Government further proposed to guarantee the advances up to 3,000,000*l.* at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. Perfect freedom would be granted to the Board as regarded the construction of the works, and the whole were to be finished in five years and a half. The measure was favourably entertained, and passed through both Houses, with little alteration, before the close of the session.

— In Committee on the India Bill, the Earl of Derby carries two important amendments on the measure as sent up from the Commons. The first had reference to the application of Indian revenues for the employment of troops, declaring that "it shall not be competent, except to repel actual invasion, or in a sudden or urgent emergency, to make the revenues of India applicable, without the consent of Parliament, to defray the expense of military operations carried on beyond the frontier." The other led to the omission of the words making it incumbent on the Government to admit candidates for the civil service in the order of their proficiency at a competitive examination, and leaving the law as it stands with regard to admission to the service, subject to such regulations as might be issued by the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Crown.

— The Legitimacy Declaration Bill passes through committee.

— Lady Bulwer Lytton having been summarily conveyed to a lunatic asylum, intimation is now made that she is free from all restraint, and about to travel in company with her son and female friend. Dr. Winslow writes that it is "but an act of justice to Sir Edward B. Lytton to state that, upon the facts which I have ascertained were submitted to him, and upon the certificates of the medical men whom he was obliged to consult, the course which he has pursued through these painful proceedings cannot be considered as harsh or unjustifiable."

23.—Came on for hearing at Stafford Assizes the case of Swinfen v. Swinfen, involving, besides properties of great value, an important question relating to the power of counsel. The plaintiff in the case, Patience Swinfen, was the widow of Henry John Swinfen, the only son of Samuel Swinfen, late of Swinfen Hall. The son died on the 15th of June, 1854, at Swinfen Hall, and the father died at the same place on the 26th of July following, at the advanced age of 81. On the 7th of July, only nineteen days before his death, he executed a will devising the Swinfen estate, valued at between 60,000*l.* and 70,000*l.*, to the plaintiff, his son's widow, but leaving personal estates to a large amount undisposed of. The defendant, Frederick Hay Swinfen, was the son of Frances Swinfen, who was the testator's eldest half-brother, and claimed the estate as heir-at-law on the ground of the testator's insanity. The issue was first brought to trial at the Assizes held at Stafford on the 15th of March, 1856, when, at the commencement of the second day's proceedings, an arrangement was made by plaintiff's counsel, Sir F. Thesiger, that the devisee should have an annuity for life out of the estate, with her jointure of 300*l.* a-year. Mrs. Swinfen, however, refused to carry out this agreement, alleging that it was entered into by her counsel without her consent, and in defiance of her express instructions. The Court of Common Pleas was applied to, but that court, without expressing any opinion as to the validity of the agreement in law or in equity, refused to enforce it by attaching the plaintiff; and the Court of Chancery, when subsequently applied to, refused to enforce it in equity. The result was that it directed the issue to come down for a second trial. The objection raised to the will was the incompetency of the testator from age and infirmity, and undue influence over him by the plaintiff. The trial lasted four days, and as there was no doubt that the will had been formally executed, and that the testator was all his life perfectly sane, and had partially lost his testamentary capacity (as it was affirmed) only by the effects of age, the testimony of the numerous witnesses—friends, lawyers, medical practitioners, servants, and tradespeople—was very conflicting. The jury, to the great satisfaction of a Staffordshire audience, returned a verdict for the plaintiff establishing the will.

29.—The Commons' reasons for disagreeing with the Lords' amendment to the India Bill considered in the Upper House. The result was, that, although on some points Lord Derby still maintained his opinion, he agreed not to insist upon any amendments except one—that relating to competitive examination for appointments to the scientific branches of the Indian army. This was afterwards acceded to by the House of Commons, and the bill passed.

30.—The House of Lords pronounce in favour of the claim of the Princess Giustiniani of Naples to the barony of Newburgh, in the peerage of Scotland.

August 2.—The Bourse at Antwerp, erected (370) in 1531, and which suggested the idea and furnished the model to Sir Thomas Gresham of our own Royal Exchange, was this day destroyed by fire. So sudden was the destruction of this splendid edifice, that all the archives belonging to the different commercial bodies using it were consumed.

2.—Distribution of the Victoria Cross by the Queen to twelve persons, on Southsea Common, Portsmouth. Five were Crimean heroes, and the seven others mostly Indian. A large number to whom the Cross was awarded were still with the army in India.

3.—The Victoria Nyanza discovered by Capt. John Hannen Speke, an African explorer who first suggested the idea that the Nile had its source in the waters of this great lake.

4.—Inauguration of Cherbourg. The first of the great displays designed for this occasion was the opening of the railway, and the second the filling of the Grand Basin, or Napoleon Docks—two works the completion of which was the consummation of the designs of a century. The Emperor and Empress were both present, and the Queen, with Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales, also took part in the ceremony. A magnificent naval demonstration was made in the harbour.

5.—The Agamemnon and Niagara, having started on their expedition a second time, succeed in laying the Atlantic telegraph. The weather was unfavourable, but no misfortune occurred to mar the progress of the work, although one or two narrow escapes were made. On the 30th an injury was noticed on the coil of the Agamemnon, a mile or two from the part paid out. The course of the ship was stopped and the break applied; but as this failed to give sufficient time for repairing the injury, the desperate expedient was resorted to of letting the huge ship swing upon the wire. It was a time of breathless anxiety; but, to the gratification of all, the cable held, the injured part was taken out, the ends spliced, and the delivery resumed. The first national use made of the cable was on the 16th, when an interchange of good wishes took place between her Majesty and the President of the United States. A message was also transmitted regarding a collision between the steamships Europa and Arabia. Great rejoicings took place throughout America on the 17th in celebration of the event. In a few days the signals became too faint to decipher, and at length, from some cause unknown, disappeared altogether.

—Case of libel against the Athenæum heard at Guildford Assizes, the plaintiff being one Eastwood, a dealer in antiquities, who professed to feel aggrieved at the contents of a paper on "Recent Forgeries in Lead," read at the British Archæological Association, and published in the above journal as part of the proceedings. The paper complained of made pointed reference to certain leaden articles known as "pilgrim signs" (some of which had been sold by the plaintiff), as modern fabrications, and warned collectors to be on their guard against them. The evidence adduced by the plaintiff showed that he had purchased pieces of lead from labourers and others employed in excavating the new dock at Shadwell, and their genuineness as pilgrim signs was spoken to by two antiquaries. On its being urged for the defendants that there was no case against them to go to a jury, Mr. Justices Willes, after a brief consideration, said he was of opinion that the article complained of was not a libel in the eye of the law. It had been laid down by one of the sages of the law that what a man said honestly and bonâ fide in the course of a public discussion on matters concerning the public interest, no matter even if he spoke rashly, and what he said was not true—still any statement made under such circumstances would not be a libel. It had also been equally clearly laid down that, before any plaintiff could ask redress for a libel, he must show distinctly that the libel complained of applied to him, and to no other person. It would be a new doctrine, indeed, if it were to be held that any person who said that all lawyers were rogues might be sued by every individual lawyer in the kingdom; and it appeared to him that the article now complained of applied to the particular trade of dealing in antiquities rather than to the plaintiff personally. Plaintiff nonsuited.

7.—Ottawa, formerly Bytown, named as the capital for the new dominion of Canada.

10.—Her Majesty and the Prince Consort embark at Gravesend on a visit to their daughter the Princess Frederick William of Prussia.

21.—Intelligence received viâ St. Petersburg of the treaty of peace concluded at Tientsin with the Emperor of China.

23.—Accident to an excursion train, conveying a gathering of Sunday-school children, between Worcester and Wolverhampton. On returning at night, the train for greater safety was divided into two sections, started, however within a few minutes' interval of each other. Near Round Oak station one of the couplings in the first train gave way, eighteen of the carriages rushed back down the incline with fearful velocity, and came into collision with the second train. Eleven lifeless passengers were discovered among the broken carriages. Three died soon after removal, and scores were maimed for life. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of manslaughter against Cook, the guard; but he was acquitted on trial.

— Came on for trial at the Wilts Assizes, (371)

before Mr. Baron Channell and a jury, the case of Vescombe v. Landor; being an action for libel raised by a clergyman in Bath against the author of "Imaginary Conversations," now nearly ninety years of age. The libels were directed against Mrs. Vescombe, and appeared chiefly in a book recently published by the poet, entitled "Dry Sticks, faggotted by Walter Savage Landor." Up to May 1857 Mr. Landor and Mr. and Mrs. Vescombe had been on intimate terms at Bath, the poet dining with them two or three times a week; but about that time Mr. Landor took offence at Mrs. Vescombe for sending away to Cheltenham Miss Hooper, a young lady of nineteen, daughter of a gentleman living next door to them, who had been staying in the family, assisting to educate the children, and proceeding with her own training under Mrs. Vescombe's superintendance. In the first instance Mr. Landor issued a pamphlet, "Walter Savage Landor and the Hon. Mrs. Vescombe," in which he charged her with six distinct acts of petty dishonesty or deceit. Mrs. Vescombe thereupon directed her solicitor to require an apology; but the only answer was another pamphlet, "Walter Savage Landor threatened," in which he made an outrageous attack on the solicitor. This led to the action. After briefs had been prepared and counsel retained, Mr. John Forster arrived from London as a friend of Mr. Landor's, and succeeded, not only in inducing him to withdraw all his statements, but to sign an undertaking not to repeat them. This apology was accepted in consideration of the advanced age of Mr. Landor; but scarcely had this been done when he commenced issuing a series of disgusting anonymous rhymes concerning both Mrs. Vescombe and Miss Hooper. Several of these were reissued in the volume entitled "Dry Sticks," and formed the basis of the libel for which redress was now sought. The evidence was short, consisting mainly in the production of the aged poet's unworthy rhymes. No plea of justification was recorded, nor were any witnesses produced on his side. An attempt was made by counsel to treat the libels as the visions of an old man whose youth had been passed in an age less conventional than the present. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, 1,000*l.* Mr. Landor soon after left England for Florence.

23.—The Eastern City, from Liverpool to Melbourne, destroyed by fire soon after crossing the equator. She had on board 180 passengers, 47 men—officers and crew—and 1,600 tons of general cargo. Mainly through the well-directed energy of Captain Johnstone the whole of those on board, with the exception of one man suffocated in his berth, were placed in safety on board the troop-ship Merchantman, which fortunately bore down on the burning ship.

26.—A small pleasure-yacht upset off

Worthing. Of eleven children, six servants, and two boatmen on board, nine children, two servants, and one boatman were drowned.

A British diplomatic agent to reside at Yeddo, and consular agents at the other ports; the Tycoon having, on the other hand, power to appoint a diplomatic agent in London, and consuls at any port in Great Britain.

31.—Close of the Encumbered Estates Court, Ireland. Since the first petition was filed, in October 1849, there had been sold through its agency 11,024 lots, representing a money value of 23,161,093 $\frac{3}{4}$. The total number of petitions presented, including those for partition and exchange, were 4,413, and the number of conveyances executed by the Commissioners, 8,364.

—Donati's comet visible to the naked eye as a star of the fourth magnitude. The comet arrived at its least distance from the sun on the morning of the 30th September, and for ten nights afterwards presented an appearance of great magnificence in the heavens. At one time the tail covered thirty-six degrees, and was calculated to measure 80,000,000 miles in length. On the 5th October the nucleus was very nearly in a line with the bright star Arcturus, which could be clearly seen through the densest part of the tail. On the 10th October the comet was at its nearest distance to the earth, 51,000,000 miles. After this the weather became unsettled, and the comet was rarely visible. The time of its revolution is calculated at 2,495 years.

13.—Accident at the Music Hall, Sheffield, caused by an explosion of gas, or, as some thought, the firing of a pistol in the gallery. In the block on the gallery stairs, four young men and a young woman were crushed to death. The number of persons injured was very considerable.

13.—The emigrant steamer Austria, 2,500 tons, trading between Hamburg and New York, burnt at sea when nine days from Hamburg, and 471 of the passengers and crew drowned by leaping from the ship, or swamped in the boats. "At one time," writes a survivor, "the scene on the quarter-deck was indescribable and truly heart-rending. Passengers were rushing frantically to and fro—husbands seeking their wives, wives in search of husbands, relatives looking after relatives, mothers lamenting the loss of their children; some wholly paralysed by fear, others madly crying to be saved; only a few perfectly calm and collected. The flames pressed so closely upon them, that many jumped into the sea; relatives, clasped in each other's arms, leapt over, and met a watery grave. Two girls, supposed to be sisters, jumped over and sank, kissing each other. A missionary and wife leapt into the sea together, and the stewardess and assistant steward, arm in arm, followed. One Hungarian gentleman, with seven children, four of them girls, made his wife jump in, then blessed his six eldest children, made them jump in one after another, and followed them with an infant in his own arms."

27.—Died, aged 63, Madame Ida Pfeiffer, traveller.

— Mr. Bright re-enters the political arena with an address to his new constituents at Birmingham, in which he defended the opinion he had expressed in opposition to Lord Palmerston's foreign policy, urged upon his hearers the necessity of Parliamentary reform, and drew an unflattering picture of the House of Peers, particularly of the spiritual peers; "a creature—what shall I say?—of monstrous, nay, even of adulterous birth." At a banquet, on the 29th, Mr. Bright strongly urged a peace policy in foreign affairs, vindicating his views by declaring that he promulgated none which had not been upheld by the most revered names in English history. "We have past experience," he said; "we have beacons, we have landmarks enough; we know what the past has cost us, we know how much and how far we have wandered, but we are not left without a guide. It is true we have not, as an ancient people had, the Urim and Thummim—the oracular gems on Aaron's breast—from which to take counsel, but we have the unchangeable and eternal principles of the moral law to guide us; and only so far as we live by that guidance, can we be permanently a great nation, or our people a happy people."

30.—Accidental poisonings at Bradford. The apothecary's assistant in Shipley having sent to a confectioner in Bradford 12 lbs. of arsenic in mistake for an equal quantity of "daff" or gypsum, the compound was made up into sweetmeats, 40 lbs. of which were sold to a small trader called Hardaker, who kept a stall in the market. The poisoned lozenges were in the course of the day vended to an extent which caused the death of eighteen persons, and placed the lives of 200 in great jeopardy. Hodgson, the chemist, was indicted for manslaughter at the York Assizes, but after hearing the evidence Baron Watson stopped the case, there being nothing in his opinion for the jury to consider.

— The Emperor Napoleon in a letter addressed to his cousin, the Minister of Algeria and the Colonies, intimates the withdrawal of his sanction from the attempt to obtain negro labourers from the African coast. "If their enrolment," he writes, "be only the slave-trade in disguise, I will have it on no terms." He recommends that an effort be made to obtain Indian coolies as free labourers.

31.—Died Major-General Sir W. Reid, author of "The Law of Storms," Governor of Bermuda and Malta.

November 1.—The Governor-General of India issues a proclamation from Allahabad, announcing that henceforth all acts of the Government of India would be done in the name of the Queen alone; and he called upon the millions of her Majesty's subjects in India to yield a loyal obedience to the call which, in words full of benevolence and mercy, their Sovereign made upon their allegiance and faithfulness.

10.—At the Central Criminal Court, Lemon Oliver, stockbroker, but not a member of the Stock Exchange, was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude for forging the signature of Robert Swan, and defrauding him of various securities deposited for safety in the London and County Bank. There was also a charge against him of appropriating to his own use 5,000*l.* entrusted to him by a lady named Dance, residing at Southsea, for the purpose of investing in Canadian securities.

12.—The Daily News publishes two important despatches improperly conveyed from the Colonial Office, in which Sir John Young, the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, advocated the abandonment of our protectorate over all the islands except Corfu, which strong fortress he recommended to be retained as a military post. Soon after receipt of the despatches they were ordered to be printed for the use of the Cabinet, and the copies lay for some weeks in the Library of the Colonial Office under the charge of the sub-librarian. A person named Guernsey, who was a frequent visitor to the library, was tried on the 15th December for purloining the documents; and though his counsel did not deny that it was through him the Daily News obtained the despatches, he urged that the offence did not amount to felony, for which he was indicted. The jury returned a verdict of Not guilty.

17.—Died at Newton, Wales, where he was born, aged 89, Robert Owen, socialist.

18.—The new great bell for the Palace at Westminster rung for the first time. Round the outer lip was inscribed:—"This bell, weighing 13 tons 10 cwt. 3 qrs. 15 lbs., was cast by George Mears, Whitechapel, for the clock of the Houses of Parliament, under the direction of Edmund Beckett Denison, Q.C., in the twenty-first year of the reign of Queen Victoria, and in the year of our Lord MDCCCLVIII." Diameter of bell, 9 feet; and height outside, 7 feet 6 inches. (See Oct. 1, 1859.)

23.—The Court of Queen's Bench grant a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, directing the Archbishop of Canterbury to hear Mr. Poole's appeal against the withdrawal of his licence.

— Died at Arundel Castle, aged 68, Admiral Lord Lyons.

25.—Came on in Paris, before the Court of Correctional Police, the trial of the Count de Montalembert, for publishing the pamphlet "Un Débat sur l'Inde" (see May 19, 1858), in which he contrasted English and French institutions in a manner unfavourable to the latter. One passage said to have given especial offence was in these words:—"When I feel the pestilential influence rising higher and higher around me, when my ears ache with the buzzing of anteroom gossips, or the fracas of fanatics who think themselves our masters, or of hypocrites who believe us to be their dupes—when I feel smothered under the weight of an atmosphere loaded with servile and corrupting vapours—I rush to breathe for a time a pure medium, and to take a life-bath in the free air of England. I was unusually fortunate the last time that I gave myself this consolation, and happened to fall into the very midst of one of those grand and glorious debates in which all the resources of intellect and all the emotions of conscience of a great people are brought into play, in which the highest problems which can agitate a nation emancipated from tutelage are presented to be elucidated in broad day by the intervention of great minds; where men and things, parties and individuals, orators and writers, depositaries of the powers of the State and organs of public opinion, are called upon to reproduce in the heart of a new Rome the picture drawn of old, by a Roman fresh from the moving incidents of the Forum—"Certare ingenio, contendere nobilitate, &c." M. Montalembert declined to withdraw or apologize for any statement in the pamphlet, and pleaded, both personally and through his eloquent advocate, M. Berryer, that it was not in excess of what was permitted by the Constitution. The President, addressing M. Berryer, said, "The court has suffered some very warm expressions and some very lively allusions to pass, but I am obliged to stop you in the dangerous course you are pursuing. You plead for the writings of M. De Montalembert; you renew the offence in endeavouring to justify it." M. Berryer.—"Allusions, M. le President! My language has betrayed me if it has in any way hid my thoughts." (Laughter.) The President.—"I cannot allow you to say that there is no longer liberty in France." M. Berryer.—"Ah! M. le President, if it be so, if it be necessary to deny what is clearer than the light of day, if it be necessary to lie, to lie towards my intelligence, to lie towards my conscience, I have nothing else to do but to be silent; I have nothing to do but to sit down and throw up my brief." The President.—"No, M. Berryer, you will not lie. In 1811, when you became a member of that bar which you have rendered illustrious, you took an oath which you have since renewed—an oath to observe the respect due to the laws; you have always observed that oath, and you will keep it also to-day." M. Berryer.—"I remember my oath: but you make me shudder, M. le President; you carry back my thoughts to a time when the praise of a good man, the approval of a virtue, of a good sentiment, of a good law, was not considered as a crime. No, I do not wish to recall that period to your memory,—legimus capitale fuisse. No, I do not consent that the praise of a free Government should be considered as an insult, for the reason alone, that this Government contrasts with the present institutions of France. This praise in the mouth of M. De Montalembert was altogether patriotic." M. Berryer then examined in detail the different heads of the accusation, and argued that no one of them was borne out by any passage in the article. Coming to the most important count in the indictment, that of an attack on "the rights of the Emperor under the Constitution and the principle of universal suffrage," he asserted that the Chief of the State was neither named nor designated. Not only so, but there was not a scrap of law to support the charge. The prosecution has recourse, in order to punish the pretended offence, to the laws of 1848 and 1849. . . . "Ah! gentlemen, do not regard as a crime our legitimate regrets. We are already far advanced in life, we have but a warmth which is passing away, allow us to die tranquil and faithful. We are sufficiently unfortunate in seeing our cause, our holy and glorious cause, betrayed, vanquished, denied, insulted. Suffer us to believe that we can preserve for it an inviolable attachment in the bottom of our hearts. Suffer us to think so. Suffer us to say so. Allow us to preserve and to recall the remembrance of those great combats of eloquence which have made known to us, and have caused us to love, the generous institutions which we have defended, which we will always defend, and to which we will be faithful to our very last hour." The judges, after deliberating an hour, inflicted a fine of 6000 francs, and ordered the Count to be imprisoned for six months. An appeal was made against the sentence, pending which the sentence was cancelled by the Emperor. The Count insisting on his right of appeal was again convicted, but had the sentence finally remitted on the 21st of December.

26.—At a court-martial at Chatham, Private Thomas Tole, late of the 1st battalion 7th Royal Fusiliers, was found guilty of deserting to the Russians from the army before Sebastopol. He was sentenced to penal servitude for life.

28.—Sunday evening service celebrated for the first time under the dome of St. Paul's. The Bishop of London preached on the occasion to a crowded and attentive audience.

29.—Mr. W. E. Gladstone, M. P., arrives at Corfu as Lord High Commissioner Extraordinary to the Ionian Islands. On the 3d he addressed the Senate in explanation of the object of his mission. "It avoided," he said, "every ulterior question that could derogate from the relations in which, by the consent of so many great States, England and the Islands have been reciprocally placed. The liberties guaranteed by the treaties of Paris and by Ionian law are, in the eyes of her Majesty, sacred. On the other hand, the purpose for which she has sent me is, not to inquire into the British protectorate, but to examine in what way Great Britain may most honourably and amply discharge the obligations which, for purposes European and Ionian, rather than British, she has contracted."

30.—Concluded in the Divorce Court, after a hearing of eight days, the case of Marchmont v. Marchmont, in which the wife, formerly the widow of a tavern-keeper in Threadneedle-street, who left her 50,000*l.*, petitioned for a judicial separation from her husband, formerly an Independent minister at Islington, on the ground of cruelty. The evidence showed that from the day after the marriage the respondent had indulged in a course of systematic cruelty in word and deed, threatening often, if she did not accede to his demands for money, that he would murder her. A plea of condonation was entered for the respondent, but it was not established. Judicial separation granted.

— Accidents by fire to the voluminous folds of ladies' dresses becoming lamentably frequent.

December 1.—A deputation of merchants and others wait upon the Premier, for the purpose of urging him to concede a protectorate to British interests at Saráwak. Earl Derby was unfavourable to the proposal, as likely to involve this country in difficulties with a district not absolutely surrendered to the British Crown.

— Meeting in Willis's Rooms, with speeches by the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Oxford, "to direct attention to the providential openings recently made for the introduction of Christianity into China and Japan."

2.—A sentence of indefinite suspension passed by a majority of bishops of the Scotch Episcopal Church, upon the Rev. Mr. Cheyne, Aberdeen, for teaching that there was a substantial presence in the Eucharist.

3.—The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland issues a proclamation against societies of a seditious or treasonable character, and offers a reward of 100*l.* for such information as would lead to the conviction of parties administering unlawful oaths.

11.—Explosion at Tyldesley Colliery, near Leigh, causing the death of all employed in the pit—25 in number. The workings were generally considered dangerous, and many of the workmen had from time to time withdrawn in alarm.

16.—At York Assizes two cases of the murder of sweethearts were tried. The first, Atkinson, of Darley, a person of weak intellect but easily excited, who had cut the girl's throat in eight different places, and then threw her into a ditch, was acquitted on the ground of insanity. The other, Whitworth, of Threap-ham, who made a brutal attack with a knife on the young woman, inflicting injuries from which she died in a few days, was found guilty, and sentenced to be executed.

— The Times, giving expression to an opinion current in commercial circles as to the suspicious manner in which the firm of Overend, Gurney, and Co. appeared from recent examinations in bankruptcy to be mixed up with the fraudulent warrant transactions of Cole, Davidson, and Gordon, Mr. D. B. Chapman, of the firm of Overend, writes to-day, that "it was most painful to us not to divulge the fraud under which we were suffering; but its magnitude took it out of the course of all ordinary proceedings, and compelled us to have consideration for our own position with the public." On this the Times remarks, "We cannot admit that because a large sum was at stake this house was justified in confederating with swindlers in the circulation of false securities. We cannot allow that the laws that protect property do not apply to very large transactions, or that magnitude in the operation converts wrong into right. There is something dramatic in the comicality of Mr. Chapman selling these fictitious warrants, and starting at the idea of 'defiling himself' with a distillery." In another communication Mr. Chapman denied that any of the warrants had ever left their possession after the discovery of the fraud, and instructions were at once issued to the junior partners on no account to part with them. In delivering judgment in the case of Davidson and Gordon, on the 5th of January, Mr. Commissioner Goulburn expressed it as his opinion that Mr. Chapman was an accessory after the fact to a most gross and wicked fraud. In his examination Mr. Chapman had stated: "Mr. Gordon called at our office, and I said to him, 'I should like to go through your warrants with you.' He assented: upon which I called Mr. Bois, who brought a parcel of warrants. Upon turning them over, we observed three warrants endorsed by a most respectable house—Messrs. Gregson and Co. I immediately said, 'It is impossible there can be anything wrong with such warrants as these;' upon which Gordon said, 'No; there is nothing wrong with the warrants: but the fact is, I have shipped the copper.' I was shocked. He stood before me in a different light, and has done so ever since." Again, in answer to Mr. Linklater's searching questions, the witness said, "When these warrants were applied for by the parties of whom we received the money, it appeared that there was not a sufficient quantity of spelter on the wharf to satisfy them. There were only eighty-two tons. Mr. Cole sent his clerk to inform us that he could not supply the spelter, unless we paid him 15*l.* a ton, because he had abstracted the spelter and borrowed 15*l.* a ton upon it. We said we would have nothing to do with Hagen's wharf, but if he would bring our warrants with the parties' receipt upon those whose money we had obtained, we would pay the 15*l.* a ton. We did not pay the money until the warrants were returned to us. The purchasers of our warrants never became aware they were of so doubtful a character." In answer to the question, whether the mode in which he carried out the transaction was to conceal the fact that the warrants were of a fictitious character, Mr. Chapman said, "I really must decline to answer that question. I only know the object was to fulfil our contract with the man whose money we had received."—"This," wrote the Times, returning to the charge, "is the evidence upon which we formed our opinion, that Mr. Chapman, acting for Overend and Gurney, did pass away for valuable consideration warrants which he knew to be of a fictitious character."

20.—Final suppression of the Indian mutiny. The Commander-in-Chief writes to the Governor-General that "the campaign is at an end, there being no longer even the vestige of rebellion in the province of Oude; and that the last remnant of the mutineers and insurgents have been hopelessly driven across the mountains which form the barrier between the kingdom of Nepal and her Majesty's empire of Hindostan."

21.—Fall of Beacon-terrace, Torquay. Two of the occupiers were found crushed to death in their beds, two others sustained severe fractures, and many sustained lesser injuries from the falling mass.

22.—Tried at the Middlesex Sessions Thomas William Capron, charged with assaulting Mr. Mowbray Morris, manager of the Times. The two parties appeared to have been friends some years ago, hunting and dining together; but eventually Capron's jealousy was raised by Morris's conduct towards his wife, and the acquaintance terminated in October 1852. On the 6th November last Morris was to be married; and the defendant selected the previous evening to perpetrate the outrageous assault with which he was now charged. He took a cab, tracked Morris from place to place, till he found him at the house of his intended wife's brother; and, encountering the object of his search, struck him over the head with a stick, remarking, "I hope I have now given him two black eyes to go to the church with." In explanation of the alleged improper intimacy with Mrs. Capron, pleaded in extenuation, it was submitted in evidence that Morris was instructing her as a friend in an action for divorce she had raised on the ground of cruelty. The jury found Capron guilty, and he was sentenced to twenty-one days' imprisonment, a fine of 50*l.*, and ordered to find sureties in 1,500*l.* to keep the peace.

27.—Accident at the Victoria Theatre, caused by a panic-stricken crowd from the gallery meeting on the staircase with a crowd waiting for admission to the new pantomime of "Harlequin True Blue." Fifteen lads were crushed or trampled to death, and thirty were picked up maimed or insensible.

January 1.—Estrangement between France and Austria. Earl Cowley writes from Paris to the Earl of Malmesbury:—"It is the custom of the Emperor, when the diplomatic body wait upon his Majesty on the occasion of the new year, to say a word or two to each of them individually. This afternoon, when his Majesty approached the Austrian ambassador, he said, with some severity of tone, that, although the relations between the two empires were not such as he could desire, he begged to assure the Emperor of Austria that his personal feelings towards his Majesty remained unaltered." On the 3d Earl Cowley writes:—"The words spoken by the Emperor to the Austrian ambassador during the reception of the diplomatic body by his Majesty on New Year's Day, to which I had the honour to call your Lordship's attention in my despatch of the 1st instant, have, of course, been commented upon, with the usual additions and exaggerations that accompany the repetition of verbal statements, and have occasioned considerable disquietude in the public mind. Yesterday evening, at the Empress's reception, the Emperor accosted M. de Hübner with his usual affability; and it may be hoped, therefore, that this incident will be forgotten." The Moniteur of the 7th contained the following:—"Public opinion has been agitated for some days past by alarming reports, to which it is a duty of the Government to put an end by declaring that nothing in our diplomatic relations authorizes the fears to which these reports tend to give birth." On the 3d there was a fall of 1 per cent. on the French Bourse.

3.—Accident at the Polytechnic Institution, Regent-street, caused by the falling of the geometrical stone staircase when the audience were leaving in the evening. About 40 people were injured, but in only one case did the injuries result in death.

4.—At Agecroft Colliery, Pendlebury, near Manchester, the cage bringing seven workmen up the shaft is brought into collision with the gearing over the pit-mouth, and falls down the shaft, a distance of 360 yards. All its occupants were killed on the spot.

11.—The saw-grinders of Sheffield attempt to blow up the house of a workman named Linley, on the ground that he was injuring their union.

12.—The Earl of Malmesbury writes to Lord A. Loftus at Vienna:—"Her Majesty's Government entertain but little doubt that if Austria and France—the former an Italian, and both Catholic States—laying aside mutual suspicion, were to join heartily with a view to promote, by peaceful means, the regeneration of Italy, their combined influence would speedily effect a change in the present unhappy state of affairs, and contribute to establish confidence between rulers and their subjects. Her Majesty's Government have not failed to press upon the Government of France considerations such as these; and they have not hesitated to express their conviction that France, though she may have no material stake at issue, could have little or nothing to gain in an Italian war. As the common friends, then, of both parties, and as sincerely desirous of the welfare of the Italian people, her Majesty's Government entreat the two imperial courts to lay aside their animosities, and to act in peaceful concert for that important object. Her Majesty's Government think that it would not only be becoming in Austria, from her peculiar position in Italy, but also advantageous to her in the public opinion of Europe, if she were to make the first advances, and propose to the French Government to join with her in considering the best means of reforming the glaring abuses in the Papal dominions which occupy central Italy. Austria is an Italian state, and both France and Austria are now occupying the Papal territories with their troops. Such a position cannot be lasting, and her Majesty's Government submit to both Austria and France that it is their public duty to terminate, if possible, a state of things which has become intolerable."

17.—In addressing the electors of Bradford, in St. George's Hall, Mr. Bright gives an outline of a new Reform Bill which he thought would settle the question for some time, and be satisfactory to a large section of the community, —a franchise to be based on rating; 56 boroughs to cease to return members, and 30 to be reduced from two to one member, the available number to be conferred on the large boroughs and cities.

21.—Died, aged 81, Henry Hallam, historian of the Middle Ages, the Revival of Letters, and the English Constitution, and father of Arthur Hallam, the subject of Tennyson's In Memoriam.

23.—During a heavy gale on the south coast of England, the steamship Czar, of 937 tons, loaded with Government stores, shot, and shell for Malta, foundered off the Lizard, and the commander, his wife and son, passengers, and several of the crew, in all fourteen persons, perished with her.

25.—The centenary of the birth of Robert Burns celebrated with almost universal rejoicing throughout Scotland, the enthusiasm being naturally greatest in places associated with the life of the poet by birth or residence. Among the most popular of the English gatherings was the "Burns Festival" at the Crystal Palace, where a prize poem, by Miss Isa Craig, was recited in memory of the poet.

27.—In consequence of the Ministerial proposals regarding the extension of the county franchise, Mr. Walpole proposes to withdraw from the Cabinet. Writing to Lord Derby, he says:—"I regret to say that I am about to take the most painful step which I have ever had to take in the whole of my life. I am going to request you to place my resignation in her Majesty's hands, because I find it utterly impossible for me to sanction or countenance the course of policy which the Government have now determined to adopt on the important subject of Parliamentary Reform. When you were so good as to ask me to join your Administration, I told you I thought I had better decline. I then foresaw that there were one or two questions with reference to which I might not be able to agree with my colleagues. On being assured, however, that, if that should happen, there would be nothing dishonourable to you or to them in asking leave to retire, I consented again to bear my part in the arduous task which the Queen was pleased to invite you to undertake. Parliamentary Reform was one of those questions; and it is now quite clear that I cannot hope to come to an agreement with the majority of the Cabinet. The reduction of the county occupation-franchise to a level with that which exists in boroughs is utterly contrary to every principle which the Conservatives as a party have always maintained. It is a complete destruction of the main distinction which has hitherto been recognised and wisely established between the borough and the county constituencies. It is to my mind a most dangerous innovation, by giving to temporary and fluctuating occupations a preponderating influence over property and intelligence, while it throws large masses into the constituencies, who are almost exempt from direct taxation, and therefore interested in forcing their representatives to fix that taxation permanently on others. I will not dwell upon other points, for this is enough. But I cannot help saying that the measure which the Cabinet are prepared to recommend is one which we should all of us have stoutly opposed if either Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell had ventured to bring it forward. Under all these circumstances, I have no alternative but to repeat the request with which I commenced; and I shall therefore consider myself as only holding the seals of office until you can conveniently fill up my place." Mr. Walpole was succeeded at the Home Office by Mr. Sotherton Estcourt. Mr. Henley retired at the same time.

27.—The members of the Ionian Legislative Assembly pass a resolution declaring for a union with Greece. Next day Mr. Gladstone, who was then discharging all the duties of Lord High Commissioner, induced the Assembly to appoint a committee to proceed in the usual way by petition, memorial, or representation, to the protecting Powers. Her Majesty afterwards declined to grant the prayer of the petition, but caused her representative to submit a scheme of reform assimilating the Constitution as far as possible to that of a British colony with responsible government.

28.—The Court of Queen's Bench, without hearing Mr. Poole's counsel, decide that he is entitled to be heard by the Archbishop on his appeal against the suspension of his licence for alleged irregularities regarding the use of the confessional.

29.—Inauguration of Wellington College by the Queen, the fabric being the result of a public subscription to commemorate the great Duke.

30.—The Princess Clotilde, eldest daughter of the King of Sardinia, married to Prince Napoleon, cousin of the Emperor Napoleon.

February 1.—In the Divorce Court, the first case under the Legitimacy Declaration Act was made in the intricate and voluminous Sheddon suit; the petitioners, William Patrick Ralston Sheddon, and his daughter, Annabella Jean Ralston Sheddon, praying that the marriage of the parents of the first-mentioned, which took place in America, might be declared valid. A final order as to the omission from the citation of a person since dead was made.

2.—Sir Henry Storks appointed Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands.

—The West Highland Crinan Canal destroyed by the bursting of one of the reservoirs employed to feed it. After an unprecedented wet season, about eight o'clock this evening one of the reservoirs above Cairnban becoming overcharged suddenly burst and precipitated itself into the one beneath; the contents of both then bounded into a third, and with a roar which shook the country for miles around an avalanche of water, rocks, and earth rolled down the mountain side, furlowing a deep watercourse in its way, and instantly obliterating the canal under a mountain of rocks and stones. The water shed off in great fury, one part finding an outlet into Loch Fine, near Lochgilphead, and the other rushing over the Crinan morass into the western sea. In the course of the session Parliament voted 12,000*l.* to restore the canal to its former efficiency.

3.—Parliament opened by the Queen in person. In addressing the Commons, her Majesty said:—"The universal introduction of steam-power into naval warfare will render necessary a temporary increase of expenditure in providing for the reconstruction of the British navy; but I am persuaded that you will cheerfully vote whatever sums you may find to be requisite for an object of such vital importance as the maintenance of the maritime power of the country." It was also intimated that their attention would be called to the state of the law regulating the representation of the people. In both Houses the Address was agreed to without a division.

7.—The convict-hulk system being now abolished, the staff of the Stirling Castle, the last employed in the service, was broken up to-day.

9.—In the case of Colonel Dickson v. the Earl of Wilton, heard in the Court of Queen's Bench, the jury return a verdict for the prisoner, with damages of 200*l.* for the slander spoken to Mr. Duncombe, in which the Earl charged the Colonel with having instigated the creditors of the regiment to take legal proceedings against himself, and 5*l.* each for the two letters charging the Colonel with misappropriating the mess funds.

11.—Debate in the Commons on the proposed plan for rebuilding the India Office, several members objecting to the Gothic style adopted, as also to the additional expense thereof.

14.—Lord Stanley, the new Secretary of State for India, after making a statement regarding the financial condition of the country, asks the House to authorize a loan to the Government of India of 7,000,000*l.* The proposal was assented to, and a measure founded thereon was afterwards carried through both Houses.

22.—The steam-tug Black Eagle explodes in Cardiff dock, causing the death of five persons on board.

—Mr. Mackinnon, M. P., obtains leave to bring in a bill to establish councils of conciliation and arbitration to adjust differences between masters and operatives.

—The Pope declares his willingness to permit the French and Austrian troops to leave his territories.

24.—Mr. Caird's motion in the House, to the effect that it would be advantageous to the public interest to publish periodically the agricultural statistics of Great Britain, as respects the extent of acres under the several crops of corn, vegetables, and grass, lost by 163 votes to 152.

25.—Lord Palmerston, in a crowded House, called attention to the present aspect of continental affairs. He thought there was no sufficient cause for war. The present troubled state of Europe he attributed to the jealousies between France and Austria, brought into action by their occupation of the Roman States. Mr. Disraeli replied:—"I have the satisfaction of informing the noble Lord and the House that we have received communications which give us ground for believing that both Austria and France will evacuate the Roman States with the concurrence of the Papal Government. Under these circumstances, Lord Cowley has been sent to Vienna on a confidential mission. I cannot inform the House of the precise character of that mission, but I may say, generally, that it is one of peace and conciliation."

26.—A fire broke out in the shop of Reeves, eating-house keeper, Great James-street, Marylebone, in which he, with the whole of his family, and a nurse, perished.

—The Calais packet, Prince Frederick William, is driven ashore at Calais, when endeavouring to enter the harbour in a ground swell. During the excitement caused by the occurrence, some of the passengers entered a life-boat sent from the shore; but it capsized in the confusion, and three of those on board were drowned. The most of the passengers and crew in the packet-boat remained by her till ebb tide, when they all got ashore in safety.

26.—The Hon. D.E. Sickles, of New York, a member of Congress, shoots Philip Barton Key, lawyer, in the streets of Washington, the ground of offence being a systematic career of guilty intercourse with his young wife. At the trial, the jury returned a verdict of Not guilty against Sickles; and popular favour manifested itself so strongly on his side, as to make the journey from the court to his house an enthusiastic ovation. He afterwards publicly announced that his erring wife was once more under her husband's protection.

— The Armstrong gun introduced into the artillery service of Great Britain.

— Lord Cowley sets out on a special mission to Vienna, to mediate between Austria and France, in reference to the affairs of Italy.

28.—In the House of Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer states the intentions of Government with respect to the representation of the people. "It is proposed," he said, "not to alter the limits of the franchise, but to introduce into boroughs a new kind of franchise, founded upon personal property, and to give a vote to persons having property to the amount of 10*l.* a year in the funds, bank stock, and East India stock; a person having 60*l.* in a savings' bank would, under the bill, be an elector for the borough in which he resided; as also recipients of pensions in the naval, military, and civil services amounting to 20*l.* a year. Dwellers in a portion of a house whose aggregate rent was 20*l.* a year would likewise have a vote. The suffrage would also be conferred upon graduates of the universities, ministers of religion, members of the legal and medical professions, and certain schoolmasters." In considering the county franchise, he reviewed the controversy respecting the Chandos Clause in the Act of 1832. To terminate the heart-burnings arising from it, and to restore the county constituency to its natural state, and bring about a general content and sympathy between the different portions of the constituent body, the Government proposed to recognise the principle of identity of suffrage between the counties and towns. They also proposed that Boundary Commissioners should visit the boroughs in England, re-arrange them, and adapt them to the altered circumstances of the times; their appointment to be delegated to the Enclosure Commissioners. The effect of giving to counties a 10*l.* franchise would be, according to the estimate of the Government, to add to the county constituency 200,000.

March 1.—Mr. Walpole and Mr. Henley state to the House of Commons their reasons for retiring from the Government of Earl Derby.

1.—The English Government having requested the Cabinet of Sardinia to state in express terms what were the particulars of the general complaint against Austria in respect of Italy, Count Cavour responds to the invitation, showing in a lengthy and ably-reasoned State paper how Austria had abused the powers within the territories which she held by treaty, and overawed States in which she could not even plead treaty rights. He thought that the danger of a war or revolution might be warded off, and the Italian difficulty practically solved, by the following changes:—"By obtaining from Austria, not in virtue of treaties, but in the name of the principles of humanity and eternal justice, a national and separate Government for Lombardy and Venetia. By requiring, in conformity with the letter and spirit of the Treaty of Vienna, that the domination of Austria over the States of Central Italy should cease, and, consequently, that the detached forts constructed outside the walls of Piacenza should be destroyed; that the convention of the 24th of December, 1847, should be annulled; that the occupation of the Romagna should cease; and that the principle of non-intervention should be proclaimed and respected. By inviting the Dukes of Modena and Parma to give their people institutions similar to those existing in Piedmont; and the Grand-Duke of Tuscany to re-establish the Constitution to which he had freely consented in 1848. By obtaining from the Sovereign Pontiff the administrative separation of the provinces beyond the Apennines, in conformity with the propositions communicated in 1856 to the Cabinets of London and Paris. May England obtain the realization of these conditions! Italy, relieved and pacified, will bless her; and Sardinia, who has so often invoked her co-operation and assistance in favour of her unfortunate fellow-countrymen, will vow to her an imperishable gratitude."

7.—An American merchant-vessel puts into Cork harbour with Baron Pœrio and sixty-six other Neapolitan exiles on board. They had been permitted to leave Naples in virtue of what the King called an act of grace, on condition that they would transport themselves to America for the term of their natural life. They afterwards compelled the captain to alter his course to an English port. The exiles were received with all the sympathy due to their unmerited suffering.

— Kerry Assizes opened for the trial of the Phoenix conspirators. In the first case against O'Sullivan, the jury were unable to agree on a verdict, and were discharged. On the 30th he was found guilty and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

— Mr. Walpole's Church Rates Abolition Bill thrown out on the second reading, by 254 to 171.

9.—Earl Cowley reports to the Earl of Malmesbury the result of his conferences with the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs:—

“With respect to the reform of administration to be introduced into the Roman States, Count Buol expresses himself willing, either to resume the negotiation which had been commenced with the French Government upon that subject in 1857, but afterwards allowed to drop by that Government, and not by him, or to fall back upon the recommendations made by the five Powers to the Pope in 1831-32. He prefers the latter measure, because he thinks it more likely to be attended with success.

He would not, however, object to the former; but in that case the proposal must come from the French Government. The matter stands thus: France had made certain propositions to Austria, to which counter-propositions had been offered; but Austria had never been able to obtain the opinion of the French Government upon those latter. She had more than once asked for that opinion; and it remained with the French Government to take the next step. Upon the third point mentioned in your Lordship's despatch of the 22d ult., namely, a security for the better relations between the Governments of Austria and Sardinia, Count Buol says, that your Lordship must address yourself to Turin. It is not, he maintains, from the conduct of Austria that the present critical state of affairs has arisen, but from the ambitious and encroaching policy of Sardinia. Austria desires no better than to renew those amicable relations which had for so many years united the two Governments, but it could only be done on one condition—a complete change of external policy on the part of the Sardinian Government. With the internal policy of Sardinia Austria had nothing to do, and has no desire to interfere. Count Buol gives the further assurance that Austria, notwithstanding the provocations which she has received, has no intention of attacking Sardinia, as long as the Sardinian troops keep within their own territory; but he insists that as long as Sardinia remains armed there can be no security for peace.”

19.—The Dutch barque Butavia destroyed by fire in the Mersey, with a cargo of silk, cloth, and fine goods, valued at 16,000*l*.

21.—On the motion for the second reading of the Reform Bill, Lord John Russell moved, “That it is neither just nor politic to interfere in the manner proposed in the Government Bill with the freehold franchise, as hitherto exercised in the counties of England and Wales; and that no readjustment of the franchise will satisfy the House or the country, which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure.” The debate was adjourned over several evenings, and ended in the defeat and dissolution of the Ministry.

23.—In the case of the Rev. Mr. Poole, accused of introducing the practice of the confessional at St. Barnabas's, Pimlico, the Archbishop of Canterbury, before whom the case came up on appeal by mandamus from the Court of Queen's Bench, pronounces a decision confirmatory of that of the Bishop of London revoking Mr. Poole's licence.

25.—In the adjourned debate on the Government Reform Bill, Lord Palmerston, in supporting Lord John Russell's resolution, said:—“Some persons say the Ministry will resign. Sir, I believe no such thing. (Laughter.) I think it will be a dereliction of duty on their part if they do resign. I do not want them to resign. (Laughter.) I say to them, as I think Voltaire said of some Minister who had incurred his displeasure, ‘I won't punish him; I won't send him to prison; I condemn him to keep his place.’ (Much laughter.) They took the government with its engagements. They undertook a measure of reform, and they will be finching from their duty to the Crown and the country if, in consequence of such a vote as that proposed by my noble friend, they fling up their places, and throw upon us the difficulty of dealing with this subject. (Hear! and a laugh.) They have advantages which no other Government would enjoy in settling the question. It is their duty to settle it, and therefore I say—not meaning, I can assure them, any uncivil taunt—I do not believe they will resign; I have too good an opinion of them to think they will shrink from the performance of the task which they have deliberately undertaken. But, then, it is said they may dissolve. Well, I have no greater faith in their dissolving than in their resignation. (Cheers and laughter.) I am of this opinion, because to dissolve Parliament at the present moment implies more than the single will of the Government. The concurrence of this House is necessary to its own dissolution. The state of public business is such that, before the Government dissolve, it would be indispensable to take another vote in supply, to pass the Appropriation Act, the Ways and Means Act, and to make provision for certain Exchequer Bills which fall due in May. Now, all these operations require the hearty concurrence of this House; and are the Government, I should like to know, sure of obtaining that concurrence? (Cheers.) In ordinary cases, I am quite ready to admit, when a question arises out of the contests of two political parties—when that question is one, for instance, relating to our foreign relations—a question of peace or war, or one of general policy, with respect to which the Government and the majority of the House of Commons may disagree—it would be a perfectly constitutional course for them to pursue to appeal to the country, and that the majority by whom their conduct happened to be censured should afford them every facility in making that appeal; that, however, is not the present question. Is it right, I ask, that the Government should throw the British Constitution to be scrambled for and discussed upon every hustings throughout the country? (Cheers.) Is that the course which a Conservative Administration thinks it its duty to pursue? (Renewed cheers.) I do not believe, Sir, they would act so if they could; and I believe they could not if they would."

26.—Heard before the Master of the Rolls the case of Bradbury and Evans v. Dickens, being an action to restrain the popular novelist from announcing in his advertisements of All the Year Round that Household Words would be discontinued. Mr. Dickens consented in future advertisements to use the phrase "discontinued by him."

28.—1,800*l.* subscribed at a meeting in Willis's Rooms to liquidate the debt on the buildings of the London Mechanics' Institution in Southampton-row, and release Lord Brougham and other trustees from pecuniary responsibility.

— In answer to a question by the Earl of Clarendon regarding Lord Cowley's mission to Vienna, Lord Malmesbury said:—"Unless some untoward and almost impossible accident should occur, we may hope that peace will not be broken, and that the Congress which will probably assemble at the end of next month will eventuate in those results which your Lordships and all Europe desire."

— The body of the great anatomist, John Hunter, raised from its original resting-place in the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, was this day re-interred with honour in Westminster Abbey on the north side of the nave, between Wilkie and Ben Jonson.

29.—In the adjourned debate on the second reading of the Reform Bill, Mr. Gladstone, who opposed both the Bill and Lord John Russell's resolution, made an appeal in favour of continuing the smaller boroughs. "Allow me," he said, "in explanation of my meaning, to state the case of six men—Mr. Pelham, Lord Chatham, Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Canning, and Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Pelham entered this House for the borough of Seaford in 1719, at the age of twenty-two; Lord Chatham entered it in 1735, for Old Sarum, at the age of twenty-six; Mr. Fox in 1764, for Midhurst, at the age, I think, of twenty; Mr. Pitt in 1781, for Appleby, at the age of twenty-one; Mr. Canning in 1793, for Newport, at the age of twenty-two; and Sir R. Peel in 1809, for the City of Cashel, at the age of twenty-one. Now here are six men, every one of whom was a leader in this House. I take them because the youngest is older than the youngest of those who now sit here, and because the mention of their names can give rise to no personal feeling. Here are six men whom you cannot match out of the history of the British House of Commons for the hundred years which precede our own day. Every one of them was a leader in this House, almost every one of them was a Prime Minister. All of them entered Parliament for one of those boroughs where influence of different kinds prevailed. Every one of them might, if he had chosen, after giving proof of his powers in this House, have sat for any of the open constituencies of the country; and many of them did so. Mr. Pelham, after sitting for Seaford in one Parliament, represented Sussex for all the rest of his life. Lord Chatham never, I think, represented an open constituency. Mr. Fox, after sitting for Midhurst, became the chosen for Westminster. Mr. Pitt went from Appleby at a very early age to the University of Cambridge. Mr. Canning went from Newport to Liverpool, and Sir R. Peel from Cashel to the University of Oxford. Now, what was the case of Sir R. Peel? The University, on account of a conscientious difference of opinion, refused the continuance of his services. They might have been lost to the British Parliament—at that moment at all events. But in Westbury he found an immediate refuge—for so it must be called: and he continued to sit for a small borough for the remainder of his life. Mr. Canning, in the same way, not losing but resigning the representation of Liverpool, found it more conducive to the public business that he should become the representative of a small borough for the rest of his days. What does this show? It shows that small boroughs were the nursery-ground in which these men were educated—men who not only were destined to lead this House, to govern the country, to be the strength of England at home and its ornament abroad, but who likewise, when once they had an opportunity of proving their powers in this House, became the chosen of large constituencies, and the favourites of the nation. . . . I agree with the hon. member for Birmingham that we should endeavour to settle this question in a spirit of trust towards the people, and we are getting all the proceedings of legislation more and more upon that sound and satisfactory basis. I am convinced such will be the only principles upon which this House will act whenever it comes to deal decisively and conclusively with the particulars of a measure of reform. But I entreat the hon. member not to use his influence—to whatever other purpose he may apply it—to procure a postponement and a prolongation of these discussions. (Cheers.) For my own part, I can most freely say, that the vote which I shall give will not be with any regard to the Government or to party; and I trust I have given no offence to any one by the remarks which I have addressed to the House. I accord fully to every other member that which I humbly and respectfully claim for myself, after a perhaps too prolonged but at the same time honest and free expression of my sentiments; and I shall vote to negative the resolution of my noble friend, because I am sure by that vote we shall best discharge the great duty that is incumbent upon us as chief among the guardians of the British Constitution and the welfare of the British dominions."

29.—Gavazzi riots in Galway. The lecturer was obliged to take refuge in the police barracks.

30.—Explosion at the powder works of Curtis and Harvey, Hounslow. Of the press-house, where the explosion originated, nothing remained to mark the site but a huge hole in the ground. Several men employed in the corn-ing-house were killed, the scattered fragments of their bodies being gathered together into a promiscuous heap to await a coroner's inquest.

31.—Defeat of the Derby Ministry at the close of the debate on the second reading of the Government Reform Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wound up with a speech of great vigour against Lord John Russell and his resolution. "There was one quality," he said, "which had rather marred than made his fortune—a sort of restlessness which will not brook that delay and that patience which are sometimes needed in our constitutional government for the conduct of public affairs. The moment that the noble Lord is not in power he appears to me to live in an atmosphere of coalitions, combinations, coups d'état, and cunning resolutions. (Cheers and a laugh.) An appropriation clause may happen to every man once in his life. But there is only one man living of whom it can be said that in 1835 he overthrew the Government of Sir R. Peel upon an impracticable pretext; that in 1852 he overthrew the Government of Lord Derby with an objectless coalition; that in 1855 he overthrew the Government of Lord Aberdeen by a personal coup d'état; and that in 1857 he overthrew the Government of the member for Tiverton by a Parliamentary manœuvre. (Cheers.) Now, I beg the noble Lord at this moment to throw the vision of his memory back for an instant to the year 1852. He sat before me then the head of a mighty host. He drew the fatal arrow that was to destroy our Government. He succeeded. He destroyed in breathless haste the Government of Lord Derby; but did he destroy anything else? Did he not destroy, also, the position of a great statesman? Did he not destroy almost the great historic party of which he was once the proud and honoured chief? (Cheers.) The noble Lord does not sit opposite me now; but had he not hurried the catastrophe of 1852, and had he bided his time according to the periodic habit of our Constitution, he would have returned to these benches the head of that great party of which he was once the chief and greatest ornament. . . . With regard to the more important branch of foreign affairs, I can say truly, although we had an inheritance of trouble, and although, probably, during the period of our official existence we have had as many difficulties to contend with as could well fall to the lot of any Ministry—although during the last three months the question of peace or war has sometimes appeared to be that only of a moment—still we have so managed affairs that all immediate dangers seem to have vanished, and there is a prospect of arrangements which, if concluded, will in my opinion lead to a permanent and a happy peace. (Cheers.) I have touched on our affairs under these principal heads. I will now allude to others of great, but not of so great importance. We have endeavoured to introduce measures which would make law reform not merely a mockery and a by-word. If we are indebted for the pacification of India to the wisdom of her ruler and valour of her chief, at least it must be acknowledged that the Administration did support these men by sending out to them, under great difficulties, such supplies of valiant soldiers as secured the triumphs which were achieved. The noble Lord has talked, and he always does talk, about a dissolution of the present Parliament. These are words that cannot escape my lips; and I must, with the permission of the House, refrain from touching upon such a theme. But I may be permitted to say, in answer to the noble Lord, that, if in the course of time the present servants of the Queen find themselves upon the hustings before their constituents, I, for one, have that confidence in a great and generous nation, that I believe at such an hour they will not forget the difficulties under which we undertook the administration of affairs, nor perhaps be altogether unmindful of what, under such difficulties, we have accomplished for their welfare. (Cheers.) It is by our conviction in the justice of the people of England, it is because we believe in the power of public opinion, that we have been sustained in this House during our arduous struggle, and are sustained even at this moment amid all the manœuvres of Parliamentary intrigue and all the machinations of party warfare." It was a quarter to one o'clock when the House proceeded to a division amid a scene of intense excitement. The numbers were—for the second reading of the bill, 291; for Lord John Russell's resolution, 330: majority against Ministers, 39. As the numbers were announced, the House rang with a triumphant shout from the Opposition. After a short irregular discussion on an amendment regarding the ballot, which Mr. Wyld sought to push to a division against the wishes of many friends of the measure, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "It will perhaps be convenient to know that I shall propose that this House at its rising do adjourn until Monday."

April 1. — At the Liverpool Assizes, James William Mitchell, engineer, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for causing the death of Lauder, a stoker on board the Bogota steamer, trading between Panama and Valparaiso, in so far as he had assisted the chief engineer (not in custody) in confining the unfortunate man in the stoke-hole, where he was literally roasted to death; the horrid fact being seen and heard by many of the crew.

— The lion's van of Wombwell's menagerie upset in a storm at Holywell, North Wales. The exhibitor and three boys killed.

4.—Intimation made in both Houses of Parliament, that in consequence of the defeat sustained on the Reform Bill, on Tuesday night, the Ministry had resolved on advising an appeal to the country. The necessary measures would, therefore, be proceeded with as early as possible in anticipation of a dissolution. Lord Derby said, it was not upon this or that measure of reform the appeal was to be made; for after the vote in question the Government felt themselves at perfect liberty to reconsider the whole question without prejudice. "We appeal to the people whether, as lovers of fair dealing and plain and straightforward conduct in public men, they will sanction the overthrow of a Ministry who, in honourably endeavouring to discharge their duty, have fallen, not in pursuance of a difference of opinion brought forward in fair Parliamentary conflict, but who have been overthrown in consequence of the success—the undesired, but I will not call it the unanticipated success—of what I must be permitted to term an ingenious manœuvre." Speaking of the Reform question, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:—"There is the Conservative view of the question, and there is—not to use the epithet in the least degree offensively—the revolutionary view of the question. That is to say, there is that Conservative view which, in any change that it recommends, would wish to preserve and maintain the present character of the House of Commons, which is a representation of the various interests and classes of the country; and there is that revolutionary view which would attempt to alter the character of the House of Commons, and make it a representation merely of the voice of a numerical majority." Reserving to the Government to deal hereafter with this question as it thought fit, Mr. Disraeli thought at present it had fulfilled its pledge at great personal and party sacrifices, and he would not enter into any further specific engagements on that head.

6.—Twenty-six lives lost in the Mair Colliery, Neath, by an irruption of water into the workings.

9.—The Times publishes an alarming telegram, dated Vienna, last night. "The long-expected crisis is at hand. A corps of 50,000 men goes from this city to Italy to-morrow and on following days. Another corps of 60,000 men is to be assembled here. A reserve corps of 70,000 men will be placed in Bohemia and Moravia. The reserves of the army in Italy and of the army corps about to leave this city have been called in." Though the intelligence was received with suspicion, it was known that events were transpiring which in all likelihood would make it only premature. Consols fell from 95½ to 94½.

11.—At Ramsgate, near the Dumpton-stairs, the naked body of a man was discovered, under circumstances leading to the belief that a cruel murder had been committed. The left hand was cut off at the wrist, the four fingers were cut off from the right hand, the ring finger was cut off between the first and second joints, and in the breast was a deep stab, the immediate cause of death. The inquiries before the coroner made it more than probable that the deceased had committed suicide, and destroyed his clothing, ring, carpet-bag, and all other articles on which his person could be traced, for the purpose of avoiding identification. Evidence was adduced to show that he was probably a Dutchman named Matterig.

12.—The Queen in Council orders the Archbishop of Canterbury to prepare a form of prayer and thanksgiving for the constant and signal success obtained by the troops in India, whereby the blessings of tranquillity and order had been restored to her Majesty's subjects in the East.

— Meeting at Willis's Rooms, in support of the Drinking Fountains movement. The first in the metropolis was erected on the 21st, near the corner of St. Sepulchre's churchyard, at the expense of S. Gurney, M.P.

13.—David Ritchie, secretary to the Committee of the Treasury at the Bank of England, killed in King William-street, by a cask of wine falling on him from the top of a loaded waggon.

—Died, aged 76, Lady Morgan, novelist.

14.—Don Arrom de Ayala, Spanish consul for Australia, commits suicide by discharging a pistol through his head in Blenheim Park. "My Lord," he writes to the Duke of Marlborough, in a letter found on the body, "I humbly ask your Lordship's pardon and forgiveness, for the great liberty I have taken in coming to put an end to my dreary and miserable existence in your park. It may be a childish feeling, but one cannot blow his brains out in a common road, on one of those cultivated fields full of cottages, and life, and civilization, and railways, and establishments of all kinds, of which your blessed country of England abounds. So I have not found another proper place to die decently than your handsome park, and you must bear the inconvenience of a dead man in your grounds. I mean no offence. I have yesterday visited your house, hoping that the sight of good things, and chiefly good paintings, would do me good, and soften the wild ideas that had led me to put an end to my life; but all of no use. Your manor is one of the most noble, splendid things I ever saw in my life, and I have travelled about and seen everything worth seeing. You have the finest Rubens that can be seen: that should have a great attraction for me under other circumstances, but now they have been of no use!"

— The thanks of both Houses of Parliament were voted to the various civil functionaries, and to the army in every rank, native and European, for the eminent skill, courage, and perseverance during the military operations by which the late insurrection in India had been effectually suppressed.

15.—Explosion of a boiler at Edwards' Spinning Mill, Scouringburn, Dundee, occasioning the loss of nineteen lives, and serious injury to fourteen others, besides the damage to property. Most of those killed were either scalded to death or crushed by the falling material. At the moment of the explosion the entire building above the boiler perceptibly rose into the air, and fell down a mass of ruins to the ground.

—Oxford and Cambridge boat-race on the Thames at Putney, won by Oxford; the Cambridge boat swamped by a steamer.

18.—Tantia Toppee, the only Indian rebel who had gained a name for generalship in the field, hanged at Sepree, in terms of the finding of a court-martial.

—Discussion in the House of Lords on the present state of Europe. Lord Malmesbury stated that Government had endeavoured to mediate between France and Austria, by sending Lord Cowley on a special mission to Vienna. On his return he found that negotiations had been going on between France and Russia during his absence, the consequence of which was a proposal from Russia that a Congress of the five great Powers should be held. Her Majesty's Government accepted this, but difficulties arose, which existed up to this time, regarding the composition of the Congress and the disarmament of the antagonistic Powers. The Government regretted that their efforts had not been more successful in averting a war, which would be no common one, but a theatre for every wild theorist and unprincipled adventurer. The discussion turned chiefly on the position taken up by Sardinia in the contest. "England," said the Earl of Derby, "is deeply interested in the maintenance of peace. She is prepared to make almost any sacrifice for that object; but, in the interest of peace, she cannot assume a position which would place her in a helpless and defenceless condition; and if a war broke out, whatever be the consequences, our neutrality, as long as it may last, must to a certain extent be an armed neutrality, enabling us to take our part on that side, whatever it may be, which the honour, the interests, and the dignity of the country may indicate as deserving our support."

19.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. The official notice by which Parliament was dissolved appeared in the Gazette on the 23d. The writs for new elections were also issued on the same day.

20.—Meeting at Rochdale to promote the return of Mr. Cobden, then absent on private business in America. Mr. Bright spoke vigorously on behalf of his friend.

—Election addresses. Lord John Russell wrote to the electors of London that if returned again it would be his endeavour to procure the immediate enactment of a sound, moderate, and constitutional measure of Reform. "In all that I have said I have refrained from attributing unworthy motives to the Ministry. The tendency of measures we can discuss; the motives which inspire them we cannot. To accuse men in power of clinging to office, and men out of power of seeking place, is the common language of all times. It is difficult to be sagacious and clear-sighted; it is easy to be suspicious and uncharitable." To the electors of Tiverton Lord Palmerston said, the question was whether the bill proposed by the Government was a good or a bad bill. Noticing the plea urged on behalf of Government that it was desirable they should hold office during the delicate negotiations now going on with continental Powers, his Lordship wrote:—"A Government to be listened to with deference abroad ought to have strength and stability at home. But the present Administration exhibits itself to Europe at the outset of an approaching Congress as having an irreconcilable difference with Parliament, of whose assistance it will have deprived itself during what may be a critical period of the negotiation."

21.—Threatened rupture between France and Austria. The Duke of Malakhoff (Pélissier) writes from the French Embassy, London, at 8 this morning, to the Earl of Malmesbury:—"It has become impossible to understand the proceedings of Austria. A despatch, which left Paris half an hour after midnight, reached me this morning before five o'clock. I did not wish to have you awoke, and I transmit it to you at a rather more convenient hour. 'Austria has just addressed a summons to Sardinia. Count Buol having communicated it to the English Minister, you will know its exact terms through Lord Malmesbury. To answer in such a manner the mediating proposition of England, accepted by France, Russia, and Prussia, is to take the whole responsibility of the war. I hope that the Cabinet of London will look upon it in this light. Report to me what they think of it. Public opinion in England will stigmatize, I hope, the conduct of Austria in this circumstance.' I shall have the honour of waiting upon you, my dear Count, as soon as you express the wish." Lord Malmesbury writes on the same day to Lord A. Loftus at Vienna:—"A meeting of the Cabinet was held as soon as possible after the receipt of your Lordship's telegram of yesterday afternoon, announcing that a summons to Sardinia to disarm had been despatched from Vienna in the previous night; and, on its breaking up, I desired your Lordship, by telegraph, to acquaint Count Buol that her Majesty's confidential servants had determined to protest, in the strongest manner, against the step taken by Austria, which they looked upon as inevitably involving the early breaking out of war in Italy. By this precipitate step the Cabinet of Vienna forfeits all claim upon the support or sympathy of England, whatever may be the consequences that may ensue from it; and her Majesty's Government see only one means of averting the calamities with which Europe is threatened. That result might possibly be attained, if the Austrian Government would declare its readiness to act on the principle to which the Plenipotentiaries acceded in the Conferences of Paris of 1856; and her Majesty's Government still cherish the hope that Austria may even now be induced, according to the terms of the 23d Protocol of the 14th of April, to refer her differences with other Powers to the friendly mediation of an impartial and disinterested ally."

23.—Baron de Kellersberg arrives at Turin with a summons from the Austrian Government calling upon Sardinia to disarm, under the threat of immediate hostilities if she refused to comply. To this peremptory demand Count Cavour transmitted, on the 25th of April, a reply to Count Buol, at Vienna, in which he said:—"The question of the disarmament of Sardinia, which constitutes the groundwork of the demand which your Excellency addresses to me, has been the subject of numerous negotiations between the great Powers and the Government of his Majesty. These negotiations have ended in a proposition made by England, to which France, Prussia, and Russia have adhered. Sardinia, in a spirit of conciliation, accepted it without reserve or arrière-pensée. As your Excellency cannot be ignorant either of the proposition of England, or of the reply of Sardinia, I could not add anything to make known to you the intentions of the Government of the King as regards the difficulties which might prevent the meeting of the Congress. The conduct of Sardinia in these circumstances has been appreciated by Europe. Whatever may be the consequences it may lead to, the King, my august master, is convinced that the responsibility will fall upon those who were the first to arm, who refused the propositions made by a great Power, and deemed just and reasonable by the others, and who now substitute a threatening summons in their stead." The next day, King Victor Emmanuel issued a proclamation to his troops:—"Soldiers! Austria is increasing her armies on our frontier, and threatens to invade our territory, because here liberty reigns with order, because not might, but concord and affection between the people and the sovereign here govern the State, because the groans of oppressed Italy here find an echo: and Austria dares to ask us, who are armed only in self-defence, to lay down our arms and submit to her clemency. That insulting demand has received the reply it deserved: I rejected it with contempt. Soldiers, I tell you this, because I know that you will take an insult to your king and to your nation as an insult to yourselves. The announcement I make to you is the announcement of war! Soldiers, to arms!"

— The French army of Italy leaves Paris to aid the Sardinians, disembarking at Genoa on the 25th.

27.—Revolutionary outbreak at Florence, and flight of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. A provisional government administered the affairs of the duchy till the 11th of May, when a Commissioner was appointed by the King of Sardinia, with the approbation of the Tuscan people.

— Austria commences hostilities by moving her army across the Ticino into Piedmontese territory.

— Intelligence from Vienna that France and Russia had agreed upon the terms of a treaty offensive and defensive. A third edition of the Times announced, "The British Government has offered its direct mediation between Austria and France upon the basis of Lord Cowley's proposals. Austria having accepted this offer, has postponed the declaration of war for a day or two. The French troops are now crowding into Sardinia." The Times added, from another source, "France has declined the offer made by the British Government."

28.—The Emperor of Austria issues a proclamation announcing his intention to invade Sardinia, "to put a stop to the hostile acts which for a series of years have been committed against the indisputable rights of my Crown." Count Buol wrote in defence of the step:—"The Sardinian Government has abused the national feeling of the Italian races. All the germs of discontent in Italy were long assiduously cultivated, and as soon as they began to spring up, Piedmont took the field as the champion of all Italian nationalities. . . . Austria is a Conservative Power, and religion, morality, and historical rights are sacred in her eyes. The possessions of Austria in Italy are guaranteed her by the very Powers which gave Genoa to Sardinia. Lombardy was, during many centuries, a fief of the German empire, and Venice was given to Austria instead of her Belgian provinces. Sardinia tells us that the real cause of the discontent of the inhabitants of Lombardy and Venice is the dominion of Austria on the Po and Adriatic. The right of Austria to Lombardy and Venice is irrefragable, and it will be defended against every attack. France, which long shared with Sardinia the moral responsibility of the sad state of things in Italy, now openly supports the revolutionary movement which has begun. The second French empire is about to realize its long-cherished ideas, for the throned Power in Paris has informed the astonished world that 'political wisdom' will replace those treaties which have so long formed the basis of European international law. The traditions of the first Napoleon have been resuscitated, and Europe is not ignorant of the importance of the struggle which is about to begin."

— The Pomona emigrant-vessel strikes on the Blackwater Bank, Wexford, the sea making a clean breach over her, and sweeping the passengers off the decks. Of 409 persons on board only 23 were saved by launching the whale-boat. The most of those who perished met their end in the fore part of the ship, where their bodies were found in clusters when the vessel slipped off the rock.

28.—Panic on the Stock Exchange, caused by the warlike preparations in France and Austria, the first-named Power proposing to raise a loan of 20,000,000*l.* and the second of 6,000,000*l.* There was a fall of 6 per cent. in English Stock, and of from 8 to 20 per cent. in Foreign Stock. Consols, which at the opening of the week were 93 $\frac{3}{4}$, fell to-day (Thursday) to 88 $\frac{1}{4}$; Exchequer Bills, from 35*s.* to 5*s.* prem. It was calculated that within twenty-four hours the depreciation in the value of stock and shares amounted to 50,000,000*l.* On Wednesday seven heavy failures were announced, to-day eighteen, and next day nineteen. The Bank advanced the rate of interest from 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and next week to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Within ten days confidence was in a great measure restored, it being then made known that this country did not intend to take any part in the contest in Italy, and that the French loan was likely to be all taken up in France.

— Sir Moses Montefiore obtains an interview with Cardinal Antonelli on the subject of the Jewish youth Mortara, who in June last had been removed by priests from the dwelling of his father, at Bologna, and placed beyond paternal control. The plea for this proceeding was, that the child had been secretly baptized some years previously; but, on the other side, relatives alleged that, if the ceremony had ever been gone through at all, it must have been by an illiterate servant who was herself only about fourteen years of age, and was otherwise done under circumstances which rendered such ceremony invalid and illegal by the laws of the Pontifical Government. Sir Moses was unsuccessful in his mission.

30.—Few of the elections during this month excited more than a local interest. At Carlisle, Sir James Graham, in reply to the taunt of being a "weathercock," said:—"No Church-rates shall be levied in Carlisle on my account, even to place me on the top of a church steeple. But there is a place which I am anxious to occupy, and it is for you to say whether that shall be or not. The place I desire to occupy is at the top of the poll; and by the weather-cock at Carlisle, when we come here on the day of election, when the hustings are open and the poll is closed, we shall then see which way the wind blows, and whether the weather-cock is placed at the top of the poll or not."—Lord Stanley was proposed by the Conservatives for London, but withdrawn early. Mr. B. Osborne was defeated at Dover by the Conservative Sir H. Lush, of the Admiralty; and Mr. Hudson, at Sunderland, by Mr. Lindsay.

At Birmingham, the Conservative candidate, T. D. Acland, could not obtain a hearing, and polled only a third of the votes given to Bright and Scholefield. At Tiverton, Lord Palmerston reviewed the policy of the Government as a mediating Power, and censured them for deference shown to Austria. At Aylesbury, Mr. Disraeli described the war as arising out of the present condition of Italy, and stated that, though the policy of England was one of peace, it was of the utmost importance she should be prepared for war. He believed the result of the elections would be a considerable gain to the Ministry. The final result showed that they won twenty-five seats.

May 1.—In consequence of an outbreak among the Sardinian Annexationists, the Duchess Regent of Parma is compelled to withdraw from her capital. She returned in a few days, and issued a proclamation to her subjects; but the complications which arose were so serious, that she was once more compelled to retire to neutral territory to await the issue of the war.

— General thanksgiving for the restoration of tranquillity to England.

3.—The Albert Bridge, at Saltash, designed by Brunel to carry the Cornwall Railway across the Tamar, opened by Prince Albert. It embraces within the two spans a distance of 2,240 feet, and is of a height sufficient to permit the largest vessels to sail beneath it without any impediment in the highest tides.

— The French Emperor directs a communication to be made to the Corps Législatif announcing the commencement of war with Austria. "That country," he said, "in causing her army to enter the territories of the King of Sardinia, our ally, declares war against us. She thus violates treaties and justice, and menaces our frontiers. All the great Powers have protested against this aggression. Piedmont having accepted the conditions which ought to have ensured peace, one asks, What can be the reason of this sudden invasion? It is that Austria has brought matters to this extremity, that she must either rule up to the Alps, or Italy must be free to the shores of the Adriatic; for in this country every corner of territory which remains independent endangers her power. Hitherto moderation has been the rule of my conduct; now energy becomes my first duty. Let France arm, and resolutely tell Europe, 'I desire not conquest, but I desire firmly to maintain my national and traditional policy. I observe the treaties on condition that no one shall violate them against me. I respect the territories and the rights of neutral Powers, but I boldly avow my sympathies for a people whose history is mingled with our own, and who groan under foreign oppression.'"

4.—The Foreign Secretary (Earl Malmesbury) issues a circular to her Majesty's ministers abroad, instructing them as to our position in the probable conflict between France and Sardinia, on the one side, and Austria on the other. —“The negotiations turned generally on two points; the one relating to disarmament, the other to the admission of the Italian States, in some form or other, to the proposed Congress. The Cabinet of Vienna insisted, at first, as an indispensable condition to its entry into the Congress, that Sardinia should, in the first instance, disarm and disband the free corps which she had enrolled; but it finally acquiesced, with some modifications, in a proposal made by her Majesty's Government, and declared it would be contented if a general disarmament were carried out by Austria, France, and Sardinia, previously to the meeting of Congress. The Government of France was prevailed upon to admit, for itself, the principle of a general disarmament; but it hesitated for a long time before it consented to press the acceptance of it on Sardinia; and at length only agreed to do so on condition that the Italian States should be admitted to send representatives to the Congress, not simply as advocates, but as plenipotentiaries, having an equal position and voice with the plenipotentiaries of the great Powers in the deliberations that might ensue. On reviewing the state of the negotiation, her Majesty's Government conceived that there was still a chance of effecting such an understanding between the parties as would ensure the meeting of the Congress; and for this purpose they proposed, on the 18th of last month:—1st. That there should be a previous, immediate, effective, and simultaneous disarmament on the part of Austria, France, and Sardinia; 2dly. That the details of that disarmament should be settled by six military or civil commissioners, to be named severally by the great Powers and by Sardinia; 3dly. That those commissioners having met and entered upon their duties, the Congress should forthwith be convened; and, 4thly. That the Congress, when convened, should invite the Italian States to send representatives, who should be admitted to, and take part in the deliberations of, the Congress, in the same manner and on the same footing as they were admitted to, and took part in the deliberations of, the Congress of Laybach. This proposal was accepted in the main by the Governments of France, Prussia, and Russia, and partly by the Cabinet of Vienna. The latter, however, absolutely refused to agree to the admission of the representatives of the Italian States to the Congress, or to the participation of Sardinia in that assembly, under any conditions whatever. This decision on the part of the Austrian Government put an end to all hope of any Congress being brought together; for, though the point was not again raised, I may as well mention to you that, in an earlier stage of the negotiations, her Majesty's Government and that of Prussia refused to entertain a suggestion made by the Cabinet of St. Petersburg, that, in consequence of the hesitation shown by Austria at that time, England, France, Prussia, and Russia should hold a Congress on the affairs of Italy, without her participation. The refusal of Austria to accept the last proposal of her Majesty's Government was accompanied, on her part, by a peremptory summons to Sardinia to disarm, and to disband the free corps. Her Majesty's Government, on receiving this intelligence, addressed to the Cabinet of Vienna the strongest remonstrances on the impolicy of this proceeding, and directed her Majesty's minister at that court to place on record a formal protest against it. This precipitate measure was the more to be regretted, inasmuch as the Cabinet of Turin, which had previously declined to comply with the combined representations of England and Prussia on the subject of disarmament, had announced, on the very day that the summons was despatched from Vienna, though the Austrian Government were unacquainted with the fact when the summons was despatched, that, as France had united with England in demanding the previous disarmament of Sardinia, the Cabinet of Turin, although foreseeing that such a measure might entail disagreeable consequences for the tranquillity of Italy, was disposed to submit to it. In this state of things, all hopes of accommodation seemed to be at an end: nevertheless, her Majesty's Government resolved to make one more attempt to stay hostilities; and they accordingly formally tendered the mediation of England between Austria and France, for the settlement of the Italian question, on bases corresponding with the understanding arrived at between Lord Cowley and Count Buol, at Vienna. But this too failed; and her Majesty's Government have only to lament the little success which has attended all their efforts, jointly with other Powers or singly, to avert the interruption of the general peace. In the present position of the contending parties, it would obviously be to no purpose to attempt to restrain them from engaging in a deadly struggle. Her Majesty's Government will, however, watch the progress of the war with the most anxious attention, and will be ready to avail themselves of any opportunity that may arise for the exercise of their good offices in the cause of peace. It is their earnest desire and firm intention to observe the most scrupulous neutrality between the contending parties.”

12.—Notice issued from the War Office, sanctioning the formation of volunteer rifle corps, under the provisions of the Act Geo. III.

cap. 54, as well as of artillery corps in towns where there were forts or batteries. The movement for the formation of these corps spread with great rapidity throughout England and Scotland.

12.—Government issue a declaration of neutrality in the war about to commence between Italy and Austria.

13.—At the Central Criminal Court, Wagner and Bateman, pretending to carry on the business of law-stationers, in York-buildings, Adelphi, but in reality known to be chiefs of a gang of forgers, were sentenced to penal servitude for life. Members of the gang of lesser standing were sentenced to terms of penal servitude varying from 10 to 20 years. During the two years the gang was known to carry on its cunningly-devised schemes, it was thought there had been obtained from bankers between 8,000*l.* and 10,000*l.*, while the cheques refused amounted to more than double that sum.

— Fall of a scaffolding at the Westminster Palace Hotel. The workmen commenced as usual at 6 A.M. Many had ascended and were at work on the scaffoldings; some were on the stage laying their courses, others were ascending the ladders; when suddenly, without any apparent cause, the poles snapped like reeds, and the piles of timber and bricks fell with a tremendous crash to the ground, bearing with them the unfortunate labourers. Five were found quite dead, two died after removal, and five others were conveyed to the hospital labouring under severe injuries.

20.—City Non-intervention meeting, presided over by the Lord Mayor, and addressed by M. Kossuth. Other meetings of a similar character were held in different towns of the kingdom.

— First engagement between the French and Austrian troops at Montebello. The Emperor writes in his despatch to the Empress-Regent:—"A body of Austrians about 15,000 strong attacked the advanced posts of the corps under Marshal Bragagny d'Hilliers, but were repulsed by General Forey's division, which behaved admirably, and cleared the village of Montebello of the enemy after an obstinate fight of four hours. The Piedmontese cavalry, commanded by General Gerny, fought with extraordinary energy. Two hundred prisoners were taken, including one colonel. The loss on the French side amounts to 500 killed and wounded. The Austrians have been retreating since yesterday evening."

21.—In a review of Mr. Mill's "Essay on Liberty," in Fraser's Magazine for April, Mr. Buckle brought serious charges against Mr. Justice Coleridge, for his conduct at the trial of Pooley, of Liskeard, in July 1857. The imputations were that Sir John Coleridge was acting in concert with others, and in particular with his own son, the counsel for the prosecution; that he had something to do with getting up the prosecution, and unduly favoured it, because it was instituted by clergymen with whose sentiments he agreed; that he might have refused to put the law in force; and that he acted as he did because the trial took place in an obscure town, and because the prisoner was poor and undefended. To all these charges Mr. J. D. Coleridge, the counsel concerned, gives now an unqualified denial, and shows that Mr. Buckle, instead of having investigated the case for himself, as he alleged, had been content to accept a one-sided statement prepared, in 1857, by Mr. Holyoake.

26.—The Bishop of Aberdeen suspends Mr. Cheyne from the office of the ministry, he "having received the first and second admonitions prescribed by the canon without evincing any regret for the ecclesiastical offences which he has committed."

28.—Completion of the electric telegraph between Suez and Aden. Brigadier Coghlan, the political resident at Aden, sent a message to the Queen, intimating that her Majesty's possessions at Aden were now in telegraphic communication with Egypt. The acknowledgment was received from Suez in less than five minutes.

29.—During a severe storm at Nottingham, Mr. Lowe, of the Beeston Observatory, found hailstones falling from 1 inch to 1½ inch in diameter, the average size of all he saw being half an inch. The shapes were most grotesque.

31.—Battle of Palestro. At seven o'clock, A.M., 25,000 Austrians endeavoured to retake the position of Palestro. The King, commanding the 4th Division in person, and General Cialdini, at the head of the 3d Regiment of Zouaves, resisted the attack for a considerable time, and then, after having assumed the offensive, pursued the enemy, taking 1,000 of them prisoners, and capturing eight pieces of cannon. During the combat at Palestro, another fight took place at Confienza, in which the Austrians were repulsed by the Division Fanti after a two hours' conflict.

— Epsom races; the Derby Stakes won by Sir J. Hawley's Musjid.

June 2.—Burning of the troop-ship Eastern Monarch at anchor, Spithead. She was returning from India with 352 invalid soldiers, 30 women, and 53 children on board, besides her officers and crew. The latter were engaged in the task of furling the sails, when a violent explosion was heard in the after part of the ship. The skylights over the poop were blown out and the poop-ladders carried away. In a moment the whole decks were filled with a choking vapour, and the flames burst out; running like wild-fire along the deck. It was seen in a few minutes that it would be impossible to save the ship; the four boats were then lowered down, and, mainly through the aid of the disciplined soldiers, the whole of the women and children were passed down the sides. Such was the fortitude and humanity of these men, that the loss of life amounted to no more than one woman and five children, killed or suffocated in the explosion, one soldier who died from exhaustion after he was brought on shore, and one child. Assistance presently reached the vessel from Portsmouth, and all hands were taken off, the ship being towed into shallow water off Haslar Hospital, where she burnt to the water-edge. The cause of the explosion was said to be the carelessness of the steward in entering the store-room with a naked light. He was afterwards tried for the offence and acquitted.

4.—Battle of Magenta. "Yesterday," writes the Emperor, "our army was under orders to march on Milan across the bridges thrown across the Ticino at Turbigo. The operation was well executed, although the enemy, who had repassed the Ticino in great force, offered a most determined resistance. The roadways were narrow, and for two hours the Imperial Guard sustained unsupported the shock of the enemy. In the meantime General M'Mahon made himself master of Magenta. After sanguinary conflicts we repulsed the enemy at every point, with loss on our side of about 2,000 men placed hors de combat. The loss of the enemy is estimated at 15,000 killed and wounded." The Austrian news to the 5th was of an undecided character. The conflict was then represented as still going on. "Eye-witnesses," says the imperial bulletin, "report that our troops join battle with joyous shout, and display endurance and bravery fully worthy of the most famous deeds of the imperial army."

6.—Meeting of the Liberal party in Willis's Rooms, to arrange an immediate vote of want of confidence in Ministers. Among the speakers were Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Mr. Bright, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Horsman, and others.

7.—The swearing in of members being now completed, the new Parliament is formally opened by the Queen in person. The Royal Speech made reference to the war in Italy, where a policy of strict neutrality was to be observed, the renewal of diplomatic intercourse with Naples, and the increase of the navy to an extent exceeding that sanctioned by Parliament. On the subject of Parliamentary Reform her Majesty was made to say:—"I should with pleasure give my sanction to any well-considered measure for the amendment of the laws which regulate the representation of my people in Parliament; and should you be of opinion that the necessity of giving your immediate attention to measures of urgency relating to the defence and financial condition of the country will not leave you sufficient time for legislating with due deliberation during the present session on a subject at once so difficult and extensive, I trust that at the commencement of the next session your earnest attention will be given to a question of which an early and satisfactory settlement would be greatly to the public advantage."

7.—Commencement of a no-confidence debate in the House of Commons. On the motion for the Address, the Marquis of Hartington moved, "That it is essential for the satisfactory result of our deliberations, and for facilitating the discharge of your Majesty's high functions, that your Majesty's Government should possess the confidence of this House and of the country; and we deem it our duty respectfully to submit to your Majesty that such confidence is not reposed in the present advisers of your Majesty." The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that it would be advantageous to the country to know whether they possessed the confidence of the House or not. Defending the conduct of the Government after the vote on the resolution of Lord J. Russell, he commented with sarcastic severity on the speech of Sir James Graham at Carlisle, the reckless statements of which, at first reading, he professed to have attributed to the young gentleman whom Sir James was then introducing to the borough.—"When I read that charge upon the Ministry, which, I was told, was to be the basis of a vote of want of confidence, and which was made without the slightest foundation, and with a bitterness which seemed to me to be perfectly gratuitous, I naturally said, 'Young men will be young men.' Youth will be, as we all know, somewhat reckless in assertion, and when we are juvenile and curly—(laughter)—one takes a pride in sarcasm and invective. (Laughter). One feels some interest in a young relative of a distinguished member of this House; and although the statements were not very agreeable to her Majesty's Ministers, I felt that he was a chip of the old block. (Great laughter and cheers.) I felt—and I hope my colleagues shared in the sentiment—that when that young gentleman entered this House, he might, when gazing upon the venerable form and listening to the accents of benignant wisdom that fell, and always fall, from the right hon. gentleman the member for Carlisle—(laughter)—he might learn how reckless assertion in time might mature into accuracy of statement—(laughter)—and how bitterness and invective, however organic, can be controlled by the vicissitudes of a wise experience. (Laughter and cheers.) Yet the statements made in that speech of the right hon. gentleman have been circulated in every form, and for a time have been credited in every quarter in this country. . . . They have believed that the allowance to innkeepers for the billeting of soldiers was absolutely increased at the arbitrary will of a War Minister in order to bribe the publicans to vote for Government candidates—(laughter)—though every gentleman in this House must be perfectly aware that their predecessors had passed the Act by which that increase of allowance was constitutionally made, and that the increase had been for some time in operation. The public did believe that barracks were built and contracts given, when contracts were never entered into and when barracks were never built. (Hear! hear! and a laugh.) The public really did believe that my Lord Derby had subscribed—had boasted, to use the language of the right hon. gentleman, of having subscribed—20,000*l.* to a fund to manage the elections. (A laugh.) Lord Derby has treated that assertion with silent contempt. (Cheers.) All the other assertions made at the time have been answered in detail, and therefore I suppose he thought the time would come when he could leave it to me to say for him, what I do say now, that that statement was an impudent fabrication. (Loud and repeated cheers.) The conduct of foreign affairs was made another ground of censure on the Ministry. How could an opinion be formed before the papers were produced? Was success to be the only test of ability in negotiations? Were there no unsuccessful negotiations previous to the war with Russia? You had then Lord Aberdeen and Lord Clarendon, men of admirable ability and experience, to conduct your negotiations. But had you nobody else? (Laughter.) Why, there was the noble Lord the member for Tiverton, who, like Coriolanus, showed his wounds yesterday, and is an avowed candidate for power. He is of opinion—as some others are, too—that he has some knowledge of foreign affairs, and he takes every opportunity of intimating that he is the only man who can wage war or preserve peace. Lord Aberdeen and Lord Clarendon had the assistance of the member for Tiverton. I will say nothing of the noble Lord the member for London, because his experience as Foreign Secretary is but limited. (Laughter.) Well, what did the member for Tiverton, and Lord Aberdeen, and Lord Clarendon do in the way of negotiation to prevent the war? Why, the sham of these negotiations is really not yet forgotten in England. (Cheers.) The State paper in Vienna is not yet entirely blotted out of the consciousness of the people of this country. (Loud cheers.) You had great advantages, and you signally failed. You had a majority in Parliament, you had wise and experienced statesmen, you had a still greater stake to urge you to exertion and to increase your responsibility, and yet you were utterly discomfited. (Cheers.) You had something yet more than we had with our poor means to preserve peace. You had an Opposition numerous and fairly ambitious, but in the midst of your negotiations that Opposition did not bring forward votes of want of confidence nor propose cunning resolutions to embarrass the public service. (Loud cheers.) We aided you in your difficulties, and supported you heartily and truly. (Cheers, and a cry of 'No'.) Is there any one can murmur 'No'? I defy any man to bring an instance during that war in which we brought forward a single motion to embarrass you; and when by your general misgovernment and misconduct of the war there arose a public outcry which called for your fall, it was a member on your own side of the House who struck the blow, and it was by the votes of several members of the Liberal party that you were ejected from office. (Cheers.) . . . I hardly know who are our rivals: still less do I know who are to be our successors. If it is the noble Lord and his friends, I might contrast his policy with ours, his failures with ours, and make out a case upon which the House might adjudicate. But then the noble Lord—who lives not in the good old days of constitutional rivalry, but in the days of reconciled sections—(a laugh)—will tell the House, 'You cannot judge of my resources by the gentlemen who are sitting near me; others will come to my aid, and by their unquestioned abilities and their varied experience, and with the bright evidence of their triumphant careers, I shall form an Administration which will put you out as the glorious sun does a farthing rushlight—(laughter)—and the whole country will immediately see that they have a strong Government entitled to their confidence.' (Cheers.) There is also the noble Lord below the gangway;—let me look below the gangway. (Lord John Russell here took off his hat and bowed, amid great cheering and laughter.) I see there two of the most eminent members of this House, who have long and frequently been servants of the Crown, and who I know are taking a very active share in the proceedings out of the House. In the days of our youth Willis's Rooms were managed by patronesses. (Laughter.) The distinguished assemblies that met within those walls were controlled by a due admixture of dowagers and youthful beauties—young reputations and worn celebrities—and it was at once the pride of society and the object of ambition for all to enter. (Laughter.) They are the noble Lord the member for the City of London and the right hon. gentleman the member for North Wiltshire who have signed the vouchers for the new contract. (Laughter.) Now Willis's Rooms are under the direction of patrons, and there are two of those patrons below the gangway. (Laughter.) They are two of the most eminent statesmen who are to form this strong Government, before whose celebrity we are to be extinguished. We have some experience of those great statesmen. We know how the noble Lord conducts negotiations. (Laughter.) We know how the right hon. gentleman conducts war. (Laughter.) You say that we have failed in our negotiations, and that we cannot be trusted in the event of possible war. Will the noble Lord and the right hon. gentleman help you much? (Cheers and laughter.) I cannot presume to pursue the research."

7.—The Austrians again defeated at Malagnano.

8.—The French Emperor and the King of Sardinia enter Milan amidst exhibitions of great enthusiasm on the part of the people.

9.—In the adjourned debate on the no-confidence motion, Sir James Graham took occasion to reply to Mr. Disraeli's strictures on his Carlisle speech, and in particular drew the Speaker's attention to the use which had been made of the phrase "impudent fabrication." Mr. Disraeli rose to order, and explained that those words were intended to apply to the authority quoted by Sir James, and not to the honourable Baronet himself. The Speaker also gave this as his impression of the sense in which the words were to be apprehended. The member for Carlisle continued:—"Certainly, Sir, what the right honourable gentleman has said, confirmed by your high and unimpeachable authority, is some satisfaction to my wounded feelings. (A laugh and cheers.) But the right hon. gentleman went on to remark upon the mild influences of age, presenting in his own person a contradiction to the Horatian maxim, 'Senit albescens animos capillus;' because he was an illustration of the fact that one might lose one's curls and still retain one's taste for sarcasm. (Laughter and cheers.) I must say, Sir, on this occasion, that I had the honour of a seat in the House when the right hon. gentleman first took his place in it. I early, indeed immediately, recognised his great abilities, and, without envy, without the slightest grudging, I have watched his rise to his present pre-eminence. But 'intemperate language in a position such as the right hon. gentleman occupies is always a proof to me of a failing cause—(cheers)—and I regard that speech, and those expressions, as a happy omen of the coming success of this motion. (Renewed cheers.) The right hon. gentleman will pardon me if I express to him an opinion. I regard him as the Red Indian of debate. (Laughter.) By the use of the tomahawk he has cut his way to power, and by a recurrence to the scalping system he hopes to prevent the loss of it. (Cheers and laughter.) When the right hon. gentleman uses towards one who offered him no offence—(oh! oh!)—language of the tone and character which he has applied to me, I say this, that I was astonished by the rudeness of the assault—(oh! oh! and cheers)—but I readily forgive it on account of the feeling of anger and of disappointment at blighted hopes by which it was dictated. (Oh! oh! and cheers).

"Nunc ad te, et tua magna, Pater, consulta revertor."

—The House of Lords pronounce a decision in the great Thellusson will case, which had been litigated for the long period of 61 years, at an expense which frustrated the design of the testator to accumulate a series of colossal fortunes for remote descendants. When the case was being argued before the Peers, the following questions, by the advice of the Lord Chancellor, were put to the learned judges who sat as assessors:—

First. Whether the devise by the testator of his lands, tenements, and hereditaments, after the decease of the several persons during whose lives the rents and profits of the same were directed to be accumulated (if it had been a devise of legal estates), to the eldest male lineal descendant then living of Peter Isaac Thellusson, and Charles Woodford Thellusson, and Charles Thellusson respectively, in tail male, is capable of an intelligent construction, or is void for uncertainty? Second. If at the time directed by the testator for the division of the estates into three lots, and for the conveyance to be made thereof, Peter Isaac Thellusson had had three sons, all of whom were dead, and the eldest of the three sons had left a son under age, and the second son had left a son 21 years of age, and the third son had left a son 30 years of age, and supposing it had been a devise of legal estates, which of the sons of the three sons would have been entitled to take under the devise? The learned Lords, having taken time to consider, delivered their several opinions. In answer to the first question, they were unanimous that the devise was capable of an intelligible construction. With regard to the second question, there was a diversity of opinion; but the majority concurred in holding that the word "eldest," used in the will as descriptive of the person who is to take a lot as a purchaser, when the time of accumulation ceased, does not mean the oldest man among his male lineal descendants, but that the testator meant and intended that the person who would be heir-at-law of Peter Isaac in tail male should take one of the lots as purchaser, by the designation of his eldest male lineal descendant. The property thus fell to the surviving heir of the elder branch, Charles Thellusson.

9.—In the Court of Common Pleas, the judges decide against the claim set up by the new Earl of Shrewsbury to the estates which had heretofore descended with the title. Bertram Arthur, the last Earl of Shrewsbury, of the Roman Catholic line, conceiving himself to be relieved from the disabilities imposed by the conditions and limitations contained in the deeds before referred to, went through the legal form of "suffering a recovery," executed a disentailing deed, and by his will devised his estates to trustees in trust for various persons, but chiefly for a younger son of the Duke of Norfolk. The Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot sought to recover the estates from the trustees by an action of ejectment in the Court of Common Pleas, asserting the subsistence and continuing validity of the restraints on alienation imposed by the Parliamentary Settlement, and denying the validity of the act of the deceased Earl. Since the proceedings on the claim to the earldom had established that Earl Talbot was the heir in tail male of the first Earl, and, therefore, now Earl of Shrewsbury, the controversy was reduced to the legal question of the validity and effect of the several deeds and settlements referred to. A formal verdict was, therefore, taken for the plaintiff, with leave reserved to the defendants to move the court to enter the verdict for them if it should so appear to the court after cause shown. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn concluded an elaborate analysis of the case in these words:—"It seems to me that we must decide in favour of the plaintiff, and discharge the rule; and I have the less reluctance in doing so, because I feel satisfied that this decision is in conformity with the justice and equity of the case. I will not say that there was a family compact, if that expression is objected to, but I think it clear, upon all the facts, that there was a parliamentary compact in this case. The Catholic tenants, whether for life or in tail, under the Settlement of 1700, found themselves in a position in which the enjoyment of their estates might at any moment be invaded and interfered with by the Protestant next of kin. They desired to enjoy immunity from this unhappy state of things. At that time of day, when men had not learned the great and salutary lesson that they may worship the same God side by side, according to their respective faiths and forms of worship, in amity and peace, people did not foresee that a time would come when those penal laws which the animosity of religious warfare, and the struggle, as it were, of life and death, for the existence of the one religion or the other, if they did not render necessary, at all events excused, would in process of time become unnecessary and would be repealed. At that time, when every one looked forward to the continuance of those laws, it was a matter of the greatest possible moment and importance to these Roman Catholic proprietors to receive protection and immunity against the operation of the then existing law, which disabled them from enjoying their estates. They obtained that protection through the intervention and influence of one who was interested in a particular settlement of these estates. They obtained it through the special legislation of Parliament at his instance and procurement. They obtained it, however, as I read the Act of Parliament, on the condition that the estates should be inalienable, except on a contingency at that time most improbable—namely, the conversion at an early age of the successors of those to whom the estates stood limited from the Catholic to the Protestant faith. Under this private and special legislation the Roman Catholic proprietors enjoyed those estates during a long series of years, when, but for it, their enjoyment and possession might at any moment have been interfered with in a manner most prejudicial and disastrous to themselves." The rule nisi obtained by the defendants to enter the verdict for them was therefore discharged.

10.—Defeat of Lord Derby's Ministry. On this the third evening of the debate on the amendment to the Address a division took place showing a majority of 13 against the Government, in a House of 637, the largest recorded in any recent division. The remaining members were thus accounted for: Speaker, 1; double return (Aylesbury), 1; vacant (Cork), 1; absent Liberals, 10; absent Conservatives, 4; total, 654. The result was received with prolonged cheering by the Opposition. When it had somewhat subsided, Mr. Disraeli moved that the House at its rising adjourn to twelve o'clock on Saturday, by which time the Committee now to be appointed might be prepared with their report on the Address. After a scene of great excitement the House broke up about half-past 2 A.M.

11.—Repeatedly defeated with great loss in the open field, the Austrian force withdraws for protection within the Quadrilateral.

12.—The mail-steamer Alma wrecked on a reef forming part of the desolate Isle of Harnish, one day from Aden. The whole of the passengers and crew were conveyed to the island, where they suffered considerably for four days, till relieved by the war-steamer Cyclops. The India and China mail was saved, but the most part of a valuable cargo and all the passengers' luggage was destroyed. The certificate of Davies, the chief officer in charge, was suspended for a twelvemonth, the main charge against him being carelessness in failing to consult his chart.

—Fire in Perth, destroying nearly the whole of Kinnoul-street and the south side of Union-street.

13.—The rumours in connexion with the formation of a new Ministry received an extraordinary addition to-day in the shape of a detailed account of the private interview, which had taken place on the afternoon of the 11th, between her Majesty and Earl Granville. "Her Majesty," it was said, "after listening to all the objections which Lord Granville had to offer, commanded him to attempt to form an Administration, which should at once be strong in ability and parliamentary influence, and should at the same time comprehend within itself a full and fair representation of all the sections into which the Liberal party has notoriously been divided. Feeling, probably, that it might be urged as an objection to this course that Lord Granville, who has never yet held the office of Prime Minister, would thus be placed in a position paramount to that occupied by Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell, who had each filled the office of First Minister of the Crown, and led the Liberal party in the House of Commons, her Majesty was pleased to observe that she had, in the first instance, turned her thoughts towards Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell, each of whom had served her long and faithfully in many high offices of State. Her Majesty felt, however, that to make so marked a distinction as is implied in the choice of one or other as a Prime Minister of two statesmen so full of years and honours, and possessing so just a claim on the consideration of the Queen, would be a very invidious and unwelcome task. Her Majesty also observed that Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston appeared to represent different sections of the Liberal party; Lord Palmerston the more Conservative, and Lord John Russell the more popular section. Impressed with these difficulties, her Majesty cast her eyes upon Lord Granville, the acknowledged leader of the Liberal party in the House of Lords, in whom both Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston had been in the habit of placing confidence, and who might have greater facilities for uniting the whole Liberal party under one Administration than could be enjoyed by either of the sectional leaders."

14.—Diplomatic relations resumed with Naples by England and France.

15.—The Morning Herald, commenting on the ministerial defeat, writes:—"Everything was done to influence waverers; places were promised and rewards freely offered, which were, we fear, in many instances accepted. One case, more flagrant than the rest, demands notice. At the late election Mr. Digby Seymour was returned for Southampton by the aid of the Conservative electors, to whom he had pledged himself not to vote against the Derby Government on the question of Non-confidence. In accordance with this pledge, Mr. Digby Seymour spoke on the first night of the debate in support of Ministers: yet his name figures in the list of the majority against the Government." On Thursday, in consequence, Mr. Seymour applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information against the Herald for libel. He most emphatically and unequivocally denied that he had been swayed as suggested; adding that he stated to the electors of Southampton he would give no "factious vote" against the Derby Government; and in the House of Commons he said that he would vote for the Government unless some promise was given by the Liberal leaders that they were prepared to legislate upon Reform. That promise was afterwards given by Lord John Russell. Lord Campbell said Mr. Seymour had had an opportunity of clearing himself by his affidavit, and had done so; he did not think it a case calling for a criminal information. In an after-dinner speech to his constituents at Southampton, on the 29th September, Mr. Seymour explained that he had, on the 10th, sent a note to Sir W. Hayter, asking for an explanation on certain points in Lord John Russell's Reform scheme. He happened to be absent when Lord John was addressing the House; but, from the explanation he received, he was satisfied that his vote should be given to the Opposition.

17.—Mr. Gladstone writes to the Provost of Oriel with reference to his prospects of reelection for Oxford as a member of Lord Palmerston's Cabinet:—"Various differences of opinion, both on foreign and domestic matters, separated me, during great part of the Administration of Lord Palmerston, from a body of men with the majority of whom I had acted, and had acted in perfect harmony, under Lord Aberdeen. I promoted the vote of the House of Commons in February of last year which led to the downfall of that Ministry. Such having been the case, I thought it my clear duty to support, as far as I was able, the Government of Lord Derby. Accordingly, on the various occasions, during the existence of the late Parliament, when they were seriously threatened with danger or embarrassment, I found myself, like many other independent members, lending them such assistance as was in my power. And, although I could not concur in the late Reform Bill, and considered the dissolution to be singularly ill-advised, I still was unwilling to found on such disapproval a vote in favour of the motion of Lord Hartington, which appeared to imply a course of previous opposition, and which has been the immediate cause of the change of Ministers. Under these circumstances it was, I think, manifest that, while I had not the smallest claim on the victorious party, my duty as towards the late advisers of the Crown had been fully discharged. It is hardly needful to say that, previously to the recent vote, there was no negotiation or understanding with me in regard to office; but when Lord Palmerston had undertaken to form a Cabinet, he acquainted me with his desire that I should join it. . . . With respect to Reform, I understood the counsels of Mr. Walpole and Mr. Henley, and I believe that if they had been followed the subject of Reform would in all likelihood have been settled at this date, without either a dissolution of Parliament or a change of Administration. But I have never understood the principles on which that subject has been managed since the schism in the late Government. I also think it undeniable that the fact of the dissolution, together with the return of an adverse and now no longer indulgent majority, rendered the settlement of this question by the late Ministers impossible. I therefore naturally turn to the hope of its being settled by a Cabinet mainly constituted and led by the men together with whom I was responsible for framing and proposing a Reform Bill in 1854. . . . I understand that misgiving exists with respect to my sitting in a Cabinet of which Mr. Gibson is a member, and which Mr. Cobden will be invited to join. The very same feelings were expressed, as I well recollect, when the late Sir William Molesworth entered the Cabinet of Lord Aberdeen. Sir William Molesworth never, to my knowledge, compromised his political independence; and these apprehensions were, I think, not justified by the subsequent course of events. . . . Were I permitted the mode of address usual upon elections, I should, after this preliminary explanation, proceed to submit with confidence to my constituents that, as their representative, I have acted according to the obligations which their choice and favour brought upon me, and that the Ministry which has thought fit to desire my co-operation is entitled in my person, as well as otherwise, to be exempt from condemnation at the first moment of its existence. Its title to this extent is perhaps the more clear, because among its early as well as its very gravest duties will be the proposal of a Reform Bill which, if it be accepted by Parliament, must lead after no long interval to a fresh general appeal to the people, and will thus afford a real opportunity of judging whether public men associated in the present Cabinet have or have not forfeited by that act, or by its legitimate consequences, any confidence of which they may previously have been thought worthy."

17.—Lord Derby makes official announcement of the resignation of the Ministry in the House of Lords. He pledged himself not only to abstain from all factious opposition, but to give his successors what support he could consistently with his duty to the country. Lord Derby was aware that the late Ministry had been overthrown, not on any one specific point, but on the broad grounds as to which party should hold office, and he was ready to abide by the result of the contest. He then referred to the report in the Times of the conversation between the Queen and Earl Granville, and expressed his surprise at the publication of matters of so confidential a character. Earl Granville, in reply, said he had asked and obtained permission from her Majesty to state to his political friends the result of what occurred, but it was never intended it should be communicated to any newspaper, nor had he done so. At the same time he could not see that any injury had resulted from the publication, seeing her Majesty appeared therein as desirous as ever of walking in the spirit of the Constitution. Mr. Disraeli made a brief ministerial statement in the House of Commons; but as none of the new Ministers were present, not having undergone the ordeal of re-election, the discussion was comparatively tame. The House adjourned from time to time till the 30th, when Lord Palmerston intimated that, having been entrusted by her Majesty to form a Ministry, he had succeeded in accomplishing the task, and the various offices were now filled up. Lord Granville also made in the course of the same evening such explanations as his negotiations made necessary.

—Warrant issued under the royal sign-manual, dispensing with the forms of prayer hitherto used on the 5th November, 30th January, and 29th May.

18.—The Thames Police-court was occupied during the greater part of this day in granting summonses to Dr. John Godfrey against persons described as disorderly, who met nightly before his house in Mount-place, Whitechapel, and annoyed him by shouts and yells regarding his alleged familiarity with female patients, and in particular by referring to a case of libel against the East London

Observer bearing on his alleged offence, in which case he had lately been defeated.

20.—First council of the new Cabinet held at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, Downing-street. Among the Ministers present were Lord Palmerston; Lord Campbell, Lord Chancellor; Earl Granville, President of the Council; Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord John Russell, Foreign Secretary; Sir G. C. Lewis, Home Secretary; Duke of Newcastle, Cabinet Secretary; Mr. Sidney Herbert, Secretary for War; Sir C. Wood, Indian Secretary; Mr. Cardwell, Secretary for Ireland; Sir George Grey, Duchy of Lancaster; and Mr. M. Gibson, Poor Law Board. Mr. Cardwell was afterwards removed to the latter office, in room of Mr. Milner Gibson, who went to the Board of Trade, in place of Mr. Cobden, who, though designated for this post, afterwards declined to join the Ministry.

—Commencement of the Handel Festival, in commemoration of the centenary of his death, at the Crystal Palace. The central transept was converted into a vast music hall, 360 feet long by 216 wide, containing an area of 77,000 square feet, exclusive of the increased auditorial space gained by the several tiers of galleries. The choir numbered 2,765, and the band 393 performers. The first day was devoted to the "Messiah;" the second to the "Dettingen Te Deum," with selections from "Saul," "Samson," "Belshazzar," and "Judas Maccabæus;" and the third, or closing day, to "Israel in Egypt." On the first day there were present 17,109 hearers, on the second 18,000, and the third 26,826. The receipts of the three days were upwards of 33,000*l.* and the expenses 18,000*l.*

21.—Sir Alexander Cockburn succeeds Lord Chancellor Campbell as Chief Justice of England.

25.—In order to aid Mr. Bruce, who had been detained on his mission to Peking, Admiral Hope makes an attempt to reduce the new forts at the mouth of the Peiho. Among the storming party on shore the casualties amounted to 252 killed and wounded; on board the gun-boats 25 were killed and 93 wounded. Two of the gun-boats, the Plover and Lee, grounded, and fell into the hands of the enemy, and another, the Cormorant, was so damaged by the fire from the forts that she sunk at her anchors. Prince San-ko-lin-tsin immediately forwarded a despatch to the Emperor announcing this victory over the rebellious barbarians. "As the action," he writes, "was about to commence, an officer with a communication from the Tautai of Tien-tsing was sent once more to warn them. The barbarians would not permit the letter to be handed in, and their vessels advancing like a swarm of bees right up to the second fort upon the southern bank, bore straight down upon the iron chains twice; but, being all brought up by these, they opened fire upon our batteries. Our soldiers, pent in as their fury had been for a long time, could no longer be restrained; and the guns of every division, large and small, opened upon all sides, and at evening the fire had not ceased."

25.—Battle of Solferino. The Moniteur despatch says:—"The Austrians, who had crossed the Mincio for the purpose of attacking us with their whole army, have been compelled to abandon their positions and to withdraw to the left bank. They have blown up the bridge of Goito. We have taken thirty cannons, more than 7,000 prisoners, and three flags." The number engaged on the side of the Allies was reported to be 145,000, of whom 16,800 were killed or wounded, and 350 taken prisoners. On the side of Austria 170,000 were engaged, of whom 21,000 were killed or wounded. The Austrian official account said:—"In the afternoon a concentrated assault of the enemy was made upon the heroically-defended town of Solferino. Our right wing repulsed the Piedmontese; but, on the other hand, the order of our centre could not be restored. Losses extraordinarily heavy, a violent thunder-storm, the development of powerful masses of the enemy against our left wing, and the advance of his main body against Volta, caused our retreat, which began late in the evening."

27.—Nomination-day at Oxford University. Mr. Gladstone was proposed in a Latin speech by the Dean of Christ Church, and the Marquis of Chandos by the President of St. John's. The polling commenced the same day, and continued till Friday the 31st, when the voting stood: Mr. Gladstone, 1,050; Marquis of Chandos, 859. Mr. Gladstone polled 28 more votes than in 1853, and the opposition 36 less.

28.—The Galway Company's steamer, Argo, wrecked near Trepassey Bay, Cape Race. The boats were got safely into the water, and conveyed the passengers to a cove about a mile off, without any loss of life, although they endured considerable hardships. In the afternoon the ship fell over, filled, and became a total wreck. The captain's certificate was suspended for six months.

— Between Singapore and Bombay fifty pirates and twelve convicts burst from their confinement on board the Ararat, commanded by Captain Correya, and attempt to take possession of the ship by murdering the crew. Through the energy of the officers the bloody design was frustrated, and, with the exception of such as were shot in the engagement, or leaped overboard, the whole of the desperadoes were driven back to their hold.

29.—Marshal, Mortimer, and Eicke found guilty in the Court of Queen's Bench of trafficking in the sale of army commissions. The indictment was laid at the instance of the Duke of Cambridge.

30.—In explaining the policy of the new Government, Lord Palmerston said that, so far as foreign relations were concerned, "the course which we intend to pursue is that which has been chalked out for us by those who preceded us—a strict neutrality in the contest which is now waging." He promised a Reform Bill early next session.

July 2.—The Gazette publishes the new statutes of nine of the Oxford Colleges—All Souls', New, Balliol, Oriol, Trinity, Worcester, Wadham, Brasenose, and Jesus—as well as two ordinances of a partial character respecting the next election of Fellows at Magdalen and the establishment of a Linacre Professorship of Physiology at Merton.

— Renewal of the controversy regarding the antiquity and genuineness of the manuscript emendations contained within Mr. Collier's Shakspeare, or "Perkins Folio," as it was called, of date 1623. The present possessor of the volume, the Duke of Devonshire, having consented to place it in the hands of the Museum officials for a short time, Mr. N. E. S. Hamilton, of the MS. Department, now writes to the Times that the emendations on the margin could not be older than the date of the present binding, which he thought might be about the middle of George the Second's reign; that a clear examination showed the margin to be covered with half-obliterated pencillings in the undisguised current hand of the present day, and that over these the imaginary ancient corrector had written in a hand of the seventeenth century the emendations which had made the Perkins Folio famous. As touching the good faith of Mr. Collier, subsidiary issues were also raised regarding his alleged discovery of Shakspeare documents in the Ellesmere Collection and at Dulwich College, the originals of which either could not now be seen or did not show passages pretended to have been transcribed from them by Mr. Collier. Mr. Collier defended himself from these imputations by describing the character and history of the disputed folio, showing that he had purchased it from Mr. Rodd in 1849; that, though not noticed by him for years afterwards, the emendations on the margin had been seen at the time by the Rev. Dr. Wellesley, New Inn Hall, Oxford (who now spoke to the fact); that they were also known to have been there by Mr. F. C. Parry, a former possessor of the volume; that, so far as the modern pencillings were concerned, he was certain there were none in the folio prior to the time it passed from the Duke of Devonshire into the hands of the officials of the Museum; and finally, that the emendations were too valuable for any one concerned in them even as suggestions, to throw away the merit on any ancient anonymous writer. On the other points Mr. Collier defended himself by reference to documents yet accessible, and the testimony of critics who had been convinced of their genuineness after careful examination. The Dulwich manuscripts, he averred, were in the condition he had described them at least as far back as 1796; and with regard to the Players' Petition of 1596, if it was a forgery at all, it was a forgery committed long before he set foot within the State Paper Office. For the greater part of a year the controversy was engaged in with all the zeal and ill-feeling characteristic of modern Shaksperian criticism.

4.—Came on in the Court of Exchequer the case of Swinfen v. Chelmsford, being an action raised by the successful litigant in the Swinfen estates' case against Lord Chelmsford, formerly counsel on her behalf, for unduly compromising her claim at Stafford assizes. The plaintiff's second plea involved a serious charge against the judge, Sir Cresswell Cresswell, an allegation being made that, after the commencement of the trial, he clandestinely and illegally communicated with the defendant, her counsel, and gave him to understand that he had formed an unfavourable opinion of the plaintiff's case, and that she would probably lose the verdict, for the purpose of intimidating the defendant and inducing him to compromise the case. This allegation the defendant denied. Damages were laid at 10,000*l.* The jury, on the second day of trial, found a verdict for the defendant, the Lord Chief Baron directing that, as regarded the charge of collusion between the defendant and Sir C. Cresswell, there was no evidence to go to the jury.

5.—Proposed annexation of Savoy to France. Lord John Russell writes to Earl Cowley:—"Her Majesty's Government have learned with extreme concern that the question of annexing Savoy to France has been in agitation. . . If Savoy should be annexed to France, it will generally be supposed that the left bank of the Rhine, and the 'natural limits,' will be the next object; and thus the Emperor will become an object of suspicion to Europe, and kindle the hostility of which his uncle was the victim." On the 8th Earl Cowley writes from Paris:—"In the course of the interview which I had with Count Walewski this afternoon, his Excellency said that I might give your Lordship the assurance that the Emperor had abandoned all idea of annexing Savoy to France."

— Lord Lyndhurst, now in his 88th year, in a long and eloquent address on our relations with the Continent, urges the House of Lords to lend what aid it can to increase our national defences. "If I am asked," he said, in conclusion, "whether I cannot place reliance in the Emperor Napoleon, I reply with confidence that I cannot, because he is in a situation in which he cannot place reliance on himself. He is in a situation in which he must be governed by circumstances, and I will not consent that the safety of this country should be placed on such contingencies. Self-reliance is the best road to distinction in private life. It is equally essential to the character and grandeur of a nation. It will be necessary for our defence that we should have a military force sufficient to cope with any Power or combination of Powers that may be brought against us.

. . . The question of the money expense," said the aged peer, "sinks into insignificance. It is the price we must pay for our insurance, and it is but a moderate price for so important an insurance. I know that there are persons who will say, 'Let us run the risk.' Be it so. But, my Lords, if the calamity should come, if the conflagration should take place, what words can describe the extent of the calamity, or what imagination can paint the overwhelming ruin that would fall upon us! I shall be told, perhaps, that these are the timid counsels of old age. My Lords, for myself I should run no risk. Personally, I have nothing to fear. But to point out possible peril, and how to guard effectually against it, that is surely to be considered, not as timidity, but as the dictates of wisdom and prudence. I have confined myself to facts that cannot be disputed. I think I have confined myself also to inferences which no man can successfully contravene. I hope what I have said has been in accordance with your feelings and opinions. I shall terminate what I have to say in two emphatic words, Ve victis!—words of solemn and most significant import."

7.—An armistice agreed upon between the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of the French, the news causing a rise of 1½ per cent. in Consols. The armistice led to the signing of preliminaries of a treaty of peace at Villafranca on the 11th. The conditions of peace were, "That the two sovereigns will favour the erection of an Italian Confederation. That the Confederation shall be under the honorary presidency of the Holy Father. Austria cedes to the Emperor of the French her rights over Lombardy, with the exception of the fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera, so that the frontier of the Austrian possessions shall start from the extreme range of the fortress of Peschiera, and shall extend in a direct line along the Mincio as far as Grazio; thence to Scorzarolo and Luzana to the Po, whence the actual frontiers shall continue to form the limits of Austria. The Emperor of the French shall hand over (remetra) the ceded territory to the King of Sardinia. Venetia shall form part of the Italian Confederation, though remaining under the Crown of the Emperor of Austria. The Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena return to their states, granting a general amnesty. The two Emperors will ask the Holy Father to introduce indispensable reforms into the States. A full and complete amnesty is granted on both sides to persons compromised in the late events in the territories of the belligerent parties."

12.—Under the influence of the peace news Consols advanced on the London Exchange from 93½ to 96. Turkish and Sardinian securities rose 5 to 7 per cent.

— The temperature of the air in shade to-day was 92½°; and on the 13th and 18th, 93°. The mean temperature of the whole month was 68° 1'.

12.—The Emperor of Austria issues an order of the day:—"My people I found ready for any sacrifice, and sanguinary battles have proved to the world the heroism and contempt of death of my gallant army, which, having to fight in inferior numbers, and after thousands of officers and soldiers have sealed with their blood their faithfulness to their duties, still looks joyfully forth with unbroken strength and courage to the continuance of the struggle. Being left without allies, I only yield to unfavourable political relations, in face of which it becomes my paramount duty not to waste in purposeless efforts the blood of my soldiers, and the sacrifices made by my people. I now conclude peace founded on the Mincio line."

— The Pope protests against any interference by Sardinia in the affairs of the Romagna.

13.—Sir John Trelawny's bill for the abolition of Church-rates read a second time, on the motion of Mr. Dillwyn, by 263 votes to 193. The Ministry generally supported the bill, with the exception of Mr. Gladstone.

— The ecclesiastical property of Mexico confiscated by President Juarez.

14.—Submarine telegraph completed between England and Denmark.

16.—Speaking at the dinner to the late Ministry given in Merchant Tailors' Hall, the Earl of Derby said:—"In my opinion, as I have avowed on former occasions, the late war was commenced upon insufficient grounds, and on false pretexes; for, of all the purposes which were put forward to justify it, there is not one which has been supported or attained by the struggle which has taken place, while there are several which are placed in greater jeopardy than before." Lord Malmesbury said:—"If we had interfered, it must have been by sea: and if our fleet had been added to that of France, how would it have been employed? In bombarding the beautiful city of Venice, and destroying its marble palaces! and for every Austrian killed by our shot, a dozen Italians would have been slain. But, even if we had joined in these operations, and there was to have been an armistice, do you think that we should have been consulted any more than the King of Sardinia, who, as far as we know, after all the achievements of his army in the field, was left in blissful ignorance of the overtures going on between his ally and his enemy—until he was informed that hostilities were at an end? Our admiral in the Adriatic would have suddenly seen a boat approach his ship, bearing a flag of truce, and a French officer would have stepped on board to tell him that as soon as he pleased he might return in all happiness and peace to Portsmouth. (Cheers and laughter.) That would have been our position if we had joined in this war, to judge from the way in which the principal actor in the drama has dealt towards his coadjutors."

— The Emperor Napoleon re-enters Paris after his Italian campaign.

18.—In introducing his Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) said he estimated the revenue for the coming year at 64,340,000*l.*, and the expenditure at 69,207,000*l.*; for the army the expense would be 13,300,000*l.*; and for the navy, 12,782,000*l.* The deficiency of 4,867,000*l.* he proposed to make up by adding 4*d.* to the tax on incomes above 150*l.*; which would produce 4,000,000*l.*, and diminishing the malt credits from eighteen to twelve weeks, which would give 780,000*l.*

19.—Count Cavour withdraws from the Sardinian Ministry, and is succeeded by Ratazzi.

20.—Mr. Charles Kean having retired from the stage, is entertained at a banquet at St. James's Hall, presided over by the Duke of Newcastle.

— Addressing Ministers regarding the close of the Italian war, the Emperor of the French said:—"When we arrived beneath the walls of Verona, the struggle was about inevitably to change its nature, as well in a military as in a political aspect. Compelled to attack the enemy in front, intrenched as he was behind great fortresses, and protected on his flank by the neutrality of the surrounding territory, and about to begin a long and barren war, I found myself in face of Europe in arms, ready either to dispute our successes or to aggravate our reverses. Nevertheless, the difficulty of the enterprise would not have shaken my resolution, if the means had not been out of proportion to the results to be expected. It was necessary to crush boldly the obstacles opposed by neutral territories, and then to accept a conflict on the Rhine as well as on the Adige. It was necessary to fortify ourselves openly with the support of revolution. It was necessary to go on shedding precious blood, and at last risk that which a sovereign should only stake for the independence of his country. If I have stopped, it was neither through weariness or exhaustion, nor from abandonment of the noble cause which I desired to serve, but for the interests of France. I felt great reluctance to curb the ardour of our soldiers, to withdraw from my programme the territory from the Mincio to the Adriatic, and to see noble illusions and patriotic hopes vanish from honest hearts. In order to serve the independence of Italy I made war against the mind of Europe, and as soon as the destinies of my country were imperilled I concluded peace."

21.—The Home Secretary announces that a plan had been suggested by the Corporation of the City of London, by which a considerable portion of the site of Smithfield Market would be rendered available for the purposes of public recreation.

— Resolutions embodying the financial plans of the Government proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and after considerable discussion agreed to.

23.—After a long discussion on the present educational machinery of the country, Mr.

Lowe obtains the consent of the House to a vote of 836,920*l.* for ordinary purposes, and 93,394*l.* for the Science and Art Department.

23.—The House of Commons vote 2,000*l.* for the purchase of Sir George Hayter's picture of the "Opening of the first Reformed Parliament."

24.—The Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Duke of Newcastle and suite, arrives at St. John's, Newfoundland, on a tour through Canada and the United States. Halifax was visited on the 30th; Quebec, August 18; Montreal, August 25; Ottawa, September 1; and Washington, where he was entertained by President Lincoln, on October 3.

— Commencement of a strike among the building trades in the metropolis, which lasted ten weeks, and led to the stoppage of many important works. The claim was for a reduction in the working time to nine hours per day, the wages to continue the same. The intention being to compel the great houses, one by one, to succumb, Messrs. Trollope's was first selected, and 470 men at once ceased working. The other masters, however, in self-defence, soon closed their doors, and kept the unionists out till they had made arrangements for carrying on work, at least on a limited scale, by the aid of non-union men, in terms of the following declaration:—"I declare that I am not now, nor will I during the continuance of my engagement with you, become a member of or support any society which directly or indirectly interferes with the arrangement of this or any other establishment, or of the hours or terms of labour, and that I recognise the right of employers and employed individually to make any trade engagement on which they may choose to agree."

25.—The Sheddon case (see Feb. 1) again before the Court of Probate and Divorce, in the form of a petition under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, praying that William and Arabella Sheddon might be declared the legitimate son and granddaughter of Ann Sheddon, who died at New York in 1798. Miss Sheddon appeared in person to move for a commission to examine witnesses in America with respect to the marriage of her grandfather. This she did with great clearness and ability, saying that the only object which she and her father had in view in presenting the petition was to have the question of their legitimacy or illegitimacy fairly raised and decided, and to remove the stain which had so long rested upon them. The motion was opposed by Dr. Deane on behalf of R. S. and W. Patrick, the heir-at-law and next of kin, on the ground that the question of law, whether the previous decisions of the House of Lords were not a bar to the present proceeding, ought to be determined before the expense of a commission was incurred for the purpose of obtaining evidence upon the question of fact. It was also submitted that, if a commission were issued, the petitioners should be ordered to give security for costs, as the litigation upon the questions raised by the petition had been going on for the last sixty years, and the petitioner, Mr. Sheddon, was liable for a large sum incurred as costs in that litigation, which he was unable to pay. Miss Sheddon having replied, Sir C. Cresswell said he was of opinion that the commission ought to be granted, and he should order it to be issued for the examination of witnesses in New York, without calling upon the petitioners to give security for the costs.

26.—The Moniteur publishes a semi-official article, denying that France had in any way caused burdens to be placed on the English people on account of "national defences," and affirming that the increase had sprung from a pretended exaggeration of French designs.

— Fire in the brandy vaults of the London Dock, destroying fifty casks of spirits.

— Wreck of the Turkish steamer Silistria, twenty-four hours after leaving Alexandria. None of the crew or Turkish passengers afforded the least assistance; the pumps being manned, and the buckets wrought, by the European passengers and twenty-eight Austrian sailors who were on board. The captain, Mustafa Bey, through whose ignorance or carelessness the ship struck, consented to throw overboard a part of the cargo; but the Turkish passengers, in a paroxysm of fanaticism, rose upon the Europeans, and threatened them with the pistol and dagger if they interfered in the management of the ship. They afterwards commenced to plunder in every direction, and threw overboard several of the passengers when attempting to reach the boats. The most of those remaining on board were taken off next day by an Egyptian Government brig.

27.—At the Lincoln Assizes, Carey and Picket, two lads, were sentenced to be executed for their share in what was known as the Stickney murder, where an old man, who had been drinking in their company, was beaten to death with bludgeons, robbed of 23*s. 6d.*, and then thrown into a ditch. Each of the prisoners made confessions accusing the other of the principal share in the deed.

28.—In the House of Commons Lord John Russell introduces a discussion on the Italian policy of the Government. The papers produced were ordered to lie on the table.

— Debate in the Commons on the affairs of Italy, and the possible effect of the Conference for the settlement proposed by the Emperor of the French. Mr. Disraeli accused Lord John Russell of always acting towards Italy as if there were an old Whig party there, and endeavouring to set up a kind of Brookes's Club at Florence, after his poetic ideal of Petrarch.

August 1.—On bringing forward the Indian Budget, Sir Charles Wood said the debt of India in April 1857, before the mutinies broke out, was 59,462,000*l.*; the military expenditure, ordinary and extraordinary, 12,561,000*l.* In 1857-58 the general expenditure amounted to 40,226,000*l.*; the revenue, 31,706,000*l.* In 1858-59 the expenditure was 48,500,000*l.*, and the revenue 33,800,000*l.* The total debt at present was 81,580,000*l.*

2.—At the Hereford Assizes, Job Isaac Jones, attorney's clerk, was charged with the murder of Harriet Baker, at Ledbury. It was sought to be established for the Crown, that the prisoner was seen to enter the rooms occupied by the deceased, who kept his master's office clean; that he had there secured the keys of the office and robbed the desk; that he had a weapon in his chest with which the blows might have been inflicted; that the embers of the stolen notes were found in his fireplace; that the torn pieces of two stolen cheques were found in a place to which he had access; that a quantity of postage-stamps corresponding with those left in the office were found in his possession; and that, though his circumstances up to the time of the murder and robbery were notoriously straitened, he was afterwards known to have in his possession 11*l.* or 12*l.* in sovereigns—the number stolen from the office: The jury returned a verdict of Not guilty.

3.—Aggregate meeting of operative builders in Hyde-park to protest against the "fiendish document" or declaration issued by the masters, and to bind all present to support the nine hours' movement.

8.—Lord Elcho renewed his motion for an address to her Majesty, as expressive of the opinion of the House, that it would be consistent neither with the honour nor the dignity of this country to take part in any Conference for the purpose of settling the details of a peace the preliminaries of which had been arranged between the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Austria. At the close of the debate, Lord Elcho expressed himself satisfied with the discussion and withdrew his motion. Sharp reference was made by various speakers to the irregular and informal communication of the views of the British Cabinet to France through Prussia.

10.—The Committee on the Pontefract election finding that Mr. Overend and Mr. Childers had agreed to refer their differences to Lord March, and afterwards failed in accomplishing a compromise, agree to place the parties in the positions they occupied at the close of the poll, and resume the inquiry from that point. By the award of Sir J. D. Coleridge the seat fell to be vacated by Mr. Overend.

11.—Fall of the bridge across the Thames at Walton, built in 1750:—"I had crossed the river," writes a spectator, "just below the bridge, in a punt with a friend, to take a sketch of it from the Walton side, when the falling of a few stones from the broken arch warned us to quicken our speed; and, before we had well reached the shore, the pier suddenly gave way, and the two large arches on either side, with the roadways, for some 150 or 200 yards, fell into the river below with a tremendous crash. The water splashed up like a fountain, and the sudden displacement caused the river to rise in a wave 4 or 5 feet high, which, rolling down the stream with irresistible force, carried boats, punts, logs of timber, and everything within reach, before it." No lives were lost.

13.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. Regarding the proposed Peace Conference, her Majesty "has not yet received the information necessary to enable her to decide whether she may think fit to take part in any such negotiation."

14.—The army of Italy makes a triumphal entry into Paris. The Emperor expressed himself as sorry to part with so formidable and well-organized a force, and bade them never forget what they and he had achieved together. "If France had done so much for a friendly people, what would she not do for her own independence?"

15.—Commenced at the Central Criminal Court the trial of Thomas Smethurst, surgeon, for the murder by slow poison of Miss Isabella Banks, a person with whom he had also entered into a bigamous connexion, and by whose death he was to obtain possession of considerable sums of money. The trial extended over six days, the jury at the close bringing in a verdict of Guilty. The prisoner was thereupon sentenced to be executed. The case gave rise to considerable discussion in public, the result of which was that the Home Secretary was induced in the first instance to grant a reprieve, and finally to recommend a pardon, as stated in his letter to the Lord Chief Baron:—"As your Lordship suggests in your report that reference should be made to the judgment of medical and scientific persons selected by the Secretary of State, for the purpose of considering the symptoms and appearances of the deceased Isabella Banks, and the result of the analysis, I have sent the evidence, your Lordship's reports, and all the papers bearing upon the medical evidence of the case, to Sir Benjamin Brodie, from whom I have received a letter, of which I enclose you a copy, and who is of my opinion, that, although the facts are full of suspicion against Smethurst, there is not absolute and complete evidence of his guilt. After a very careful and anxious consideration of all the facts of this very peculiar case, I have come to the conclusion that there is sufficient doubt of the prisoner's guilt to render it my duty to advise the grant to him of a free pardon, which will be restricted to the particular offence of which he stands convicted, it being my intention to institute a prosecution against him for bigamy. The necessity which I have felt for advising her Majesty to grant a free pardon in this case has not, as it appears to me, arisen from any defect in the constitution or proceedings of our criminal tribunals. It has arisen from the imperfection of medical science, and from the fallibility of judgment, in an obscure malady, even of skilful and experienced medical practitioners." At the trial for bigamy, which came on November 20th, Smethurst set up a plea that his marriage with Miss Banks was good, in so far as his reputed wife had committed bigamy by marrying him while her former husband, passing under the assumed name of Johnson, was still alive. He was found guilty of the imputed offence, and sentenced by Baron Bramwell to 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour.

16.—The foundation-stone of a new "Tabernacle" for the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon laid at Newington.

17.—Inquiry in the Court of Session into the frauds carried on by the original chief partners of the Carron Company. Under the original deed of 1773, the Company were allowed to buy the shares of any retiring partner: and it now appeared that the managers, Dawson and Stainton, availed themselves so far of this permission as not to permit for thirty-five years any shares to be purchased by any stranger or partner other than a member of the families of Stainton or Dawson; and the charge now was, that "by means of false balances, abstracts, and accounts, and a general system of misrepresentation and concealment, the shareholders were kept in ignorance of the true value of the stock, and even thus induced to sell their shares at prices greatly below their actual worth." Among others, in 1847 Colonel Maclean was led to sell twenty shares at 700*l.* each: and he accordingly brought an action to have the sale and transfer set aside, and to be reinstated in possession, on the ground of fraud. He alleged that half-yearly balance-sheets were made out, in which the profits and the assets were systematically put down at far less than their proper amount. Mr. Joseph Dawson used to send to Mr. Henry Stainton, the agent in London, and brother of Mr. Dawson's predecessor in the management, "trial balance-sheets" which were correct, and these were then altered and adjusted to meet the object in view. . . . There was also a fund in London, known only to Stainton and the Dawsons, called the "Secret Reserve Fund," which amounted in 1838 to 77,792*l.*, and which was described to have been chiefly accumulated by debiting certain consignments of military stores from Carron to the Board of Ordnance in London with breakages which had never occurred. These "breakages" went sometimes to the extent of twenty-five per cent.; and Mr. Henry Stainton delivered to the Board of Ordnance, and received payment for, the whole quantity sent, but remitted to Carron only the supposed proceeds of the unbroken goods. These things continued apparently until 1850, when Joseph Dawson died, and William Dawson succeeded to the control at Carron, while Henry Stainton remained as agent in London. Dissension, then, for the first time broke out between the families of Stainton and Dawson. William Dawson being manager, called upon Henry Stainton to account for the London fund. Stainton admitted its existence, and handed over 96,000*l.* to the Company. He died shortly afterwards, and the Company made a claim on his executors for shortcomings, which was compromised last year by a payment of the enormous sum of 220,000*l.* From these family feuds the outside shareholders, or those who were formerly shareholders, gained an idea of the transactions which form the subject of the present action. For three and twenty years, according to the pleadings of Colonel Maclean, shareholders had been vainly endeavouring to get information on the points in dispute.

18.—Various outward physical evidences of a so-called revival of religion in Ireland engaged considerable attention about this time. The excitement afterwards spread to England and Scotland.

21.—Commencement of disturbances in the church of St. George-in-the-East, London, in consequence of the rector, the Rev. Bryan King, adopting an elaborate ritual, and refusing to allow time for the Sunday afternoon lecture by the Rev. Hugh Allen. The Bishop of London undertook unsuccessfully to arbitrate in the case, and the scenes on Sundays in the church, for many weeks in succession, were of the most scandalous description.

26.—Schamyl, the Circassian chief, captured in his stronghold at Gounil, and sent with his eldest son a prisoner to St. Petersburg.

—Commencement of the sale of Lord Northwick's collection of pictures, at Thirlestone House, Cheltenham. It continued eighteen days, the number of pictures disposed of being 1,881, and the amount realized 95,725*l.* His Lordship's collection of coins was sold during twelve days in December, and brought 8,565*l.*

—Concordat between Rome and Spain, the latter Power engaging to send an army of occupation into the Roman States if the French withdrew.

27.—Died at Putney, aged 75, Leigh Hunt, poet and essayist, and friend of Shelley.

September 3.—The assembly of the Romagna adopt a resolution expressive of their refusal to live any longer under the temporal sway of the Pope. On the same day a deputation from Tuscany waited upon Victor Emmanuel to propose, in the name of the whole Tuscan people, the annexation of that state to Piedmont. The King promised in both cases to support their desires before the great Powers.

5.—Captain Peard, "Garibaldi's Englishman," writes from the camp of the General at Modena, denying the rumours circulated against him in England of shooting Austrians like game, while altogether indifferent to the cause of Italian independence.

7.—The Great Eastern steamship leaves her moorings at Deptford for Portland Roads.

9.—Explosion on board the Great Eastern during her trial trip, off Hastings. For the double purpose of heating the water before it passed into the boilers, and of keeping the saloons cool, a "jacket" or casing was placed around the lower part of each funnel. The common stop-cock with which it was fitted had by inadvertence or ignorance been turned to close the pipe, while the communication between the casing and the boilers had also been cut off. In consequence, as the water within the casing became heated, and the steam got compressed, the "jacket" water was converted into steam, the power of which increased from moment to moment as speed was put on. At last a terrific explosion took place. The forepart of the deck appeared to spring like a mine, blowing the great funnel up into the air. There was a confused heavy roar, amid which came the awful crash of timber and iron mingled together with frightful uproar, and then all was hidden in a rush of steam. Blinded and almost stunned by the overwhelming concussion, those on the bridge stood motionless in the white vapour till they were reminded of the necessity of seeking shelter by the shower of wreck—glass, giltwork, saloon ornaments, and pieces of wood, which began to fall like rain in all directions. The prolonged clatter of these as they fell prevented any one aft the bridge from moving, and though all knew that a fearful accident had occurred, none were aware of its extent or what was likely to happen next; all that could be ascertained was that the vessel's sides were uninjured, and the engines still going. The whole centre of the ship seemed to be one vast chasm, and from it was belching up steam, dust, and then smoke lighted with flame. When the great funnel of eight tons weight blew up it tore away everything—decks, cabins, and far below this again steam-gearing of every kind. The furnace-doors being burst open fire poured on one side on the unfortunate firemen, and scalding vapour on the other. As many as ten were injured so severely that death either relieved them from their sufferings on the spot, or followed close upon a short period of unconsciousness or apparent insensibility to pain. Captain Harrison and the officers of the ship showed the most prompt courage and ready fertility of resource in meeting the calamity. Some one shouted out to Atkinson, the pilot, to save himself. "I'm no engineer," he replied, "I'm a pilot; I've charge of the ship, and I mean to stick to her." The most of the passengers also behaved with great coolness and humanity, and, before the vessel had advanced far from the scene of the disaster, were busy personally attending the wounded or collecting subscriptions on their behalf. The Great Eastern arrived in Portland harbour about ten o'clock on the morning of the 10th, neither screw nor paddles having been stopped from the time she left the Thames. Notwithstanding the force of the explosion, the sides of the great vessel were uninjured.

10.—In consequence of the determination of his Irish tenantry to conceal the murder of one of his tenants, named Crow, the Earl of Derby issues instructions to warn off the whole of the occupants on the Down estate, Tipperary, with the exception of the immediate friends of the deceased and a few others. This step gave rise to severe animadversion on the part of the Irish press, but Lord Derby explained at Liverpool that the warning was given with the view of protecting the well-disposed on his estate, and punishing those whom he believed to have connived at the crime.

14.—Died at Coblenz, in his 71st year, Sir James Stephen, Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge, and formerly Under-Secretary for the Colonies. Sir James was also known as a contributor to the Edinburgh Review on subjects relating to the history of the Church and the development of religious opinion.

15.—Died at his residence, Duke-street, Westminster, from paralysis induced, it was believed, by the late disaster on board the Great Eastern, Isambard Kingdom Brunel, engineer, aged 54. His chief work was the Great Western Railway, including Saltash and Chepstow bridges, and all the other great works on that line and its branches; and to his suggestions was due the series of vast steam-vessels, the Great Western, Great Britain, and Great Eastern.

21.—At the Lewes Agricultural Show a portable steam-engine, shown by Cheale and Son, exploded, causing the death of the engineer in attendance, four persons, spectators, and several cattle in the show-yard.

— Captain M'Clintock arrives off the Isle of Wight with news of the fate of the Franklin Expedition. He writes to the Secretary of the Admiralty:—"I beg you will inform the Lords Commissioners of the safe return to this country of Lady Franklin's final Searching Expedition, which I have had the honour to conduct. Their Lordships will rejoice to hear that our endeavours to ascertain the fate of the Franklin Expedition have met with complete success. At Point Victory, upon the north-west coast of King William's Island, a record has been found, dated the 25th of April, 1848, and signed by Captains Crozier and Fitzjames. By it we were informed that her Majesty's ships Erabus and Terror were abandoned on the 22d of April, 1848, in the ice, five leagues to the N.N.W., and that the survivors, in all amounting to 105 souls, under the command of Captain Crozier, were proceeding to the Great Fish River. Sir John Franklin had died on the 11th of June, 1847. Many deeply interesting relics of our countrymen have been picked up upon the western shore of King William's Island, and others obtained from the Esquimaux, by whom we were informed that, subsequent to their abandonment, one ship was crushed and sunk by the ice." (See May 28, 1847.)

27.—Explosion, at Birmingham, of Phillips and Pursall's percussion-cap factory, in which there were stored, in process of finishing, 5 million and a half of caps, from 3,000 to 4,000 cartridges, containing about 40lbs. of gunpowder, and a large quantity of other explosive material. The entire building was blown to atoms, and twenty-one of the work-people burnt or buried in the ruins. In the priming-shop, where the disaster was supposed to have originated, the whole of the workmen were killed.

28.—Died, aged 81, Carl Ritter, the eminent Prussian geographer.

—Doncaster races.—The St. Leger Stakes won by Sir C. Monk's Gamester.

October 1.—The new bell "Big Ben," of Westminster, ceases striking the hours, having become more hopelessly cracked than even its predecessor.

4.—In the course of a conversazione in St. George's Hall, Wolverhampton, the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell, addresses the Christian Young Men's Institute of the place:—"If I were to look back on my own life, to derive from it anything like a lesson for the guidance or instruction of others, I should say that of all the success that individually I have met with in my career, I should ascribe the greater part, not to the possession of any particular ability, but, in the great variety of instances, more to the benefit I have found resulting from a feeling in one's favour produced whenever I have been fortunate enough to have it in my power to confer any advantage or any kindness on others. I am perfectly confident that the principle of mutual benevolence, of a universal desire to do good, derived from Christianity, and which is the first lesson inculcated when you are taught to read the New Testament, is one of the best and most sure modes of securing even temporary success in life. (Cheers.) I venture to derive that conclusion from it, because it is peculiarly, and in every sense of the word, a Christian conclusion; and if you compare the lessons of the New Testament with the lessons of any other school of morality, high as are some of the excellent lessons of morality in heathen philosophers, they differ essentially, inasmuch as all Christian goodness is founded wholly and entirely on the principle of love and mutual benevolence. I am extremely glad, therefore, to find that you have combined in the whole of your institution, and in all its regulations, the necessity of making the study of Christianity one of the primary objects."

5.—Coroner's inquiry at Stepney into the circumstances attending the death of the infant child of Miss Yaroth, born in the school-house at Mile-end, Stepney, with the connivance of the incumbent, the Rev. J. Bonwell, M.A., and buried in secret by his desire. The medical attendant on the occasion was Dr. Godfrey, of Mount-place, Whitechapel. The jury found the conduct of the incumbent and sexton "highly censurable." The Commissioners under the Church Discipline Act afterwards instituted proceedings, and carried the case before the Bishop.

8.—M. About having been personally attacked by the Bishop of Orleans for his book "The Roman Question," replies in the columns of the Opinion Nationale:—"Perhaps you would have done better to speak in more courteous terms of a literary man and a gentleman. For only to suppose such a misfortune as that fifteen or twenty years hence you should find me on the next bench to you in the French Academy, you would be forced either to leave your seat, or to admit that you had gone a little too far. But religious polemics have their peculiar customs. The torture which religion no longer dares to use in practice, it imports, as far as possible, into its language. The sacred fire of the Inquisition now burns only in the eloquence of man. I was made to feel it in the first mandate—I mean the first article—of your new friend, M. Veuillot. When I was told that this Père Duchesne of the Church had declared war upon me, I expected to have some formidable arguments to meet. I buckled on my best logical and historical armour. How simple was I? M. Veuillot merely insulted me as you have done, Monseigneur, and he denounced my book to the police. For it is easier to ruin an editor than to ruin an argument; there is no reply so irrefutable as a seizure. According to law, I might, Monseigneur, require you to insert this, my answer, in your next number—I mean your next mandate. But I will not be too exacting; I am satisfied with being in the right. I respectfully kiss your pastoral ring, and humbly bow, Monseigneur, to the sacred character with which you are invested."

9.—The Sardinian ambassador withdraws from Rome.

11.—The Lord Provost of Edinburgh announces that Sir David Brewster had accepted the Principalship of Edinburgh University, to which he had been elected by the Town Council.

12.—Died, at his residence, Gloucester-place, aged 56, Robert Stephenson, engineer of the London and Birmingham Railway, the High Level Bridge at Newcastle, the Britannia and Conway Bridges over the Menai Straits, and the Victoria Bridge over the St. Lawrence. The remains of the great engineer were interred in Westminster Abbey, near Telford, whose suspension-bridge divides with Stephenson's tubular bridge, the admiration of visitors to the Menai Straits.

13.—The Theatre Royal, Hull, destroyed by fire. The wardrobe and dresses of the company were also burnt. It was one of the finest of provincial theatres, and worthily placed at the head of the so-called York circuit.

14.—The Glasgow Water-works opened by the Queen at the outflow of Loch Katrine. To overcome the first great engineering difficulty of drawing the water from the lake it was necessary to tunnel a mountain 600 feet below the summit for 2,325 yards in length and 8 feet in diameter. This was the first of a series of 70 tunnels measuring in the aggregate 13 miles. The bogs were traversed by 3½ miles of vast iron pipes, and the rivers and valleys crossed by 9¼ miles of aqueducts. The system was estimated to be able to supply the city with 50,000,000 gallons daily. The total cost was about 1,500,000*l.* Her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and two Princesses arrived at the works from Edinburgh, which city they had reached on their journey from Balmoral southward. The weather was of the most untoward description, the rain falling in torrents throughout the greater part of the day. There was, however, a large gathering of people to welcome her Majesty on the occasion. The ceremony consisted of the presentation of an Address on the part of the Water-works Commissioners, and a suitable reply from her Majesty, and was ended by the Queen putting in motion the apparatus by which the waters of the lake were admitted into the tunnel. By the aid of the electric telegraph the event was at once made known in Edinburgh and Stirling by the firing of the Castle guns.

16.—Anti-slavery outbreak at Harper's Ferry, a town on the borders of Virginia and Baltimore. Under the leadership of John Brown, or "Old Brown," as he was sometimes called, a noted Kansas abolitionist, the arsenal was seized, the trains stopped, and the telegraph wires cut. A number of people were also slain in the encounter which took place with the military. Brown was captured and tried for high treason. When asked in court what remarks he had to make, he composedly answered, "Gentlemen, make an end of slavery, or slavery will make an end of you." The same steadiness of purpose marked the demeanour of this zealous Abolitionist on the scaffold to which he was condemned. When asked for a signal that he was ready, John Brown replied, "I am always ready." He was executed on the 2d of December, but the efforts of his life and the manner of his death gave an increase of vitality to the abolition struggle, and was thought to have had a sensible influence in hastening on the war between the North and the South.

22.—Spain declares war against Morocco, the immediate inciting cause being the refusal of the latter power to cede territory claimed by the former for the protection of its settlements on the North African coast.

26.—Wrecked in Redwharf Bay, near Moelfra, Anglesea, during the severe storm which set in the previous day, the well-known Liverpool and Australian steamer Royal Charter, homeward bound. The number lost reached the frightful total of 459. The ship was unhappily kept near a dangerous lee shore, in the hope of meeting with a pilot for Liverpool. In this she was disappointed, and at about 10 P.M. of the 25th, with a northerly gale blowing, she let go two anchors a few miles to the east of Point Lynas. So violent, however, was the wind and sea that the chain cables parted, although the engines were working at full speed to lessen the strain. In spite of every effort the vessel was now forced ashore, and struck the rocks astern in four fathoms water. Up to this period (3 A.M.) not the slightest alarm was evinced among the passengers, a large portion of whom were women and children. The masts and rigging were now cut adrift, but caused no relief, as the ship continued to thump on the sharp-pointed rocks with fearful rapidity. Shortly after she struck, the ship was thrown broadside on, perfectly upright, upon the shelving stony beach, the head and stern lying due east and west, the former not being more than twenty yards from a projecting rock. At this juncture one of the crew, a Portuguese, named Joseph Rogers, nobly ventured to struggle through the heavy surf, and convey a rope on shore. Though it was not believed even yet that danger was imminent, the captain gave the order, and Rogers ably fulfilled his duty. A strong hawser was then passed and secured on shore. To this was rigged a boatswain's chair. While this was going on a fearful scene was being enacted in the saloon. An attempt had been made by Mr. Hodge, a clergyman, to perform a service; but the violent thumping of the vessel on the rocks, and the sea which poured into the cabin, rendered this impossible. The passengers now collected here, and Captain Taylor and Captain Withers endeavoured to allay their fears by the assurance that there was at any rate no immediate danger, when a succession of tremendous waves struck the vessel, and broke her in half amidships. Shortly afterwards the foremost portion was again torn through, and the ship began to break up rapidly. A few of the crew saved themselves by means of the hawser; some were hurled mutilated, but living, upon the rocks by the waves; all the officers perished. Captain Taylor was the last man seen alive on board. He had lashed himself to a spar, but did not succeed in getting ashore. The effect of the sea on the great iron safe in which the ship's treasure was contained showed the fury of the storm. It was so totally broken up and destroyed that it could not be discovered in form, while the smaller iron boxes were crushed and ground to atoms, sovereigns and lumps of gold being forced into the very substance of the iron.

26.—While the wreck of the Royal Charter was dwarfing all the other calamities of the storm, a feeling of pride was excited throughout the country by the conduct of the Channel Fleet, under Admiral G. Elliot. On the 25th, the squadron, consisting of four line-of-battle ships, Hero, Trafalgar, Algiers, and Aboukir, and three frigates, Mersey, Emerald, and Melpomené, was caught in the gale while exercising between the Land's End and Plymouth. Seeing it doubtful if the rear vessels in line could make the Sound, the Admiral decided to wear the fleet together and face the weather. In the afternoon it blew a perfect hurricane, and for three hours the whole fury of the tempest was poured upon the squadron. When it began at length to abate a little, the four line-of-battle ships and one of the frigates were still in company, and all doing well. The Mersey and the Emerald had steamed into Plymouth, but the five remaining vessels kept in open order throughout that terrible night, wore in succession by night signal at about 1 A.M., made the land at daylight, formed line of battle, came grandly up Channel under sail, at the rate of 11 knots an hour, steamed into Portland, and "took up their anchorage without the loss of a sail, a spar, or a rope yarn."—The strength of the Great Eastern was severely tried in the gale, but she rode it out without sustaining serious damage. It was computed that during the forty-eight hours over which the storm extended, 106 vessels were lost on the British coast; and the crews of 29 drowned, 15 partially so, 62 saved. Much damage was done to the breakwaters and harbour works on the south and west coasts, as well as to lines of railway and telegraph.

28.—Under the new Act regulating the Universities of Scotland, the University of Edinburgh this day elected Lord Brougham to the office of Principal, the votes standing, Lord Brougham, 655; Duke of Buccleuch, 419.

31.—In the Court of Probate, a person describing herself as the wife of Major Yelverton, R.A., sued for the restoration of her conjugal rights. The marriage, it was alleged, took place in Scotland, and the parties cohabited in each of the three kingdoms, and also in France. The respondent was charged with having deserted the petitioner at Bordeaux, and to have since married another person in Scotland. The points raised in the discussion were—first, whether Major Yelverton, who was an Irishman by birth, and never served in England, had, nevertheless, acquired an English domicile, by reason of the head-quarters of the Royal Artillery being at Woolwich; and, secondly, whether the petitioner, having been deserted by the respondent, had power to acquire a different domicile from that of her alleged husband. Sir C. Cresswell said the question was one of great importance, and one that was likely frequently to arise. The petitioner was afterwards dismissed on the ground of want of jurisdiction, Sir C. Cresswell describing the Divorce Court as a court for England, and not for the United Kingdom.

November 1.—Meeting in the Senate House, Cambridge, to carry out the union with the Oxford Mission, for establishing "one or more stations in Southern Central Africa, which may serve as centres of Christianity and civilization, for the promotion of the spread of true religion, agriculture, and lawful commerce, and the ultimate extirpation of the slave-trade."

5.—Accident at the Star Green Pit, Hanley Potteries, caused by the ascending cage being permitted by the engine-man to pass beyond the pit-mouth. Of the fourteen men in the cage, thirteen were thrown out; six fell down the shaft and were dashed to pieces; four landed on the iron pavement at the pit-mouth, one of whom was killed on the spot. The occupants of the descending cage were all severely injured by the violence of the shock received on reaching the bottom.

6.—St. George's-in-the-East riots. Although the incumbent had agreed, in accordance with the Bishop's decision as mediator, to lay aside the vestments which had latterly been made an excuse for disorder, and also to take the most convenient hour preceding the lecture for service, the disturbance in the church throughout the day was so serious as to lead to the closing of the building altogether in the evening. On the 13th, the rioting may be said to have reached a climax, for the yelling, fighting and stamping was not only as shameless and profane as ever; but, to add to the confusion, two trained dogs were let off among the officiating priests and choristers. For months the Thames Police-court was occupied almost daily with charges arising out of these disturbances, preferred in most instances against idle, ill-disposed lads or vagabonds who stirred up the riots for the sake of plunder. The purely religious zealots were few in number.

9.—The Scotch College of Bishops confirm the sentence of suspension passed on the Rev. Mr. Cheyne, Aberdeen, by 3 votes to 2.

10.—Festival at the Crystal Palace to celebrate the centenary of the poet Schiller. After a speech by Dr. Kinkel on the genius of the poet, a colossal bust by Gross was uncovered. The "Song of the Bell," to Romberg's music, formed a principal part of the concert following. In the evening there was a torchlight procession in the grounds.

—The preliminaries of peace signed at Villafranca converted into a definite treaty at Zurich.

11.—The King of Sardinia refuses to permit his cousin, the Prince of Carignan, to accept the temporary Regency of the vacant Italian dukedoms. The Chevalier Buoncompagni was afterwards chosen to act pending the meeting of a Congress.

12.—Mr. Gladstone, M.P., elected Rector of Edinburgh University by a majority of 116 over Lord Neaves, the numbers being 643 and 527.

— The Wakefield Election Commissioners succeeded in unravelling the secret of the mysterious "Man in the Moon," who appeared to have been mixed up with most of the recent cases of bribery in the borough. A draper in the town said he had engaged the Man in the Moon. Serjeant Pigott.—Who is he? Moore.—Well, I'd rather not disclose his name yet; but I can produce him if necessary. The secret has been so well kept, that it would be a pity to disclose it before it is necessary. (Laughter.) Mr. Serjeant Pigott.—Can you produce him to-day? Moore.—Oh, yes; he is hard by. I can bring him in at once. Mr. Serjeant Pigott.—We shall be delighted to see him. Moore then left the Court, and in about five minutes returned with the "Man in the Moon," who was next examined. He said his name was Whitehead, and his calling was that of an upholsterer at Bradford, but he had "always been in the habit of taking part in electioneering affairs." His evidence contained few new facts in addition to those previously gleaned from the candidates (Leatham and Charlesworth), and their agents. Questioned as to his own identity, Mr. Serjeant Pigott said: I suppose you knew you went by the name of "The Man in the Moon," while you were here? Whitehead.—Well, I believe that was my designation. Mr. Serjeant Pigott.—And there is no doubt about your identity? Whitehead.—Oh, dear no, I'm the man, sure enough. (Laughter.)

— Insubordination, amounting almost to mutiny, on board the 91-gun ship Princess Royal, in Portsmouth harbour. The men having asked for leave till Monday (the 14th) to celebrate the launch of the Victoria, the Port-Admiral assented to one half going ashore, but ordered the other half to remain. While the one half were leaving a message was sent to the Admiral, informing him that the whole of the hands must have liberty or none would go. He thereupon sent an order to turn back the section advancing, and keep all on board. This led to a general riot among the men, which was only subdued by the interference of the marines. One hundred and eight were tried in one batch, and condemned to three months' hard labour in Winchester Gaol. From circumstances which afterwards transpired, showing that ill-temper and mismanagement prevailed among the chief officers, public sympathy was aroused on behalf of the seamen, and they were discharged before the expiry of their term.

14.—Crowded meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, to listen to Captain M'Clin-tock's memoir of his voyage in search of Sir John Franklin.

16.—Died, at Cheshunt, aged 96, James Ward, Esq., the oldest Royal Academician.

18.—Garibaldi writes from Nice:—"As underhand machinations are continually impeding the freedom of action attached to the rank I occupy in the army of Central Italy, and which I made use of in the endeavour to attain the object which every good Italian has in view, I leave the military service for the moment. On the day when Victor Emmanuel shall again call his soldiers to arms for the redemption of the country, I will once more find a weapon of some sort, and a place by the side of my brave companions."

20.—Died, at Hookwood Park, Surrey, aged 81 years, the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone, an able Indian servant, and historian of Cabul.

21.—The Divorce Court gives judgment for a dissolution, with costs, in the case of the Hon. Mrs. Theresa Caroline Rowley v. the Hon. Hugh Rowley, on the ground of adultery, cruelty, and desertion, one or other of the offences appearing to have been indulged in daily from the date of marriage till the lodging of the petition.

— Wreck of the Montreal steamship Indian, on the coast of Newfoundland. The sea was comparatively quiet at the time, and the captain was judged to have been misled by a new light on the Seal Rocks not laid down on his chart. She had 38 passengers and a crew of 79 men on board; of which 27 were drowned. The others were taken off in boats belonging to the ship, or by a schooner sent from the shore by one of the survivors. The wreck was freely plundered by the inhabitants along the coast.

22.—Died, aged 41, George Wilson, Esq., Professor of Technology in the University of Edinburgh.

24.—The Victoria tubular bridge at Montreal (R. Stephenson, Esq. engineer) opened.

28.—Died, at Sunnyside, New York, aged 75, Washington Irving, essayist and historian.

— A lunatic, lodging in King's Head-court, Shoreditch, murders his wife by ripping her open, and then cut off her head, which he placed in a basin. The murderer's infant daughter was found lying sleeping on a pillow on the floor beside the head.

29.—Collision in the Frith of Clyde between the Glasgow and Londonderry steamer Eagle and the timber-laden ship Pladda, water-logged, in tow of a steam-tug. The former sunk soon after the accident, and 20 out of 46 on board were drowned.

30.—Four Liverpool merchants having written to the Emperor Napoleon to ascertain what his intentions were respecting the invasion of England, M. Mocquard writes:—"Great fear or great confidence can alone explain the step you have taken. On the one hand, you are affected with an imaginary disease, which seems to have attacked your country with the rapidity of an epidemic. On the other, you count on the loyalty of him from whom you ask an answer. Yet it was easy for yourselves to give that answer, if you had coolly examined the real cause of your apprehensions. That cause you would have found only in the din excited among your countrymen by the most chimerical alarms; for, up to the present moment, in no circumstance whatever is there a word of the Emperor, or an act which would permit of a doubt respecting his sentiments, and, consequently, his intentions towards your country. His conduct, invariably the same, has not for a moment ceased to be that of a faithful and irreproachable ally. That which he has been he wishes (and on his behalf I declare to you) to continue to be. In proof of the fact, you have the approaching community of distant perils between your soldiers and ours. Thus, henceforth completely reassured, combat an error which is too extended. Great nations are made to esteem and not to fear each other."

December 5.—Came on for hearing, before the Divorce Court, the petition of James Morton Bell, praying for a dissolution of his marriage with Ellen Jane Bell, on the ground of adultery with the Marquis of Anglesey, and also asking for damages to the extent of 10,000*l.* from the co-respondent. The jury found a verdict for the petitioner, and awarded the damages claimed. The court then pronounced a decree of dissolution, and condemned the co-respondent in costs.

14.—Prince Metternich re-opens diplomatic relations between France and Austria, by appearing at the Tuileries as Ambassador of the latter Power.

17.—The royal palace of Fredericksburg, one of the noblest edifices in Denmark, destroyed by fire.

20.—Heard, in the Court of Common Pleas, the case of Oakley v. the Moulvie Ood-Deen, being an action to recover 5,000*l.* advanced on, a bill of exchange for 6,500*l.*, alleged to be accepted by the defendant as the English agent to the King of Oude. The bill had been drawn by Henry Chard, endorsed by him to Viscount Forth, and by the latter to Oakley, who now sought to recover the amount said to have been advanced. The Moulvie pleaded fraud in obtaining the bill; and, second, that the plaintiff's agents knew of the fraud. The jury gave effect to both pleas.

— Publication of another Imperial pamphlet, "Le Pape et le Congrès," bearing on its title-page the name of M. de la Guéronnière, but presumed to indicate the policy of, if not to be written by, the Emperor himself.

24.—Modena, Parma, and the Romagna formed into the Province of Æmilia.

25.—Military riot at Aldershot camp, arising out of a controversy between the 24th Foot and a company of the Tower Hamlets Militia, as to which had got the best Christmas dinner. The discussion waxed so hot that the 24th crossed over to the quarters occupied by their opponents and fired upon them with loaded rifles. Four of the militiamen were wounded and one killed.

26.—The Blerzie Castle wrecked passing through Dover Straits, and all hands lost—34 of the crew, and 22 passengers destined for Adelaide.

28.—Died suddenly, aged 59, Thomas Babington, Lord Macaulay, the historian of the English Revolution, critic, poet, and politician. He was buried with honour in Westminster Abbey on the 9th of January.

January 1.—In pronouncing a benediction on the French army, the Pope takes occasion to censure the pamphlet of M. de la Guéronnière:—"Presenting ourselves at the feet of the God who was, is, and shall be throughout eternity, we implore Him, in the humbleness of our hearts, to shed down abundantly His blessings and His light on the august chief of that army and nation, in order that, being guided by that light, he may walk safely in his difficult path, and more than this, perceive the falsity of certain principles which have been put forth in these latter days in an opuscule which may be termed a signal monument of hypocrisy, and an ignoble tissue of contradictions. We hope that, with the aid of that light,—nay, more, we are persuaded that with the aid of that light he will condemn the principles contained in that opuscule; we are more convinced of this, because we possess certain documents which some time ago his Majesty had the goodness to send to us, and which are a veritable condemnation of those principles. It is with this conviction that we implore God to shed His blessings on the Emperor, on his august Consort, on the Prince Imperial, and on the whole of France." While the benediction was being conveyed to Paris, it was crossed by an Imperial epistle to the Pope from the Tuileries:—"After a serious examination of the difficulties and dangers which the different combinations presented, I say it with sincere regret, and however painful the solution may be, what seems to me most in accordance with the true interests of the Holy See, would be to make a sacrifice of the revolted provinces. If the Holy Father, for the repose of Europe, were to renounce those provinces which for the last fifty years have caused so much embarrassment to his Government, and were in exchange to demand from the Powers that they should guarantee him possession of the remainder, I do not doubt of the immediate restoration of order. Then the Holy Father would assure to grateful Italy peace during long years, and to the Holy See the peaceful possession of the States of the Church. I am sure your Holiness will not misconstrue the sentiments which animate me. You will understand the difficulty of my position; you will give a kind interpretation to my frank language, remembering all that I have already done for the Catholic religion and for its august Head."

4.—Count Walewski retires from the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs, and is succeeded by M. de Thouvenel, formerly French Ambassador at Constantinople. Lord Cowley left the French Court at this time on a diplomatic mission to London.

—David Hughes, solicitor, sentenced at the Central Criminal Court to ten years' penal servitude, on various charges of defrauding his clients by misappropriating their funds, and of refusing to surrender to proceedings in bankruptcy.

10.—Pemberton Mills, situate on the Merrimac river, Massachusetts, falls in ruins upon 600 or 700 workpeople engaged in the factory. In the course of the evening, when the most active efforts were being made to rescue the survivors, the mass of fallen material caught fire, and scores of the miserable people—many of them women and children—were consumed while their voices were still heard and recognised in unavailing shrieks for help. The total number of lives lost in this appalling accident was said to be at least 300.

15.—Count Cavour resumes his place in the councils of the King of Sardinia.

17.—Mr. Cobden appointed Plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty of commerce with France. "Having stated the basis which appears to be best suited to the proceeding," Lord John Russell writes, "I have now to mention certain reserves which her Majesty's Government have to make on behalf of England, and which, they presume, the Government of his Majesty the Emperor of the French may also make on behalf of France. The freedom of each Government to regulate trade in all matters lying beyond the stipulations of the treaty will remain entire; but it may be well, for the purpose of avoiding misapprehension, to specify points which might otherwise remain open to doubt. The two Governments will be free, for example, to extend to all countries the concessions they engage to make to one another; and this extension will, on the part of England, probably be effected by a simultaneous act. The two Governments are to be at liberty to regulate all the conditions of import and export, as to place and otherwise, for particular articles, and to designate the ports at which any branch of trade may be carried on, of course with reference to the due economy of Customs establishments, which does not permit a trade imposing difficult and costly duties on officers of the Revenue to be carried on except in places of considerable resort and significance. Again, the abolition or limitation of duty would not preclude either Government from imposing upon goods such charges as are known in this country by the name of rates or dues, and as are intended, not for the purpose of raising a general revenue at the cost of trade, but merely either to sustain or to mitigate the cost imposed upon the public by the necessary establishments at the respective ports. Lastly, it may be requisite to advert to the time at which the meditated changes shall take effect. On the side of England, her Majesty's Government will propose that, with respect to all those articles which are to be set free from duty, and removed altogether from the tariff, those articles shall become free on the day succeeding that on which a resolution in Committee of the House of Commons, affirming the proposed freedom from Customs duty, shall have been duly reported and agreed to by the House itself."

18.—Statue to Lord Clive inaugurated at Shrewsbury, Earl Stanhope delivering an address on the occasion.

21.—Captain Harrison, of the Great Eastern, drowned in Southampton water, by the capsizing of a small boat carrying him from the ship to the town. The boat, which was fully manned by six picked seamen and the captain's coxswain, was seized in a sudden squall near the dock-gates, and upset before her try-sail could be lowered. Boats were at once put off from the Indus to the rescue, but when Captain Harrison was reached, the body was floating a little under water, and life quite extinct—death being apparently the result of apoplexy, caused by the intense cold. The coxswain was found insensible close by, and survived only till the evening. A fine youth, son of the chief purser, was also drowned; the chief purser himself (Mr. Lay), and Dr. Watson, were among those saved with the crew.

—Suppression of L'Univers, the organ of the Ultramontane party in France.

23.—Treaty of Commerce between France and England, signed at Paris. Ratifications exchanged February 4th.

24.—Parliament opened by the Queen in person. The Royal Speech alluded to the communications carried on with the Emperor of the French, "with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and thus to draw still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them." The other principal subjects referred to were the Peace Congress for settling the affairs of Italy; the conflict at the Peiho, caused by the resistance of the Chinese to the treaty of Tientsin; the San Juan difficulty; the entire suppression of the Indian Mutiny; the acceptance of the extensive offer of voluntary service received from all ranks; and the new measure to be brought in for placing the representation of the people "upon a broader and firmer basis." The discussion which ensued on the motion for the Address had reference chiefly to the condition of Italy and the approaching Congress.

29.—The long-continued and unseemly disturbances in the church of St. George's-in-the-East (see Aug. 21 and Nov. 6, 1859) reached a pitch to-night which the Times rightly described as "devilish." The appearance of the Rev. Bryan King with his attendant priests and choristers was the signal for the commencement of the most discordant noises and fearful imprecations. One mode of annoyance long practised had been to "say" the responses in the loudest possible tone, in order to drown the "chant" of the choir. This irreverent proceeding was now extended into blasphemy, the disturbers of the service substituting indecent and wicked imitative responses. When the service was concluded and the clergy withdrawn, the mob made a rush at the altar; the hassocks were hurled at a beautiful chandelier suspended over the apse, and a large cross was assailed by missiles from the gallery, where there were groups of blackguards singing comic songs. The rioters were latterly expelled by the police, which force for several Sundays afterwards afforded a very small measure of protection to the people worshipping in the church. The disturbance gradually died out as the churchwards themselves became more tolerant of the ministrations and more alive to their duty of seeing the peace preserved within the fabric of which they had the charge.

30.—In the House of Lords the Bishop of London urges upon the Government the necessity of taking steps to protect the parishioners of St. George's-in-the-East in the free exercise of worship in the church there. Earl Granville admitted that the proceedings were a very great scandal and highly discreditable to all the parties concerned. When disturbances first occurred there was a difficulty in ascertaining the law by which magistrates could punish offenders, and the only act giving that power was one of Philip and Mary, respecting which the question arose whether it applied to the Protestant Church, it having been originally passed with a view to Roman Catholic places of worship. It was held that the law might apply in the present instance, but there were still difficulties in carrying it into effect. In the House of Commons the Home Secretary, Sir G. C. Lewis, demurred to designating the scandalous scenes as "outrages," though they were doubtless offences against the decorum and propriety of public worship. He expressed his regret that the incumbent's mode of performing public worship in St. George's-in-the-East should be such as to create so much dissatisfaction.

31.—The emigrant ship Endymion destroyed by fire in the Mersey. The passengers being all got out in safety, the captain scuttled the vessel, and ran her on shore; but, as the tide was receding, this attempt to save the hull was attended with no advantage.

February 1.—Mr. M'Mahon's bill for permitting an appeal in criminal cases thrown out on a second reading without a division, the Home Secretary pointing out the probable consequence of the proposed change: the delay and uncertainty it would impart into the administration of our criminal law; the multiplication of trials, which would compel an addition to the judicial bench; the cost of new trials, and the equal justice with which the prosecutor might claim such a privilege with the prisoner.

— Meeting of delegates of the Marriage Law Defence Association at Willis's Rooms, to co-operate in the efforts now being made to oppose the bill for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Vice-Chancellor Wood proposed a resolution which was carried unanimously, "that such marriage, or any other within the prohibited degrees, would be fraught with grave danger and injury to religion, morality, and family life."

4.—The Spaniards capture Tetuan, and afterwards consent to a truce.

6.—In consequence of the renewed rumours regarding the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, Lord John Russell writes to Sir J. Hudson at Turin:—"In speaking to Count Cavour respecting the rumoured annexation of Savoy, you will not disguise from Count Cavour that, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, it would be a blot in the escutcheon of the House of Savoy, if the King of Sardinia were to yield to France the cradle of his ancient and illustrious House. You will point out that if the military position of Sardinia will be weak, in face of the fortresses possessed by Austria on the Mincio and the Adige, that weakness will not be cured by placing on another frontier the great power of France in possession of the passes of the Alps, commanding an easy access to Italy in any case of hostile discussion between the French and Sardinian Governments." Earl Cowley writes from Paris on the 10th:—"I had an opportunity of seeing the Emperor yesterday, and I had the honour of having some conversation with him on the subject of the annexation of Savoy to France. His Majesty did not deny that, under certain eventualities, he might think it right to claim a proper frontier for France; that he believed that the wish of the Savoyards was to be united to France; and that he could not understand why, in the case of the Duchies, the wishes of the populations were to be attended to, and that the same principle should not prevail with respect to Savoy. His Majesty, however, disclaimed all intention of annexing Savoy against the will of the Savoyards themselves, and without having consulted the great Powers." M. Thouvenel, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, then sought to justify the annexation:—"Historical traditions, which it is needless to recall, have accredited the idea that the formation of a more powerful state at the foot of the Alps would be unfavourable to our interests, and although, in the arrangement developed in this despatch, the annexation of all the states of Central Italy to Sardinia should not be complete, it is certain that in the point of view of external relations it would be equivalent in reality to an analogous result. The same provisions, however distinct they may be, claim the same guarantees; and the possession of Savoy and of the country of Nice—excepting the interests of Switzerland, which we always desire to take into account—also presents itself to us in that hypothesis as a geographical necessity for the safety of our frontier.”

7.—The Marquis of Normanby moves an Address to the Queen, directing her Government to use their best endeavour to prevent the transfer of Savoy and Nice to France. The motion was opposed by Government, and withdrawn after discussion.

— Lord John Manners' motion for leave to bring in a bill permitting the Divorce Court to hold its sittings with closed doors, thrown out by 268 to 83 votes.

8.—Sir John Trelawny's Church-rates' Abolition Bill read a second time, by a majority of 263 to 234.

10.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the annual Budget, the statement having been unavoidably deferred from the 6th, in consequence of his illness. Mr. Gladstone began by noticing the circumstances which made the present a memorable year in British finance—the relief of 2,146,000*l.* from payment of interest on National Debt; the lessening of war-duties on tea and sugar; the expiring of the period for which the Income-tax was voted, and the new commercial treaty with France. He estimated the charges for the ensuing year at 70,000,000*l.*, and the income at 60,700,000*l.* The deficiency to be made up partly by a renewal of the tea and sugar duties as they now stood for fifteen months, and partly through the operations of the new French treaty, which he recommended the House to adopt. “France,” he said, “engaged to reduce the duties on English coal and coke, flax, and pig-iron, in 1861. On the 1st of October, 1861, France would reduce duties and take away prohibitions on British productions mentioned, on which there was an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. There was a provision that the maximum of 30 per cent. should, after a lapse of three years, be reduced to a maximum of 25 per cent. England engaged, with a limited power of exception, to abolish immediately and totally all duties on manufactured goods; to reduce the duty on brandy from 15*s.* to 8*s.* 2*d.*; on wine from 5*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.*; with power reserved to increase the duty on wine, if we raised our duty on spirits. England engaged to charge upon French articles subject to Excise the same duties which the manufacturer would be put to in consequence of the changes. The treaty was to be in force for ten years.” Speaking of Mr. Cobden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he could not help expressing his obligation to him for the labour he had, at no small personal sacrifice, bestowed upon a measure, which Mr. Cobden, not the least among the apostles of Free-trade, believed to be one of the greatest triumphs of Free-trade ever accomplished. “It is a great privilege for any man who, having fifteen years ago, rendered to his country one important and signal service, now enjoys the singular good fortune of having it in his power—undecorated, bearing no mark of rank or of title from his Sovereign, or from the people—to perform another signal service in the same cause for the benefit of, I hope, a not ungrateful country.”

12.—Died, aged 74, General Sir William Napier, historian of the Peninsular War.

13.—Apologizing for his inability to attend a meeting called at Birmingham to express sympathy with the Pope, Dr. Newman, of the Oratory, writes:—“If ever there was a Pontiff who had a claim on our veneration by his virtues, and on our affection by his personal bearing—whose nature it is to show kindness, and whose portion it has been to reap disappointment—it is his present Holiness. From the hour that he ascended the throne he has aimed at the welfare of his States, temporal as well as spiritual, and up to this day he has gained in return little else than calumny and ingratitude.”

14.—Lord Normanby brings the affairs of Italy under the notice of the House of Lords, by a motion directly for papers, but indirectly to convey a strong censure upon the newly-constituted authorities in Tuscany, and upon the acts of the Sardinian Government.

16.—On the proposal that the House go into Committee, Mr. Disraeli submitted an amendment: “That this House does not think fit to go into Committee on the Customs Act, with a view to the reduction or repeal of the duties referred to in the treaty of commerce between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, until it shall have considered and assented to the engagement in the treaty.” The amendment was defeated on a division by a majority of 293 to 230.

17.—The American emigrant barque Lima, which left Havre on the 15th, with 75 passengers and a crew of 26, wrecked on the Rocher de Quillebœuf. The occurrence was seen by thousands, but the vessel was so quickly broken up that of all on board only three were rescued, and of these one died afterwards from injuries and exposure.

18.—Close of the most prolonged, and (writes the Guardian) perhaps the most important session of Convocation which has been seen since its revival. Among the subjects which engaged the attention of both Houses were, the addition of services for particular occasions to the Book of Common Prayer; the sending of missionary bishops to the heathen not within the bounds of her Majesty's dominions; the repeal of the 29th Canon, which forbids parents to stand as sponsors for their own children; the law of simony; the question of pew-rents; and the means to be adopted for lessening the scandals which have lately been so prevalent among the clergy.

19.—Collision off Beachy Head between the steamer Undine from Dublin, and the schooner Heroine of Bidford. The steamer went down with about 40 of the 70 on board, those saved getting off in a jolly-boat to Dover. Two or three were afterwards picked up by the Thetis floating near the wreck.

— The British North American steam-ship Hungarian wrecked off Cape Ledge, Nova Scotia, and all on board, about 200 in number, drowned. So total was the destruction that the very corpses were carried away by the ocean current, only three bodies being found near the scene of the wreck. Sixteen mail-bags were recovered, but the contents were beaten to pulp. The Hungarian left Liverpool on the 5th for Portland, U.S., with a crew of 74 persons, 45 cabin and about 80 steerage passengers.

20.—At Tottenham station on the Eastern Counties line, a train runs off the rails, causing the death of the engine-man, stoker, and two passengers on the spot, and injuries to about a score of others, three of whom afterwards died. The coroner's jury found "that the deceased met with their deaths from the breaking of the tire of one of the leading wheels of the engine, in consequence of the defective weld; and we are of opinion, that had proper caution and vigilance been used, the same might have been detected."

21.—Debate on the Budget, raised by Mr. Ducane's motion, "That this House, recognizing the necessity of providing for the increased expenditure of the coming financial year, is of opinion that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and is not prepared to disappoint the just expectations of the country by re-imposing the Income-tax at an unnecessarily high rate." The discussion extended over two nights, and resulted in a majority for Government of 116 in a House of 562.

25.—The French Government recommends the complete annexation of Parma and Modena to Sardinia, the establishment of a protectorate in the Romagna, and the incorporation of Savoy and Nice with the French empire.

27.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer explains the Government scheme, for remitting a portion of the wine-duties. The lighter wines of France and the Rhine he proposed to admit at a duty of 1s. to 1s. 6d. per gallon.

"A portion of the lighter wines of Portugal, Spain, and the Mediterranean, will also be admitted at a duty of 1s. 6d. per gallon; while the greater portion of the Spanish, as well as the great bulk of the Portuguese, and a considerable amount of the Sicilian, together with the wines of the south of France, will have to pay a duty of 2s. Next of the scale of duties. A uniform duty cannot be adopted, because wine varies in quality more than any other product. Anything more than a mere nominal duty would be unequal in its operations. But we cannot impose a nominal duty only, since the principle on which wine-duties are levied lies at the root of half our indirect taxation—the imposition of duties on strong liquors. The lowest duty is a high rate on the lowest kind of wine. Therefore, in order to give fair play to the scheme, that duty must not exceed 1s." Entering minutely into various objections, Mr. Gladstone showed that the alcohol in beer is more legally taxed than the alcohol in spirits properly so called; and that the competition between beer and spirits and beer and wine is only indirect. The Government could not reduce the duty below 2s., when the spirit approaches forty degrees of proof, without perilling the 12,000,000*l.* of revenue raised on British and foreign spirits. Therefore, 2s. was as low as they could go. He had carefully considered ingenious proposals for an ad valorem duty, but he did not think that any head of a Revenue department would undertake to administer the law on such a principle.

28.—The steamer Nimrod, from Liverpool to Cork, wrecked in a severe storm off St. David's Head, and all on board—about 40 in number—perished. The winter storms this season were of unusual severity. In January, 206 wrecks were reported, and a loss of 53 lives; this month they amounted to 137, involving a loss of 90 lives.

March 1.—Fall of Ramsay-terrace, overlooking Princes-street-gardens, Edinburgh. The terrace, erected by the late Lord Murray to commemorate the author of "The Gentle Shepherd," had been thrown up on an imperfect foundation, and recent heavy rains completed the work of destruction.

— In his speech at the opening of the Legislative session, the Emperor of the French thus referred to the annexation of Savoy, which had for so many months been involved in secrecy to the disquiet of European courts:—"Looking to the transformation of Northern Italy, which has put all the passes of the Alps in the hands of a powerful State, it was my duty, for the security of our frontier, to claim the French slopes of the mountains. This reassertion of a claim to a territory of small extent has nothing in it of a nature to alarm Europe and give a denial to the policy of disinterestedness which I have proclaimed more than once; for France does not wish to proceed to this aggrandizement, however small it may be, either by military occupation, or by provoked insurrection, or by underhand manœuvres, but by frankly explaining the question to the great Powers. They will, doubtless, understand in their equity, as France would understand it for each of them under similar circumstances, that the important territorial re-arrangement which is about to take place, gives us a right to a guarantee indicated by Nature herself. . . . For the last eleven years I have sustained alone at Rome the power of the Holy Father, without having ceased a single day to revere in him the sacred character of the chief of our religion. On another side the population of the Romagna, abandoned all at once to themselves, have experienced a natural excitement, and sought during the war to make common cause with us. Ought I to forget them in making peace, and to hand them over anew for an indefinite time to the chances of a foreign occupation? My first efforts have been to reconcile them to their sovereign, and, not having succeeded, I have tried at least to uphold in the revolted provinces the principle of the temporal power of the Pope."

1.—Lord John Russell introduces the promised measure of Parliamentary Reform. He proposed to reduce the borough franchise to 6*l.*—a step which would have the effect of increasing the number of voters from 440,000 to 634,000. Twenty-five seats were to be taken from small places returning two members, and divided among new constituencies. The measure was received with great indifference, and, after a succession of languid debates, withdrawn on the 11th of June.

2.—Explosion at the Burradon Colliery, near Killingworth, Newcastle, causing the death of seventy-six men and boys employed in the workings. The pit being on the low main had a bad reputation, yet only those working on the "broken" section used Davy lamps; those engaged in the "whole" used candles. The bodies were found in groups in various parts of the workings as they had fallen and died in their flight. Some were scorched and killed by the explosion; but by far the largest number appeared to have died from the effects of choke-damp.

— In laying on the table of the House the correspondence relating to the annexation of Savoy, Lord John Russell said he had no knowledge of any treaty between France and Sardinia on the subject, but the Emperor had pledged himself to take no steps in the matter without consulting the other Powers. Later in the evening, in the course of a discussion raised by Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Bright said:—"I don't want the Government to give the slightest countenance to this transfer, nor do I want them, on the other hand, to give the slightest opposition to it. The opposition, if you give it, must be futile; you cannot prevent the transference of Savoy, but you may, if you like, embroil Europe and bring England into collision with France. I say, 'Perish Savoy'—(cries of 'Oh, oh!')—though Savoy, I believe, will not perish or even suffer—rather than we, the representatives of the people of England, should involve the Government of this country with the people and the Government of France in a matter in which we have really no interest whatever. . . . If those two kingdoms have agreed on the transfer, and the people of Savoy themselves are favourable to it, I say it is contrary to the interests of England, and to the honour of the English Government, to pretend to interpose against a transaction which, though I would never have recommended or promoted it, is yet, I am sure, not worth the imposition of a single tax on Englishmen, or the expenditure of a single drop of blood for one moment to prevent." Lord John Manners repudiated these sentiments, and expressed his confidence that the hon. member for Birmingham stood alone in the expression of such opinions. On the 5th, Mr. Roebuck said the House of Commons had, by a declaration of its opinions on a former occasion, stopped the Emperor in his career, and they might do so again when under a pretence of entering into closer commercial relations with us he was casting dishonour upon England, and breaking up all the treaties to which this country was a party.

2.—Count Cavour to M. de Thouvenel:—"The Sardinian Government "would never consent, with even the greatest prospective advantages, to cede or exchange any one of the parts of the territory which has formed for so many ages the glorious inheritance of the House of Savoy. But the King's Government cannot refuse to take into consideration the changes which passing events in Italy may have introduced into the situation of the inhabitants of Savoy and Nice. At the moment when we are loudly demanding for the inhabitants of Central Italy the right of disposing of their destiny, we cannot, without incurring the charge of inconsistency and injustice, refuse to the King's subjects dwelling on the other side of the Alps the right of freely manifesting their will. However poignant the regret we should feel if the provinces, once the glorious cradle of the monarchy, should decide on demanding their separation from the rest of the King's dominions in order to join other destinies, we should not refuse to acknowledge the validity of this manifestation declared legally and conformably with the prescriptions of Parliament."

5.—The Austrian Reichsrath reformed by Imperial patent, and summoned to meet annually for the discussion of public business.

7.—Her Majesty holds a levee in St. James's, for the purpose of receiving the officers of the newly-formed Volunteer Rifle Corps. About 2,500 attended, representing an effective force of 70,000 men. Earl Grey, the Under Secretary-at-War, in addressing the officers, said it would depend upon themselves whether the movement was to be worthy of England, or whether it was to become a mere laughing-stock. Before the end of the summer he thought the number of Volunteers would reach 100,000 men. The proposal was received with such universal favour, that by the date spoken of the number of Volunteers enrolled numbered 180,000, of whom 40,000 had been formed into battalions, so admirably trained and armed, that the official inspection pronounced them fit to take their place in line of battle.

8.—From Shanghai Mr. Bruce addresses an ultimatum to the Chinese Government, demanding an ample apology for firing on our ships from the Taku forts, the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, an indemnity of 4,000,000 taels, and the reception of a resident ambassador at Peking. The terms were rejected, the despatch being described as written in language insubordinate and extravagant. "For the future he (the English minister) must not be so wanting in decorum."

— Mr. Byng's motion for an address to her Majesty expressing the satisfaction of the House with the Commercial Treaty with France, carried by 282 to 56. Apart from its connexion in point of time with the annexation question—which the opponents of the treaty made the most of—the principal discussion took place on the 11th article, relating to the exportation of coal from this country. A considerable number of Conservatives left the House before the division.

11.—Commencement of the voting in Tuscany and the Æmilia (comprising the Duchies of Parma and Modena and the Legations) on the question of annexation to Sardinia or a separate kingdom. The people appeared to decide by an immense majority in favour of annexation. On receiving the homage of Æmilia, the King said:—"In uniting to my ancient provinces, not only the states of Modena and Parma, but also the Romagna, which has separated itself from the Papal Government, I do not intend to fail in my deep devotion to the Chief of the Church. I am ready to defend the independence necessary to the supreme minister of religion, the Pope, to contribute to the splendour of his court, and to pay homage to his sovereignty."

12.—The second reading of the Government Bill abolishing the paper-duty carried by 245 to 192.

— Lord John Russell makes a formal explanation of the position of the Government with reference to the negotiations going on for the annexation of Savoy and Nice by France. He denied that the Government had encouraged either Sardinia or France in their designs upon other countries. It was for European objects that they had employed the influence of Great Britain, and employed it peacefully to reconcile differences, prevent war, and lay the foundations of peace between the great Powers of Europe. If in doing so they could enable Italy to regain her independence, and raise a country which for three centuries had been sunk and degraded, into one of the leading Powers of Europe, so far from being ashamed and shrinking from any responsibility, he should always take a pride in having been allowed to participate in such an object. In the debate which ensued the conduct of the Government in not making the annexation a pretext for war was generally approved of.

13.—M. Thouvenel writes to Count Persigny justifying on the ground of treaties the cession to France of the Savoy slope of the Alps. "In accordance with our requirements (convenances) and with the will of the King of Sardinia, and without contravention of the general interests of Europe, the cession of Savoy and the country of Nice to France raises no questions incompatible with the best established and most rigorous rules of public law. If the character, the language, and the customs of the populations destined to be united to France assure us that the cession is not contrary to their feelings; if we reflect that the configuration of the locality has intermixed their commercial and their political interests with our own; if we say, lastly, that the Alps constitute the barrier which must eternally separate Italy from France, we may confine ourselves to conclude from this that the new frontier to be established between Piedmont and ourselves finds its sanction in the force of circumstances. It is not in the name of the idea of nationality, it is not as a natural frontier, that we prosecute the adjunction of Savoy and of Nice to our territory; it is solely as a guarantee, and under circumstances such as the mind cannot conceive, that they should reproduce themselves anywhere else." . . . In the same Moniteur was published the reply made, four days earlier, to the protest of Dr. Kern on behalf of the Swiss Government. "The Emperor is greatly surprised at such a step, thinking after the friendship he had shown to the Federal Council, confidence might have been placed in the justice of France." The Moniteur also published an account of the reception by the Emperor of the councillors of the principal towns of Savoy, with their addresses and the Imperial reply. The councillors concluded their address:—"From the shores of Lake Lemane to the valleys of Mount Cenis those who have been honoured with the votes of their fellow-citizens have hastened to your Majesty to express the joy that Savoy will feel when she shall be fully re-united to France, and when she may always have with that great and noble nation but one cry—that of 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive la France!'" The Emperor, in his reply, having epitomised the arguments contained in the above despatches, added—"My friendship for Switzerland made me look upon it as possible to detach in favour of the Confederation some portions of the territory of Savoy; but, in face of the repulsion shown among you at the idea of seeing a country dismembered which has known how to create for itself through centuries a glorious individuality, and thus give itself a national history, it is natural to declare that I will not constrain the wishes of the populations to the profits of others. As regards the political and commercial interests which unite certain portions of Savoy to Switzerland, it will be easy, I think, to satisfy them by special arrangements."

15.—The Great Tasmania, which had left Calcutta on the 9th of November with above 1,000 of the disbanded troops, arrives in the Mersey, a floating plague-ship, with above 400 of her miserable passengers in the last stage of fever, cholera, or dysentery. The vessel was greatly overcrowded at starting, the men were in the worst possible condition from weeks of unrestrained indulgence; to crown all, it was discovered on mid-ocean that most of the food on board was unfit for human use, and that the water with even short rations would hardly carry them to St. Helena. There was only one medical officer on board aided by a dispenser, and the medicine chest was found to be as badly furnished as other departments of the ship. About 80 died on the passage; those now suffering were removed as quickly as possible to the infirmaries, and the survivors of a branch of that once formidable force which had broken the strength of the great Mutiny by exertions unsurpassed in history, now crept out like skeletons stealing from a plague-stricken city.

— The College of Bishops deliver judgment in the case of Dr. Forbes, of Brechin, a Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church, charged with holding heretical opinions on the subject of the Eucharist. The presentment accused the Bishop of maintaining and teaching, in a charge delivered to his clergy on the 5th of August, 1857, and since published and republished by him, doctrines contrary and repugnant to, unsanctioned by, and subversive of, certain of the Articles of Religion, and certain parts of the formularies for public worship used in the Scottish Episcopal Church, in so far as he taught: (1) That "the Eucharistic sacrifice is the same substantially with that of the cross;" (2) that "supreme adoration is due to the body and blood of Christ mysteriously present in the gifts," and that "the worship is due not to the gifts, but to Christ in the gifts;" (3) "that in some sense the wicked do receive Christ indeed, to their condemnation and loss." Whereby the doctrines (1) of the oneness of the oblation of Christ finished on the cross, of the perfect propitiation which He there once made, and of the Holy Eucharist being a memorial or commemoration of His death and sacrifice on the cross; (2) of the non-adoration of the sacramental bread and wine and non-corporeal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood therein; and (3) that the wicked are in no sense partakers of Christ—were contradicted and depraved. Several other passages in the presentment were also cited as tending generally to deprave the doctrines of the Articles and Formularies, by drawing aside the plain and full meaning thereof. The Synod, having taken time for deliberation, this day delivered their judgment, which was in substance as follows:—"That the College of Bishops, having considered the presentment, &c., and having heard parties fully thereon, find that the said presentment is relevant and proven to the extent and effect after-mentioned; more particularly find, with reference to the charge contained under the first and second heads of the presentment, that the teaching of the respondent there complained of is unsanctioned by the Articles and Formularies of the Church, and is to a certain extent inconsistent therewith; find that the third charge of the presentment is not proven. But, in consideration of the explanations and modifications offered by the respondent in his answers in reference to the first charge; and in consideration, also, that the respondent now only asks toleration for his opinions, and does not claim for them the authority of the Church, or any right to enforce them on those subject to his jurisdiction, we, the College of Bishops, feel that we shall best discharge our duty in this painful case by limiting our sentence to a declaration of censure and admonition: and we do now solemnly admonish, and in all brotherly love entreat, the Bishop of Brechin to be more careful for the future, so that no fresh occasion may be given for trouble or offence, such as has arisen from the delivery and publication of the primary charge to his clergy complained of in the presentment."

19.—In the course of the debate on the proposal for reading Lord John Russell's Reform Bill a second time, Mr. Disraeli, while he would offer no opposition to the measure at this stage, said if anything could be devised calculated to introduce into Parliament a temporising spirit, it was the machinery by which the representation of the minority in the constituent body was to be secured.—"The destruction of spirit and energy in our public life would, I cannot help thinking, be the consequence, and therefore it is that I, for one, am entirely opposed to the second object which the noble lord seeks to attain by his scheme of dealing with the redistribution of seats."

20.—Correspondence between the King or Sardinia and the Pope, relating to the events in Italy. The King writes:—"If your Holiness should receive with beneficence the present overture for a negotiation, my Government, ready to offer homage to the high sovereignty of the Apostolic See, would be also disposed to bear in a just proportion the diminution of the revenues, and to concur in providing for the security and independence of the Apostolic See. Such are my sincere intentions, and such are, I believe, the wishes of Europe. And now that I have, with words of sincerity, declared my feelings to your Holiness, I will await your determination, in the hope that, through the goodwill of the two Governments, an agreement may be realized which, founded on the feelings of the princes and the content of the people, may settle the relations of the two states on a stable foundation. From the kindness of the Father of the Faithful I expect a gracious reception, which may afford a well-founded hope of extinguishing civil discord, of pacifying exasperated minds, and of sparing every one the serious responsibility of the evils which might arise from contrary counsels." The Pope replies:—"The events which have taken place in some of the provinces of the States of the Church impose on your Majesty the obligation, as you write to me, of accounting to me for your behaviour in respect to them. I might contest certain assertions contained in your Majesty's letter, and say, for instance, that the foreign occupation in the Legations had been for some time past confined to the city of Bologna, which never was a part of the Romagna. I might answer that the pretended universal suffrage was not spontaneous, but imposed; and here I abstain from asking your Majesty's opinion on universal suffrage, as well as from declaring to you my decision. I might answer that the Papal troops were hindered from re-establishing the legitimate Government in the insurgent provinces by causes known also to your Majesty. I might answer this and much more on the subject; but what still more imposes on me the obligation of not consenting to your Majesty's plans, is the spectacle of the immorality daily increasing in those provinces, and of the insults offered to religion and its ministers; so that, even were I not bound by solemn oaths to maintain the patrimony of the Church intact—oaths which forbid me to enter upon any negotiations whatever tending to diminish its extent—I should consider myself bound to reject every project, so as not to stain my conscience with a consent which would carry with it the sanction of, and direct participation in, those disorders, and would have the effect of justifying an unjust and forcible spoliation. For the rest, I not only cannot receive cordially your Majesty's proposals, but, on the contrary, protest against the usurpation which is being accomplished to the loss of the States of the Church, and I leave on the conscience of your Majesty, and all abettors of this act of spoliation, the fatal consequences which may ensue. I am persuaded that your Majesty, in reading over, with a mind more tranquil, less prejudiced, and better acquainted with the real facts, the letter which you addressed to me, will find much to repent of. I pray the Lord to grant you that grace of which, in your present difficult position, you have so great need."

23.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces his proposal, afterwards accepted by the House, to increase the Income-tax to 10*d.* per pound.

24.—In the matter of the Carron Iron (414)

Company compromise, the Master of the Rolls rejects the plea made on behalf of Stainton's representatives that the first payment constituted a general compromise, and finds that the recently-discovered defalcations constitute a new and independent claim against the Stainton estate.

24.—Signature of the Treaty of Annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. The preamble declared that:—"His Majesty the Emperor of the French having explained the considerations which in consequence of the changes that have arisen in the territorial relations between France and Sardinia, caused him to desire the annexation of Savoy, and of the arrondissement of Nice to France; and his Majesty the King of Sardinia having showed himself disposed to acquiesce in it, their Majesties have decided to conclude a treaty to this effect." His Majesty the King of Sardinia consents to the annexation of Savoy and of the arrondissement of Nice to France, and renounces for himself and all his descendants and successors, in favour of his Majesty the Emperor of the French, his rights and titles over the said territories. It is understood between their Majesties that this annexation shall be effected without any constraint of the wishes of the populations, and that the Governments of the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia will concert together as soon as possible upon the best means of appreciating and verifying the manifestations of those wishes.

25.—Austria protests against the annexation of the Italian duchies to the new kingdom of Italy.

26.—The Pope issues Letters Apostolic pronouncing the major excommunication against the invaders and usurpers (not named) of certain provinces in the Pontifical States:—"The first evident signs of the hostile attacks were seen at the Paris Congress of the year 1856, when that Power, among other hostile declarations, proposed to weaken the temporal power of the Pope and the authority of the Holy See; but last year, when war broke out between the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia, no fraud, no sin was avoided, which could excite the inhabitants of the States of the Church to sedition. Hence instigators were despatched, a great deal of money was spent, arms were supplied, excitement was created by bad pamphlets and journals, and fraud of every kind was employed, even on the part of those who were members of the Embassy of that country at Rome, without any regard to honesty and international right, as they asserted their dignity in order to be enabled to misuse it, and to pursue their dark projects for damaging our Papal Government. . . . Having invoked the light of the Holy Spirit in private and public prayers, and having taken the advice of the reverend brothers the Cardinals of our Holy Romish Church, we declare, in accordance with the authority which we hold from Almighty God and the most Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and also in accordance with our own authority, all those who have taken part in the sinful insurrection in our provinces, in usurping, occupying, and invading them, or in doing such deeds as we complained of in our above-mentioned allocutions of the 20th of June and the 20th of September in last year, or those who have perpetrated some of those acts themselves, as well as those who have been their warranters, supporters, helpers, counsellors, followers, as well as those who connived at executing the above-mentioned deeds under whatever pretence, and in whatever manner, or who perpetrated them themselves, to have taken on themselves the atonement of the major excommunication and religious punishment as they are determined in our Apostolic Constitution, and by the decrees of the General Councils, especially that of Trent (Sess. 22, chap. ii. on Reforms); and, if necessary, we excommunicate them again, we anathematize them, further declaring that they are to lose all privileges and graces, an indulgence which they enjoyed until now from our Papal predecessors, and that they cannot in any measure be released or absolved of these censures by any one except ourselves or the Romish Pontiff then reigning, except at the moment of death, but not in the event of their recovery, when they are again subject to the above punishment, and are unable to receive any absolution until they have retracted, revoked, annulled, and abolished in public all they have committed, and have brought everything back fully and effectually to its former state, and have given complete satisfaction to the Papal power. . . . The present letter, as is well known, cannot be safely published everywhere, and especially in such places where it should be most required; therefore we will that this letter, or copies of it, shall be posted on the doors of the Lateran Church, on those of the church of the Prince of the Apostles (Basilica Principis Apostolorum), on those of the Apostolic Chancery and General Curia (Curia Generalis), in Monte Citaris, and at the corner of the Field of Flora of the city (in acie Campi Floræ de Urbe), as is usual, and the so posted and published letters, and each of those letters, shall have the same power upon every one whom it concerns as if they had been presented nominatim personaliter."

26.—Mr. Horsman makes another attack on the French Emperor and the policy of Ministers. He denounced the conduct of the Emperor in Italy as full of deceit. "I say," he repeated, "that he has deceived the English ministers, and has made them his tools for deceiving the English Parliament. (Opposition cheers.) I say that he has treated them with a duplicity which they had not the candour to avow, and with a contempt which they had not the spirit to resent. (Renewed cheers.) And, speaking of his proceedings in Savoy and Sardinia, and the manner in which he has announced his policy to Europe, I say he has added insolence to aggression, and perfidy to injustice!" Lord John Russell, who on rising was received with loud cheering, said the hon. gentleman had raised a great many spectres, with which he has fought much more than with any reality existing. The chief was that the Ministers were continually rebuking the House for freedom of speech. On the contrary, Government had been satisfied with the forbearance shown. Once only it was thought Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald had forgotten the responsibility of his position, but he subsequently made a speech of such moderation and good intention, that he was perfectly satisfied.

"But I must say that, as the right hon. gentleman, the member for Stroud, has given us so much warning and advice, and so much objur-gation, I may be permitted to give him one piece of advice—that, seeing there is on the other side of the House an indisposition to enter upon any violent course of opposition, or any factious misrepresentation, I wonder that he does not himself take his place on the front seat of the Opposition bench—(ministerial cheers)—and endeavour to show, to the shame of the right hon. gentlemen opposite, what faction can effect. (Renewed cheers.) . . . Sir, my opinion, as I declared it in July and January, I have no hesitation to repeat—that such an act as the annexation of Savoy is one that will lead a nation so warlike as the French, to call upon its Government from time to time to commit other acts of aggression, and, therefore, I do feel that, however we may wish to live on the most friendly terms with the French Government—(cheers)—we ought not to keep ourselves apart from the other nations of Europe—(loud cheers from both sides of the House)—but that, when future questions may arise, as future questions will arise, we should be ready to act with others, and to declare, always in the most moderate and friendly terms, but still firmly, that the settlement of Europe, the peace of Europe, is a matter dear to this country; and that settlement and that peace cannot be assured if it is liable to perpetual interruption—(loud cheers)—to constant fears, to doubts and rumours, with respect to the annexation of this one country, or the union and connexion of that other; but that the Powers of Europe, if they wish to maintain that peace, and respect each other's rights, must respect each other's limits, and, above all, restore and not disturb that commercial confidence which is the result of peace, which tends to peace, and which ultimately forms the happiness of nations. (Loud cheers.)"

27.—Prussia protests against the annexation of Savoy to France.

29.—The Queen of Spain agrees upon preliminaries of peace with Morocco, the Emperor consenting to pay 20,000,000 piastres as indemnity, and to leave Tetuan in the meantime in the hands of Spain. A treaty was signed April 27th.

30.—Sir Robert Peel draws attention to the position of Switzerland, in consequence of the annexation of Savoy to France, and endeavours to show from documents sent to him from Chambery, that the pretended popular vote was the result of coercion on the part of French agents. He also censured Mr. Bright for first describing the annexation as a "miserable question," and then attempting to fix the guilt of the agitation on the House of Orleans.

April 2.—At the opening of the Sardinian Parliament, the King said :—"Out of gratitude to France, for the sake of Italy, to cement the union of the two nations, whose origin, principles, and destinies are common, a sacrifice was necessary, and I have made the one which was dearest to my heart. With reserve of the suffrage of the people, of the consent of Parliament, and with due regard to the right secured to Switzerland by virtue of international laws, I have stipulated a treaty of annexation of Savoy and of the county of Nice to France." The Treaty of Cession was submitted to Parliament on the 12th, and approved of by a majority of 229 against 33 votes. Garibaldi, who sat as deputy for Nice, his native town, was amongst those who spoke and voted in the negative.

12.—Considerable excitement was created in mercantile circles in the metropolis by the sudden and unexpected rise of the rate of discount, first to 4½, and now to 5 per cent. The step was said to be owing to the withdrawal of 1,550,000*l.* by the great discount house of Overend, Gurney, & Co., in resentment at the application of the Bank rule against re-discounting. The experiment terminated in the amount being returned to the Bank in the course of a week, and discount was thereupon reduced to its former rate.

— At a Reform meeting in Manchester Mr. Bright defended the right of working men to engage in strikes, when the condition of trade made such a step necessary. "It has never yet been proved," he said, "that trades' unions or that strikes are always bad. I dare say that in nine cases out of ten—it may be, for aught I know, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—a strike had been better avoided. But the strike is the reserved power; and if I were a working man I should never say I would surrender my right, in combination with others, to take such steps as are legal and moral for the advancement of my interests and the interests of those who worked with me. But if these strikes are sometimes—it may be often, it may be mostly—bad, and that, I think, all classes of persons would agree to, still the House of Commons and Mr. Whiteside and his party are not the parties to upbraid the working men with what they do upon this matter. The House of Commons itself was a great trades' union from 1815 to 1846. (Cheers.) You know that the shibboleth of the country members was wheat at so much, barley at so much, oats at so much; and one of them, wishing to be minute in the profession of his faith—the member for the North Riding of Yorkshire—was for establishing a proportionate price for new-milk cheese. (Laughter.) Now, we combined against this system. We 'struck.' (Loud applause.) Why, Nature herself, constant and beneficent as she always is, 'struck' against this inhuman system. The very harvest rotted in your fields. As in the old time the bondsmen of Egypt were liberated by means of the plagues of Egypt, so famine, and fever, and an exodus greater than that which Moses led, was necessary, and came and succeeded in striking off the manacles from the industry of the people of this kingdom."

16.—The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone installed as Rector of Edinburgh University. He addressed the students on the subject of university work, and the spirit in which it ought to be undertaken.

17.—Great fight for the championship, at Farnborough, between Tom Sayers and Heenan the "Benicia Boy," an American. The contest being generally regarded as a kind of international trial of "pluck," gave rise to excitement in quarters where such events are seldom talked of, and even revived for a time the faded glories of the prize-ring. Peers, it was said, were there, and peers' sons; members of Parliament in plenty; authors, poets, painters, soldiers, even clergymen, "men about town," members of "the Fancy," a vast variety of low life—much of it of a suspicious character, and some of it long past suspicion. Sayers, aged 34, who at present held the belt, stood 5 feet 8½ in., and when in fair fighting trim weighed from 10 st. 10 lbs. to 10 st. 12 lbs. Heenan, aged 28, a native of Troy, U.S., stood about 6 feet 2 inches, and was otherwise firmly knit together. Umpires and a referee having been appointed, there was a toss for a choice of position, which, being won by Heenan, he selected the highest ground where he would have the sun on his back, thereby placing Sayers in such a position that he would have the full glare in his eyes. In a few minutes over two hours, thirty-seven rounds were fought—the last five amid great confusion, owing to the police and others breaking in upon the ring—and the men were then hurried away by their friends, Heenan all but blind from punishment in the face, and Sayers with his powerful right arm useless. The appropriation of the stakes and honours gave rise to a sharp controversy in pugilistic circles,—a controversy which was far from being settled by the presentation of a belt to each of the champions.

19.—In the House of Lords, Earl Grey obtains the appointment of a committee to inquire "what would be the probable increase of the number of electors from a reduction of the franchise, and whether any and what change was likely to be made in the character of the constituencies by such increase."

23.—Earl Cowley having obtained special leave of absence from the embassy at Paris, defends himself in the House of Lords from charges brought against him by Lord Normanby, of treating as private communications which had passed between the Foreign Minister and the French Ambassador on the subject of the annexation of Savoy, at a time when the interference of Britain might have been more effective than it afterwards was.

— Close of the voting in Savoy and Nice on the question of annexation to France. In Savoy, 130,533 voted in favour, and 235 against; in Nice the votes were 25,743 for annexation, and 160 against it.

— Baron Bruck, Finance Minister of Austria, commits suicide. A deficiency in the national accounts had previously been discovered of 1,700,000*l.*

— Insurrection in Spain, leading to a renunciation of the claim to the throne put forward on behalf of the Count of Montemolin, eldest son of the late Don Carlos. This renunciation was afterwards annulled at Cologne.

27.—Captain Speke and Mr. Grant embark in the steam-frigate Forle at Portsmouth, on their expedition to explore the source of the Nile in Central Africa. After some delay at the Cape and Mozambique, they arrived at Zanzibar on the 15th August, and commenced their journey across the continent early in October.

— The third reading of the Church Rates Abolition Bill carried in the House of Commons by 235 to 226.

29.—The Liverpool Sailors' Home, the foundation-stone of which was laid by Prince Albert in 1846, destroyed by fire. The whole of the inmates, about 120 in number, escaped; but the flames spread with such rapidity that the retreat of many was cut off, and they were rescued through the window by ladders. Two men rendering assistance fell into and were consumed in the burning ruins.

May 1.—The Pope appeals to his "beloved children" of every nation for the loan of 50,000,000 francs.

3.—After a debate carried on in a languid manner for six nights, and protracted over a period of two months, the Government Reform Bill was read a second time without a division, and ordered to be committed on the 4th of June.

4.—Died, in Belgrave-square, aged 72, Dr. Thomas Musgrave, Archbishop of York.

5.—Garibaldi sails from Genoa with a body of 2,000 men, whom he had induced to volunteer to assist the Sicilians in the insurrection against Francis II. At Talamona he issued a proclamation:—"Italy and Victor Emmanuel!"—that was our battle-cry when we crossed the Ticino; it will resound into the very depths of Ætna. As the prophetic battle-cry re-echoes from the hills of Italy to the Tarpeian Mount, the tottering throne of tyranny will fall to pieces, and the whole country will rise like one man." The Piedmontese official Gazette said the Government disapproved of the expedition, and attempted to prevent its departure. On the 9th of October, when the insurrection had accomplished its design, the King in an address to the people of Southern Italy said:—"The people were fighting for liberty in Sicily when a brave warrior devoted to Italy and me—General Garibaldi—sprang to their assistance. They were Italians. I would not, I ought not, to restrain them."—On the 10th of May Garibaldi effected a landing at Marsala, and assumed the title of Dictator of Sicily "in the name of Victor Emmanuel of Italy." On the 27th he attacked Palermo in the most daring manner, and drove the Neapolitan troops into the citadel, which they afterwards evacuated during an armistice.

7.—In the course of a debate raised by Mr. Horsman as to the connexion of Mr. Walter, M. P., with the Times, Lord Palmerston said:—"My right hon. friend has stated that he did not know what the influence was which drew Mr. Delane, one of the editors or managers of the Times, to me; and if by that statement he means to imply a wish on my part to exercise any influence over the line of conduct which is pursued in the case of that journal, I can only say in answer to this charge, in the words of Mrs. Malaprop, that I should be but too glad to plead guilty to the soft impeachment, and to know that the insinuation which it involves was really founded on fact. (A laugh.) If there are influences which, as the right hon. gentleman says, have fortunately led Mr. Delane to me, they are none other than the influences of society. My right hon. friend has observed, in that glowing address which he has just delivered to us, that the contributors to the press are the favourites and the ornaments of the social circles into which they enter. In that opinion he is, it seems to me, perfectly correct. The gentlemen to whom he refers are, generally speaking, persons of great attainments and information. It is, then, but natural that their society should be agreeable. My acquaintance with Mr. Delane is exactly of that character. I have had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Delane frequently in society, and he has occasionally done me the honour to mix in society under my roof. That society was, I may add, composed of persons of all shades of politics—(cheers)—of various pursuits; and I need hardly say I feel proud when persons so honour me without undertaking any other engagement than that which Mr. Delane always makes good—of making themselves agreeable during the time of their stay."

8.—The Government proposal to repeal the Excise duty on paper carried by a majority of 9 in a house of 429.

9.—In the Central Criminal Court the Rev. Mr. Hatch is successful in his attempt to procure a conviction for perjury against the girl Plummer, 11 years of age, who had charged him with indecent conduct to her in his own house, and for which he was now undergoing confinement in Newgate. In the first case the mouth of Mrs. Hatch, a most essential witness on her husband's behalf, was necessarily closed; but now, in the way the prosecution was laid, she was put into the witness-box, and gave evidence showing it to be impossible that Mr. Hatch could have committed the offence charged against him without her cognisance. In this she was corroborated by other visitors at the house. Baron Channell summed up the evidence in an address of eight hours' duration. The jury were absent two hours, and delivered their verdict as follows:—"We find the prisoner, Mary Eugenia Plummer, guilty; and while we recommend her to the utmost extent of mercy, we venture at the same time to express a hope that your Lordship, if you have the power to do so, will direct that any imprisonment to which she may be subjected may be accompanied by a proper course of training and education, of which she has hitherto been deprived, and probably would still be deprived, at home." The verdict was received with applause. After a suitable admonition, she was sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment, and then to be sent to a reformatory for two years.

11.—Sir C. Wood explains that the recall of Sir C. Trevelyan from Madras was rendered necessary by his having published a protest against the financial measures of Mr. Wilson, the Finance Minister.

12.—Died, aged 55, Sir Charles Barry, R.A., architect of the new Houses of Parliament.

15.—George William Pullinger, late chief cashier of the Union Bank of London, tried before Mr. Baron Channell at the Central Criminal Court, for defrauding that bank to the extent of over 260,000*l.* The whole of the large payments into the Bank of England passing through his hands, Pullinger found that he virtually possessed the entire control of these funds, inasmuch as the pass-book forming the only check remained in his hands till it was consigned to the ledger-keeper. Emboldened by his success in altering this pass-book for trifling amounts, he persevered in his crime to meet alleged losses on the Stock Exchange, and ended by appropriating the almost incredible amount above mentioned. The fraud was detected on the 19th April, when the prisoner was accidentally absent. He was now sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude on the first indictment, and six years on the second.

— Discussion in the House of Lords on the resignation by Sir C. Trevelyan of the post of Governor of Madras.

— Meeting in St. Martin's Hall to protest against the conduct of the Lords in threatening to reject the clause of the Budget relating to the repeal of the paper duty. Mr. Bright was the chief speaker.

16.—At the meeting of the National Republican Convention at Chicago, Abraham Lincoln was selected as candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

18.—At Sandown Fort, Isle of Wight, Sergeant Whitworth, R.A., murders his wife and six children by cutting their throats with a razor, and then attempts to commit suicide with the same weapon. Whitworth was tried at the Winchester Assizes, but was found to be in a state of mind not capable of understanding or pleading to the indictment.

21.—After a long debate in a crowded House the Lords reject the bill repealing the paper-duty by a majority of 193 to 104 votes. The principal speeches in opposition were delivered by Lord Monteagle, who moved the rejection of the resolution, the Earl of Derby, and by Lord Lyndhurst, who completed his eighty-eighth year on the day of debate, and who showed from the Journals of the House, and the conferences which had taken place with the other branch of the Legislature, that it was no unusual thing for their Lordships to exercise their constitutional veto upon bills repealing as well as on bills proposing taxes. He found precedents for the step in 1689, when a poll bill was thrown out; in 1709, when an alteration in the malt duties was made; in 1790, when a bill for removing stamps was rejected; in 1805, when a bill abolishing Custom-house fees was rejected; and again in 1808, when a bill repealing certain duties on coal, and altering others, was thrown out without even a complaint being raised. "I may be told," concluded the venerable peer, "there is a surplus. That is a perilous matter into which I do not choose to enter. It forms no part of the programme which I have marked out for myself. I leave that to my noble friend opposite (Lord Monteagle), who, I have no doubt, will sufficiently clear up that portion of the subject. The question comes to this: if your Lordships are satisfied, as you must be, that you have not only the power but the constitutional right to reject this bill; and if you are satisfied that there is an actual deficiency—that next year there must be an enormous deficiency—and that the present state of Europe is such as to create continual anxiety; then I ask your Lordships, Will you consent to give up, not for the present year only, but permanently, a sum of nearly a million and a half? (Cheers.) That is the proposition I put to your Lordships, and I am satisfied what your answer will be. As I said I would confine myself to this question of privilege, I will only further observe that the illusions—perhaps I may say the delusions—created by the introduction of the Budget seem to have passed away; and we have learnt that, although brilliant eloquence has charms, yet, like other seductions, it is not without its dangers. The same schemes may bear the impress of genius, of imprudence, of rashness. Satis eloquentia, sapientie parum, is not an irreconcilable combination. If my noble friend will move the amendment of which he has given notice, I shall give him, for the reasons I have stated, my cordial support."

22.—Wreck of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company's ship Malabar in the harbour of Point de Galle, Ceylon. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros were on board with their suites, and among the many precious things lost were papers and credentials bearing upon the Treaty of Tien-tsin, which they were going out as Ambassadors Extraordinary to compel the Chinese Government to ratify. The vessel in a sudden gale was swept from her temporary moorings and drifted on a reef close at hand, where her bottom was stove in. The passengers and crew, with a portion of the luggage and cargo, were saved: portions of the latter were afterwards recovered by divers.

— Epsom Races. The Derby won by Thormanby; the Oaks by Butterfly.

25.—Lord Palmerston obtains the appointment of a committee to ascertain and report on the practice of each House with regard to the several descriptions of bills imposing or repealing taxes.

— The Home Secretary announces that the Crown had resolved to grant the prayer of the petition submitted by Convocation, for permission to revise the 29th Canon, prohibiting any parent from being godfather to his own child.

28.—So calamitous were the storms of the early summer that on this day alone 143 wrecks took place off the English coast, 36 of them being completely beaten to pieces. One fleet of Yarmouth fishing-boats was entirely swamped and every person on board drowned; they numbered 186, and left among them 72 widows and 172 children. Subscriptions on their behalf were collected to the amount of 10,000*l.*

— At the annual meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, the Founder's gold medal was presented to Lady Franklin and Sir Leopold M'Clintock: to the former as a testimony of "the services rendered to science by her late gallant husband, and also as a token of respect and admiration for the devotedness with which she has pursued those inquiries which have resulted in clearing up the fate of the crews of the Erebus and Terror, and at the same time in making important contributions to our geographical knowledge of the Arctic regions;" to the latter "in acknowledgment of the very great and valuable services he had performed—services appreciated not only throughout this country, but throughout all Europe and America." Lady Franklin, in acknowledging the honour, claimed for her husband the crowning discovery of the North-West Passage which cost himself and his companions their lives.

29.—In the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies, after the adoption of the Treaty of Cession, Signor Ratazzi rose to demand explanations of Count Cavour, who in reply expressed his regret at having been compelled to say very delicate things, but the responsibility attached to his remarks upon the question must rest with Signor Ratazzi. Count Cavour further said:—"We have no guarantees from France in favour of the annexed provinces of Italy, as we have not asked for any. We have considered the declarations of France that she would ensure a policy of non-intervention on the part of the foreign Powers to be sufficient. France has not exercised the least pressure respecting the autonomy of Tuscany: she has limited herself to simple non-official diplomatic conversations, in which we have declared the autonomy of Tuscany must disappear. To this France has not made the least objection."

29.—Speaking at Manchester on the rejection of the Paper Duties Bill, Mr. Bright reminded his hearers that there was no dissolution for the House of Lords. "If a peer dies, there is no measurable instant of time between the death of him who dies to-day and him who votes to-morrow. The spirit does not pass from the body into space with greater rapidity, or with a more unseen motion, than passes the legislative power from the dead peer to the living one. The only things that do not die are the prejudices, the alarms, the self-interests, the determination to combine for the interest of their body, which necessarily, in all countries and in all ages, have acted upon irresponsible powers like that which our House of Lords is now assuming to become. Our taxes, are drawn from the capital of the country, from the skill of its population, from the toil of all those who work, as no other people in the world perhaps do work; and I say that we shall have reason for ever to be ashamed of ourselves—that our children will have to be ashamed that they come from us—if we do not now resist every attempt to take from the House of Commons that which the Constitution has given to them, and which we find to be essential to our security and our freedom—namely, the absolute, the irreversible, and uncontrolled management of the taxation and the finances of this great kingdom."

June 4.—President Buchanan writes to the Queen, inviting the Prince of Wales to visit Washington:—"To Her Majesty Queen Victoria. I have learned from the public journals that the Prince of Wales is about to visit your Majesty's North American dominions. Should it be the intention of his Royal Highness to extend his visit to the United States, I need not say how happy I should be to give him a cordial welcome to Washington. You may be well assured that everywhere in this country he will be greeted by the American people in such a manner as cannot fail to prove gratifying to your Majesty. In this they will manifest their deep sense of your domestic virtues, as well as their convictions of your merits as a wise, patriotic, and constitutional Sovereign. Your Majesty's most obedient Servant, JAMES BUCHANAN."—"Queen Victoria to President Buchanan. My Good Friend,

I have been much gratified at the feelings which prompted you to write to me, inviting the Prince of Wales to come to Washington. He intends to return from Canada through the United States, and it will give him great pleasure to have an opportunity of testifying to you in person that these feelings are fully reciprocated by him. He will thus be able, at the same time, to mark the respect which he entertains for the chief magistrate of a great and friendly state and kindred nation. The Prince of Wales will drop all royal state on leaving my dominions, and travel under the name of Lord Renfrew, as he has done when travelling on the continent of Europe. The Prince Consort wishes to be kindly remembered to you. I remain your very good friend, VICTORIA R."

9.—The Channel Fleet anchors off St. Margaret's Hope, Frith of Forth, and is for several days a source of great attraction to the inhabitants of Edinburgh and the east country. The fleet afterwards came round to the Clyde, and lay several days off Greenock.

— In accordance with an address from the House of Commons, the ancient form of proclamation "for the encouragement of piety" was revised and issued to-day by the Queen.

11.—The Refreshment Houses and Wine Duties Bill read a third time in the Commons, and passed.

— After another debate protracted over six nights, Lord John Russell intimates that Government intend to withdraw their Reform Bill this session. The resolution to abandon the measure appeared to be hastened by the support given to Mr. Mackinnon's motion for delaying legislation on the subject till the result of the census was seen. Mr. Disraeli censured the Government for the delay and waste of time which had arisen from differences with their own supporters.

13.—Inquiry at Norwich into the charge preferred against the Rev. Canon Dalton, priest, and three other lay Roman Catholics, of abducting William H. Vansittart, a youth of sixteen, son of the M.P. for Windsor. A person in disguise, but described as one Father Euguine, had obtained in a clandestine manner an interview with the lad in the rectory grounds of Rockheath, where he had been sent for safety, and advised him "to cut and run" to Canon Dalton's.

16.—Interview at Baden between the Emperor Napoleon and the German sovereigns.

— The Grenadier Guards celebrate their bicentenary by a banquet in the hall of St. James's Palace, presided over by Prince Albert. The Scots Fusiliers made a similar celebration in Willis's Rooms on the 19th. The non-commissioned officers and privates of these regiments celebrated the event by a common festival at the Crystal Palace, provided at the expense of the officers of the regiments.

17.—The Great Eastern leaves the Needles (420)

on her first voyage across the Atlantic, and reaches New York after a successful run of ten days and a half. She was received with great enthusiasm in her passage up the river, and was afterwards visited by thousands when in harbour, where she lay till the middle of August. The return run from New York to Halifax was accomplished in forty-six hours, a shorter time than it had ever been performed in before. Throughout the whole voyage her speed averaged fourteen knots an hour.

19.—The Church Rates Abolition Bill thrown out in the House of Lords on a second reading by a majority of 128 to 31.

21.—Massacre of Maronite Christians by Druses at Deir-el-Kammar. The number of slain was put down at from 1,100 to 1,200. "I travelled," writes Lord Dufferin, "over most of the open country before the war was over, and came to Deir-el-Kammar a few days after the massacre. Almost every house was burnt, and the street crowded with dead bodies, most of them stripped and mutilated in every possible way. My road led through some of the streets my horse could not even pass, for the bodies were literally piled up. Most of those I examined had many wounds, and in each case was the right hand either entirely or nearly cut off; the poor wretch, in default of weapons, having instinctively raised his arm to parry the blow aimed at him. I saw little children, of not more than three or four years old, stretched on the ground, and old men with grey beards. Beyrout itself was threatened by the infuriated and victorious Druses, and the presence of an English pleasure-yacht in the harbour, with a single gun, is supposed to have had more effect in averting the danger than all the troops of the Turkish Pasha, whose conduct, in fact, showed that he connived at the massacre." On the 9th of July similar outrages began at Damascus. A mob, consisting of the lowest order of Moslem fanatics, assembled in the streets, and instead of being dispersed by the Turkish troops, of whom there were 700 in the town, under the command of Ahmed Pasha, they were allowed to increase until they began a general attack upon the houses in the Christian quarters, and committed many murders. The soldiers sent to quell the disturbance joined the mob, and next day the work of destruction was renewed with greater violence. The Consulates of France, Austria, Russia, Holland, Belgium, and Greece were destroyed, and their inmates took refuge in the house of Abd-el-Kader, who behaved nobly on the occasion, and sheltered about 1,500 Christians from the fury of the assailants. For this conduct he afterwards received the thanks of the British Government.

23.—Volunteer review in Hyde-park. The Queen, with Prince Albert, several members of the Royal Family, and the King of the Belgians, arrived on the ground at four o'clock, and drove along to the extreme left of the line of volunteers on the Bayswater-road, and thence along the whole front to the extreme right at Albert Gate. The Queen and suite then took up their station in the Royal Stand, erected about the centre of Park-lane, when the whole of the assembled volunteers, numbering 21,000 men, commenced to march past in companies. This accomplished, and the corps in their original position, the line advanced in battalion columns and cheered her Majesty, by signal, with vociferous earnestness. Of the great force thus assembled, 15,000 belonged to the metropolis, and 6,000 to the provinces. Woolwich sent no fewer than 1,800 men; Manchester, about 2,000; the City of London, 1,800; and the Inns of Court, 450. Her Majesty left at six o'clock, and by eight the immense gathering was clear out of the park without accident.

27.—A French tailor named Dherang commits suicide in Hyde-park, by wounding himself in two places with a pistol, and then cutting his throat. He had two or three days before consummated a career of great cruelty towards his wife by murdering her, and then locking up the body in their lodgings in Oxford-street. On now breaking into the room, the body of the poor woman was found stretched on the floor in a pool of blood. The head was cut off and placed in a cupboard, and an attempt had also been made to separate the limbs. The witnesses at the inquest concurred in describing the suicide as in some respects a maniac.

28.—Lord W. G. Osborne, son of the Duke of Leeds, examined in the Cambridge Insolvent Court, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for irregular business transactions with Jew clothes-dealers and dog-fanciers.

29.—Mysterious child-murder at Road, Wilts. On this evening the household of Mr. S. S. Kent, a sub-inspector of factories in the district, consisted of himself, his wife, three daughters—Mary Anne, aged 29; Elizabeth, 27; Constance, 16—a son, William Saville, 15; all children by a former marriage: a daughter, Mary Amelia, 5 years; Francis Saville, 3 years and 10 months; and a daughter about 2 years old; children of the present Mrs. Kent: together with three servants—nursemaid, cook, and housemaid. Next morning the nurse gave the alarm that Francis Saville was missing from the cot in her room. She had missed him as early as five o'clock, but said that for two hours she was under the belief that he had been taken into Mrs. Kent's own room, as he was ailing a little. Ordering a thorough search to be made about the premises, Mr. Kent set off to Trowbridge to inform the police. Before his return, the body of the child was found thrown down a privy, wrapped in a blanket taken from the nursery, and its throat cut in the most shocking manner. The examining surgeon thought it must have been dead at least five hours. As the doors and windows had all been carefully closed at night, and no marks of forcible entrance could be found anywhere, suspicion was mainly directed to the parties sleeping in the house. The nursemaid, Elizabeth Gough, naturally came in for a heavy share, and she was twice taken before the Wiltshire magistrates for examination; but her answers being on all occasions consistent with known facts, and as no single suspicious act could be proved to involve her in any way, she was discharged. Mr. Kent himself lay for some time under general suspicion on account of his hurried departure to Trowbridge, to get rid, as was alleged, of the evidences of crime. In the absence of a culprit, public excitement rose to an extraordinary height, and latterly took the turn of accusing Constance Kent of having murdered her half-brother through petty jealousy. Whicher, an experienced London detective, was sent down to assist the local police; and he, having obtained a warrant, took Constance into custody as the murderess. The ground of arrest was that one of the young lady's night-dresses was missing. It appeared by the young lady's list that she had three of these articles. The housemaid deposed, that when, on the Monday after the murder, she collected the family linen to be sent to the washerwoman, she received from Miss Constance that which she had worn the week before; it was soiled exactly as such an article worn for a week would be; she put it in the basket, placing other clothes of bulk on the top of all; the other two night-dresses of Miss Constance, which had been brought home from the wash, the servant aired for use. The servant said that, when she had packed the clothes-basket, Miss Constance came and asked her to get a glass of water, and followed her as she did so to the top of the back stair; she was not gone a minute, and when she returned, her young mistress, standing where she had left her, drank the water and retired. The clothes-basket had no appearance of having been touched. The basket was delivered by the cook to the laundress and her daughter the same morning. According to the statement of the laundress, when she opened the clothes-basket at her own house, Miss Constance's dress was missing; nor could it afterwards be found. The supposition was, that either during the absence of the maid for the glass of water, or in the interval between the packing by the housemaid and the delivery by the cook, Miss Constance had opened the basket and taken away the dress. It was not, however, suggested that there had been any suspicious conduct on the young lady's part, nor was there any conceivable motive why she should wish to abstract this dress, since it was believed that there were no marks whatever upon it; nor did her accusers attempt to account for their own failure to discover any trace of the garment: concealment, or destruction by fire, seemed almost impossible, as the house was then in possession of the police, who were investigating the case with eager jealousy. The murder continued shrouded in mystery for five years, when a confession was made by the

Miss Constance above referred to, which showed with what just cause suspicion had been from the first directed against her.

29.—The Commons Privilege Committee present their report on the practice of each House with regard to the several descriptions of bills imposing or repealing taxes. The Committee found, by a majority of fourteen, that the privilege of the Commons did not extend so far as to make it unconstitutional for the Lords to reject a bill for the repeal of a tax. The Report was drawn up by Mr. Walpole, and gave an elaborate classification of all the precedents on the subject from the year 1628 downwards, that year being selected because the previous cases were most ably commented on in the great precedent of 1671; and, secondly, because that was the year in which the present form of granting supplies might be said to have been practically established. A draft report by Mr. Bright appeared in the proceedings of the Committee, arguing that if the Lords cannot begin a tax—if they cannot increase or abate a tax—yet if they may prolong a tax by refusing their assent to its repeal when that repeal has been voted by the House of Commons—then “it appears to the Committee” that the fundamental and inherent right of the House of Commons to an absolute control over taxation and supply is not only menaced but destroyed.

July 2.—The first meeting of the National Rifle Association held at Wimbledon, her Majesty commencing the proceedings by firing the first shot—a “centre.” For six successive days the furze covers and corpses of Wimbledon rang with the incessant crack of rifles, the large number of the butts and the smartness of the competition giving the fusillade the rapidity of a severe skirmish. 299 Volunteers entered for the regulated prizes, and 594 for those open to all comers. In the competition, the first or Queen’s prize of 250*l.*, with the gold medal of the Association, was won by Mr. Ross, of the 7th North York. In the determining contest he made eight points at 800, seven points at 900, and nine points at 1,000 yards. For “pool shooting” the receipts amounted to 440*l.*; the total admission money was 2,000*l.*

5.—Debate on the Privilege Question in the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston succeeding in carrying the following resolutions:—“That the right of granting aids and supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution, and the limitation of all such grants as to matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them. That although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting bills of several descriptions relating to taxation by negating the whole, yet the exercise of that power by them has not been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant the supplies, and to provide the ways and means for the service of the year. That to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over taxation and supply, this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit taxes, and to frame bills of supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time may be maintained inviolate.” The Opposition generally concurred in the resolutions, which led Mr. Gladstone to censure them as being less alive than they ought to be to the constitutional privileges of the House. Lord Fermoyle gave notice of a motion tending to renew the agitation, but, on division, the “previous question” was carried by 177 to 138 votes.

9.—The Prince of Wales leaves England on his visit to Canada and the United States, accompanied by the Duke of Newcastle.

10.—In consequence of hostility on the part of Dissenters, Government consent to the withdrawal of the religious denomination clause of the Census bill.

12.—Orange riot at Derrymacash, near Lurgan. The Protestant party, in repelling an attack near the chapel, discharged their firearms, killing two of their opponents, and wounding fifteen others. In Londonderry the judge of assize, the bishop, and clergy were insulted by the display of Orange flags on the cathedral tower.

—Ann Barker sentenced to death at Oxford Assizes for attempting to murder her child by throwing it down an old well in Ipsden wood, about 134 feet deep. It was found living, and not much injured, on a bed of leaves, mould, and brushwood, by two men, accidentally examining the place. When trying to sound the depth of the well, they were alarmed by what appeared the cries of a child coming from the dark bottom; and after many ingenious devices had been tried, they induced a boy to descend, who brought up a fine healthy male child, about thirteen months old. The only injuries it had received were a severe bruise on the back of the head and bruises on the back and arm, some of which it was thought might have happened during its thirty-nine hours’ dreary imprisonment in the well. The child was now produced in court, and seemed not much the worse for its extraordinary adventure. The sentence upon the mother was afterwards commuted to five years’ penal servitude.

18.—Lord Clyde arrives at Dover from India, and is presented with a formal address on landing.

—During an eclipse of the sun, this day, between one and three o’clock, the mercury fell from 114° to 65.7°.

19.—Commenced at York Assizes the series of trials for bribery in connexion with the last election at Wakefield. The Liberal candidate, Mr. W. H. Leatham, was convicted, as were also the sub-agents, Noble, Boyes, and Taylor “the Pump.” The charge against the Conservative candidate, Mr. J. B. Charlesworth, was postponed till next assizes.

20.—Garibaldian victory at Melazzo, the last of the fortresses in Sicily occupied by Royalists.

23.—Lord Palmerston explains the intentions of the Government with respect to the recommendations of the National Defence Commission for fortifying the dockyards, and establishing a central depot for arms and stores. He proposed that a vote be taken in the meantime for 2,000,000*l.* to be charged on the Consolidated Fund, and raised by annuities for a term not exceeding thirty years. The resolution was agreed to on the 2d August, after various amendments had been proposed and rejected.

— Thomas Hopley, late head-master of a private school at Eastbourne, tried at Lewes Assizes, for causing the death of Reginald Channel Cancellor, a pupil committed to his care by one of the Masters of the Court of Common Pleas. The young lad, it appeared, was labouring under disease of the brain. He was stolid, stupid, and not able to learn. He was often silent when asked to repeat a lesson which he had just read, and sometimes did not appear to know the difference between a sixpence and a shilling. The case was one for medical care and gentle treatment. Hopley took a schoolmaster's view, and thought the weakness obduracy, to be broken down by excessive corporal punishment. On the morning of the 22d of April the poor lad was found dead in bed, and Hopley took steps to make a hasty burial. But the screams of horror heard through the night by servants and pupils, and the blood-stained instruments of punishment lying about the room, were too glaring marks of crime to be passed over, and in a day or two a formal medical examination was made of the body. The legs and arms of the corpse were found to be coated with extravasated blood; the cellular membranes under the skin of the thighs were reduced to jelly—torn to pieces and lacerated by the blows that had been inflicted. There were two holes in the right leg, about the size of a sixpence and an inch deep, which appeared to have been made by "jobbing" a thick stick into the flesh. On the whole, the appearance was that of a human creature who had been mangled by an infuriated and merciless assailant. Mrs. Hopley was also known to be up during the night of the tragedy endeavouring to wash out the bloody evidences of the crime from the carpet, floor, benches, and bed. Hopley denied that the lad was dead, or even suffering much when he left him. "When I brought the rope," he said, "and inflicted punishment for the last time, I burst into tears, and Cancellor then placed his head upon my breast and asked to be allowed to say his lesson. I afterwards prayed with him and left him, saying, 'Heaven knows I have done my duty to that poor boy.'" Hopley was found guilty and sentenced to four years' penal servitude. From his prison he sent out a defence, entitled, "Facts bearing on the death of R. C. Cancellor; with a supplement and sequel," urging the formation of a grand "model educational establishment," with himself as the model Christian master, and his wife married and educated by him for this express purpose, "to aim at becoming the model Christian mistress."

25.—The Emperor of the French writes to M. de Persigny complaining of the unjust suspicions directed against the Imperial Government:—"Affairs appear to me to be so complicated, thanks to the mistrust excited everywhere since the war in Italy, that I write to you in the hope that a conversation, in perfect frankness, with Lord Palmerston, will remedy the existing evil. Lord Palmerston knows me, and when I affirm a thing he will believe me. Well, you can tell him from me, in the most explicit manner, that since the Peace of Villafranca I have had but one thought—one object—to inaugurate a new era of peace, and to live on the best terms with all my neighbours, and especially with England. I had renounced Savoy and Nice; the extraordinary additions to Piedmont alone caused me to resume the desire to see provinces essentially French re-united to France. It was difficult for me to come to an understanding with England on the subject of Central Italy, because I was bound by the Peace of Villafranca. As to Southern Italy, I am free from engagements, and I ask nothing than a concert with England on this point, as on others; but, in Heaven's name, let the eminent men who are at the head of the English Government lay aside petty jealousies and unjust mistrusts. Let us understand one another in good faith, like honest men as we are, and not like thieves who desire to cheat each other. To sum up—this is my innermost thought—I desire that Italy should obtain peace, no matter how, but without foreign intervention, and that my troops should be able to quit Rome without compromising the security of the Pope. I could very much wish not to be obliged to undertake the Syrian expedition, and, in any case, not to undertake it alone: firstly, because it will be a great expense; and secondly, because I fear that this intervention may involve the Eastern Question. but, on the other hand, I do not see how to resist public opinion in my country, which will never understand how we can leave unpunished, not only the massacre of the Christians, but the burning of our consulates, the insult to our flag, and the pillage of the monasteries under our protection."

— The long-continued rioting in the church of St. George's-in-the-East is put at rest today by the departure of the Rev. Bryan King from the parish.

— Vice-Chancellor Stuart delivers judgment in the case raised by the relatives of the deceased Miss Notidge to recover from Prince, of the Agapemone, 5,728*l.* Three per Cent. Annuities, transferred to him under the exercise of improper influence. The bill, he said, alleged that the gift had been obtained by misrepresentation and deception, and was made under the influence of a gross delusion, inculcated and encouraged by the defendant for his own purposes. Of the undue dominion of the defendant over the mind of Miss Nottidge there was evidence that, by falsely and blasphemously pretending to a direct Divine mission, he had imposed on these weak women, and obtained a gift of the whole of their fortunes. As to Miss Louisa Jane Nottidge, the case was very clear; she had fortunately escaped the degradation of such a marriage as had been made the means of conveying all the money of her sisters into the pocket of the defendant; but the defendant's own statements showed that he had obtained this gift of all her property by imposing a belief in his supernatural character upon her weak mind. This successful imposture was the influencing motive for the gift, and therefore vitiated it entirely. The Vice-Chancellor concluded by decreeing that the transfer had been improperly obtained, and must be set aside, and the money restored to the plaintiff as the legal personal representative of the deceased; and that the defendant should pay all costs of the suit.

27.—The King of Sardinia having urged on Garibaldi the necessity of abstaining from further operations against Naples till an opportunity could be afforded to Sicily of declaring her attachment to a united Italy, the General writes to-day from Melazzo:—"Sire, your Majesty knows the high esteem and the devotion which I feel towards your Majesty; but such is the present state of things in Italy that, at the present moment, I cannot obey your Majesty's injunctions, much as I should like it. I am called for and urged on by the people of Naples. I have tried in vain, with what influence I had, to restrain them, feeling as I do that a more favourable moment would be desirable. But if I should now hesitate, I should endanger the cause of Italy, and not fulfil my duty as an Italian. May your Majesty, therefore, permit me this time not to obey! As soon as I shall have done with the task imposed on me by the wishes of the people which groans under the tyranny of the Neapolitan Bourbon, I shall lay down my sword at your Majesty's feet, and shall obey your Majesty for the remainder of my lifetime."

August 4.—A French force despatched to Syria to protect the Christians of the Latin Church from the excesses of the excited Maronites and Druses.

6.—Mr. Gladstone's resolution for removing so much of the Customs duty on paper, as exceeded the Excise duty at home carried by a majority of 33 in a House of 499. This was the last contest of the session, and the last debate in which the principle of Protection was openly maintained.

7.—Her Majesty reviews her northern army of Volunteers in the park adjoining Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh. The line taken up by the corps extended from the wall of the Palace to the rising ground at the eastern extremity of the park. On the northern side, directly facing Arthur's Seat, a gallery was erected for the use of her Majesty and distinguished visitors. The great mass of spectators, reckoned at hundreds of thousands, occupied the slopes of Arthur's Seat, rising tier on tier to the picturesque summit. The force assembled was ranged in two divisions. The first consisted of Mounted Rifles, 84; Artillery (two brigades), 3,451; Engineers, 211; Rifles (three brigades), 8,501: total, 12,247. The second division, Rifles (four brigades), 8,257. Total on the ground, 20,522, about 18,000 of which were Scottish corps. Her Majesty and suite first rode slowly from end to end of the line, and, returning to her position in the centre, the corps commenced marching past in battalions. When the last brigade returned to its original ground, the line was re-formed, and the whole force advanced, presented arms, and saluted. This having been graciously acknowledged by her Majesty, the men burst into an enthusiastic cheer, which was taken up and repeated again and again by the multitude assembled on the hill-side.

9.—Explosion of a cannon in the Volunteer Artillery battery at Archcliff Fort, Dover. "On No. 2 gun," said a witness, "being fired for the fourth time, I saw from fifty to sixty pieces blow upwards from the gun, and in the midst of them a huge fragment which ascended higher than all the rest. It rose at least fifty feet into the air. At the same instant I saw four persons swept off the parapet, the nearest to me turning several somersaults in the air before falling. I saw also two falling together, and a third descending singly." Six persons were blown over—Lieut. Thompson, who died in half an hour; Sergt. Monger, who received mortal injuries from the concussion; and four others, whose injuries were not of so vital a character. The gun was an old one, cast in 1805, and had been used in the war-ships Edgar, Barham, and Asia. Since being altered at Woolwich, in 1845, it had been fired 180 times.

—The House of Lords, sitting as a Committee of Privileges, admit the claim of the Right Hon. Theobald Fitzwalter Butler to the title and dignity of Baron of Dunboync in the peerage of Ireland.

—The House of Commons vote 60,000*l.* for the Galway subsidy, by a majority of 145 to 39.

11.—Died, aged 55, the Rt. Hon. James Wilson, political economist and financial member of the Indian Council in Calcutta.

13.—The march of the Allied troops in China having been delayed by rain till yesterday, they now came up with the enemy at Tangku, defeating the Imperial troops with little loss, and capturing forty-five guns. The Allied forces next attacked the Taku forts.

14.—Fracas between Mr. Justice Blackburn and Sheriff Evelyn at Surrey Assizes, Guildford. The Sheriff published a placard, in which he stated that, by the Judge's orders, the public were systematically kept out of his court contrary to law; adding also, that he (the Sheriff) had given directions for the court again to be opened, and prohibited his officers from giving any assistance to keep the public out. To-day the Lord Chief Justice characterized the proceedings as "a painfully contumacious contempt of the court," and fined the Sheriff in the sum of 500*l*.

15.—Three English tourists in the Alps—Rochester and Vavasour, of Cardiff; Fuller, of London—and the guide, F. Tairraz, killed, by slipping over a precipice when descending the Col du Géant to Cormayeur. Another fatal Alpine accident, owing mainly to the carelessness of his guide, occurred a fortnight later to the Rev. W. G. Watson, chaplain of Gray's Inn, when passing over the snow, en glissade, from the Col to the Windacher Thal.

16.—At the Central Criminal Court William Godfrey Youngman was sentenced to be executed for having, in his father's house, Manor-place, Walworth, murdered his mother, one brother aged seven, another aged eleven, and a young woman named Mary Wells Stretter, by first stabbing them, and then cutting their throats. The only conceivable motive the prisoner appeared to have for his appalling crime was the idea that he could recover from an insurance office the sum of 100*l*., for which he had induced Stretter to insure her life. He charged his mother with having committed the murders, and said he had only killed her in self-defence when attacked. Youngman was executed on the morning of the 4th of September, in front of Horsemonger-lane Gaol, in presence of 30,000 spectators, being a larger number than had assembled at any execution since that of the Mannings.

17.—Fire at the West Kent Wharf, Southwark, destroying oil, butter, lard, wool, and oats, stored in the warehouses, to the estimated value of 200,000*l*.. The fire originated in a small explosion of gas which set fire to a bale of jute.—Next night, the Phoenix flour and baking mills, Ratcliff-highway, were burned down, and the whole of the biscuits intended for the expeditionary force in China destroyed.

19.—The body of a young woman found in the Queen's-park, Edinburgh—the face blackened and disfigured, the nose broken, and marks of strangulation on the throat. She was last seen about midnight in the company of three soldiers of the 13th Light Dragoons. Next day, a boy discovered some clothes, slightly stained with blood, thrust into the materials of the old Trinity Church, which were identified as having belonged to the deceased, and presumed to have formed part of a small bundle she was seen carrying. One of the soldiers at the barracks, spoken to as one of three seen in company with the deceased, was examined before the magistrates preparatory to committing him for trial; but the prosecution did not make out a strong case against him: nor was any other clue ever discovered.

19.—Garibaldi lands at Spartivento from Sicily, and drives back the Neapolitan soldiery so far as to be able to command the navigation of the Straits. He afterwards set out for Reggio.

20.—The Australian Exploring Expedition, under Burke and Wills, start from Melbourne in great state with a caravan of twenty-seven camels, horses, waggons, and assistants. It was exactly at a quarter to four o'clock when the Expedition got into order fit for marching out of the Royal Park. A lane was opened through the crowd, and in this the line was formed, Mr. Burke mounted on a little grey pony at the head. The Mayor of Melbourne mounted one of the drays to wish the expedition God speed, and to call for three cheers for the Expedition and its chief. Burke replied that "no Expedition had ever started under such favourable circumstances as this. The people, the Government, the Committee—all have done heartily what they could do. It is now our turn, and we shall never do well till we justify what you have done in showing what we can do." Proceeding by way of Torowoto Swamp to Cooper's Creek, the Expedition entered upon comparatively unknown land, and reached the shores of the Gulf of Carpentaria early in February 1861. The return homeward was a series of mistakes and calamities. The stores left at various points of the journey had been seized by the natives, and the Relief Committee at Melbourne were late, and unfortunate in providing for the wants of the explorers. Burke and Wills died from exhaustion near Cooper's Creek, which was reached on the evening of the day the relieving party had left. The only survivor of the Gulf party, John King, was discovered existing among the natives, and relieved by Howitt's party on September 15th, in a condition when a few hours would, to all appearances, have put an end to his sufferings. Howitt writes:—"I found King sitting in a hut which the natives had made for him. He presented a melancholy appearance—wasted to a shadow, and hardly to be distinguished as a civilized being but by the remnant of clothes upon him. He seemed exceedingly weak, and I found it occasionally difficult to follow what he said. The natives were all gathered round seated on the ground, looking with a most gratified and delighted expression."

—David Wemyss Jobson convicted for libelling Sir James Ferguson by imputing to him cowardly conduct when serving in the Crimea, and also with writing threatening letters to Mr. Disraeli, and sentenced by the Recorder to twelve months' hard labour.

24.—In the course of a debate on foreign affairs, Lord Palmerston made a statement with reference to the cession of Savoy, of great significance after the personal appeal which the Emperor had made in his letter to M. de Persigny:—"The Treaty of Turin has not received formal acknowledgment by any of the Powers—certainly not by this country—and cannot, at present, be said to form part of the public law of Europe. The cession of Savoy to France was a very peculiar transaction, and does not come within the ordinary category of cessions of territory made by one sovereign to another. The territory of Savoy was held by the King of Sardinia subject to very peculiar conditions attached to it by the Treaty of Vienna, to which all the eight Powers of Europe were parties. It was not competent for the King of Sardinia to cede, nor, as I hold, for France to accept, that territory, thus emancipating it from the conditions under which it stood as part of the dominions of Sardinia. The conditions had mainly for their object the preservation of the neutrality and independence of Switzerland; and it is clear that Savoy in the hands of France stands in a very different position in regard to the maintenance of the neutrality of Switzerland than when in the hands of Sardinia. France being a much stronger Power, and differently situated in many respects, there is greater danger to Switzerland from it than from Sardinia. The cession was objectionable, not only on that account, but on account of the manner in which it was made. All the circumstances connected with it from first to last—the denials at one time, and avowals at another; the promises made, as reported by the President of Switzerland in his Message of March; the promises made in January and February by the French Government to the Minister of Switzerland, that whenever the cession should be completed Faucigny and Chablais should be transferred to Switzerland (a promise afterwards retracted, and apparently never intended to be performed)—all these circumstances must produce a most painful impression in the mind of every man in regard to all the parties who were concerned in the transaction. (General cheering.) It had certainly produced a painful impression on the mind of all the other states in Europe—an impression showing that they considered that, for the future, forethought and precaution must be the duty of every Power."

— The Times publishes an address presented to the Rev. F. D. Maurice, by members of the Church of England, lay and clerical, tendering (to him their congratulations on his recent nomination by the Crown to the incumbency of Oxford chapel, St. Marylebone, "as a slight and tardy recognition of your eminent services, not only as one of the most learned theologians of the day, but more particularly as a wise and benevolent co-operator with the working classes of the community, upon whose minds you have been eminently successful in bringing the practical truths of the Gospel to bear, and in leading them to regard the Church of our common Lord and Master Jesus Christ as the great instrument designed by Providence for the regeneration of mankind and the alleviation of society."

26.—Fire in Kesterton's coach-factory, Long Acre, extending to, and finally destroying, the fine concert-room of St. Martin's Hall, erected by Mr. Hullah, in 1847, for the accommodation of 3,000 persons.

27.—Holden, formerly a police-constable at Dunganon, executed for the murder of his sergeant, M'Clelland, and the attempted murder of his sub-inspector, Matthews. When being sentenced, at Tyrone Assizes, he interrupted the judge, and begged that he might be shot instead, saying that he had a few personal friends in the force whom he would select for the duty. To the last he seemed possessed of a morbid conviction that there was a system of treachery and injury designed against him in the force of which he was a member.

— Fire at Smyrna, destroying 700 houses.

28.—Parliament prorogued by Commission.

29.—Dr. Lushington gives judgment in the Court of Arches in the case of the Rev. James Bonwell, incumbent of St. Philip's, Stepney, prosecuted for immorality under the Church Discipline Act. Having gone carefully through the evidence, the learned judge said the conclusions were simply these—that the evidence against Mr. Bonwell was entirely uncontradicted; that he seduced the young woman Elizabeth Yaroth, he being a married man, and falsely representing himself to be single; and that he had thereby caused great scandal to the church of which he was minister. The sentence was deprivation from office and payment of costs.

31.—In prospect of an attack by Sardinia on Venetia, Lord John Russell writes to Sir James Hudson, British minister at Turin:—"The only chance Sardinia could have in such a contest would be the hope of bringing France into the field, and kindling a general war in Europe. But let not Count Cavour indulge in so pernicious a delusion. The great Powers of Europe are bent on maintaining peace, and Great Britain has interests in the Adriatic which her Majesty's Government must watch with careful attention."

September 1.—The Lancashire Volunteers to the number of 11,000 reviewed in Knowsley-park, and afterwards entertained by the Earl of Derby. The refreshments provided on the occasion included between five and six tons of pies, several thousand rolls, and twenty-five hogsheads of the famous Knowsley ale.

4.—Collision near the Helmshore station of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, occasioned by the breaking of a coupling of an excursion train, one half falling back on an incline, up which another train, also heavily laden with excursionists, was just entering. The trains were seen approaching each other for some distance, and an attempt was even made to lessen the momentum of each by the use of breaks, but without much effect. The last of the runaway carriages were dashed to pieces, and their passengers scattered over the line, killed and maimed. Ten died on the spot, or soon after, and seventy-seven were injured. The excursion trains were despatched from Manchester at intervals of ten minutes each.

5.—The Duke of Newcastle informs the Mayor and Corporation of Kingston, Toronto, that he cannot advise the Prince of Wales to accept their proffered hospitality, on account of the extent to which they had permitted their Orange zeal to interfere with their invitation.

6.—The King of Naples issues a manifesto to the Courts of Europe:—"Since a daring 'condottiero,' with all the force which revolutionary Europe possesses, has attacked our dominions in the name of one of Italy's sovereigns, a kinsman and an ally, we have, by all the means in our power, fought during five years for the independence of our states. The fortune of war has been against us. The daring enterprise which that sovereign, in the most formal manner, protested he ignored, and which, nevertheless, pending the treaties for an intimate alliance, received in his states principally help and support—that enterprise which the whole of Europe, after having proclaimed the principle of non-intervention, looks at with indifference, leaving us alone to struggle against the common enemy—is on the point of extending its unhappy effects even to our capital. The hostile forces are nearly approaching us. On the other hand, Sicily and the provinces of the continent, long since and in all ways undermined by revolution, having risen under so much pressure, have formed provincial governments with the title, and under the nominal protection of, that sovereign, and have confided to a pretended Dictator the authority and the full arbitrament of their destinies. Powerful in our rights, founded on history, on international treaties, and on the public law of Europe, while we depend on prolonging our defence as long as possible, we are not less determined to make every sacrifice to spare the horrors of a struggle and of anarchy to this vast metropolis, the glorious seat of antiquity, the cradle of the arts and the civilization of the kingdom. In consequence, we will move with our army outside our walls, confiding in the loyalty and affection of our subjects for the maintenance of order and respect to the authorities. In taking such a resolution, we feel at the same time the duty which is dictated to us by our ancient and unshaken rights, our honour, and the interests of our heirs and successors, and still more of our beloved subjects; and we strongly protest against all the acts hitherto consummated, and the events which have taken place, or will happen hereafter." After issuing this proclamation, the King left Naples for Gaeta, where he had resolved to make a stand against the successful "condottiero."

7.—Count Cavour informs Cardinal Antonelli that Sardinia would feel herself justified in invading the Papal States unless the Pope disbanded the troublesome and irregular mercenary troops in his pay. The Emperor Napoleon thereupon caused a despatch to be sent to the French embassy at Rome, stating that if the Piedmontese troops were guilty of such culpable aggression into the Pontifical territories he should be obliged to oppose them. Cardinal Antonelli wrote that the Holy See could only repel the menace with indignation, "strong in its legitimate rights, and appealing to the law of nations, under the ægis of which Europe has hitherto lived, whatever violence the Holy See may be exposed to suffer, without having provoked it; and against which it is my duty now to protest energetically in the name of his Holiness."

8.—Garibaldi, having defeated the troops of Francis II. at Reggio and San Giovanni, enters Naples as a first-class passenger in the railway train from Salerno. He was accompanied, among others, by Mr. Edwin James, who appeared to act in some sort as his adviser.

—The Lady Elgin, American mail-steamer, run into during an excursion trip on Lake Michigan, and 300 of her passengers drowned. Within a quarter of an hour the engine of the ill-fated vessel fell through her bottom, and her hull went down, leaving nothing but the hurricane deck, two boats, and some loose fragments floating about the waves. The greater part of those on board perished in a mass in the cabin, the two small boats taking off only twenty-one between them. Among the persons who perished was Mr. Herbert Ingram, M. P. for Boston—well known as the proprietor of the Illustrated London News—and his son.

10.—Explosion at Melfort Powder Works, Argyllshire, causing the death of six men—all who were on the premises at the time. The disaster took place in the "corning-house," where about three tons of gunpowder were stowed, and extended to another building, eighty yards distant, in which, however, nobody was employed at the time.

11.—Doncaster Races. The St. Leger won by St. Alban's.

12.—The fortress of Pesaro, garrisoned by 1,200 men, surrenders to the Piedmontese army under Cialdini. Fano, Urbino, Perugia, and Spoleto (where the troops included 300 Irish volunteers under Major O'Reilly), were afterwards taken by assault.

—Captain Macdonald committed to prison at Bonn for resisting the railway authorities there. The English residents interfered in a manner which led to a diplomatic correspondence with this country. The affair was amicably settled on the 1st May following.

13.—John Dalliger, a marine in the China Fleet, executed at the yard-arm for attempting to shoot Lieut. Hudson of the Severn, and also the second master. The rigging of every ship was manned by all hands to witness the execution. Punctually at one o'clock the prisoner was brought out stripped of his uniform; a rope was passed round his neck, the signal given, and in two seconds the bowmen had run him up to the fore-yard-arm. There a loop was loosed, and the body fell with a jerk at least six feet.

18.—The Chinese Imperial Commissioners having expressed a desire to resume negotiations, the two secretaries of the embassy, Messrs. Parkes and Wade, accompanied by M. de Norman, attaché, Capt. Brabazon, Lieut. Anderson, Mr. Bowlby of the Times, and some others, depart for Tang-chow, to arrange the necessary preliminaries for an interview. They found the place occupied by Imperial soldiers, under the Tartar general, San-kolin-sin, and, while they were on the ground, the outposts commenced a sharp fight with Allied troops. Parkes and Loch were seized by the Chinese and carried before the General, who received them with rudeness and insult. The rest of the party, including eighteen sowars of Fane's Horse, were carried into the interior, where all, with the exception of a few of the sowars, miserably perished, owing to the excessive cruelty with which they were treated, their hands and feet being bound so tightly with cords that in some instances the flesh burst, and mortification ensued. Mr. Parkes and Mr. Loch were conveyed prisoners to Peking, and confined separately in prisons of the most filthy description. On the 22d Mr. Parkes was removed from the common prison to a separate ward, about eight feet square, on the opposite side of the court; and four gaolers were appointed to watch him. Here he received frequent visits from a Mandarin named Hang-ki, whom he had known at Hong Kong, and who was sent by Prince Kung, the Emperor's brother, to endeavour to extract information from him, and make use of him to obtain favourable terms with the British plenipotentiary, Lord Elgin. At last he was told that he should be taken out of prison; but Mr. Parkes generously refused to leave it unless he were accompanied by Mr. Loch. The result was, that on the 29th of September Hang-ki came to the prison with an order for the removal of both, from the Board of Punishments, to a temple, where quarters were provided for them, and where they were well treated until their final release. In the meantime, Lord Elgin refused to negotiate unless the prisoners were returned; and on the 25th of September he replied to overtures from Prince Kung that the army would advance to the assault of Peking, unless within three days the prisoners were surrendered and the Convention formerly signed ratified. As Prince Kung continued to evade these demands, the army marched forward on Peking.

19.—Slater and Vivyan, two keepers at Colney Hatch Asylum, tried at the Central Criminal Court, and acquitted, on a charge of manslaughter, in respect of a patient named Swift, who died after a severe struggle with another keeper not in custody.

28.—The Garibaldians capture Ancona, General Lamoricière surrendering with the entire garrison as prisoners of war. This achievement concluded the campaign in the Marches.

—The Pope pronounces an allocution condemning the Sardinian Government, and praying that the pride of the Church's enemies might be broken, the hearts of prevaricators changed, and those who attacked her put to flight.

29.—At the Camp, Aldershot, Private Johnson of the 41st Foot shoots Sergeant Chipt and Corporal Coles, in revenge for having been sentenced to twelve days' extra drill. He feigned drunkenness when apprehended, and insanity when put on his trial at Winchester Assizes, on the 12th December; but the jury with short deliberation found him guilty, and he was sentenced to be executed.

October 5.—During the continuance of a severe storm, which swept over the northern part of Britain, the lone island of St. Kilda was rendered almost desolate. Every house was unroofed, the scanty crops were blown into the sea with the soil in which they grew, every shed and shelter was swept away, and the very boat by which they kept up a communication with the mainland was blown out of its shelter and destroyed. In this crisis of the island H.M.S. Porcupine appeared in the bay, and, on becoming acquainted with the state of matters, Captain Otter not only gave relief himself, but induced the Highland Society and others to send out abundance of food and seed to the starving islanders.

7.—General Guyon, commander of the French troops in the Papal States, informs the inhabitants of Viterbo that his column is approaching the town, and will require accommodation. The Gonfaloniere answers:—"The Municipal Commission of this town, of which I have the honour to be president, is disagreeably surprised at the receipt of your communication that a column of French troops is coming here. Relying on the assurance of your Emperor that no intervention would take place in Italy, we proclaimed the Government of King Victor Emmanuel, the friend and ally of France. His Majesty sent a commissioner to govern us, and we have maintained the most perfect order with the unanimous consent of all the citizens. Persons and property were never so secure here as they have been since the installation of the King's Government, and we can conscientiously say that we do not deserve to have our tranquillity troubled. If, however, your orders, General, should be such that you cannot change your determination, you will not meet with the slightest resistance, but you will find the town deserted, unless you assure us that you will not be followed by the reaction. I myself and the entire municipality will seek a place of safety, as will also the other citizens, who are almost all liable to prosecution by the clerical government."

7.—Loss of the Galway Company's American steamship Connaught. She became water-logged and altogether unmanageable when about 300 miles off Boston on her outward voyage; and, to add to the horror of the situation, it was then discovered that she was on fire between decks. A small American brig of 198 tons burthen answered the Connaught's signal of distress, coming up at the moment when the fire was bursting out on the deck and threatening to devour everything in its way. First the women and children, and latterly the whole passengers and crew, amounting in all to 591 people, were taken on board the little brig and landed safely at Boston. The Connaught, with all her cargo, passengers' luggage, and 10,000*l.* in gold, received at St. John's, went down soon after.

8.—Mr. William Brown's munificent gift to Liverpool of a Free Library was this day formally handed over to the Corporation, and inaugurated by a procession, dinner, and speeches.

9.—The King of Sardinia issues a manifesto to the people of Southern Italy explaining and justifying his proceedings since the Treaty of Villafranca. He concludes:—"I have proclaimed Italy for the Italians, and I will not permit Italy to become a focus for cosmopolitan sects, who may meet there, to contrive schemes of reaction or of universal demagogic intrigues. People of Southern Italy! my troops advance among you to maintain order. I come not to impose my will; but to make yours respected. You may freely manifest it. Providence, who protects the cause of the just, will suggest the vote which you should place in the urn. Whatever the gravity of events, I wait calmly the judgment of civilized Europe and of history, conscious of having fulfilled my duties as a King and as an Italian. My policy will, perhaps, not be inefficacious in reconciling the progress of nations with the stability of monarchy. As for Italy, I know that there I bring to a close the era of revolutions."

10.—The Peruvian frigate Callao upset when being drawn into the dry dock at San Lorenzo, and 150 of the people on board drowned, including many of the sick and wounded in the hospital. The vessel afterwards went to pieces.

12.—The Allied troops enter Peking. The siege-guns were in position, and the Chinese Government had been informed that the cannonade would be opened on the following day, at noon, unless the city were previously surrendered, and one of its gates placed in our hands. The result was that all the demands of the Allies were unconditionally acceded to, the gate was thrown open to the troops, and for the first time in history the flags of England and France floated victoriously on the walls of Peking. The Emperor had abandoned his capital on pretence of attending a hunting expedition. Being ignorant at the time of the barbarous treatment of the prisoners, Lord Elgin simply made provision for having them delivered up to him; but a few days later, when their fate was ascertained, he communicated to Prince Kung the only conditions upon which the city would be spared:—"Of the total number of twenty-six British, seized in defiance of honour and of the law of nations, thirteen only have been restored alive, all of whom carry on their persons evidence, more or less distinctly marked, of the indignities and ill-treatment from which they have suffered; and thirteen have been barbarously murdered, under circumstances on which the undersigned will not dwell, lest his indignation should find vent in words which are not suitable to a communication of this nature. Until this foul deed shall have been expiated, peace between Great Britain and the existing dynasty of China is impossible. The following, therefore, are the conditions, the immediate acceptance of which will alone avert from it the doom impending on it: What remains of the palace of Yuen-Ming-Yuen, which appears to be the place at which several of the British captives were subjected to the grossest indignities, will be immediately levelled to the ground: this condition requires no assent on the part of his Highness, because it will be at once carried into effect by the Commander-in-chief. A sum of 300,000 taels must be paid down at once to the officers appointed to receive it, which sum will be appropriated, at the discretion of her Majesty's Government, to those who have suffered, and to the families of the murdered men. The Convention drawn up at Tien-tsin must be immediately signed. It will remain as it is, with the single change that it shall be competent for the armies of England and France to remain at Tien-tsin until the whole indemnities spoken of in the said Convention are paid, if the Governments of England and France see fit to adopt this course." The Summer Palace, consisting of a great variety of buildings, scattered over a park of immense size, and which had contained, before it was plundered, all the luxuries Chinese art could furnish, or wealth supply, was accordingly set on fire by a detachment of our troops, and totally destroyed. The Convention was signed at Peking on the 24th of October.

14.—Professor Henslow contributes to the

Athenæum the result of his investigation in the much-talked-of gravel pits of Amiens and Abbeville. From the extremely loose texture of the different beds, or rather bands, of gravel, from the confused intermixture of various samples, and from the broken and fragmentary character of the ivory found with the flint instruments, he was led to believe that the beds were formed by a comparatively recent flood, which carried with it masses of various geological formations, and thus utterly confused their chronological arrangement. He had, therefore, returned from his excursion impressed with the conviction that the facts he witnessed did not, of necessity, support the hypothesis of a pre-historic antiquity for these works of man; and that the bones of extinct animals found associated with the Celts need not, of necessity, be supposed to have belonged to individuals contemporary with the men who formed the flint instruments.

20.—The Emperor of Austria suddenly entering (as M. Deak described) the path of Constitutionalism, issues a diploma conferring on the Reichsrath legislative powers and the control of the national finances.

22.—Imperial interview at Warsaw between the Emperor of Russia and the Emperor of Austria.

25.—Commenced at the Central Criminal Court the trial of George Mullins, for the murder of Mrs. Emsley, an aged widow lady of considerable means, but parsimonious habits, residing in Grove-road, Stepney. She was last seen alive on the evening of the 13th August, and on the 17th, when suspicion was excited by her disappearance, it was found that she had been barbarously murdered in the lumber-room of her house, and a considerable amount of her property stolen. From information given by Mullins, a shoemaker named Emm, who collected rents for the murdered woman, was apprehended, and a portion of the stolen property found in an out-building adjoining his house, but to which Mullins himself or any other might have access. The other evidence against Emm was of the most inconclusive description. Mullins himself (who had formerly been a sergeant in the K Division of the Metropolitan Police) was apprehended, the theory being that he had acted against Emm, first with the view of diverting suspicion from himself, and, next, to secure the large reward of 300*l.* offered by Government for the discovery of the murderer. It was now established in evidence that Mullins was seen going in the direction of the cottage on the night of the murder; that he could get easy access to the house, from the circumstance that he was employed by the deceased to job about her property; that she was murdered when in the act of exhibiting paper-hangings; that when last seen he had in his hand a plasterer's hammer, with which the wounds might have been inflicted; that the marks in the clotted blood on the stair-head corresponded with an old boot worn on the night in question by the prisoner; that on his mantelpiece was found a piece of tape corresponding to that binding the parcel concealed near Emm's house, and also a piece of wax, with which the thread tying an inner parcel was covered—evidently for the purpose of strengthening the suspicion against Emm, who was by trade a shoemaker. It was also proved that Mullins was seen near to where the parcel was found a few days before he informed against Emm; and finally, that his wife had disposed of a silver pencil-case known to have been in the possession of the deceased when she was murdered. On the second day of trial the jury, after deliberating upwards of three hours, returned a verdict of Guilty, and sentence of death was passed by the Lord Chief Baron. He was executed on the 19th of November, having written a statement, not exactly in the form of a confession, but declaring his belief that Emm was innocent.

26.—The King of Piedmont with his army having crossed the frontier into the Abruzzi, Garibaldi advances with a body of volunteers to meet his Majesty, then marching upon the line of the Volturno. The interview took place between Teano and Speranzano. "Seeing the red shirts," writes a witness, "the King took a glass; and having recognised Garibaldi, gave his horse a touch of the spur, and galloped to meet him. At ten paces distant the officers of the King and those of Garibaldi shouted 'Viva Victor Emmanuel.' Garibaldi made another step in advance, raised his cap, and added, in a voice which trembled with emotion, 'King of Italy!' Victor Emmanuel raised his hand to his cap, and then stretched out his hand to Garibaldi, and with equal emotion replied, 'I thank you.'"

— Spain withdraws her minister from Turin, and protests against the invasion of the Papal territories by Sardinia.

27.—Several of the European Courts expressing disapproval of the late proceedings of the King of Sardinia, Lord John Russell now writes to Sir James Hudson, our minister at Turin:—"Her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in declaring that the people of Southern Italy had not good reason for throwing off their allegiance to their former Governments: her Majesty's Government cannot, therefore, pretend to blame the King of Sardinia for assisting them. There remains, however, a question of fact. It is asserted by the partisans of the fallen Governments that the people of the Roman States were attached to the Pope, and the people of the kingdom of Naples to the dynasty of Francis II.; but that Sardinian agents and foreign adventurers have by force and intrigue subverted the thrones of those sovereigns. It is difficult, however, to believe, after the astonishing events which we have seen, that the Pope and the King of the Two Sicilies possessed the love of their people. How was it, one must ask, that the Pope found it impossible to levy a Roman army, and that he was forced to rely almost entirely upon foreign mercenaries? How did it happen again, that Garibaldi conquered nearly all Sicily with 2,000 men, and marched from Reggio to Naples with 5,000? How but from the universal disaffection of the people of the Two Sicilies? Neither can it be said that the testimony of the popular will was capricious or causeless. . . . It must be admitted, undoubtedly, that the severance of ties which bind together sovereigns and their subjects is in itself a misfortune: notions of allegiance become confused, the succession of the throne is disputed, adverse parties threaten the peace of society; rights and pretensions are opposed to each other, and mar the harmony of the State. Yet it must be acknowledged, on the other hand, that the Italian revolution has been conducted with singular temper and forbearance. The subversion of existing power has not been followed, as is too often the case, by an outbreak of popular vengeance. The extreme views of democrats have nowhere prevailed. Public opinion has checked the excess of public triumph. The venerated forms of constitutional monarchy have been associated with the name of a prince who represents an ancient and glorious dynasty. Such having been the causes and the concomitant circumstances of the revolution of Italy, her Majesty's Government can see no sufficient ground for the severe censure with which Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia have visited the acts of the King of Sardinia. Her Majesty's Government will turn their eyes rather to the gratifying prospect of a people building up the edifice of their liberties, and consolidating the work of their independence, amid the sympathies and good wishes of Europe."

30.—Died, aged 85, Admiral Cochrane, Earl of Dundonald.

31.—The Middlesex magistrates quash a conviction obtained against Rosier for disorderly conduct in the church of St. George's-in-the-East, partly on the ground that the police-magistrate had not fixed a time when the fine of 3*l.* was to be paid.

November 3.—Explosion of the steamship Tonning in Yarmouth Roads. Eight of the crew were blown into the sea and drowned; the mutilated fragments of other three were found in the ship; seven were frightfully scalded; and the most of the live stock on board were killed and crushed into a shapeless mass. The survivors were taken off by the fishing-boats, and the wreck towed by a smack into Yarmouth harbour.

— The Sardinian army commences the siege of the fortress of Gaeta, where Francis II. had resolved to make a final stand.

4.—Chappell's pianoforte factory, Crown-street, Soho, destroyed by fire, and one woman killed by an explosion which took place.

6.—Died, aged 74, Admiral Sir Charles Napier, M.P. for Southwark.

— Abraham Lincoln, the Republican candidate, elected President of the United States.

7.—King Victor Emmanuel enters Naples in state, and issues a proclamation to the Neapolitan and Sicilian people:—"The results of the vote by universal suffrage give me the sovereign power over these noble provinces. I accept this new award of the national will, moved, not by any monarchic ambition, but by conscientious feelings as an Italian. The duties of all Italians are augmented. Sincere concord and constant self-denial are more than ever necessary. All parties must bow before the majesty of the Italian nation, which God uplifts. We must here inaugurate a government which may give security of free existence to the people, and of severe rectitude to public opinion. I put my reliance on the efficacious co-operation of all honest men. Where power is bounded by the laws, and strengthened by freedom, the Government has as much influence on the public welfare as the people excel by public and private virtues. We must show Europe that, if the irresistible force of events has broken through the conventionalities grounded on the calamities by which Italy was for centuries afflicted, we know how to restore to the united nation the empire of those unchangeable principles without which every society is infirm, and every authority is exposed to struggle and uncertainty."

9.—Miss Sheddon commences her pleadings before a full Divorce and Probate Court in the Legitimacy Declaration case of Sheddon v. Patrick. After occupying the court about fourteen days, the Judge Ordinary dismissed the appeal, being of opinion that the balance of testimony was against Ann Wilson being legally married earlier than the death-bed marriage celebrated at New York in 1798.

— Garibaldi departs from Naples for his retired home at Caprera.

11.—The famous Kildare-street club-house, Dublin, destroyed by fire, and three of the female servants burnt. The plate and wines were saved, but the furniture, pictures, and library were all consumed.

13.—Vice-Chancellor Wood gives judgment in the suit of Di Sara v. Borghese, arising out of the will of the late Earl of Shrewsbury. The plaintiff, the Duchess Di Sara, the only surviving child of the late Princess Borghese, formerly the Lady Catherine Gwendoline Talbot, second daughter of John, Earl of Shrewsbury, claimed to be entitled, upon the preliminary contract for the marriage of her mother, to one moiety of the real estate, and also one moiety of the personal estate, of which the Earl of Shrewsbury was possessed at the time of his death, besides a dowry in money of 40,000*l.*, which the contract also stipulated, and of which one half had been paid. The Vice-Chancellor gave judgment, that the effect of the preliminary contract was to retain to the Earl of Shrewsbury the power of disposing of his estate to strangers; and as the Earl did so, the result was that nothing but the dowry of 40,000*l.* went to the Borghese family.

14.—Commercial treaty arranged between Russia and China.

15.—After an unusually slow and disagreeable voyage, the Prince of Wales arrives at Plymouth in the Hero, having left Portland on the 20th October.

16.—The "limited" mail-train from Scotland runs into a cattle-train being shunted at Atherstone station, killing nine of the drovers, who were asleep in the last van, and smashing four of the loaded trucks. The fireman of the "limited" was the only person who lost his life or was seriously injured in that train.

19.—The Bishop of Down and Connor driven from a meeting of the Propagation Society in Belfast by a band of Orangemen, who were incensed at the prohibition of service on the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne.

21.—To moderate her intense grief for the loss of her sister, the Duchess of Alba, the Empress of the French crosses the Channel, and makes a series of hurried visits to various persons and places in England and Scotland. Her Majesty was attended only by the Marquis La Grange and two ladies in waiting. She put up a day or two at Claridge's Hotel, and then started for the north, where she permitted the private character of her visit to be so far broken through as to receive addresses from the corporations of Edinburgh and Glasgow. After a rapid tour to Dunkeld, Tynemouth Castle, Stirling, and Hamilton Palace, Loch Katrine, and Loch Lomond, the Empress returned to London by way of Manchester and Leamington. On the 4th December she was received by her Majesty at Windsor Castle, and returned to Paris on the 13th.

24.—Died suddenly in Holborn the Rev. George Croly, LL.D., of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, aged 80.

25.—In connexion with various ministerial changes now felt to be necessary, the Emperor Napoleon issues a decree conceding greater freedom of discussion to the Chambers, and appointing two sets of officials—speakers and administrators.

— President Miramon being driven from office by the oppressed Mexicans, Juarez enters the city with a victorious army, and resumes the reins of government.

26.—Decrees published by Victor Emmanuel II., annexing the Marches, Umbria, Naples, and Sicily to his new Italian dominions.

28.—Died at Bonn, aged 69, the Chevalier Bunsen, formerly Prussian Ambassador at (432) the Court of St. James's, and author of various learned works on the history of the Christian Church.

30.—Heard in the Court of Common Pleas the case of Emma Kemp, milliner, v. the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University. In January last the plaintiff was going in an omnibus with an undergraduate named Graham, of Emmanuel College, and some musicians, to a private party to be given at Shelford by Graham, in celebration of his B. A. degree, when the Proctor and his assistants, or "bull-dogs," stopped them at Barnwell, and took the plaintiff and other young women into custody. She was sentenced by the Vice-Chancellor to fourteen days' imprisonment, and was actually confined for four. The defence pleaded was "Not guilty; authority under certain University statutes, and the immemorial custom of the Proctors to apprehend suspected women." The questions put to the jury were whether the Vice-Chancellor had examined the plaintiff, and might be reasonably satisfied that she was in company with undergraduates for idle, disorderly, or immoral purposes. After many adjournments, the jury declared that they could not say "Yes" or "No" to the questions as submitted, but all agreed that further inquiry should have been made before the girl was imprisoned. This was entered as a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, 40*s.* In this, as in the case of another young woman, named Ebbon, a bill of exception was tendered, in order that the whole question of the public powers of the University might be argued before a higher court.

December 1.—Explosion in the Black Vein Pit of Risca Colliery, Newport, causing the death of 142 workmen, and between 30 and 40 horses employed in the pit. From the inquiry which took place into the cause of this catastrophe, it seemed not improbable that the explosion was caused by one of the men recklessly exposing his lamp for the purpose of lighting a pipe. The ventilating arrangements were so extensive that they were calculated to drive 48,000 cubic feet of air per minute down the shaft, and were proved by test, after the accident, to be then forcing down 37,500 feet per minute. The inspection of the works was said to be efficient and systematic; the men were provided in every instance with safety-lamps of the most approved construction, and these were said to be examined and locked by a special officer before they were delivered to the workmen. Of the 142 bodies brought to the surface, 72 appeared to have died from the effects of choke-damp; 65 bore the marks of burns; 3 were evidently burnt to death; and 3 died from injuries caused by the "falls."

4.—In the Court of Exchequer the case of O'Malley Irwin v. Lever, for services alleged to be rendered in starting the Galway Steam-packet Company, was withdrawn.

4.—At a meeting of the clergy and laity of the rural deanery of Amersham, Buckinghamshire, Mr. Disraeli avows his opinion that the question of Church-rates necessarily involves the existence of a National Church. "The clergy," he said, "must make members of Parliament understand that though this was not a party question, it was a political one, and a political question on which, in their minds, there ought not to be, and there could not be, any mistake. He could assure them from his own knowledge, that there were many members of Parliament who, on this question, gave careless votes, and thought by so doing they were giving some vague liberal satisfaction without preparing any future inconvenience for themselves. Let their clerical friends, Whig or Tory, Conservative or Liberal, make these gentlemen understand that, in their opinion, on the union of Church and State depend, in a large measure, the happiness, the greatness, and the liberty of England."

5.—M. Poinso, president of one of the chambers of the Imperial Court, murdered in the railway train between Troyes and Paris. The body had been pierced by two pistol shots, both in the head; and a third shot had been fired at the heart, but repelled by the clothing. The skull was also seriously fractured, and with such violence had the instrument of attack been used, that the brains of the deceased were scattered about the compartment. The assassin succeeded in making good his escape while the train was in motion, carrying with him the watch and railway-rug belonging to his victim.

7.—At the Durham Assizes, Thomas Smith, pitman and poacher, was sentenced to death for murdering his companion Batty, near Winton, with a "morgan rattler," or life-preserver. Though many weeks elapsed before he was apprehended, the conscience-stricken murderer seemed unable to move far from the neighbourhood of the crime, and was at last apprehended at Port Mulgrave, Yorkshire, whither hunger and weakness had led him. At the same assizes Milner Lockey was sentenced to death for murdering Thomas Harrison, at Urpeth Mill, by stabbing him with a knife, after making an attempt on the life of his own wife, whom he charged with undue familiarity with the deceased. Smith and Lockey were hanged on the 27th December.

— In an examination in bankruptcy concerning the transactions of Messrs. Streatfeild & Co., bankrupts with 750,000*l.* of debts, and Laurence, Mortimore, & Co., with 300,000*l.*, both leather merchants, it appeared that, though enjoying the highest of credit, they had for years been carrying on an involved series of accommodation-bill transactions with small firms or persons altogether imaginary, to the extent of, in 1857, 240,000*l.*; 1858, 320,000*l.*; 1859, 293,000*l.*; and 1860, 117,000*l.* The bankrupts said the banks were not only willing to take their "paper," but in almost every instance solicited it—one writing for a "tea-spoon" (5,000*l.*), and others for "spoons" of various sizes up to a "gravy-spoon" (20,000*l.*).

7.—Contest at Oxford between Mr. Max Müller and the Rev. Monier Williams for the Boden Professorship of Sanskrit. The polling commenced at two o'clock and continued till half-past seven, when the numbers stood—Williams, 833; Müller, 610: majority for Williams, 223.

12.—The Queen visits Oxford for the first time since her accession, on the occasion of the leave-taking of the Prince of Wales.

13.—Died, aged 76, the Earl of Aberdeen, head of the Coalition Cabinet of 1854.

15.—The Court of Chancery pronounces judgment in the long-litigated claim of the Rajah of Coorg against the East India Company, for the recovery of two promissory notes which he held against them, and which they had given to him as security for the repayment of two loans. The Company pleaded that having captured and annexed Coorg, these notes, by the right of conquest, formed part of the booty of war, as the Rajah, they argued, had lent the money in his sovereign and not in his private capacity. This was the view now taken by the Master of the Rolls, who dismissed the bill, but without costs.

16.—Abolition of passports in France. M. de Persigny addresses a circular to the Prefects of the Departments informing them that the Emperor had decided, "that from the 1st of January next, and by reciprocity, the subjects of the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland coming into France will be admitted to circulate on the territory of the Empire without passports. I request you, in consequence, to give the necessary instructions that English subjects may be received in France on the simple declaration of their nationality."

17.—Royal proclamation issued authorizing the new bronze coinage of penny, half-penny, and farthing pieces.

— Came on for hearing, in the Court of Common Pleas, the case of Anna Maria Cobden Hooper against Thomas Charles Warde, of Clapton House, Warwickshire, magistrate and formerly high-sheriff of the county. The plaintiff, who (with her mother's consent) had lived in the house in the capacity of Warde's mistress, complained that the defendant had several times assaulted her, and also compelled her to have intercourse with servants in the house. There was a count in trover for detaining articles of jewellery, and another count for money lent. The defendant denied that he had been guilty of the assaults, having acted only in self-defence. He also denied that the jewels were the property of the plaintiff; and as to the money lent, alleged payment. The evidence given by the plaintiff, and confirmed by others, disclosed a course of disgusting and shameful conduct on the part of the defendant. At the close of the second day's proceedings the jury found a verdict for Miss Hooper—damages for the jewellery, 100*l.*; for the loan, 80*l.*; and for the assaults, 500*l.* The Lord Chancellor afterwards caused the defendant's name to be erased from the Commission of the Peace, on the ground that he had shown a recklessness of conduct, and an unconsciousness of the distinction between right and wrong, which proved him to be a person wholly unfit to be entrusted with the power of taking part in the administration of criminal law.

19.—Died at Dalhousie Castle, aged 48, Lord Dalhousie, Governor-General of India from January 1848 to March 1856.

20.—Explosion in Hetton Colliery, Durham, causing the death of 23 men, mostly masons, employed in the pit at the time, repairing the road and roley-ways.

— South Carolina secedes from the United States. On this day the State Convention sitting at Charleston adopted the following ordinance:—"An ordinance to dissolve the union between the State of South Carolina and other States united with her under the compact entitled the Constitution of the United States of America: We, the people of the State of South Carolina in Convention assembled, do declare and advise, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the ordinance adopted by us in Convention, on the 23d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1788, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and also all acts and parts of acts of the General Assembly of the States ratifying amendments of the said Constitution, are hereby repealed; and that the union now existing between South Carolina and other States, under the name of the United States of America, is hereby dissolved." In subsequent sittings the Convention passed a variety of ordinances—one appointing the existing officers of the United States officers of the State of South Carolina exclusively; declaring that "all ships owned wholly or in part by citizens of slave-holding States should be registered as vessels of South Carolina; and directing all moneys collected by the said officers to be paid into the State Treasury for the use of the said State." Another ordinance empowered the Governor and his Executive Council to issue a proclamation to the world, "that this State is, or she has a right to be, a separate, sovereign, free, and independent State; and as such has a right to levy war, conclude peace, negotiate treaties, leagues, or covenants, and to do all acts whatsoever that rightfully appertain to a free and independent State."

24.—Christmas-eve the coldest night, and Christmas-day the coldest day, recorded for fifty years. The temperature at four feet above the ground was 8° below zero; and on the grass 13° below zero, or 45° of frost. In Staffordshire a thermometer registered 15° below zero, and one at Pennicuick, near Edinburgh, 14° below zero.

27.—Lord John Russell causes intimation to be made that despatches had been received at the Foreign Office enclosing a convention putting an end to hostilities with China, signed on the 24th of October by the Earl of Elgin with the Plenipotentiary of the Emperor of China.

29.—The iron-clad line-of-battle ship, Warrior, launched from the yard of the Thames Iron Ship-building Company. She measured 380 ft. in length, 58 ft. in extreme breadth, and 41 ft. 6 in. in depth. Her engines were 1,200 horse-power, and her gross tonnage 9,000 tons. She was designed to carry thirty-six 68-pounders, or 95 cwt. guns, on the main deck, ten Armstrong 70-pounders on the upper deck, and two Armstrong 100-pounders on pivots—forty-eight guns in all.

January 1.—Died at the Palace of Sans Souci, Potsdam, aged 65, Frederick William IV. King of Prussia. He was succeeded by the Regent Prince Frederick William Louis.

4.—Accident on the Shrewsbury and Hereford Railway, near Dinmore, several of the carriages being thrown down an embankment into the river Lugg: two female passengers perished from immersion or exposure to the intense cold.—On the same evening a casualty occurred on the North-Western line, near Camden station, three of the carriages getting detached from the Liverpool express train in the Primrose-hill tunnel: one thrown off the rails caused the death of one passenger and serious injury to others.—A third accident occurred on the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, near Sittingbourne, causing the death of one passenger. Another collision occurred near the same place, next day, in which the engineman and fireman were killed.

5.—Boiler explosion near Langton, Yorkshire, causing the death of two farm-labourers, and injury to six others, who at the moment were seated round the engine, partaking of their customary refreshment.

7.—At Ballymote, Sligo, a young man named Phibbs murders the two Callaghans and a servant-girl, by cutting their throats. Though a considerable portion of the stolen money and other property was found in his possession covered with blood, the first jury before which he was tried, at Sligo, refused to return a verdict. He was again tried at the next assizes, found guilty, and executed.

— A keeper at Astley's Theatre killed by the lion "Havelock." It had wrenched off the bars of its cage, and was, with three others, at large in the arena, when the spring was made on the unfortunate man. Death was supposed to have ensued instantly from the first spring at the neck, but the brute continued to carry the keeper in his mouth round the arena for some minutes, and was seen thus engaged by other servants, too terror-stricken at the moment to attempt a rescue. The lions were afterwards led quietly back to their cage.

8.—The Hartley Institution, at Southampton, founded by private munificence, to promote the study and advancement of science, opened by Lord Palmerston. At the déjeuner which wound up the proceedings of the day his Lordship was the oldest burgess present, having been admitted in 1807.

9.—Secession of Mississippi from the United States. Alabama followed on the 11th; Florida, on the 12th; Georgia, on the 19th; Louisiana, on the 28th; Texas, February 1st; Virginia, April 17; Arkansas, May 6; Tennessee, May 8; and North Carolina, May 20.

— In his Message to Congress President Buchanan made reference to the fact that, in several States which have not yet seceded, the forts, arsenals, and magazines of the United States have been seized. This, he thought, was by far the most serious step which had been taken since the commencement of the troubles. "My opinion," he said, "remains unchanged, that justice, as well as sound policy, requires us still to seek a peaceful solution of the questions at issue between the North and the South."

— Grand display of fireworks on the ice in St. James's and other parks.

— The first direct collision between the Federal Government and the South occurs in Charleston harbour, the troops in Fort Sumpter firing on the Star of the West when attempting to reach the city with reinforcements for the batteries.

12.—The Prince Alfred steamer, trading between Leith and London, wrecked in a fog off Flamborough Head.

15.—The Court of Queen's Bench grant a writ of habeas corpus to bring before it the fugitive slave Anderson, who was being kept a prisoner in Canada, pending the decision of the colonial authorities on the demand of the United States Government for his delivery under the Extradition Treaty. The demand was based on a charge of murder, alleged to have been committed in the State of Missouri, in the year 1853. One Digges, when attempting to capture Anderson, received a blow from which he died. The slave fled, and was ultimately conveyed to Canada through the aid of certain liberation machinery, known as the "underground railway." When the case came before the Canadian courts, Chief Justice Robinson sought to construe the Extradition Treaty with more rigour than English lawyers thought should be imported into such a question. "According to our law," he said, "homicide committed in resistance to lawful authority is murder. The authority by which Digges attempted to capture Anderson was unquestionably lawful by the law of Missouri, where the struggle took place. Although we are not bound to go to the local law for our definition of murder, we are bound to look to it to ascertain whether Digges was invested with lawful authority. We find that he was; and then we apply to this ascertained fact our own definition of murder, according to which the slave, though morally justified in the eye of our law, is nevertheless guilty of the crime of murder." The English court now granted the writ on a simple affidavit that Anderson was illegally detained at Toronto; and the only question which it considered was that of its own jurisdiction to issue such a writ into the province of Canada. The writ was directed to the Governor of Canada, as well as to the sheriff and gaoler of Toronto; and there was no doubt it would have been obeyed if Anderson had not been set at liberty by the authority of a colonial court. The writ arrived in Toronto on February 1st; and on that same day a writ of habeas corpus was granted by the Canadian Court of Common Pleas, on which the prisoner was brought up, and, after argument, discharged for informality in the warrant of commitment. A question which had excited a wide and painful interest was thus disposed of, without the necessity of determining the difficult legal controversy which had been agitated as to the duty of Great Britain under the Extradition Treaty with the United States.

15.—The Neapolitan General Lovera defeats the Sardinians at Tagliacozzo.

17.—Died in the United States, aged 37, Lola Montes, an adventuress and intrigante, who created some commotion in Bavaria in 1847.

19.—The last French ship-of-war leaves Gaeta, and a strict blockade is enforced by the Sardinian admiral, Persano.

21.—Explosion at Chatham arsenal, caused by the accidental bursting of a grenade in process of manufacture. The first explosion was followed by a number of others of lesser magnitude as the various heaps of grenades and fuses in that department of the factory ignited.

— In the Divorce Court, Miss Lavinia Janetta Horton Ryves petitioned under the Legitimacy Declaration Act for a declaration that her father, John Thomas Serres, and Olive, his wife, daughter of a so-called Princess of Cumberland, were lawfully married, and that she was their lawful child, and a natural-born subject of her Majesty. The court allowed that she had established her three allegations.

28.—Dr. Baly, physician to her Majesty, killed on the South-Western Railway, near Wimbledon. The carriage in which he was seated was dragged down the embankment, and fell in broken pieces on the passengers. The death of this distinguished physician led to a protracted investigation, but the exact cause was not discovered. The coroner's jury recommended that additional break-power should be applied to all railway trains. The guard, engine driver, and pointsman were praised for their promptitude and presence of mind.

28.—The agitation raised by the Protestant Alliance succeeds in removing Mr. W. B. D. Turnbull from the Record Office, on the ground of his strongly expressed Roman Catholic convictions. He writes this day to the Master of the Rolls :—“I am at a loss to express the pain which I feel at finding myself still the cause of a religious controversy, which seems to be becoming more embittered day by day. Strong though my religious convictions may be considered by some, I am not the less conscious of my own rectitude, and I feel that I am the innocent object of a persecution which, consistently with the precepts of our common Christianity, cannot be justified. This state of things, however, must now be brought to an end ; for I cannot, for my own individual advantage, allow the public mind to be disturbed by an acrimonious discussion of my own merits or demerits, from which no commensurate beneficial results can possibly arise. I therefore, with many thanks for your kind patronage, and with deep gratitude for the kind protection which you have so feelingly afforded me, beg to resign into your hands the Calendarship of the Foreign State Papers with which you honoured me in the month of August 1859.” The Master of the Rolls writes next day to Mr. Turnbull :—“It is with much regret that I have read your letter resigning your present employment. I feel, however, that I cannot press you to retain a situation which subjects you to so much persecution as that to which I have inadvertently exposed you. My regret at your resignation is, however, mainly founded on the public loss which will, I believe, be sustained by the discontinuance of your services ; nor will it be easy to find a gentleman both willing to carry on the arduous task in which you have been engaged, and also possessed of the peculiar knowledge and capacity required for that purpose. I cannot conclude without expressing the high esteem I entertain for yourself personally, and the pain I feel that any society of English gentlemen, professedly founded on religious principles, should have been found to exist in this country, who have considered it consistent with the charity on which those principles are based to endeavour, by ex-parte statements and confidential canvassing, to remove from an employment for which he is peculiarly fitted a gentleman so honourable and trustworthy as I consider you to be.”

— Revolutionary outbreak in Herzegovina against the Turkish rule.

31.—At Sheerness dockyard a “travelling crane” used in the boiler shop gives way when in use, and falls with a crash on a boiler beneath, causing the death of two men on the spot, and serious injury to other three.

February 2.—The Rev J. Sumner Brockhurst, of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, sen- (436)

tenced by the University Court to four years suspension from all degrees, for assaulting with a horsewhip the Rev. Edward Dodd, Fellow of Magdalen College and Vicar of St. Giles’s, Cambridge. The accused admitted to the offence, and said he had been impelled to it by a sense of the dishonour which Mr. Dodd was reported to have cast on religion by omitting the name of Christ from the common grace in the hall on one occasion when a Jew was present.

2.—Monaco purchased by the French under treaty for 4,000,000 francs.

4.—In the Imperial Address, at the opening of the French Chambers, the Emperor said :—“At Rome I have thought it necessary to augment the garrison, when the security of the Holy Father appeared to be menaced. I despatched my fleet to Gaeta at the moment when it seemed to be the last refuge of the King of Naples. After leaving it there for four months, I have withdrawn it, however worthy of sympathy a royal misfortune so nobly supported might appear. The presence of our ships obliged us to infringe, every day, that principle of neutrality which I had proclaimed, and gave room for erroneous interpretations.” The reference to the abandonment of the King of Naples by the Emperor gave rise to a sharp debate on the 1st of March, in which the Marquis Larochejaquelin and Prince Napoleon sustained the principal parts. “The treaties of 1815,” said the latter, “are, no doubt, to be respected, but on condition of execrating and tearing them whenever it may be possible. (Applause.) These treaties have been respected by Europe, but on condition of violating them to our prejudice. Remember Cracow ! Gentlemen, it is the glory of the Emperor that he has torn the treaties of 1815 with the point of the sword ; and the people are grateful to him for the act. (Much applause.)”

5.—The third session of the sixth Parliament of Queen Victoria opened by her Majesty in person. It was promised that measures would be laid before both Houses for the consolidation of important parts of the criminal law ; for the improvement of the law of bankruptcy and insolvency ; for rendering more easy the transfer of land ; and for establishing a uniform system of rating in England and Wales. Referring to America, her Majesty was made to say :—“It is impossible for me not to look with great concern upon any event which can affect the happiness and welfare of a people nearly allied to my subjects by descent, and closely connected with them by the most intimate and friendly relations. My heartfelt wish is that these differences may be susceptible of a satisfactory adjustment.” In the House of Lords the customary Address was agreed to without a division, although Lord Derby took occasion to comment with severity on the policy of the Government with reference to France and Italy—a policy, he said, which had placed on the people of this country an amount of taxation absolutely unprecedented in time of peace, and only made more intolerable by the financial freaks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Speaking of the unity of nationalities, he said, "No doubt all the people in Italy might be called Italians ;

'As hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves, are 'cleped All by the name of dogs.'"

In the Commons, an amendment moved by Mr. White, on the subject of Reform, was negatived by a majority of 129 to 46, and the Address thereafter carried without a division.

5.—Fire at Blenheim Palace, destroying the picture-gallery, and the fine series of Titians presented to the first Duke of Marlborough by Victor Amadeus, Duke of Savoy. A gigantic and much-esteemed painting by Rubens, "The Rape of Proserpine," also fell a prey to the flames. The fire was supposed to have originated in the bakehouse or storeroom over which the Titian gallery was built. A portion of the collection had been engraved in mezzotint, by John Smith.

6.—Died at Oxford, aged 79, the Rev. Bulkeley Bandinel, D.D., keeper of the Bodleian library.

—Explosion in the Earl of Shaftesbury's Coppice Pit Colliery, Cannock Chase; five men and two boys killed.

—In the Prussian Chambers, Baron von Vincke carries an amendment against the Ministry, in favour of strengthening the alliance with England, and promoting the consolidation of Italy.

7.—Lord Palmerston obtains the appointment of a committee to consider whether, by any alteration in the forms and proceedings of the House, the despatch of public business could be more effectually promoted. A committee for a similar purpose was fixed next day by the House of Lords. The most important change recommended, and afterwards carried out, was the substitution of Thursday for Friday as a Government night, and the adoption of Tuesday as a Supply night.

8.—Four men choked in a City sewer, while endeavouring to clean out that portion of the system lying between the Old Bailey and Farringdon-street. Three were found lying dead near each other, and a fourth was discovered far down the main sewer, in Bridge-street. The fatal gas was pronounced to be sulphuretted hydrogen, and was thought to have been created by the discharge of a quantity of acid water from copper-works in Warwick-lane.

—In a committee of the whole House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the preliminary resolutions on which he designed to found his new Post Office Savings' Bank Bill.

—The Southern States' delegates assemble at Montgomery, Alabama, to agree upon a constitution. Mr. Jefferson Davis was called upon to preside.

9.—Though Admiral Fitzroy had sent the warning telegram to the north-east ports three days since, "Caution; gale threatening from the south-west and the northward," about a hundred vessels confidently left the Tyne, and were caught in a fierce storm when off the south-Durham coast. On the shore near West Hartlepool between forty and fifty vessels were seen at one time struggling against inevitable disaster. On the Longscar Rocks a Chinese ship, the Kelso, with a cargo valued at 50,000*l.*, was lost; and at Whitby the lifeboat was capsized in one of her many errands of mercy during the storm, and thirteen of her crew drowned. A similar calamity befell the lifeboat at Blakeney, on the Norfolk coast; and at Kingstown, Ireland, Captain Boyd, of H.M.S. Ajax, with five of his men, was swept off the breakwater while heroically endeavouring to rescue the crews of three brigs, which had drifted to destruction behind the east pier. This serious maritime calamity excited much sympathy throughout the country, and subscriptions were at once set on foot in aid of the destitute relatives of the sufferers. Gold medals were awarded to Lieut. Dyer, of the Ajax, and to Mr. John Walsh, Lloyd's agent, who had also rendered good service at the wreck of the Tayleure in 1854.

11.—The Attorney-General obtains leave to introduce a bill for amending the laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency.

12.—The iron steamer Metropolis wrecked near Elizabeth Castle, Jersey. Cargo lost; crew and passengers saved.

13.—The fortress of Gaeta, the last in possession of the King of Naples, surrenders to the Sardinians under General Cialdini. The siege, accompanied with repeated attacks on the walls, had been carried on from the 3d Nov.

14.—The thanks of both Houses of Parliament voted to the officers and men in her Majesty's service who had been engaged in the recent operations in China. In the House of Lords the Secretary for War, Lord Herbert, made special reference to the cordial co-operation which had prevailed between the two branches of the service on the occasion; and in the House of Commons Lord Palmerston described the operations as performed amid considerable difficulty, without any mistake. Lord John Russell explained that the reason why General Montauban and Baron Gros dissented from the destruction of the Summer Palace was not because it was an act of unjustifiable barbarism, but because they thought it would strike such terror into the Chinese as might lead to their breaking off with the treaty.

—Sir George Lewis obtains leave to bring in a bill for conferring the four seats vacant by the disfranchisement of Sudbury and St. Alban's on the West Riding, South Lancashire, Chelsea and Kensington, and Birkenhead. The bill was afterwards modified in its progress through the House, one member being assigned to East Lancashire, and the West Riding divided, each to return two members. There was a general concurrence in awarding a member to Birkenhead.

15.—The Supreme Court in Paris disallow the claim of legitimacy set up by Jerome, son of Jerome Buonaparte and Elizabeth Paterson of Philadelphia.

16.—Discovery of the Durden-Holcroft frauds, carried on at the Henrietta-street branch of the Commercial Bank of London. John Durden, a ledger-clerk, whose duty it was to keep the accounts between D and H, with the corresponding pass-books, having devised a system whereby certain customers on paying money into the bank had the sum entered to their credit, and also to the credit of a confederate named Holcroft, an insolvent bootmaker, whom he instructed to open an account at the bank. Squaring his own daily balance in this way, Durden contrived to hoodwink the chief ledger-clerk, and managed at the same time to be constantly at the desk himself, so that none of his neighbour clerks had access to his books, through which the fraud might at once have been discovered. This was at length brought about through Durden's absence, from ill-health. He made no attempt to deny his guilt, and stated that his plunder amounted to about 66,992*l.* Durden was tried at the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude. His accomplice, Holcroft, escaped, on the technical plea that he had no particular knowledge of the larcenies with which they were jointly charged.

17.—Arrest of M. Mirès, the great French banker and contractor.

—Died at Exmouth, aged 68, Francis Danby, Associate of the Royal Academy, well known for his large imaginative paintings.

18.—The new Parliament of Italy meets at Turin in a large wooden structure erected for the occasion. The most important debates had reference to Rome and Venetia, as essential parts of a united Italy. "Opportunity, matured by time," said Baron Ricasoli, "will open our way to Venice. In the meantime we think of Rome. This is for the Italians not merely a right, but an inexorable necessity. We do not wish to go to Rome by insurrectional movements—unreasonable, rash, mad attempts—which may endanger our former acquisitions and spoil the national enterprise. We will go to Rome hand in hand with France."

—Jefferson Davis inaugurated, at Montgomery, Alabama, as President of the Confederate States. "Mutual interest," he said, "would unite goodwill and kind offices. If, however, passion or lust of dominion should cloud the judgment or influence the ambition of the North, we must prepare to meet the emergency, and maintain by the final arbitration of the sword the position which we have assumed among the nations of the earth. We have entered upon a career of independence which must be inflexibly pursued through many years of controversy with our late associates of the United States."

19.—The iron-built ship City of Glasgow wrecked near Belfast, two days on her voyage out. Her cargo was reported to have been insured for 120,000*l.*

21.—Violent storm, destroying much property on land and at sea, and memorable for the ruin of the north wing of the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. All stood well till about half-past seven o'clock P.M., when, during one of the fearful gusts which swept over the structure, some men in the carpenter's room heard a slight crashing of glass and iron, and immediately ran out to the terrace-garden. In another minute, with an appalling crash, the tower at the lower end of the wing fell over among the trees, and lay in fragments on the ground. In the course of two or three minutes the wing gradually gave way in pieces of 30 or 40 yards at a time, till a total length of about 110 yards was demolished.—During the same gale the spire of Chichester Cathedral fell to pieces almost on its own base, sinking, spectators said, like a large ship foundering quietly at sea.—From 9 A.M. to 5 P.M. the pressure varied from 3 to 12 lbs., and from 5 P.M. to 9 P.M. from 13 to 36 lbs. on the square foot. When the wing of the Crystal Palace fell, the anemometer at Lloyd's was registering 36 lbs. pressure. The barometer fell to 28.50*in.*

—Commenced in the Court of Common Pleas, Dublin, before Chief Justice Monaghan and a special jury, the case of Thelwall v. Yelverton. It was in the form of an action to recover the sum of 259*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for board, lodging, and necessaries supplied to the defendant's wife and her servant; but its main design was to establish the validity of a marriage between Teresa Longworth and Major the Hon. William Charles Yelverton, son of Lord Avonmore, and heir to the title. In his examination the defendant admitted the intimacy proved by the plaintiff, but said he had never promised her marriage, nor gone through any valid marriage ceremony in either Scotland or Ireland. From his first connexion with her in the Crimea to their final separation he had, he said, no other intention than making her his mistress. His evidence was received with manifest marks of disapprobation by the court, and was in opposition to the spirit of much of the correspondence produced. The trial lasted eleven days, the laborious summing up of the Chief Justice showing a manifest leaning towards Mrs. Yelverton. Mrs. Yelverton was waiting in an adjoining apartment during the retirement of the jury; and when she heard the summons of the judge to receive the verdict she fell on her knees with her hands clasped before her. The people sat in painful silence. "How say you, gentlemen, do you find there was a legal Scotch marriage?" "We do, my Lord."—"How say you, gentlemen, do you find there was a legal Irish marriage?" "Yes, my lord."—"Then you find Major Yelverton was a Catholic on the latter occasion?" "Yes, my Lord."—Then arose a thundering cheer, repeated over and over again: cheers for Mr. Whiteside, for the Chief Justice, for Serjeant Sullivan, and for the jury, reverberated through the court without the slightest interference on the part of the officials. The excited people outside surrounded Mrs. Yelverton as she left the court, took the horses from her carriage, and drew her in triumph to the hotel. Here she was compelled to address her noisy admirers from the balcony window—"My noble-hearted friends," she said, "you have made me this day an Irishwoman by the verdict that I am the wife of an Irishman. I glory to belong to such a noble-hearted nation. You will live in my heart for ever, as I have lived in yours this day. I am too weak to say all that my heart desires, but you will accept the gratitude of a heart that was made sad, and is now more glad. Farewell to the present; but for ever I belong, heart and soul, to the people of Dublin."

25.—Collapse of a tunnel on the Midland Railway at Sheffield, killing six men who were at work on an adjoining building, and severely injuring a seventh. This building was the cause of the accident.

26.—Meeting of both Houses of Convocation for the despatch of business, under a licence from the Crown, being the first gathering of the kind in recent years. The first business taken up was the alteration of the 29th Canon, to admit of parents being made sponsors for their own children. The Bishop of Oxford's motion recommending the change was carried without a division. In the Lower House, Dr. Jelf brought up the question of "Essays and Reviews" (published in Feb. 1860), by moving an Address to the Upper House, asking it to take synodical action upon a book full of erroneous views, and applied by atheists and Socinians to further their ends. After some discussion, the motion was withdrawn in favour of an amendment by Dr. Wordsworth:—"That the Clergy of the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, having regard to the unanimous censure which has been already pronounced and published by the Archbishops and Bishops of both provinces on certain opinions contained in a certain book called 'Essays and Reviews,' entertain an earnest hope that, under the Divine blessing, the faithful zeal of the Christian Church may be enabled to counteract the pernicious influence of the erroneous opinions contained in the said volume."

— The House of Lords, sitting as a Committee of Privilege, decide against the claim of Vice-Admiral Sir Maurice Berkeley, of Berkeley Castle, to a seat in the House of Peers as Baron of Berkeley. Sir Maurice claimed to sit by tenure, citing precedents in ancient times to show that former Barons of Berkeley sat by tenure. The Lords held that the ancient right to sit by tenure, if it ever existed, had been superseded by personal dignity.

26.—Austria issues decrees enlarging the Constitution of the Empire, and establishing it as a fundamental law for the representation of the people that the Reichsrath should consist of two Chambers—Peers and Deputies. 28.—During this month 285 vessels were reported as having been wrecked on the shores of the United Kingdom. Among the most important was the Miles Bartole, troop-ship, from Hong Kong for England, lost in Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope; but by the bravery and discipline of the company on board—the 3d Foot—the whole were conveyed safely ashore, and soon afterwards obtained relief from the Governor of the Cape.

— Disturbance in Warsaw arising out of the celebration of the battle of Grochow. It was finally suppressed by the military, who fired upon the people and killed six. The rioting was renewed on the occasion of their funeral.

March 2.—A new Tariff Bill (Morrill), almost prohibitory, so far as foreign commerce was concerned, passed by the Northern States of the American Union.

3.—The Emperor Alexander of Russia issues a decree emancipating the serfs throughout his vast dominions. The proprietors, retaining their rights of property on all the lands belonging to them, were to grant land to the peasants, at a fixed regulated rental, and to see that each fulfilled his obligations to the Government. The document concluded:—"And now, pious and faithful people, make upon thy forehead the sacred sign of the cross, and join thy prayers to ours to call down the blessing of the Most High upon thy first free labours, the sure pledge of thy personal well-being and of the public prosperity."

4.—Fatal occurrence in the bear-pit at Berne. Captain Lorts, of the British army, falling accidentally into the compartment occupied by the old bear, an attempt was made to rescue him about an hour afterwards, when the brute attacked the young man with great ferocity, and finally killed him in presence of many excited friends who had come to render assistance.

— The new President of the United States, (439)

Abraham Lincoln, enters formally upon the duties of his office. In the course of his address he said:—"I have no purpose, direct or indirect, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so. No State," the President further remarked, "can, upon its own mere motion, lawfully get out of the Union: resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void, and acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary according to circumstances." The address closed as follows:—"If there be an object to carry, if the minority will not acquiesce, the majority must, or the Government must cease. There is no alternative for continuing the Government but acquiescence on the one side or other. If a minority in such a case will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which, in turn, will ruin and divide them; for a minority of their own will secede from them whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such a minority. For instance, why may not any portion of a new confederacy, a year or two hence, arbitrarily secede again, precisely as portions of the present Union now claim to secede from it? All who cherish disunion sentiments are now being educated to the exact temper of doing this. Is there such perfect identity of interests among the States to compose a new Union as to produce harmony only, and prevent renewed secession? Plainly, the central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy."

4.—Debate in the House of Commons on the affairs of Italy. On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. Pope Hennessy called attention to the active interference of Lord John Russell in promoting what Mr. Pope Hennessy styled "Piedmontese policy," and assailed both that policy and the past and present conduct of the Foreign Secretary. Reference having been made to the courage manifested by the King during the siege of Gaeta, Mr. Gladstone replied:—"It is all very well to claim consideration for him on account of his courage; but I confess I feel much more admiration for the courage of the honourable member for Dundalk (Sir G. Bowyer) and the honourable member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy): for I think I would rather live in a casemate listening to the whizzing of bullets and the bursting of shells, than come before a free assembly to vindicate—(Loud cheers, which prevented the remainder of the sentence being heard.) The miseries of Italy," he concluded, "have been the danger of Europe. The consolidation of Italy, her restoration to national life—if it be the will of God to grant that boon—will be, I believe, a blessing as great to Europe as it is to all the people of the Peninsula. It will add to the general peace and welfare of the civilized world a new and solid guarantee."

4.—In the House of Lords, the Marquis of Normanby moves for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the appointment and resignation of Mr. W. B. D. Turnbull in the Record Office, where he was engaged calendaring documents of the reigns of Edward and Mary. (See Jan. 28.) The plea for a committee was founded on the allegation that Mr. Turnbull was compelled to resign because he had been deprived of the support of the Government in the attacks made upon him for being a Roman Catholic. The Earl of Derby said:—"It is contrary to all justice, polity, and wisdom, if you desire to have faithful and honourable servants, to allow any person whatever who has been appointed to a situation, and who has been found blameless in it, to be whispered and tormented out of it by slanders behind his back, and by imputations upon his honour which he had no means of refuting. Mr. Turnbull having been appointed, whether wisely or not, and the objections against him having been found not to interfere with the faithful discharge of his duties, he ought to have been protected by the Government against the insinuations which drove him to resign, by the mere force of the irritation and vexation which they caused. And I say that a Government which consents to the dismissal of a faithful servant under such circumstances does not deserve to have, and will not have, faithful servants." The motion for a committee was negatived by 41 votes to 26.

5.—At the Assizes, Newcastle, William Bewick, a man of position and education, and until lately a Justice of Peace for Northumberland, was sentenced to four years' penal servitude for shooting two sheriff's officers. He had been deprived of his commission for falsely imprisoning a man and his wife, and, refusing to pay the costs in the case, an attorney obtained judgment against him, and sent two officers to take possession. They each swore that he first threatened to shoot them, then locked himself up in the house, and finally fired upon them in a cowshed where they had taken refuge.

11.—In introducing the Navy Estimates, Lord Clarence Paget urges upon the House the necessity of proceeding at once with the construction of iron-cased vessels similar to the French La Gloire and the English Warrior. The discussion which subsequently took place on the relative merits of iron and wood warships led to important changes in their construction.

12.—At the Exeter Assizes, Private Robert Hacket, of the 61st Regiment, was sentenced to be executed for shooting his sergeant, Henry Jones, in the barracks at Plymouth, on the 5th January last. The murderer and his victim had served in India together, and were on the best of terms till the day in question, when a trifling quarrel in the mess-room led to the capital offence for which the prisoner was now convicted. He was executed, maintaining to the last that he had no intention of shooting Sergeant Jones, and attributing the crime to the effect of drink.

13.—Mr. Locke King's motion for lowering the county franchise to a 10*l.* qualification defeated, on the second reading, by a majority of 248 to 229. Mr. Disraeli was among those who objected to deal with the question of extending the suffrage in counties otherwise than by a complete and comprehensive measure in connexion with the borough franchise, and with all that affected the representation of the people in Parliament.

— A large clerical deputation waits upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, to present an address signed by 800 of their order, praying his Grace to devise measures for banishing from the Church the authors of such heresies as appeared in "Essays and Reviews." In reply, his Grace deprecated the idea of any section of the Church involving itself in a tedious and uncertain law-suit, and urged his hearers to wait with patience till they saw the satisfactory replies which he was sure were preparing in abundance in the Church.

— Hayti united to Spain.

19.—In the House of Commons, Mr. Dunlop moves for the appointment of a Select Committee relating to Afghanistan presented to the House in 1839, and the character of the mutilation to which the despatches of Sir Alexander Burnes had been subjected. Lord Palmerston resisted the inquiry, contending that Burnes had been imposed upon by Dost Mahomed, and that the Government, who had the direction, and were responsible for the results, of the war, judged of the proceedings of Dost from a much wider range of facts than Burnes had access to. Mr. Bright said, "My honourable friend, Mr. Dunlop, has told us of the marvellous care which had been taken, so that the guilty person must have been, not only a man of ability, but a man of genius. Of course, there are men of genius in very objectionable walks of life: but we know that the noble lord is a man of genius, or he would not have been on that bench for the last fifty years; and we know also that Lord Broughton is a man of varied accomplishments. I ask again, will the noble lord tell us who did it?—he knows who did it. Was it his own right hand, or Lord Broughton's right hand, or was it some clever secretary in his or in the India Office? The House has a right to know: we wish to know, because we want to drag the criminal before the public; we wish to deter other Ministers from committing a like offence." Motion rejected by 159 votes to 49.

— The Sardinian Ambassador intimates to the British Government that Victor Emmanuel had assumed the title of King of Italy. On the 30th Earl Russell answered:—"Having laid your communication before her Majesty the Queen, I am commanded to state to you that her Majesty, acting on the principle of respecting the independence of the nations of Europe, will receive you as the Envoy of Victor Emmanuel II., King of Italy."

20.—The cities of Mendoza, San Juan, and San Louis, populous towns of the Argentine Republic of South America, destroyed by an earthquake, the first and principal shock of which occurred about 8:30 this evening, succeeded by other shocks which spread over the three following days. The total number of persons who perished in this great convulsion of nature was estimated at 15,000. Not only were the largest buildings in the cities mentioned above cast down, but the whole district was broken up, rivers being turned from their courses, and roads and bridges involved in one general ruin. In the Jesuit church of Mendoza, where a large number had gathered for evening service, the walls and roof fell down on the worshippers and enclosed them in one huge sepulchre. A fire also broke out among the ruins of the city, and led to the loss, it was believed, of about 600 people. Troops, accompanied by physicians, with food, clothing, and medicine, were at once despatched to protect the destitute survivors from the crimes perpetrated.

trated on them by bands of plunderers who flocked to the ruined cities.

21.—At the Assize Court of the Isère, Grenoble, Benjamin Reynaud, a venerable-looking person, sixty-six years of age, of good education and easy fortune, was tried for murdering his daughter by stabbing her with a poniard. He appeared to have been excited to the deed by a contemptuous expression used in a note from one of his mistresses to his daughter. He also shot a young man with whom the latter had an assignation, and attempted to commit suicide by firing a pistol into his mouth. The jury found Reynaud guilty with extenuating circumstances, and he was sentenced to imprisonment for life.

22.—At Taunton Assizes, Matthew Wedmore and Charles Wedmore, brothers, were sentenced to death for the murder of an aged female relation, at Dundry, on the 9th January last. They were executed together on the 5th April.

26.—This day (Good Friday) five men lost their lives on Hollingworth Lake, near Rochdale, through a collision between two pleasure-boats.

27.—At the Brecon Assizes, Wm. Williams was sentenced to be executed for shooting his mother, Ann Williams, at Grwyney, Talgarth, on the 18th October last. The jury recommended the prisoner to mercy on the ground of his youth and ignorance; but the crime was so barbarous, and committed with so much premeditation, that no effect could be given to the recommendation. He was executed on Tuesday, April 23d.

28.—Meeting at the Mansion House to take steps to raise money for the relief of the starving people of North-west India. It was at one time feared that public sympathy could not be aroused in favour of this pressing and wide-spread calamity. On taking his seat on the 23d, the Lord Mayor (Cubitt) said that on making inquiry he found there were few or none of influence or station who were likely to come forward and take part in a requisition for a meeting, and he had, therefore, been recently compelled to write to Calcutta that he had not been able to meet the wishes of the Relief Committee formed there. After this public statement money began to flow in abundantly, and when the lists were finally closed about the end of June it was found that the large sum of 107,585*l.* had been collected. Of this sum 50,500*l.* was remitted to Calcutta, and 54,000*l.* to Bombay.

Mr. Roebuck refuse to hear any defence of the charges made against him in connexion with the Galway Steamboat Company and certain Austrian Government contracts. The Mayor was compelled to leave the chair in consequence of the noise and confusion caused by the excited electors. Mr. Roebuck obtained a hearing next day, entered at length into a vindication of his character and votes, and obtained a vote of confidence on the occasion.

1.—Volunteer sham-fights; at Brighton under Lord Ranelagh, and at Wimbledon under Lord Bury.

6.—Upsetting of a ferry-boat at Govan, near Glasgow, whereby seven people were drowned, and the lives of thirty others placed in great jeopardy. The accident was mainly owing to a panic seizing some of the passengers while the boat was being hastily overcrowded with people from one of the Clyde steamers.

— Six people drowned in Dublin by the upsetting of an omnibus, near Portobello-bridge, into the Great Canal. The horses in the vehicle became restive on the crown of the bridge, and having their heads towards the east parapet for the purpose of taking the ascent at an angle, backed with great violence against the opposite side, which gave way in the shock and permitted the omnibus and horses to fall into the canal.

8.—Census of Great Britain and Ireland taken this evening (Sunday), being the seventh decennial enumeration under the authority of Parliament. The registering staff was much more complete than on any previous occasion, and the returns embodied a greater variety of information, though one item—the attendance at churches—was omitted on the present occasion. The total population of the British Isles was taken at 29,334,788, as compared with 27,511,926 in 1851: of this number England and Wales contributed 20,061,725, as compared with 17,927,609 in 1851; and Scotland gave 3,061,329, as compared with 2,888,742; but Ireland showed a decrease of 787,842, the number in that portion of the United Kingdom being set down at 5,764,543, as compared with 6,552,385 in 1851. The net increase in England and Wales for the decennial period was 12 per cent., but over the entire kingdom only 6 per cent.

— Another outbreak at Warsaw, suppressed by the military after the slaughter of about 100 people.

9.—The Earl of Elgin lands at Dover after his special mission to China and Japan. In replying to the congratulatory address presented to him, his Lordship said:—"The Chinese, no doubt, still labour under the disadvantages, and exhibit the defects, which ignorance of the world and isolation engender both in individuals and society; but they are, nevertheless, a people eminently industrious, peaceable, intelligent, and commercial, and are, therefore, calculated, when the shackles and trammels which impede the true exercise of their natural energies shall have been shaken off, to contribute largely, both as producers and consumers, to the sum of human prosperity and natural well-being."

10.—Mr. Baines's proposal to reduce the borough franchise to 6*l.* negatived by a majority voting for "the previous question."

12.—A young man, named William Horsley, murdered in the Pack Horse Inn, Carlisle; strangulation, it was generally believed, having been effected by his mother-in-law, Mrs. Davidson, in a fit of jealousy, caused by his paying attention to some other woman than herself. Mrs. Davidson committed suicide the same night.

— Commencement of the sale of the famous Uzielli collection of gems, pottery, and paintings, which lasted over eight days, and brought prices formerly unheard-of in the world of Art.

13.—Publication of the Duc d'Aumale's letter to the Emperor of the French. "One thing," the Prince wrote, "astounds me; and that is, that my grandfather found no favour in your sight: for you, like him, sat on the left side of a Republican Assembly. There, indeed, the resemblance stops; for he expiated his fault. He left the National Convention to mount the scaffold, while you descended from the benches of the Mountain to enter the splendid mansion in which the Duke of Orleans was born. . . . When the Buonapartes threaten to shoot people, their word may be relied upon. And note this, Prince, that of all the promises made by you and yours, that is the only one upon which I could rely. For it must be admitted that the present French Government, all-fortunate as it has been in many respects, is less successful as regards the fulfilment of promises than in other things. One man only swore to the Republican Constitution, and that man was the author of December 2. The same man said, 'The Empire is peace;' and we have had the wars of the Crimea and Lombardy. In 1859 Italy was to be free to the Adriatic; Austria is still at Verona and Venice. The temporal power of the Pope was to be respected: we know what has become of that; and the Grand-dukes are still waiting for their restoration which was announced by the Peace of Villafranca."

— The Federal garrison of Charleston surrenders the fortress to the Confederates.

14.—Fire in Patrick-street, Dublin, causing the death of eleven people—nine of them children.

15.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces his annual financial statement in a Committee of Ways and Means. The expenditure he estimated at 70,000,000*l.*, and the income at 71,823,000*l.*, this being the largest estimate of revenue ever made. He proposed to apply the surplus in the reduction of the Income-tax by one penny per pound—the 10*d.* being reduced to 9*d.*, and the 7*d.* to 6*d.*—and to abolish the duty on paper. The first-mentioned reduction would absorb 850,000*l.* and the latter 665,000*l.* The proposal to abolish the paper-duty led to protracted discussion on the motion for going into Committee.

15.—Mr. Samuel White Baker, accompanied by his wife, leaves Cairo, on an expedition to discover the sources of the Nile. After a year's exploration of the Abyssinian frontier, they arrived at Khartoum June 11th, 1862. They remained in that neighbourhood till the close of the year, when they commenced their voyage up the White Nile, reaching Gondokoro early in February 1863.

— President Lincoln issues a proclamation, calling out the militia of the several States of the Union to the aggregate number of 75,000.

17.—A bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister thrown out on a division on the second reading, by a majority of 177 to 172.

— Proceedings were this day taken by the contending States in America which made a peaceable solution of their differences all but impossible; President Davis issuing letters of marque, and President Lincoln declaring the Southern ports in a state of blockade. In his message to the Provisional Congress at Montgomery, on the 29th, the former said: "I entertain no doubt you will concur with me in the opinion that, in the absence of a fleet of public vessels, it will be eminently expedient to supply their place by private armed vessels, so happily styled by the publicists of the United States 'the militia of the sea,' and so often and justly relied on by them as an efficient and admirable instrument of defensive warfare. I earnestly recommend the immediate passage of a law authorizing me to accept the numerous proposals already made."

19.—The State of Maryland desiring to remain neutral in the quarrel between North and South, the mob in Baltimore attack a party of Massachusetts troops on their march through to Washington. Secretary Seward wrote to the Governor, that the force to be sent though the State was designed for nothing but the defence of the capital. "The President," he wrote, "cannot but remember that there has been a time in the history of the American Union when forces designed for the defence of the capital were not unwelcome anywhere in the State of Maryland."

21.—Attempted murder in the house of G. Higgins, Chapel-street, Islington, a youth named Frederick Strugnell making a savage attack on the female servant, Ann Redkisson, to prevent her raising an alarm of "Thieves!" whom he had introduced to plunder the house. He was sentenced to death for the capital offence, but respited.

24.—Debate in the House of Commons on the proposal to facilitate elections for universities by permitting the use of voting-papers.

A bill authorizing this novel experiment was passed during the session through both Houses of Parliament.

28.—The Confederate Congress passed an Act authorizing the President to borrow fifteen millions of dollars on the credit of their own States, by the issue of bonds at eight per cent., the principal and interest being secured by an export duty on cotton of one-eighth of a cent per pound.

29.—Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between her Majesty and the Sultan signed at Kaulidja.

May 1.—At a Mansion House banquet, Lord Derby explains the reasons which induced the Conservative party to support the present Ministry in office, rather than involve the country in a new series of embarrassments arising from the present divided state of parties.

3.—President Lincoln issues a proclamation calling into the service of the United States 42,000 volunteers, and directing that the regular army should be increased by 22,714 officers and men, and the navy by 18,000 seamen. The following day Mr. Secretary Seward wrote to the American minister at Paris:—"You cannot be too decided or too explicit in making known to the French Government that there is not now, nor has there been, nor will there be, the least idea existing in this Government of suffering a dissolution of this Union to take place in any way whatever. There will be here only one nation and one government, and there will be the same republic and the same constitutional union that have already survived a dozen national changes and changes of government in almost every other country. These will stand hereafter, as they are now, objects of human wonder and human affection. You have seen, on the eve of your departure, the elasticity of the national spirit, the vigour of the national Government, and the lavish devotion of the national treasures to this great cause. . . . The insurgents have instituted revolution with open, flagrant, deadly war, to compel the United States to acquiesce in the dismemberment of the Union. The United States have accepted this civil war as an inevitable necessity."

6.—Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart delivers judgment in the case of the Kossuth notes. The Emperor of Austria prayed that Messrs. Day, who had undertaken to furnish Kossuth with a large quantity of paper-money for circulation in Hungary, should deliver up the same, and that the plates should be destroyed. At the same time he obtained an injunction restraining the Messrs. Day from delivering the notes to Kossuth, Sir John Stuart holding that the paper-money prepared was intended for circulation in Hungary. The question now was whether the Messrs. Day could be allowed to possess this large quantity of printed paper manufactured for such a purpose. The defence was, that the court had no jurisdiction. Sir John Stuart was of a contrary opinion. The regulation of the currency he held to be a great prerogative right of sovereign power. A public right recognised by the law of nations is a legal right, because the law of nations is part of the common law of England. Whereas in the present case the existing rights of a plaintiff as sovereign of Hungary are recognised by the Crown of England, the relief which he seeks in this case is for the protection of that legal right against the acts of the defendants. That protection can only be effectually afforded by the relief prayed in this suit, and there must be a decree against the defendants according to the prayer of the bill. Judgment confirmed on appeal, June 12.

6.—In a Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Gladstone announces his intention of including all the chief financial propositions of the Budget in one bill, instead of dividing it into several. This course was objected to by Mr. Disraeli and other members of the Opposition as contrary to precedent and constitutional usage, and designed to limit the powers of the House of Lords. Lord Robert Cecil characterised the step as designed "to avenge a special political defeat, to gratify a special pique, and to gain the doubtful votes of a special political section." Sir James Graham, though suffering from illness, spoke with great vigour and eloquence on the side of the Government proposal. "It is open," he said, "to the Lords to reject the whole; or, if they think fit, they may alter a part of it; but, according to the well-known principle, altering a portion is equal to the rejection of the whole. I have heard a sort of hustings-cry, 'Down with the paper-duty, and up with the tea-duty.' Now, I do not wish to raise an invidious hustings-cry; but if we are to have a hustings-cry—if that fatal issue should be joined, 'Up with the Lords, and down with the Commons,'—if that issue be taken, I do not think that gentlemen on this side need be afraid of going to their constituents with that cry; and I very much mistake if the power and authority of the House of Commons would not be confirmed by a large majority." The proposal of the Government was carried after several nights' debate by a majority of 296 to 281. The Lords afterwards consented to the arrangement.

7.—On the motion of Mr. Maguire, Government consent to the production of certain papers connected with the mission of Mr. Gladstone as Lord High Commissioner to the Ionian Islands in 1858, and also with the subsequent administration of Sir Henry Storks.

8.—In answer to Mr. Gregory, Lord John Russell announces in the House of Commons that, after consulting the law-officers of the Crown, the Government were of opinion that the Southern Confederacy of America, according to principles which appear to be just principles, must be recognised as a belligerent Power.

10.—Debates in both Houses of Parliament on the subject of the French occupation of Syria, which had been consented to under a convention by the British Government, in consequence of the calamitous outbreaks in that country. Several speakers laid the blame of the late unhappy events in that country upon the Ottoman Government.

— The Stoker tragedy at Gateshead: Mary Stoker, aged 39, wife of a pitman, cutting the throats of her daughters, Mary and Margaret, and then her own, while in a state of mental depression. Before life was quite extinct, she was able to articulate, "I had it to do; there was some one spoke to me from behind my back; and I was frightened that the canny bairns would want."

12.—Lord Shaftesbury directs the attention of the House of Lords to that part of the Report of the Education Commissioners relating to Ragged Schools, which he characterised as untrue, unfair, and ungenerous. The Duke of Newcastle defended the Report, and the motion for papers was subsequently withdrawn.

— In the Hungarian Diet, M. Deak protested against the Emperor's diploma of 20th October, 1860, by which the existence of the Hungarian Government was made to depend on a foreign assembly. The first address adopted by the Diet was not received by the Emperor; nor was it till the members addressed him as the hereditary King of Hungary, that he promised to restore the Constitution under conditions tending to the development of the whole empire.

— Neutrality proclamation issued by her Majesty, warning all subjects of the Queen from enlisting in the sea or land service on either side of the American belligerents, from supplying munitions of war, equipping vessels for privateering purposes, engaging in transport service, or doing any other act calculated to afford assistance to either party.

16.—A missionary named Gordon and his wife cut to pieces by the savages of Erromanga.

17.—Falling in of a portion of the Metropolitan Underground Railway, Euston-road, St. Pancras. About four o'clock the whole of the earth in front of the pavement on the north side, the pavement itself, and the walls and railings in front of no less than eight houses fell in with a loud crash. Previous warnings regarding danger at this part of the line had led to the withdrawal of the workmen before the accident.

18.—Explosion at Waltham powder mills; one man killed, and three injured.

19.—Epsom Races. The Derby won by Kettle drum: the Oaks (30th) by Brown Duchess.

20.—Father Daly, of Galway, and the Premier. A rumour being current in the House that the votes of Irish members on the Budget division had been influenced by the decision of the Government with reference to the Galway contract, Lord Palmerston now explains what had taken place at the interview with the Rev. Father, who waited on him to urge the claims of the Company. "I said the question must be discussed publicly in the House of Commons, not privately in my room. Mr. Daly said if I would not discuss it with him, would I do so with a deputation of Irish members. I said I did not see that it was a matter between me and the Irish members, but between the Government and the Galway Company; nor did I see what the Irish members had to do with it more than to take part in the discussion that must follow on the motion. (Laughter.) Mr. Daly said I was mistaken, because the Irish members must take some action on the subject. I said, 'Yes, that action will be on the discussion.' (Cheers and laughter.) 'Well,' Mr. Daly said, 'that won't exactly do—(laughter): I wish to bring a deputation of Irish members to you on Monday.' But Monday, I told him, was the day appointed for the Budget, and the Galway contract is a different question. (Laughter.) I said, 'There is no discussion on Monday about the Galway contract. There is no reason why I should receive a deputation on that day; and, moreover, if I were to receive a deputation, I know already everything they could say to me, and I can only tell them what I tell you—namely, that it is a public question to be discussed in the House of Commons, and not in a private room in my house. ‘Well, but,’ said Mr. Daly, ‘I am anxious that you should see them on Monday, because they must take action on the subject—(laughter)—and that action must be taken on Monday evening.’ (Renewed laughter.) ‘Oh,’ said I, ‘I now understand you—(much laughter); and when it is put to me in that way, I must, with all due deference and respect for the Irish members, entirely decline seeing any of them.’”

June 1.—M. Blondin commences a series of performances at the Crystal Palace on a rope stretched at a great distance from the ground.

3.—Sir Charles Wood makes a short preliminary statement respecting the finances of India, on which to found a resolution, to which he asked the assent of the House, affirming the expediency of raising money in the United Kingdom for the service of India. The Indian financial statement was made on the 25th of the following month, when a loan of 5,000,000*l.* was proposed to assist the railways.

— Arrangement concluded regarding the Wilton-Dickson scandal. In connexion with the dismissal of Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson from the 2d Tower Hamlets Militia, that officer charged the Colonel, Lord Wilton, with (1) having introduced to the officers a female of loose habits; (2) with keeping her in his hut on Woolwich Common on a certain day till the regiment was ready for inspection; (3) that he had received the regimental salute in company of the said female; and, generally, with conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman, derogatory to the position of a deputy-lieutenant of the Tower Hamlets, and especially disgraceful to a privy councillor, a peer of the realm, and a magistrate. In anticipation of a Court of Inquiry ordered by Mr. Secretary Herbert for to-morrow, it was now agreed:—(1) That Colonel Dickson shall appear before the Court of Inquiry and state that he has placed himself in the hands of his friend, Mr. Duncombe, M.P., who has recommended him to withdraw the charges made against the Earl of Wilton, being satisfied with the explanations which have been given; and Colonel Dickson is to ask permission of the court to withdraw the same. (2) Mr. Duncombe and Mr. Edwin James, on behalf of Lord Wilton, undertake to use their best efforts with the authorities of the War Office and Horse Guards to restore to Lieut.-Col. Dickson the position he has lost in his profession, and endeavour to obtain for him some employment consistent with his former rank. (3) Colonel Dickson having incurred a large expense, arising out of the dispute and charges against him connected with the Tower Hamlets Militia, and in the action brought by him against Lord Wilton, Mr. Duncombe has represented this to Mr. Edwin James; and he has agreed, on Lord Wilton's behalf, to pay Colonel Dickson 600*l.* upon this arrangement being carried out. The first article of the arrangement was carried out at the Court of Inquiry; the third was discharged by Lord Wilton on the 14th; but the second led to much after-dispute and bad feeling among the parties mixed up in the scandal.

— Wreck of the Montreal Steam Navigation ship, Canadian, on an iceberg, while passing through the Straits of Belleisle. Out of a crew of 97 and 112 passengers, 35 were drowned by the upsetting of one of the eight boats in which those on board took refuge. The mail also was lost.

5.—Horticultural fête on the occasion of opening the new grounds of the Royal Horticultural Society at Brompton. In answer to an address presented to him on the occasion, his Royal Highness the Prince Consort said, “That which last year was still a vague conception, is to-day a reality, and I trust will be accepted as a valuable attempt at least to reunite the science and art of gardening to the sister arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting.”

6.—Died at Turin, in his 52d year, Camillo Benso di Cavour, known in this country as Count Cavour, the Prime Minister of the King of Italy, regenerator of the kingdom, and one of the most popular of modern Italian statesmen. His disorder was of a typhoid character, and, unfortunately, the science of Italian physicians did not discard the pernicious practice of bleeding. They bled their unhappy patient again and again, till his nervous system, previously reduced to great debility by hard work and anxiety, succumbed to their weakening attacks. When it became known in Turin that the Minister was in a dying state, a mournful crowd occupied the area before his palace, and sat day and night, mute, and apparently unchanged, watching with eager eyes every movement within the dwelling. It was said that the shadow of despair which fell over the whole city when the announcement of his death was made could be likened to nothing but the consternation felt on the arrival of the despatches which told of the fatal defeat of Novara in 1849. Baron Ricasoli was afterwards placed at the head of affairs.

7.—The British ship Prince of Wales wrecked at Albardas, Rio Grande; the natives of the district plundering the vessel and killing some of the crew. The refusal of the Brazilian Government to make restitution led to reprisals being made by Great Britain, and latterly to a suspension of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries. The dispute, in its latest form, was referred for arbitration to the King of the Belgians, who decided in favour of Great Britain.

11.—The Surrey Music Hall destroyed by fire, originating, it was supposed, from a portable fire left unguarded by some workmen engaged in repairing the roof. Before the last engine left the scene of disaster the lessee had converted the refreshment-room into a temporary concert-room, and the entertainments were carried on again.

— Overflow of water in Clay Cross Colliery, causing the death of twenty-one men and boys employed in the lower workings.

12.—Williamson, the manager of the Royal Exchange Fire and Life Assurance Company, at Manchester, sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude, for defrauding that company of £1,350*l.* by making claims for losses through imaginary fires, and claims in excess of proper amounts in the case of actual fires.

14.—Thermometer 82° in the shade, 108° in the sun. During the march of the Guards from Kingston to Guildford one private died of sunstroke, and two others were stricken down.

— Professor Faraday having been invited to "take part in one of Home's spiritual manifestations," wrote to Sir Emerson Tennent:—"I do not wish to give offence to any one, or to meddle with this subject again. I lost much time about it formerly in the hope of developing some new force or power; but found nothing worthy of attention. I can only look at it now as a natural philosopher; and because of the respect due to myself I will not enter upon any further attention or investigation unless those who profess to have a hold upon the effects agree to aid to the uttermost. To this purpose they must consent (and desire) to be as critical upon the matter, and full of test-investigation in regard to the subject, as any natural philosopher is in respect of the germs of his discoveries. How could electricity, that universal spirit of matter, ever have been developed in its relation to chemical action, to magnetic action, to its application in the explosion of mines, the weaving of silk, the extension of printing, the electro-telegraph, the illumination of lighthouses, &c., except by rigid investigation, grounded on the strictest critical reasoning, and the most exact and open experiment? and if these so-called occult manifestations are not utterly worthless, they must and will pass through a like ordeal."

19.—At the close of a debate on the third reading of Sir John Trelawny's Bill to abolish Church-rates, the House divided equally, 274 voting with the "Ayes," and 274 with the "Noes." The Speaker, on the occasion, gave his casting vote in favour of the "Noes," as he thought a division to pass or reject the measure was different from a division in the preliminary stages, when the "Ayes" had invariably the benefit of the casting vote. The bill was consequently thrown out.

19.—The race-horse Klarikoff, which ran fifth in the Derby, burnt to death in a horse-van, on the Great Northern Railway, while being conveyed to Malton.

— The morning papers publish a correspondence purporting to have been forwarded by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, and relating to a threatened attack on that gentleman by the author of "Puck on Pegasus," which had been somewhat severely handled in the Athenæum. Mr. Dixon immediately wrote to the Times that the pretended correspondence was as visionary as the famous Mr. Toots's confidential correspondence with the Duke of Wellington. "I have never seen Mr. Pennell—never received any letter from him—never, to my knowledge, read a line of his writing in my life. You have been imposed upon by a fabricator."

21.—Publication of the Times with a triple supplement, containing about 4,000 advertisements.

22.—Great fire at the wharves adjoining London-bridge, extending over a space, and destroying property to an extent, probably unparalleled since the conflagration of 1666. About four o'clock this (Saturday) afternoon the fire was discovered by a lighterman raging in what was called the old counting-house of Cotton's wharf, situated close to the water-side. The warehouses here had an extensive river frontage, and extended to Tooley-street backward. They were filled with merchandise of every description—Russian tallow, oils, salt-petre, hemp, gums, rice, and sugar, being in greatest abundance. Every floor of each of the huge warehouses may be said to have been loaded with goods, and of the whole of this valuable property, estimated at upwards of 1,000,000*l.*, scarcely a particle was saved. To be added to this loss there was the destruction of the entire western range of Alderman Humphrey's warehouse, flanking the new dock known as Hay's Wharf, and the burning of four warehouses and quay, comprising Chamberlain's Wharf, adjacent to St. Olave's Church. But exciting public feeling far more strongly than even the immense destruction of property was the death of the leader of the fire brigade, Mr. Braidwood, who was buried in a mass of the falling ruins the first night of the outbreak, while in the act of encouraging his men in their perilous labour. The fire burned for four days with a fierceness which made it doubtful whether the whole of that quarter of the metropolis might not fall a prey to the flames, nor was it for the long period of fifteen days that the fire could be said to have lost its terror by bursting forth in fresh and unexpected quarters. Besides Mr. Braidwood two other persons perished in the conflagration, and a number unknown lost their lives in the river while attempting to recover tallow and other salvage which poured out in vast quantities from the blazing warehouses. About ten o'clock on Saturday night, a spectator wrote that the fire seemed to be at its worst. Probably between eight and nine there was a greater body of flame than at any subsequent period, but the broad light of a summer evening drowned its glare. It was not till night-fall that the tremendous terrors of the spectacle could be appreciated. The whole south bank of the river, from London-bridge to below the Custom-house, seemed one stupendous pile of fire, glowing at its core with an intensity that made it painful to look at, and creating a ruddy glare on everything far and near. At this time the only hope of the firemen lay in the night continuing calm. Their efforts to check the flames they felt and knew were hopeless. All the engines of London and all that could be brought by rail or road from the suburbs were as useless as toys against the acres of burning ruins. People from all parts thronged to the seat of the fire. Cabs were in such demand, that it was difficult to find one disengaged. Every building which commanded a view was black with human beings: the multitudes on London-bridge rendering it for a time quite impassable; the cage on the summit of the Monument appeared full to suffocation; and everywhere—on church-tower, house-roof, and river—the eye fell on myriads of spectators. Probably at no time, even during the Great Fire of London, was there ever such a mass of flame as roared and seethed so dreadfully on the first night of the outbreak. All the small boats were obliged to keep close to the Middlesex shore. The intense heat rendered this necessary, but there were other dangers. As warehouse after warehouse caught fire, the barrels of saltpetre and tar with which some were filled exploded, and came pouring forth in streams of liquid fire which floated up upon the water in great sheets, and broke up at last into islands of flame which went floating up the river. Mr. Braidwood's body was eagerly sought for in the ruins till found, and interred in Abney-park Cemetery with great honour a few days afterwards.

23.—Died at Stratheden Lodge, Kensington, in his 81st year, the Right Honourable John Lord Campbell, Lord Chancellor of England, a judge who, by an industry and perseverance unparalleled, raised himself from the commonest walk in the legal profession. He was succeeded on the woolsack by the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell.

27.—The Great Eastern leaves the Mersey (448) with troops for Canada; the total number on board being about 3,300. She was caught in a storm about 280 miles westward of Cape Clear, and sustained damage to an extent which compelled her to put back to Kinsale.

28.—The Baron de Vidil, an adherent of the exiled House of Orleans, makes a murderous attack upon his son with a loaded whip, while riding together in a secluded lane near Twickenham. The young man was carried into a neighbouring public-house, followed by his father, who alleged that the injuries were the result of an accident on the road. In his depositions the younger Vidil said:—"I had just got a little way up the lane leading to the main road, when he said we had made a mistake, and must turn back. I turned back without saying a word. It is very shady in that corner. I saw no one near. I got a little ahead of the Baron, he being on the right. I had gone a pace or two when I felt a violent blow on my head. I turned round, being all right on the saddle, and saw the Baron's hand uplifted with something in it. With this he struck me another blow, and again raised his arm, when I hurried on my horse; and having got on a little way, I got down quietly, putting my leg over as usual, and ran on to where a woman and man were standing. I caught hold of the woman's dress and clung to her, praying her to protect me." Though the injured lad was quite communicative immediately after the assault, he gradually became less so, and finally, at the police examination, refused to give any information whatever tending to criminate his father. "If you insist upon my speaking," he said, "I am in a dreadful position. You do not know all. I understand that my father has accused me to a certain extent—he has made a charge against me. If he says anything against me, then I shall be compelled to tell everything. I wish him to know that if he insists I must tell all." The Baron fled to Paris immediately after the occurrence, was apprehended there, and tried at the Central Criminal Court on the 24th August; but as the son still refused to give evidence to criminate his father, the jury could find the prisoner guilty of unlawfully wounding only, and he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour.

29.—Died at the Casa Guidi, Florence, an hour beyond daybreak, and after a long illness, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, a gifted poetess and patriotic woman.

30.—This evening, about ten o'clock, a comet of extraordinary splendour burst into view, and continued for many nights a spectacle exciting both wonder and admiration. Its place when first seen was near Ursa Major, and directly beneath the pole star. The tail consisted of a curved brush of light, bending over in the direction of the two "pointers." It could be traced for a space varying from 70° to 100°, and had a length, by calculation, of 16,000,000 or 18,000,000 miles.

30.—Juarez elected President of the Mexican Republic with dictatorial powers.

— Excitement in India occasioned by the publication of "Nil Darpan," a Hindoo drama libelling the indigo-planters. The translator, the Rev. James Long, was sentenced to fine and imprisonment, while the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, who encouraged the work, and his Secretary, Mr. Seton-Kerr, who had without authority distributed copies, were severely censured, and resigned in September.

July 2.—Discussion in the House of Commons on the Derryveagh eviction, and the crimes which had been committed in connexion therewith. Mr. Butt's motion for a committee of inquiry was negatived by 88 to 23 votes.

— The Lords Justices of Appeal decide a case of considerable importance in connexion with the bankruptcies of Lawrence and Mortimore, leather-merchants. The Bank of England claimed to be mortgagees on an estate at Egham, bought by the bankrupts, to the extent of 83,000*l.* Mortimore bought the estate originally, but as it was too large for him, and rising in value, he proposed to his partners to join him, and the purchase-money was paid out of partnership funds. The accounts were kept also in the partnership books. The Lords Justices held that the property having been purchased as a speculation, must be held to be part of the partnership property, and pass to the assignees.

— Meeting held in Exeter Hall, to welcome the fugitive slave, John Anderson, whose case had recently excited much interest.

4.—Speech-day at Harrow. Lord Palmerston laid the first stone of the new library intended to commemorate the mastership of Dr. Vaughan.

5.—The Hungarian Diet vote an address to the Emperor of Austria praying for the restoration of the old Constitution and the coronation of the Emperor at Pesth.

6.—Died, aged 73, Sir Francis Palgrave, of the Record Office, historian and antiquary.

8.—Came on for hearing, in the Court of Common Pleas, before Lord Chief Justice Erle and a special jury, the case of Turnbull v. Bird. The plaintiff, as before mentioned, was appointed Calenderer in the State Paper Office by the Master of the Rolls, and was compelled to resign in consequence, as he alleged, of attacks made upon him by the Protestant Alliance, of which the defendant was secretary. Among other injurious statements circulated regarding him, one was contained in a memorial prepared for presentation to Lord Palmerston, to the effect that since certain documents had been placed in his hands, an important letter from the Queen Dowager of Scotland to the then commander of the French army, and said to tell strongly against the Papists, had disappeared. Another was contained in a paragraph copied from the

Athenæum into the Alliance's Monthly Letter:

"Mr. Turnbull retires from the task of writing officially the 'History of Religion in England under Queen Mary.' There will now be peace in the Record Office, and among the six thousand of the Protestant Alliance, and of the Scottish Reformation Society." In a letter to Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Turnbull omitted the latter clause of the above paragraph, and appeared otherwise to believe that the words, "Record Office," as he copied them, referred to the State Paper Office, and not, as explained by Lord Shaftesbury, to the Record newspaper office. His Lordship, however, did not hesitate to write that the statement that the defendant was engaged to "write officially the 'History of England under Queen Mary,'" was a grave error, and not to be justified. The trial extended over three days, and resulted in a verdict for the defendant. Mr. Turnbull died soon after, suffering from the persecution to which he considered he had been subjected.

8.—The Lower House of Convocation adopt a resolution to defer the further consideration of "Essays and Reviews," pending the result of the suit instituted by the Bishop of Salisbury against Dr. Rowland Williams, Vicar of Broadchalk, one of the Essayists.

— On a division, the motion for adopting the Italian style for the new Foreign Office was negatived by 188 to 95 votes. Lord Palmerston made a lively defence of the condemned order against the criticism of Lord John Manners.

9.—At Epworth, Isle of Axholme, the wife of a farmer named Wilson, while in a fit of desponding insanity, takes away the lives of her three children by drowning them one after another in the water-cistern.

11.—Sir John Pakington directs the attention of the House to the Report of the Education Commissioners, with the view of learning to what extent the Government intended to adopt its recommendations. Mr. Lowe thought the Commissioners had not provided any remedy for the three faults they pointed out, viz. superficial and imperfect tuition; schools not so widely spread over the country as was necessary; and general complication of system.

12.—Frightful encounter between two men in a house in Northumberland-street, Strand. One of the surviving actors, Major Murray, gave an account of the occurrence to the effect that when he was passing up from Hungerford Bridge he was accosted by a stranger and questioned regarding the intention of the Grosvenor Hotel directors to borrow money. With the view of discussing certain details connected with the proposal Major Murray was induced to accompany the stranger to a residence he described as his chambers, No. 16, Northumberland-street. "I asked him for his card of address; he said, 'Immediately,' got up from the table, walked round me and began rummaging among the papers of a desk. I thought he was looking for his card, and took no particular notice. Presently I felt a touch in the back of my neck—there was a report of a pistol, and I dropped off the chair on the ground. I was perfectly paralysed. I could not move any part of my body. My head, however, was quite clear. I was lying with my face to the fender, and when he fired I believe he left the room. After some little time I felt returning life in my leg and arm, and was just raising myself on my elbow when I heard a door open, and he came in again. He immediately walked up behind me and fired a pistol into my right temple. I dropped back on the carpet, and the blood gushed all over my face and eyes and mouth in a regular torrent. He either stooped or knelt down close behind me, for I could feel his breath, and he watched close to see if I was dead. I then made up my mind to pretend to be so. I felt that the bleeding was bringing life back to me fast all over my body, which was tingling to the fingers' ends. I knew if I could get on my feet I should be able to make a fight for it. After he had knelt behind me for some time, he got up and walked away; I then opened my eyes and took a look round, and saw a pair of tongs within a few inches of my hand. Feeling that my strength was returning to me, and there was the whole length of the room between us, I seized the tongs and sprang to my feet. He was then at the window. Hearing me move, he turned and faced me. I at once rushed at him and made a heavy blow at him with the tongs, which missed. I then seized them short by the middle and made a dash into his chest and face, which knocked him over on his back. I got my knees on his chest and tried to smash his head with the tongs. They were too long, and he got them in both his hands firmly. I struggled hard for some time to get them away, but he was as strong as I, and I could not do it. I looked round for something else to hit him with, and close to my right hand I saw a large black bottle, which I caught in my right hand, and, shaking the tongs with my left to keep him occupied, I hit him full with all my force, on the middle of the forehead, smashing it to pieces. That made him quiver all over, but still he did not let go the tongs, so I caught hold of a metal vase and dashed it at his head with all my might, but I missed him. Then, as I saw there was nothing else at hand, I set to work desperately to get the mastery of the tongs which he was holding all the time. During all this he was on his back, close under the window nearest the door. After a long struggle I got the tongs. As they came into my hands I lost my balance and fell back, but was up again in an instant, and by that time he was rising into a sitting position, which gave me a full fair blow at his head with the tongs, and I gave it him with all my might and main. I repeated it three or four times. He hid his head under the table to escape my blows, and I then hit him over the back of the neck; and in order to disable his hands I hit him hard over the wrists. I then thought he was sufficiently disabled, and tried to get out, but the door of the room was locked. I then went through the folding-doors of the front room and tried that way, but that door was locked too. In coming back through the folding-doors I met him again face to face walking towards me; I took a step back in order to get a full swing, and hit him on the head again with the tongs. He fell forward on his face through the folding-doors as if he was dead. I pushed his feet through the doors, shut them, and threw up the window to get out." It was in endeavouring to effect his escape at this point that Major Murray was seen by some workmen and assisted to the ground. He had then in his hands the tongs used in the struggle, broken, bent, and covered with blood and hair. He appeared for a few minutes unconscious of his injuries, but was soon overcome with their severity and conveyed to Charing Cross Hospital. The alarm being at once given to the police, an entry was forced into the chambers where the struggle took place, and their occupant found in the condition described by Major Murray. It was then ascertained that the unknown assailant was a Mr. Roberts, a money-lender, who rented the chambers. He also was conveyed to Charing Cross Hospital, but sank in a few days under his injuries, having been able to make little more reference to the encounter than "Murray did it all. He first shot himself and then attacked me with the tongs." The mystery was unravelled at the coroner's inquest, when a certain Annie Maria Moodie, of Elm Lodge, was examined. She passed as Mrs. Murray, and had for several years lived under his protection. Roberts had been recently making advances to her which she treated with considerable coldness, but could not reject altogether on account of certain pecuniary obligations. Roberts knew of her connexion with Murray, and designed the attack, it was thought, to get him out of the way.

13.—The American Minister communicates to Lord John Russell the draft Convention between the two countries relating to the rights of belligerents and neutrals in time of war. It stipulated that "Privateering is, and remains abolished; the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war; neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag; blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective, that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

14.—Oscar Becker makes an attempt to assassinate the King of Prussia when taking his morning walk in the Lichtenthal Allée, Baden-Baden. His Majesty was slightly wounded in the neck.

17.—The Lord Mayor entertains Mr. Cobden at dinner in the Mansion House, in recognition of his services in negotiating the French Treaty.

17.—The Mexican Congress resolve to suspend payment of public bonds for two years—a step which leads to a rupture of diplomatic relations with England and France.

20.—The Congress of the Confederate States assembles at Richmond, Virginia.

21.—Battle of Bull Run or Manassas Junction, resulting in the defeat of the Federals, 18,000 strong, under General M'Dowall, and their flight in great confusion to Washington. The loss on their side was estimated at 19 officers and 462 men; wounded, 64 officers and 947 men. Two regiments of volunteers, whose term of office expired the preceding day, insisted on their immediate discharge, and dropped to the rear at the commencement of the action. The Confederate loss was trifling, and considerable fear was entertained that they would march forward on Washington, then almost defenceless. The appearance of the defeated Federal troops in the streets of the capital gave rise to great excitement there.

21.—A gentleman of fortune, at Clapham, named Littleton, committed suicide in a fit of excitement induced, it was believed, by his wife having drowned herself in the Long Pond after a domestic quarrel.

22.—Mr. J. C. D. Charlesworth, M.P., convicted at York of bribery at the Wakefield election of 1859. The case was partly heard before, but broke down by the refusal of Fernandez, an important witness, to hear testimony. The judge, on that occasion, instead of permitting a withdrawal of the charge, dismissed the action, so as to allow of a new trial. Fernandez now acknowledged that he had used a portion of the 500*l.*, entrusted to him by Mr. Barth Charlesworth, in bribing the electors—50*l.* having been given in one case, and lesser sums in another.

— At the Cambridge Assizes, Augustus Hilton was found guilty, on his own plea, of murdering his wife at Wisbeach, and sentenced to be executed. He resolutely refused to alter his plea, nor would he permit any effort to be made for a commutation of the sentence.

— The Court of Session give a decision in favour of the pursuer in what was known as the "Cardross case." In 1858, John M'Millan, Free Church minister, of Cardross, was suspended by the General Assembly for charges of immorality, which had been fully discussed in the inferior courts. He appealed to the civil courts to protect him, on the ground that the proceedings were informal in so far as the Assembly had decided upon points not before them in the way of appeal. He was then called before the Assembly, and being interrogated regarding his appeal to the civil court, answered in the affirmative. M'Millan was, thereupon, deposed from the office of the ministry. On the case coming up in the Court of Session, the Judge Ordinary commanded the Assembly to produce their rules, or "satisfy production," as it was called; the Assembly refused, alleging that the matter was spiritual, and not subject to the review of the civil courts, and lodged an appeal. The Court of Session now rejected the appeal unanimously, on the ground that, although the Assembly could make any rules it liked, it must adhere to them, when, as in this case, they involved a contract. They could enable a majority to depose a minority without forms, but if they once established forms they must abide by them. After the case had occupied the court in many different phases, M'Millan withdrew his pleadings, and the claim fell to the ground.

24.—Lord John Russell delivers a farewell address to the electors of the City of London, on the occasion of vacating his seat preparatory to his elevation to the House of Lords. He remarked of himself, that he felt like the great emperor, who, three centuries ago, having been engaged in all the great transactions of his time, and thinking that he would like to see what would happen after his death, had all the pomps of his funeral prepared, and assisted himself as chief mourner at the ceremony.

26.—At the Maidstone Assizes, Henry Sherry sentenced to death for wilfully setting fire to his father's house and barn, at Stourmouth, near Canterbury.

— The amendment of the Commons to the Lords' amendments on the Bankruptcy Bill, with their reasons for disagreement, came on for consideration in the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor (Bethell) warmly supported the decision of the House of Commons, in favour of the appointment of a chief judge. If this was a job, he said, he alone was responsible for it. Lord Chelmsford having replied to the insinuations of the Lord Chancellor against the Select Committee, and vindicated the decision of that Committee as entirely removed from party motives, stated his opinion that the appointment of a chief judge was unnecessary, as the duties which he would have to do were efficiently performed by those to whom they were now entrusted. The House resolved to adhere to its amendment on this clause, striking the chief judge out of the Bill, by a majority of 80 to 46. The Bill was afterwards accepted by the Commons in this state. The Spectator, referring to the debate in the Lords, said: "The language which the Lord Chancellor, so recently arrived amongst the peers, did not hesitate to use to his astonished audience, was not such as to increase his own dignity. The Christian principles which have been, as the Wolverhampton electors learnt from his own lips, a comfort and a sustenance to Sir Richard Bethell through his life, seemed almost as if they were going to desert him at the last. If a person of such piety could lose his temper, and forget himself, we should have said that, in a fit of passing weakness, Sir Richard Bethell was not what he once was in imagination at Wolverhampton."

29.—At the Derby Assizes, George Smith

aged 20, was found guilty of the wilful murder of his father, by shooting him in his own house. The prisoner made a defiant denial of his guilt to the court, but quailed as the time approached for execution, and left a written confession of his crime.

August 1.—A second fire in Tooley-street, destroying the premises of Curling and Co., wharfingers. Engines being still employed on the embers of the recent great fire, several were promptly at work on this new outbreak, and prevented it extending to the adjoining warehouses.

2.—Died, at Wilton House, near Salisbury, aged 50, Lord Herbert of Lea (Sidney Herbert), celebrated not more for the elegance of his accomplishments than for laborious exertions in the reform of the War Office, where he presided as Secretary till July last. He had retired to Spa with his family for the purpose of recruiting his energies, worn out in the public service; but it was too late. He daily became weaker and weaker, and feeling that his end was nigh he desired to be brought home, that he might die among his family. He was borne to his ancestral seat at Wilton—a seat which he had done so much to adorn, but where he could seldom reside. The evening on which he was carried within his hall it was found that his sight was gone; on the third evening he died.

5.—At the close of the second and last of the aristocratic fêtes given at Cremorne, Mr. Lythgoe, aeronaut, makes an ascent in the balloon Royal Normandy. After a voyage of unusual peril a descent was made near Lowestoft.

6.—Came on at Croydon Assizes, the trial of Johann Carl Franz, for the murder of Martha Halliday, at Kingswood Rectory, on the 10th of June last. The case presented in a marked manner the difficulties besetting merely circumstantial evidence; one series of strong coincidences which appeared to establish incontestably the prisoner's guilt being met by another series of coincidences tending as strongly to confirm his innocence. On the night in question the rectory was entered by two men for the purposes of plunder; Mrs. Halliday, wife of the parish clerk, was the only inmate.

Startled, it was presumed, at the forcible entry made into her apartment, the burglars to prevent her raising an alarm thrust a stocking down her mouth, and bound her hands and feet with cord of a peculiar make purchased at Reigate that afternoon. Being scared in the act of plundering the house, they fled from the premises almost empty-handed, leaving Mrs. Halliday choked in bed, where she was found next morning by her husband. A packet of papers picked up in the room, and written in German, referred to the career, appearance, and movements of Johann Carl Franz, the prisoner, a native of Schandau, in Upper Saxony. He was apprehended in London, when he gave the name of Salzman, but afterwards admitted that his real name was Carl Franz, and further that he was the owner of the documents bearing his name. At the trial it was clearly established in evidence that he was the person to whom the papers or "service-book," as it was called, had been delivered in Saxony, and it was further sought to be shown by witnesses, more or less positive, that Franz was one of two persons who purchased the ball of string in Reigate; that he was seen near the rectory on the night of the murder, and that there was found, tied round a shirt left by him at his lodgings, a piece of hempen cord matching exactly with that used to bind Mrs. Halliday. The defence appeared at first of great weakness and irrelevancy, Franz alleging that the papers produced had been stolen from him, with others he enumerated, by a poor countryman with whom he was travelling; that, wandering about London in a destitute condition, he heard of the murder at Kingswood being charged against him; that he therefore changed his name, and kept out of the way of the police; and that, so far as the piece of cord was concerned, he had picked it up at a tobacconist's door, not far from his lodgings in Whitechapel. Between his examination and trial evidence was procured to establish that the peculiar twine was manufactured within a few yards of the place mentioned by the prisoner; that he was not the person who had waited on Mdlle. Tietjens under the name of Krohn, one of whose papers was found in the bundle; and that he actually had lost at least some of his papers was proved by the production of a railway guard's testimony, and a kind of diary describing his journey from Hull to Liverpool and Staffordshire which had been found by two tramps in a roadside hovel on the borders of Northamptonshire. This latter document was produced by the Crown as an evidence of identity of handwriting. The jury, after much hesitation, returned a verdict of Not guilty.

6.—Parliament prorogued by commission. The Royal Speech announced that the French army of occupation had been withdrawn from Syria. Reference was also made to the Forfeited Seats Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, the Indian Government Bill, and the relief of shipping from passing tolls, as among the important measures to which her Majesty had given her sanction during the session.

7.—Explosion and fire at Summerlee coal-pit, near Hamilton, causing the death of twelve men employed in the works. About forty others were rescued alive by the courage and perseverance of volunteer assistants who descended the shaft.

8.—Two children eight years of age, named Barratt and Bradley, tried at the Chester Assizes, for the murder of George Burgess, aged two years and nine months, by throwing him into a pool, and afterwards beating him with sticks. The offence was committed in the most deliberate and cruel manner, the little infant being first stripped by the youths, and then flung into the water. A verdict of Manslaughter was returned, and Mr. Justice Crompton sentenced them to a month's imprisonment each, and at the expiration to be sent to a reformatory for five years.—At the same assizes Michael Doyle received sentence of death for a murderous assault on the person of Jane Brogine, a woman with whom he cohabited. He sought to deprive the poor creature of life by smashing her on the head with a stone, and trampling on her body. The ruffian was executed on the 27th of August.

— M. Deak delivers to the Hungarian Diet his famous answer to the Imperial rescript:—"We solemnly protest," he said, "against the exercise on the part of the Reichsrath of any legislative or other power over Hungary in any relation whatsoever; we declare that we will not send any representative to the Reichsrath; and further, that the election by any other instrumentality will be an attack on our Constitution; and that any person elected by such means cannot in any respect represent Hungary." The Emperor dissolved the Diet on the 21st, and soon after placed the kingdom under martial law.

12.—The King of Sweden visits England.

19.—Ten persons drowned at Scarborough by the upsetting of a small pleasure boat, which was returning somewhat overcrowded from a trip to Flamborough.

21.—The Queen, with the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Alfred, enter Kingstown on their third visit to Ireland. The Curragh was visited on the 24th, and Killarney on the 26th and 27th.

22.—Death of the Emperor of China, Hien-fung, and accession of his son Tsai-sun.

22.—Died, at Harrogate, aged 72, Richard Oastler, popularly known in the manufacturing districts as the "Factory King."

25.—Serious accident in the Clayton Tunnel of the Brighton Railway. Owing to a misunderstanding regarding the signals "train out" and "train in," an engine-driver was induced by the sight of a hand danger-signal to back his train to the Brighton end; but before its egress, the signal-man, thinking the tunnel was clear, permitted a parliamentary train to dart in, when the two came into violent collision. The engine of the parliamentary train crushed the last carriage of the other—an excursion train—into fragments, and then mounted over and crushed the next carriage, upon the ruins of which it rested in a nearly upright position. In the central compartments of the last carriage, and in each of the four compartments of the other, were numerous passengers now involved in one general calamity. The mutilated and crushed bodies of the killed and injured were mixed up with the wreck of the carriages, while the hot steam was pouring out from the engine on the suffering passengers. Twenty-three people were taken out dead, and 176 were more or less mutilated.

26.—James Rae, clergyman, sentenced to ten years' penal servitude, for forging and uttering a warrant or order for the payment of 6,000*l.*, with intent to defraud. Some time after the decease of his uncle, and when he had been defeated in various attempts to defeat the validity of his will, he produced a letter purporting to have been written by his uncle, in which was enclosed a cheque upon his bankers in Macclesfield for 6,000*l.* Rae took proceedings in Chancery to obtain that sum out of the estate of the testator. The trustees treated the letter as a fraudulent device, and now established in evidence, that not only were the letter and cheque forgeries, but that the prisoner had even forged the post-office stamp upon the envelope of the letter.

27.—Lord Palmerston installed at Dover as Warden of the Cinque Ports. In his address at the evening banquet, he said there were two securities for peace,—“the one consists in a state of perfect insignificance, the other in a state of perfect defence. The security arising from perfect insignificance, England, I think, will never enjoy. The securities for peace arising from a perfect state of defence unconnected with any notion of aggression, not coupled with hostility towards any one, but confined solely to a manly determination to protect and maintain what we have, is a security which I trust this country will long continue to possess. And so far from that being a reason why the most friendly relations should not be kept up with foreign Powers, in my opinion it is the only true, solid, and stable foundation upon which those friendly relations and the hope of a durable peace can rest."

29.—War commenced between the Argentine Republic and Buenos Ayres, which had withdrawn from the Confederacy in 1853. An engagement took place at Pavon, on the 17th September, when the forces of the Republic, under Urquiza, were defeated by General Mitre.

September 2.—Collision on the Hampstead Railway between an excursion train conveying certain servants of the North London Company from Kew, and a ballast train which had been shunted on to the "up" line till the engine-driver could bring himself by a "cross-over" to the head of his carriages. The engine of the excursion train was thrown off the rails, dragging six of the carriages after it down an embankment; three were precipitated over the wing-wall of a bridge into the road below, piled one above another, a fourth rested on the pile half over, and a fifth lay on the edge of the embankment. The passengers in the uninjured portion, though seriously hurt by the concussion, threw themselves out of the doors and windows, and rushed across the fields shrieking, sobbing, and fainting. A few rendered what assistance they could to the railway servants in rescuing the dead and dying from the frightful wreck lying around. Sixteen people lost their lives in this calamity, twenty had limbs broken, and over 300 received injuries of a lesser description. An official investigation led to the conclusion that the accident was caused mainly by the neglect of a signal-man named Rayner, who had taken off certain danger-signals before the excursion train came in sight, and while the ballast-train was in the act of shunting from the siding to the down line.

5.—Fire in Paternoster-row, breaking out in a corn warehouse in London House Yard, and embracing within its destructive sweep the tallow warehouse of Messrs. Knight and Son. The publishing warehouses on both sides of the Row suffered severely, some being destroyed altogether, and the contents of others so much injured by fire or water as to be altogether valueless. No less than six serious fires occurred in the metropolis this week.

12.—The Prince of Wales discharges his first public duty by presenting a new stand of colours to the 36th Regiment at the Curragh, where he had been stationed for some time.

17.—At Preston Barracks, Private Patrick M'Cafferay, of the 22nd Regiment, shoots Lieut-Col. Crofton and Captain Hanham while walking in the barrack-square. Col. Crofton expired on Sunday, and Captain Hanham on the Monday following. M'Cafferay appeared to have been incited to the act by a sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment passed upon him for neglect of duty.

18.—Explosion at Bedart's oil-cake manufactory, Rotherhithe, causing the death of ten workmen employed on the premises. In the course of the afternoon the feed-pipe to the engine was discovered to be out of order, and while an engineer was engaged in its repair the head of the boiler with the bars of the furnace underneath were blown out like a cannon shot among the workmen. As soon as an entry could be made into the ruins of the engine-house, it was found that not one employed there had escaped, five being killed on the spot, three surviving only a few hours, and two dying on Tuesday morning.

Father Passaglia issues a pamphlet pointing out the evils with which the temporal power was threatening the Church. He affirmed that disunion was springing up in Italy among the priests themselves, and that the people were abandoning the churches. He also alleged that the temporal power of the Papacy was only expedient during a period in history which had passed away.

18.—Case of Richard Guinness Hill, or "the Rugby Romance," as it was called. On the 5th of January, 1859, Mrs. Hill, a lady of considerable means in her own right, was delivered of a male child at Rugby, when on a journey from Ireland to London with her husband. The marriage contract drawn up between the parties made it more advantageous to the husband, so far as money was concerned, that there should be no surviving family after the decease of Mrs. Hill. Within a few days after her confinement she was induced, at the pressing solicitation of her husband, to let the child be taken out to nurse; but as to where it was taken or who the person was who had it in charge, Hill preserved a mysterious silence, which ultimately led to their separation. The matter was then put into the hands of Brett, a London detective, who displayed great ingenuity in tracing the lost infant, and now discovered it in a state of extreme wretchedness in a squalid lodging-house off Drury-lane. The course of the inquiry went to show that Hill, to hide as far as possible the existence of the child, commenced by causing a misleading entry to be made in the register at Rugby; he then hurried up to London, and obtained an ally in the person of a poor woman whom he found selling laces, or begging, in Windmill-street, Haymarket, and who, after various interviews with a person answering to the description of Hill, consented to receive the child, and bring it up as her own, for a fixed allowance of 16*l.* per annum. Hill next went back to Rugby, obtained the consent of the mother, as before mentioned, to let the child be taken out to nurse, and, in company with a servant named Catherine Parsons—an important link in the chain of witnesses—carried the child up to London. At the Euston Station they were met by the street wanderer before referred to, and two female companions whom she had brought with her in a cab. The infant was then handed to her in a shawl in which it had been wrapped by its mother before leaving Rugby. From that time to the present, this poor heir to 14,000*l.* had spent its existence among these wretched women, suffering great physical injury, and subjected to all the miseries arising from want of food and clothing. The house in which it was found appeared to be occupied from top to bottom by prostitutes and beggars. It was insinuated during the investigation that Hill was not the father of the child, and some colour was given to the statement by the proceedings which took place when he was brought up for trial on a charge of causing a false entry to be made in the register at Rugby. The jury then pronounced a verdict of Not guilty, on the ground that the registrar was dead, and the proof, therefore, insufficient to secure a conviction.

24.—Six ballet girls burnt to death in the Continental Theatre, Philadelphia, the muslin clothes in which five of them were dressed having come into contact with the blazing garments of another accidentally lighted at the gas.

25.—Died, aged 61, Joseph Maudslay, engineer.

26.—William Cogan tried at the Central Criminal Court for the murder of his wife, by cutting her throat during a fit of drunken brutality. He attempted to commit suicide at the same time, but did not inflict injury sufficient to cause death. He was now sentenced to death and executed on the 14th Oct.

27.—A Dublin cabman named John Curran makes a savage outrage on the person of Miss Jolly, a young lady, whom he was driving in the direction of Churchtown. She defended herself with remarkable bravery and self-possession till, aided somewhat by the restlessness of the horse, he was compelled to leave her, bruised and battered, but able with difficulty to make her way in the darkness of midnight to the railway station at Milltown, where the help she stood in need of was readily administered. Curran was tried for the offence on the 26th of October, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

— William Molony tried at the Central Criminal Court for murdering his wife, the case being chiefly remarkable for the prosecution depending mainly on one witness, who swore to having seen the prisoner in his own house inflict the fatal stab, though he took no steps to inform the police of the occurrence. Molony was sentenced to death, but after-inquiry led the Home Secretary to advise a commutation of the capital sentence.

27.—Fall of the iron bridge in process of construction at Lendal, York, one of the large girders dropping into the river when being hoisted to its place on the roadway. Five of the workmen were killed.

October 1.—Mark Frater stabbed in a public street in Newcastle by a cabinet-maker, named Clark, in revenge, it was believed at the time, for having pressed Clark in the capacity of collector of assessed taxes. When Clark was taken, almost red-handed, he exclaimed, "It is all right;—he robbed me, and now I have paid him. You can charge me with wilful murder." When put on his trial for the offence, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder"—in which the judge concurred; the prisoner remarking that he was "a very good sort of old wife." The Home Secretary afterwards ordered an inquiry into the state of Clark's mind, and being satisfied that he was then, if not previously, quite insane, ordered him to be sent to a lunatic asylum.

3.—One of the keepers of the Longships Lighthouse, Land's End, commits suicide by stabbing himself with a penknife.

7.—Died, at the residence of Mr. White Melville, St. Andrew's, Archibald William Montgomerie, thirteenth Earl of Eglinton, a popular Scottish nobleman.

8.—Viscount Forth, eldest son of the Earl of Perth, commits suicide in the Spa Hotel, Gloucester, by partaking of a bottle of laudanum while in a state of nervous excitement, induced partly by the sudden death of his mistress in child-birth.

14.—Burning of the stables attached to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich. Twelve horses destroyed.

— Russia declares Poland in a state of siege.

18.—William I. of Prussia and Queen Augusta crowned at Königsberg.

19.—Massacre of British colonists (Mr. Wills and family), by aborigines, on the Comet River, Queensland.

21.—Canton restored by Britain to the Chinese.

22.—Shakespeare's House and Garden purchased for the nation (through Mr. J. O. Halliwell) for 3,400*l.* In the auctioneer's announcement, the premises were described as "a convenient and highly desirable residence for a private family or professional gentleman, and presents an unusual opportunity for capitalists, builders, and others, on account of its extensive frontage in the centre of the town."

23.—Vincent Colucci tried at the Central Criminal Court, for obtaining money under false pretences from Miss Frederica Johnson, a lady of considerable means, to whom he had been introduced as an artist. An intimacy sprung up between the parties, and a marriage was arranged between them, when the numerous solicitations for money opened the young lady's eye to Colucci's real character and position. To secure the return of her letters she offered to give him 2,000*l.*, and handed him that amount (less 100*l.* which he had obtained before) at an interview which took place by appointment at the Pantheon Oxford-street, on the 3d of August. The sealed parcel, which he placed in her hands, was found, on examination at home, to contain only one letter and a few old newspapers. Colucci was now sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

24.—George and Frederick Clift sentenced to ten years' penal servitude for feloniously setting fire to a dwelling-house and stable at Peckham, with intent to defraud the Globe Insurance Company, with whom a policy of 2,800*l.* had been taken out. The Clifts represented that the stable was a warehouse, and full of valuable quills, but an inspection of the premises when the fire broke out, showed there was little or nothing in it, while from the dwelling-house the furniture had been entirely removed. George Clift was seen hurrying from the premises in a stealthy manner when the fire broke out.

— Explosion in a powder-mill at Ballincolig, near Cork, causing the death of five men.

25.—Died, at Netherby, aged 64, Sir James Graham, Bart., a statesman of considerable reputation in the House for eloquence and business ability, and long the trusted friend of the late Sir Robert Peel.

— The foundation stones of two public buildings—the new Post-office, and an Industrial Museum—laid in Edinburgh by the Prince Consort, who, with the Queen and the rest of the Royal Family, passed the preceding night at Holyrood en route from Balmoral to Windsor.

27.—A detachment of French troops cross into the Swiss portion of the Vallée des Dappes in consequence of the arrest of two French subjects at Ville-la-Grande. An international commission was appointed to settle the dispute, but separated without coming to any decision. The difficulty was ultimately arranged by a treaty concluded at Berne towards the close of the following year, in which, to provide against future embroilments, the frontiers of the valleys were more strictly defined than before.

29.—As indicating to some extent the feeling of the Cabinet towards America, the Duke of Argyll said to-day, at a dinner given by his tenantry, at Inverary: "Whatever we may think of the contest, in fairness to our American friends we ought to admit that no more tremendous issues were ever submitted to the dread arbitrament of war than those which are now submitted to it on the American continent. I do not care whether we look at it from the Northern or from the Southern point of view. Take the mere question of what is called the right of secession. I know of no government which has ever existed in the world which could possibly have admitted the right of secession from its own allegiance. There is a curious animal in Loch Fyne which I have sometimes dredged up from the bottom of the sea, and which performs the most extraordinary and unaccountable acts of suicide and self-destruction. It is a peculiar kind of starfish, which, when brought up from the bottom of the water, and when any attempt is made to take hold of it, immediately throws off all its arms, its very centre breaks up, and nothing remains of one of the most beautiful forms in nature but a thousand wriggling fragments. Such, undoubtedly, would have been the fate of the American Union if its Government had admitted what is called the right of secession. Gentlemen, I think we ought to admit, in fairness to the Americans, that there are some things worth fighting for, and that national existence is one of them."

31.—Opening of the Middle Temple Library by the Prince of Wales, who was made a Bencher on the occasion. His Royal Highness, at the close of a brief address, said: "While heartily congratulating you on the completion of this great work, I venture to express a fervent hope that the students within its walls may largely profit by the advantages so wisely and liberally provided for them, and may successfully emulate the fame of their ancient predecessors." The new Library was erected from designs by Mr. Abraham at a cost of 14,000*l.* The opening ceremony was followed by a service in the Temple Church, a déjeuner in the hall, and a conversazione in the evening.

— Convention concluded between Great Britain, France, and Spain, regarding Mexico, "feeling themselves compelled, by the arbitrary and vexatious conduct of the authorities of the Republic, to demand from the authorities more efficacious protection, as well as a fulfilment of obligations contracted." A joint expedition was afterwards despatched, France and Spain sending 6,000 men, and Great Britain one line-of-battle ship, two frigates, and 700 supernumerary marines.

November 1.—The first investiture of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, held by her Majesty at Windsor Castle. His Highness the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, Lord Clyde, Sir John Lawrence, General Pollock, and Lord Harris, were invested on the occasion.

2.—Severe storm on the east coast of England, destroying much shipping between Yarmouth and Newcastle. The loss of life was also considerable, particularly in the neighbourhood of Scarborough, where Lord Charles Beauclerk and two others were crushed between the Spa-wall and their boat.

4.—Failure of the Bank of Deposit, a fraudulent joint-stock speculation, carried on nominally under a Board of Directors, but in reality by one manager, Peter Morrison. Commencing about seventeen years since with an available capital of 8,000*l.*, the association continued its operations with daily and yearly losses—the amount in some years being more than equal to the whole capital received—and now the sum due to depositors amounted to 348,096*l.* The investments were found, in most instances, to “have no market value whatever.”

8.—Seizure of the Confederate Commissioners, Messrs. Slidell and Mason, on board the Trent, West India mail steamer. “Shortly after noon,” writes Commander Williams, “a steamer having the appearance of a man-of-war, but not showing colours, was observed ahead and hove to; we immediately hoisted our ensign at the peak, but it was not responded to until, on nearing her, at 1.15 P.M., she fired a round shot from her pivot-gun across our bows, and showed American colours. Our engines were immediately slowed, and we were still approaching her when she discharged a shell from her pivot-gun immediately across our bows, exploding half a cable’s length ahead of us. We then stopped, when an officer with an armed guard of marines boarded us, and demanded a list of the passengers, which demand being refused, the officer said he had orders to arrest Messrs. Mason, Slidell, McFarland, and Eustis, and that he had sure information of their being passengers in the Trent. Declining to satisfy him whether such persons were on board or not, Mr. Slidell stepped forward, and announced that the four persons he had named were then standing before him, under British protection, and that if they were taken on board the San Jacinto, they must be taken vi et armis. The commander of the Trent and myself at the same time protested against this illegal act—this act of piracy carried out by brute force, as we had no means of resisting the aggression, the San Jacinto being at the time on our port-beam, about 200 yards off, her ship’s company at quarters, ports open, and tampions out. Sufficient time being given for such necessaries as they might require being sent to them, these gentlemen were forcibly taken out of the ship; and then a further demand was made that the commander of the Trent should go on board the San Jacinto, but as he expressed his determination not to go, unless forcibly compelled likewise, this latter demand was not carried into execution. At 3.40 we parted company, and proceeded on our way to St. Thomas.” An additional formal affidavit was made by Commander Williams at the Admiralty, on the 27th, after the Trent reached Southampton. The excitement in the public mind at this wanton aggression on an unarmed vessel being very great, a Cabinet Council discussed the question on the 28th, and on the 30th Earl Russell wrote to Lord Lyons, the British Minister, at Washington, “that intelligence of a very grave nature had reached her Majesty’s Government.” After describing the nature of the outrage, the Foreign Secretary instructed Lord Lyons that her Majesty’s Government trust that when this matter shall have been brought under the consideration of the Government of the United States, that Government will, of its own accord, offer to the British Government such redress as alone would satisfy the British nation,—namely, the liberation of the four gentlemen, and their delivery to your Lordship, in order that they may again be placed under British protection, with a suitable apology for the aggression which has been committed.” Another despatch instructed Lord Lyons that in the event of Mr. Seward asking for delay, “in order that this grave and painful matter should be deliberately considered, you will consent to a delay not exceeding seven days. If at the end of that time no answer is given, or if any other answer is given, except that of a compliance with the demands of her Majesty’s Government, your Lordship is to leave Washington with all the members of your Legation, bringing with you the archives of the Legation, and to repair immediately to London.” Remonstrances and advice were also sent to the American Government by the Courts of France, Austria, and Prussia. Earl Russell’s despatch was received by Lord Lyons between eleven and twelve P.M. on the 18th of December. On the afternoon of the following day he waited upon Mr. Seward, who was reported to have received the communication seriously, but without any manifestation of dissatisfaction. He asked till the following day to consider the matter, and consult with the President. On the 26th he forwarded a despatch to Lord Lyons reviewing the transaction, and arguing the question at issue on the five following grounds:—(1) Were the persons named and their supposed despatches contraband of war? (2) Might Captain Wilkes lawfully stop and search the Trent for these contraband persons and despatches? (3) Did he exercise that right in a lawful and proper manner? (4) Having found the contraband persons on board, and in presumed possession of the contraband despatches, had he a right to capture the persons? (5) Did he exercise that right of capture in the manner observed and recognised by the law of nations? These questions he answered in the affirmative so far as America was concerned, but admitted two special difficulties which beset his side of the case—the want, namely, of specific instruction by the commander of the San Jacinto from his Government, and his permitting the Trent itself to proceed on her voyage after he had satisfied himself that she was carrying contraband of war. He concluded:—“I have not forgotten that, if the safety of this Union required the detention of the captured persons, it would be the right and duty of this Government to detain them; but the effectual check and waning proportions of the existing insurrection, as well as the comparative unimportance of the captured persons themselves, when dispassionately weighed, happily forbid me from resorting to that defence. It would tell little for our claims to the character of a just and magnanimous people, if we should so far consent to be guided by the law of retaliation as to lift up buried injuries from their graves, to oppose against what national consistency and the national conscience compel us to regard as a claim intrinsically right. Putting behind me all suggestions of this kind, I prefer to express my satisfaction that by the adjustment of the present case upon principles confessed by Americans, and yet, as I trust, mutually satisfactory to both of the nations concerned, a question is finally and rightfully settled between them which, heretofore exhausting not only all forms of peaceful discussion, but also the arbitrament of war itself, for more than half a century alienated the two countries from each other, and perplexed with fears and apprehensions all other nations." Lord Lyons forwarded Mr. Seward's despatch on the 27th December, the important document reaching London on the 9th January. In acknowledging its receipt the following day, Earl Russell wrote, that he did not think it necessary at that time to discuss the question under the five heads suggested by Mr. Seward (this was done in a later despatch, of date January 23), but he remarked drily, that in the meantime "it will be desirable that the commanders of the United States cruisers should be instructed not to repeat acts for which the British Government will have to ask for redress, and which the United States Government cannot undertake to justify." The Confederate Commissioners were placed on board a British war-ship, and arrived in this country with their secretaries, on the 29th of January. Congress passed a vote of thanks to Captain Wilkes for his seizure, and he was otherwise honoured at various public meetings in the States.

12.—At a dinner at Fishmongers' Hall, Mr. Yancey, a Commissioner from the Confederate States, thus eulogized the South: "Why should there not be peace? Simply because the North will not admit that to be a fact, which old England, followed by the first Powers of Europe, has recognised, and which the Confederate Government and armies have repeatedly demonstrated to be a stern and bloody fact—the fact that we are a belligerent Power. There can be no basis for negotiations or for peace proposals, or consultations, so long as the Confederates are deemed to be and are treated as rebels. But when our adversary shall become sufficiently calm to treat us as a belligerent Power, the morning of peace will dawn in the horizon. When that hour shall arrive, I think I may say the Confederate Government will be inflexible upon one point only—its honour and its independence. For the great interests of peace and humanity it will yield much that is material or of secondary importance."

— Died at Lisbon, of typhus fever, aged 24, Pedro V., king of Portugal. Don Fernando and Prince John, his two brothers, died of the same malady, the former on the 6th November and the latter on the 22d December.

14.—M. Achille Fould appointed by the Emperor Napoleon to the office of Minister of Finance.

18.—President Davis presents his first Message to the Confederate Congress, in which he reviewed the events of the year, and congratulated the South on the victories obtained at Bethel, Bull's Run, Manassas, Springfield, Lexington, Leesburg, and Belmont. "If we husband our means," he said, "and make a judicious use of our resources, it would be difficult to fix a limit to the period during which we could conduct a war against the adversary whom we now encounter. The very effort which he makes to isolate and invade us must exhaust his means, whilst they serve to complete and diversify the production of our industrial system. The reconstruction which he seeks to effect by arms becomes daily more and more palpably impossible. Not only do the causes which induced us to separate still exist in full force, but they have been strengthened; and whatever doubt may have lingered in the minds of any must have been completely dispelled by subsequent events."

21.—The Molloy tragedy in Dublin, a waiter of that name making a murderous attack on his wife, and cutting the throats of two children, while in a state of great mental irritation, brought on, it was believed, by severe distress.

22.—Died at Lancing, Sussex, aged 64, Thomas Slingsby Duncombe, Radical M.P. for Finsbury.

— The Confederate war-steamer Nashville arrives in Southampton harbour, having on board in irons the crew of the Federal merchantman Harvey Birch, which she had captured and burnt.

— Died at Sorrèze, in the department of the Tarn, aged 58, Father Henry Dominic Lacordaire, a distinguished Dominican preacher and political reformer.

24.—Fall of an old house in the High-street of Edinburgh. About ten minutes past one o'clock this (Sunday) morning, when all the inmates were in bed, suddenly, and without any previous warning, the ancient tenement collapsed and fell in shapeless ruins upon its own base, some of the outer walls falling into the street, and others choking up the close at its side. Upwards of eighty persons were buried in the ruins. Amid great dangers from falling fragments the work of rescue was almost instantly commenced, and carried on eagerly over Sunday. About fifty were got out alive, some of them severely injured, and the remaining great company of sufferers were found to have been killed by falling beams and stones, or suffocated in the rubbish. Of those rescued, a considerable number were children. On the rebuilding of the premises a memorial tablet was inserted in the front, illustrating a touching incident in the disaster—the rescue of a boy who was heard to encourage the workers above his prison with the remark, "Dig away, lads, I'm no deid yet."

25.—Chester Station Hotel destroyed by fire.

26.—The Italian Minister leaves Madrid in consequence of the refusal of the Spanish Government to restore the Neapolitan archives.

27.—Richard Reeve, a dissipated youth of 18 years of age, found guilty at the Central Criminal Court, of murdering his step-sister, aged 10, by hanging her in a cellar of their house in Drury-court. Being strongly recommended to mercy on account of his youth and the bad example set at home, the capital sentence was afterwards commuted to penal servitude for life.

28.—George Inkpen found guilty of murdering his sweetheart, Margaret Edmunds, in so far as he had aided and abetted her in the act of self-destruction by consenting to bind himself to her, that both might commit suicide together in the Surrey Canal. When they reached the banks of the canal, the young woman, who was alleged to be in a desponding state of mind, asked him if he had got a handkerchief with which they could tie themselves together, but when it was produced she thought it would not be long enough to go round them both. She then took from her pocket a piece of tape, and the prisoner took from his a boot-lace, with which they bound themselves tightly. Placing her arms on his neck, they flung themselves together into the canal. They turned over in the water two or three times, when either the lace or tape broke, and they were separated. The woman sunk at once, but the man rose to the surface, and reached the opposite bank of the canal, up which, though somewhat tipsy, he managed to crawl. In reply to questions now put by the judge, the jury said they believed the statement of the prisoner to be in every respect true, and that he had not been actuated in the slightest degree by malice. Sentence of death was passed, but not carried out.

December 2.—Great fire at Antwerp, destroying the Entrepôt and Belgian sugar refinery. Two firemen and eight assistants were killed by the falling in of the roof of the first-mentioned building.

— President Lincoln opens the 37th Congress of the United States. The appropriations asked for the service of the ensuing fiscal year were computed for a force of 500,000 men. The disaster of Bull's Run was but "the natural consequence of the premature advance of our brave but undisciplined troops which the impatience of the country demanded. The betrayal, also, of our movements by traitors in our midst enabled the rebels to choose and intrench their position, and, by a reinforcement in great strength at the moment of victory, to snatch it from our grasp." The President then referred to a method of blockades adopted at certain of the Southern ports, which created much indignation throughout Europe:—"One method of blockading the ports of the insurgent States and interdicting communication, as well as to prevent the egress of privateers which sought to depredate on our commerce, has been that of sinking in the channels vessels laden with stone. The first movement in this direction was on the North Carolina coast, where there are numerous inlets to Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds and other interior waters, which afforded facilities for eluding the blockade, and also to the privateers. For this purpose a class of small vessels were purchased in Baltimore, some of which have been placed in Ocracoke Inlet. Another and larger description of vessels were bought in the Eastern market, most of them such as were formerly employed in the whale-fisheries. These were sent to obstruct the channels of Charleston harbour and of Savannah river; and this, if effectually done, will prove the most economical and satisfactory method of interdicting commerce at those points."

3.—Died, in Park-square, Regent's Park, aged 83, Sir Peter Laurie, for many years connected with the magistracy of the City of London.

4.—The Londonderry monument inaugurated at Seaham; the Duke of Cleveland, Mr. Disraeli, and Mr. Mowbray making speeches at the luncheon which followed in the Town Hall.

— The United States Government refuse to join the allied European Powers in the attempt to restore order in Mexico.

6.—Came on for trial at the Chester Assizes the case of Jemima Morgan, or Thompson, a young woman of loose character, charged with murdering George Henry Davies, with whom she had been living for some weeks. The almost unprecedented circumstance that the unwilling survivor of two voluntary suicides should be tried for the murder of her less fortunate companion gave considerable interest to this case. On the 27th October last, while in a state of great depression, she agreed to commit suicide with Davies, and each procured for the other a quantity of laudanum which they had contrived to introduce into their lodgings. The prisoner alarmed the other inmates shortly after the dose had been partaken of, and they were both conveyed to the infirmary. She rallied so far as to be able to appear at the police-court next day, but Davies gradually sunk, and expired the following morning. The jury acquitted the prisoner.

8.—Eruption of Mount Vesuvius, destroying Torre del Greco, a city of 20,000 inhabitants, built on the slopes of the mountain towards the sea. About three o'clock in the afternoon a large opening was made in the ground above the town, and about half a mile below the crater of 1774. The first one was thrown up beneath some houses, which were blown up into the air. Some other ones were found, near the same place and on the top of the mountain. At two o'clock next morning the great crater burst out with tremendous noise, throwing stones and ashes to a great height. Streams of lava next began to descend the sides of the mountain, and, uniting together flowed down in one vast glowing river on the city. The mountain continued in a state of agitation during this month.

9.—Died in Dublin, aged 53 years, John O'Donovan, an Irish antiquarian of rare insight and accomplishments.

11.—Illness of the Prince Consort. An uneasy feeling was excited to-day by the publication of a bulletin announcing that "His Royal Highness is suffering from fever, unattended by unfavourable symptoms, but likely, from its symptoms, to continue for some time."

12.—Thomas Jackson, aged 19, private in the 78th Regiment, sentenced to death at Winchester Assizes for shooting Sergeant John Dixon in the barracks at Aldershot. He confessed the crime, and only regretted that the shot did not bring down another of the company. He died on the gallows as he had lived in the barracks—hardened and unrepentant.

14.—Death of the Prince Consort. This sad and unexpected national calamity was announced in an Extraordinary Gazette in the following terms:—"Whitehall, Dec. 15. On Saturday night, the 14th inst., at ten minutes before eleven o'clock, his Royal Highness the Prince Consort departed this life at Windsor Castle, to the inexpressible grief of her Majesty and of all the Royal Family. The Queen, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, their Royal Highnesses the Princess Alice and the Princess Helena, and their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Leiningen, were all present when his Royal Highness expired. The death of this illustrious Prince will be deeply mourned by all her Majesty's faithful and attached subjects, as an irreparable loss to her Majesty, the Royal Family, and the nation." The calamity was made known to the inhabitants of the metropolis about midnight, by the tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's; and early on Sunday morning the telegraph spread the intelligence in time sufficient to permit reference being made to the calamity in most of the churches throughout the kingdom. The bulletins issued on the day of the Prince's decease, showing the progress of the fever under which he suffered, were:—"9 A.M. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort has had a quieter night, and there is some mitigation of the severity of the symptoms."—"10.40 A.M. There is a slight change for the better in the Prince this morning."—"4.30 P.M. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort is in a most critical state."—"Midnight. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort became rapidly weaker during the evening, and expired, without suffering, at ten minutes before eleven o'clock." About four o'clock in the afternoon, it will be seen, a relapse took place, and the Prince, who, from the time of his severe seizure on Friday, had been sustained by stimulants, began gradually to sink. When the slight improvement took place in the morning, it was agreed by the medical men that if the patient could be carried over one more night, his life would, in all probability, be saved. But the sudden failure of vital power which occurred in the afternoon frustrated these hopes. Congestion of the lungs, the result of complete exhaustion, set in; the Prince's breathing became continually shorter and feebler, and he expired without pain. He was sensible, and knew the Queen to the last. "Of the devotion and strength of mind," writes the Times, "shown by the Princess Alice all through these trying scenes, it is impossible to speak too highly. Her Royal Highness has indeed felt that it was her place to be a comfort and support to her mother in this affliction, and to her dutiful care we may perhaps owe it, that the Queen has borne her loss with exemplary resignation, and a composure which, under so sudden and so terrible a bereavement, could not have been anticipated." After the death of the Prince, the Queen, when the first passionate burst of grief was over, called her children around her, and, with a coolness, which gave proof of great natural energy, addressed them in solemn and affectionate terms. Her Majesty declared to her family that, though she felt crushed by the loss of one who had been her companion through life, she knew how much was expected of her, and she accordingly called on her children to give her their assistance, in order that she might do her duty to them and to the country.—The concern for her Majesty's health, felt by all classes, was manifested by the interest taken in the daily bulletins. On Sunday, at noon, it was announced:—"The Queen, although overwhelmed with grief, bears her bereavement with coolness, and has not suffered in health." On the 18th it was intimated:—"The Queen had several hours of undisturbed sleep last night, and is calmer this morning." Addresses of condolence were forwarded from all parts of the kingdom; but the sudden and terrible blow produced a commotion of feelings which almost forbade the use of the ordinary language of respect and sorrow.

16.—Commission opened by the Court of Chancery, before Mr. Commissioner Warren, Q.C., to inquire into the sanity of William Frederick Windham, Esq., of Fellbrig Hall, Norfolk. The Court sat till the 30th of January, thirty-four of the intervening days being occupied by the examination of about 150 witnesses, many of whom spoke to the habits of wild prodigality and debauchery indulged in by the subject of inquiry. The jury found that he was of sound mind, and capable of managing himself and his affairs.

17.—William Beamish tried at Warwick Assizes for poisoning his wife. He attempted to avert the suspicion attached to him by pretending to have found in his wife's dress a letter addressed to "Jane Stokes," in which she admitted having taken the arsenic herself, and hoped that no one would be blamed for it. He was found guilty, and shortly before his execution made a formal confession of the crime, as also of forging the letter.

— The Spanish portion of the allied expedition to Mexico lands at Vera Cruz, and afterwards occupied the fortress of St. John d'Ulloa.

18.—Henry Wells Young, a solicitor in good practice, sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude for defrauding the Bank of England by uttering forged documents to sell and transfer stock, amounting in the aggregate to 5,666*l*. The prisoner had been employed as the legal adviser of the persons in whose name the money stood in Consols, and thus became acquainted with the handwriting of the parties and the particulars of their estate.

— At the York Assizes, James Waller, a notorious poacher, was sentenced to be executed for shooting a gamekeeper on the estate of Mr. Horsfall, Hawkeswaith Hall.

19.—Fire at Winyard Hall, Durham, the residence of the Marchioness of Londonderry, destroying the chapel and the entire west wing.

20.—At the Stafford Assizes, Brandrick, Jones, and Maddox, with four others, were tried for the murder of John Bagott at Bilston, on the 20th September. The victim in this case was a tailor and draper of eccentric habits, who was known to keep a considerable sum of money secreted about his house, and on the night in question was noticed to have been carried home drunk. The premises were broken into and plundered, and Bagott was found with his head lying over the fender, suffocated or "burked" by the application of a sooty hand to the mouth. Four men of loose character were apprehended on suspicion, but the discovery of a portion of the missing property in the hands of the three mentioned above led to the apprehension of the actual perpetrators of the crime. Brandrick, a determined criminal, was executed; but the lives of the other two were spared.

— Earl Russell writes to Lord Lyons at Washington, urging him to remonstrate with the United States Government regarding the sinking of vessels in Charleston harbour:—"Even as a scheme of embittered and sanguinary war, such a measure is not justifiable. It is a plot against the commerce of nations and the free intercourse of the Southern States of America with the civilized world. It is a project worthy only of times of barbarism."

22.—This being the first Sunday after the promulgation of the news of the Prince Consort's death, the services in most of the churches throughout the kingdom made special reference to that calamity. Mr. Garden, the sub-dean, officiated at the Chapel Royal, at Whitehall, which was draped in black throughout; Dean Trench, at Westminster; and Dean Milman, at St. Paul's. Dean Milman embodied the feelings of all classes of her Majesty's subjects in a sermon of touching simplicity and beauty: "From the highest to the lowest," he said, "it was felt that a great example had been removed from among us—an example of the highest and the humblest duties equally fulfilled—of the household and every-day virtues of the husband and father, practised in a quiet and unostentatious way, without effort or aid, as it were, by the spontaneous workings of a true and generous nature. To be not only blameless, but more than blameless, in those relations was not too common in such high positions. But his duties to the Queen's subjects, as well as to the Queen—his duties to the great English family dispersed throughout all the world, as well as to the young family within the chambers of the Palace, were discharged with calm thought and silent assiduity. No waste of time in frivolous amusement, in vain pomp and glory, but usefulness in its highest sense: schemes of benevolence promoted; plans for the education of the people suggested and fostered with prudent and far-seeing counsel, and with profound personal interest; great movements for the improvements of all branches of national industry, if not set on foot, maintained with a steady and persevering impulse—in short, notwithstanding foreign birth and education, a full and perfect identification of himself with English interests, English character, English social advancement. All these things had sunk gradually, if not slowly, into the national mind. He was ours, not merely by adoption, but as it were by a second nature."

23.—Proclamation made at Jassy and Bucharest, that the Danubian Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia were now united into one state, under the title of Roumania. The first meeting of the united elective assembly was held early in February following, when Prince Alexander John Couza declared that Roumania should for ever continue an independent State.

— Funeral of the Prince Consort, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The ceremony, though sufficiently stately, was almost private, only the Princes, a few of the highest dignitaries of the realm, and the Royal household, being included in the cortège. Throughout the kingdom, the people marked their sense of their Sovereign's grief by a general abstinence from business, the shops being closed in London and most of the provincial towns, the churches draped in black, and the "decent mourning" ordered by the Lord Chamberlain almost universal.

— In view of the threatened Federal aggression on British territory in America, troops are despatched to-day to strengthen the Canadian garrisons on the frontier-line.

24.—Capt. Maury, the eminent American meteorologist, resigns his post at the Washington Observatory, and writes to Admiral Fitzroy a letter explanatory of his motives for doing so and joining the Confederate army.

29.—H. M. S. Conqueror, 100 guns, wrecked on a coral reef during the voyage from Port Royal to Bermuda. The armaments, stores, and a portion of the machinery were landed on the island known as Rum Cay, but the ship itself, considered the pride of the navy, was ground to pieces on the rock.

January 3.—The blockade of the Confederate ports having cut off, in a great measure, the supply of cotton to this country, meetings are held this day at Wigan, Blackburn, Preston, and some other towns in Lancashire to devise measures for the relief of the distressed operatives. A Central Relief Committee was established at Manchester in April.

7.—The Anglo-French portion of the allied expedition against Mexico arrives at Vera Cruz.

8.—Public anxiety set at rest by receipt per Europa of news that the American Government had resolved to release Messrs. Slidell and Mason. The Europa arrived off Queens-town on the 6th. The journey from Cork to Dublin, 166 miles, occupied 4 hours 3 minutes; Kingstown to Holyhead, 3 hours 17 minutes; Holyhead to London, 264 miles, 5 hours. Notwithstanding that the condition of the money market was such that in the morning the Bank of England had reduced the rate of discount from 3 to 2½ per cent., the Funds received a sensible impulse. Bargains were made "after hours," at a rise of ¼ per cent., and in the morning there was a further advance of ⅓ per cent. The highest price at which Consols were quoted, on the 9th, was 93½, — or 3¼ per cent. higher than the point to which they had fallen during the interval of suspense and anxiety." The released Commissioners arrived at Southampton on the 29th by the La Plata.

9.—The Federal sloop-of-war Tuscarora anchors in Southampton water to watch the Nashville cruiser, which had arrived there for repairs with the crew of the captured Harvey Birch on board. The decision of our Government to let twenty-four hours elapse between the sailings of the vessels enabled the Nashville to elude her watchful foe, and she afterwards committed considerable damage among Federal merchantmen. She was, at length, chased into Gibraltar, where she disarmed and passed into the merchant service.

10.—The Commissioners of the Allied Powers, England, France, and Spain, issue a joint proclamation to the Mexicans, warning them of the danger certain to follow from their present lawless proceedings. "To you exclusively," they said, "without the intervention of foreigners, belongs the task of constituting yourself in a permanent and stable manner. Your labour will be the labour of regeneration, which all will respect, for all will have contributed to it. The evil is great—the remedy urgent."

14.—The pythoness in the Zoological Gardens lays about 100 eggs, the whole of which were addled in the cold occasioned by the absence of the creature when casting its skin. She abstained from food for the long period of thirty-two weeks.

— Meeting at the Mansion House to organize measures for raising a national memorial to the Prince Consort.

16.—Great calamity at Hartley Colliery, near Newcastle-on-Tyne. About half-past 10 A. M., when the whole of the works were in full operation, the huge iron beam connected with the pumping apparatus suddenly snapped asunder, and the entire gearing, weighing over twenty tons, fell down the shaft, carrying away in its descent stages, props, and lining. There were then 199 men employed in the workings, and five coming up the shaft to the pit-mouth. The mass of falling material became entangled in the lining before it reached the bottom, and in one or two places the sides collapsed, shutting off all communication with the unfortunate workmen below. For seven days and nights the most heroic efforts were made to reach the sufferers, but without effect, though at times the communication was so near that they could be heard working their way through the obstruction, and even signalling to those above. From the time the beam broke the water was known to be rushing into the workings at the rate of 1,500 gallons per minute. A "stythe" also began to accumulate in the pit, poisoning those imprisoned below, and interfering greatly with the clearing operations above. On the morning of the 20th the remains of the five killed in the shaft were brought up from the "high seam," and conveyed to their families. The "yard seam," where most of the men had taken refuge, was not reached till the 22d, when the whole of them were found to have been suffocated by the stythe, to all appearance two or three days before. They were lying in rows one each side, all quiet and placid as if sleeping off a heavy day's work. Boys were lying with their heads on the shoulders of their fathers, and one poor fellow had his arm clasped round the neck of his brother. In a book, taken from the pocket of the overman, was found a memorandum dated "Friday afternoon (17th), half-past 2 o'clock.—Edward Armstrong, Thomas Gledson, John Hardie, Thomas Bell, and others took extremely ill. We had also a prayer-meeting at a quarter to 2, when Tibbs, H. Sharp, J. Campbell, H. Gibson, and William Palmer—(sentence incomplete). Tibbs exhorted to us again, and Sharp also." Others had scratched messages to their families on their flasks, boxes, and whatever could carry an inscription. The pit-mouth, where for days the relatives had watched in eager hopefulness the work of excavation, was now crowded with grief-stricken widows and orphans, who followed the bodies to their homes as they were brought up. So comprehensive was the calamity, that of the entire male population of three pit-hamlets only twenty-five were not employed at the time of the accident. Almost every cottage had a coffin, some two, one five, and another poor woman no less than seven, containing the remains of a husband, five sons, and a boy whom they had brought up and educated. The funerals, in most instances, took place on Sunday, the relatives following the coffins to the graves, singing with mournful tenderness the hymn "O God, our help in ages past." The calamity excited universal sympathy. The Queen, with her own deep sorrow fresh upon her, caused repeated telegraphic messages to be sent to her at Osborne. "The Queen" (so ran the first) "is most anxious to hear that there are hopes of saving the poor people in the colliery, for whom her heart bleeds." On the 23d her Majesty commanded Col. Phipps to write:—"Her tenderest sympathy is with the poor widows and mothers, and her own misery only makes her feel the more for them. Her Majesty hopes that everything will be done as far as possible to alleviate their distress, and her Majesty will have a sad satisfaction in assisting in such a measure." The subscription in aid of the widows, orphans, and other relatives, reached the large sum of 81,000*l.*, one-fourth of which was collected by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House.

25.—Commenced before the Supreme Court of Bombay, the great Maháráj libel case which for months back had excited intense interest in all religious circles, native and European, throughout the Presidency. The defendant, who seemed to be a member of the Soodhar Lele, or Reforming party of the natives, and edited the Satyá Prákash, a Gujaráti newspaper, disclosed in one of his articles the indecent and immoral practices of the Vallabhácháryan gurus, and accused the plaintiff (one of these gurus) of adulterous intercourse with his female disciples. The plaintiff complained that these charges were false and malicious, and injuriously affected him in his individual character as a member of society, as a Brahmin, as a Maháráj, as a Hindoo priest, and as a member of the sect of Vallabháchárya. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and, secondly, that the charges made in the publication were true. This latter plea was of great length; and set out various points of doctrines from books alleged to be of religious authority in the sect, and relied upon them as justifying the publication. It also put in issue various facts and circumstances in proof of the evil reputation of the Mahárájas as a body for immorality; and it finally charged specific acts of immorality committed by the plaintiff as part of his religious system, and in the presence of various witnesses produced in court. The trial lasted many days, and occasioned an elaborate summing up on the part of the judge, Sir Joseph Arnould, who also expressed the obligations the community were under to the defendant for exposing the shocking immorality which had been elevated to the rank of a religion. On the technical plea of not guilty, 5 rs. damage was awarded to the plaintiff, but the defendant was acquitted of the higher charges of defamation and libel, and had awarded to him the costs of defence.

26.—Died, at his residence, Bloomsbury-square, aged 82, Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne, Biblical critic.

February 6.—Parliament opened by commission. The Royal Speech, as was to be expected, made tender reference to the affliction in which her Majesty was involved by the calamitous, untimely, and irreparable loss of the Prince Consort. "It has been, however, soothing to her Majesty, while suffering most acutely under this awful dispensation of Providence, to receive from all classes of her subjects the most cordial assurance of their sympathy with her sorrow, as well as their appreciation of the noble character of him, the greatness of whose loss to her Majesty and to the nation is so justly and so universally felt and lamented." The Speech also referred to the satisfactory settlement of our difference with the United States regarding the seizure of the Confederate Commissioners, and to the Convention concluded with France for the purpose of obtaining from Mexico a redress for grievances inflicted on foreign residents within that country. Measures were also promised relating to the improvement of the law, and the simplification of title in land.

— The Prince of Wales (travelling as Baron Renfrew) leaves England for a tour in the East, accompanied by General Bruce, the Rev. A. P. Stanley, and others. Alexandria was reached on the 1st March; the Pyramids, on the 5th; Thebes, on the 15th; Jaffa, on the 28th; and Jerusalem, on the 31st March. On Monday, the 7th April, the Prince and a small suite were permitted as a mark of unparalleled favour to enter the tombs of the patriarchs at Hebron. At Mount Gerizim the party witnessed the celebration of the Samaritan Passover; and on Easter-day, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, Holy Communion* was celebrated by Dr. Stanley. After spending several weeks in Syria, a homeward route was taken by way of Smyrna, Constantinople, Athens, Cephalonia, and Malta. On the evening of the 14th of June his Royal Highness reached Windsor Castle.

11.—This morning the water in the disused Hendre mines, near Mold, Flintshire, broke into the adjoining Bryn Gwioig lead mines, and drowned sixteen of the workmen, only one of the whole employed succeeding in escaping by a rope up the shaft.

13.—The Revised Education Code introduced into the House of Lords by Earl Granville, and to the Commons by Mr. Lowe. Adverting to the cry raised against the new Minutes by the clergy and teachers, Earl Granville explained that it did not make the slightest technical alteration in the old system of religious teaching; and as to the blow struck at training colleges, he admitted it was sudden and severe; but the assistance granted to these establishments averaged no less than 68 per cent. of the whole expense, showing how little voluntary efforts were excited by such large grants.—Agreeing with the Royal Commissioners that it would not be right to interfere with the foundation of the existing mode of administering the grant, Mr. Lowe said the Committee of Council had come to the conclusion that the system of appropriated grants should be abolished, and capitation grants substituted—infants under six years being entitled to capitation without examination. He entered very fully into the question of the claims of the schoolmasters, which in their integrity, he maintained, had no foundation in principle or justice, but explained the length Government would go, under the circumstances, to meet those claims.

19.—Explosion in the Cethin Colliery, near Merthyr Tydvil, causing the death of forty-nine workmen, employed in what was known as the “four-foot” seam. About 200 engaged in other workings were rescued. The whole country was agitated by wailing and woe, and in the villages and on mountain-sides were to be seen groups of miners repeating the tragic tale with the violence and pathos of Welsh eloquence. The sufferers were interred with romantic solemnity in the wild cemetery of Cefn.

—The Queen causes Sir Charles Grey to write to the committee of the Prince Consort Memorial Fund:—“It would be more in accordance with her Majesty’s feelings and, she believes, with those of the country in general, that the monument should be directly personal in its object. After giving the subject her maturest consideration, her Majesty has come to the conclusion, that nothing would be more appropriate, provided that it is on a scale of sufficient grandeur, than an obelisk to be erected in Hyde Park, on the site of the Great Exhibition of 1851, or on some spot immediately contiguous to it. Nor would any proposal that could be made be more gratifying to the Queen herself personally; for she can never forget that the Prince himself had highly approved of the idea of a memorial of this character being raised on the same spot in remembrance of the Great Exhibition.” In a second letter the Queen expressed her intention of personally contributing towards erecting the memorial, that “it might be recorded in future ages as raised by the Queen and people of a grateful country to the memory of its benefactor.”

22.—The newly-elected Confederate President, Jefferson Davis, delivers an inaugural address at Richmond, in which he describes the past year as one of the most eventful in the annals of the American continent, a new Government having been established, and its machinery put in operation over an area exceeding 700,000 square miles.

24.—At the Carlisle Assizes, William Charlton, engine-driver on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, was found guilty of the murder of Jane Emmerson, an old woman who took charge of a level crossing on the line at Durran Hill, near Carlisle. The motive for murder in the case appeared to be robbery, 7*l.* being stolen from the house, besides some sheets, three spoons, and a ring. The chief circumstance founded on by the prosecution was the correspondence of the prisoner’s shoe with a footmark left in the congealed blood. There were two peculiar circular marks on the toe, which the prisoner had endeavoured to efface by drawing the nails, but close examination showed that the holes corresponded, and the nails themselves were found hidden close by the prisoner’s house. It was also established that he knew the habits of the deceased, had ample opportunities for committing the crime, and was seen in the neighbourhood on the night of the murder. In returning their verdict, the jury recommended Charlton to mercy on the ground of his previous good conduct, but the Home Secretary declined to interfere, and the sentence was duly carried out, the prisoner setting all doubt about his guilt at rest by making a full confession.

—Stormy debates in the French Senate. The Marquis de Boissy said it was not France but England which gained most by the last Italian wars. “There is one thing,” he said, “I regret; it is this, that the money spent in these wars was not differently employed. We could with much more advantage have gone to London; and we would have had the advantage of going with a friendly nation, instead of going to Sebastopol with one who is our ally in name, though in point of fact our enemy in every circumstance; and as dangerous, if not more so, under the name of ally, as under that of enemy.” On the 27th, Prince Napoleon attacked the Marquis de Larochejaquelein as the author of the programme of a counter-revolution. “I look upon the Empire,” he said, “as due to the well-understood principles of revolution. To me the Empire signifies the glory of France abroad, the destruction of the treaties of 1815 within the limits and the resources of France, and the unity of Italy, which we have contributed to free. At home the glory of France is in the preservation of order by a complete system of wise and real liberties, comprising the liberty of the press, and unlimited popular instruction, without religious congregations, and without institutions which would impose upon us a return to the bigotry of the Middle Ages."

25.—Sir Robert Peel having, in reply to certain remarks made by the O'Donoghue at a meeting in Dublin, described him as a manikin traitor devoid of respectability, is challenged to fight through Major Gavin, M.P. for Liverpool. By the Premier's advice the "second" was referred to him, and he brought the matter before the House to-night, as a violation of the privilege of speech—a step which had the desired effect of preventing any breach of the peace.

28.—Exposure of the Threepwood conspiracy. On 5th March last, William Bewicke, Esq., a gentleman of ancient lineage, belonging to Northumberland, was sentenced at Newcastle Assizes to four years' penal servitude for the imputed offence of firing a loaded rifle at two sheriff officers with whom he had an altercation concerning a distress-warrant issued against him as owner of Threepwood Hall. The shot was alleged to have been fired from the window of a small water-closet, and a piece of flattened lead was produced as one of the bullets used on the occasion. Important evidence in defence coming to light after the trial, the two officers, with an assistant, a witness on the first trial, were now put in the dock charged with conspiracy. After a trial, which occupied the entire day, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty against the two officers, Dodd and Hutchinson, and next day the assistant Dalgleish pleaded guilty to the charge contained in the indictment.

March 1.—The Tae-ping attack on Shanghai repulsed by an Imperial and Anglo-French force.

— Lord Elgin arrives at Calcutta as Governor-General of India. He was installed into office on the 12th; Earl Canning leaving India six days later.

3.—The United States' steamship Merrimac (seized by the Confederates and christened the Virginia) steams out of port to attack the Federal squadron in Hampton Roads. The engagement commenced at 3 P.M., and within an hour she had sunk the Cumberland, captured and burnt the Congress, disabled and driven the Minnesota ashore, and defeated the St. Lawrence and Roanoke, which sought shelter under the guns of Fortress Monroe. Two small steamers were also blown up, and two transports captured. The Cumberland went down with all hands on board, her tops only remaining above water, but many of her people were saved by boats from the shore. Next day the Federal iron-clad ship-of-war Monitor arrived from New York, and engaged the Virginia. Both vessels separated after a short contest without any decisive result, and went into port to repair damages.

9.—The Ocean Monarch, 2,199 tons, which left New York for Liverpool on the 5th, laden with provisions, founders in a gale. Twenty-two of the crew abandoned the vessel, and they, as well as three left on board, were rescued by a passing schooner.

11.—Mr. Horsfall introduces, but withdraws after a debate, a resolution declaring that "the present state of international maritime law as affecting the rights of belligerents and neutrals, is ill-defined and unsatisfactory, and calls for the early attention of her Majesty's Government."

— Mr. Walpole lays on the table of the House of Commons a series of eleven resolutions condemning the Revised Education Code introduced by Government. He condemned the principle of paying exclusively by results; and the system of grouping by age as inadequate and specially disadvantageous for children whose early education had been neglected. The new code, it was declared, would increase the difficulty of providing education for poor districts, and its regulations with respect to pupil teachers were censured as impolitic and unjust. The discussion commenced on the 24th, and ended in the Government modifying their scheme to meet the wishes of the House, and promising that in future any alteration contemplated in the Code would be laid for one month before Parliament previous to coming into operation.

12.—The shop of Dodds, Brothers, jewellers, Cornhill, entered by burglars during the night, and property carried off to the value of 3,000*l.* Suspicion was directed against the shop porter as an accomplice, and he was at once arrested and committed for trial.

— Mr. George Peabody, American merchant in London, announces the munificent gift of 100,000*l.* to the poor of the metropolis. "I have," he wrote to the trustees, "few instructions to give or conditions to impose, but there are some fundamental principles from which it is my solemn injunction that those entrusted with its application shall never, under any circumstances, depart. First and foremost among them is the limitation of its uses, absolutely and exclusively, to such purposes as may be calculated directly to ameliorate the condition and augment the comforts of the poor who, either by birth or established residence, form a recognised portion of the population of London. Secondly, it is my intention that now, and for all times, there shall be a rigid exclusion from the management of this fund of any influences calculated to impart to it a character either sectarian as regards religion, or exclusive in relation to local or party politics." Without seeking to limit the discretion of the trustees, the donor suggested that at least a portion of the fund might be applied to the construction of such improved dwellings for the poor as would combine in the utmost possible degree the essentials of heathfulness, comfort, social enjoyment, and economy.

14.—At the Stafford Assizes, the Rev. Horatio Samuel Fletcher, incumbent of St. Leonard's, Bilston, and a magistrate for the county, was found guilty, under the Fraudulent Trustees Act, of feloniously appropriating various sums of money which came into his hands as Secretary to the Bilston Savings Bank. From the evidence it appeared that the entire management of the Institution had lapsed into the hands of the reverend gentleman, who acted as secretary, treasurer, and trustee. A defence was set up that the prisoner was not a trustee within the meaning of the Fraudulent Trustees Act,—“a trustee for public purposes,” or “a trustee for depositors,” or “a trustee under an express trust created by an instrument in writing.” The points were left for the decision of the Court for Crown cases reserved.

17.—Thompson, a grinder, tried at the Sheffield Assizes, for a trade-outrage committed in a house in Acorn-street, on the 23d November last; the dwelling was set on fire by an explosive charge thrown in at the window. One inmate, a woman named O'Rourke, was burnt to death, and another blinded. Evidence was adduced to show that the prisoner was one of the most violent of the “turn-outs;” that he had been heard to threaten Wasney, who lived in O'Rourke's house; that he had purchased a case at one place, and explosive powder at another, shortly before the outrage was committed; and that he was one of two persons seen running away from the house when the case was thrown in. The jury, however, thought the evidence insufficient, and returned a verdict of Not guilty. The following day three other grinders were charged with blowing up a nailmaker's shop at Thorpe, near Rotherham; and though the alibi pleaded in defence on this occasion was unusually well supported, the jury found all guilty, and Mr. Justice Mellor sentenced them to fourteen years' penal servitude. They afterwards received a free pardon.

18.—Encounter in the House of Lords between the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford, in a discussion concerning those officials of the late Insolvent Court who had been deprived of their retiring allowance through an omission in the new Bankruptcy Act. The Lord Chancellor, being charged with negligence, insincerity, and tyranny, retaliated by accusing his assailant of personal dislikes, and of being for weeks together in daily confidential intercourse with him, without hinting in the slightest degree that it was his intention to assail him with a series of charges which were entirely founded on perversions of fact. “It will,” said the Lord Chancellor, “be a lesson to me for the future with whom I engage in confidential intercourse.” Lord Derby protested against such language as undignified and undeserved, and was followed by Earl Granville and Earl Russell, who each defended the Government. There was an unusually large attendance in the House to-night, many of those present being ladies.

22.—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean presented with a service of silver plate subscribed for by Etonians “as a tribute to the genius of a great actor, and in recognition of his unremitting efforts to improve the tone, and elevate the character of the British stage.” The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) acted as spokesman for the donors.

23.—Campden House, Kensington, destroyed by fire. This interesting relic of former times was built by Sir Baptist Hickee, a wealthy silk-mercator of Cheapside, founder of Hickee's Hall, and afterwards created Viscount Campden by James I. The mansion was occupied by a Mr. Woolley, who had spent large sums in restoring it and furnishing it with rare examples of art, particularly in carving and tapestry. Nothing was saved.

—Died, at St. Petersburg, in his 93d year, Charles Robert Count von Nesselrode, Chancellor of the Empire, and chief among the diplomatists at the court of Czars Alexander and Nicholas.

26.—Came on for hearing at Warwick Lent Assizes, before Lord Justice Cockburn and a jury, the case of Kennedy v. Broun and wife, being a civil action raised to recover the sum of 20,000*l.* from the successful litigant in the Swinfen estate case, in accordance with a promise made, for services rendered by her solicitor and advocate, Charles Rann Kennedy. The connexion of the plaintiff with Mrs. Broun (formerly Swinfen) appeared to have commenced in May 1856, at a time when her objections to the compromise which had been effected in her behalf were notorious. From that time up to the latter part of 1861, when she married the plaintiff, Mr. Broun—a proceeding which caused the final rupture—Mr. Kennedy appeared to have acted in all the proceedings above mentioned as her leading legal adviser and counsel, and to have devoted himself with great energy to her interests. According to the statement of Mrs. Broun, the action against Lord Chelmsford (see July 4, 1859) was brought in express contradiction to her wishes, and solely through the advice of Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy was paid from time to time various sums for fees, but great ambiguity seemed to prevail as to the relation in which he stood towards Mrs. Broun with respect to remuneration. She asserted that he had undertaken her cause solely from motives of friendship, and with no other prospect of reward but what might be the result of her success. Mr. Kennedy, in consequence, as he asserted, of his great devotion to her interests, was reduced to very low circumstances, and became desirous of having some security for the sum in which he considered Mrs. Broun to be indebted. With this view, in May 1859, he wrote to her at Swinfen Hall, desiring her to come up to London and see him, as he wished to communicate with her as to obtaining a seat in Parliament. She accordingly came, and was conducted by him to her lodgings. On the next day she took a walk with him to the Zoological Gardens; and whilst seated on a bench in that place of recreation, promised to execute a deed conveying to him the reversionary interest in the Swinfen Hall estates, expectant on her decease. In accordance with this promise, Mr. Kennedy drew a deed and caused it to be engrossed. The effect of this deed was to reserve a life-estate in Swinfen Hall estates to Mrs. Broun, and, subject to such life-interest, to convey the estate in fee-simple to Mr. Kennedy. No right of cutting timber, nor any power of leasing, was reserved to Mrs. Broun. Previous to the promise above mentioned, Mr. Kennedy had asked her whether she did not consider herself indebted to him to the extent of 20,000*l.*, and she answered in the affirmative. Mrs. Broun was afterwards taken by Mr. Kennedy to the office of Mr. Collis, who had been her solicitor in the action against Lord Chelmsford, and who appears to have been an old friend of Mr. Kennedy. After a brief explanation of the deed to her by Mr. Collis, and without further communication with any one, Mrs. Broun signed the document, Mr. Collis being the attesting witness. Every part of the plaintiff's statement was denied by the defendant. She represented him as having sought the position of her advocate; said that no remuneration was to be given him unless he got it from her adversary; that he alone had pushed on the action against Lord Chelmsford for the purpose of making a name—or "spoiling the Egyptians" (as she said), and then dividing the plunder; that he urged her on from one step to another in litigation, and she swore positively that she never directly or indirectly promised him any such sum as 20,000*l.* for his services. In the course of the trial the plaintiff felt himself compelled to bring out in evidence that the frequent and lengthy consultations necessary in the Swinfen case led to their being often in each other's society, and that she had even lived with him for some time as his mistress. On this point the Lord Chief Justice on summing up expressed his deep regret that the plaintiff should have so far forgot himself as to publish among Mrs. Broun's lady friends the dreadful libel that had been put in evidence. His lordship also read and commented on the letters, and comparing them with each other, and the defendant's own admission, asked the jury to say whether her friendship for Mr. Kennedy was only that of a sister. But while adverting to them and to the poems, one of which, accepted by the defendant as an expression of the plaintiff's sentiments, was full of the passionate outbursts of a lover, he felt bound to say that, having read them carefully, there was nothing in them to show that she had lived with Mr. Kennedy as his mistress, or that there was anything between them but a desire to consummate their marriage at some future time when circumstances permitted it. That even was bad enough; and while they must look upon the conduct of Mr. Kennedy as a married man with a family, and as having written the libel, with honest indignation, and denounce and deprecate it, they must at the same time do him even-handed justice. Mr. Kennedy conducted his own case, examining Mrs. Broun with much minuteness as to their past connexion and the relation in which they stood to each other, and addressing the court with great fervour in support of his claim. Late on the evening of the third day of trial the jury, after a brief deliberation, gave a verdict affirming the right of the plaintiff to the sum claimed.

April 1.—The Mars steamship, trading between Waterford and Bristol, wrecked in a fog on the Welsh coast, and fifty of the passengers and crew drowned. Six only were saved, who succeeded in getting into one of the ship's small boats, but being without oars or rudder, were tossed helplessly about during the night, and thrown ashore at daybreak near St. Garvan's Head.

9.—A bill introduced by Mr. Bouverie early in the session, designed to give relief to parties desirous of withdrawing from the obligation imposed by holy orders in the Church of England, defeated on a second reading by a majority of 98 to 88.

—Conference of Orizaba, resulting in the withdrawal of England and Spain from the Mexican expedition. The French commissioner, insisting that the object of the alliance was not to encourage conciliatory measures but to obtain satisfaction from the Mexican Government, proceeded with his own force towards the capital.

15.—Boiler explosion at the Millfield Iron Works, Priestfield, Staffordshire, resulting in the death of twenty-eight workmen and serious injury to ten others. Three-fourths of the boiler, weighing about eight tons, was thrown to a height of between 200 and 300 feet into the air, and fell at a distance of 250 yards from the spot where it had been fixed. The dispersion of the brickwork and masonry of the furnaces, with their contents of molten iron, and the burning coals from the fire, completed the appalling catastrophe.

18.—Bath Theatre destroyed by fire. The cause of the disaster was never ascertained with certainty. The last performance in the house took place on the previous Wednesday, when the Lyceum drama of "Peep o' Day" was played, and the house closed, so far as theatrical representations were concerned, until Saturday in Easter week.

21.—The ship Emily St. Pierre enters the port of Liverpool with a crew of Federal seamen as prisoners, Captain Wilson having by great personal daring recovered his vessel from the parties who captured her when attempting to run the blockade at Charleston harbour. In answer to a demand made by the American Minister for reclamation, Earl Russell replied that her Majesty's Government had no jurisdiction or legal power whatever to take or to acquire possession of the vessel, or to interfere with her owners in relation to their property in her.

21.—The Volunteer corps in the metropolitan counties reviewed at Brighton by Lord Clyde and other distinguished officers appointed by the Horse Guards. The proceedings of the day were thought to give a very satisfactory solution to the question of the efficiency of the Volunteers as a defensive force. A division of 20,000, collected from every part of the metropolis and a district exceeding sixty miles square, were conveyed to Brighton Downs in a few hours, fully equipped for action. A mimic fight was gone through, and the whole force dislocated and brought safely back to their homes before nightfall. Lord Clyde expressed an opinion of marked approval regarding officers and men.

24.—New Orleans surrenders to the Federal fleet under Commodore Farragut. Two days afterwards the city was occupied by General Butler, who issued a proclamation declaring that women who showed any contempt for his officers or soldiers should be treated as prostitutes plying their vocation. The spirit and terms of the proclamation were universally execrated, and formed the subject of a debate in the House of Commons. Lord Palmerston said he was prepared to say that no man could have read that proclamation without a feeling of the deepest disgust—a proclamation to which he did not scruple to attach the epithet of infamous. Englishmen, he continued, must blush to think that it came from a man of the Anglo-Saxon race—a man who was a soldier, and had raised himself to the rank of a General.

26.—Came on for hearing in the Court of Probate, before Sir C. Cresswell and a jury, the claim set up by Dr. Smethurst to obtain possession of 1,800*l.* left by his paramour, Miss Bankes. Probate was opposed by the brother-in-law and two sisters of the testatrix, on the ground that the deed was not duly executed; that it was procured by undue influence and control, and that the deceased was not of sound mind at the time of execution. A concluding plea of fraud was added during the trial. The jury, after an hour's consultation, found a verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues, thus establishing the validity of the will.

29.—Mary Timney executed at Dumfries for the murder of Ann Hannah, at Carsphad, a small farm in the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, on the morning of the 13th January last. The execution was rendered unusually touching and remarkable from the hysterical appeals of the poor woman on her passage to the gallows, that mercy might even yet be extended to her for the sake of her poor children.

30.—The Japanese ambassadors arrive in England from France, and take up their residence at Claridge's Hotel.

May 1.—The International Exhibition, at Brompton, opened with the most imposing public pageant seen in this country for many years. Captain Fowke's structure consisted of two vast domes of glass, 250 feet high and 160 feet in diameter, connected by a nave 800 feet long, 100 feet high, and 85 feet wide, with a closed roof, and lighted by a range of windows after the manner of the clerestory of a Gothic cathedral. The domes opened laterally into spacious transepts, and the nave into a wide central avenue and interminable side-aisles and galleries roofed with glass. An address was presented by the Commissioners to the Duke of Cambridge, who represented her Majesty on the occasion, and expressed the warm interest she took in the Exhibition, and her hope that its success might amply fulfil the intentions and expectations with which it was projected. After a formal procession through the building, the Duke of Cambridge in a loud voice said, "By command of the Queen, I now declare the Exhibition open." It continued a source of national and almost world-wide attraction till the 1st November, when the total number of visitors, exclusive of attendants, was found to have been 6,117,450, a number about 50,000 under the gross visitors to the Exhibition of 1851. The foreign exhibitors then numbered only 6,566; they were now 16,456:

2.—Died at Taunton, aged 67, the Rev. Joseph Wolff, an Eastern traveller and linguist, whose mission to Rokhara to ascertain the fate of Captain Stoddart and Col. Conolly excited much interest. (See April 19, 1844.)

4.—Bursting of the great sluice in connexion with the Middle Drainage Level, at Wiggenhall, St. Germans, King's Lynn. The tidal waters of the Ouse spread over 10,000 acres of rich land, and a calamity ensued which involved farmers and peasantry in one common ruin. The weight and torrent of waters borne along the banks of the straight long drain swept backwards and forwards for eight days. It was well known the bank must give way sooner or later. At an early hour on the ninth morning, as many as two hundred persons were gathered together near one manifestly weak spot, waiting for what they knew must come. At the distance of about three feet from the top of the bank a thin spout of water burst through a hole in the side of the earthen wall, and poured out on the surrounding land. Mass after mass almost instantly gave way, till a breach of one hundred yards permitted the pent-up waters of the Ouse to spread over the whole of the cultivated country of Marshland and Smeeth. The depth of water varied, according to the tide, from five to ten feet, but its influx and efflux were so rapid that an opposing wind made it surge and swell like the waves of a troubled sea. To cut off the water-supply from this inland sea, and stop the tidal-stream in the full strength of its flow, cunningly-contrived coffer-dams were erected; but it was not till the middle of June that the oft-baffled engineers could say the country was free from danger. To obviate the evil likely to arise from the blocking-off of the Middle Level line of drainage, huge siphons of cast iron were placed across the dam, their aggregate capacity being such as to equal the whole discharge of water through the old sluices. The accumulated waters on the flooded land were gradually drained away through the local works. The loss caused by the inundation was set down at 25,000*l*.

5.—The French Mexican force defeated by General Zaragoza on the heights around Puebla. Marquez joined the expeditionary force with 3,000 men on the 18th.

6.—A thunder-storm having its centre about Newark burst over England. Hailstones were reported to have fallen on this occasion measuring six inches in circumference, and weighing four ounces. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon it was so dark at Nottingham Observatory that a book could scarcely be read at the window, and the landscape appeared to be closed in on all sides, at the distance of half a mile, by a kind of storm-cloud wall. The rain fell in torrents, and flashes of bluish-red lightning followed each other in rapid succession.

11.—The iron-clad Merrimac blown up by the Confederates to prevent her capture.

12.—Mr. H. B. Farnall appointed Special Commissioner to make inquiries into the operation of the Poor Laws in the distressed cotton districts of Lancashire. The operatives objected to the labour-test imposed by the Poor Laws, consisting as it did chiefly of stone-breaking, injurious to the health of men used to indoor employment.

16.—In Manchester, William and Martha Taylor stab a house-agent named Meller, after murdering their three children, and laying them out in their bed-room for interment. Their death was supposed to have been caused by the administration of chloroform, or suffocation. On the breast of one of the children was pinned a paper bearing the incoherent expressions: "We are six, but one at Harptry lies. Meller and sons are our cruel murderers, but God and our loving parents will avenge us. Love rules here. We are all going to our sister to part no more." The murderer, Taylor, on delivering himself up appeared unconscious of having committed any crime. His wife was captured soon after, and tried along with him at Liverpool Assizes. A plea of insanity was set up for the husband, but the jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and he was executed at Manchester. Mrs. Taylor was acquitted.

20.—Treaty ratified at London between her Majesty's Government, on the one hand, and the United States of America, on the other, for the suppression of the African slave-trade. A copy was laid on the table of the House of Lords the same evening, when Lord Brougham suggested that some arrangement should be made by which the right of search, now conceded within thirty leagues of the coasts of Africa and Cuba, might be further extended to within thirty leagues of the island of Porto Rico.

22.—Mrs. Vyse, Ludgate Hill, poisons her two children by administering Battle's Vermin Powder, and then attempts to commit suicide by cutting her throat. She was found sitting in her room on the first floor with the blood-stained razor in her hand, by two female inmates, who, with rare presence of mind, stopped the hæmorrhage in a temporary way till a surgeon was called in, and the wound effectually bound up. At the trial it was established in evidence that Mrs. Vyse was of an extremely affectionate disposition, and up to the time of the murder manifested the utmost tenderness towards her children. A verdict was returned of Not guilty on the ground of insanity, and the unfortunate woman was ordered to be detained in custody during her Majesty's pleasure.

— Earl Russell, writing to Sir C. Wyke, the English Commissioner in Mexico, on the failure of the Mexican expedition, through the presence and Imperialistic designs of General Almonte, says:—"Her Majesty's Government think that the presence of General Almonte in Mexico, under the protection of the French army, might fairly be considered as a provocation to civil war." The French army under General Lorencez was left to prosecute the enterprise alone.

24.—The New Bridge at Westminster opened in its entirety for public traffic. The barriers were removed at 4.30 A.M. on this the morning of the Queen's birthday, and the event signalled by a salute of 25 guns. The cost of the new structure was estimated at 4*l*. per square foot, or less than half the expense of London, Southwark, or Waterloo bridges.

26.—Died at Damascus, aged 40, in the course of a tour through the East, Henry Thomas Buckle, Esq., author of the "Introduction to the History of Civilization in England."

June 2.—At a meeting of the Opposition at Lord Derby's residence, St. James's-square, it was unanimously resolved to support Mr. Walpole's amendment on Mr. Stansfeld's resolution urging the Government to reduce the expenditure in a way which would not only equalize revenue and outlay, but afford the means of reducing impositions of a temporary and exceptional character.

3.—Lord Palmerston frustrates the Opposition tactics by treating Mr. Walpole's amendment on Mr. Stansfeld's resolution as a vote of want of confidence. Mr. Walpole refused to engage in the discussion on these terms, and withdrew his amendment, leading Mr. Disraeli to describe him as "a Derby favourite who had bolted." Mr. Stansfeld's resolution was rejected by 367 to 65, and another, proposed by Lord Palmerston, expressive of the opinion that, while it was necessary the nation should be efficiently protected, the House was satisfied with the past and hopeful of future reduction, was carried without a division. The debate was protracted till 1.15 A.M., the House at its close adjourning till the 5th, for "The Derby."

4.—Epsom races. The Derby won by Caractacus. The Oaks (6th) by Feu-de-Joie.

14.—Return to England of the Prince of Wales from his Eastern tour.

17.—Special Commission opened at Limerick for the trial of parties concerned in the numerous assassinations which had disgraced that county for some months. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in his opening charge, said it would be impossible to fix upon a period of six weeks during the last 30 or 40 years in which so many terrible crimes had been perpetrated. Beckham was found guilty of shooting Francis Fitzgerald in the presence of his wife at Kilmallock, and executed on the 16th July. His companion Walsh, who contrived to elude the police for some weeks, was afterwards found guilty, and executed on the 1st September. One of the brothers Dillon was also found guilty as an accessory before the fact, and executed. At Clonmel, the trial of one of the Hallorans for shooting M. Gustave Thiebault at Boytonrath, on the 28th April, failed from the unwillingness of witnesses to speak to facts known to be familiar to them. Bohan, charged with shooting at Col. Knox, was also acquitted, and received back among the peasantry of Templemore with marks of unbounded joy.

— Died, aged 50, Charles John, Earl Canning, late Governor-General of India.

18.—At the Central Criminal Court, Charles Talbrook was sentenced to penal servitude for life for striking his own grandmother with intent to murder, the prisoner urging with apparent seriousness that he had been bewitched

5.—Died at Paris, aged 95, Duc Pasquier, Chancellor of France in the reign of Louis Philippe, and a courtier of high rank and influence during the First Empire. His recollection of the events of the Reign of Terror, in which he figured, was vivid and minute, he being at the time older than St. Just, and only eight years younger than Robespierre.

7.—In a discussion on going into committee on the Fortification (provision for expenses) Bill, a personal altercation took place between Mr. Cobden and Lord Palmerston, the member for Rochdale charging the Premier with being, to a great extent, responsible for the invasion panics which periodically disturbed this country. Lord Palmerston replied that Mr. Cobden, although a great authority on Free Trade, was on naval and military matters in a state of blindness and delusion, and therefore unsafe as a guide or adviser on the question of national defences.

15.—The London Gazette announces that letters patent had been passed under the Great Seal, removing Edwin John James from the office of one of her Majesty's Counsels. In the early part of the year the Benchers of the Inner Temple established serious charges against him concerning his pecuniary relations with Lord Worsley, son and heir of the Earl of Yarborough; with Mr. Fryer, attorney, Wimborne; and another, of a criminal nature, relating to the case of Scully v. Ingram, in which James acted as counsel for the plaintiff, and accepted money at the same time from the defendant.

17.—Mr. Glaisher makes his first scientific ascent from Wolverhampton in Coxwell's new balloon, 69 feet in height, 54 in diameter, and with a capacity of 95,000 cubic feet of gas. The leading facts sought to be ascertained were connected with the decrease of temperature and the distribution of moisture throughout the atmosphere. The aeronauts attained, on this occasion, a height of 26,177 feet, or nearly five miles. The temperature, when the balloon left the earth, was 55°, decreasing to 26° when two miles up, but again increasing to 42° at four miles, while at five miles it was only 16°, with the air dry and electricity positive. Another ascent was made from the Crystal Palace on the 30th; from Wolverhampton again on the 18th August; from London on 21st August, when a scene of great beauty was witnessed at sunrise; and a third at Wolverhampton on the 5th September, when the daring voyagers were nearly frozen to death—at five miles the temperature was 2° Fahr. Mr. Glaisher, on this occasion, became unconscious, and registered no observations above 36,000 feet. Mr. Coxwell contrived to pull the valve string with his teeth, when the balloon began to descend, and as they neared the earth the adventurers gradually regained consciousness.

— President Lincoln sanctions a bill confiscating the property and emancipating the slaves of all persons who continued sixty days in arms against the Union.

18.—At the Winchester Assizes, George Nicol Gilbert, a criminal twice convicted previously for minor offences, was sentenced to be executed for the murder of Ann Susan Hall, at Midgham Farm, near Fordingbridge, on the 22d June. The young woman having resisted with all her power an attempt to violate her person, the prisoner first sought to stifle her cries by choking her, and then turned her face downwards into a muddy ditch, near which the body was found. Gilbert made a full confession of his guilt previous to execution.

— Discussion in the House of Commons on the motion proposed by Mr. Lindsay:—“That in the opinion of this House the States which have seceded from the Union of the Republic of the United States have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established government, and have given such proof of their determination and ability to support their independence, that the propriety of offering mediation with the view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties is worthy of the serious and immediate attention of her Majesty's Government.” Lord Palmerston contended on the part of the Government that the Cabinet up to this time had pursued a wise and prudent course, and it would be better for the House to leave them to judge of the fittest occasion for proffering their friendly offices. The motion was withdrawn without a division.

19.—The Cotton District Relief Fund originated at a meeting held in Bridgewater House, presided over by the Earl of Derby; 11,000*l.* subscribed among those present, the Queen giving 2,000*l.*, and the Viceroy of Egypt, who was in London at the time, 1,000*l.*

The respondents were the brothers and sisters of the above Francis Kevelin Bouverie, who pleaded that the petitioner was not legitimate, and tendered evidence in court that he was the child of one Bell, with whom Mrs. Bouverie had eloped from Castle Dawson in October 1835. The petitioner was born on the 12th July, 1836. At the close of the trial, the Judge Ordinary said the rule of law had never been disputed that, when two married persons were living together no inquiry or speculation could be allowed as to who was the father of a child to which the wife had given birth. Its legitimacy was a presumption juris et de jure. By his lordship's direction the jury returned a verdict for the petitioner upon all the issues.

22.—In order to mitigate the severity of the distress now being felt in Lancashire from the limited supply of American cotton, Mr. Villiers, President of the Board of Trade, obtains leave to introduce a bill enabling every parish overburdened by local distress to claim a contribution from the common fund of the union, and permitting entire unions similarly situated to call for a contribution from other unions in the county. In committee, an addition was made to the bill, enabling unions to raise money by loan, as well as to resort to the expedient of a rate-in-aid. The liability to a rate-in-aid was to arise as soon as the expenditure of a parish exceeded 3s. per pound; and the power to borrow conferred on guardians, subject to the sanction of the Poor-law Board, whenever the expenditure of a union exceeded 3s. in the pound on the whole rateable value. The measure ultimately passed through both Houses, and received the Royal assent.

— At the Clonmel Assizes, Richard Burke was found guilty of poisoning his wife, by mixing strychnine in medicine which she received at his hands. The jury recommended him to mercy on account of his previous good character. He was, however, executed on the 25th of August.

28.—The African travellers, Speke and Grant, arrive at Ripon Falls. The former records in his journal: "The expedition had now performed its function. I saw that old Father Nile, without any doubt, rises in the Victoria N'yanza, and, as I had foretold, that lake is the great source of the holy river which cradled the first expounder of our religious belief. . . . The most remote waters or top-head of the Nile is the southern end of the lake, situated close on the third degree of south latitude, which gives to the Nile the surprising length in direct measurement, rolling over thirty-four degrees of latitude, of above 2,300 miles, or more than one-eleventh of the circumference of our globe. . . . I now christened the 'stones' Ripon Falls, after the nobleman who presided over the Royal Geographical Society when my expedition was got up; and the arm of the water from which the Nile issued, Napoleon Channel, in token of respect to the French Geographical Society for the honour they had done me just before leaving England, in presenting me with their gold medal for the discovery of the Victoria N'yanza."

2.—Earl Russell writes to Mr. Mason regarding the claim made by the latter to have the Confederate States recognised as a separate and independent Power:—"In order to be entitled to a place among the independent nations of the earth, a State ought not only to have strength and resources for a time, but afford promise of stability and permanence. Should the Confederate States of America win that place among nations, it might be right for other nations justly to acknowledge an independence achieved by victory, and maintained by a successful resistance to all attempts to overthrow it. That time, however, has not, in the judgment of her Majesty's Government, arrived. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, can only hope that a peaceful termination of the present bloody and destructive contest may not be far distant."

7.—The Thames Embankment Bill receives the Royal assent, empowering the Metropolitan Board of Works to embank the river from Westminster to Blackfriars, and make approaches thereto. In the discussion on the second reading in the House of Commons it was alleged that the Duke of Buccleuch had appeared before the Committee in opposition to public interests, but the debate which ensued on this point relieved his Grace from the odium of such a charge, though Mr. Cowper was of opinion that in some respects the Duke had not acted as might have been anticipated.

7.—Parliament prorogued by Commission.

10.—At Warwick Assizes, George Gardner was found guilty of shooting his fellow-servant, Sarah Kirby, at Studley, on the 23d of April last. In his confession the prisoner said that the deceased never would draw him the proper quantity of beer, and that vexed him. While hesitating whether he should kill the girl or not, and unable to make up his mind, he determined to solve his doubt by throwing up the "spud" of the plough. If it had fallen down flat, he said, he would not have killed her, but it came down point foremost, and he, therefore, left the field with the determination to take her life.

12.—The iron sailing vessel Ganges capsizes in the Thames, near the entrance of the Grand Surrey Dock, and five of the Lascar crew drowned in the hold. The vessel was afterwards raised by lighters.

15.—Fire in Cumberland-street, Hyde Park, causing the loss of three lives—Mr. Barrett, the occupant of the mansion, and two of his children.

16.—Considerable uneasiness excited in commercial circles by an intimation from the solicitor to the Bank of England, that a quantity of genuine paper prepared for notes had been stolen from the paper-mill, and was presumably in the hands of forgers.

18.—Commenced at Guildford Assizes the case of Roupell v. Waite, which led to an exposure of the forgeries and frauds committed by William Roupell, late M.P. for Lambeth. The plaintiff, Richard Roupell, brought the action to recover an estate of about 163 acres called Norbiton Park Farm, near Kingston, Surrey, of which the late Mr. Richard Palmer Roupell died seized on the 12th Sept., 1856, the plaintiff claiming the estate as the only legitimate child and heir-at-law of his deceased father. His claim was disputed by the defendant under a conveyance, dated July 1861, made to him by William Roupell, the natural brother of the plaintiff. The title of William Roupell to convey, and of the plaintiff to hold, the Norbiton lands, depended upon the validity of a deed purporting to be a deed of appointment and gift to William Roupell by his father; "and inasmuch," said Mr. Serjeant Shee, "as the title of the plaintiff cannot be impugned without producing that deed, I undertake, before I sit down, to state and to prove after I have concluded my address, that that deed was a forgery—the forgery of William Roupell. Though I succeed in proving that Richard Roupell, the plaintiff, is heir-at-law of the deceased Mr. Roupell, and in proving that the deed of July 1856 is a forgery, yet if there was a will of the late Mr. Roupell devising the property to other persons than the plaintiff Richard, his title as heir-at-law would be defeated. And inasmuch as after the death of Richard Palmer Roupell a will was set up by William Roupell purporting to be the last will of the deceased, and probate was obtained of that will by William Roupell as an executor named in it, I must satisfy you that that will is not the real will of the late Richard Palmer Roupell; and I undertake to prove to you that it is, every word of it, and every signature upon it, a forgery by William Roupell." In the course of the trial William Roupell was placed in the witness-box, and, first under an examination-in-chief, and then under a severe cross-examination by Mr. Bovill, gave the most circumstantial details as to the time, place, and circumstances of the imputed frauds and forgeries. At the close, Mr. Serjeant Shee informed the court that it had been agreed to withdraw a juror, the plaintiff and defendant afterwards to divide the value of the property in dispute, and the plaintiff also to confirm the defendant's title by all proper means. The forged documents were thereafter impounded, and William Roupell taken into custody. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court on the 24th September before Mr. Justice Byles, and, pleading guilty to the charge of forgery, was sentenced to penal servitude for life. His career, he admitted, had been one continued mistake, and he now only desired that complete justice should be done to all parties concerned.

(Wisdom of Solomon, iv. 13, 14.)

22.—President Lincoln, in a letter to Mr. Horace Greeley, writes: "My paramount object in the struggle is to save the Union, and not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the coloured race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear I forbear, because I do not believe it would help to save the Union."

She drew 26 ft. 10 in. aft and 26 ft. 6 in. forward, and accomplished an average speed of 12'209 knots an hour, being about two knots per hour under the speed of her sister-ship the Warrior, although the latter had been worked with 5 lbs. less pressure on the safety-valve.

Garibaldi was conveyed to Spezia, where, after considerable suffering, a ball was extracted from his ankle by Professor Partridge, of King's College, whom Garibaldi's friends in this country despatched to Italy. He issued a defence on the 1st September, denying any intention of engaging with the troops of Victor Emmanuel, and blaming the Government of Ratazzi for all that had happened to oppose the liberation of Rome. A decree of amnesty was passed the 5th of October.

8.—Fire at Brownlow Hill Workhouse, Liverpool, causing the death of twenty-three inmates, mostly children, who were asleep in the northern dormitory. Their escape was almost completely cut off when the flames were discovered; and though the most heroic efforts were made to carry them all out, the above number perished miserably amid the falling rains.

—The Cotton Famine now begins to assume its most intensely severe form in Lancashire. Twenty-four Poor Law Unions in the distressed districts afforded outdoor relief to 140,165 persons, at a weekly cost of 7,922*l.*, being nearly 100,000 persons in excess of the corresponding period of last year.

16.—Commenced at the Glasgow Circuit Court, before Lord Deas, the trial of Jessie M'Intosh, or M'Lachlan, for the murder of Jessie M'Pherson, in the dwelling-house Sandyford-place, on the night of the 4th July preceding. The prisoner pleaded Not guilty. A special defence was also lodged in the following terms:—"The panel pleads Not guilty, and, without prejudice to that plea, specially pleads that the murder alleged in the indictment was committed by James Fleming, residing with John Fleming, accountant, in or near Sandyford-place." From some unexplained incident thought to point in the direction of old Fleming, who was an inmate of the house at the time of the murder, he was apprehended at an early stage of the preliminary inquiry, but liberated in a few days, and now examined as a witness for the Crown. The murder was discovered on the afternoon of the 7th July, the examining surgeon testifying that the woman had been murdered with extreme ferocity; that her death had taken place within three days; that a severe struggle had ensued before death; that such an instrument as a cleaver for cutting meat, or a similar weapon, was that most likely to have caused the fatal injuries; that all the wounds on the neck and head, with the exception of those on the forehead, had been inflicted by a person standing over the deceased as she lay on her face on the ground; and that the body had been drawn by the head with the face downward, along the lobby from the kitchen to the front room. It was now set out in evidence that the prisoner was on terms of intimacy with the deceased, and often visited at the house in Sandyford-place; that on the 4th of July she was very much in want of money, being then behind with her rent, and with many articles in pawn; that on the above evening she dressed herself in a particular manner described by one of the witnesses—part of it being a brown merino gown, bonnet, and boots, none of which were now forthcoming; that she went out saying she was going to see Jessie M'Pherson, and was seen about half-way to Fleming's house; that she did not return till next morning between eight and nine o'clock; that within a few hours she sent out to pawn various articles of silver plate stolen from the house in Sandyford-place; that she was seen wearing certain articles of clothing known to have belonged to the deceased; and that to the prisoner was traced the despatch of a box to Hamilton, found to contain most of the clothing stolen from the house. At the close of the fourth day of trial, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty on the double charge of murder and theft. A long circumstantial statement was thereupon read by her counsel, setting forth that she was present in Fleming's house on the night of the murder; that the murder was committed by Mr. Fleming, sen., when the prisoner was out for drink; that he had sworn her over to secrecy "on a big Bible with a black cover on it," and that the plate had been carried off to give rise to the belief that the murder had been committed by some one who broke into the house. Lord Deas, after an address, enlarging on the horrible nature of the crime, and sharply censuring the prisoner for her attempt to cast the guilt on the shoulders of an innocent old man, adjudged the prisoner to be executed on the morning of the 11th October. This case gave rise to much controversy in the newspapers, the guilt or innocence of the prisoner being made matters of personal predilection; and a semi-official inquiry was made by Mr. Young, advocate, at the instance of the Lord Advocate acting for the Home Secretary. An important fact then sought to be established, was, that the prisoner's statement (which corresponded with ingenious accuracy to certain evidence tendered by the Crown) had been tendered to her agents so far back as 13th August. The result was that the Crown deferred so far to a loudly-expressed, if not widely-felt desire to spare the prisoner's life, as to commute the extreme sentence to one of penal servitude.

22.—President Lincoln issues a proclamation, declaring his intention, on the next meeting of Congress, to recommend the passing of a bill enacting that, on and after the 1st January, 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State the people whereof shall be in rebellion against the United States, shall be thenceforward and for ever free. The proclamation added, "The Executive will in due time recommend that all citizens of the United States who shall have remained loyal thereto throughout the rebellion, shall, upon the restoration of peace, . . . be compensated for all losses by acts of the United States, including the loss of slaves."

25.—Catherine Wilson, "the poisoner," tried at the Central Criminal Court for administering poison to Mrs. Soames, Bedford-square. There was another case against her for administering poison to Mrs. Ann Atkinson, Kirkby Lonsdale, and a third for administering oil of vitriol to Sarah Carnell, with intent to murder. For this last she had been tried in the same court, June 19th, and acquitted. She was now found guilty on the first of the above-mentioned charges, and sentenced to be executed, which sentence was carried into effect on the morning of October 20th.

October 5.—Riot in Hyde Park, originating in an attack made the preceding Sunday by Irish Papists upon a meeting of working men, called to express sympathy with Garibaldi, and to adopt a protest against the French occupation of Rome. Driven off the ground on the first occasion, the party calling themselves Garibaldians now mustered in great strength, charging the Irish with vigour in all directions, and obtaining possession of a mound of rubbish used as a kind of platform by the speakers. The battle raged throughout the afternoon, and resulted in a considerable number of persons being taken to the hospitals much injured. An attempt to renew the disturbance the following Sunday was put down in a summary way by the concentration of a large body of police in the Park. In Birkenhead, on the 8th and 15th, the rioting between the Papist and Garibaldian partisans was of the most aggravated description, and nearly resulted in the death of two police constables. At the Chester Assizes, a ringleader, one Lennon, who had made himself conspicuous by the use of an iron bar, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude.

7.—In an after-dinner speech, at Newcastle, the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed it as his opinion, that Jefferson Davis had really succeeded in making the South an independent nation. Coming from a Cabinet Minister at a time when neutrality was understood to be the policy of the Government, the announcement, as was to be expected, caused considerable sensation at the dinner-table, and much comment outside. In answer to Mr. Mozley, Manchester, who wrote on behalf of many cotton shippers, Mr. Gladstone replied, that his words at Newcastle were no more than the expression, in rather more pointed terms, of an opinion which he had long ago stated in public, that the effort of the Northern States to subjugate the Southern ones was hopeless by reason of the resistance of the latter.

11.—The Prussian Chamber of Deputies reject the military budget. It was afterwards passed by the Peers, but the dispute between the two chambers led the King to close the session on the 13th, and declare his intention of governing independently of the Constitution.

13.—Collision between two passenger trains on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, near Winchburgh, causing the almost instant death of 15 persons, and injuries more or less severe to about 100 others. The immediate cause of the calamity was the ignorance of a pointsman who permitted the train from the west to pass on to a single line of rails in use during the repair of the line, where it met with the train from Edinburgh proceeding at its ordinary speed. The scene which followed was of the most heartrending description. The engines and tenders of both trains were smashed to pieces; the first carriage of the Scottish Central train from Edinburgh, a third class, was completely destroyed, as was also a third-class carriage in front of the Glasgow train. Piled above the broken débris of these carriages were a large number of the carriages of the Glasgow train with their numerous passengers. The groans of the wounded and dying, and the shrieks of the terrified occupants of the carriages, were agonizing, and the horrors of the scene were still further intensified by the darkness of the night and the nature of the ground, the line running through a deep cutting of rock at the spot where the accident occurred. The calamity was considered one of the most serious which ever occurred on a Scottish line, and led to a fall in the value of the Company's stock, representing a depreciation of 100,000*l.*

19.—The Bencoolen, East Indiaman, wrecked in a severe storm on the Cornish coast, and twenty-seven of the crew drowned. Among other vessels lost in the British seas during this storm, were the Sir Allan M'Nab, timber laden, from Quebec, and the St. Louis, of Marseilles; the steamer Hamburg, trading between Havre and Brest, sank after coming into collision with the French bark Juanita.

27.—The Mexican Congress protest against the French invasion and proclamation, intimating that they would have entire freedom in the choice of a new government.

29.—At the Central Criminal Court, Robert Cooper, or Copeland, was sentenced to be executed for the murder of Ann Jane Barnham, at Isleworth. She was found in an insensible state from a gun-shot wound, in Brezil Mill-lane, and the crime was gradually traced to the prisoner, with whom his victim had at one time lived.

30.—Samuel Gardener, sweep, tried at the Central Criminal Court for the murder of his wife. It was pleaded in defence that the case might be one of suicide, that no motive of corresponding magnitude could be discovered, and that it was possible the crime was committed by the prisoner's mistress, Humbler, who resided in the house. The coroner's jury had found a verdict of Guilty against both these parties. Gardener himself was now found guilty, and sentenced to the extreme penalty of the law, a sentence afterwards commuted to one of penal servitude for life.

31.—Writing to the Mayor of Wigan regarding the distress in the cotton district, Lord Lindsay said: "We owe it to ourselves, and to our wealthy principality, to show that we are no laggards in providing for the wants of those who are now dependent upon us for relief and assistance. And when we think of the noble patience with which the operatives endure this adversity—an adversity not brought on by their own fault, but by external circumstances over which they have had no control—I think we shall consider, not how little, but how much we can each of us supply towards the great and crying necessity before us. I conclude by proposing, on the part of my father, who has kindly commissioned me to act for him in this matter, the following arrangement,—viz. that we will contribute 100*l.* a week to the Relief Fund during the next five months, towards maintenance in the way of food, and in the hope that an increased scale of allowance may be adopted; and we will pay at once 500*l.* to the fund for the purpose of redeeming or providing clothing and bedding, payment of rent, or any such necessary demands, leaving the distribution of this sum to the approved discretion of the Committee."

6.—The Reindeer, or turf scandal correspondence. Colonel Burnaby, part owner of a horse named Palm Oil, having changed its name to Reindeer, asked the dinner company at Mamhead how the name was spelt. "Oh," said Sir W. Codrington, "there is but one way of spelling it, viz., 'Reindeer';" to which Colonel Burnaby replied, "I will bet you a pony on fifty that you are wrong." I then laid him 10*l.* and one or two others laid him the same. Speaking of authorities, Col. Burnaby next said, "How do you spell 'referable'?" He then said, "You are wrong again." I then laid him 10*l.* on that. After booking these bets, Colonel Burnaby said, "I will now take two to one I win both bets," and I laid him 20*l.* to 10*l.* he did not; and I believe another gentleman laid him a similar bet to mine for a larger amount. Mr. Ten Broeck then said that he was so convinced we were right that he would bet 100*l.* to 1*l.* on it, which Captain Stewart took."

8.—Explosion of the locomotive-engine Perscus, in the engine-shed of the Great Western Railway, caused by a corrosion along a line of rivets which had gradually weakened the plates. Two cleaners and a lighter-up were killed, and considerable damage done to the engine-shed.

10.—Died, at Cambridge, aged 66 years, Mr. Jonas Webb, long celebrated for his successful experiments in improving the breed of sheep.

11.—Lambeth suspension-bridge opened for traffic. It was considered the cheapest of the London bridges, having cost only 30,000*l.*—less than one pound per superficial foot.

12.—Mrs. Norman makes a successful defence against a company of burglars who attempted to plunder the residence of her husband, at Whalley-bridge, Derbyshire. One of them was so severely wounded by a shot from her revolver, that he could with difficulty be carried off by his companions. They were all captured soon afterwards.

13.—Died, at Tübingen, the place of his birth, in his 75th year, Johann Ludwig Uhland, one of the greatest of modern German poets.

— Earl Russell writes to Earl Cowley, that the Emperor of the French had, through his Ambassador, proposed to her Majesty as well as the Emperor of Russia, that the three Courts should endeavour, both at Washington, and in communication with the Confederate States, to bring about a suspension of arms for six months, during which every act of hostility, direct or indirect, should cease, at sea as well as on land. "After weighing all the information which had been received from America, her Majesty's Government are led to the conclusion that there is no ground, at the present moment, to hope that the Federal Government would accept the proposal suggested, and a refusal from Washington at present would prevent any speedy renewal of the offer."

19.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company's steamer Colombo wrecked in a fog-squall on the island of Minicoy, Travancore. The whole of the passengers, and 257 out of the 630 mail-boxes on board were saved. The passengers were kindly treated by the natives, and remained on the island in tents for ten days, when they were taken off by the Ottaway, telegraphed for from Bombay.

26.—Commencement of the memorable sessions of the Central Criminal Court, where Baron Bramwell, by the well-directed severity of his sentences, put a sudden check to the brutal garrotte crimes which for months back had been the terror of London society. An Act of Parliament was passed the following session to punish such offences by flogging.

December 1.—Died, aged 78, James Sheridan Knowles, dramatist.

— The Greek Government order a plebiscite to be taken for the election of a king. A general desire being manifested among the Hellenes, that Prince Alfred would accept the throne, England, France, and Russia replied on the 13th, that it was their intention to exclude the dynasties of the three protecting Powers.

2.—At a meeting held in Manchester Town Hall to devise means for increasing the relief to distressed cotton operatives, and attended by Lords Derby and Sefton, Sir Philip Egerton of Tatton, and other great land-owners, 70,000*l.* is subscribed, and 60,000*l.* added afterwards.

— Commenced in the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of Seymour v. Butterworth, an action for libel brought by W. D. Seymour, Q.C. and M.P. for Southampton, against Mr. Butterworth, law-publisher. The libel appeared in the May number of the "Law Magazine and Law Review," in the form of an article upon the plaintiff, purporting to be a commentary upon his professional career. Mr. Seymour had boasted to the electors of Southampton that his elevation to the Record-ership of Newcastle was a proof of his professional success. The writer alleged that it was given in return for parliamentary support to the Government, and further, that at the very time of the statement there was evidence before him that the Benchers of the Middle Temple had censured and almost disbarred him for unprofessional conduct in his relations with attorneys. Mr. Seymour complained of having been maligned and persecuted by his brethren of the Northern Circuit because he was an Irishman, and had, therefore, joined them "with the curse of Swift" upon him. "It is only just to Mr. Digby Seymour," writes the critic, "to say, that there are two kinds of Irishmen, and that the cordiality extended to the one is by no means secure to the other. There is the Irish gentleman, generous, accomplished, and urbane—perhaps the highest type of the genus gentleman to be found in the United Kingdom. There is also the Irish blackguard—swaggering, foul-mouthed, and shameless; the most insolent of upstarts, the most unblushing of swindlers; never destitute of a quarrel, never at a loss for a lie. For, as the Irish gentleman is of rare quality, so the Irish blackguard is consummate in his growth. Ireland is always great in extremes, more especially in her psychological productions. She has reared generals who have led their armies to certain victory, and she has reared also the tribe of cabbage-garden heroes. She has adorned our Parliament with splendid orators and consummate statesmen, and has afflicted it also with a breed of bawling demagogues and venal fools. And so it happens that this green and prolific island, with the singular versatility of her race, has supplied to the bar of England some of its brightest ornaments and some of its blackest sheep; bestowing on the former a learning and eloquence which Englishmen are proud to admire, and enriching the latter with a power of impudence and a fertility in fraud which defy all description, as (to the uninitiated intellect) they pass all knowledge." At the close of the second day's proceedings the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages 40s.

3.—Boiler explosion at the Midland Iron Works, Masborough, killing nine of the workmen, and injuring many others.

8.—Series of explosions in the Edmund's Main Colliery, Barnsley, causing the death of sixty workmen employed in the pit. When firing a charge of powder for the purpose of blasting, the gas issuing from the coals became ignited, and immediately set fire to the surrounding heaps. The men made many determined attempts to extinguish this, as they had done other fires in the same seam, but it increased with unusual rapidity, till a terrific blast up the shaft gave those above warning of the fearful character of the explosion which had taken place below. The lifting machinery was wrought with precision and speed, and it was for a time hoped that all would be rescued; but a second explosion destroyed the communication between certain parts of the mine and the shaft, and sixty men and boys were enclosed in one gloomy sepulchre. A third explosion took place about one o'clock, which not only put an end to all doubt as to the fate of the workmen, but caused the death of five additional volunteer searchers, who had gallantly encountered the unknown horrors of the pit to rescue their brethren. The fire was only extinguished by turning a stream of water down the shaft, and flooding the workings.

10.—At the Winchester Assizes, Ferdinando Petrina, an Austrian seaman, was indicted for the wilful murder, on the high seas, of the captain of the English brigantine Winthrop, the captain's wife, and the first mate Jones. In the course of the voyage from San Francisco to Monte Video the prisoner rushed on deck in an excited state, put out the light, and, with a cry of "No more farinha," commenced a butchery which ended in the death of the above parties. He was sentenced to be executed, and died, on the 30th December, fully admitting his guilt.

— Concluded in the Court of Queen's Bench, after a five-days' trial, before Mr. Justice Crompton and a common jury, the case of Hall v. Semple, being an action against a medical man for illegally causing the plaintiff (478) to be seized and confined in a lunatic asylum, and, on another count, for falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, giving and getting to be given, medical certificates of his insanity, with a view to his confinement under the Lunacy Act, 1863, 16th and 17th Victoria, cap. 96. The plaintiff himself was examined at great length, and his married daughter, his son-in-law, and many near friends and neighbours, some of whom had known him all his life. They one and all gave strong evidence, not only that he was perfectly sane, but there never was the least pretence for supposing that he was not so; and, indeed that he was remarkably sensible. Dr. Griffiths, a medical man, who had attended the family for twenty-eight years, gave similar evidence. The defendant, Dr. Semple, who had been, twenty-six years in practice, stated in evidence that he had furnished his certificate chiefly on the testimony of the plaintiff's wife, confirmed by the opinion of Dr. Grey, who had given a similar certificate some years before, and also, from his own observation, at an interview with the plaintiff himself, and the testimony of several persons to whom Mrs. Semple referred him. The jury now returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the second count of the indictment, which set forth that the defendant, in signing his certificate, had acted negligently, and without reasonable care and caution. Damages 150l.

13.—At the Worcester Assizes, William Ockeld, aged 70 years, was sentenced to be executed for murdering his wife, quite as old as himself, by beating her to death with a mop, the only provocation alleged in defence being that the old woman disturbed the prisouer at night by groaning in bed. He was executed on the 2d January.

— Battle of Fredericksburg; the Confederates, after an obstinate engagement, beating back the Federal army under General Burnside, who was compelled, three days afterwards, to withdraw the remnant of his forces across the Rappahannock. The Southern generals who most prominently distinguished themselves in this series of actions were Lee, Longstreet, and "Stonewall" Jackson.

18.—The Newcastle steamer Lifeguard foundered in a storm at sea with all hands. Very little of the wreck was ever discovered, but it was generally thought she had gone down off Flamborough Head.

— The remains of the lamented Prince Consort removed from the temporary resting-place provided for them in the vaults of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, to the new mausoleum erected for the purpose by her Majesty in Frogmore Park. The ceremony took place at an early hour in the morning, and was of a purely private character.

26.—Fire in Portland-place, Soho, destroying the greater part of the house No. 6, and suffocating six children of the Spencer family (from four to fourteen years of age) who had been brought in from Battersea School to enjoy the Christmas holidays with their parents.

27.—The Lancashire distress reaches a climax this week, the relief lists showing the alarming total of 496,816 persons to be dependent on charitable or parochial funds. There was no disturbance in the distressed districts, nor any complaining among the famine-stricken operatives. The weekly loss of wages at the same time was estimated at about 168,000*l.* So far as the health of the district was concerned, the reports of the medical officers unanimously declared that, apart from epidemic maladies, whose origin and progress were similar to those of other countries in which no distress exists, the health of the population was in a satisfactory condition, there being no ascertainable connexion between the origin, character, or spread of these diseases and the distress.

30.—Chester Town Hall and Exchange destroyed by fire, commencing in the rooms over the Council Chamber.

31.—Western Virginia admitted as a separate state of the American Union under the name of Kanawha.

January 1.—President Lincoln issues a proclamation that all persons held as slaves within the Confederate States, are and henceforward shall be free, and that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognise and maintain the freedom of said persons.—“And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free, to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence; and I recommend to them that in all cases, when allowed, they labour faithfully for reasonable wages. And I further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the armed service of the United States, to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service. And upon this, sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favour of Almighty God.” With reference to this proclamation, Earl Russell wrote to Lord Lyons, January 17:—“The proclamation of the President enclosed in your Lordship’s despatch of the 2d inst. appears to be of a very strange nature. It professes to emancipate all slaves in places where the United States cannot exercise any jurisdiction or make emancipation a reality; but it does not decree emancipation of slaves in any States, or part of States, occupied by Federal troops, and subject to United States jurisdiction, and where, therefore, emancipation, if decreed, might have been carried into effect. . . . The proclamation makes slavery at once legal and illegal, and makes slaves either punishable for running away from their masters, or entitled to be supported and encouraged in so doing, according to the locality of the plantation to which they belong, and the loyalty of the State in which they may happen to be. There seems to be no declaration of a principle adverse to slavery in this proclamation. It is a measure of war, and a measure of war of a very questionable kind. As President Lincoln has thrice appealed to the judgment of mankind in his proclamation, I venture to say I do not think it can, or ought to, satisfy the friends of abolition who look for total and impartial freedom for the slave, and not for vengeance on the slave-owner.”

2.—The English envoy at Brazil orders the seizure of several merchant vessels in reprisal of alleged insults offered to the officers of H.M.S. Forte and for the pillage of the Prince of Wales, a trading vessel wrecked on the Brazilian coast. The native Government afterwards paid, under protest, the indemnity demanded by the English envoy.

—Close of a series of battles at Murfreesboro’ between the Northern and Southern forces. The Confederates led by General Bragg were ultimately beaten back by General Rosencrans.

3.—Sunnyside Bleaching Works, Salford, destroyed by fire.

6.—Fire at Plymouth, breaking out in an isolated block of buildings used as an hotel, assembly room, and theatre.

—Loss of the London and Liverpool steamer Liverpool, and the barque La Plata, bound to Lima, through coming into collision off Point Lynas, in St. George’s Channel. No lives lost, the crew and passengers in each vessel taking to their boats, in which they kept afloat till next morning, when assistance arrived.

7.—Commenced at the Central Criminal Court, before Mr. Justice Blackburn, the trial of the prisoners Buncher, butcher; Burnett, labourer; Brewer, mould-maker; and Griffiths, printer, indicted for uttering forged notes of the Bank of England printed on paper stolen from the mills at Laverstoke. The entire details of this mysterious and successful fraud were laid bare by the approver Brown, who was employed as an assistant at the mills, and contrived to secrete quantities of paper manufactured for 5*l.*, 10*l.*, and 50*l.* notes. These sheets through time were conveyed to Buncher and Burnett, and from them they passed to the printer Griffiths at Birmingham, where quantities were seized along with the forged plates. While proceeding to a field where certain of the plates had been buried, Griffiths admitted that he had printed the whole of the notes forged on the Bank of England for the last seventeen years. He printed for Buncher on this occasion 180 5*l.* notes, and twenty 10*l.*; and twenty 5*l.* notes for another person, most probably “the woman in black” who met Brown by arrangement at the Waterloo station on various occasions, and received from him a portion of the stolen paper. When Buncher (whose ostensible business was a butcher in Westminster), received the notes back from Birmingham, they appeared generally to have been exchanged for a certain quantity of gold in a house, North Kent-terrace, New Cross. The detective on one occasion witnessed the transaction:—"We went first into the front parlour," said Detective Moss in evidence, "and removed two bricks from the partition wall, separating it from a back parlour, and leaving a light picture over the hole. We then went into the back parlour, and remained secreted there for some time. We could hear distinctly what passed in the front parlour. About half-past one o'clock in the day, from what Miss Campbell said to me, I went upstairs to a back room, and, looking out of the window, saw the prisoner Buncher and another man. I then went into the back parlour. I first heard a knock at the street door, which was answered by a Mrs. Clift, the landlady of the house. Buncher inquired if Mrs. Campbell was in. The answer was 'Yes,' and Mrs. Campbell was called down stairs. Buncher said, 'Good day; are you now prepared?' She said she was. 'How much?' said he. Mrs. Campbell replied, 'Fifty.' He said, 'That is no good; I want 200*l.* as promised on Wednesday last.' She said she could not lay out more than that the first time, and besides, she did not know whether she could get rid of 'them.' She asked how many he had got. Buncher said, 'Ten fifties.' Mrs. Campbell asked if he had got any gold. He said, 'Not to-day; but let me see the money first. Business is business. I want 200*l.* as promised at the beginning of the week.' Mrs. Campbell said she could not spare so much. Buncher asked her to let him see what she had, adding that he had plenty of 'tens' and 'fives,' and would go and fetch them. He went out. The other man was not present at that time. Buncher returned in about ten minutes, and by that time the husband of Mrs. Campbell had joined her in her room. The other man came in afterwards. Buncher, addressing Campbell, said, 'Now, the stuff.' Campbell said his wife had it upstairs. Buncher then became very violent, made a great deal of noise, and said they were playing the fool with him. I don't believe the Campbells produced the money." Griffiths was sentenced to penal servitude for life, Buncher to twenty-five years, Burnett to twenty years, and Williams to four years' penal servitude. Robert Cummings, who was next placed in the dock charged with having a quantity of the stolen paper in his possession for unlawful purposes, was acquitted, on the technical plea that there was no other evidence than the approver's to connect him with Griffiths or any other of the gang.

7.—Alexander Milne, jeweller, Edinburgh, murders James Paterson in a dwelling-house in South Frederick-street. The latter, who was a working-jeweller, entered Milne's shop about 11 o'clock, and a few minutes afterwards he was seen to come out at the area door, climb over the railings, and enter an adjoining shop, where he fell down, and expired in a few minutes, having been stabbed to the heart. Milne had been drinking heavily for some time, and for two or three days preceding the murder had been violently excited by imaginary injuries inflicted, he alleged, by Paterson among others. Milne gave various accounts of the occurrence, sometimes admitting and even justifying the murder, then expressing regret for it, and once he made a declaration to the effect that he was playing with the dagger when Paterson entered, and could not prevent him rushing against it. Milne was tried before the High Court of Justiciary on February 9th, when the jury, though finding him guilty of murder, gave effect to the plea of insanity set up in his behalf, by recommending him to mercy.

8.—Accident at the Knottingley station of the Great Northern Railway, caused by the York and Leeds trains running into each other at the junction there. Many of the passengers were injured.

9.—Ceremonial opening of the Metropolitan Railway. A banquet in celebration of the event was held at the Farringdon-street terminus, several of the speakers giving interesting details of the difficulties which had to be overcome in laying down a line of railway in the underground world of London. When the line was open to the public, next day, about 30,000 people were conveyed between the various stations.

—At Locarno, Lago Maggiore, the dome of the church of La Madonna del Sasso crashes through the roof of the building, and entombs in its ruins 53 females who were worshipping in the building at the time.

14.—The Poles rise against the Russian conscription—designed, as described by Lord Napier, "to make a clean sweep of the revolutionary youth of Poland; to shut up the most energetic and dangerous spirits in the restraints of the Russian army; to kidnap the opposition, and carry it off to Siberia or the Caucasus." At midnight police agents and soldiers commenced the work in Warsaw. They surrounded the houses noted down in their list, and a detachment entered each to seize the men designated to serve, the parents being seized as guarantees in the case of absence of young men. During the first evening about 2,500 were carried off. Next day thousands took flight, and commenced an organized resistance against Russia, which soon spread over the entire area of Russian Poland. A Central Committee sitting at Warsaw was the main directing body in this struggle for freedom. Langiewicz fought for a time at the head of the national forces as Dictator of Poland, but disappeared in a mysterious manner after a desperate encounter with the Russians on the 18th March. He was afterwards known to have crossed the Vistula and given himself up to Austria.

14.—The Prussian Chambers open their session at Berlin, the deputies soon after carrying an address stating that the ministers had carried on the administration against the Constitution. Count Bismarck objected on the ground that while the ministry in England was the ministry of the Parliament, in Prussia they were bound to be the ministry of the King. The King refused the claim of the deputies to control the finances of the kingdom.

19.—In reply to an address from the working men of Manchester, President Lincoln writes:—"I know and deeply deplore the sufferings which the working men at Manchester, and in all Europe, are called to endure in this crisis. It has been often and studiously represented that the attempts to overthrow this Government; which was built upon the foundation of human rights, and to substitute for it one which should rest exclusively on the basis of human slavery, was likely to obtain the favour of Europe. Through the action of our disloyal citizens, the working men of Europe have been subjected to a severe trial, for the purpose of forcing their sanction to that attempt. Under these circumstances I cannot but regard your decisive utterances upon the question as an instance of sublime Christian heroism which has not been surpassed in any age or in any country."

— Minute drawn up by Lord Derby for the guidance of the Executive Committee of the Lancashire Relief Fund. "The committee had not only to distribute the alms entrusted to them by public beneficence, but so to distribute them that on the one hand they may not place the honest and industrious on the same footing with the idle and profligate; and, on the other hand, that they may not abuse public liberality by making their funds contribute to the relief of those who have unexpended means of their own."

— Died, aged 74, Horace Vernet, French historical painter.

22.—Fall of Lytham Lighthouse, erected on the Lancashire coast, at a dangerous spot, known as "The Double Stammers." The destruction was partly owing to the fierceness of the gale which swept round it some days previously, and partly to the action of the sea which had wrought itself beneath the foundation of the structure.

26.—Three men killed at Bradley Colliery, near Bilston, in consequence of the rope giving way when being let down the shaft.

— At the Princess's Theatre, Oxford-street, two ballet girls seriously injured, the dress of one taking fire at the side-lights, and of the other when attempting to rescue her neighbour. One of them died from the injuries she received. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of accidental death, but strongly urged the necessity of light dresses being rendered unflammable by the manufacturer and laundress.

27.—The Archbishop of Canterbury replies to an address of the clergy of the rural deanery of Chesterfield on the subject of the heresies of Bishop Colenso:—"It is to be deplored for his own sake as well as for the sake of those whose minds may be perplexed, not certainly by the force of his arguments, but because they are advanced by a bishop, that he should have felt himself called upon at once to publish his crude sentiments, which deeper study and more profound reflection might most probably have induced him to renounce, but which the hasty step he has now taken may, it is to be feared, render impossible. You may be assured that no effort shall be wanting on my part, nor, I trust, on the part of my right reverend brethren, to vindicate the faith of the Church in this instance, as far as it is in our power to do so."

30.—Charles Clark, Esq., a magistrate for Staffordshire and formerly Mayor of Wolverhampton, shoots himself in his bed-room in a fit of nervous excitement.

31.—Died at Bowood, in his 84th year, Henry, Marquis of Lansdowne, a statesman of deserved influence with both the great political parties, and widely known for his judicious patronage of artists and men of letters.

— The Confederates attack the blockading squadron before Charlestown and compel it to retire for a short time.

February 5.—The fifth session of the present Parliament opened by Royal Commission. The first paragraph of the Speech made reference to the treaty concluded with the King of Denmark for the marriage of the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra. The Greeks, it was said, had expressed a desire that Prince Alfred should accept the Greek Crown, but "the diplomatic engagements of her Majesty's Crown, together with other weighty considerations, have prevented her Majesty from yielding to the general wish of the Greek nation. If the Republic of the Seven Islands should declare a deliberate wish to be united to the kingdom of Greece, her Majesty would be prepared to take such steps as may be necessary for a revision of the treaty of November 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted and was placed under the protection of the British Government." Another sentence referred to the civil war raging in the Northern States of America, her Majesty having abstained from taking any step with a view to induce a cessation of the conflict, because it did not appear that such overtures could be attended with a probability of success. The distress in the cotton districts, and the generosity with which relief was being administered, were also referred to. In the course of the debate on the Address, the home and foreign policy of the Government was discussed at considerable length. No division took place in either House on the Address.

5.—At an afternoon sitting of the House of Lords, the Prince of Wales takes his seat for the first time. His Royal Highness wore the scarlet robe with ermine bars, proper to his rank as Duke of Cornwall, over the uniform of a general in the army. He also wore the "George," and the Star of the Order of India. The oath having been administered, a procession of Peers moved towards the throne, and the Duke of Cambridge pointing to the chair of state on the right, his Royal Highness took his seat there, covered. Rising immediately afterwards he again advanced to the woolsack, shook hands cordially with the Lord Chancellor, who offered his congratulations. His Royal Highness then retired by the Peers' entrance. In the evening the Prince attended the debate on the Address, taking his seat on the cross-benches.

— Came on for hearing in the Court of Queen's Bench, before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury, the case of Clark v. the Queen, being an action (the first of the kind) raised under Mr. Bovill's Petition of Right, by an inventor of certain methods of constructing iron ships, against the Admiralty, for an alleged use and application of his invention, or of his plans and drawings, in the construction of the Warrior and others of our new iron vessels of war. The Petition of Right was filed so long ago as March 1861, plaintiff framing his case, not only upon his patent, but also on a second and distinct count,—an alleged contract by the Admiralty to accept and use his plans and remunerate him for their use. Particulars of infringement were then delivered, which comprised "longitudinal framing on each side of internal keel," and "plates of vertical framing set up according to the invention;" "vertical floors;" longitudinal framing inside and out; mode of securing timber to external framing; a particular mode of framing in floors; timber between two thicknesses of metal; and tonguing and grooving plates." Two main points in dispute were whether these were included in the alleged invention, and if so whether they were novelties, so that they could legally be the subjects of a patent. The tables of the Court were covered with sections and models of the Warrior and other similar vessels, while the Court in some degree, crowded as it was with eminent scientific men, had the aspect of a mechanical museum, or conversazione of the Society of Civil Engineers. The amount claimed in name of damages was 500,000*l.* The trial lasted over five days, in the course of which a great number of marine engineers of eminence and Admiralty officers were examined. Mr. Watts, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, said, he had designed the Warrior without any aid whatever from the petitioner's designs. In his charge the Lord Chief Justice formally directed the jury to consider—(1) Whether the patent had been infringed in the building of the Warrior, &c., either in the use of the separate framework and the wooden planking, or the tonguing and grooving. (2) Whether the petitioner's specification and drawings showed vertical and longitudinal framing separate from the plates. (3) Whether, if so, that was a new invention or had been previously used. (4) Whether it was so described in the specification that a competent workman could therefrom construct such a framework. (5) Whether the complete specification departed from the provisional. (6) Whether the petitioner had been employed by the Admiralty, or had furnished drawings, &c. on the terms he alleged? The jury then retired to consider their verdict, and were absent above an hour. On their return into Court they returned answers to the above questions thus:—(1) That the patent has not been infringed—i.e. in the construction of the hull. (2) That the petitioner's specification does not show longitudinal and vertical framing separate from the plates. (3) As to the question of novelty they desired to be excused from answering. (4) The jury likewise desired to be excused from answering as to whether the specification described the invention sufficiently, and the Lord Chief Justice said it was not now material. (5) The jury said the complete specification did contain some matters which were not in the provisional. (6) They found that the petitioner had not been employed by the Admiralty. This, of course, amounted to a verdict for the Crown, and was so entered. The jury added that they desired to say nothing as to the validity of the plaintiff's patent on other points.

7.—Wreck of H.M.S. Orpheus on a sandbank in Manukau harbour, west coast of New Zealand. From the inquiry which took place, it appeared that either she was not kept far enough to the north, or that the middle bank had very recently extended itself unknown to the pilots; for very shortly after passing the bar, and when about two miles from the Head, the ship struck on what was subsequently discovered to be the extreme northern edge of the middle bank, and at about fifty feet from the deep water. The order was given to back astern, but the engines never moved; the ship immediately broached to with her head to the north, and the waters made one complete sweep over the port broadside, tearing to pieces and sweeping everything before them; the heavy bumping of the ship then forced up the hatchway fastenings, and she consequently soon filled with water. The small steamer Wonga-Wonga picked a number of the survivors off the wreck; but of 260 officers, crew, and marines on board, no less than 190 were drowned, many of them being carried beneath the wreck by the eddies and undercurrents which formed about the vessel when the strong flood-tide set in. About eight hours after the Orpheus struck, the masts went one by one, the people in the tops being heard cheering and encouraging each other as they fell. The commander, Commodore Burnett, C.B., was among those drowned. His body was recovered by the natives, and buried in the first instance on the coast, but afterwards disinterred, and removed to Auckland, where it was interred with military honours.

9.—The Bishop of Lincoln's palace at Riseholme partly destroyed by a fire, believed to have originated in the chimney of the servants' hall.

— The George Griswold arrives at Liverpool laden with provisions, the gift of Americans to the Lancashire fund for the relief of the distressed operatives. The commander was presented with an address by the Chamber of Commerce, expressive of thankfulness for the munificent and well-timed gift. Another vessel, the Achilles, arrived in the Mersey, on the same charitable mission, on the 24th.

12.—The Prince of Wales entertained by the Worshipful Company of Fishmongers, and presented with the freedom of that Corporation.

13.—The Upper House of Convocation, at the request of the Lower, agree to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the teaching of Bishop Colenso's work on the Pentateuch.

— Came on for hearing in the Court of Common Pleas, Guildhall, before Lord Chief Justice Erle and a special jury, the case of Collingwood v. Berkeley and others, which led to an exposure of what the Times described as one of the greatest swindles of the day. The action was brought by the plaintiff, Isaac Collingwood, against the Hon. F. H. F. Berkeley, N. J. Fenner, E. Loder, and others, as Directors of the British Columbia Overland Transit Company (Limited), to recover back the sum of 45*l.* paid by the plaintiff for his passage and transit to British Columbia, and the amount of damage and costs he had been put to from the failure on the part of the defendants to carry out a contract they had entered into with him to convey him to Columbia, and for leaving him without any provision for conveying him further, at St. Paul's, Minnesota, in the United States of America. The Overland Transit Company was projected by Colonel Sleigh, with the avowed object of conveying emigrants to British Columbia. He caused an attractive prospectus of the project to be drawn up, and prefixed to it a list of first-class names as Directors. How many of these gentlemen, or whether any of them, had been consulted did not appear, but there was no doubt that several had not, and in some instances peremptory orders were given to omit their names. Berkeley was among those who appeared to have given their consent before the prospectus was issued. It was next duly announced that the first batch of emigrants would be transported to British Columbia in the course of May, vid Quebec, Chicago, and St. Paul's, Minnesota. Thence they were to be conveyed to their destination, partly by water, partly by land, under the protection of a "powerful escort," and it was stated that plenty of cattle and provisions would be taken, that the prairies abounded in wild buffalo, and that the rivers swarmed with fish. Accordingly, Mr. Collingwood, with thirty-one other passengers, having paid their passage-money of 42*l.* each to cover everything, sailed on May 31, from Glasgow, in charge of the Company's agent, Mr. Hayward, and arrived without mishap at St. Paul's. There they found nothing whatever in readiness, no lodging, no provisions, no covered waggons or other means of transport, no escort, and no money to purchase or hire any of these. Hayward had brought none with him; Hines, the agent at St. Paul's, had got none; neither Messrs. Burbank, the contractors for the transport of emigrants, nor any one else would take the Company's bills, and there was nothing for it but to send Mr. Collingwood back, and to camp out in the meantime under canvas. Mr. Collingwood hurried back to England in no enviable mood, and knocked at the door of No. 6, Copthall-court, Throgmorton-street, where the office had been. It was gone; the Company's name was erased, and the laundress in occupation could tell him nothing about it. He sought out the Company's solicitor, but found that the bubble had burst and that the Directors repudiated the agency of Colonel Sleigh. A verdict was now given against all the Directors except Fenner. Damages 160*l.*

15.—Following the course of the White Nile from Ripon Falls, Lake N'yanza, Speke and his party enter Gondokoro, where they were met, not by Consul Petherick as had been intended, but by Mr. Samuel Baker, and hospitably entertained.

16.—With reference to the suspension of intercourse with Brazil, following on the dispute regarding the wreck of the Prince of Wales in the Rio Grande, Lord Derby, in the House of Lords, said that more unjustifiable proceedings were never taken by any representative of the Crown against a friendly government than what appeared to have been taken by Mr. Christie, and he trusted to hear that they had been disapproved of by her Majesty's Ministers. Earl Russell justified the conduct of the Government on the ground mainly that the Brazilian authorities had prevented an inquiry being made into the matter of our complaints.

17.—In the Court of Probate and Divorce, Sir C. Cresswell gives judgment in the notorious case of Gipps v. Gipps and Hume. Augustus Pemberton Gipps prayed for a dissolution of his marriage with Helen Etough Gipps, on the ground of her adultery with William Wentworth Fitzwilliam Hume. The respondent pleaded a denial of the charge. The co-respondent also denied the charge, and further alleged that the petitioner had been guilty of connivance and of wilful neglect and misconduct, conducing to the adultery if it had been committed. He also averred that the petitioner had filed a former petition charging adultery between the respondent and co-respondent, and that when the petition was about to be heard the petitioner, in consideration of a large sum of money to be paid to him by the co-respondent, agreed to withdraw the petition; that the co-respondent had paid to the petitioner a large sum of money, and that when the petition came on for hearing the petitioner produced no evidence in support of it, and the verdict was thereupon entered for the respondent and co-respondent. The petitioner by his replication traversed the allegations of connivance and wilful neglect and misconduct, and as to the other averments in the co-respondent's answer pleaded that they were irrelevant except as evidence of connivance, and that they contained a partial and incorrect statement of the circumstances of the former suit.—Petition dismissed.

17.—The Earl of Rosse installed Chancellor of Trinity College, Dublin.

— In explanation of the intention of the Oxford High Church party to bring the teaching of Professor Jowett under the notice of the Vice-Chancellor's Court, Dr. Pusey writes:—"It is impossible to look upon Professor Jowett's teaching otherwise than as a part of a larger whole—a systematic attempt to revolutionize the Church of England. The publication of the 'Essays and Reviews' was a challenge to admit that teaching as one of the recognised phases of faith in the English Church. The subjects on which we are told on high legal authority that there is evidence that Professor Jowett has distinctly contravened the teaching of the Church of England, are great and central truths. These are the doctrine of the Atonement, the Inspiration of Holy Scripture, and the agreement of the creeds with Holy Scripture. Painful, then, as it is to have to act against one with whom in this place we must needs be brought into contact—painful as are many other consequences of an appeal to law—yet I hold myself bound by my duty to God, to the Church, and to the souls of men, to ascertain distinctly whether such contradiction of fundamental truths is to be part of the recognised system of the University." Next day Mr. Godfrey Lushington wrote: "Of the prosecutors, Dr. Pusey, too well known to fame to make any statement, has been suspended from the University pulpit for heterodoxy, he has been condemned in person by Dr. Ogilvie, one of his co-prosecutors, and indirectly by the other, Dr. Heurtley, and he and his followers were saved from impending academical exile by the intervention of the very man he is now prosecuting."

19.—In view of the marriage of the Prince of Wales, and in response to a Royal message on the subject, the House of Commons unanimously adopt Lord Palmerston's motion to settle 100,000*l.* per annum on his Royal Highness—40,000*l.* to be drawn from the Consolidated Fund, and 60,000*l.* from the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall; 10,000*l.* was also voted for the separate use of the Princess of Wales, and 30,000*l.* per annum in the event of her surviving his Royal Highness.

20.—The Pneumatic Despatch Company commence operations by sending the mail-bags through the tubing from Euston Station to the post-office in Eversholt-street.

23.—In the House of Commons Lord Clarence Paget introduces the Navy Estimates, and moves for a vote of 10,736,032*l.*, being a reduction of 1,058,273*l.* as compared with the preceding year. The number of seamen and marines to be the same—76,000 men.

— Unveiling of the Wedgwood statue at Stoke-on-Trent.

27.—At Oxford, in the Chancellor's Court, Montague Bernard Esq., Assessor, delivers judgment in the case instituted by the Rev. Dr. Pusey and two other Doctors of Divinity against the Rev. Benjamin Jowett, Professor of Greek in the University, for heresy contained in certain of his published writings. Objections were taken by defendant's proctor that the court had no jurisdiction in spiritual matters; that it was unfit to do justice to the case, and that it had no power over a Regius Professor. The Assessor now gave judgment that the protest in which these objections were embodied should be disallowed, but that the case must not be carried further.

— In the course of a debate on the Navy Estimates, Sir F. Smith made certain observations which led Mr. Reed, Chief Constructor of the Navy, to write him an epistle which the House adjudged to be a breach of its privileges. Mr. Reed now appeared at the bar in custody of the Serjeant-at-arms, and expressed his regret for having written the letter, as he was now sensible that he had entirely misunderstood the purport of Sir F. Smith's observations. He was therefore excused from further attendance.

— Came on for hearing in the Court of Queen's Bench, Guildhall, before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury, the libel case of Campbell v. Spottiswoode, being an action raised by the Rev. Dr. Campbell, for some years editor of the British Banner, and now editor and proprietor of certain religious papers—the British Ensign and the British Standard—against the printer of the Saturday Review, for an alleged libel in one of its articles. The first sentence of the article referred to a series of "Letters to the Prince Consort," published by the plaintiff in his paper in 1860. The general tenor of these letters, as admitted by the Doctor in cross-examination, was to warn the religious public of the dangers which might arise to the Prince of Wales from his being at Rome in the company of Roman Catholic prelates; from his visit to Canada, where Roman Catholics were in the ascendant; and from his being sent to Oxford for education. In August 1861, there was an article in the Saturday Review commenting upon these letters, and alluding to a hoax said to have been practised upon the Doctor in respect of their subject. In September 1861, there commenced in the British Ensign and British Standard a series of letters from the plaintiff, as editor, on the subject of "Missions to China." One of these letters, published in that month, was addressed to the Queen, and contained a passage which was reprinted and commented upon in the article alleged to be libellous. On the 6th of June, 1862, there appeared in the British Standard, following a long letter from the plaintiff, as editor, on the same subject, a letter from the publisher, stating: "Co-operation is earnestly invited to aid in sending forth on all sides, facts, arguments, and appeals calculated to awaken compassion for the lost millions of the land of China." Other passages referred to the encouragement given to the scheme by various friends, some known, others unknown. An article on the subject in the Saturday Review of the 14th June, contained the following:—"To spread the knowledge of the Gospel in China would be a good and an excellent thing, and worthy of all praise and encouragement; but to make such a work a mere pretext for puffing an obscure newspaper into circulation, is a most scandalous and flagitious act, and it is this act, we fear, we must charge against Dr. Campbell. Buy the letters, and save the heathen. . . . No doubt it is deplorable to find an ignorant credulity manifested among a class of the community entitled, on many grounds, to respect; but now and then this very credulity may be turned to good account. Dr. Campbell is just now making use of it for a very practical purpose, and to-morrow some other religious speculator will cry his wares in the name of Heaven, and the mob will hasten to deck him out in purple and fine linen. When Dr. Campbell has finished his 'Chinese Letters,' he will be a greater simpleton than we take him for if he does not force off another 100,000 copies of his paper by launching a fresh series of thunderbolts against the powers of darkness. In the meanwhile, there can be no doubt that he is making a very good thing indeed of the spiritual waters of the Chinese." In summing up, the Lord Chief Justice said to the jury, "If you think that the only effect of the article was fairly to discuss the proposal of the plaintiff, then find for the defendant. If you think that the effect is to impute base and sordid motives, then your verdict ought to be for the plaintiff. If, at the same time, you are of opinion that the writer did so under an honest and genuine belief that the plaintiff was fairly open to these charges, I invite you, while you find your verdict for the plaintiff with such damages as you think proper, to find that matter of fact specially; and I shall, in that event, reserve leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, if the Court should be of opinion that the matter of fact so found in his favour entitles him to the verdict." The jury then retired to consider their verdict, and returned, after the lapse of an hour, with a verdict for the plaintiff for 50*l.*, at the same time finding specially "That the writer of the Saturday Review believed his imputations to be well founded." On the 18th April an application was made in the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule to show cause why the verdict for the plaintiff should not be set aside and entered for the defendant. In pronouncing his opinion, the Lord Chief Justice said:—"You have a perfect right to canvass a man's public conduct; to say that it was foolish and absurd, and that the effect of the subscription which Dr. Campbell was asking the public to contribute to, was only to put money into his pocket; but when you go beyond, and state what would be the mischievous consequences, and say he is actuated by a desire of putting money into his own pocket, and that he resorts to fraudulent expedients, you are charging him with positive dishonesty. The doctrine cannot be pushed further. You have a full right to comment in the true spirit of criticism. It is said that it is for the interests of society that men's public conduct should be criticised; but, on the other hand, it seems to me, that we all have an equal interest in the maintenance of the public character, without which public affairs could never be conducted with a view to the public welfare, and we ought not to sanction attacks upon public men destructive to their character and honour, unless they can be proved to be true. On these grounds I am of opinion that no rule should be granted." The other learned judges were of the same opinion. The rule was therefore refused.

March 2.—Earl Russell writes to the British Minister at St. Petersburg that her Majesty's Government view with the deepest concern the state of things now existing in Poland:—"Great Britain, as a party to the Treaty of 1815, and as a Power deeply interested in the tranquillity of Europe, deems itself entitled to express its opinions upon the events now taking place, and is anxious to do so in the most friendly spirit towards Russia, and with a sincere desire to promote the interests of all parties concerned. Why should not his Imperial Majesty, whose benevolence is generally and cheerfully acknowledged, put an end at once to this bloody conflict by proclaiming mercifully an immediate and unconditional amnesty to his revolted Polish subjects, and at the same time announce his intention to replace without delay his kingdom of Poland in possession of the political and civil privileges which were granted to it by the Emperor Alexander I. in execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of 1815? If this were done a national Diet and a national Administration would in all probability content the Poles, and satisfy European opinion."

6.—Russia relieves the Polish peasantry from the oppressive rights of the nobility and landed proprietors.

7.—A public reception, remarkable for its splendour and enthusiasm, given to the Princess Alexandra of Denmark on her arrival in this country. She was met at Gravesend by the Prince of Wales, and received by the Lords of the Admiralty and the dignitaries of the town. An address presented on the occasion expressed the delight of the Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough at the honour conferred on the town by selecting it as that part of her adopted country which she had chosen first to honour with her presence. The journey by rail to the metropolis was performed in a leisurely manner to afford some satisfaction to the eager crowds which gathered at every station along the line. When Bricklayers' Arms Station was reached, a royal and official deputation were waiting on the platform to receive the illustrious bride and bridegroom. A slight luncheon was also partaken of here before they set out on their progress through the metropolis. The route lay by way of the Old Kent and Dover roads, the Borough High-street, across London-bridge (where the procession was augmented by the Lord Mayor, Corporation, and City companies), King William-street, the Mansion House (where the Lady Mayoress presented a tasteful bouquet to the Princess), Cheapside, St. Paul's Churchyard (where seats were erected to accommodate about 12,000), Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, the Strand, Pall-mall, Piccadilly, and Hyde Park (where the Volunteers mustered in great force), to the station of the Great Western Railway at Paddington. Probably the most notable feature of the welcome was the decoration of London-bridge, which was taken in hand and completed at great expense by the Corporation. Along the entire route the people were packed in such masses as excited wonder that even so gigantic a population as London could furnish the spectacle. Not a building could be described from which did not wave some flag, floral device, or other token of welcome; the whole route, too, being literally overarched with a canopy of banners, garlands, and streamers. The police arrangements in the City were unfortunately not of the most perfect description for permitting the different deputations to join the procession, and at the Mansion House and Temple Bar the lives of spectators were for hours placed in great jeopardy. From Paddington the Prince and Princess continued their journey to Slough, where carriages were waiting to carry them through Eton to Windsor, which was reached about 5.30 P.M. The welcome at the close of this royal progress was as cordial and universal as that which greeted them on their entry into the metropolis.

8.—Resignation of Sir Rowland Hill of his office of Secretary to the Post Office announced in the House of Lords, and a high tribute paid to him as one who had introduced and completed an improvement which had, perhaps, conferred more benefit on mankind than any other invention.

10.—Marriage of the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra of Denmark solemnized (486) with great pomp in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Regarded as a work of art, the ceremony was described by spectators as perfect. Everything had been foreseen, and everything provided for. From the first to the last, one event followed another with a certain ease of action and unity of design which left nothing to be desired. Gravely, firmly, reverentially, without affectation, and with a dignified and quiet simplicity, the hero and heroine of the day performed their part. The interest of the wedding guests culminated with the entrance of the Royal Bride into the chapel and her advance to the altar. "The hush," writes the Times correspondent, "was now so deep and breathless, that even the restless glitter of the jewels that twinkled everywhere seemed almost to break it, and despite of the stately etiquette which had hitherto regulated every word and gesture, all now bent far and eagerly forward, as the hum and rustle in the nave beyond showed the young Bride to be drawing near. In another moment she had entered, and stood the fairest and almost the youngest of all the train that bloomed in fair array behind her. Though not agitated she appeared nervous, and the soft, delicate bloom of colour which ordinarily imparts a look of joyous happiness to her expressive features had all but disappeared, as with head bent down, but glancing her eyes occasionally from side to side, she moved slowly up towards the altar. On nearing the haut pas the Prince turned as if to receive her, but checked himself as he saw them all bowing to the Queen, who sat in her private closet from the commencement of the ceremony, and for the first and only time he seemed irresolute as to what he ought to do. The long keen scrutiny seemed to have disturbed his consciousness at last, though only for a second. The anthem ceased, and all retired a little apart while the Bride and Bridegroom were left standing in the middle of the haut pas—the latter above, the former, of course, closely surrounded by her attendant bridesmaids. As the solemn chant ended, the prelates advanced to the communion rails, and the Primate, in a rich clear voice which was heard through every part of the building, choir and nave, commenced the service with the usual formulary. At the words 'I, Albert Edward, take thee, Alexandra,' &c., the Prince repeated word for word after his Grace, though now and again when it was the turn of the young Bride she could be heard to answer almost inaudibly. The concluding prayer was solemnly repeated, and Prince and Princess rose while the Primate joined their hands and uttered the final words,—'Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.' Soon after, the guns in the Long Walk were heard booming forth, and the steeples throughout the town seemed to fill the air with sound. Raising his voice, the Primate solemnly pronounced the benediction, during which the Queen, now deeply affected, was observed to kneel and bury her face in her handkerchief. The Bride and Bridegroom then joined hands, and turning to the Queen gave a nod of kindly friendship, which the Queen returned in kind. In another minute, the Queen, giving a similar greeting to the Prince, quitted the closet, and to strains of inspiring music the whole pageant went pouring out of the choir in a gorgeous stream or flood of colours of waving plumes and flaming jewels." After a short interview with her Majesty, at the Castle, the Prince and Princess set out for Osborne. The festivities attendant upon the marriage were of the most universal and elaborate description. Bridal banquets were held in every town of note in the kingdom; and in the evening the great cities presented a spectacle in the way of illumination never surpassed for magnificence. In all the principal streets of London the illumination was very general, and especially brilliant in those through which the royal pageant of Saturday had passed. The banners used on that occasion still floated from the houses in the line of route, while the triumphal arches and all the rest of the varied ornamentation continued to give an additional interest to the spectacle. The people turned out to witness it in incredible numbers, and roamed about till an advanced hour, the greater number being on foot. The shops and warehouses were generally closed, and the day observed as a holiday. Gratuitous performances were given at all the theatres in the evening.

10.—The provincial government of Bengal prohibit the throwing of dead bodies into the Hooghly, and the burning of the dead within a certain distance of Calcutta.

11.—Died, aged 61, Lieut.-Gen. Sir James Outram, a hero of the Indian army, described by an opponent as sans peur et sans reproche.

12.—Santa Anna lands at Vera Cruz and announces his adhesion to the French intervention.

15.—The Prussian ports blockaded by Denmark, and the bombardment of Duppel commenced.

— Mr. Ashley Eden, English envoy at Bhootan, seized at Poonakha, and, after a series of indignities, compelled to sign a treaty giving up Bhootan to the Assam Doors.

21.—Riot among the distressed operatives at Staleybridge, caused by a resolution of the Local Relief Committee to issue tickets instead of money at the rate of 3s. a week, and to retain always a day's amount in hand. Several shops and clothing stores were broken into and plundered, but the mob quickly dispersed when they saw a troop of Hussars advancing from Ashton barracks. Of eighty-two rioters apprehended, twenty-nine—all, with one exception, Irish—were committed for trial at Chester Assizes and received sentences of various terms of imprisonment. An attempt was made to renew the disturbances at Ashton, but the rioters were thoroughly checked and driven off the ground by the police and special constables called out for the protection of the town.

26.—The Lord Chancellor introduces a bill for the augmentation of small benefices, which afterwards passed through both Houses.

— Died, aged 46, Leopold Augustus Egg, R. A.

30.—Prince George of Denmark, brother of the Princess of Wales, proclaimed King of Greece. At the same time the Senate at Athens offered the thanks of the Greek nation to the Queen of Great Britain for the benevolent intention she had manifested of renouncing her protectorate over the Ionian Isles with a view to their incorporation into the kingdom of Greece.

— The King of Denmark issues a proclamation, consolidating and giving a constitution to his dominions, exclusive of those attached to the Confederation of Germany; Holstein to have independent rights, but Schleswig to be annexed.

— Lord Palmerston visits Glasgow, where he is installed as Lord Rector of the University, and afterwards entertained at a public banquet. Speaking of our relations with foreign countries at the banquet, his Lordship said:—"I am glad to say that there never was a period when this country was upon better terms of friendship with all the other nations of the world. (Cheers.) I advert not to those contending parties in America who sue us like rivals who sue a fair damsel—(laughter and cheers)—each party wanting us to take up her cause, and each feeling some little stinging resentment on account of that neutrality which both have characterised as unfriendliness. But setting aside those feelings, which create no irritation in our mind, and do not in any degree diminish that friendly feeling which ought to prevail between kindred races as they and we are—I say, barring that, we may safely congratulate ourselves that there is no Government, no nation, with which we have political or commercial intercourse, with whom we are not on terms of the most satisfactory friendship." In his address to the students he pressed upon them the necessity of paying special attention to the more useful parts of education—the study of our own literature, physical science, and the mechanical arts. Next day he was entertained by the Clyde Trustees, and conveyed down the river to Greenock, where he was presented with an address in the Town Hall. In the evening his Lordship attended and spoke at a soiree in the Glasgow City Hall. On the 1st April he continued his journey northward to Edinburgh, where he was presented with the freedom of the city, and afterwards entertained at a banquet in the Music Hall. Referring to Italy in his speech, he said:—"There is unfortunately still on the part of that beautiful and noble land an incubus which weighs on what ought to be their capital. I cannot but believe that truth and justice must in the end prevail, and therefore, much as I lament the shorn condition of the Italian kingdom, I cannot but believe that a brighter future is in store for it, and that a time will come when all who are concerned in regulating its destinies will feel that it is for their advantage, as well as for the advantage of the Italians, that Italy should be in full possession of her capital."

31.—In answer to an address, presented to him by the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Lindisfarne, on the subject of Bishop Colenso's book, the Bishop of Durham writes: "It has been suggested, as I learn from the newspapers, by the clergy of some rural deaneries in other dioceses, that the bishops in England 'should unitedly suspend Bishop Colenso, authoritatively and by inhibition, from all ministrations in the home dioceses.' In such a proceeding I could not concur; not merely because a general inhibition would be without legal authority, and therefore practically ineffective, but much more because I am fully satisfied that such a warning to the clergy of my diocese is wholly uncalled for; and, were I to issue it, it would imply on my part a suspicion that some of them were unsound in doctrine, and would give a sanction to Bishop Colenso's unwarrantable assertion that a large number of the clergy agree with him in his heterodoxy. I have the utmost confidence that there is not an incumbent in my diocese who would not consider it a calumny if it were thought that he was capable of admitting Bishop Colenso into his pulpit; and I am not, therefore, disposed to issue a prohibition which would imply a censure upon my clergy which they little deserve."

— The Archbishop of Canterbury addresses the clergy of his diocese on the subject of the Colenso heresies. "You invite me," he wrote, "to take the necessary steps for upholding the belief in the inspired Word of God, and for vindicating the Church of England from the scandal which attaches to her in consequence of the recent publications of one of her bishops. But you are not perhaps aware that in the case of the Bishop of Natal the primary jurisdiction rests with the metropolitan of Southern Africa, the Bishop of Capetown. This prelate has just returned to his province, and is prepared to institute those judicial proceedings which will try whether the charges brought against Bishop Colenso can be sustained. It is not for me to anticipate the judgment which may be delivered in his case; but you are aware that he has refused to resign the see of Natal, although he cannot deny that he is unable to exercise the most important functions of that office; and persists in disseminating, as bishop of his diocese, opinions which derive their chief weight from the office he still holds in connexion with the Church of England. Under these circumstances, it becomes my painful duty, in conformity with the rule of discipline in our Church, when proceedings are about to be instituted against any clerk, by reason of conduct which causes great scandal, to caution all the clergy of my diocese against admitting Bishop Colenso into their pulpits, or allowing him to minister in the Word or Sacraments in their respective parishes, until he shall have cleared himself from the grave imputations which at present attach to him."

31.—The French army in Mexico enter Puebla after a bombardment of four days.

April 5.—Nine miners killed in the diagonal descent of Botallack mine, Cornwall, the chain to which the "ship" was attached having parted at the surface, and permitted the carriage to rush down with frightful velocity to the lowest, or 190 fathom, workings.

6.—The Alexandra, a three-masted wooden vessel, seized at Liverpool by the Commissioners of Customs, on the ground of a breach of the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which provided that if any person within the United Kingdom should equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or attempt or endeavour to equip, &c., or procure to be equipped, or should knowingly aid or be concerned in the equipping, with intent that such ship should be employed in the service of any foreign State as a transport or store ship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against any State with whom his Majesty shall not then be at war, every person so offending should be guilty of a misdemeanour. The owners, Sillern and others, resisted the seizure, and the case came on for trial before Lord Chief Baron Pollock and a special jury, in the Court of Exchequer at Westminster, on the 22d June.

— Tried at the Central Criminal Court the brothers Joseph and Isaac Brooks, charged with shooting William Davey, a police-constable at Acton, on the 19th January last. The crime in this instance appeared to have been committed from the most trifling motive—a suspicion that Davey had been over-officious in watching a quantity of old timber which the Brookses were presumed to have removed for their own use. A gun, redeemed from a pawnshop in Hammersmith by Joseph Brooks, on the night of the murder, was found concealed in his bed, and in one of his pockets a quantity of shot corresponding with that which had formed the fatal charge. The principal witness against the first-mentioned prisoner was a young girl named Jane Lake, to whom he was to have been married in a few days, and who spoke under great excitement as to his movements on the night in question. Other witnesses identified him as a person they had seen leaning on his gun at Acton-green, within a few minutes of the time Davey was shot. The jury acquitted Isaac, but turned a verdict of Guilty against Joseph Brooks, who afterwards confessed the crime, and was executed at the Old Bailey on the 27th April.

— Came on for hearing at Gloucester, before Mr. Justice Crampton and a jury, the case of Corbett v. Palmer and another, being an action brought by Mr. Corbett, clerk to the Worcestershire and Staffordshire Canal Company, against Mrs. Palmer and her husband, for breach of promise of marriage by the lady when Miss Chandler, and before marrying Palmer. The intimacy between the parties was admitted, as was also the correspondence proving the engagement of marriage. His Lordship, in summing up, said the law of England entitled either the lady or gentleman, in cases of this kind, to sue the other for breach of promise, though undoubtedly there was a difference in the position of the two when jilted. To a woman it was perhaps the only chance of her life, but a man might form other connexions more easily. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages 20*l*.

7.—At a meeting of the supporters of the midnight-meeting movement for the reclamation of fallen women, held at Freemason's Hall, it is stated, that there were 50,000 "unfortunates" in London alone, and about 40,000 in the rest of the United Kingdom. Of that number upwards of 40,000 perished annually by disease, starvation, and suicide, while the average term of their course of life did not exceed seven years. It was further stated, that, through the midnight-meeting movement, thirty-three gatherings had taken place, and, of the 7,500 who had attended, 500 were reported as rescued.

—The Federal ironclads, under the command of Admiral Dupont, make an unsuccessful attack on Charleston.

8.—The Sultan of Turkey arrives at Alexandria on a visit to his Viceroy.

9.—Emma Jackson, a woman of light character, murdered in a brothel in George-street, Bloomsbury, by a person (as presumed) who was seen to enter the premises with her, about seven o'clock A.M. This individual was never discovered, nor was any clue found by which he could be traced—a circumstance, as was remarked at the time, of great mystery, seeing there were people living in an adjoining room, and also immediately below that in which the death-struggle had taken place. The unfortunate girl was found dead, covered with wounds, about four o'clock on the afternoon of the 10th, suspicion having been then excited in the minds of some of the other female lodgers in the house at the long-continued quietness in her apartment.

10.—The President of the Confederate States issues a manifesto, warning his countrymen against engaging too much in the cultivation of their ordinary lucrative cotton crops. He appealed to them to lay aside all thought of gain, and to devote themselves to securing their liberties, without which these gains would be valueless. "It is true that the wheat harvest in the more southern States, which will be gathered next month, promises an abundant yield; but even if this promise be fulfilled, the difficulty of transportation, enhanced as it has been by an unusually rainy winter, will cause embarrassments in military operations and sufferings among the people, should the crops in the middle and northern portions of the Confederacy prove deficient. But no uneasiness may be felt in regard to a mere supply of bread for men. It is for the large amount of corn and forage required in the raising of live stock, and the supplies of the animals used in military operations, too bulky for distant transportation, that the deficiency of the last harvest was mostly felt. Let your fields be devoted exclusively to the production of corn, oats, beans, pease, potatoes, and other food for man and beast; let corn be sowed broadcast for fodder in immediate proximity to railroads, rivers, and canals; and let all your efforts be directed to the prompt supply of those articles in the districts where our armies are operating. You will thus add greatly to their efficiency, and furnish the means, without which it is impracticable to make those prompt and active movements which have hitherto stricken terror into our enemies, and secured our most brilliant triumphs."

11.—Bishop Colenso disputes the right of his brother bishops to say that he is unable to use the prayers of the Liturgy, or otherwise discharge the duties of his episcopal office. "It is not enough," he writes, "for a bishop to make a general charge of heresy, even in the case of an incumbent in his own diocese. He is bound to specify the particulars of the offence before he can take any measures against him. As the bishops are now proceeding, I cannot but regard them as acting in a way which has not been seen or tolerated in this Church and country since the days of Bonner and Laud. I am untried and unheard. No definite charge has yet been made, though proceedings are threatened against me; yet the bishops venture, in public and official documents, to accuse me of scandalous, dishonest, and heretical conduct. And the Archbishop of Canterbury has already pronounced judgment upon me without a trial, though he would himself be the judge before whom my case would have to be heard, should I have to appeal from a decision of the inferior court. In short, I may be right or wrong in my theology; that is a question which I must leave to be settled by time and investigation. But, meanwhile, I stand upon my rights as an Englishman, and I protest against a course of conduct which is as illegal as it is contrary to the first principles of the Reformation."

13.—Died, aged 57, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, scholar and statesman, War Secretary at the time of his decease.

15.—The new court at the South Kensington Museum opened for the exhibition of the wedding gifts presented to the Princess of Wales.

—Sir Morton Peto's bill to enable Non-conformists to have their funerals celebrated with their own religious rites and services, and by their own ministers, in the graveyards of the Established Church, thrown out in the House of Commons by a majority of 221 to 96.

16—The Rev. Samuel Mason, LL.D., Dublin, commits suicide by throwing himself from the deck of the steamer Ulster, when near the Kish light-ship.

— Mr. Gladstone introduces the annual financial scheme of the Government. The estimated charge was 67,749,000*l.*, and the revenue 71,490,000*l.* He proposed to equalize the duty on chicory and coffee, and to place upon an equal footing certain taxes upon licences, removing anomalies therein, making clubs liable to the duties payable for the sale of wines and spirits, and withdrawing the exemption, under the Income-tax Acts, of corporate trust-property and of charitable endowments. These additional taxes would amount to 133,000*l.* a year, raising the estimated surplus to 3,874,000*l.* He proposed to reduce the duty on tea to 1*s.* per pound, to take 2*d.* per pound off the general rate of Income-tax, and to equalize the tax on incomes between 100*l.* and 200*l.* The surplus of 534,000*l.* the Government did not propose to part with, and he appealed to the Committee to support them in retaining this amount in their hand. The proposed alterations in the hackney-carriage dues and the club licences were subsequently withdrawn, as was also the scheme for taxing charitable and trust-corporation funds, under circumstances to be afterwards referred to.

18.—Rockingham House, near Boyle, Roscommon, the seat of Viscount Lorton, destroyed by fire.

20.—Debate on the second reading of the bill intended by Sir George Grey to give the inmates of prisons not being members of the Established Church the benefit of the attendance of ministers of their own religious persuasion. It was supported by Lord Derby and many other members of the Conservative party. On the occasion of the second reading in the Upper House, on the 8th of June, the leader of the Opposition said:—"I am well aware, not only that I differ on this question from several of my noble friends around me, but that this measure has met with much apprehension and prejudice—honest prejudice, no doubt—and that it is not likely to be popular in the country. But where I have clearly seen my way with regard to the justice and policy of a measure, I hope that I never have shrunk, and that I never shall shrink, from incurring the risk of unpopularity; and I think I have made a much greater sacrifice than in taking a course which connects me with unpopularity out of doors, when I find myself differing on this question from noble friends around me, with whom, on most occasions, it has long been my happiness to act. All considerations of this sort, however, must give way to those of policy and justice; and upon the higher principle of Christian charity and religion I deem it my duty to give a conscientious and a cordial vote in favour of the second reading." The bill received the royal assent on the 28th July.

20.—Lord John Russell writes to the American Minister, Mr. Adams:—"With regard to the complaints which you have made from time to time of British sailors who have entered the Confederate service, I have to remark that no steps have hitherto been taken by the United States authorities to prevent British subjects from entering the military or naval service of the United States. Mr. Seward has, on the contrary, justified the means used, provided they were not bribery or intimidation, to induce British sailors to enter the Federal service. You will readily perceive the justice of the request I am about to make; namely, that before you repeat your complaints that British sailors have entered the service of the so-called Confederate States, you will furnish me with proofs that all British subjects serving in the Federal army or navy have been discharged, and that orders have been given not to enlist or engage such persons to serve in arms contrary to the tenor of her Majesty's proclamation.

— In consequence of the widely-expressed feeling of dissatisfaction at the police arrangements made by the City of London on the occasion of the entry of the Princess Alexandra, Sir George Grey obtains leave to introduce a bill into Parliament to amalgamate the City with the Metropolitan Force. The City authorities strenuously opposed the measure, and in the end it was thrown out on the ground of non-compliance with the standing orders.

22.—The Queen approves of Mr. Gilbert Scott's design for the National Memorial to the late Prince Consort, in the form of an Eleanor cross with spire and statues. Next day Parliament voted 50,000*l.* for the erection, in addition to the 60,000*l.* received in voluntary subscriptions.

— Earthquake at Rhodes, causing the destruction of about 2,000 dwelling-houses and hundreds of the inhabitants.

— The King of Denmark informs the Rigsgaad that, though his ordinance of the 30th of March had been opposed by the great German Powers, he would not be diverted from his original intention.

25.—Loss of the Montreal Ocean Company's steam-ship Anglo-Saxon, on a reef off Clamb Cove, a few miles eastward of Cape Race. There was a thick fog at the time, and the vessel was presumed to be in a position seventeen miles south of Cape Race. Certain of the crew reached the rocks by means of a studding-sail boom, and, with the help of some of the passengers, got a hawser secured to a rock to keep the vessel from listing out, by which the female passengers were landed on the rocks from the foreyard-arm. Several of the first-class passengers managed to get into the two effective boats. About one hour after striking, the ship's stern swung off from the rocks, and she settled down very fast, listing to port, and sinking in deep water. The captain, with many of the passengers and crew, were on deck at the time, and went down with the vessel. Of 440 people on board, 300 were drowned.

27.—In the House of Commons, Mr. Wilson Patten makes a statement regarding the amount and sources of the munificent fund collected for the relief of the Lancashire distress. The Central Relief Committee, 959,000*l.*; in clothing and provisions, 108,000*l.*; subscriptions from different localities, 306,000*l.*; private charity, 200,000*l.*; Mansion House Committee, 482,000*l.*; Poor-Law Board, 680,000*l.* Total, 2,735,000*l.* Of this sum, the county of Lancaster contributed 1,480,000*l.* At this date there was a gross balance on hand of 845,000*l.*

29.—A meeting of clergymen, gentlemen, owners of property, and employers of labour held at London House, at the request of the Bishop, in order to consult as to the best means of meeting the spiritual wants of the poorer districts of the metropolis. After a conversational discussion, a resolution was carried to raise 100,000*l.* each year, for the next ten years, in order to carry out the four objects of the Diocesan Society, viz., the building of churches, the endowment of parsonages, the employment of curates, and the general purposes of church extension in the metropolis.

— Sir John Trelawny's bill abolishing Church-rates thrown out on the second reading by a majority of 10 in a House of 560 members. The former divisions on this much-debated measure had shown—in 1855, a majority of 28 for abolition; in 1856, 43; in 1858, 53; in 1859, 74; in 1860, 29. In 1861, the votes being equal, the bill was lost by the casting vote of the Speaker; and in 1862 it was negatived by a majority of 1.

May 1.—M. Gustave Thiebault assassinated on his grounds, near Cahir, Tipperary. He was found dead and much disfigured, lying on the roadside, his gun near him, both barrels discharged, and the stock smashed off near the butt. A broken pitchfork and a heavy stone lay on his face, the flesh of which was torn off as with the cock of the gun. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against Thomas Halloran, one of two brothers arrested on suspicion.

2.—Commencement of a series of battles, at Chancellorsville, between the Federals under General Hooker, and the Confederates under General Lee. The former was compelled to recross to the north bank of the Rappahannock with great loss. In one of the engagements, General Jackson ("Stonewall Jackson") received a wound in the arm, from the effects of which he died a few days afterwards in hospital. In the confusion attending one of the fiercest of the engagements it was thought he had been fired upon in mistake by some of his own troops.

3.—The Polish Central Committee declares itself a provisional government, and rejects the conditions of the Emperor's amnesty.

4.—Abandonment of Mr. Gladstone's proposal regarding the taxation of charities. In the morning, a deputation, numerous and influential beyond all precedent, waited upon the right hon. gentleman at his official residence in Downing-street. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge represented the Corporation of Christ's Hospital, which he said would be mulcted of about 2,000*l.* per annum if the scheme were carried out; the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, and the Clergy Orphan Corporation; while the Bishop of London, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and many other prelates and members of both Houses of Parliament were present to press for a continuance of matters as they were. Mr. Gladstone received the memorials, and heard the different speakers urge the case of the various charities they were connected with, but reserved his defence of the proposal till the scheme was formally brought before the House in the evening. The right hon. gentleman then went at great length into the question, and defended it as a practical, well-considered scheme. In combating the assertions which had been freely made out of doors, that if the hospitals should be compelled to pay the Income-tax they must necessarily close some of their wards or reduce their beds, he said:—"It was not my intention to make any remarks on the management of hospitals of this kind, which we must all regard with so much favour and respect; but when at every turn the threat is flung in my face that if this measure is carried out the number of patients must be diminished, then I am obliged to give it particular consideration. I do not believe that the beds of patients will be reduced. Those who, in the case of the protected trades, declared that if protection were withdrawn they must dismiss so many of their workmen, were not men who told lies. They really believed what they said, but were not aware that more economical arrangements would enable them to keep these workmen, pursue their trade, and make larger profits than before. One of the great evils of the present system is, that while you bestow public money on these establishments, you dispense with all public control over them, and thus annul all effective motives for economy. Endowed institutions laugh at public opinion. The press knows nothing of their expenditure; Parliament knows nothing of it. It is too much to say that hospitals are managed by angels and archangels, and do not, like the rest of humanity, stand in need of supervision, criticism, and rebuke. Therefore, even in the case of St. Bartholomew's, I object to an exemption, which, by its very nature, at once removes the principal motives for economical management. When the managers tell me that the exaction of 820*l.* will compel them to dismiss 500 patients, I am entitled to ask, Why, then, do you spend 220*l.* in a feast? What right have you to eat up in an hour 150 beds? I confess I am amazed at the skill with which my opponents have put their best foot foremost. Their tactics and strategy have been admirable, but their case will not bear close scrutiny. What are the circumstances of Guy's, of St. Thomas's, and similar establishments? Every year they are able to place 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* each in reproductive investments in land. They are thinking not merely of the sick, but of their own future aggrandizement and extension. I was informed the other day that St. Thomas's spends 15 per cent. of its income in improvements on land. Well, then, it is a matter for the State to consider, whether the indefinite enrichment of such corporations—even of those instituted for the best of purposes—when entirely removed from the control of public opinion, the press, or Parliament, is to go on without limit, and is to be augmented by contributions from the public purse. I do not believe that a single patient will be dismissed from one of the hospitals of London, if this proposal is agreed to; but if there were the slightest apprehension of such an occurrence, private charity would at once prevent it."

5.—Mr. Bouverie obtains leave to introduce, but afterwards withdraws, a bill designed to repeal that clause in the Act of Uniformity which required several classes of persons to make a declaration of conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England, and thus operated as a barrier against Nonconformists otherwise qualified to obtain fellowships and other academical rewards at the Universities.

8.—The Queen visits the invalid soldiers in the Royal Military Hospital, at Netley, the foundation stone of which had been laid by the Prince Consort seven years since.

11.—Rumour having given currency to a statement that the affairs of the popular singer Mdlle. Adelina Patti would be made the subject of a Chancery suit at the instance of one Macdonald, who described himself as her "next friend," and Mons. Alfred Vidal, a suitor for her hand, the lady made affidavit this day:—"Until I read the name of James William Macdonald, who styles himself my next friend, I never heard of such a person, nor did I, ever to my knowledge, see him, nor did I ever communicate with him in any way. There is not one word of truth in any of the allegations against him or against my said father in any of the affidavits filed in this cause. I wholly deny that I am or ever was treated with cruelty by them, or either of them, or that my liberty is or ever was controlled, or that I am or ever was kept short of money, or that my jewellery or any part of it has been or is appropriated by them or either of them. On the contrary, I have and always have had whatever money I require, and all my jewellery has always been and is under my own control, and I could convert the whole of it into money at once if I were so disposed." On the matter coming before the Vice-Chancellor the bill was dismissed with costs, to be paid by the so-called "next friend."

11.—Exciting scene in the Prussian Chamber of Deputies, arising from the opposition of the members to the policy of the King's Ministers on the Army Reconstruction Bill. "If," remarked Herr von Roon, the Minister of War, "such utterances are indulged in against the Cabinet or a member of the Cabinet, this in my opinion is no more than a piece of arrogance." Herr von Bockum Dolffs, the second President of the House, happened to occupy the chair at the time the Minister of War made this remark. "I am under the necessity," he immediately interposed, "of interrupting the Minister of War." The Minister, here cutting short the President, cried out rather impetuously, "I beg not to be interrupted." Herr von Bockum (ringing his bell): "It is I who have to speak, and I interrupt the Minister of War." Herr von Roon: "I beg your pardon. It is I who have begun to speak, nor shall I cease until I have done. I am constitutionally entitled to speak whenever I like, and no bell, no gesture, no interruption—" (The President rings violently. Cries of "order.") Herr von Bockum, the Vice-President: "If I see fit to interrupt the Minister of War, the Minister has to desist forthwith. (Tremendous cheers on the left.) Should my command be disregarded by the Minister, I shall order my hat to be brought." Herr von Roon: "I have nothing in the world to say against your hat being brought. (Cries of "silence," and "sit down.") But you compel me to say— (Disturbance, cries of "sit down," and "put him out.") Gentlemen, I find 350 voices to be louder than one. I insist on my constitutional right. By virtue of the Charter I am entitled to speak whenever I please. Nobody has a right to cut short one of his Majesty's Ministers." Herr von Bockum (ringing his bell): "I said I would interrupt the Minister, and I do so." The scene soon assumed a tumultuous character. Words uttered by the Minister were contradicted by a hundred voices, violent outcries resounding from every quarter, the galleries not excepted. Herr von Bockum put on his hat, and, supported by a volley of cheers, rose from his seat. With him rose the members. In the lull which immediately ensued, the President declared the House adjourned for one hour.

12.—Radama II., King of Madagascar, assassinated, and his widow Radobo proclaimed Queen.

16.—Mr. Robert Rawlinson, who had been appointed to inquire into the advisability of employing the distressed cotton operatives on public works, reports that "a vast amount of useful work may be beneficially undertaken and executed by the best of the distressed men out of employment." Any loss on the work in the first instance would, he thought, be more than made up to the locality in a saving of the poor-rate.

19.—The Lower House of Convocation presents to the Upper a report on Bishop Colenso's work on the Pentateuch, which they find to contain errors of the gravest and most dangerous character. The prelates answered, "That this House having reason to believe that the book in question will shortly be submitted to the judgment of an ecclesiastical court, declines to take further action in the matter, but that we affectionately warn those who may not be able to read the published and convincing answers to the work which have appeared, of its dangerous character."

20.—Epsom races. The Derby won by Mr. Naylor's Maccaroni.

22.—The Oaks by Mr. Valentine's Queen Bertha.

— Henry Valentine Smith, known in the theatrical world as "Swanborough," and a favourite actor at the Strand Theatre, commits suicide by cutting his throat, in his bed-room, in a fit of mental depression.

26.—Herat captured by the forces of Mahomet Khan of Afghanistan. He died within a few weeks of his triumph, leaving the succession to his throne to be disputed by two sons.

27.—In reply to an address from the Chamber of Deputies, the King of Prussia states that the Ministry possess his entire confidence, and that he purposes again to carry on the government of the country without a parliament.

28.—In the House of Commons Mr. Walpole presented a petition from Mr. Churchward, whose contract for the Dover post office packets had been suddenly terminated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the course pursued, and the Report was agreed to by 205 votes to 191.

30.—Accident on the Brighton Railway, between Streatham and Balham, the engine exploding when proceeding at a rapid rate, and dragging the greater part of the train down an embankment. The engine-driver and three passengers were killed on the spot, and serious injuries were sustained by between thirty and forty of the Grenadier Guards, returning from rifle practice at Eastbourne.

31.—The Crown Prince of Prussia remonstrates with his father on his arbitrary conduct in dissolving the deputies.

June 1.—Came on in the Court of Queen's Bench the matter of the Earl of Winchelsea ex parte Willes, Mr. Hawkins, Q. C., moving for a rule calling on the Earl and a Mr. James Kennett to show cause why a criminal information should not issue against them for certain libels upon the applicant, Mr. Willes, the "Argus" of the sporting world. The libel appeared in the Sporting Gazette, and was contained in a rhyming prophecy which Lord Winchelsea was alleged to have contributed to that journal under the signature of "John Davis."

"Adown the eventful course the beaten lay,
And Pindar was the 'Argus' of that day;
'Our own reporter,' with a scale of fees,
At whose bureau you purchased what you please,
'No fee, no puff!' 'Half-price'—praise only horse;
'Full price'—dish owner up with friendly sauce;
'Full price and douceur with the run of table!'
Butter horse, man, and everything you are able."

An explanation being demanded, Lord Winchelsea replied that he made it a rule not to answer impertinent questions, and on the same day Mr. Willes' solicitor received a note signed "John Davis," denying that there was anything to complain of, except the fact of mentioning Pindar and "Argus" in the same paragraph. The Court was of opinion that it was not such a matter as would justify their interference, and that Mr. Willes' proper remedy would be by action or by indictment.

1.—Lord Ebury moved an address for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the present compulsory and indiscriminate use of the Burial Service of the Church of England, but the motion was withdrawn, on the understanding that the bishops would prepare a measure to relieve the scruples of the clergy.

— The elections to the French Legislative Assembly carried in Paris by the Opposition.

3.—Mr. Soames' bill for closing public-houses on Sunday thrown out on a second reading, by 278 to 103 votes.

4.—In the House of Commons Mr. Bagwell moves a resolution that it is impolitic any longer to exclude Ireland from the operation of the Volunteer system. Lord Palmerston opposed the resolution, not from any doubt of the loyalty of the Irish, but because religious zeal was likely to lead to dangerous revolts when each of the parties were armed. Resolution negatived by 156 to 45.

5.—Mr. Fortescue calls the attention of the House of Commons to the circumstances attending the death, after four weeks' imprisonment, of Regimental Sergeant-Major Lilley of the 6th Dragoons, at Mhow, in India, on the 25th of May, 1862; and to the imprisonment at the same time, for a still longer period, of Troop Sergeant-Majors Duval and Wakefield, of the same regiment, without either of the three having been brought to trial, or any formal charge having been preferred against them; and to ask whether the commanding officer (Colonel Crawley), under whose authority those things took place, was still to be left in command of the regiment. Further inquiry promised.

8.—The Prince and Princess of Wales visit the City in state, and are entertained at a banquet in Guildhall by the Corporation. An address was also presented to his Royal Highness expressive of the pleasure felt by the Corporation that he should have assumed the freedom of the City in virtue of the citizenship of his lamented father. The banquet on the occasion was of unusual splendour, the City companies having sent in most of their rich ornaments and plate. The banquet was followed by a ball, which was kept up till one o'clock, when the Royal visitors left with an escort of Life-guardsmen. The route from Marlborough House to the City was brilliantly illuminated, and great enthusiasm was manifested by the mass of spectators who lined the streets.

9.—Discussion in the House of Commons on Mr. Buxton's resolution to relax the stringency of Subscription under the Act of Uniformity. "Two courses," Mr. Buxton said, "were open to the Church of England. If she chose to be, not national, but narrow and sectarian; if she drove from her the intellect of the age; if she stubbornly withstood all progress, all reform; if she met the irresistible advance of the human mind, the inevitable growth of religious opinion, the novelties of speculation, the discoveries of science, not with strong and gentle reasoning, but with paroxysms of fear and rage; if she displayed that, which was of all things the most pitiful, the longing to persecute without the power, the day might come when, alienated from all that was most profound in thought and most generous in feelings, she might find herself forsaken and spurned by the English people. A far other career, he believed, was before her. Let men of mind find with her a welcome and a home; let her open her gates wider, and shake off the bonds that cramped her; let her move onward with the age, and in the van of its religious thought; let her deal tenderly with error, and grapple boldly with truth; and let her ministers be still foremost in every work of mercy—in short, instead of trusting to outward props the handiwork of men, let her grow ever more glorious within, more pure, more noble, more profound—then they need not doubt that their children's children would still cleave to the Church, which their fathers founded and sealed with their blood in the great days of old."

— Came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of the Queen v. Lieutenant-Colonel Calthorpe, ex parte the Earl of Cardigan, in the form of a rule for a criminal information against the defendant. The case arose out of certain imputations upon the conduct of Lord Cardigan in the memorable Light Cavalry charge at Balaklava during the Crimean war, made by General Calthorpe in a work entitled "Letters from Head-Quarters, by a Staff Officer." The main charge made against his lordship was one of cowardice, the General alleging that his lordship, although well known to be a consummate horseman, had allowed his horse during the charge to take him to the rear. Lord Cardigan applied repeatedly to General Calthorpe to retract his statement, but without any other result than a note to the following effect in the second edition:—"The author had relied on statements furnished by officers actually engaged in the charge; but as the excellence of Lord Cardigan's horsemanship is unquestionable, the idea that his horse ran away with him is no doubt erroneous." Lord Cardigan came before the Court last term, and obtained a rule for a criminal information, which came on for argument this day. Mr. Garth was heard in support of the rule, and many affidavits were produced on behalf of Lord Cardigan. At the conclusion of a lengthened judgment, the Lord Chief Justice said he was glad the discussion had so completely vindicated the gallant Earl, but the Court had no alternative but to discharge the rule. The other judges concurred, and the rule was accordingly discharged, but without costs.

9.—Came on for hearing in the House of Lords, before a Committee of Privilege, the petition of the Earl of Dundonald, which prayed that he was entitled to vote for representative peers in Scotland, and that he was the lawful son of the late Earl. The petitioner's brother, Captain the Hon. L. Cochrane, of her Majesty's ship Warrior, claimed the peerage, as the eldest son born after the marriage of his father and mother. The Dowager Countess of Dundonald was examined, and detailed the circumstances which led first to a private marriage, at Annan, in Scotland, in 1812, and then to a more public ecclesiastical ceremony, when her husband was about to leave this country. Their Lordships concurred that the Countess had fully explained the validity of the first marriage, and that the petitioner had made good his claim.

10.—Inauguration of the Albert Memorial of 1851, at the Horticultural Gardens, South Kensington. A large and fashionable gathering assembled to receive the Prince and Princess of Wales, on whom the duty devolved of receiving addresses from the Council of the Horticultural Society, and the Executive Committee of the Memorial. With the exception of her Majesty, most of the Royal Family were present, and took part in the procession through the grounds. Besides other inscriptions relating to the Exhibition, one tablet bore that the Memorial, then uncovered, was erected by public subscription. "Originally intended only to commemorate the International Exhibition of 1851, now dedicated also to the memory of the great author of that undertaking, the Good Prince, to whose far-seeing and comprehensive philanthropy its first conception was due, and to whose clear judgment and untiring exertions in directing its execution the world is indebted for its unprecedented success.—Albert Francis Augustus Charles Emmanuel, the Prince-Consort. Born August 26, 1819. Died December 14, 1861." Her Majesty visited the memorial on the 12th.

— The French army under General Forey enter the Mexican capital, President Juarez having previously transferred his seat of government to San Luis de Potosi.

11.— The Duc de Chartres married, at Kingston, to his cousin, the Princess Amélie of Orleans, daughter of the Prince de Joinville.

14.—The Montreal Ocean steamship Norwegian wrecked in a thick fog on St. Paul's Island, near the North-east Light. She had on board 58 cabin and 271 steerage passengers, which, with the crew and mails, were all saved. A portion of the cargo was also recovered.

15.—The House of Commons, by a majority of 267 to 135, vote 123,000*l.* to purchase the seventeen acres of land at South Kensington, where the Exhibition building stands. The proposal made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 2d July, to vote 105,000*l.* for the purchase of the building itself, was negatived by a majority of 166 in a House of 408 members.

16.—The Prince and Princess of Wales attend the Oxford Commemoration, during the ceremonies incident to which the degree of D. C. L. was conferred on his Royal Highness. At the proceedings in the Sheldonian Theatre, the Chancellor (Earl Derby) addressed the Prince in a Latin speech, which was greatly admired, both for the excellence of its Latinity and the happy choice of topics which it displayed. In the evening the Prince and Princess were entertained at a state banquet, in the hall of Christ Church. Next day the Royal visitors attended the Commemoration proper, and in the evening witnessed the time-honoured procession of boats on the Isis. The Prince and Princess left Oxford for Windsor on the afternoon of the 18th.

17.—Earl Russell forwards to Lord Napier, at St. Petersburg, the text of the note on the Polish question which had been drawn up concurrently with France and Austria. "Her Majesty's Government," he said, "would deem themselves guilty of great presumption if they were to express an assurance that vague declarations of good intentions, or even the enactment of some wise laws, would make such an impression on the minds of the Polish people as to obtain peace and restore obedience. In present circumstances, it appears to her Majesty's Government that nothing less than the following outline of measures should be adopted as the bases of pacification:—(1) Complete and general amnesty. (2) National representation, with powers similar to those which are fixed by the charter of the 15-27th November, 1815. (3) Poles to be named to public offices in such a manner as to form a distinct national Administration, having the confidence of the country. (4) Full and entire liberty of conscience; repeal of the restrictions imposed on Catholic worship. (5) The Polish language recognised in the kingdom as the official language, and used as such in the administration of the law and in education. (6) The establishment of a regular and legal system of recruiting. These six points might serve as the indications of measures to be adopted, after calm and full deliberation.

But it is difficult, nay, almost impossible, to create the requisite confidence and calm while the passions of men are becoming daily more excited, their hatreds more deadly, their determination to succeed or perish more fixed and immovable."

17.—Captains Speke and Grant, the now famous African travellers, arrive at Portsmouth on board the Pera, and are presented by the Corporation with an address expressive of the pleasure they felt in welcoming travellers "whose recent discoveries have solved the perplexing problem of all ages, by ascertaining the true source of one of the most wonderful rivers on the face of the earth." On the 22d they received a most enthusiastic reception at the Royal Geographical Society, and made a brief statement of their discoveries.

18.—The King of the Belgians, as arbitrator between the British and Brazilian Governments in the dispute concerning the arrest, by the guard of Brazilian police stationed at Tijaca, of three officers of the British navy, pronounces his opinion that in the mode in which the laws of Brazil have been applied towards the English officers, there was neither premeditation of offence nor offence given to the British navy.

—The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals obtain a conviction before a bench of magistrates, at Loughborough, against the Marquis of Hastings, for cock-fighting at Donnington Hall. The Marquis was adjudged to pay the full penalty of 5*l.*, and the three gamekeepers concerned 2*l.* each.

19.—Discussion in the House of Lords concerning the atrocities committed by Russia in Poland.

22.—The House of Commons resolves to postpone, in the meantime, the discussion of a motion which Mr. Pope Hennessy had given notice of, for an address to the Crown, expressing the regret of the House at learning that the Emperor of Russia had set up a claim to the sovereignty of Poland, which was in violation of the Treaty of Vienna, and praying her Majesty to adopt measures in concert with other Powers which might preserve the legitimate right of Poland, and tend to produce a durable peace.

23.—Carlo Valerio, a tight-rope dancer, killed in Cremorne-gardens by a steel hook giving way, which suddenly slackened the wire on which he was performing, and threw him to the ground among the spectators.

—At a meeting of the Shakspeare Committee held in the apartments of the Royal Society of Literature, and presided over by the Duke of Manchester, it was resolved that a national celebration of the three-hundredth birthday of the poet should be held on the 23d April, 1864.

—Discussion in the House of Lords on the case of Mary Ann Walkley, who was said to have died from over-work, and from sleeping in a badly ventilated room at a fashionable milliner's in Regent-street.

24.—In the Court of Exchequer, the jury return a verdict for the defendants in the case of the Alexandra, seized at Liverpool under the Foreign Enlistment Act. In summing up, the Lord Chief Baron Pollock directed the jury that, if there was to be a conviction under the Act, it must be upon evidence and not suspicion. If they thought the object really was to build a ship in obedience to an order, and in compliance with a contract, leaving those who bought it to make what use they thought fit of it, then it appeared to him that the Foreign Enlistment Act had not been in any degree broken.

— The British Orphan Asylum at Slough opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales.

— A new provisional government established under the title of "the Regency of the Mexican Empire."

— The Japanese close their ports against foreign traders.

26.—The Guards give a grand ball to the Prince and Princess of Wales in the picture-galleries of the International Exhibition building. The decorations were of surpassing splendour, it being calculated that the gold and silver plate represented a gross value of two millions sterling. The company was limited to 1,400.

— In answer to Mr. B. Osborne, Mr. Cardwell said that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present ecclesiastical settlement of Ireland would open a controversy which had convulsed and disorganized the country.

— Died, aged 70, General Sir Joshua Jebb, well known in the annals of prison discipline.

27.—In the case of Dickson v. Combermere and others, charged with conspiring to remove the plaintiff from the command of the 2d Tower Hamlets Militia, the jury return a verdict for the defendants. The case occupied the Queen's Bench over eight days.

— The American mail-steamer Persia arrives at Liverpool with the intelligence that General Lee had commenced offensive operations against the North, by an invasion of the State of Pennsylvania with the Army of the Rappahannock.

28.—General Meade supersedes Hooker in the command of the Federal army of the Potomac.

29.—Came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Guildhall, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, the case of Morrison v. Belcher, being a claim for damages for a libel written by the defendant, Admiral Sir Edward Belcher, concerning the plaintiff, a retired naval officer, and editor of the astrological publication known as "Zadkiel's Almanac." Shortly after the death of Prince Albert, Mr. Alderman Humphrey was led to make some observations from his place on the magisterial bench regarding certain prophecies said to be contained in "Zadkiel" for 1861. Commenting thereon, a writer in the Telegraph asked: "Who is this 'Zadkiel,' and are there no means of ferreting him out and hauling him up to Bow-street as a rogue and vagabond?" Sir Edward Belcher thereupon addressed the following letter to the Telegraph, which formed the libel complained of:—"I will aid you in the scent by first informing you that he stands as a lieutenant in the 'Navy List,' seniority 1815. Next, that he has his admirers about Greenwich Hospital, who fancy him a prophet A 1; and that his mischievous propensity is not solely confined to that foolish publication 'Zadkiel's Almanac.' More, I think he gave his name not long since as president of some peculiar society connected with astrology—R. J. Morrison. A friend reminds me that the author of 'Zadkiel' is the celebrated 'crystal globe seer,' who gulled many of our nobility about 1852, making use of a boy under 14 years of age, or a girl under 12. He pretended, by looking into the crystal globe, to hold converse with the spirits of the Apostles, and even our Saviour, with all the angels of light as well as of darkness, and to tell what was going on in any part of the world, and drawings were made of the objects seen in those visions. One noble lady gave one of those boys 5*l.* to give her intelligence of her son, who was in the Mediterranean; the boy peached, and let the cat out of the bag. Of course the information was false. He took money, if he really be the same, for these profane acts, and made a good thing of it. If it was deemed sufficiently important, there can be no doubt that he can be satisfactorily trotted out. As to his position as a naval officer, excepting the coastguard, he has not served afloat since 1815." Witnesses were now adduced to show that, though the plaintiff had visited several houses of note with his magic crystal, he had not received any money for doing so, nor did it appear that he had wilfully deceived anybody. Among those examined were the Earl of Wilton, Sir E. B. Lytton, Lord Harry Vane, the Marchioness of Aylesbury, the Bishop of Lichfield, and the Master of the Temple. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages, 20*s.*

29.—Vicomte de Morilo, a French officer of the Legion of Honour, commits suicide by shooting himself in a railway train, near Newark-on-Trent.

— Memorial statue to Lord Herbert of Lea uncovered at Salisbury.

30.—Re-opening of Hereford Cathedral after extensive alterations and restorations.

— In the debate on Mr. Roebuck's motion to recognise the Southern States as an independent Power, the hon. member for Sheffield gave an account of his interview with the Emperor of the French, and of some important declarations made by the Emperor, who gave him authority, he said, to disclose them to the House. The Emperor of the French said:—"As soon as I learnt that the rumour of an alteration of my views was circulating in England, I gave instructions to my Ambassador to deny the truth of it. Nay, more; I instructed him to say that my feeling was not, indeed, exactly the same as it was, because it was stronger than ever in favour of recognising the South. I told him also to lay before the British Government my understanding and my wishes on this question, and to ask them still again whether they would be willing to join me in that recognition." "Now, Sir," continued Mr. Roebuck, "there is no mistake about this matter. I pledge my veracity that the Emperor of the French told me that. And, what is more, I laid before his Majesty two courses of conduct. I said, 'Your Majesty may make a formal application to England.' He stopped me and said, 'No, I cannot do that; and I will tell you why. Some months ago I did make a formal application to England. England sent my despatch to America. That despatch, getting into Mr. Seward's hands, was shown to my Ambassador at Washington. It came back to me, and I feel that I was ill-treated by such conduct. I will not,' he added, 'I cannot, subject myself again to the danger of similar treatment. But I will do everything short of it. I give you full liberty to state to the English House of Commons my wish, and to say to them that I have determined in all things'—(I will quote his words)—'I have determined in all things to act with England; and, more than all things, I have determined to act with her as regards America.' Well, Sir, with this before us, can the Government be ignorant of this fact? I do not believe it. With this before them, are they not prepared to act in concert with France? Are they afraid of war? War with whom? With the Northern States of America? Why, in ten days, Sir, we should sweep from the sea every ship. (Exclamations of dissent.) Yes, there are people so imbued with Northern feeling as to be indignant at that assertion. But the truth is known. Why, the Warrior would destroy their whole fleet. Their armies are melting away; their invasion is rolled back; Washington is in danger; and the only fear which we ought to have is, lest the independence of the South should be established without us." On the 13th July Mr. Roebuck moved that the order for resuming the debate be discharged.

July 1. — Prince Gortschakoff forwards to the Russian Ambassador in London the Emperor's answer to the representation made on behalf of the Poles by the Courts of London, Paris, and Vienna, as parties to the Treaty of Vienna. He declined to discuss in detail the six points placed before Russia, on the plea that the most of them had already either been decreed or were about to be initiated. "If Lord John Russell," he wrote, "were exactly informed of what passes in the kingdom of Poland, he would know, as we do, that wherever the armed rebellion has striven to acquire substance, to give itself a visible head, it has been crushed. The masses have kept aloof from it, the rural population evinces even hostility to it, because the disorders by which agitators live ruin the industrial classes. The insurrection sustains itself alone by a terrorism unprecedented in history. The bands are recruited principally from elements foreign to the country. They gather together in the woods, and disperse at the first attack to reunite in other places. When they are too closely pressed, they cross the frontier to re-enter the country at another point. Politically, it is a stage display intended to act upon Europe. The principle of action of the directing committees from without is to keep up agitation at all cost, in order to give food for the declamations of the press, to abuse public opinion, and to harass the Governments, by furnishing an occasion and a pretext for a diplomatic intervention which should lead to military action. All the hope of the armed insurrection is in this: it is the object at which it has laboured from its rise. . . . His Majesty the Emperor owes to his faithful army, struggling for the maintenance of order, to the peaceable majority of Poles who suffer from these deplorable agitations, and to Russia, on whom they impose painful sacrifices, to take energetic measures to terminate them. Desirable as it may be speedily to place a term to the effusion of blood, this object can only be attained by the insurgents throwing down their arms and surrendering themselves to the clemency of the Emperor. Every other arrangement would be incompatible with the dignity of our august master, and with the sentiments of the Russian nation." In any case, the Prince insisted on the re-establishment of order as an indispensable condition, which must precede any serious application of the measures destined for the pacification of the kingdom.

1.—The Dutch abolish slavery in their West Indian possessions.

— Commencement of a series of engagements at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, between the Federal and Confederate armies. The latter, under General Lee, attacked the former, commanded by General Meade, and drove them into a well-defended position on Cemetery Hill, to the south of the town. After a succession of severe onslaughts, the Confederates were defeated on the afternoon of the 2d, and again more seriously on the 3d, on the occasion of a gallant attack by General Pickett on the Federal position. The Confederates thereupon withdrew, leaving about 3,000 prisoners in the hands of General Meade. Vicksburg surrendered the following day.

6.—Public intimation having been made that Lord Barcaple intended to withdraw from the Free Church, in consequence of the Assembly's acquiescence in Dr. Candlish's attack on the Queen for permitting a verse from the Apocrypha to appear on the monument to the Prince Consort at Balmoral, Dr. Candlish now writes to explain that he spoke for himself alone, not for the Assembly, far less for the Church. "And it is scarcely reasonable, I submit, to saddle me with the blame of involving a dumb Assembly in my peculiar treason, and depriving a defenceless Church, on that account, of one of its ornaments and supports. But I must allow that, whatever the learned Judge's mode of punishing one in many and many in one may say for his logic or his law, it speaks volumes for his loyalty. It was relevant," he thought, "to a discussion upon the subject of Popish leanings in influential quarters to adduce as an instance the description of an Apocryphal text on the tomb or cairn of a Protestant Prince—a novelty, I am persuaded, in our country's monumental literature, for which it will be hard to find a precedent satisfactory, I say, not to a theologian, but even to a mere antiquarian. . . . Infidels and latitudinarian divines are simply preparing the way for Rome when they affect or seem to put the Apocrypha on the same footing with the Bible. I cannot get rid of the impression that the Balmoral inscription manifests a tendency in that most dangerous direction. I have said so; and whoever is responsible for it, I must say so still. I say it with the deepest sorrow, if it is the Queen who is responsible; which, however, I do not believe. I say it with indignation, whoever else it may be."

6.—Debate in the House of Commons concerning an alleged breach of neutrality laws, in permitting British officers to serve in the Chinese army. Lord Palmerston said he could not understand the censure of Lord Naas, who seemed to imply that we were wrong in teaching the Chinese the art of government, of regulating their finances, of increasing their revenue, and improving their administration. He admitted these charges and claimed credit for them. The House afterwards went into Committee of Supply.

7.—Died at Linden Grove, Bayswater, aged 78 years, William Mulready, R.A.

10.—The Mexican Assembly resolve to adopt an hereditary monarchical government under a Roman Catholic emperor, and to invite the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian, eldest brother of the Emperor of Austria, to accept the imperial title. The provisional government afterwards assumed the style of the "Regency of the Mexican Empire."

13.—Treaty of London, approving of the election of Prince William of Denmark to the throne of Greece, signed by England, France, and Russia.

13.—Commencement of a series of conscription riots at New York and Boston.

15.—The tribe of the Waikatoes, dwelling near Auckland, begin a new outbreak by murdering two settlers. General Cameron afterwards marched against the aborigines.

16.—Another phase of the Roupell forgeries came on to-day for hearing, at Chelmsford Assizes, before Mr. Baron Channell and a special jury. The action was brought to recover an estate at Great Warley, Essex, consisting of two farms,—viz. Bury, in the occupation of Hawes; and Bolens, in the occupation of Springham. The real parties to the action were Richard Roupell, plaintiff, as son and heir, and also as devisee of his father, the late Richard Palmer Roupell, with certain persons, stated to be trustees for widows and children who took a mortgage of the estate, in July 1857, from William Roupell; and the real defendants were the mortgagees, let in to defend as landlords in terms of a deed of gift by old Roupell to his son William, of date 9th January, 1856. As will be seen above, William Roupell mortgaged the property after his father's death; but if the deed were genuine, the old man did not die seized of the estate, and Richard could not take it either as heir-at-law or as devisee under the disputed will of 1850. On the other hand, the plaintiff, who must recover on his own right, was bound to prove that both the deed of gift and the will of September 1856 were forgeries; for if the former were genuine, the mortgagees had a title, and if the latter were genuine, the estate was left to his mother, and the plaintiff had no claim at all. The case for the defendant was thus founded on the deed of gift of January 1856, while the plaintiff pleaded that both deed and will were forgeries. William Roupell was again brought from prison to the witness-box, and explained in the most minute manner how he had forged his father's name, and obtained the signatures of two attesting witnesses—not absolutely necessary—by representing to them that they were attesting a lease signed by himself. His evidence was confirmed by these two persons, Trueman and Dove. They denied that they ever saw Roupell, the father, sign any deed; but they declared that their own signatures were genuine, and that the only person present when they signed was William Roupell. So far the convict's evidence was strongly corroborated. The case as to the will of 1856 also rested almost entirely on the evidence of William Roupell, who not only swore that he forged the document in question, but also gave evidence as to the contents of the will of 1850, declaring that under it the Warley estate was given to Richard. This will, he said, he destroyed, after keeping it for years; and the loss was irremediable, since the draught had been also destroyed by the proctor. William Roupell was not cross-examined, the defendants deeming him unworthy of credit, but Trueman and Dove, the witnesses for the two tenants, were severely handled. Between the examination of witnesses, and the discussion of points of law, the proceedings were protracted over nine days. In summing up, the learned Judge observed, that the deed of grant or gift did not require to be executed by the grantee or donee, William Roupell, but only by the grantor or donor, R. P. Roupell; and again, it did not require that his signature should be attested, but only that he should sign and deliver it to the donee, William Roupell, or some one on his behalf taking it for him. Neither was it required in the case of a will that the donor's execution should have been attested by two witnesses, but only that it should be signed, sealed, and delivered by the donor. The circumstances under which it was prepared and executed were stated by William Roupell, and his was the only direct evidence about it. The answers of the jury, after first retiring, were as follows:—To the first question,—Was the deed of gift executed in the presence of the two witnesses?—It was not. Upon the second question, as to whether it was executed by the testator, they were not agreed. To the third question,—Was the will of September 2, 1856, the will of the testator?—they found it was not so. To the fourth question,—Whether the will of 1850 devised the estate to the plaintiff?—they answered that there was not sufficient evidence to enable them to find. The jury retired again about six o'clock. At ten, being still unable to agree, and declaring that there was no prospect of their coming to a unanimous conclusion, the learned Judge, after conferring with counsel on both sides, declared the jury to be discharged: and so this long-contested case ended, like the suit tried at Guildford, without any decision.

20.—Mr. Horsman draws the attention of Parliament to the oppressive measures of Russia in Poland, asking the House to agree to a resolution—"That, in the opinion of this House, the arrangements made with regard to Poland by the Treaty of Vienna have failed to secure the good government of Poland or the peace of Europe; and any further attempt to replace Poland under the conditions of that treaty must cause calamities to Poland and embarrassment and danger to Europe." As Lord Palmerston declined to commit the Government to any more active policy than remonstrance till an answer had been obtained from Russia to the six points recently placed before her by the great Powers, the motion was withdrawn after a debate.

—The "female Blondin" killed at Aston-park, Birmingham, while performing on the tight-rope for the entertainment of a company of the Order of Foresters. The chair in which the first part of the performance had been carried through was removed, and a bag placed over the head of the performer as an additional blindfold. In this condition she again moved on the rope, holding the balancing pole in her hand, and cautiously feeling her way. She had trodden but three faltering steps when the rope collapsed, the platform on which the attendant was standing fell back, and the poor woman was dashed to the ground. Her death was instantaneous. The Foresters persevered with their entertainment till the evening. A letter written to the Mayor of Birmingham, by command of the Queen, stated:—"Her Majesty cannot refrain from making known to you her personal feelings of horror that one of her subjects—a female—should have been sacrificed to the gratification of the demoralizing taste, unfortunately prevalent, for exhibitions attended with the greatest danger to the performers. Were any proof wanting that such exhibitions are demoralizing, I am commanded to remark that it would be at once found in the decision arrived at to continue the festivities, the hilarity, and the sports of the occasion after an event so melancholy. The Queen trusts that you, in common with the rest of the townspeople of Birmingham, will use your influence to prevent in future the degradation to such exhibitions of the Park, which was gladly opened by her Majesty and the beloved Prince Consort, in the hope that it would be made serviceable for the healthy exercise and rational recreation of the people." The Mayor (Sturge) replied:—"For the future I have every reason to hope that, notwithstanding Aston-park is beyond the jurisdiction of the authorities of Birmingham, their influence, and that of their fellow-townsmen, will henceforth limit its use exclusively to the healthy exercise and rational recreation of the people, so that the gracious intentions of her Majesty and her revered Consort may not be frustrated, but realized. In the meantime I trust that exhibitions of so dangerous and demoralizing a character may be interdicted by parliamentary enactment."

24.—With reference to the Volunteer Review at Wimbledon on the 18th, the Commander-in-Chief writes:—"I can only express my satisfaction at the zeal with which all on the ground carried out the instructions they received; and I have a firm conviction that the Volunteer force is now becoming a very efficient body of men, and valuable as a great auxiliary to the regular army of the country."

28.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. The Royal Speech made reference to the condition of Poland, the civil war in America, the kingdom of Greece, the outrage in, and cessation of, diplomatic intercourse with Japan, and to the most prominent measures carried during the session.

31.—The Master of the Rolls delivers judgment in the case of Broun v. Kennedy, setting aside the deed executed by Mrs. Broun in 1859, giving a reversionary estate in fee simple in the Swinfen Hall estates, on the ground that such deed had been obtained by surprise and the exercise of undue influence. The deed to be delivered up to be cancelled;

Kennedy to re-convey his interest in the estate, and pay the costs of suit. His Honour also expressed his concurrence in the decision arrived at by the Court of Common Pleas, that a barrister was not allowed to sue for the recovery of fees.

August 1.—Died, at Abingdon House, Kensington, her Highness Maharanee Jendau Kower, widow of the late Maharajah Runjeet Singh, ruler of the Sikhs, and mother of the present Maharajah Dhuleep Singh. Her Highness was interred in Kensal-green Cemetery, after some opposition on the part of her attendants, who wished the body conveyed to India.

3.—Accident on the Lynn and Hunstanton Railway, occasioned by the engine coming in contact with a bullock upon the line. Five of the passengers were killed, some of them so mutilated as to defy recognition.

— The Prince of Wales visits Halifax to open the New Town Hall.

5.—Settled, by compromise, at Cork Assizes, the protracted process of litigation known as the Egmont property case, involving the ownership of lands computed to be worth 12,000*l.* a year. The action was in the form of an issue directed by the Court of Chancery for the purpose of ascertaining whether a certain instrument was the last will of Henry, Earl of Egmont. It purported to devise all the freehold and personal estates, together with the right of presentation to two livings in England, to Edward Tierney, of Fitzwilliam-street, Dublin, making him, indeed, the sole residuary legatee, after payment of a few comparatively small charges. The Egmonts and Tierneys first became acquainted at Brighton in the reign of George IV. The ultimate effect of this intimacy was, that Edward Tierney, who was regarded as a friend and counsellor of the Egmonts, was appointed agent to the estates, then very much involved. Immediately after the accession of Henry, Lord Percival, the testator to the Egmont title, it became necessary, in order to meet the embarrassments of the family, to borrow money. This was done, and two trust-deeds executed, whereby the whole estates were conveyed to Lord Percival, Mr. Teed, and Mr. Edward Tierney. These trustees were to pay certain sums to Lord Egmont and his son, Lord Percival; they were to bar all entail, and to invest the property in the name of the Earl of Egmont, so as to give him power to dispose of it ultimately to the testator, Lord Percival. In consequence of the pecuniary position in which he was placed, Lord Percival, although a man of great refinement, gave way to drink. When he succeeded to the title, he had property valued at 200,000*l.*, but upon it there was a debt of 100,000*l.*, besides a further sum of 23,000*l.* owing to Mr. Tierney. The Earl died in 1841, and in his will made Edward Tierney his heir and residuary legatee. Subsequent to the Earl's death, the property had been greatly improved, no less a sum than 70,000*l.* having been expended upon it by Mr. Tierney. Owing to the peculiar form of the pleadings, the question being the validity of a will, the Rev. Sir Lionel Darell appeared as plaintiff against the Earl of Egmont (Lord Arden), whereas he was in reality defendant, resisting the claim of his opponent to get possession of the estates, which were alleged to have been obtained by fraud and false representation. The terms of the compromise were, that the estates were to be surrendered to the Earl of Egmont, who, in return, was to pay Sir Lionel Darell 125,000*l.*, and to require no account of the mesne rents and profits since the death of the testator. The Earl also became bound to pay all costs incurred.

6.—Commercial treaty concluded between England and Italy.

— Sir Henry Storks, acting under the authority of the Queen's proclamation, dissolves the Ionian Parliament, "with a view to consult, in the most formal and authentic manner, the wishes of the inhabitants as to their future destiny." The result was a unanimous resolution in favour of union with Greece. A protocol ceding the isles was given effect to in June 1864.

11.—An English fleet, under the command of Captain Kuper, enters the Bay of Kagosima to demand satisfaction from the Prince of Satsuma for an attack made on the English travellers within the bounds of his jurisdiction, Sept. 14, 1862. Failing to obtain any satisfactory answer to the demands made, three steamers were seized on the 15th, when suddenly all the batteries opened a fire of shot and shell on the squadron. The Admiral at once proceeded to bombard the city, laying a great part of it in ruins, and completely destroying the batteries. Satsuma afterwards consented to do his utmost to apprehend the murderers, and paid his portion of the indemnity demanded, 25,000*l.*

14.—Died, at the residence of General Eyre, Chatham, aged 71, years, Lord Clyde, "who by his own deserts, through fifty years of arduous service, from the earliest battle in the Peninsula to the pacification of India in 1858, rose to the rank of Field-Marshal and a peerage."

17.—A Congress of German Sovereigns assembled at Frankfurt. The Emperor of Austria presided, and, in his opening speech relative to the reforms which the Congress should initiate, expressed his regret that he had not been able to induce the King of Prussia to participate in the work of unity. The 35 States of the Confederation, or Bund, included 1 empire, 5 kingdoms, 7 grand-duchies, 1 electorate, 8 duchies, 1 landgravate, 8 principalities, and 4 free towns. The entire population was computed at 44,802,050, and the military force of the Confederation at 503,072 men.

20.—In reply to a second pressing invitation to attend the Congress of Sovereigns at Frankfort, the King of Prussia writes:—"My conviction is still the same as that expressed in my explanation of the 4th inst., and I retain it the rather as I have yet received no official information of the basis of the propositions. The information which has reached me by other means only strengthens me in the view not to fix my determination until, by business-like deliberations on the matter by my Council, the proposed changes in the Federal Constitution may be harmoniously discussed in their relations to the just power of Prussia and to the just interests of the nation. I owe it to my country, and the cause of Germany, to give no explanations which may bind me to my Federal allies before such discussion has taken place. Without such, however, my participation in the discussions would be impracticable."

24.—Mr. Coxwell's balloon collapses soon after ascending from a fête at Basford Park, Nottingham, and, descending with great rapidity, causes the death of an amateur aeronaut named Chambers, who had volunteered to take the place of the aerial scientific navigator. The car struck the ground and rebounded several feet, when it was caught hold of by a party of young men. Chambers was stretched at the bottom of the car, life nearly extinct, more, it was believed, from the effects of the gas in the balloon than even the serious fractures he had sustained.

26.—Heard in Edinburgh, before Lord Barcople and a jury, the case of Craig v. Tennent, being an action for seduction in which the damages were laid at 1,000*l.* The pursuer was the daughter of a surgeon at Strathaven, and the defender acted as a bank-agent there. The case was chiefly remarkable for the exposure it led to of the easy morality prevailing in that district during the courting season. The pursuer herself admitted that on one evening, when a number of young people met for diversion, there might have been rolling on the floor and kissing going on. "Toozling" was the custom of the place, and was familiarly known as "the batts." Another witness remembered the defender and a medical friend "bedding" Miss Craig, and afterwards "toozling" about the house. This also was a custom of the place, though it was not established in evidence that such practices were a necessary preliminary of marriage, for, during the period of their occurrence, the pursuer had been heard to speak slightly of the defender as "small-legged Tammy." A justice of the peace had been present at one of the "toozling" scenes, and gone through the ceremony of a sham marriage. The defender at first pleaded that he had never been guilty of any improprieties with the pursuer, and then that improprieties had been continued over the whole period of their intimacy. The village-doctor was called on the side of the defender, and also several female witnesses, who all testified that the occurrences referred to were quite common in and around Strathaven, and nobody there thought anything of them. The jury returned a unanimous verdict for the pursuer, and gave damages for the full amount claimed, 1,000*l.*

29.—Came on for trial at the Croydon Assizes, before Baron Bramwell and a special jury, the case of Wolley v. Pole, involving the plaintiff's right to recover from the Sun and other insurance offices the sum of 29,000*l.*, as insurance effected on the mansion of Campden House and furniture, prior to its destruction by fire on the 23d March, 1862. After a long time spent in investigating the claim, and the circumstances of the fire, the offices determined to dispute the policies on the ground of fraud and arson, and this was the crime which was now submitted to the jury. The first action, in which the Secretary of the Sun Office appeared as defendant, was arranged to be taken as decisive of the others. The main facts sought to be brought out in evidence against the plaintiff were, that he had increased the insurances far beyond the value of the fittings; that many of the articles insured had been removed from the house; that his movements on the night of the fire were open to grave suspicion; that the furniture and books were spread about so as to burn readily, and, finally, that he was in such pecuniary difficulties as to furnish a motive for the crimes alleged against him. After a trial, extending over five days, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

September 1.—Termination of the Frankfort Congress. In the course of the sittings resolutions were carried in favour of the formation of a Chief Directory of sovereigns, a Federal Council with an assembly of 302 delegates, and a Federal Court of Justice: Prussia to preside at the Council or Directory only in the absence of Austria.

9.—Earl Russell visits Dundee, and is presented with the freedom of the burgh, preparatory to opening the public park presented to the citizens by Sir David Baxter. Referring to our duty as neutrals in the American struggle, he said:—"The duties of neutrality between parties violently hostile, are not easily performed. It has been, and will be our endeavour, however, to exercise the powers now entrusted to the Crown by Parliament in such a manner as at once to defeat every attempt to engage our people in enterprises inconsistent with our neutral position, and to preserve for ourselves, our persons and our property, these safeguards of British law and justice to which alone they are indebted for the security they enjoy." In an after-dinner speech given in his honour a few days later at Blairgowrie, Perthshire, his Lordship expressed an opinion that, so far as Reform was concerned, we were at the present time entitled "to rest and be thankful."

The walls were covered with pictures of value, and in various corners of his apartments piles of clothing were found mixed up with silver plate, and rare books—all thickly covered with dust. A verdict was returned that death was caused by exhaustion from low fever, accelerated by neglect.

— The Ionian Assembly declare in favour of uniting the Islands to the kingdom of Greece, and thank Great Britain and the joint protecting Powers. The Assembly declining the pecuniary stipulations, was afterwards pro-rogued.

25.—Inquiry before the Castle Hedingham magistrates into the death of an old Frenchman commonly called "Dummy," who practised fortune-telling to a little extent, and had incurred, in consequence, the evil reputation of being a wizard. Aggrieved by his refusing to heal their imaginary ailments, and determined at the same time to rid the parish of a person of such baleful influence, a mob, composed of the most part of small shopkeepers and women, fell upon the old man on the 3d August last, and, besides half-suffocating him in a ditch, otherwise maltreated him so severely, that he died in a few days from the injuries received. Emma Smith, and Samuel Stammers, ringleaders in the outrage, were now committed to take their trial at the Chelmsford Spring Assizes.

October 3.—The Archduke Maximilian consents to accept the crown of Mexico, provided his election be ratified by a free vote of the whole Mexican people.

6.—Earthquake shocks felt in the central and western parts of England, the shocks being nearly simultaneous from Milford Haven to Burton-on-Trent, and from the Mersey to Plymouth.

— Discourteous treatment of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, by the Earl of Leitrim. In his progress through the western parts of the Island, Lord Carlisle and his party were refused accommodation at the little Inn of Maam, in Connemara, in consequence of the following letter written to his tenant, the inn-keeper, by the Earl of Leitrim:—"King, I will be obliged to you to fill the hotel with my tenants forthwith. Let every room be occupied immediately, and continue to be occupied; and when so occupied you will refuse admittance to Lord Carlisle and his party. If there should be the slightest difficulty as to filling the hotel, the occupation of the rooms, my desire is that you will fill each room with the workmen; but you must not admit Lord Carlisle, and consequently the rooms should be filled previous to his coming there. Any orders you may have received notwithstanding, I rely on your observing my wishes to the letter.—LEITRIM. P.S.—I will pay for the tenants using the rooms." Lord Leitrim was afterwards removed from the Commission of the Peace.

Her Majesty (through Sir George Grey) said:—"I could not reconcile it to myself to remain at Balmoral, while such a tribute was being paid to his memory, without making an exertion to assure you personally of the deep and heartfelt sense I entertain of your kindness and affection; and, at the same time, to proclaim in public the unbounded reverence and admiration, the devoted love that fills my heart for him whose loss must throw a lasting gloom over all my future life."

17.—Explosion at Morfa Colliery, Glamorganshire, causing the death of thirty-nine workmen, being almost the entire labourers in the pit at the time.

19.—Lord Palmerston entered as a co-respondent in the Divorce Court. A person named O'Kane filed a petition this day alleging his marriage with Matilda Margaret Augustus Morris, on the 2d of October, 1851, at St

George's-in-the-East, London. He then stated cohabitation at 2, John-street, Commercial-road; Gravesend; Tralee; and 2, Grove Place, Brighton, and the birth of a son and four daughters. There was next an allegation to the effect that on the 16th June, 1863, at Cambridge House, and at other times and places, the respondent committed adultery with the co-respondent, Viscount Palmerston, in consideration of which damages were claimed for 20,000*l.* The respondent, Mrs. O'Kane, answered this petition on the 1st day of November, by a denial both of the adultery and the marriage. The noble co-respondent did not answer, but instead of doing so—and as a preliminary step—he, on the 17th of November last, obtained in chambers an order that the petitioner should specify more precisely the place and mode in which the marriage was celebrated, and also the places and times at which the adultery was committed. With this order the petitioner did not comply, and took no further steps in the suit. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings the petition was removed from the file, an affidavit being sworn to that the petition was presented, filed, and served for the purpose of extortion only, and that the petitioner had no case on its merits.

22.—The Prince of Wales elected President of the Society of Arts.

There were found in her room ornaments to the value of 800*l.*, 200 pairs of gloves, and 273*l.* in money. She was committed for trial, and convicted at the Central Criminal Court.

4.—The Emperor of the French issues an invitation to the Sovereigns of Europe to assemble in Congress at Paris for the settlement of various international difficulties:—"Called to the throne," he wrote to her Majesty, "by Providence, and the will of the French people, but trained in the school of adversity, it is perhaps less allowable for me than for others to ignore the rights of sovereigns and the legitimate aspirations of the people. Thus I am ready, without any preconceived system, to bring to an International Council a spirit of moderation and justice, the ordinary portion of those who have undergone so many different trials. If I take the initiative in such an overture, I do not yield to an impulse of vanity, but because I am the sovereign to whom ambitious projects have mostly been attributed. I have it at heart to prove, by this frank and loyal overture, that my sole object is to arrive, without convulsion, at the pacification of Europe. If this proposal be agreed to, I beg your Majesty to accept Paris as the place of meeting. If the princes, allies, and friends of France should think fit to enhance by their presence the authority of the deliberations, I shall be proud to offer them cordial hospitality. Europe will, perhaps, see some advantage in the capital whence the signal of confusion has so often arisen, becoming the seat of conferences destined to lay the basis of a general pacification. I take this opportunity of renewing to you the assurances of the high esteem and inviolable friendship with which I am, Madam my Sister, your Majesty's good brother—NAPOLEON." Earl Russell entered at length into the question in a despatch, dated 25th November. He concluded:—"If the mere expression of opinions and wishes would accomplish no positive results, it appears certain that the deliberations of a Congress would consist of demands and pretensions put forward by some and resisted by others; and, there being no supreme authority in such an assembly to enforce the decision of the majority, the Congress would probably separate leaving many of its members on worse terms with each other than they had been when they met. But if this would be the probable result, it follows that no decrease of armaments is likely to be effected by the proposed Congress. M. Drouyn de Lhuys refers to a proposal made by Lord Clarendon in one of the last sittings of the Congress of Paris. But her Majesty's Government understand that proposal to have reference to a dispute between two Powers to be referred to the good offices of a friendly Power, but in no way to the assembling of a General Congress. Not being able, therefore, to discern the likelihood of those beneficial consequences which the Emperor of the French promised himself when proposing a Congress, her Majesty's Government, following their own strong convictions, after mature deliberation, feel themselves unable to accept his Imperial Majesty's invitation."

5.—The Attorney-General moves for a rule for a new trial in the case of the Alexandra, on the ground of misdirection by Lord Chief Baron Pollock, and also upon the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. When the rule came to be argued, two of the judges thought it should be made absolute, and two that it should be discharged. By the withdrawal, as is the custom in such cases, of the judgment of the junior judge, a decision was entered that the rule should be discharged. An appeal on behalf of the Crown was made to the Court of Error, Exchequer Chamber (February 6), but Sir Hugh Cairns there stated the objection, that the Court of Exchequer had no power by law to make the rule under which the appeal had been brought. He contended that the only power given by the 26th Section of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act to the Court of Exchequer was to regulate the internal arrangements within their own court, and not to create new courts. They could not go outside their own court and give to suitors rights external to their court, or give them power of appeal from their decision to the Privy Council or the House of Lords. Four of the judges were of opinion that the Court had no jurisdiction, and three that it had. The case was ultimately carried to the House of Lords, the point argued with much subtilty on both sides being the technical question of the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The House pronounced a decision on the 6th of April, showing a great diversity of opinion among the law lords, but deciding by a majority in favour of the Lord Chancellor's opinion, that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Two days afterwards he poisoned himself with aconite while the police were endeavouring to effect an entrance into his house.

The engines, however, were powerful enough to drive the huge mass through the storm till a safe anchorage was reached off Kingstown.

17.—Commenced, at Aldershot, the Court-martial on Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley, charged "(1) with conduct unbecoming an officer, and to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in having at Mhow, during the month of May, A.D. 1862, when the Regimental Sergeant-Major Lilley was confined in close arrest, caused the orders under which he was so confined to be carried into effect with unnecessary and undue severity, whereby the said Regimental Sergeant-Major Lilley and his wife were subjected to great and grievous hardships and suffering; (2) for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in having at Mhow, on or about the 7th June, A.D. 1862, in the course of an address made by him before the general Court-martial which was then being held for the trial of Paymaster T. Smales, 6th Enniskillen Dragoons, expressed himself in the following language, or words to the like effect:—'Close arrest necessarily implies a sentry over a prisoner, but it does not necessitate his being placed over a prisoner's wife or family, and I can assure the court that no person could be more shocked than I was when I learned from the evidence of Sergeant-Major Lilley that his wife had been incommoded or annoyed by the precaution taken for his safe custody. It was Lieutenant and Adjutant Fitzsimon's fault if any such thing occurred, for it was his duty as Adjutant to have seen the post assigned to the sentry, and to have taken care that no such improper interference with the privacy of the Sergeant-Major's wife could have taken place. As it was, immediately I became acquainted with the statement of Sergeant-Major Lilley, I sent off orders to have the sentry removed to a post where he could perform his duty equally well without annoying or interfering with Mrs. Lilley;' thereby representing that the said Lieutenant and Adjutant Fitzsimon was in fault for what had occurred, whereas in truth, and in fact, Lieut.-Colonel Crawley then well knew that the said Lieutenant and Adjutant Fitzsimon had acted in the said matter by the express order and direction of the said Lieut.-Colonel Crawley." The examination of witnesses was continued till the 17th of December, when Colonel Crawley addressed the Court in defence, and claimed a complete acquittal. The Court found him Not guilty on both counts, and restored him the command of the regiment. Several witnesses who seemed to be actuated by an animus against Colonel Crawley, and had given their evidence in a hesitating, unsatisfactory way, were draughted to other regiments or dismissed the service.

On the 19th the Viceroy was quite conscious of his critical state and perfectly composed. He then made his will, directed Colonel Strachey to design a tomb for his remains; approved of the design when submitted to him; dictated the words of the telegram to England expressing his duty to the Queen, and requesting her to appoint a successor; gave instructions respecting the return of his family to England, took an affectionate leave of all present, and waited calmly till the end came.

24.—The Cobden-Delane dispute. In a speech at Rochdale to-night, Mr. Cobden said:—"With regard to some things in foreign countries we don't compare favourably. You have no peasantry but that of England which is entirely divorced from the land. There is no other country in the world where you will not find men holding the plough and turning up the furrow upon their own freehold. I don't want any agrarian outrages by which we should change all this; but this I find, and it is quite consistent with human nature, that wherever I go the condition of the people is generally pretty good, in comparison with the power they have to take care of themselves; and if you have a class entirely divorced from political power, while in another country they possess it, they will be treated there with more consideration, they will have greater advantages, they will be better educated, and have a better chance of having property than in a country where they are deprived of the advantage of political power." Commenting on this and other speeches delivered at the same meeting, the Times wrote:—"This language, so often repeated, and so calculated to excite discontent among the poor and half-informed, has really only one intelligible meaning—"Reduce the electoral franchise; for when you have done so you will obtain an Assembly which will seize on the estates of the proprietors of land, and divide them gratuitously among the poor." . . . It may be right to reduce the franchise, but certainly not as a step to spoliation." Mr. Cobden addressed himself direct to Mr. J. T. Delane, of the Times, who at once took upon himself personally the responsibility of the interpretation put upon the speeches. That interpretation Mr. Cobden described as a libellous outrage upon two members of the House of Commons, and an insult to millions of honest, industrious Englishmen. "Nobody," he wrote, "knows better than yourself, except the writer who actually penned the scandalous passage in question, that this accusation against Mr. Bright, of wishing to divide the land of the rich among the poor, is nothing but the resort to a stale rhetorical trick (this only aggravates the character of the libel). To draw away public attention from the real issue, and thus escape from the discussion of a serious but for the moment an inconvenient public topic, in order to trail a red herring across the true scent, the cry of spoliation was raised." Mr. Delane defended himself by alleging that he had been dragged into the correspondence entirely by the exaggerated intensity Mr. Cobden attached to the oft-quoted phrase,—“Mr. Bright’s proposition for a division among the poor of the lands of the rich.” “You seem to assume that I charged you with proposing that this division should be accomplished by violence. But your own words were there to prove to me that such was not your meaning, and to confute me instantly if I had attempted to attach that interpretation to it. There are, however, as no one knows better than yourself, other and more effective, because more enduring means than violence for the division of the land of the rich among the poor. . . . You suggest so obviously that it is by legislative measures—rendered possible by giving political power to the peasantry—you propose to ‘amend the unequal distribution of the land between the rich and the poor,’ that no one would think of charging you with endeavouring to effect this great change by violence. For myself,” Mr. Delane concluded, “I can but repeat that certain passages in your speech will in my opinion bear no other interpretation than that ascribed to them; and you have yourself quoted the very passage upon which I rely to justify my opinion.” Towards the close of the correspondence, Mr. Cobden wrote:—"In the teeth of all these proofs in plain unmistakable English to the contrary, I should be sacrificing truth to courtesy were I to affect to concur in this new version of your language, which does not admit of two meanings. I note your recantation, but repel the attempt to raise a fresh issue to cover your retreat under a fire of minor accusations. I will conclude this correspondence with merely remarking that the blow which was aimed at the fame of Mr. Bright and myself has missed its mark. How far the recoil of the weapon may affect the hand that levelled it time will show."

25.—Suppression of the insurrection among the mountain tribes in the Punjab, headed by Ram Singh.

First Fenian Convention assembles at Chicago.

December 1.—Opening of the new railway between Charing Cross and Greenwich.

2.—The Prussian Chambers, by a majority of 231 to 63, pass a resolution: "That the honour and interest of Germany demand that all the German States should preserve the rights of the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, that they should recognise the hereditary prince of Schleswig - Holstein - Sonderburg - Augustenburg, as Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, and they should lend him assistance in vindication of his rights." In reply to this the King of Denmark announced his intention of resisting all revolutionary movements in Holstein.

6.—Lady Blantyre recovers 584*l.* in name of "damages" from the St. James's Hotel Company, for loss sustained in money and jewels while staying at their premises in Piccadilly. Mr. Bovill contended that the company could not be liable, seeing they had hung up a notice in every room—"The company do not hold themselves responsible for property lost in the hotel unless placed in the special charge of the manager." Mr. Justice Byles ruled that the liability of a hotel-keeper was undoubted. It was not only the law of England until modified by a recent Act of Parliament, but it was the law of every country in the world. With respect to the notice furnished on the card, it was of no value whatever, for it could not take away the responsibility of the defendants.

8.—Two thousand persons—mostly women—burned in the church of La Compania, Santiago, Chili, in the course of a festival in honour of the Immaculate Conception. Every corner of the building, from the ground to the ceiling, and especially about the altar, was a sea of muslin and drapery flooded with every variety of illumination. Not content with even this display, the chief priest of the church, a man named Ugarte, in one of his attempts to outstrip the Catholic world, invented a celestial post-office in the building, through which direct communication in writing was obtained with the Virgin, and in which offerings accompanying the letters were to be deposited. At half-past six, though the building was crammed to suffocation, the crowd outside clamoured for admittance and pressed against the closed doors. At a quarter to seven high mass began with all the pomp and splendour customary on such occasions, the perfume of the frankincense pervading the building, and the plaintive sounds of the organ seeming to inspire feelings of holy awe at the grand solemnity. The staff of acolytes engaged for hours in lighting the endless festoons of lamps now reached the precinct of the high altar; all the tapers were safely lit, and there remained but to ignite a silver crescent containing paraffin which had been placed at the foot of a large image of the Virgin. A careless acolyte, it was thought, mismanaged the lighting of this ornament, and the flame rising to an extraordinary height came in contact with the muslin and gold draperies round the altar. These, from their light and inflammable texture, communicated the fire to the cloth-of-gold canopy above, which in its turn was soon in a blaze with all the other decorations round the church. For the closely-packed and excited crowd to escape (506) from the building was impossible. The doors were few in number and closely blockaded outside. There were also many ladies who, in ignorance of the true state of affairs, did not rise from their knees as quickly as they might have done. The consequence was that those pressing from the centre of the church towards the doors stumbled over them, and in a few minutes great walls twelve feet high of fainting, trampled, and dying girls, entangled in each other's dresses, barricaded the only three exits which the church possessed, thus excluding from all outward help upwards of 1,800 ladies who now found themselves face to face with death. The inside of the great dome, composed mostly of timber, was soon in a blaze, and showers of molten lead fell upon the seething mass of humanity below. The flames at last reached the festoons on which thousands of paraffin lamps were hung, and, snapping the cords asunder, the coloured globes and their contents descended on the heads of the people, enveloping them in one sheet of liquid fire. From the windows of the opposite houses people could be seen rushing to and fro amid the flames in the body of the church; others stretching out their hands imploringly for help; and high above the din of even the swinging bell in the tower could be heard the piercing cries of agony. A few minutes after eight the roof fell, burying beneath it all whom the fury of the fire had spared. A few, disfigured by the flames or mangled by the crush, were dragged out and laid in the adjoining Senate-house, but it was thought that not fewer than two thousand—the rank and beauty of the city—perished in the calamity. The charred embers were gathered together and buried in a huge trench prepared for their reception, 1,500 blackened skulls being counted and acknowledged as received by the authorities of the burial-ground for interment. The priest Ugarte was believed to have escaped by a private door in the sacristy.

9.—Sir John Lawrence leaves England to assume the duties of Governor-General of India.

10.—Tom King defeats the American champion, Heenan, in a pugilistic encounter near Wadhurst, Sussex. At the twentieth round the ring was broken into by the excited spectators, and for five additional rounds the fight was carried on amid much confusion. Heenan was then unable to respond to the call of his second.

12.—Tried, at Derby Assizes, George Victor Townley, charged with murdering Miss Elizabeth Goodwin, a young lady who had contracted a marriage engagement with him, but afterwards broke it off for reasons satisfactory to herself and friends. The murder was committed on the evening of the 21st of August last in the grounds of Wigwell Hall, Derbyshire, in the course of an interview he had solicited for the purpose of ascertaining her final intentions. A witness (Reuben Conway) said:—"On the night in question, between eight and nine o'clock, as I was going along the turnpike-road from the Hall towards the Wigwell-lane end, I heard a moaning noise, which appeared to come from the direction of the Mill-lane end. I ran forward, and found Miss Goodwin guiding herself by the wall and coming towards the house. Her face and the front of her dress were covered with blood. She asked me to take her home, and said there was a gentleman down there had been murdering her. I put my arm round her and carried her about twenty yards. She asked me whether I could see any one, and on looking down the road I saw the prisoner sixty or eighty yards below towards the lane end, and nearer the lane end than the place where the blood was afterwards found. He was crossing the road, and then came towards me. When I first saw him he was about forty yards from the Hunting-gate. As he came up I went towards him and asked him who had been murdering Miss Goodwin. He said he had stabbed her. I asked him to go and help me, and he took hold of her head and I of her body, and we carried her towards Wigwell. He called her 'poor Bessie,' several times, and said, 'You should not have proved false to me.' She said nothing then. We laid her down near a gate, and prisoner asked me for something to put round her neck to stop the bleeding. I said I had nothing, and he asked me to go for help. I asked him if he would stop with her, and he said he would. I then went to Mr. Bowmer's yard for help, leaving the prisoner with Miss Goodwin. I was away about four or five minutes, and on coming back found the prisoner holding something round her neck. I asked if she was living, and he said she was. She said, 'Take me home.' We then carried her a short distance further, until Mr. Leeds and his brother came up. Mr. Leeds asked who had done it. The prisoner said, 'I have done it.' We then carried her further and met James Conway, who also asked who had done it. The prisoner said, 'I know, and he knows; I am the man who did it, and I shall be hanged for it.' Miss Goodwin then said she was dying. We carried her further, and met Mr. Bowmer, who also wanted to know who had done it. The prisoner said, 'I have done it; there is no question at all about that.' After going a little further, he said he was afraid she was dead, and bent down and kissed her. She was dead." A defence of insanity was set up and corroborated by Dr. Forbes Winslow, who had two interviews with the prisoner since the murder. The jury after an absence of five minutes returned a verdict of Guilty, and Mr. Baron Martin, who entirely concurred in the finding, sentenced Townley to be executed on the 31st inst. A report under the Lunacy Act, signed by various justices and medical men, was afterwards sent to the Home Secretary, who was induced thereby to commute the capital sentence, although a more formal examination, authorized by himself, resulted in a report declaring that Townley was then perfectly sane. He was afterwards removed to Bethlehem Hospital.

14.—Destructive flood in Melbourne, the Yarra-yarra rising forty feet above its usual level.

16.—Tried at the Central Criminal Court, before Mr. Justice Blackburn, Samuel Wright, bricklayer, charged with the murder of Maria Green, a woman with whom he cohabited in a lodging-house in Waterloo-road, on the morning of the 13th instant. He pleaded guilty to the charge, and, though repeatedly warned as to the consequences of his avowal, refused to alter his plea, and received sentence of death. The swiftness with which in this instance conviction followed the perpetration of the crime, and the refusal of the prisoner to take advantage of any ground which might be suggested in his favour, coupled with his doubtful sanity, led to great efforts being made to obtain a mitigation of the sentence—particularly as such abundant mercy had been shown to the other murderer, Townley—but the Home Secretary refused to interfere, and the capital sentence was carried out amid many evidences of public dissatisfaction.

17.—At Kingston Assizes, Joseph Mahaig, a sergeant of the 3d Buffs, received sentence of death (afterwards commuted) for poisoning Elizabeth Wolerer, a woman with whom he cohabited, at Guildford. He attempted to commit suicide, and lay for some time in a neglected state beside the corpse in the bed.

18.—Fire in Wood-street and Milk-street, City, destroying property and merchandise estimated at over 100,000*l.*

19.—Mr. Hall, the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs, addresses the Ministers of Prussia, Austria, Saxony, and Hanover, pronouncing the decree of the Federal Diet for giving effect to the "procedure of execution" in the Duchies, passed on the 7th, as deprived of all binding force, owing to the illegal exclusion of the Plenipotentiary of Denmark from the assembly. After announcing that the proffered mediation of the British Government had been accepted, he protested against the unquestionable encroachment which had been assumed towards the King, who reserved to himself to take such further steps as he may consider reconcilable with his rights and interests.

22.—The Holstein Diet meet at Hamburg and resolve to appeal to the Federal Diet in favour of Duke Frederick of Augustenburg. Next day a detachment of Saxon and Hanoverian troops entered Holstein.

24.—An unexpected sadness fell on many a Christmas festivity throughout the kingdom by the death this morning of Mr. Thackeray, the greatest of English novelists since Fielding, and a satirist who combined in a surprising degree the rare gift of brilliant humour with tender sympathy and high moral purpose.

26.—Explosion in the Maesteg Colliery, Glamorganshire, causing the death of fourteen men and boys who were working at the time with unprotected lights.

27.—The Prince of Augustenburg proclaimed Duke of Schleswig-Holstein at Elms-horn by the title of Frederick VIII. The Prince made a public entry into Kiel on the 30th.

29.—Four Italians, Greco, Imperatori, Trabuco, and Scaglioni, arrested in Paris on the charge of conspiring to assassinate the Emperor.

31.—Earl Russell addresses a note to the Federal Diet, demanding in the interests of peace, (1) That a Conference of the Powers which signed the Treaty of London, in conjunction with a representative from the German Confederation, shall meet in Paris or London to settle the differences between Germany and Denmark. (2) That the status quo shall be maintained until this Conference shall have finished its labours.

January 1.—Opening of the new South-wark street, extending from the High-street to Blackfriars-road.

3.—Died, aged 63, William Behnes, sculptor.

6.—The Federal Commission suppresses the administration of Holstein, and institutes a Ducal Government at Kiel. Ten days afterwards Austria and Prussia required Denmark to suppress the Constitution of November 1863 within forty-eight hours. This being refused, an Austro-Prussian army, under Marshal Wrangel, entered Holstein on the 21st.

— Another ballet girl burnt to death at the Pavilion Theatre, through her dress coming in contact with an unprotected light.

7.—Garibaldi withdraws from the Italian Chamber of Deputies.

8.—At two minutes to nine o'clock this evening, the Princess of Wales was safely delivered of a son. Her Royal Highness had been one of a skating party at Virginia Water in the afternoon.

9.—Explosion of the barque Lotty Sleigh, lying in the Mersey, laden with gunpowder. While the steward of the vessel was in the act of filling a lamp from a can of paraffin oil, the liquid, by some means, became ignited. The can was instantly dropped, and the burning fluid spread over the vessel. When the flames reached the gunpowder, an explosion took place which was felt along the entire line of docks and far into the city, where doors and windows were shivered to pieces. Even at Birkenhead the shock had the effect of extinguishing the gas-lights in shops and private dwelling-houses, as well as in the streets. In each town the inhabitants were rushing about in a state of wild distraction, and it was midnight before a complete sense of security returned. No lives were lost, the crew of the Lotty Sleigh having been taken off by a passing boat a few minutes before the explosion.

12.—Sir John Lawrence enters Calcutta as Governor-General of India.

14.—Correspondence between Professor Kingsley and Dr. Newman, concerning the meaning of certain words used by the latter in a sermon on "Wisdom and Innocence," published in 1844. In the current number of Macmillan's Magazine, "C. K." wrote:—"So again of the virtue of truth. Truth for its own sake has never been a virtue of the Roman clergy. Father Newman informs us that it need not, and on the whole ought not to be; that cunning is the weapon which Heaven has given to the saints wherewith to withstand the brute male force of the wicked world which marries and is given in marriage." Dr. Newman instantly complained of this as "a grave and gratuitous slander," and expressed amazement that Mr. Kingsley should have used such language. "I ask," he writes, "for no explanation—that concerns the author and editor. If they set about proving their point, or, should they find that impossible, if they say so, in either case I shall call them men. But if they only propose to say that I have 'complained,' and that 'they yield to my explanations,' or 'that they are quite ready to be convinced if I will convince them,' and so on . . . that is, if they ignore the fact that the onus probandi of a very definite accusation lies upon them—then, I say, they had better let it all alone." As the terms, even more than the language of Dr. Newman's letters, made it apparent that Professor Kingsley's opinion of the meaning of the words in dispute was a mistaken one—a note was drawn up for insertion in the Magazine, expressing regret at having so seriously mistaken him, but of which note Dr. Newman gravely disapproved, after contrasting the actual words with what might be "the unjust but too probable popular rendering." To-day Professor Kingsley writes:—"Dr. Newman has by letter expressed in the strongest terms his denial of the meaning which I have put upon his words. It only remains, therefore, for me to express my hearty regret at having so seriously mistaken him." On this Dr. Newman commented:—"You have made a monstrous charge against me; direct, distinct, public. You are bound to prove it as directly, as distinctly, as publicly;—or to own you can't. 'Well,' says Mr. Kingsley, 'if you are quite sure you did not say it, I'll take your word for it; I really will.' My word! I am dumb. Somehow I thought that it was my word that happened to be on trial. The word of a Professor of lying, that he does not lie! But Mr. Kingsley reassures me:—'We are both gentlemen,' he says; 'I have done as much as one English gentleman can expect from another.' I begin to see: he thought me a gentleman at the very time that he said I taught lying on system. After all, it is not I, but it is Mr. Kingsley who did not mean what he said. Habemus confitentium reum. So we have confessedly come round to this, preaching without practising; the common theme of satirists from Juvenal to Walter Scott! 'I left Baby Charles and Steenie laying his duty before him,' says King James of the reprobate Dalgarno. 'O Geordie, jingling Geordie, it was grand to hear Baby Charles laying down the guilt of dissimulation, and Steenie lecturing on the turpitude of incontinence.' While I feel then that Mr. Kingsley's February explanation is miserably insufficient in itself for his January enormity, still I feel also that the correspondence which lies between these two acts of his constitutes a real satisfaction to those principles of historical and literary justice to which he has given so rude a shock. Accordingly, I have put it into print, and make no further criticism on Mr. Kingsley." Professor Kingsley afterwards discussed the question in a pamphlet, and was supported by one or two other writers; but the most important result of the controversy was the contribution made to the history of modern religious thought in the Church of England, by the publication of Dr. Newman's "Apologia pro Vita Sua."

28.—One of the lions in the Agricultural Hall, Islington, attacks and seriously mutilates a keeper.

29.—Died at Hampstead, aged 83, Miss Lucy Aikin, a well-known writer in the department of history and biography.

31.—The proposal of Austria and Prussia that the troops of the German Confederation should be restricted to the occupation of Holstein, and should not interfere with Schleswig, having been rejected by the Diet of Frankfort, the two Powers announced that they should take the matter into their own hands as parties to the Treaty of London of 1852, and they summoned Denmark to annul the Constitution by which Schleswig was incorporated into that kingdom. Denmark applied for time to obtain the sanction of the Rigsraad, which was refused. In reply to the summons of Marshal Wrangel to surrender Schleswig, General de Meza, the Danish commander, said he had orders to defend the duchy.

February 3.—The Prussians bombard and afterwards burn Missunde.

4.—Parliament opened by Royal Commission. The Speech intimated that the condition of the country was on the whole satisfactory. The revenue has fully realized its expected amount; the commerce of the United Kingdom is increasing; and, while the distress in the manufacturing districts has been in some degree lessened, there is reason to look forward to an increased supply of cotton from various countries. On the all-engrossing question of the Schleswig-Holstein dispute, the Royal Speech announced that the death of the late King of Denmark brought into immediate application the stipulation of the Treaty of 1852, which declared that it was conducive to the preservation of the balance of power, and of the peace of Europe, that "the integrity of the Danish monarchy should be maintained, and that the several territories which have been hitherto under the sway of the King of Denmark should continue so to remain. Her Majesty has directed that a Commission shall be issued for the purpose of revising the forms of subscription and declaration required to be made by the clergy of the Established Church." In the debate which followed, the Earl of Derby made a graceful allusion to the birth of an heir to the Prince of Wales:—"It appears to me that as we advance in life—we look with a warmer and kindlier sympathy upon the opening prospects of those who are entering upon that career, towards the close of which so many of us are hurrying. But I am sure there is not one of your Lordships who does not view with the deepest interest the happy career of that youthful pair upon the birth of whose heir we are now congratulating the Sovereign. I am sure there is not one of your Lordships who does not offer up a fervent prayer to the Throne of Grace that that bright prospect may remain unclouded, and that long after the youngest of your Lordships have passed away from this scene, the throne of these realms may be occupied by the descendants of the illustrious Prince and his new-born heir. 'Et nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis!'" Turning to the policy pursued by the Government, the language used by the noble Earl was the reverse of complimentary:—"The foreign policy of the noble Earl (Russell), as far as the principle of non-intervention is concerned, may be summed up in two truly expressive words—'meddle' and 'muddle.' During the whole course of his diplomatic correspondence, wherever he has interfered—and he has interfered everywhere—he has been lecturing, scolding, blustering, and—retreating. Seriously—for, though there may be something ludicrous about it, the matter is of too great importance to be treated only in a light and jocular manner—I cannot but feel as an Englishman that I am lowered and humiliated in my own estimation, and in that of other nations, by the result of the noble Earl's administration of foreign affairs. Thanks to the noble Earl and the present Government, we have at this moment not one single friend in Europe: and, more than that, this country, the chief fault of which was, that it went too direct and straightforward at what it aimed; which never gave a promise without the intention of performing; which never threatened without a full determination of striking; which never made a demand without being prepared to enforce it,—this country is now in such a position, that its menaces are disregarded, its magniloquent language is ridiculed, and its remonstrances are treated with contemptuous indifference, by the small as well as by the great Powers of the Continent." Earl Russell defended the policy of the Government. In the House of Commons the most important speeches were delivered by Mr. Disraeli on the one side, and Lord Palmerston on the other. Eventually, in both Houses, the Address was agreed to without a division.

6.—The Danes retreat from the Dannewerke, leaving behind them the whole of the heavy artillery by which the forts were defended.

8.—The Lord Chancellor (Lord Westbury) delivers the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the "Essays and Reviews" case of Rowland Williams v. the Bishop of Salisbury; and Wilson v. Fendall. All the charges against Dr. Williams were rejected by the Judge in the Archdeaconry Court, except those contained in the 7th and 15th articles. The 7th article as reformed sets forth certain passages, wherein it was alleged that Dr. Williams had advisedly maintained and affirmed that the Bible or Holy Scripture is an expression of devout reason, and the written voice of the congregation—not the Word of God, nor containing any special revelation of His truth, or of His dealings with mankind, nor of the rule of our faith. An opinion was now pronounced that the words "an expression of devout reason, and therefore to be read with reason in freedom," ought not to be taken in the sense ascribed to them by the accusation. It was deemed unnecessary to put any interpretation on the words "written voice of the congregation," inasmuch as they were satisfied that, whatever might be the meaning of the passage included in the article, they did not, taken collectively, warrant the charge which has been made, that Dr. Williams has maintained the Bible not to be the Word of God, nor the rule of faith. The 15th article of charge was part of a supposed defence of Baron Bunsen against the accusation of not being a Christian, which was alleged to transgress the 11th Article (of the Thirty-nine Articles): "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith, and not of our own works or deservings." It is fair (said the Lord Chancellor) to Dr. Williams to observe, that in the argument at the bar he repudiated the interpretation which had been put upon these words, that the doctrine of merit by transfer is a fiction, and he explained "fiction" as intended by him to describe the phantasm in the mind of an individual that he has received or enjoyed merit by transfer. "Upon the whole," he concluded, "we cannot accept the interpretation charged by the promoter as the true meaning of the passage included in the fifteenth article of charge, which in effect is that Dr. Williams asserts that justification by faith means only the peace of mind or sense of Divine approval which comes of trust in a righteous God. This is not the assertion of Dr. Williams. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the judgment against him of one year's suspension must be reversed. The charges against Mr. Wilson must be reduced to the 8th and 14th. In the one Mr. Wilson was alleged to affirm that the Scriptures were not written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and that they were not necessarily at all, certainly not in part, the Word of God. The caution of the framers of our Articles forbids our treating their language as implying more than is expressed; nor are we warranted in ascribing to them conclusions expressed in new forms of words, involving minute and subtle matters of controversy. After an anxious consideration of the subject, we find ourselves unable to say that the passage extracted from Mr. Wilson's Essays, and which forms the subject of this article of charge, is contradicted by, or plainly inconsistent with, the Articles or Formularies to which the charge refers, and which alone we are at liberty to consider. The 14th article alleged that Mr. Wilson had advisedly declared and affirmed in effect, that after this life, and at the end of the existing order of things on this earth, there will be no judgment of God awarding to those men, when He shall appear, everlasting life or eternal happiness; but with respect to a judgment of eternal misery a hope is encouraged by Mr. Wilson, that this may not be the purpose of God." On this point the Lord Chancellor said, "We are not required or at liberty to express any opinion upon the mysterious question of the eternity of final punishment, further than to say that we do not find in the Formularies to which this article refers any such distinct declaration of our Church upon the subject, as to require us to condemn as penal the expression of a hope by a clergyman that even the ultimate pardon of the wicked who are condemned in the day of judgment may be consistent with the will of Almighty God. Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend to her Majesty that the sentence be reversed, and the reformed articles rejected in like manner as the rest of the original articles were rejected by the court below—namely, without costs; but inasmuch as the appellants have been obliged to come to this court, their Lordships think it right that they should have the costs of this appeal." The Archbishops of Canterbury and York did not concur in the judgment, so far as it related to the 7th article against Dr. Williams, and the 8th against Mr. Wilson. Pastoral letters were afterwards issued by both prelates.

8.—In answer to Lord Robert Cecil, Lord Palmerston announces that our Government had remonstrated with Prussia and Austria on their proceedings in Holstein and Schleswig in regard to the Duke of Augustenburg, which were inconsistent with the good faith by which, under the Treaty of 1852, they were bound to maintain the integrity of Denmark.

—Sir George Grey obtains leave to introduce a bill making further provision for the confinement and maintenance of insane prisoners, rendered necessary in consequence of Townley and others having escaped under the operation of the present law.

9.—Letters patent passed under the Great Seal appointing a Commission to consider and revise the various forms of subscription and declaration required to be made by the clergy of the United Church of England and Ireland, and to report their opinion how far they may be altered and simplified, consistently with due security for the declared agreement of the clergy with the doctrine of the Church and conformity to its ritual. Report completed 9th February, 1865.

10.—The Austrians and Prussians occupy North Schleswig.

— Debate in the House of Commons on the recent operations against Japan. Mr. Buxton submitted a resolution:—"That this House, while only imputing to Admiral Kuper a misconception of the duty imposed on him, deeply regret the burning of the town of Kagosima on purpose, as being contrary to those usages of war which prevail among civilized nations, and to which it is the duty and the policy of this country to adhere." Defeated by 164 to 85.

— Debate in the House of Lords on the seizure of the steam-ram at Birkenhead, Opposition speakers alleging that the Government had been coerced by threatening letters from the American Foreign Secretary.

— Accident on the Gothland incline of the Maltby and Whitby railway, caused by the breaking of the wire rope to which the train was attached. Shooting round a curve across the Elderbeck with extreme velocity, the train left the rails and the foremost carriages rolled into a ditch. Two passengers were killed and fourteen injured.

11.—The fine old Elizabethan structure of Hillfield Hall, Warwick, destroyed by fire.

— A subtle discussion was this day engaged in before the Court of Queen's Bench relating to the meaning of the word "team." A lessee of the Duke of Marlborough was required by the terms of his lease, "to perform each year one day's team work, with two horses and one proper person, when required." The tenant refused to send a cart to carry coals, although he offered to send horses and man; an issue was therefore joined. The case was tried in the first instance at the Oxford Assizes, and a verdict found for the Duke; but the point was reserved and came on for decision before the judges now sitting in banco. The question was argued very ingeniously by counsel on both sides, and illustrated by quotations from various sources. On behalf of the Duke a passage in Cæsar "de Bell. Gall." iv. 33, was quoted concerning the ancient Britons leaping from the war-chariots—percurrere per temorem. As the "team" here mentioned was held to signify the beam or pole to which the horses were harnessed, the quotation, it was answered, proved that the team meant the carriage without the horses. On the same side the line in Gray's "Elegy,"—"How jocund did they drive their team a-field,"—was held to imply both horses and cart. On the part of the defendant the illustrations were more numerous and pertinent, ranging from Spenser's ploughman guiding his "toilsome team," to Dryden's "long team of snowy swans on high." Ultimately this reasoning prevailed, and the Court decided by a majority, Mr. Justice Mellor dissenting, that the tenant had performed his contract in tendering horses and man without the cart.

12.—In consequence of an attack made upon the Fantees by the King of Ashantee to retake certain slaves, Governor Pim, the British resident at Cape Coast, orders a force to proceed against him. The expedition was smitten with pestilence and returned unsuccessful and dispirited.

— Concluded at Edinburgh the case of Angus Mackintosh, of Holme, Inverness, against Dr. John Smith and Dr. Lowe, being a claim for damages of 5,000*l.* for illegal detention in Saughton Hall Asylum during the summer of 1852. The pursuer had raised various actions in the interim against parties concerned in his apprehension and detention, but never succeeded in getting a verdict in his favour. After a seven days' trial the jury, by a majority of three-fourths, again returned a verdict in favour of the defendants.

14.—Died in his 58th year, William Dyce, Esq., R. A.

— Found dead, from drink and destitution in the streets of Douglas, Isle of Man, the Hon. Jane Yelverton, sister-in-law to Lord Avonmore—locally known as "Jenny Keefe."

— Tried at the Central Criminal Court, before Mr. Baron Bramwell, John Lyons, Francisco Blanco, Ambrosio or Mauricio Duranno, Basilio de los Santos Marsolino, and Miguel Lopez, Spaniards; George Carlos, Greek; and Marcus Vartos (or Watto), a Turkish subject, all charged with murder on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, on the 10th September, 1863. The prisoners were all seamen on board the English ship Flowery Land, and they were indicted for the murder of the captain, though the mate, the captain's brother, the steward, and several others on board had also been barbarously slaughtered. The Flowery Land left the port of London on the 28th July, 1863, for Singapore, with a cargo consisting of wine and other commodities, and twenty persons on board—a crew of nineteen and one passenger. From time to time the crew showed symptoms of insubordination, but they were kept in check by punishment till about three o'clock on the morning referred to. This was the mate's watch on deck, when the captain was below, and could not therefore be communicated with. The captain's brother and the second mate, Tiffin, were also below at the time.

They slept in a cabin, and certain of the crew in a house on deck. An attack was made almost simultaneously on the captain and mate. The latter, who appeared to have been taken unawares, was struck down on the deck with handspikes. He cried for mercy, but his assailants belaboured him with their weapons about the head and face until every feature was obliterated, and he was then thrown, shrieking for pity, into the sea. The captain, possibly alarmed by the noise, appeared to have left his sleeping berth in the cabin and to have got as far as the companion, where the mutineers despatched him with daggers. The captain's brother appeared to have been trying to escape by the companion ladder, but was attacked and beaten about the head until he died. Nothing more was seen of him, and it was presumed the body was thrown into the sea. They proceeded next to put a rope round the dead body of the captain, for the purpose of throwing it overboard, but the second mate, Tiffin, interposed, and asked to be allowed to sew it up in canvas. Permission was granted, and after the last offices had been thus performed, the body was thrown into the sea. They afterwards proceeded to gather together the plunder on board and divide it among themselves. As the second mate was the only survivor who knew anything about navigation, he was instructed by Lyons, who could speak English fairly, to run the ship to the coast of Brazil. This was done after many murderous onslaughts among the mutineers. When within ten miles of land the ship was scuttled, and, with the exception of the cook and steward, who were beaten to death with champagne bottles while struggling in the water, the whole of the survivors took to the small boats with what provisions they could stow into them. When land was reached, Tiffin managed to separate himself from his companions, and gave information which led to the arrest of the prisoners. The facts mentioned above were now established in evidence by the second mate and others of the crew who had seen the outrages committed. Seven of the prisoners were found guilty of murder, and sentenced to death. Carlos, tried a second time for scuttling the ship, was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

16.—The Commissioners appointed in July 1861, to inquire into the working of the Public Schools, present their Report. They had held 127 meetings and examined 130 witnesses, chiefly governors, masters, and past and present scholars of various standing. The nine schools, to which special attention was directed, were in some sense representative institutions—Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, being attached to ecclesiastical corporations; St. Paul's and Merchant Taylors', to City Companies; Shrewsbury, to the municipal corporation of the place; and Harrow and Rugby as managed by trustees. The general conclusions come to were that "their course of study is sound and valuable in its main element, but wanting in breadth and flexibility—defects which destroy in many cases, and impair in all, its value as an education of the mind. In their organization and teaching, regarded not as to its range, but as to its force and efficiency, we have been unable to resist the conclusion that these schools, in very different degrees, are too indulgent to idleness, or struggle ineffectually with it; and that they consequently send out a large proportion of men of idle habits, and empty and uncultivated minds. In their discipline and moral training we have been able to speak of them in terms of high praise."

17.—The second reading of Mr. Laird's Chain, Cable, and Anchor (Testing) Bill, carried in the House of Commons without a division.

18.—In the action of Vyse v. Lewis, being a claim made by Madame Bonaparte Vyse, cousin to the Emperor of the French, against William Lewis, of the firm of Lewis and Home, solicitors, for neglecting to pay certain claims which she alleged she had authorized him to discharge, and which led to her being taken into custody for a short time on her arrival in Dublin, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—400*l.* on the special count, and 150*l.* on the money count.

— The Danes quit Schleswig, and afterwards declare both duchies in a state of blockade.

19.—Penggern Hall, Wales, the seat of the Mostyn family, destroyed by fire.

22.—Five of the seven pirates convicted of the murder of the captain of the Flowery Land executed in front of Newgate, in presence of an immense gathering of people. The sentence upon the other two was commuted to transportation for life.

— Mr. Gifford Palgrave attends at the Geographical Society meeting, and gives an account of his travels in Central and Eastern Arabia,—“telling his tale,” as a critic remarked, “more as Herodotus would have recited an Olympiad than like a commonplace voyager of the nineteenth century.”

23.—Indignation meeting in Dublin to protest against the erection of a monument to Prince Albert in the city. The interior of the Rotunda was during the whole evening a scene of the wildest disorder, the seats and tables being torn up for weapons by the excited belligerents. The Sullivan or “National” party were ultimately ejected by their “Fenian” adversaries, who now appeared for the first time in force in Ireland.

— Denmark opposes the proposal of England to submit the disputed question of the succession to a Conference of the Powers concerned in the Treaty of 1852.

24.—Subscription commenced in London in aid of the wounded Danes.

25.—The English Government decline to assist Denmark with material aid in the contest with Austria and Prussia.

25.—The four Italians charged with conspiring to assassinate the Emperor of the French, found guilty and sentenced—Greco and Trabuco to transportation for life; Imperatori and Scaglioni to twenty years' imprisonment. Greco admitted that the proposal to assassinate the Emperor came from Mazzini, who furnished the money, bombs, and weapons.

March 1.—The Federals, under General Kilpatrick, attack Richmond, but are driven back with great loss.

3.—The Marquis of Hartington moves the Army Estimates, which he said were 14,844,888*l.* being a decrease of 215,349*l.* The number of men was 146,766.

10.—The infant son of the Prince and Princess of Wales christened in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Archbishop of Canterbury administered the rite, the Queen naming the young Prince, Albert Victor Christian Edward. A select company of Church dignitaries and State officers were present.

11.—Disastrous inundation at Sheffield, caused by the bursting of the Bradfield reservoir, eight miles above the town. Early in the evening the reservoir gave indications of its inability to resist the heavy pressure consequent upon the recent floods, and the inhabitants in the hamlets immediately adjoining were somewhat prepared for the calamity; but lower down the valley no warning was given, and when the great dam burst at midnight the pent-up flood rushed down the course of the stream dealing death and destruction on every hand. Entire villages were suddenly swept away; huge manufactories, mills, and warehouses were all engulfed in the roaring current, and for a wide distance on either side tracks of desolate ruins marked the site of prosperous farms, steadings, and stores, of agricultural produce. Nothing could be saved from the swift fury of the flood. Tearing down the course of the river at an immense speed, the inundation swept through Sheffield a few minutes past twelve o'clock, with a roar which startled the entire town. Shooting along the discoloured waters were the wrecks of villages above, while piled up against the piers of Lady's-bridge, as high as the stone wall of the parapet, were rafters, flooring, roofing, and an immense collection of miscellaneous articles, carried down in quantities sufficient to block up the archway. Persons who were in the streets when the flood broke out said that in the stillness of the night there was suddenly a long, loud, and terrible roar which increased in its intensity; and, as they stood listening and wonder-stricken, there came, sounding above the roar, a sudden hissing noise, as of water dashing on a rock; this was quickly followed by piercing shrieks, first distant, then increasing, till up the streets, in every direction away from the flow of the river, ran hundreds of persons in their night-dresses, some dragging little children by the hand, others half-dressed, tripping and falling, while from many went up the wild shrieking exclamation—"O God! the flood, the flood!" The loss of life was appalling—as many as 270 being probably swept into the current. They were found, on the subsidence of the waters, in every variety of age and condition—children drowned unconsciously beside their sleeping mothers, and strong men clutching at the wreck which the fury of the waters had drawn around them. Others appeared to have made a hurried escape from their homes but to have been encompassed by the waters in the confusion and darkness of the night. While the loss of life in the lower parts of Sheffield was considerable, it was still more serious further up the valleys, there being at Malin's-bridge neither a living person nor the vestige of a house to be seen. A large number of dead bodies were also found at Rotherham, and along the valleys of the Loxeley and Rivelin. A lengthened inquiry took place as to the cause of the calamity, from which it appeared that the work had been originally constructed in a defective manner, and was inattentively looked after. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that, in their opinion, there had not been that engineering skill and attention in the construction of the works which their magnitude and importance demanded; and further, they were of opinion that the Legislature ought to take such action as would result in a Government inspection of all works of this character, and that such inspection should be frequent, regular, and sufficient. A subscription, headed by the Queen, was started for the relief of the sufferers, and during the parliamentary session an Act was passed appointing Commissioners to ascertain the claims for compensation against the Sheffield Water-works Company by persons whose property had been injured or destroyed by the inundation.

16.—An address, purporting to be signed by 137,000 members of the Church of England, presented in Lambeth Palace to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, thanking them for their late pastoral letters, and praying that they might "be enabled, with the other Bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland, to take effectual counsel for upholding, amid the peculiar dangers of the present times, the Divine authority of Holy Scriptures, and the integrity of the faith, so that the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour may be taught in all its purity among ourselves, and handed over without diminution or addition to our children's children." The Primate replied:—"I accept with cordial satisfaction the expression of your gratitude for the pastoral letter which I recently addressed to the clergy and laity of my province, under circumstances of no ordinary gravity. Articles of belief which had ever been held by the Church Catholic, and by all its several branches, seemed to be impugned, and deep anxiety pervaded the minds of a large proportion of the members of our Church. I thus felt myself called upon to give my reasons for having dissented from the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The principle on which I proceeded is the very principle laid down and recognised by that judgment itself—namely, that any rule or teaching is to be ascribed to the Church, only as we find it to be expressly or distinctly stated in her Articles or Formularies, or which are plainly to be involved in, or to be collected from, that which is written. The doctrines in question seemed to me to be so 'plainly involved in, and to be collected from' the Articles and Formularies of our Church, that I had no alternative but to dissent from a judgment that pronounced the contrary. And it is most gratifying to me to find that the course I then pursued is so consonant with the views and feelings of that large and important body of Churchmen whom you represent, and that there is so resolute a determination on their part to maintain and uphold the cardinal doctrines of our Church."

16.—Mr. Dodson, in moving the second reading of the Tests Abolition (Oxford) Bill, explained that its object was, by abolishing the test, to open degrees to persons of any religious sect. Sir W. Heathcote and Mr. Selwyn opposed the measure as separating the University from the Church, but the second reading was carried by 211 to 189.

17.—Discussion in the House of Commons concerning Mr. Stansfeld, member for Halifax. At the trial in Paris of Greco and others for conspiring to assassinate the Emperor of the French, it was stated by the Procureur-Imperial in his speech, that a paper had been found in the possession of one of the accused persons, directing him to write for money to Mr. Flowers, at 35, Thurlow-square, Brompton, "where," the Procureur added, "a member of the English Parliament resided, who, in 1855, had been appointed banker to the Tibaldi conspirators." Mr. Cox, member for Finsbury, first referred to the matter incidentally, when Mr. Stansfeld indignantly repudiated the statement made by the Procureur-Imperial. It was quite true that he lived at No. 35, Thurlow-square, Brompton, but he knew nothing whatever of the prisoner Greco, or of Mr. Flowers, whose letters were addressed to his house. He had, however, been on intimate terms with M. Mazzini for the past eighteen years, and he was persuaded that no man had ever been more cruelly or wrongfully maligned than he was. To-night, on going into Committee of Supply, Sir Henry Stracey moved as an amendment, "That the speech of the Procureur-Imperial on the trial of Greco, implicating a member of this House and of her Majesty's Government, in the plot for the assassination of our ally, the Emperor of the French, deserves the serious consideration of this House." After a debate, in the course of which Lord Palmerston said he thought the explanation of Mr. Stansfeld perfectly satisfactory, the amendment was negatived by 171 to 161. The subject was revived the following night by Lord Elcho; and, as it appeared that a series of premeditated attacks was designed against the member for Halifax, he placed his resignation of the office of Junior Lord of the Admiralty in the hands of the Prime Minister. After some hesitation and delay the resignation was accepted.

22.—In closing the Danish Rigsraad, the King said:—"We are still alone, and do not know how long Europe will look with indifference upon the acts of violence perpetrated against us. We are ready to do everything that may serve to obtain peace; but the enemy must know that the period is still distant when we shall be compelled to submit to a humiliating peace. This is the King's farewell to you."

27.—In order to promote the establishment of Industrial Exhibitions, the Royal assent is given to a measure modifying that portion of the Patent-laws which refused protection to inventions exhibited before being protected, in so far as articles displayed at these working-class exhibitions were concerned. Successful exhibitions were afterwards organized for West London (Floral Hall), North London (Agricultural Hall), Bristol, Preston, Glasgow, and Leeds.

30.—Reappearance of the Queen in public for the first time after her great bereavement, the occasion being a flower-show at the Horticultural Gardens, Kensington.

April 1.—Report presented to Congress, showing that the war had raised the expenditure of the United States from 15,905,975*l.* in 1860, to 17,367,317*l.* in 1861, to 117,215,954*l.* in 1862, and to 183,941,813*l.* in 1863. The numbers of men called into military service on the Federal side since the commencement of the war were—under the President's first call, April 19, 1861, 77,875; Volunteers for the war, 1861, 660,971; call of July 1, 1862, 300,000; Militia, August 1862, 300,000; Militia, June 1863, 120,000; Conscription, July 1863, 250,000; since 17th October, 1863, 700,000—total 2,480,846.

2.—Died, aged 64, Mr. T. P. Cooke, actor.

3.—General Garibaldi arrives in England. He reached Southampton this (Sunday) afternoon, on board the Ripon, and was received by the Mayor, whose guest he remained till next day, when he proceeded with his friend, Mr. Seeley, M.P., to the Isle of Wight. The welcome given to the great Italian deliverer was of the most exciting and enthusiastic description; ladies and gentlemen of the most elevated station struggling with the mob in the streets to press his hand or catch a glimpse of his countenance. In London, which was reached on the 11th, Garibaldi's entry partook of the character of a Royal progress, work being in a great measure suspended in the metropolis, and deputations and societies of all kinds following in his train. The route was crowded with a dense mass of spectators, who cheered with an excitement almost delirious at the sight of their favourite hero. It was nearly four hours before the carriage of the Duke of Sutherland, in which he was seated, could make its way from Nine Elms to Stafford House, where he resided during his stay in London. For ten days the excitement was kept up at an extreme pitch by a succession of fêtes, visits, and welcomes—the most important probably being the great demonstration at the Crystal Palace on the 16th, where he received an address from the London Italian Committee, and spoke to an audience computed at between 20,000 and 30,000 in number. A grand concert was given here in his honour, and the enthusiasm of the immense company increased to an almost uncontrollable point by the singing of the "Garibaldi Hymn" and the "National Anthem." On being presented with a sword from the Italians in London, the General said:—"I thank you, Italians, for this beautiful present. I promise you I will never unsheath it in the cause of tyrants, and I will draw it only in support of oppressed nationalities. I hope yet to carry it with me to Rome and Venice." Addresses and presentations were also given to him from the City of London and many other municipalities throughout the kingdom who solicited the honour of a visit. To the disappointment of many, Garibaldi left London for Italy, somewhat unexpectedly, on the 22d. In a parting address he said:—"I came here with the primary object of thanking the English nation for their sympathy for me and for my country, and this my first object is accomplished. . . . If I have caused some trouble and disappointment to many friends, I ask their pardon; but I cannot draw the line between where I could and where I could not go, and therefore, for the present, these are my thanks and my farewell." A visit to Cliefden Park (the Dowager Duchess of Sutherland's) for two days, and to Penquite (Colonel Peard's), completed his stay in England. He was conveyed to Caprera in the Duke of Sutherland's yacht, accompanied by his noble host and a few members of his family.

5.—With a view of counteracting Imperial designs in Mexico, the Washington House of Representatives unanimously resolve that "the people of the United States will never recognise a monarchical government which has been established in America on the ruins of a Republican government, and under the auspices of a European power." Five days afterwards the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian of Austria received a Mexican deputation, at Miramar, and consented to accept the Imperial dignity, under the title of "Maximilian the First, Emperor of Mexico."

7.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces his annual financial statement. As indicating the increasing extent of our trade, he stated that our gross exports and imports now amounted to 444,000,000*l.*, being about three times the value at which they stood in 1842, when Parliament first began to set itself deliberately to the task of revising our commercial legislation, and representing as nearly as possible 1,500,000*l.* for every working day in the year—a magnitude of industry, or of operations connected with industry, so vast that, if it did not stand upon incontrovertible figures, it could hardly receive belief. He estimated the total amount of the expenditure for the year at 66,890,000*l.*, and of the revenue at 69,460,000*l.* With the surplus of 2,570,000*l.* he proposed to reduce the Income-tax by one penny per pound, and to lower the fire-insurance duty from 3*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* so far as stock in trade was concerned. The entire relief from taxation he estimated at 3,000,000*l.* The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed himself as opposed to repeal or even reduction of the duties on malt, which was now being advocated by professed friends of the agricultural interest. At a later period of the session he introduced a measure conceding to some extent the demands of the Anti-malt-tax party, in the form of a bill authorizing the remission of so much of the duty as had hitherto been levied upon malt for the consumption of cattle.

9.—In the course of the debate on the policy of the Government on the Schleswig-Holstein dispute, Earl Russell defended the course he had taken in urging Denmark to fulfil the engagements it had made to Germany, and asserted that it would have been most unwise for England to enter into hostilities against Germany without the aid of France, Russia, and Sweden. They were equally parties to the Treaty; and England was not bound to act alone.

12.—By a majority of 101 to 93, Lord Robert Cecil carries the following resolution censuring by implication the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education for tampering with the Reports of Inspectors:—"That in the opinion of this House the mutilation of the Report of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the Committee of Council, while matters favourable to them are admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of Inspectors was originally sanctioned by Parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their Reports." Mr. Lowe thereupon resigned the office of Vice-President, and obtained the appointment of a committee, which entirely exonerated him, and led to the above resolution being rescinded.

— Capture of Fort Pillow, Kentucky, by General Forrest, who massacres the greater portion of the Federal garrison.

13.—In explanation of his opposition to Mr. Locke King's County Franchise Bill, Lord Palmerston said: "I hardly think it was expedient for my hon. friend to bring forward his bill at the present juncture, for it is plain that there does not now exist the same anxiety for organic change which was observable some time ago. The fact is, that organic changes were introduced more as a means than as an end, the end being great improvement in the whole of our commercial legislation. All such changes as were desirable have long since been effected, as the result of our organic reforms; and therefore, there is so much less desire for further innovations. There are also considerations connected with external affairs, tending to abate our anxieties for organic changes. The wants which are taking place in other countries, and which are in a great measure the result of their constitutional systems, have made the people of this country much less anxious for change." The bill was thrown out on the second reading, by 254 to 227 votes.

14.—Spain seizes the Chincha Islands from the Peruvian Government, and declares its intention of retaining them till reparation was made for outrages committed by Peruvian subjects in the Basque colony of Talamon. The guano of the island had previously been pledged as security for the Peruvian public debt.

18.—The fortress of Düppel, besieged by the Prussians since the 15th March, surrenders. Three days afterwards the King of Prussia visited the theatre of war, when he found that the main body of the Danish garrison had retired into Jutland.

22.—In the House of Lords, Earl Derby submits a resolution: "That in every Metropolitan railway a provision should be made for cheap trains morning and evening, for the labouring classes, who are experiencing increased difficulties from the destruction of dwellings suited to their means, by the extension of railways into the heart of the town." The resolution was accepted by the Government after a debate.

23.—The three hundredth anniversary of Shakspeare's birthday celebrated with rejoicings in various cities of the kingdom, but pre-eminently at the poet's birth-place, Stratford-on-Avon. Here were several interesting exhibitions of Shaksperian relics; and in the Town Hall the Mayor (Flower) received an address from the Free German Institute of Arts and Sciences at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, presented by Professor Max Müller, of Oxford. In the afternoon a banquet was held in the pavilion, which had been fitted up to combine the different purposes of a dining-room, theatre, and ball-room. The chair was occupied by the Earl of Carlisle, who touched in his happiest manner upon the peculiarities of Shakspeare's genius. "Presumptuous," he said, "as the endeavour may appear to classify, there would seem to be a few great tragedies which occupy summits of their own. 'Macbeth,' 'Hamlet,' 'Lear,' 'Othello,' I feel we may take our stand within that unassailable quadrilateral, and give our challenge to all the world. I feel indeed tempted to upbraid myself when I think of all the outlying realms of strength and comeliness which I thus seem to leave outside; the stately forms of Roman heroes, the chivalry marshalled around our Plantagenet kings, the wit of Mercurio, Beatrice, and Falstaff—the maiden grace of Imogen and Miranda; Ariel the dainty sprite, Oberon and his elfin Court; the memories which people the glades of Ardennes, the Rialto of Venice, the Garden of Verona, giving to each glorious scene and sunny shore a stronger lien upon our associations than is possessed even by our own native land. It is time that I should call upon you, in the right of all the recollections which must throng in your own breasts far more copiously and vividly than I could hope to present them to you—by the thrill you have felt in the crowded theatres amid all the splendours of dramatic pageantry—by the calmer enjoyment of your closet leisure—by the rising of your soul when the lines which breathe and warm have led you to recognise and adore the Giver of such gifts to men—to join me in drinking, not with the solemn silence which a more recent death might have enjoined, but with the reverential love and the admiring fervour due to the day and the man—the memory of Shakspeare!" The other entertainments at Stratford comprised dramatic entertainments, a concert, and excursion to places of Shaksperian interest. Two sermons were also preached in connexion with the commemoration by the Archbishop of Dublin and the Bishop of St. Andrew's. Other celebrations took place in London—where a tree was planted on Primrose-hill—at the Crystal Palace, Agricultural Hall, and in some of the large towns throughout the kingdom; but it was generally thought that the result accomplished was less than the preparatory arrangements suggested.

25.—First sitting of the Conference of London, and a suspension of hostilities in the Duchies proposed by Earl Russell.

26.—Sir Thomas Fitzgerald commits suicide by throwing himself into the Suir, near his residence of Golden Hill, while in a state of great mental depression arising from pecuniary difficulties. He despatched notes to two friends, intimating his intention, and describing the place where his body would be found. The peasantry resisted the burial of the body in the churchyard, and it could only be carried out after some delay in presence of a strong body of constabulary.

May 3.—John Devine executed in front of Newgate, for murdering his master Joseph Derck, Marylebone, by beating him on the head near his own residence in Chesterfield-street. Devine had at the same time robbed his victim of two sovereigns and a peculiar old-fashioned watch, which were clearly traced to his possession on the night of the murder. He confessed the crime immediately before execution.

3.—Generals Lee and Longstreet, having united their forces, quit their entrenchments at Mine Run, and march towards Fredericksburg. Two days afterwards they encountered General Grant at Wilderness, where a severe engagement took place, but without any decisive result. Victory was claimed by both combatants. Lee retired upon Spottsylvania, where he was again encountered by Grant on the 10th, and a series of desperate encounters took place between the armies. A Federal general writing to Washington says, "Everybody is fighting, and has been for eight days." The Federal loss was stated to be 40,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. General Lee made good the position he had taken up.

6.—Intimation given in both Houses of Parliament that an agreement had been come to in the Conference between the Danish and German representatives that there should be a suspension of hostilities for one month from the 12th instant. This was further extended during the proceedings of the Conference in London.

11.—In the discussion on Mr. Baines' Bill for lowering the borough franchise, the Chancellor of the Exchequer alarmed his colleagues by a declaration in favour of a very wide extension. "We are told," he said, "that the working classes do not agitate; but is it desirable that we should wait till they do agitate? In my opinion, agitation by the working classes upon any political subject whatever, is a thing not to be waited for, not to be made a condition previous to any parliamentary movement, but on the contrary is to be deprecated, and, if possible, prevented by wise and provident measures. An agitation by the working classes is not like an agitation by the classes above them having leisure. The agitation of the classes having leisure is easily conducted. Every hour of their time has not a money value; their wives and children are not dependent on the application of those hours of labour. But when a working-man finds himself in such a condition that he must abandon that daily labour on which he is strictly dependent for his daily bread, it is only because then, in railway language, the danger signal is turned on, and because he feels a strong necessity for action, and a distrust in the rulers who have driven him to that necessity. The present state of things, I rejoice to say, does not indicate that distrust; but if we admit that, we must not allege the absence of agitation on the part of the working classes as a reason why the Parliament of England, and the public mind of England, should be indisposed to entertain the discussion of this question." Mr. Baines' motion was defeated by 272 against 216.

15.—After reviewing the events which had happened in the Duchies, Herr von Bismarck writes:—"The Government of the King cannot consider itself in any way longer bound by the obligations it contracted on the 8th of May,

1852, under other circumstances. Prussia concluded this treaty with Denmark and not with the other Powers; the ratifications were only exchanged between Copenhagen and Berlin, not between Berlin and London or St. Petersburg. Even if—which we do not admit—the London Treaty had been intended to create obligations between us and the neutral Powers, these would become void, together with the treaty, as soon as the latter lapsed through non-fulfilment of its preliminary conditions."

15.—Mr. Moens, a British subject, seized by Italian brigands and only released, after a confinement of over three months, by payment of a ransom of 5,000*l.*

16.—In the French Corps Legislatif M. Laboule proposes to refund to the family of M. Lesurques, who was wrongfully executed in 1796 for the robbery of the Lyons mail, the sum of 54,585*fr.* 75*c.* which had been taken from him as the proceeds of the supposed robbery. The vote was carried by a majority of one, but afterwards cancelled.

18.—The seventy-first anniversary of the Royal Literary Fund celebrated by a banquet in St. James's Hall, presided over by the Prince of Wales. The meeting was, in a pecuniary point of view, the most successful ever held; 2,000*l.* having been collected, including 100 guineas from the Queen, and a similar amount from the Prince of Wales.

19.—Died, aged 59, Nathaniel Hawthorne, American novelist.

20.—Died in the Lunatic Asylum, Northampton, aged 71, John Clare, the "Northampton poet."

22.—Died, aged 70, Marshal Pélissier, Duke of Malakoff, and Governor-General of Algeria.

24.—The anniversary of the Queen's birthday celebrated with the customary rejoicings, for the first time since the death of the Prince Consort.

25.—Epsom races; the Derby won by Blair Athol. On the 27th, the Oaks by Fille de l'Air.

27.—The tercentenary of the death of Calvin celebrated in Edinburgh.

28.—Volunteer review in Hyde-park; 21,743 men under arms.

—The Emperor Maximilian and Empress land at Vera Cruz. A proclamation was at once issued:—"With the blessing of God, progress and liberty will not fail us if all parties, guided by a strong and loyal government, and preserving that religious sentiment which has distinguished our country from the most remote periods, unite to obtain the ends I have pointed out. The civilizing flag of France to which you are indebted for the return of peace and order, represents the same principles. It is what was told you some months back in sincere and disinterested language by the Commander-in-Chief when he announced to you a new era of prosperity. . . . Mexicans!

the future of our fine country depends upon you. I shall ever be actuated by the purest intentions and a firm determination to respect your laws and make them respected. . . . To the Empress is confided the enviable task of consecrating to the country all the noble sentiments of a Christian and all the affection of a tender mother."

28.—In the London Conference, Earl Russell submits the following among other resolutions:—"In order to prevent a future contest and to satisfy Germany, it would be necessary, in our opinion, entirely to separate Holstein, Lauenburg, and the southern part of Schleswig from the Danish monarchy. To justify so vast a sacrifice on the part of Denmark, and to maintain the independence of the Danish monarchy, it is desirable, in our opinion, that the line of the frontier should not be drawn more to the north than the mouth of the Schlei and the line of the Dannewerke." Denmark consented in principle to this proposal, but insisted that she should only be asked to cede Lauenburg on special conditions. Austria and Prussia declined to accede to the proposed boundary line, and adhered to the one first traced by themselves from Apenrade to Tondern.

30.—Marriage of Louis Philippe Albert D'Orléans, Comte de Paris, eldest grandson of King Louis Philippe, with the Princess Marie Isabelle d'Orléans, eldest daughter of the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, solemnized in the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kingston.

31.—Debate on Mr. Cobden's motion asking the House to agree to a resolution declaring that the policy of non-intervention by force of arms in the internal affairs of foreign countries, which we proposed to observe in our relations with the States of Europe and America, should be observed in our intercourse with China. The resolution was ultimately withdrawn.

Settlement of the Hutchinson Will case, affecting the competency of the testator, a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, and a member of the Brompton Oratory, to dispose of his property by will. The plaintiff, the Rev. Thomas Francis Knox, propounded the will and codicil of the Rev. William Hutchinson deceased. The defendants, Dr. Alfred Smee and Mrs. Smee, pleaded that the will was not according to the requirements of the statute; that the testator was of unsound mind, and was unduly influenced by the plaintiff and others. The will was dated 7th July, 1860, and the codicil 7th August, 1860. The testator died on the 12th July, 1863. Alfred Smee, one of the defendants, married Elizabeth, the testator's sister, who was the other defendant. The testator, son of George Hutchinson, a cashier in the Bank of England, was born in 1822, and his sister in 1818. After their father's death, the testator, who inherited considerable property, and his sister, were brought up by William Smee with his own children, and, as already mentioned, Alfred Smee married the testator's sister, who was amply provided for under her father's will. The testator entered Cambridge University in 1843, and in 1845 went to Italy, and made the acquaintance of Dr. Faber, a member of Oxford University. The testator had previously expressed his intention to become a Catholic. This was violently but unsuccessfully opposed by Alfred Smee, who, in a letter dated 17th September, 1845, said such resolution arose not from reason but from a mind diseased, and that he was lending himself to the "mummery" of a relentless body, who would rob him of every farthing. On the 21st of the same month the testator was received into the Roman Catholic Church at Birmingham, and subsequently became a member of the Oratory at Brompton. For three weeks before his death he was under the professional care of the defendant Alfred Smee, medical practitioner. The value of his property at his death did not exceed 5,000*l.* After hearing evidence, the Judge-Ordinary (Wilde) said he thought the testimony in favour of the validity of the will was overwhelming, and condemned Mr. Smee in the costs of the proceedings.

14.—Experiment at Shoeburyness with Captain Palliser's chilled shot. In every case it went through the 4½-inch armour plate, and deep into the backing beyond. Another peculiarity observed was, that after penetrating the plate, the shot broke up into minute fragments of from four to eight ounces weight, so that the projectile carried in itself almost the penetrative powers of steel shot, and the explosive fragments of the most powerful shell.

17.—Sir John Hay's motion censuring Government for the impolitic and disastrous expedition sent out from the Cape Coast against the King of Ashantee, defeated by the narrow majority of 7, in a House of 459.

20.—The Confederate cruiser Alabama sunk by the Federal war-steamer Kearsage off Cherbourg. The Alabama left Cherbourg harbour about ten o'clock this (Sunday) morning, the Kearsage which had long been in hot pursuit being then several miles out to seaward with steam up ready for action. The log of Mr. Lancaster's yacht Deerhound furnishes the following details:—"10.30. Observed the Alabama steaming out of the harbour towards the Federal steamer Kearsage. 11.10. The Alabama commenced firing with her starboard battery, the distance between the contending vessels being about one mile. The Kearsage immediately replied with her starboard guns; a very sharp, spirited firing was then kept up, shot sometimes being varied by shells. In manœuvring, both vessels made seven complete circles at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile. At 12 a slight intermission was observed in the firing, the Alabama making head sail and shaping her course for the land, distant about nine miles. At 12.30 observed the Alabama to be disabled and in a sinking state. We immediately made towards her, and on passing the Kearsage were requested to assist in saving the Alabama's crew. At 12.50, when within a distance of 200 yards, the Alabama sank. We then lowered our two boats, and, with the assistance of the Alabama's whale boat and dingy, succeeded in saving about 40 men, including Capt. Semmes and 13 officers. At 1 P. M. we steered for Southampton." With great bravery Captain Semmes kept the guns ported till the muzzles were actually under water, and the last shot was fired as the Alabama went down. When her stern was completely under water the captain gave orders for the men to save themselves as best they could, and every one jumped into the sea and swam to the boats which put off to their rescue.

21.—"Essays and Reviews" condemned in Convocation:—"That this Synod having appointed Committees of the Upper and Lower House to examine and report upon the volume entitled 'Essays and Reviews,' and the said Committees having severally reported thereon, doth hereby synodically condemn the said volume as containing teachings contrary to the doctrines received by the United Church of England and Ireland, in common with the whole Catholic Church of Christ." When the judgment was brought down to the Lower House, the Archdeacon of Taunton moved:—"That this House respectfully and heartily tender its thanks to his Grace the President and the Bishops of the Upper House for their care and defence of the faith as manifested in the Report upon the book entitled 'Essays and Reviews' now read to the House, and that the House do thankfully accept and concur in the condemnation of the book by the Upper House." Canon Blakesley moved as an amendment:—"That whereas on the 13th of February, 1863, it was referred to the Committee of Privilege to examine the precedents for the censure of books, and report to the House thereon; and whereas that Report has not yet been presented, this House respectfully represents to his Grace the President, that in their opinion no further proceedings can be satisfactorily or safely taken by the Lower House in the matter until they have had before them the Report in question, and have had an opportunity of giving it full consideration." For the motion, 39; amendment, 19. Another amendment proposed by Canon Selwyn was to the effect that:—"This House regrets it cannot concur in the judgment proposed by their Lordships of the Upper House on the book called 'Essays and Reviews,' inasmuch as the judgment does not state any particular proposition contrary to the doctrine of the United Church of England and Ireland, on which the judgment is founded." This was not allowed to be put to the House. A motion that Dr. Rowland Williams, one of the essayists, be heard in terms of his petition, was also negatived.

21.—In the House of Commons, Mr. H. Berkeley moved that at the next general election "it was expedient that a fair trial should be given to the vote by ballot." Lord Palmerston opposed it as inconsistent with the character of Englishmen, and the motion was rejected by 212 to 123 votes.

22.—The Conference of London meets for the last time, the belligerent Powers being unable to agree upon a boundary line satisfactory to each. On behalf of Denmark M. de Quade said that his Government would make great sacrifices in order to obtain the restoration of peace, but there were limits beyond which they would not go, and his instructions forbade him to consent to any other line than that proposed by the English Plenipotentiaries in the sitting of the 28th May, and accepted by Denmark. This declaration ended the debate, and the Conference broke up. Hostilities were resumed in Schleswig next day; but as Denmark saw that the neutral Powers were not likely to aid her in the struggle, she gradually withdrew her armies from the territories in dispute.

24.—The Archbishops of Canterbury, York, (519)

Armagh, and Dublin, issue an address to the Church on the subject of foreign missions:—"We earnestly and affectionately entreat you to make a new and great effort for a large increase of our present missionary funds. . . . We are convinced that in no other way can the work be done than by every parish, or part of its separate parochial existence, raising its own contributions for the work; and we therefore beseech our brethren of the clergy to preach one sermon annually, and make a collection for Church of England Missions; and we pray our brethren of the laity to help them, not only by their contributions to this annual collection, but by becoming regular subscribers, if they are not such at present, or if they are, by increasing on a new scale of Christian liberality their aid to the funds of the societies they support, and by forming themselves into associations for more completely effecting this great work of God."

26.—The Empress of Mexico invested with the dignity of Regent in the event of the death of her husband.

27.—Came on for hearing before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the petition of Bishop Colenso, praying that her Majesty would be pleased to declare the petitioner to be entitled to hold his see until the letters patent granted to him should be cancelled by due process of law for some sufficient cause of forfeiture, and to declare that the letters patent granted to the Bishop of Capetown, in so far as they purported to create a court of criminal justice within the colony, and to give to the Archbishop of Canterbury an appellate jurisdiction, had been unduly obtained from her Majesty, and did not affect the petitioner's rights. The petitioner also prayed that the pretended trial and sentence were void and of no effect, and that an inhibition, as was usual in ecclesiastical cases, should issue against the proceedings under the sentence pending the appeal. The petition was ordered to stand over till the Michaelmas sittings of the Judicial Committee.

July 1.—Mr. Dodson's bill, designed to abolish the tests required on taking degrees at Oxford, read a third time by the casting vote of the Speaker. On the formal motion that the bill do pass, it was thrown out by 173 to 171.

4.—Commencement of Mr. Disraeli's no-confidence motion:—"To thank her Majesty for having directed the correspondence on Denmark and Germany, and the protocol of the Conference recently held in London, to be laid before Parliament; to assure her Majesty that we have heard with deep concern that the sittings of the Conference have been brought to a close without accomplishing the important purpose for which it was convened; and to express to her Majesty our great regret that, while the course pursued by her Majesty's Government has failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the capitals of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace." As an amendment to the last sentence of the resolution, Mr. Kinglake proposed to substitute the words:—"To express the satisfaction with which we have learned that at this conjuncture her Majesty has been advised to abstain from armed interference in the war now going on between Denmark and the German Powers." "It is not for us," said Mr. Disraeli, "it is not for any man in this House to indicate to the Ministers what should be the foreign policy of the country. The most we can do, is to tell the noble lord what is not our policy. We will not threaten and then refuse to act. We will not lead on our allies with expectations we do not intend to fulfil. And, Sir, if it ever be the lot of myself and of those with whom I act, to carry on important negotiations of this country, as the noble lord and his colleagues have done, I trust we shall not, at least, carry them on in such a manner as that it will be our duty to come to Parliament and announce that we have no ally, and then to declare that England can never act alone. Sir, these are words that ought never to have escaped the lips of any British Minister. They are sentiments which ought never to have entered his heart. I repudiate them and reject them. I remember that there was a time when England had not a tithe of our resources, when, inspired by a patriotic cause, she triumphantly encountered a world in arms. And, Sir, I believe, now, if the occasion were fitting, and our independence and our honour were attacked and assailed, if our empire were endangered, I believe that England would arise in the magnificence of her might, and struggle triumphantly for those objects for which men live and nations flourish. But, Sir, I for one will never consent to go to war to extricate British ministers from the consequences of their own indiscretion; and it is in this spirit that I have drawn up this address to the Crown. I have drawn it up in the spirit in which the Royal Speech was delivered at the commencement of this session. I am ready to vindicate the honour of this country when it is necessary, but I have drawn it up in the interests of peace." Mr. Gladstone at once replied:—"This is the very first occasion that the British House of Commons has been called upon, for the sake of displacing a Government, to record the degradation of its country. Why cannot the right hon. gentleman speak plainly in his motion? Why does he not adopt the language of our forefathers, who, when they were dissatisfied with a Government, addressed the Crown, and prayed that the Government might be dismissed? They said boldly that the conduct of the Government was open to such and such charges, and they prayed that other men might be put in their places. But the right hon. gentleman was afraid to raise that issue. He has, indeed, plucked up courage to propose this motion; but why has he not done it in the proper constitutional form in which votes of want of confidence have hitherto been drawn? Never before, as far as I know, has party spirit led gentlemen in this country to frame a motion which places on record that which must be regarded as dishonourable to the nation. I go back to the time of Sir R. Walpole, of Lord North and Mr. Fox, but nowhere do we find such a sterile and jejune affair as this resolution. Those charges were written in legible and plain terms; but the right hon. gentleman substitutes language which might, indeed, be sufficient for the purpose of rendering it impossible for the Government to continue in office, but which cannot transfix them without its sting first passing through the honour of England. For the reasons I have stated, I look forward with cheerfulness to the issue which has been raised with regard to our conduct. Nay, more, I feel the most confident anticipation, that both the House and the country will approve of the course taken in this difficult negotiation by her Majesty's Government, and that they will reject a motion which both prudence and patriotism must alike emphatically condemn." In the course of the last night's debate in the Commons, considerable amusement was created by Mr. Bernal Osborne's brilliant sallies against the Government:—"Let us see how this Ministry is constituted. There is the noble lord the First Minister. I wish to speak of him with every respect, because a more active and able man in the performance of his duty has seldom existed in this House. I may say of him that 'panting time toils after him in vain!' He is certainly facile princeps, and is the liveliest, if not the youngest man on the Treasury Bench. He deserves credit for his admirable management of affairs during a long course of years. He has acted with all sorts of men, and agreed with all sorts of opinions. Why, Sir, he has contrived a most extraordinary feat; he has conciliated both the Low Church and the High Tory party. The Record acknowledges his inspiration, and the hon. member for North Warwickshire bows to his influence. These are great feats. But what is his policy? In his domestic policy he is paternal but stationary. His foreign policy up to this day has been pugnacious and progressive. But now he is about to achieve the most wonderful feat of his life, for he is about to go to the country as the apostle and minister of peace, and will be supported by the member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). That is the most extraordinary feat of the whole. I do not think I have been unfair to the noble lord. Well, coming to the Cabinet, it is a museum of curiosities. There are some birds of rare and noble plumage, both alive and stuffed. But, Sir, unfortunately there is a difficulty in keeping up the breed, and it was found necessary to cross it with the famous Peelites. I will do them the justice to say that they have a very great and able minister amongst them in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it is to his measures alone that they owe the little popularity and the little support they get from this Liberal party. But it cannot be said by their enemies or friends that they have been prolific in measures since they have been in office. Then there is my right hon. friend who is not connected with the Whigs by family (Mr. Gibson). He is like some 'fly in amber,' and the wonder is how the devil he got there. The hon. member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) and the hon. member for Birmingham must have been disappointed, I think, in this 'young man from the country.' When he married into the family we expected some liberal measures from him; but the right hon. gentleman has become insolent and almost quarrelsome under the guidance of the noble lord. Well, what are we to expect? We know by the traditions of the great Whig party that they will cling to the vessel, if not like shipwrecked sailors, at least like those testaceous marine fish which adhere to the bottom, thereby clogging the engines and impeding the progress. Should a vote of this House displace the Administration, what are the Liberal party to do? If I might advise the Liberal party, I should say they may be perfectly happy as to the issue of this great duel. They are somewhat in the position of Iago when he exclaims, 'If Cassio kill Roderigo, or Roderigo kill Cassio, or each do kill the other, every way makes my gain.' Even should this Parliament decide on terminating its own and their existence, they will find consolation that the funeral oration will be pronounced by the hon. member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and that some friendly hand will inscribe on their mausoleum, 'Rest and be thankful.'" Ministers having arranged to accept a division on Mr. Kinglake's amendment, after a discussion extending over three nights, the numbers were found to be:—For Mr. Disraeli's motion, 295; for amendment, 313. Majority for Ministers, 18. A motion, similar in terms to Mr. Disraeli's, was carried in the House of Lords against Ministers by a majority of 9.

7.—The Savoy Chapel destroyed by a fire originating in the carelessness of certain workmen making repairs in the gas-pipes below the organ. The fire was discovered soon after two o'clock P.M., when no person was in the building. The doors at the time were locked, and before they could be got opened the interior was one mass of flame, which burst out of the north window, and caught the back of the houses in the Strand. The structure was erected in 1505, and had been the scene of many events of historical importance. The Queen, who had greatly improved the building, in 1843, now once more took upon herself the cost of restoring the fabric.

8.—Foundation-stone of the Thames Embankment, extending from Westminster-bridge to Blackfriars, laid by Mr. Thwaites, chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

9.—Murder of Mr. Thomas Briggs, on the North London Railway. On the arrival of the 9.45 train at Hackney, from Fenchurch-street, a gentleman called the attention of the guard to the state of a compartment of a first-class carriage, No. 69, in the train. He had opened the door with the intention of getting in, and placing his hand on one of the cushions found it to be covered with blood. On a minute examination being made, not only the cushion, but the floor, side, and windows, were found besmeared with blood. There was found inside the carriage a hat, walking stick, and small leathern bag. Almost at the same moment, the driver and stoker of an engine which had been working the Hackney Wick and Stratford traffic discovered a person on the line, near the Milford Arms Tavern, covered with blood, and the head greatly disfigured as if with blows by some blunt instrument. He was alive at the time, but unconscious, and died soon after being taken into the tavern. From letters found in his pocket he was identified as Thomas Briggs, chief clerk in the bank of Messrs. Roberts and Co., Lombard-street. He was seen by his niece's husband, at Peckham, that evening, about 8.30, getting into an omnibus to take him to Fenchurch-street Station, from which place he purposed proceeding by train to his residence, near Hackney. On minute examination, it was found that there was 4*l.* 10*s.* in gold and silver in a trousers pocket, and a silver snuff-box in his coat. Through Mr. Briggs, jun., the police ascertained that when his father left home in the morning he wore a gold watch, with an Albert chain, and a gold eye-glass attached to a hair guard. On examining the waistcoat, it was seen that a watch had been torn from the waistcoat pocket, and the chain broken off by the link or hook which still hung to the button-hole. The gold glasses were also missing. The stick and bag found in the compartment were identified as belonging to Mr. Briggs. The hat had never been in his possession. The murder remained a mystery, without the least clue to its discovery, for a week, though Government was prompt in offering a reward of 100*l.*, to which another 100*l.* was added by deceased's employers. The first trace was obtained in the discovery of the chain, which was found to have been exchanged for another, at Mr. Death's, Cheapside, by a man having the appearance of a foreigner. On the 18th, a cabman, named Jonathan Matthews, gave important information. He identified the hat as one which he had bought for an acquaintance, named Franz Müller, a native of Cologne, who at one time lodged in his house, and had quite recently, when visiting, given one of his children a card box, used by jewellers, bearing the name of Mr. Death. On the Monday after the murder, when in Matthews' house, this Müller was seen to have a gold chain, and a ring corresponding with that taken from Mr. Briggs. He was then slightly lame, and accounted for it by having sprained his ankle. With the aid of a photograph presented by Müller himself to Matthews' sister, whom he courted, Mr. Death was able to identify him as the person who had exchanged the chain at his shop. On proceeding to his lodgings, at Old Ford, Bow, Müller was not to be found though he had been there about 11 o'clock on the night of the murder, and then appeared very much confused. It was subsequently ascertained from a letter posted at Worthing, on the 16th, that he had sailed in the ship Victoria, for New York. Inspector Tanner thereupon obtained a warrant for Müller's apprehension, and, accompanied by Sergeant Clarke, Mr. Death, and the cabman Matthews, left London for Liverpool to proceed to New York, in the City of Manchester steamer, expected to reach its destination four days before the Victoria.

13.—Came on in the Divorce Court, the case of Hopley v. Hopley, being a petition presented by Mrs. Hopley for separation, on the ground of cruelty, from her husband, formerly schoolmaster at Eastbourne, and now at large on a ticket-of-leave. (See July 23, 1860.) The allegations were of the following tenor:—“On our marriage day I began to write a letter to one of my sisters. He objected to the style in which it was written, and otherwise his conduct seemed harsh and unreasonable. We did not occupy the same bed for two or three nights. The reason he gave was that I was not yet fitted to be the mother of his children, and he saw no reason why our children should not be model children or ‘second Christs.’ He wrote down rules in a book, and I had to learn and study them every day. He told me his object was to make me a ‘model wife.’ In January 1856, when I was expecting my first child, I was repeating a lesson to him in his study, when apparently annoyed at some mistake I made, he struck me a violent blow on the head. Five days after my confinement I went out in a fly by his desire, and the child was taken with us in a fish-hamper. He beat it with his hand when it was not more than a fortnight old. I once had a fish-bone in my throat, and he told me he thought a great blessing was about to befall him as I would be choked. He used often to say that I was not fit to say my prayers with him at night, and that I was altogether deceit, and flew every day in the face of God Almighty. He said he felt inclined to take a poker and dash my brains out. The eldest child was an idiot, which he said was caused by my mismanagement." The respondent appeared in person, and cross-examined his wife respecting the doctrines he had propounded in public lectures as to the education of children, his project for establishing a model school, the way in which their courtship had been carried on, and many other irrelevant matters. The jury were agreed on the first issue, that Hopley had been guilty of cruelty, but on the second they were of opinion by a majority that there had been condonation on the part of the wife.

13.—Mr. Bouverie's Uniformity Act Amendment Bill, enabling fellowships in colleges of Universities to be held without a declaration of conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England, thrown out on the second reading by 157 to 101.

15.—Discussion in the House of Lords on the proceedings of Convocation with reference to "Essays and Reviews." Lord Houghton, in terms of a notice formerly given, asked her Majesty's Government whether they had taken, or were willing to take, the opinion of the law officers of the Crown as to the powers of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury to pass a synodical judgment on books written either by clergymen or laymen, as to the immunity of members of that body from proceedings at common law consequent on such judgments, and as to the form according to which such judicial power must be exercised if it belongs to that body. Lord Chancellor Bethell replied:—"There are three modes of dealing with Convocation when it is permitted to come into action and transact real business. The first is, while they are harmlessly busy to take no notice of their proceedings. The second is, when they seem likely to get into mischief to prorogue and put an end to their proceedings; the third, when they have done something clearly beyond their powers, is to bring them before a court of justice and punish them. . . . Not only did it require Convocation should be put into motion by the Crown, but it said no ordinance or sentence—nothing of which Convocation might choose to pronounce—should have any validity until it had received the sanction of the Crown, and if any attempt were made to give any force to them without that sanction the parties so offending should incur the penalties of a præmunire. I am afraid my noble friend has not considered what the pains and penalties of a præmunire are, or his gentle heart would have melted at the prospect. The Most Reverend Prelate and the bishops would have to appear at the bar, not in the solemn state in which we see them here, but as penitents in sackcloth and ashes. (A laugh.) And what would be the sentence? I observe that the

Most Reverend Prelate gave two votes—his original vote and a casting vote. I will take the measure of his sentence from the sentence passed by a bishop on one of these authors—a year's deprivation of his benefice. For two years, therefore, the Most Reverend Prelate would be condemned to have all his revenues of his high position sequestered. (A laugh.) I have not ventured—I say it seriously—I have not ventured to present the question to her Majesty's Government; for, my Lords, only imagine what an opportunity it would be for my right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to spread his net and in one haul take in 30,000*l.* from the highest dignitary, not to speak of the hoi polloi, the bishops, deacons, archdeacons, canons, vicars, all included in one common crime, all subject to one common penalty! (Much laughter.) I cannot contemplate that possibility, and therefore your Lordships will not be surprised to hear that I have refrained from approaching the subject. I have shrunk altogether from taking the first step of asking counsel in the matter. I have no doubt I should be advised that if there was a synodical judgment it would be a violation of the law; and entertaining, as I do, a sincere affection for the Episcopal Bench, and a sincere personal regard and affection for several members of the Episcopate, I am happy to be relieved from all difficulty and embarrassment in the case. But the question is a most serious one for the right reverend Bench; and, in order that I may relieve my right reverend friends from all difficulty, I am extremely anxious to know from them what the thing is which is called a synodical judgment. No criminal has been condemned. The Most Reverend Prelate did not favour me with a copy of the judgment, and therefore I have been obliged to have recourse to the ordinary sources of information. But, assuming that the report of the judgment which I have read is a correct one, I am happy to tell your Lordships that what is called a synodical judgment is simply a series of well-lubricated terms—a sentence so oily and so saponaceous that no one would grasp it. (A laugh.) Like an eel it slips through your fingers—it is simply nothing, and I am glad to tell my noble friend (Lord Houghton) that it is literally no sentence at all. (Renewed laughter, and 'Hear.') I find it stated in a publication of some authority that the sentence was in terms to this effect:—"That the Convocation having appointed committees of the Upper and Lower Houses to examine and report on the book entitled "Essays and Reviews," and the committees having severally reported thereon, this Convocation does hereby synodically condemn such book, as containing teachings contrary to the doctrines received by the United Church of England and Ireland, in common with the whole Catholic Church." If, my Lords, the volume had been the work of one hand, the sentence might have had some effect; but, seeing that the volume is nothing more than two covers holding together separate essays, and seeing that this sentence does not attribute any offence to anything but the volume containing those separate writings, not one of the authors is condemned, and each one of them may say :—‘ This thing that is condemned is not mine—it belongs to you.’ In this way the volume and the sentence which condemns it may be handed round from one to another, and the application of the sentence be repudiated by all the authors. As a judgment the sentence has no meaning whatever ; this judgment is no judgment at all. . . . With regard to your meeting among yourselves as a debating club, expressing your opinion whether this or that law is a good or a bad one, even that is not a very small, nor is it a proper thing ; because you may thereby involve yourselves in circumstances of great peril. Let me bring before you the predicament in which any individual member of the Episcopal Bench may stand. You, the Upper House, come to a particular determination ; but, suppose the author of one of these essays is presented to a living or any other piece of ecclesiastical preferment, and suppose that one of the bishops who has been a party to these proceedings is called upon to institute. The bishop will naturally say, ‘ How can I institute a man whose work I have joined in condemning ?’ But in declining to institute, the bishop might possibly become liable to a præmunire, or be involved in the consequences of another hard word, duplex querela. I call upon the bishops to pause before they place themselves in such a position—to pause for their own sakes, even if they have no regard to the injustice, to the anomaly, to the unreasonable spectacle of condemning a man whom they have no power to convene, whom they have no authority to hear, and whom, when he presents himself as a suppliant, their own timidity and fear of going beyond their tether compel them to dismiss. Those who concur with me may probably think that by protesting against such a course they may save themselves from consequences ; but if there be any attempt to carry Convocation beyond its proper limits, their best plan after protesting will be to gather up their garments and leave the place, remembering the pillar of salt, and resolving not to cast a look behind. (Laughter.) I am happy to say that in all these proceedings there is more smoke than fire. The words of condemnation are innocent and innocuous, though they do not probably proceed from a spirit that is equally harmless. As to the question of the noble Lord, after what, I trust, may be this acceptable attempt on my part to expound the law, I have only to assure the noble Lord that it is not the intention of the Government to take any further steps in the matter.” The Archbishop of Canterbury replied that in the course taken by Convocation there was no touch of malice, the object being simply to vindicate the Church of England from complicity with opinions considered to be mistaken and dangerous. The Bishop of Oxford complained of the tone adopted by the noble Lord on the woolsack. “ If a man has no respect for himself, he ought at all events to respect the audience before which he speaks ; and when the highest representative of the law in England in your Lordships’ court, upon a matter involving the liberties of the subject and the religion of the realm, and all those high truths concerning which this discussion has arisen, can think it fitting to descend to ribaldry in which he knows that he can safely indulge—because those to whom he addresses it will have too much respect for their characters to answer him in like sort—I say that this House has ground to complain of having its character unnecessarily injured in the sight of the people of this land by our occupying so high a position within it. . . . I know enough of this House, and of the people of England, to know that it is not by trying, in words which shall blister those upon whom they fall—to produce a momentary pain on those who cannot properly reply to them, that great questions should be solved ; but that it is by dealing with them with calmness, with abstinence from the imputation of motives, and above all, with the most scrupulous regard to stating upon every point that which shall prevent any man in this House being led to a conclusion other than that which the facts warrant.” The Bishop further justified the step taken by Convocation, and concluded, “ I would rather subject myself, in the presence of my countrymen and of your noble House, to any amount of that invective and insinuation, and all those arts of, I will not say what part of the bar of England, of which we have seen something to-night—I would, I repeat, rather a thousand times incur it all, than have to look back on my death-bed on myself as one of those who had not striven for the truth of our Established Church, and had not encountered, because I was afraid personally of the consequences, anything which the maintenance of that truth might entail.”

15.—Lieutenant Edward John Eyre appointed Governor of Jamaica.

16.—Elopement of Lady Florence Paget with the Marquis of Hastings. They were married at St. George’s, Hanover-square, in the presence of a few friends.

19.—Suppression of the Taeping rebellion, the city of Nanking being this day captured by the Imperialists, and the chief leaders taken prisoners.

20.—Truce between Germany and Denmark, preparatory to a conference for the restoration of peace, which assembled at Vienna on the 26th.

21.—The third reading of the Scottish Episcopal Disabilities Removal Bill carried in the House of Commons by 34 to 10. The measure afterwards received the Royal assent.

— Tolls abolished in Middlesex.

21.—Sir C. Wood makes his annual statement of the finances of India. In three years, 8,313,000*l.* of debt had been paid off; there was a balance in the Treasury of 10,000,000*l.* and a surplus on the year's income of 1,827,346*l.*

22.—Private Thomas Cooper, of the Coldstream Guards, one of the markers at the Wimbledon Rifle Competition, accidentally shot by a musketry instructor.

— In answer to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Earl Russell expresses his belief that the documents recently published in the Morning Post, relating to the policy of Russia, were malicious fabrications, and there was no reason whatever for supposing that that Power was planning for a revival of the Holy Alliance.

29.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. The Royal Speech expressed regret at the renewal of the hostilities with Denmark, but hoped that the negotiations now opened between the belligerents themselves might restore peace to the north of Europe. The incorporation of the Ionian Republic into the kingdom of Greece, and the dispute between the Sultan and the Hospodar of Moldo Wallachia, were also alluded to, along with the important acts of the session.

31.—General Grant makes a furious assault on Petersburg; but, though he exploded a mine which carried off about 500 Confederate troops, and laid open the inner line of defence, he was received with such determined resistance by the Confederates, as compelled him to retire with a computed loss of 10,000 men.

August 1.—Preliminaries of the Treaty of Vienna accepted by the King of Denmark, in terms of which the Duchies were ceded to Austria and Prussia. Being invited to express an opinion on the moderation displayed by the German Powers, Earl Russell wrote to Bismarck:—"If it is said that force has decided this question, and that the superiority of the arms of Austria and Prussia over those of Denmark was incontestable, the assertion must be admitted. But in that case it is out of place to claim credit for equity and moderation."

4.—In consequence of repeated outrages, Brazil addresses an ultimatum to Uruguay. The conditions being rejected, war broke out between the Powers on the 9th.

6.—Close of the protracted and irregular war in New Zealand by the unconditional submission of the Maori chiefs.

8.—Commencement of a series of riots in Belfast between the Romanists and Orangemen, the immediate cause being the inauguration by the former of a statue of Daniel O'Connell. A caricature of the Liberator was carried about by the Protestant party, and afterwards burnt—an indignity which roused the feelings of the Catholics to an ungovernable pitch and led to a struggle of several days' duration. Paving-stones, brickbats, and stout oak sticks were the weapons called first into requisition, but they gave place through time to old guns and weapons of a still more dangerous character. Both sides got themselves thoroughly armed, and in their frantic attacks on each other set the constabulary at defiance. They were only put down with great difficulty when the military was called out. In one week there were admitted into the hospital fifty persons injured in the riots, thirty of whom were suffering from gun-shot wounds. Two or three deaths were known to have occurred, but several, it was thought, were kept secret. The outbreak spread in a mitigated form to Cork and Dundalk. Towards the close of the year Government appointed a commission of inquiry to investigate the cause of the outbreak.

10.—The Bill introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for amending the law relating to the purchase of Government Annuities through the medium of savings-banks, and to enable the granting of life insurances by the Government, receives the Royal assent.

23.—Election riots at Geneva; suppressed by the Federal troops who occupied the city.

24.—The Federal steam frigate Niagara arrives in Dover Roads with the crew of the Georgia, formerly a Confederate cruiser, but seized while sailing under British colours and owned by a Liverpool merchant. She had latterly been chartered by the Portuguese Government for the purpose of carrying passengers between Lisbon and the West Indies.

— Franz Müller apprehended at New York on board the Victoria. He denied all knowledge of the murder; but after the usual preliminary examination he was delivered up under the Extradition Treaty, and arrived in Liverpool in custody on the 17th September.

29.—The House of Lords' judgment was given in the Yelverton case. The Lord Chancellor (with Lord Brougham, who was absent) considered it proved that there was a solemn interchange of consent to become husband and wife between the parties at Edinburgh, on the 12th of April, 1857, when, according to the respondent, Major Yelverton read aloud the Marriage Service of the Church of England at her lodgings. His Lordship concluded an elaborate review of the case by stating that he must give as the conclusion of the examination, "that there was and is now a relation of marriage adequately constituted by the Scotch law between the appellant and the respondent, and that they are now legally man and wife." On the other hand a majority, consisting of Lords Wensleydale, Chelmsford, and Kingsdown, decided against Mrs. Yelverton.

30.—The Perth Memorial to the Prince

Consort inaugurated in presence of Her Majesty.

30.—The Federal General Paine, commanding in Western Kentucky, issues a proclamation, urging the most remorseless measures against the Confederates:—"The first and great commandment is, that all you disloyal, rebellious people shall not circulate one dollar of capital in all this land. Not a dollar, no debt or bill of exchange can be paid or made without my signature, and I pledge you I will not approve any money transactions of a disloyal man. All his capital, all his money, every cent of it, shall be placed at the disposal of the Government. I will teach you that, having encouraged this rebellion, having comforted and aided your country's enemies, you must, ay, shall reap a traitor's reward. Talk about your rights! Why, you have no rights to talk about. A loyal citizen is the only one left with rights at this time. And yet you come to me asking for a banking privilege. Great God! the devil might as well ask the Almighty for a front seat in heaven. No; if in your prosperity you have despised this great and good Government, you may soon have the privilege to love it in your adversity. Not only this, but you ought, ay, you must, fight for this Government. The second commandment is, that all you notorious rebels get out of your houses and leave my district, so that Union men and women may come here to help me redeem this country. What do I care about your tobacco interest, the market value of your niggers or cotton? I shall shoot every guerilla taken in my district; and if your Southern brethren retaliate by shooting a Federal soldier, I will walk out five of your rich bankers, brokers, and cotton men, and make you kneel down and shoot them. I will do it, so help me God! You men of such large influence will be held responsible for the peace of this district. If a Union man is murdered by these guerillas here, the same fate awaits five of you gentlemen. I have sworn it, and it shall be done. I am going to manage this district, so that when I am done with it men and women who remain can come together in the name of the Lord and say, 'We belong to the United States.'"

September 1.—General Sherman defeats the Confederates, at Jonesborough, and compels Hood to evacuate Atlanta, which he subsequently makes his own head-quarters. Later in the month severe engagements took place between Sheridan and Early, in the valley of the Shenandoah.

3.—The Prince and Princess of Wales embark at Dundee on their voyage to Denmark.

7.—The Confederate General Hood refusing to move women and children from Atlanta, Sherman issues an address that this movement should be made at once for the sake of humanity:—"You yourself burned dwelling-houses along your parapets, and I have seen to-day fifty houses that you have rendered (526) uninhabitable, because they stood in the way of your forts and men. You defended Atlanta on a line so close to the town that every cannon-shot and many musket-shots from our line of investments that overshot their mark went into the habitations of women and children. General Hardee did the same at Jonesborough, and General Johnston did the same last summer at Jackson, Missouri. I have not accused you of heartless cruelty, but merely instance those cases of very recent occurrence, and could go on and enumerate hundreds of others, and challenge any fair man to judge which of us has the heart of pity for the families of a 'brave people.' I say it is a kindness to these families of Atlanta to remove them now at once from scenes that women and children should not be exposed to; and the 'brave people' should scorn to commit their wives and children to the rude barbarians who thus, as you say, violate the laws of war, as illustrated in the pages of its dark history. In the name of common sense I ask you not to appeal to a just God in such a sacrilegious manner—you, who, in the midst of peace and prosperity, have plunged a nation into civil war, 'dark and cruel war,' who dared and badgered us to battle, insulted our flag, seized our arsenals and forts that were left in the honourable custody of a peaceful sergeant, seized and made prisoners of war the very garrison sent to protect your people against negroes and Indians long before any overt act was committed by the (to you) hateful Lincoln Government, tried to force Kentucky and Missouri into the rebellion in spite of themselves, falsified the vote of Louisiana, turned loose your privateers to plunder unarmed ships, expelled Union families by the thousand, burned their houses, and declared by act of your Congress the confiscation of all debts due to Northern men for goods had and received. Talk thus to the marines, but not to me, who have seen these things, and who will this day make as much sacrifice for the peace and honour of the South as the best born Southerners among you. If we must be enemies, let us be men, and fight it out as we propose to-day, and not deal in such hypocritical appeals to God and humanity. God will judge us in due time, and He will prove to us whether it be more human to fight with a townfull of women and the families of a 'brave people' at your back, or to remove them in time to places of safety among their own friends and people."

8.—Unveiling of the memorial statue of Sir G. C. Lewis at Hereford, Lord Palmerston paying a graceful tribute to his late colleague. The inscription on the monument bore that it was to commemorate "a wise and honest statesman, a profound scholar, and kind and firm friend."

— Accepting the nomination of the Chicago Convention, General M'Clellan issues an address regarding the presidency, which large numbers of his supporters declared to be unsatisfactory, as far as the continuance of the war was concerned.

10.—Joseph Myers, aged 44, and Jane Sargisson, executed at Leeds, being the first execution which had taken place in the city. They had each been found guilty of murder at the recent established assizes for the West Riding.

— Bishop Colenso prohibited from preaching at Claybrook, through an inhibition from the Bishop of Peterborough served in the church on him.

15.—Convention concluded between the Kingdom of Italy and the French Empire :—Art. 1. Italy engages not to attack the present territory of the Holy Father, and to prevent even by force every attack upon that territory from without. 2. France shall withdraw her troops from the Pontifical States in proportion as the army of the Holy Father shall be organized. The evacuation shall, nevertheless, be accomplished within the space of two years. 3. The Italian Government engages to raise no protest against the organization of a Papal army, even if composed of foreign Catholic volunteers, sufficing to maintain the authority of the Holy Father, and tranquillity as well in the interior as upon the frontier of his States, provided that this force do not degenerate into a means of attack against the Italian Government. 4. Italy declares herself ready to enter into an arrangement to take under her charge a proportionate part of the debt of the former States of the Church; Florence to be substituted for Turin as the capital.

16.—Captain Speke killed by the accidental discharge of his fowling-piece while shooting at Neston Park, Wilts. He appeared to have been getting over a low stone wall, when, by some mischance, his gun went off while the muzzle was pointed to his chest. He was sensible for only a few minutes. On one of the party coming up, Speke said feebly, "Don't move me." In a few minutes he breathed his last. The death of this great discoverer threw a sudden gloom over the proceedings of the British Association then sitting at Bath, a discussion on the sources of the Nile being expected to take place next day between him and Captain Burton. Sir R. Murchison expressed the general feeling in a resolution, "That the geographers and ethnologists of the British Association having heard with profound regret of the fatal accident which has befallen Captain Speke, and by which they have suddenly lost so eminent an associate, resolve that their most heartfelt condolence be offered to his relatives on his being cut off in so awful a manner in the fulness of his strength and vigour."

17.—Died at Florence, aged 89, Walter Savage Landor, scholar and poet.

19.—Fire in Gresham-street, City, destroying the ancient and stately hall of the Haberdashers' Company, and many of the elegant carvings and paintings for which it was celebrated. The carpet warehouses of the Messrs. Tapling were also consumed.

21.—The Russians commence an attack upon the important fortress of Tchemkent, in Khokhand. In spite of a violent fire from the magazine the Russians forced the gates, and in an hour from the commencement of the assault were masters of the fortress with its magazines, built upon an inaccessible eminence, strongly armed with munitions of war, and a garrison of 10,000 of the Khan's best troops.

— Commencement of a series of riots at Turin, in consequence of the contemplated transfer of the Court and Parliament to Florence.

23.—At the Social Science Meeting, in York, Sir J. P. Wilde, in his capacity of president of the department of Jurisprudence, delivered an address on Law Reform, which was the means of drawing general attention to this important subject :—"Our people," he said, "have ever loved justice and order, and revered the law as the guardian of both. Perhaps this reverence has in times past been carried too far. It concealed its errors, and even gilded its faults. A severe exactitude in the application of a system highly technical has ever been the foremost blemish of English jurisprudence. It was not difficult to exalt this severity of precision into the inflexibility of justice, and mistake an iron rule for a golden precept. But our lot is cast in times of a far other character. Reason and veneration—the two great forces by which instituted rights are upheld—bid fair to change places, and while one has waxed the other has waned. There is no subject so sacred, not even the most sacred subject of all, as to escape inquiry, observation, and the hard scrutiny of distrust. The law is no exception, and the popular sense of justice may not be violated with impunity. The time has surely come when those who really revere our noble laws should have it at heart to place them beyond cavil, and give them that hold on the good sense of the people which they have ever had in their affection."

24.—Failure of the Leeds Banking Company, owing chiefly to the frauds and forgeries practised upon it by an ironfounder named Marsden, and one Scaife, in his employment.

October 1 (Sunday).—Great calamity at Erith, caused by the explosion of about 1,000 barrels of gunpowder, containing 100 lbs. each. The buildings of the Messrs. Hall were blown to dust, and the embankment in front thrown with great violence into the Thames. The shock was heard and felt at Charing-cross, a distance of fifteen miles. Those who saw the explosion said that it appeared as if a huge pillar of fire shot up into the air until it reached the clouds, when it spread out in every direction, became extinct, and left a dense circular mass of smoke, hanging like a funeral pall over the scene of desolation. A distant trembling of the earth and a violent atmospheric undulation was followed by a dull roaring sound that diminished in volume as the distance from the scene of disaster increased, until it became inaudible at places where the terrestrial and atmospheric effects were felt with wonderful intensity. People who experienced the earthquake-shock which occurred a year ago, and who this day were within the wide-spread effects of the explosion, describe the phenomena as similar in kind, though vastly greater in degree. Houses were partly destroyed, windows smashed, doors blown in, people violently thrown down, pitched out of bed, and in various ways more or less injured. Five men were known to have been killed on the spot, five others were missing, presumably killed, and three died after removal to Guy's Hospital; the seriously injured amounted to twelve. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "accidental death" at the close of a long inquiry which took place. It was thought that the first of the three great shocks experienced took place on board one of the barges unloading powder in the river.

5.—Cyclone at Calcutta, destroying property in the river and city to an amount too large ever to be accurately estimated. On the 4th the weather was showery, with light and variable winds, and occasionally severe lightning, but it was not till an hour after midnight that the barometer began to fall, the wind being then light from the N.E. In the morning the breeze gradually freshened, with squally and heavy rain, till about ten o'clock, when it veered to the east, and blew with increased fury. Between eleven and twelve, and with a noise like distant thunder, the cyclone burst over the city, tearing up trees, carrying off the roofs of houses, overturning walls and buildings, and heaping up mounds in the streets and roads, through which it was impossible for passengers to make their way. On the river the effect of the storm was even more disastrous. Tier after tier of vessels broke adrift, in most cases taking moorings, buoys, and tackle with them, and drove about in clusters of six or eight entangled together, and carrying with them ships at anchor in the stream, and everything else with which they came in contact. Several went down, others drifted on the shore, generally taking the course of the river under the influence of the wind at S.E. to S., and a strong flood-tide, many of them having travelled as far as six or seven miles from their moorings. To add to the disaster, the tide this afternoon was unprecedentedly high, and all the vessels driven to leeward on the opposite bank were carried up as far as high water could float them, so that when the flood retired they were left aground, some distance from the river. Of more than 200 ships in the Hooghly only about ten could be kept at their moorings. The Govindpore was run into amidships, cut to the water-edge, and her crew only saved by a feat of rare heroism performed in carrying a line from the shore to the sinking vessel. It was calculated that about forty people, principally natives, were killed in the city and suburbs.

10.—A conference of delegates assembled at Quebec, to consider the advisability of forming a Federal union of the provinces of North America. The proceedings received the sanction of her Majesty's Government, with the exception of the resolution relating to the exercise of the prerogative of pardon, which it was thought should be vested in the Governor-General instead of Lieutenant-Governors appointed by the Central Government.

11.—Church Congress opened at Bristol. At one of the meetings Dr. Pusey advocated the revival of synodical action, more especially in view of the recent decision of the Privy Council. The principal discussions took place on Home Missions and Lay Agency. Brother Ignatius (Lyne) was permitted to address the Congress amid some interruption.

18.—Died, at Clumber Park, aged 53, Henry Pelham Clinton, Duke of Newcastle, a statesman of the Peelite school, and War Minister in Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet.

19.—Confederate refugees in Canada cross the frontier into Vermont and attack the town of St. Albans. A number of them were arrested and tried at Montreal, but discharged on the technical plea that the warrant for their arrest was not under the hand of the Governor-General of Canada, as the Imperial Act required in such cases. General Dix afterwards issued an order instructing all military commanders on the frontier that where any act of depredation or murder was attempted, whether by marauders or persons acting under commissions from the rebel authorities at Richmond, the perpetrators were if possible to be shot down on the spot, or followed if necessary into Canada and seized there. This order was disavowed by President Lincoln, who, however, proposed in his Message that after six months' notice had been given to England, a naval force should be formed on the Lake to prevent Confederate raids from Canada.

27.—Came on at the Central Criminal Court, before the Lord Chief Baron (Pollock) and Mr. Baron Martin, the trial of Franz Müller for the murder of Mr. Briggs on the North London Railway, upon the 9th July last. The trial excited intense interest in the public mind, though this was caused rather by the flight and subsequent capture of the prisoner than by the crime itself, which was entirely of an unimaginative character, and prompted simply by robbery. The web of circumstantial evidence which the Crown went round the prisoner was of the most convincing kind. His need of money, his inability to account for his movements on the night of the murder, his possession of the stolen articles, the discovery and identification of his hat in the railway carriage, his possession of Mr. Briggs's hat, slightly reduced in height, and his sprained ankle, presumably received in the struggle, or when dropping from the train,—were all spoken to with precision and fulness. On the part of the defence, conducted by Mr. Serjeant Parry, an attempt was made to throw discredit on the character of the witness Matthews, the cabman, and evidence was given on that side to show that at the hour the murder was committed the prisoner was in a cottage in the Vassal-road, Camberwell. After an absence of fifteen minutes, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and Mr. Baron Martin sentenced him to be executed, his address to the prisoner warning him to prepare for his certain fate, as a commutation of the sentence need not be expected. At its close the prisoner said:—"I should like to say something. I am at all events satisfied with the sentence which your lordship has passed. I know very well it is that which the law of the country prescribes. What I have to say is that I have not been convicted on a true statement of the facts, but on a false statement." Müller's firmness here gave way, and he was led sobbing from the dock.

29.—Died at Hammersmith, aged 57, John Leech, of Punch, the most fertile humorist known in modern pictorial art.

30.—The British colonial vessel Saxon seized at Angra Pequina by the Federal war steamer Vanderbilt, under pretence that she was trading in the interests of the Confederates. The mate of the Saxon was shot in the course of an altercation with one of the Federal officers placed on board.

— Treaty of Peace concluded at Vienna between Denmark and Germany; Denmark to resign the Duchies, pay a sum of money or an equivalent for war expenses, and agree to a rectification of the Jutland frontier.

November 4.—H. M. S. Racehorse wrecked in the China seas about five leagues south-east of Chefoo Cape. "At the time of the ship striking," writes the commander of the gunboat Insolent, "it was comparatively smooth, and stream anchors and cables were placed in cutters ready to lay out; but heavy rollers set in, swamping both cutters and gig, and broke entirely over the ship; the masts were then cut away, and the Racehorse steamed full speed on shore in the endeavour to save life; but the wind increasing to a gale the rollers washed away all the skylights and filled the ship. The ship's company were then sent aft, told the position of the ship, and that if they held on till daylight there was every hope of all hands being saved. Unfortunately the endurance of only a few was equal to this, the poor fellows dropping off one by one from the effect of the cold and the force of the sea. Only nine were saved—three officers and six men."

8.—Southwark Bridge opened to the public free.

— The illustrious French advocate, Mons. Berryer, while on a visit to Lord Brougham, entertained at a banquet in the hall of the Middle Temple. The company was the most brilliant and accomplished that could be assembled in the metropolis. The Attorney-General presided, and was supported by most of the judges and distinguished law officers of the Crown.

8.—Abraham Lincoln elected a second time President of the United States.

10.—Concluded, before the Master of the Rolls, the case of Gedney v. Smith. The action arose upon a bill filed by Miss Harriet Francis Holgate Gedney, a minor, to obtain a declaration that she was the child of Mr. Patteson Arthur Holgate Gedney, by his late wife Harriet Gedney, and the execution of two settlements securing certain property under the marriage settlement of that lady and gentleman to the issue of that marriage. The plaintiff claimed to be their only child, her case being that Mr. and Mrs. Gedney were married in the month of May 1851; that from 1851 up to 1854 there was no issue born of this marriage, but that in the month of February 1854 Mrs. Gedney was confined of the plaintiff; that she immediately sent off to her husband, who was in Lincolnshire, to come up; that her husband got the notice of her confinement on a Sunday morning, and started by the next train to London to see her; that he was dissatisfied with her being attended by Dr. Goss, whom he immediately paid off and discharged, together with Mrs. Goss, who also appeared to have assisted at the accouchement; that Mr. Gedney then went to Dr. Farre, an eminent physician at the West-end, and engaged him to attend upon Mrs. Gedney; that Dr. Farre did immediately take up the case, and attended upon Mrs. Gedney from the time he was called in—which was three or four days after the alleged confinement—until Mr. Gedney duly registered the plaintiff as his child before leaving London, and had her baptized as soon as he got back to Lincolnshire, Mrs. Gedney's brother, Mr. Stapleton Smith, the principal defendant in this suit, standing godfather to the child at its christening; that from the birth of the plaintiff in 1854 until the death of Mrs. Gedney in 1857 the plaintiff was always treated by Mr. and Mrs. Gedney as their child, and was so received in the family; that almost immediately upon the death of Mrs. Gedney, and on the very day of the funeral, Mr. Gedney received a letter from Mr. Smith, Mrs. Gedney's father, alleging for the first time, that the plaintiff was a supposititious child, and not really the child of Mr. and Mrs. Gedney; and that since that time, Mrs. Gedney's family, so far as the settled property was concerned, had disputed the plaintiff's right to such property. In answer to the case of the plaintiff, the defendants, as the representatives of Mrs. Gedney's family, and entitled to the reversion of a considerable part of the settled property, failing any real or legitimate child of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Gedney, contended that the plaintiff was no child of such marriage, but the child of some stranger procured for the purpose of arresting the gift over in default of children: the defendant's case being, that at the time Mrs. Gedney was alleged to be pregnant she was not in the family-way at all, but suffering from a disease contracted from her husband; that they, the defendants, could prove by the evidence of medical men living in the neighbourhood of Candlesby Hall, and by the servants of Mr. and Mrs. Gedney, that at the time when the latter came to London she was not and could not have been in the family-way; that from the state of her person after death, she had never had a child; that at the very time of her going into lodgings in Park-street, Grosvenor-square, she could not be near her confinement: that just at the time when it was alleged she was confined Dr. Goss had gone to a lying-in asylum in the Borough, and bought a child from a poor woman, one Lydia Fletcher (exactly answering the description of the plaintiff as a child), on the representation to the mother that such child would be adopted by, and brought up as a lady; that the whole allegations as to Mrs. Gedney's confinement and the plaintiff being her child were a tissue of inventions from beginning to end; and that Mrs. Gedney confessed to her father on her death-bed that they were so. The examination of witnesses being concluded this day, the jury returned a verdict for the defendants—that in their opinion the plaintiff was not the child of Mr. and Mrs. Gedney. They expressed a hope that the innocent sufferer by their verdict would still be protected by some member of the family.

11.—Died at the Stationery Office, of which he was comptroller, aged 75, John Ramsay M'Culloch, Esq., political economist, and author of the "Commercial Dictionary."

12.—The Governor-General of India issues a proclamation announcing his intention of annexing permanently the Bengal Dooars and part of the Bhootan hill territory. An army was forthwith despatched, and occupied Gopulunge on the 28th.

14.—Execution of Franz Müller for the murder of Mr. Briggs. He was attended by Dr. Cappel, of the German Lutheran Church, to whom he made the only statement approaching a confession which he vouchsafed. "Müller," (the Doctor said in German,) "in a few moments you will stand before God. I ask you again, and for the last time, are you guilty or not guilty?"—Müller: "Not guilty."—Dr. Cappel: "You are not guilty?"—Müller: "God knows what I have done."—Dr. Cappel: "God knows what you have done. Does He also know that you have committed this crime?"—Müller: "Ja; Ich habe es gethan" (Yes; I have done it). At this moment the bolt was drawn, and the voice appeared to be choked as if in the act of seeking utterance.

17.—Came on for hearing in the Divorce Court, before Sir J. P. Wilde, and a special jury, the case of Codrington v. Codrington, being a petition from Admiral Henry John Codrington, praying for a divorce from his wife, Helen Jane Codrington (formerly Smith), on the ground of adultery with Lieutenant-

Colonel Anderson, of the 26th Regiment, and with Lieutenant Mildmay, of the Rifle Brigade. The case was one of unusual blackness even for the Divorce Court. In 1856 the Admiral was ordered to the Crimea, and left his wife with a companion of her own choosing, Miss Emily Faithfull, of the Victoria Press. When the Admiral returned in 1857 he found his wife's feelings towards him apparently changed, and some disagreement occurred, followed by the dismissal of Miss Faithfull. In 1858 the Admiral was sent to Malta as superintendent of the dockyard, and here, it was alleged, she contracted improper intimacy with each of the co-respondents. The chief witnesses were the boatmen of the Admiral's gondola, who averred that they often found the boat was put out of trim when she was returning from parties at night with either Anderson or Mildmay; and the domestics of the Admiral's establishment, who had witnessed them in suspicious circumstances in the house and also in the lanes and by-ways contiguous. The respondent denied her guilt, and pleaded that the Admiral not only systematically neglected her by sleeping apart, but paid improper attention to Mrs. Watson, wife of the Rev. Joshua Watson, a clergyman at Malta, and a friend of both parties. Mrs. Codrington also charged her husband with attempting a gross assault on Miss Faithfull when they were sleeping together in the bedroom. Mrs. Watson, in the course of her examination, gave evidence of an alleged confession made to her by Mrs. Codrington of her guilt with Lieutenant Mildmay—a confession, she said, on which she always intended to keep the seal of secrecy, but felt now at liberty to divulge in consequence of being subpoenaed as a witness. When Mrs. Watson made this declaration, at a preliminary hearing of the case on the 30th of August, opposing counsel were compelled to ask for a new trial on the ground of surprise. They now sought to invalidate her testimony by imputing improper intimacy with the petitioner. After a trial extending over four days the jury found the adultery established in both instances, and further, that Admiral Codrington had not by his wilful neglect or misconduct conducted to the misconduct of his wife. The Judge therefore ordered a decree Nisi for the divorce.

20.—Major Baldwin and Lieutenant Bird, of the 20th Regiment, attacked by Japanese near the Temple of Kamakura. Baldwin was murdered on the spot, and Bird some hours after he had been conveyed to a tea-garden to get his wounds dressed.

23.—In addressing the Rochdale Reform Association Mr. Cobden made pointed reference to the ignorance manifested by the people of this country concerning American institutions and even American geography:—"If I were a rich man," he said, "I would endow a professor's chair at Oxford and Cambridge to instruct the undergraduates of those Universities in American history. I will undertake to say, and I speak advisedly, that I will take any undergraduate now at Oxford or Cambridge, and I will bring him a map of the United States and ask him to put his finger on Chicago, and I will undertake to say that he does not go within a thousand miles of it. Yet Chicago is a place of 150,000 inhabitants, from which one or two millions of people in our own country are annually fed. These young gentlemen know all about the geography of ancient Greece and Egypt. Now, I know I shall be pelted with Greek and Latin quotations for what I am going to say. When I was at Athens I sallied out one summer morning to seek the famous river, the Ilissus, and after walking some hundred yards or so up what appeared to be the bed of the mountain torrent, I came upon a number of Athenian laundresses, and I found that they had dammed up this famous classical river, and were using every drop of its water for their own sanitary purposes. Why then should not these young gentlemen, who know all about the geography of the Ilissus, know also something about the geography of the Mississippi? I am a great advocate of culture of every kind, and I say when I find a man like Professor Goldwin Smith or Professor Rogers, who in addition to profound classical learning have a vast knowledge of modern affairs, and who, as well as scholars, are profound thinkers, 'These are men whom I know to have a vast superiority over me,' and I bow to them with reverence for their superior advantages; but to hurry young men from college with no knowledge of the country in which the great drama of modern politics and national life is now being worked out; who are ignorant of a country like America, but who, whether it be for good or for evil, must exercise more influence in this country than any other class—to bring the young destitute of such knowledge and to place them in responsible positions in Government, is, I say, imperilling its best interests; and earnest remonstrance sought to be made against such a state of education by every public man who values in the slightest degree the future welfare of his country.

24.—The London and Aberdeen iron steamer Stanley wrecked at the mouth of the Tyne, while attempting to run in for shelter from a severe storm sweeping along the north-east coast. Owing to the repeated failures in fixing a communication with the shore most of the passengers and crew were drowned within sight and hearing of an anxious but excited crowd, whom the disaster had drawn to the spot. The same fate befel the Friendship, of Colchester, which drifted to within a few yards of the Stanley, and greatly intensified the horror of the disaster. Two of the life-boat crew were also lost in their attempts to render assistance. In the same storm, the Dalhousie steamer, trading between Dundee and Newcastle, was lost at the mouth of the Tay, with all hands—twenty passengers and fourteen of the crew.

25.—Died in his 68th year, David Roberts, Esq., R.A. He was suddenly stricken with apoplexy, in Bond-street, this afternoon, and died in the evening.

— In reply to a manifesto addressed by the Confederates to the different Courts in Europe, Earl Russell writes:—"Since the commencement of the civil war which broke out in 1861, her Majesty's Government have continued to entertain sentiments of friendship equally for the North and for the South. Of the causes of the rupture, her Majesty's Government have never presumed to judge; they deplored the commencement of this sanguinary struggle, and anxiously look forward to the period of its termination. In the meantime they are convinced that they best consult the interests of peace, and respect the rights of all parties, by observing a strict and impartial neutrality. Such a neutrality her Majesty has faithfully maintained, and will continue to maintain."

— Fire at Bermondsey, destroying the extensive range of warehouses adjoining Sufferance Wharf, filled with saltpetre and other combustible materials.

— At a meeting of the Oxford Diocesan Society for augmenting the endowment of small benefices, Mr. Disraeli delivered an address which was generally considered to embody the future Church policy of the Conservative party:—"Instead of believing," he said, "that the age of faith has passed, when I observe what is passing around me, what is taking place in this country, and not only in this country, but on the continent in other countries and in other hemispheres, instead of believing that the age of faith has passed, I hold that the characteristic of the present age is a craving credulity. Why, my Lord, man is a being born to believe; and if you do not come forward—if no Church comes forward with its title-deeds of truth, sustained by the tradition of sacred ages and by the conviction of countless generations to guide him, he will found altars and idols in his own heart and in his own imagination. But observe what must be the relations of a powerful Church without distinctive creeds, with a being of that nature. Rest assured that the great principle of political economy will be observed. Where there is a great demand, there will be a proportionate supply; and commencing, as the new school may, by rejecting the principle of inspiration, it will end by every priest being a prophet; and beginning as they do by repudiating the practice of miracles, before long we shall be living in a flitting scene of spiritual phantasmagoria. There are no tenets however extravagant, no practices however objectionable, which will not in time develop under such a state of affairs; opinions the most absurd, and ceremonies the most revolting, are perhaps to be followed by the incantations of Canidia and the Corybantian howl. (Loud cheers and laughter.) But consider the country in which all this may take place. Dangerous in all countries, it would be yet more dangerous in England. Our empire is now unrivalled for its extent; but the base—the material base—of that empire is by no means equal to the colossal superstructure. It is not our iron ships; it is not our celebrated regiments; it is not these which have created or indeed really maintained our empire. It is the character of the people. I want to know where that famous character of the English people will be if they are to be influenced and guided by a Church of immense talent and great wealth and power without any distinctive creed. You have in this country accumulated wealth that probably never has been equalled, and very likely will still increase. You have a luxury that will some day even rival your wealth; and the union of such circumstances with a Church without a distinctive creed will lead, I believe, to a dissoluteness of manners and of morals that has been seldom equalled in the history of man, but which furnishes the tomb of empires. Look at the Europe of the present day and the Europe of a hundred years ago. It is not the same Europe; its very form is changed. Whole nations and great nations which then flourished are no longer found. There is not a political constitution in Europe existing at the present time which then existed. The leading community of the continent of Europe has changed all its land-marks, altered its boundaries, erased its local names; the whole jurisprudence of Europe has been subverted, even the tenure of land, which of all human institutions most affects the character of man, has been altered—the feudal system has been abolished, not merely laws have been changed, not merely manners have been changed, but customs have been changed. And what happened? When the turbulence was over—when the shout of triumph and the wail of agony were alike stilled—when, as it were, the waters had disappeared, the sacred heights of Sinai and Calvary were again revealed, and, amid the wreck of thrones and tribunals of extinct nations and abolished laws, mankind bowed again before the Divine truths that had been by Omnipotent power in His ineffable wisdom entrusted to the custody and the promulgation of a chosen people. I hold that the highest function of science is the interpretation of nature—and the interpretation of the highest nature is the highest science. What is the highest nature? Man is the highest nature. But I must say that when I compare the interpretations of the highest nature with the most advanced, the most fashionable and modern school of modern science—when I compare that with older teachings with which we are familiar—I am not prepared to say that the lecture-room is more scientific than the Church. What is the question which is now placed before society with the glib assurance which to me is most astounding? That question is this—is a man an ape or an angel? My Lord, I am on the side of the angels. I repudiate with indignation and abhorrence those new-fangled theories. I believe they are foreign to the conscience of humanity; and I say more, that even in the strictest intellectual point of view, I believe the severest metaphysical analysis is opposed to such conclusions. Put, on the other hand, what does the Church teach us? What is the interpretation of this highest nature? It teaches us that man is made in the image of his Creator—a source of inspiration, of solace,—a source from which can flow only every right principle of morals and every Divine truth. I say therefore that when we are told that the teachings of the Church are not consistent with the discoveries of science, and that in that sense the inferiority of the Church is shown, I totally deny the proposition. I say that the scientific teaching of the Church upon the most important of all subjects is, in fact, infinitely superior to anything that has been brought forward by these discoveries. In fact, it is between these two principles that society will have to decide. Upon our acceptance of that Divine truth of which the Church is the guardian, all sound and coherent and sensible legislation depends: it is the only security for civilization; it is the only guarantee of real progress."

December 4.—Died at Castle Howard, aged 62, George William Frederick Howard, Earl of Carlisle, a popular statesman and pleasing writer.

— The premises of Messrs. Baum, bullion dealers, Lombard-street, broken into and over 10,000*l.* in home and foreign coinage stolen. The thieves had secreted themselves about the premises previous to closing on the afternoon of the 3d, and entered the strong room by a hole made in the wall. The safes in this apartment, where the treasures had been deposited, were burst open by the use of mor-tise chisels and crowbars.

5.—Mr. Seward writes to Mr. Adams regarding the money collected in England for distribution among distressed Confederate prisoners:—"You will now inform Lord Wharcliffe that permission for an agent of the committee described by him to visit the insurgents detained in the military prisons of the United States, and to distribute among them 17,000*l.* of British gold, is disallowed. Here it is expected that your correspondence with Lord Wharcliffe will end. That correspondence will necessarily become public. On reading it the American public will be well aware that while the United States have ample means for the support of the prisoners, as well as for every other exigency of the war in which they are engaged, the insurgents, who have blindly rushed into that condition, are suffering no privations that appeal for relief to charity, either at home or abroad. The American people will be likely to reflect that the sum thus insidiously headed in the name of humanity constitutes no large portion of the profits which its contributors may be justly supposed to have derived from the insurgents, by exchanging with them arms and munitions of war, for the productions of immoral and everlasting slave labour; nor will any portion of the American people be disposed to regard the sum thus ostentatiously offered for the relief of captured insurgents as a too generous equivalent for the devastation and desolation which a civil war, promoted and protracted by British subjects, has spread throughout the States, which before were eminently prosperous and happy. Finally, in view of this last officious intervention in our domestic affairs, the American people can hardly fail to recall the warning of the father of our country, directed against two great and intimately-connected public dangers—namely, sectional faction and foreign intrigue. I do not think that the insurgents have become debased, although they have sadly wandered from the ways of loyalty and patriotism. I think that, in common with all our countrymen, they will rejoice in being saved by their own considerate loyal Government from the grave result which Lord Wharncliffe and his associates, in their zeal for the overthrow of the United States, have prepared for the victims of this unnatural and hopeless rebellion."

7.—M. Garnier-Pagès and twelve others (several of them members of the Corps Législatif) fined 500 fr. in a Paris police-court, for transgressing the 291st article of the penal law, prohibiting the assembling of more than twenty people for any purpose whatever. A speech of such surprising ability was made in their favour by M. Jules Favre, that the aged M. Berryer said nothing could be added, and he would therefore not occupy the time of the court by speaking for the clients who had put their case into his hands.

8.—The Pope issues an Encyclical letter on this the tenth anniversary of the declaration of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. "In order," wrote the Holy Father, "that God may accede more easily to our prayers and our wishes, and to those of all His faithful servants, let us employ in all confidence as our Mediatrix with Him the Virgin Mary, who has destroyed all heresies throughout the world, and who, the well-beloved mother of us all, is very gracious and full of mercy; allows herself to be touched by all, and takes under her pitying care all our miseries with unlimited affection; and who, sitting as Queen upon the right hand of her Son our Lord Jesus Christ in a golden vestment, shining with various adornments, knows nothing which she cannot obtain from the Sovereign Master. Let us implore also the intervention of the blessed Peter, chief of the Apostles, and his co-Apostle Paul, and of all those saints of heaven, who, having already become the friends of God, have been admitted into the celestial kingdom, where they are crowned and bear palms, and who, henceforth certain of immortality, are entirely devoted to our salvation. Lastly, let us ask from God from the bottom of our heart the abundance of all His celestial benefits for you. We ourselves bestow upon you, venerable brethren, and upon all clerks and faithful of the laity committed to your care, our Apostolic benediction from the most loving depths of our hearts, in token of our charity towards you." The Apostolic letter was accompanied by an appendix of eighty propositions, containing the principal modern errors inveighed against by the Pope. Under the latter head the following notions were condemned as heretical:—Seven referring to pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism, seven to moderate rationalism, four to religious indifference, twenty to errors against the Church, nine to errors of philosophy, ten to errors connected with Christian marriage, and six to modern liberty and the temporal sovereignty of the Pope. Under the latter head, the following opinions were condemned as heretical:—That the Pope can and ought to become reconciled to progress, liberalism, and modern civilization. That it is not fitting that in the present day the Catholic religion should be the exclusive religion of the State. That it is untrue that civil liberty of worship and freedom of the press conduce to the corruption of morals and to propagate indifference. Among the political and philosophical errors the Pope condemned were these:—Authority is nothing more than the union of material force and of numbers. A happy injustice of facts inflicts no injury upon the sanctity of right. It is allowable to oppose and revolt against legitimate princes. Violations of oaths and every act contrary to the eternal laws are permissible in the cause of patriotism. The Pope further condemned Biblical, Socialist, and secret societies, and all persons who held that there was hope of the eternal salvation of those who do not belong to the true Church, or that Protestantism was only another form of true belief, and equally pleasing to God.

8.—The Suspension Bridge, formerly at Hungerford, London, opened with much ceremony at Clifton as a new roadway across the Avon. Of the money invested in the stone work, 8,000*l.* had accrued from 1,000*l.* left for that purpose in 1753 by Alderman Vick.

14.—Dublin was this week excited and scandalized by a trial in which the parties were Sir William Wilde, one of the leading physicians of the Irish capital, and Miss Mary Josephine Travers, for libel. She had, as appeared in evidence, consulted the physician for some slight ailment, accompanied by her mother. Sir William, according to her statement, persisted in further cultivating her acquaintance, and she frequently met him during the next six or eight years; at length, she said, one day in 1862, he first rendered her unconscious by pressing his hand upon her throat, or putting chloroform to her nostrils, in his consulting-room, and then committed a felonious assault. After this, so her story went, she continued to meet him, but only, as was alleged, to have revenge; which took the form of attempting to poison herself in his study, sending him doggerel verses, borrowing his money, but rejecting his advances, bringing essence of garlic into his house when she came, and continually holding over his head the threat of exposure. Lady Wilde, wife of Sir William, gave Miss Travers umbrage by passing her in the hall without speaking; and henceforth she too was persecuted. Miss Travers, who, it seems, had some literary pretension, inserted a spiteful review of a work by Lady Wilde in some of the Dublin papers; and also sent her anonymous letters. At length the young lady, last year, printed and had hawked about the streets a pamphlet, in which, under the name of "Florence Boyle Price," she set forth her version of the connexion which had existed between herself and "Dr. and Mrs. Quilp," as she nicknamed Dr. and Lady Wilde. The following is one of her notes to Sir William Wilde, written in August 1863:—"Now, spiteful old lunatic, since you want to do something for me, please cut my corn, that you did not half do before. I'll keep your nose to the grindstone while your wife is away, and when she returns I'll see her; so you had better not make a fool of me this time. I'll give you another trial for the few days I am waiting." In her cross-examination Miss Travers owned to have been in the habit, at one time, of taking laudanum. At length, in May last, Lady Wilde wrote the following letter to the young girl's father (described as "professor in the Dublin University, and sub-librarian in Marsh's library:—" "Sir, you may not be aware of the disreputable conduct of your daughter at Bray, where she consorts with all the low newspaper boys in the place, employing them to disseminate offensive placards in which my name is given, and also tracts in which she makes it appear that she has had an intrigue with Sir William Wilde. If she chooses to disgrace herself, that is not my affair; but as her object in insulting me is the hope of extorting money, for which she has several times applied to Sir William Wilde, with threats of more annoyance if not given, I think it right to inform you that no threat or additional insult shall ever extort money from our hands. The wages of disgrace she has so basely treated for, and demanded, shall never be given to her." On this letter Miss Travers brought her action for libel. The trial lasted from Monday till Saturday, and ended in a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, one farthing.

14.—Came on for hearing before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the appeal of Bishop Colenso against the sentence of Dr. Gray, Bishop of Capetown and Metropolitan of South Africa. This very important case, which treated of the whole position, authority, and character of the so-called Church of England in the colonies, and of the persons who assume to hold office in it, arose out of the proceedings taken by the Bishop of Capetown, Dr. Gray, for the purpose of depriving the Bishop of Natal, Dr. Colenso, of his episcopal see and jurisdiction, on the ground that his published writings were contrary to the Articles and Formularies of the Church. Dr. Colenso at the outset protested against the whole proceedings, denied the jurisdiction in hac re of the Metropolitan, and announced his intention of appealing against any sentence that might be pronounced against him. Notwithstanding this protest, the Bishop of Capetown claimed to exercise coercive jurisdiction over his suffragan bishop, by virtue of the letters patent under which the office of metropolitan bishop had been conferred upon him by the Crown, whereby it was provided that any proceedings against either of his suffragan bishops of Grahamstown or Natal should originate and be carried on before the Bishop of Capetown, with a final appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and, accordingly, the Bishop of Capetown proceeded to try the charges of heresy brought against the Bishop of Natal; and, having heard the case, he pronounced a sentence of deposition against the latter, and subsequently prohibited the clergy in the diocese of Natal from yielding obedience to their deposed bishop. The Bishop of Natal was advised that the exercise of this jurisdiction on the part of the Metropolitan was not only an assumption of power unknown in the history of the Western Church, Catholic or Protestant, but that it was plainly at variance with the settled principles of constitutional law as applied to colonies or settlements which have acquired legislative institutions of their own. He accordingly presented a petition of complaint and appeal to the Queen as Sovereign of this realm, and as the head of the Church of England, praying that the letters patent granted to the Bishop of Capetown, in so far as they purported to create a court of criminal justice within the colony of Natal, and to give the Archbishop of Canterbury appellate jurisdiction in causes between the Metropolitan of Capetown and his suffragan bishops, and in so far as they derogated from the Bishop of Natal's rights under his own letters patent, were of no force or avail in the matters complained of, and that the pretended trial and proceedings before the Bishop of Capetown, and the sentence pronounced by him, were null and void in law. The petition of complaint and appeal also prayed that, if necessary, the Bishop of Natal might be heard upon the merits of the case, by way of appeal from the sentence of Bishop Gray. This petition was presented to the Queen through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in the spring of 1864, and was referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to hear the same, and report their opinion to her Majesty. The case of the Bishop of Capetown, as presented by his counsel at the bar, was, that the letters patent under which the office of metropolitan bishop was conferred upon the Bishop of Capetown expressly authorized him to exercise coercive jurisdiction over his suffragan bishops, and that the only appeal from his decision was to the Archbishop of Canterbury; that if such letters patent were insufficient in point of law to confer such jurisdiction, the Bishop of Natal had, by taking the oath of canonical obedience to the Bishop of Capetown as Metropolitan, submitted himself as a matter of contract to the jurisdiction of the latter; and, lastly, that if neither of these positions were sound in point of law, and if, consequently, the proceedings and sentence at Capetown were a nullity, the Bishop of Natal might disregard them altogether, but that he had no right to come to the Sovereign to ask for a declaration as to their invalidity—that he might defy the sentence, and, if necessary, call upon the civil tribunal at Natal to protect him against the consequences of such sentence. The case was argued over four days, Messrs. James, Stephen, Westlake, and Clarke appearing for Bishop Colenso, and Sir Hugh Cairns with the Queen's Advocate for Bishop Gray. At the close of the pleadings, on the 19th, the Lord Chancellor intimated the case would receive from their Lordships their most serious consideration, and if they considered it necessary to go into the dispute on its merits, proper intimation would be given to all the parties concerned.

16.—Collision in the Blackheath tunnel of the North Kent Railway; a passenger train, proceeding at the rate of forty miles an hour, running into a ballast train proceeding slowly up the tunnel on the same rails. Five plate-layers, thrown from the ballast train, were killed on the spot, and in the passenger train, though there were no deaths, the injuries were numerous and severe.

20.—General Sherman completes his thirty days' raid through Georgia by appearing at Savannah. He had driven 1,200 head of cattle through, though he started with only 200, and fed his army on full rations during a march of 300 miles. He also gathered on his way over 700 able-bodied negroes, and so many horses, mules, and waggons as to embarrass him. The army found and lived on the choicest of provisions, Georgia poultry forming no inconsiderable item in the bill of fare. During a considerable portion of their march the line extended over a breadth of country sixty miles wide, forty miles at times intervening between the right and left wings. Sherman's whole loss from wounds, sickness, stragglers, and all other causes, up to the time of arriving in front of Savannah, was about 1,000. The average daily march was twelve miles.

22.—General Sherman writes to President Lincoln:—"I beg to present you, as a Christmas gift, the city of Savannah, with 500 heavy guns and plenty of ammunition, and also about 25,000 bales of cotton."

24.—The Federal fleet, under Admiral Porter, make an unsuccessful attack on Wilmington.

27.—In view of the many recent fatal accidents on the railways of the United Kingdom, the Queen causes a letter to be sent to the Directors of the most important lines, expressing her hope that they will "carefully consider every means of guarding against these misfortunes, which are not at all the necessary accompaniments of railway travelling. It is not for her own safety that the Queen has wished to provide, in thus calling the attention of the company to the late disasters (her Majesty is aware that when she travels extraordinary precautions are taken); but it is on account of her family, of those travelling upon her service, and of her people generally, that she expresses the hope that the same security may be insured for all as is so carefully provided for herself. The Queen hopes it is unnecessary for her to recall to the recollection of the railway directors the heavy responsibility which they have assumed, since they have succeeded in securing the monopoly of the means of travelling of almost the entire population of the country."

— Francis Wane executed at Chelmsford, for the murder of his paramour Amelia Blunt, at Chadwell-heath. He confessed that he had made up his mind to prevent the woman carrying out a matrimonial engagement she had contracted. He therefore watched until she was left alone in the wash-house, and then quietly went behind her. As he put his arm round the deceased, she turned with a look of horror, exclaiming, "O, Teddy, what do you want here?" and without saying a word in reply he immediately cut her throat. She then fell forward in the position in which she was discovered.

— In answer to a farewell address from the inhabitants of Schleswig, the King of Denmark said:—"Of all the cares and sorrows which have been heaped upon me during my brief reign, nothing has more depressed my mind, nothing weighed more deeply on my heart, than the brave, faithful, and loyal Schleswigers, who have, on so many difficult occasions, constantly given the most brilliant proofs of fidelity and devotion to Denmark, and the Danish royal house, and who have cherished no dearer or more zealous wish than to remain united with the kingdom under my sceptre. But, my friends, we must all bow to the will of Providence; and I will pray to the Almighty that He may give, both to you and to me, the requisite strength and endurance to bear the bitter pangs of separation."

31.—Birley's Hanover-street Mills, Preston, destroyed by fire, adding about 260 work-people to the already over-crowded list of persons subsisting on parochial or other charity.

January 1.—The French Minister of Justice addresses a circular to the Bishops of the Gallican Church, intimating that the publication of the Pope's Encyclical could not be authorized, as it contained propositions contrary to the principles on which the Constitution of the empire was based. Thirty-four Ultramontane prelates protested against the prohibition.

2.—New Exchange at Birmingham opened. Mr. Bright spoke at great length, expressing an opinion that manufacturers and merchants, as a rule, had generally been either too modest, or not sufficiently acquainted with their true position. From the commercial classes, he said, and not from monarchs or great lords of the soil, had come whatever there was of social, or civil, or religious freedom to the inhabitants of this country. On the subject of strikes, he said he was not sure that they should be altogether abandoned. "I call the power to strike among workmen a reserve power, which, under certain circumstances, it may be their duty to exercise. At the same time, I think that, in my experience in nineteen cases out of twenty, at least, the exercise of that power may be fairly questioned; and in many of these cases it has been a merciless curse to those by whom it has been exercised."

— Fatal occurrence at Springthorpe's Music-hall, Dundee. An exhibition of gymnastic performances was to have taken place in a large hall under a Dissenting place of worship, to which entrance was gained by descending a flight of thirteen steps. A crowd assembling outside were pressing against the door, only one half of which was opened, when the other half was forced in and those in front at the top of the steps thrown forward with great violence. Others again fell on them, and a scene of the wildest and most inextricable confusion resulted. No fewer than nineteen were trampled or crushed to death, or suffocated—the most of them boys and girls—and many more grievously injured.

4.—At a distribution of prizes of the Romsey Labourers' Encouragement Association, Lord Palmerston took occasion to offer a few observations on the subject of education among the poor. Speaking of writing, he said "it was almost as important as speech, because every man, whatever his station in life may be, must have constant occasions to convey his thoughts, his wishes, his complaints, his desire, in writing; and unless that writing be not only legible and easily read, with the letters well formed, so that a person can read that writing without trouble and delay, it fails by disgusting the person to whom it is addressed. I must say that, in the present day, I do not think that instruction in writing is given in that way which would render it most useful. Children who are taught to write are taught to make up-strokes fine and down-strokes bold: the consequence of which is, that writing often looks like an area railing a little lying on one side, so that it is difficult for the eye to make out the letters of which that writing is composed. Children should be taught to write a large hand, to form each letter well, and never to mind whether it looks beautiful or not. If it answers the purpose of being easily read, that is the thing which ought to be aimed at."

11.—At the Central Criminal Court, Major W. B. Lumley pleaded guilty to writing letters to Mr. Desborough, his solicitor, challenging him to a duel, and apologized to the prosecutor. He was bound over to keep the peace.

— Commenced at the Central Criminal Court the trial of Ferdinand Edward Karl Kohl, a German sugar-baker, charged with murdering his countryman Christian Fuhrop, in the Plaistow Marshes, on the 3d of November last. In September it appeared the prisoner went to Germany, but afterwards returned, bringing with him a young man, the deceased, who went to lodge first with a Mrs. Warren, and afterwards with Kohl himself. Fuhrop was last seen alive in the Plaistow Marshes, and the prisoner was then with him. They were walking along a path, about a quarter of a mile from the reed bank where the body was found. The prisoner returned about twelve that day. It was remarked that his boots and trousers were covered with mud, something like that in colour at the reed-bed. His attention was called to it, but he said he had been riding in a butcher's cart. Asked what had become of "John," he said he had gone to a certain sugar-bakery in the Commercial-road to ask for work, and when he returned he could not find John. He made no allusion to having been in the Plaistow Marshes. Having given this account of losing his friend, he said, "If John does not return in two hours, I shall break open his boxes." He did do so with a poker, and affected astonishment at some of the clothes being missing. He said, "If John's clothes are gone, John will never return." He also appeared greatly excited. One of the lodgers in the prisoner's house had a chopper, which the prisoner borrowed some few days before the murder. Upon his returning it the owner called his attention to some red paint on the handle, to which he replied that he had put the paint on because the handle was loose. Some spots of blood were found upon the prisoner's clothes, and upon the chopper small portions of linen fibre and of human skin. On the morning of the Monday after the murder, and before its discovery, the prisoner got up at half-past five o'clock. He had no work to do, and there was nothing specially to call him out. He was seen that morning about eight o'clock in the reed-bed, and in the afternoon he was again seen jumping out of the reed-bed. A further search discovered a clasp-knife near where the body and head were found. Beyond all doubt the prisoner was poor, while the deceased was well to do; and on the day after the murder the prisoner had in his possession several sovereigns. One of the witnesses described how the prisoner shrank from looking at the body after it had been carried into the Graving Dock Tavern, and fell in a fainting state against the wall when his attention was drawn to the wound in the neck. Mr. Best addressed the jury for the defence, but called no witnesses. After an absence of about forty minutes they returned a verdict of Guilty.

13.—Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, burned, and great damage inflicted on the adjoining Roman Catholic church of St. Mary's. Six people were killed by the falling of a wall, one of them, Mr. George Lorimer, the City Dean of Guild, being in the act of rescuing other sufferers from the conflagration.

14.—The new blockade-runner Lelia lost off Great Ormshead in a storm which burst across the Irish Sea from the North. The master, with about forty of the officers and crew, were drowned, and seven more were added to the sufferers in this calamity by the upsetting of a lifeboat sent out to take the survivors off the lightship.

— The Athenaeum announces (inaccurately) that the Poet-Laureate had accepted a baronetcy conferred on him by the Queen.

18.—Addressing his constituents at Birmingham on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, Mr. Bright said:—"An Englishman, if he goes to the Cape, can vote; if he goes to Australia, can vote; if he goes to the Canadian Confederation, can vote. It is only in his own country, and on his own soil, where he was born—the very soil which he has enriched with his labour and the sweat of his brow—that he is denied this right, which in every community of Englishmen in the world would be freely accorded to him. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) I agree very much with the gentlemen at the Torquay dinner as to the apparition which alarmed, but I hope did not disturb, their formidable and robust digestion. This apparition is not a pleasant one; this state of things is dangerous, and one which cannot perpetually last. It may happen that the eyes of the five or six millions all over the kingdom may be fixed with an intense glare on the doors of Parliament. It was so in the years 1831 and 1832. There are men in this room who felt them, and who know now, that it required but one spark to the train, and this country would have been in the throes of a revolution; and these men who are so alarmed at the proposition to give a 10*l.* vote for counties, and a 6*l.* vote for boroughs, would have repented in sackcloth and ashes if they had given a vote against Earl Grey's Reform Bill. Accidents are always happening, not only to individuals, but to nations. It was the action of the French Revolution in 1830 that precipitated the great movement in this country. There may be accidents again; and I do not hold that to be statesmanlike which allows the security, the tranquillity, the loyalty of a people to be disturbed by any accident over which they have no control. (Cheers.) If these five or six millions of people once unitedly fix their eyes with an intense look on the doors of the House of Commons, who shall say nay? (Cheers.) Not the mace upon the table of the House; not the 400 easy gentlemen who lounge in and out of that decorated chamber under the same roof; not a dozen gentlemen who call themselves statesmen, and who doze in Downing-street; not even a power appalling and more menacing that have their lodgings higher up in Whitehall. I say that, as opinion now stands, there is no power in this country that can say nay for one single week to the five or six millions, if they are intent on making their way within the walls of Parliament. This is the apparition which frightens the gentlemen at Torquay; but it also gives trouble in other quarters to which I would pay more respect. . . . It is only because there is something which the people still believe to be in some degree a representative body, and which stands between them and monarchical or aristocratic despotism,—it is only the existence of that House which makes the institutions they are so fond of safe and permanent at all, and they are afraid that the five millions should get into it. And I beg leave to tell them that the five millions will get into it. They may not get in all at once—and perhaps few men desire they should, for I am opposed myself to great and violent changes, which create needless shocks, and which are accepted, if they are accepted at all, with great alarm—but I will undertake to say that a considerable and effective portion of that five millions will, before many years are past, be freely allowed to vote for members of the House of Commons. It is not the Democracy which these gentlemen are always afraid of that is the peril of this country. It was not Democracy in 1832 that was the peril; it was the desperate antagonism of the class that then had power to the just claims and rights of the people—(cheers)—and, at this moment, while I speak, I tell them that Conservatism—they give it that name, but it is worthy of a very different name—Conservatism, be it Toryism or Whiggism—is the true national peril we have to face. (Loud cheers.) They may dam the stream and keep back the waters, but the volume is ever increasing, and it descends with an accelerated force; and the time will come when, in all probability, and to a certainty, if wisdom does not take the place of folly, the waters will burst their banks, and these men, who fancy they are stemming this imaginary apparition of Democracy, will themselves be swept away by a resolute and united people. . . . I demand this, then, which is but the right of the Constitution, that the House of Commons shall be made freely and fairly to represent the commons and the people of the United Kingdom. England has long been famous for the enjoyment of personal freedom by her people. They are free to think, they are free to speak, they are free to write; and England has been famed of late years, and is famed now the world over, for the freedom of her industry, and the greatness and freedom of her commerce. I want to know why it is that our people should not be free. (Cheers.) Who is there that will meet me on this platform, or who will stand on any platform, and will dare to say to an open meeting of his fellow-countrymen that these millions, for whom I am now pleading, are too ignorant, or vicious, or destructive, to be trusted with the elective franchise? I, at least, will never thus slander my countrymen. I claim for them the right of admission, through their representatives, into the most ancient and venerable Parliament which at this hour exists among men; and when they are thus admitted, and not till then, it may be truly said that England, the august mother of free nations, herself is free."

18.—Died suddenly, aged 71, Charles C. F. Greville, Esq., late joint-clerk of the Privy Council, and well known in the upper circles of the metropolis.

19.—Died, aged 55, P. J. Proudhon, an eminent French Socialist.

24.—At the first annual meeting of the supporters of the Bishop of London's Church Extension Fund, it is reported that the total receipts to the 31st of December, 1864, were 100,456*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, and a further sum of 72,003*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* had been promised.

—Died, aged 64, August Kiss, German sculptor.

25.—Karl Kohl executed at Chelmsford for the murder in Plaistow Marshes. He was attended to the scaffold by Dr. Cappel, but made no confession.

26.—Announcement made in Melbourne that Australia had ceased to be a colony to which British convicts were liable to be sent.

28.—Treaty signed at Callao, between Peru and Spain, confirming the former in the possession of the Chincha Islands, on condition of paying an indemnity of 60,000,000 reals. The islands were restored Feb. 3.

30.—Burning of the Surrey Theatre, Blackfriars-road. The fire was discovered at the conclusion of the pantomime, but before the audience had left. Owing to the promptness and order in which the people left the building there was little confusion and no loss of life. The actors in most cases had to escape in their theatrical costumes.

February 3.—Tried at the Central Criminal Court Serafino Pelizzioni, an Italian, charged (538) with stabbing Michael Harrington, in the course of an altercation in a public-house on Saffron Hill on 26th December last. He was found guilty and sentenced to be executed on the 22d—Mr. Baron Martin, in passing sentence, stating that he never heard more direct and conclusive evidence.

3.—Conference in Hampton Roads between President Lincoln and certain Confederate Commissioners regarding peace. The latter said they had no authority to negotiate except on the basis of the recognition of the South. The President informed them that such recognition was utterly and totally out of the question, and that the one condition necessary for peace, or truce, or armistice, was that "the authority of the National Government should be recognised and obeyed over the whole territory of the United States." The conference therefore broke up. Mr. Seward afterwards wrote to the American Minister in London:—"What the insurgent party seemed chiefly to favour was the postponement of the question of separation, upon which the war is waged, and a mutual direction of the efforts of the Government, as well as those of the insurgents, to some extrinsic policy or scheme for a season, during which passions might be expected to subside, and the armies be reduced, and trade and intercourse between the people of both sections be resumed.

—Great watch and jewel robbery at Mr. Walker's, 63, Cornhill. The robbery was most elaborately planned, and only accomplished through the exertions of an expedition of well-equipped thieves. The cleverest of the gang—Caseley—had taken Mr. Walker, his family, his habits, and his doings, under the closest surveillance for seven weeks before, night and day, until at last everything connected with his going and coming, his business and his practice, was thoroughly known. This information being complete, a party of five thieves repaired to the premises at ten minutes past six on the evening of Saturday the 4th. The house was let and occupied in floors, Mr. Walker's shop being on the ground floor, Sir Charles Crosley's offices immediately above, and other offices above those, while below Mr. Walker's shop was a room tenanted by a tailor. The occupants, when the thieves arrived at the spot, had not yet all left for the night, but the offices on the second floor were empty, and to these three of the robbers at once ascended by the common staircase. The other two remained in the street to watch and give signals. At twenty minutes to eight the signal was given by the confederates outside that Mr. Walker's foreman, who appears to have been the last on the premises, was gone. Operations were then at once commenced. The three thieves concealed in the house first went down to Sir Charles Crosley's floor, where—more for pastime, as it appeared, than anything else—they opened the safe. The chief object of the expedition was still postponed, nor was it until past midnight that they began the work. Mr. Walker's shop was secured by iron doors or partitions, but the thieves directed their attack against a part which had not unnaturally been left with less protection. They got into the tailor's room on the lowest floor, mounted upon his cutting-board, and then forced their way through the ceiling and floor into Mr. Walker's shop above. Having thus effected a lodgment against the real point of attack, they distributed the duties of the night. Of the two thieves stationed in the street, one was to be on the watch lest Mr. Walker or any of his people should return to the house, while the other was to keep guard over the police, and give warning whenever any constable approached the shop. Inside, one of the gang sat upstairs, in Sir Charles Crosley's arm-chair, at the window of the second floor, to correspond with the sentries in the street, and the signals of these men he communicated by means of a string to his comrades below. Another, placed in the hole half-way between the shop and the tailor's room, handed up such instruments as were wanted for use; the others did the work. The first proceeding of the operators was to "test" the safe in which the booty was secured, and this experiment was conducted by the insertion of a thin wedge of steel into the almost imperceptible chink left between the door of the safe and its side. Then a little bar was inserted to relieve the wedge, then another wedge a little larger to release the bar, then another bar a little bigger still to release the second wedge, until after ten or a dozen such steps, the chink was opened sufficiently for the introduction of the "alderman." The instrument thus dignified in name was a long iron bar, sometimes as much as five feet in length, jointed together in pieces, so as to be carried in a small case. With the end of the "alderman" fairly introduced, and the arm of a strong man acting at the other extremity of the lever, the safe has no longer any chance. The door was prized open by the force of this powerful lever, and the booty seized. At a quarter before four on Sunday afternoon the thieves were "up in Sir Charles Crosley's office, washing their hands," and by twenty minutes to five they were miles away on the Guildford-road, with a load of plunder valued at 6,000*l.*

6.—In the case of Woodward v. Clarke, breach of promise, the jury returned a verdict for the lady—damages 2,000*l.* Defendant pleaded that he had made an "error in judgment," and enclosed in his last note two religious hymns for consolation.

7.—Parliament opened by Commission. In the Royal Speech reference was made to the operations this country had been compelled to undertake against Japan, the war in New Zealand, the Confederation of North America, and the disastrous hurricane at Calcutta. Bill-were promised for the revision of the statute law, the concentration of the law courts, the relief of the poor, public schools, and the law relating to patents and inventions. The customary Address was voted without a division, Lord Derby describing the Speech as one very proper to be addressed by an aged Minister to a moribund Parliament. "No medical skill or science," he said, "can prolong its existence beyond a period of a very few weeks. All that the most eminent physicians can do for it is to take care that its dying moments are disturbed by no unnecessary excitement, that nothing may disquiet its last hours, and that it may be supplied with just so much gentle occupation as may tranquilly engage its thoughts. The physicians, of course, will continue to hold their formal consultations on the state of their patient, receive their accustomed fees, and wait it serenely towards its final rest." Earl Russell referred to a claim which he understood was likely to be made by the United States Government upon this country for compensation for injuries inflicted upon the merchant shipping of American subjects by the Alabama and other vessels which had been clandestinely fitted out in British ports. Looking at the precedents in international law, looking at the declarations made by the United States themselves, in the case of Spain and Portugal, he thought such a claim upon this country would be extremely unfair. While we were bound to make every allowance for the irritation naturally engendered in the United States by these injuries, and while our Government would do all in its power to prevent infractions of its avowed neutrality, it could not, on the other hand, admit that there was any colour of justice for such demands. The Address was voted in each House without a division.

— The "adjusting" scandal at Lochend, Inverness-shire, illustrating in a curious way the rough simplicity of a rural population amenable mainly to clerical advice and discipline. The Free Church minister of Dores writes to the editor of the Inverness Courier:—"Sir,—Two females from Lochend called on me this night with a view to the publication of the accompanying document as an advertisement in the Courier. I hereby give my concurrence to the foresaid proposal. Have the goodness to send the document to Dr. Campbell, that he may insert one or two words which are wanting in the certificate, which must have been hurriedly written.—A. MACPHERSON." The enclosure referred to was in these words:—"A rumour having been circulated tending to affect the character of the fair sex of Lochend in reference to the body of a child lately found in Loch Ness, the inhabitants of the district deemed it expedient to get their character adjusted by Dr. Campbell, from Inverness, who, on Monday last, met all the young and unmarried females of the place in the vestry of the Free Church, and certified as to their characters being free from reproach. A reward of 5*l.* is hereby offered to any party who can give correct information to the Rev. Mr. Macpherson, Dores, of any one attributing the perpetration of the crime to any of the females within the bounds of Lochend." The surgeon's certificate was attached to the above:—"Lochend, January 25th. I hereby certify that I have examined a number of young women of Lochend, and have no reason to believe that any of them have (sic) been recently confined.—W. A. CAMPBELL." A wide publicity having been given to the details of this scandal by the Times and Lancet, it was taken up by the Free Church Commission and the principal parties afterwards censured by the local Presbytery.

7.—The Benchers of the several Inns of Court, presided over by Mr. Macaulay, M.P., decide, by a majority of 12 to 11, that ordained clergymen should be henceforth eligible for call to the bar.

8.—Fire in Philadelphia, destroying forty-seven buildings, and an immense amount of property stored therein. Several lives were also lost.

9.—The numerous robberies in the City excite a panic of distrust, which leads to a meeting of aldermen and residents, who carry a resolution that had the police exercised the care and watchfulness the City had a right to expect from them, the Cornhill burglary would not have happened.

10.—Came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of Woodgate v. Rideout, being an action for libel against the publisher of the Morning Post. It arose out of the great Egmont-Darrell case, and had reference mainly to a remark made by the Solicitor-General, that the action had been raised because Mr. Woodgate, solicitor to the late Earl, had been refused the payment of 1,300*l.* which he claimed from the Darrells. In commenting upon the statement, the Morning Post likened Mr. Woodgate to the famous firm of "Quirk, Gammon, and Snap." This was the libel complained of. Mr. Walpole, M.P., and the Earl of Egmont were called on behalf of the plaintiff to show that he had manifested no undue desire to press on the Egmont case. No witnesses were called for the defence; but Mr. Lush urged that a newspaper was not amenable for the correctness of what had been stated in Court to be fact, and that the writer in the Morning Post was justified in his comments upon assumed facts. In summing up, the Lord Chief Justice said there was no doubt that, in point of law, a report of proceedings in a court of justice, if it were a fair case, although it might contain matter which of itself was libellous, would be privileged. The administration of justice was a matter of universal interest to all the world; but the question the jury had to decide in this case was whether the defendant's comment upon the proceedings was a fair one, particularly as it had been made not at the close, but during the progress of the trial. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages 1,000*l.*

11.—Came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of Lewis v. Powell, being an action to recover 50,000*l.* in name of damages from Colonel Powell, M.P. for Cardiganshire, for breach of promise of marriage. Colonel Powell was fifty years of age, partially paralysed, and was assisted in his correspondence by the lady's brother. Plaintiff and certain relatives were visiting the Colonel in London last year, when he proposed to her and she accepted him, stating to his medical man that "she understood she was to be more a nurse and a companion than a wife." Colonel Powell's relatives afterwards induced him to break off the match. For the defence Mr. Coleridge urged that the smallest amount of damages would suffice. The Chief Justice observed:—"It is said that a woman who, without having her affections engaged, gives herself up to a man in marriage with a view merely to social position, compromises and degrades the sacred character of that union the essence of which is conjugal affection, and that topic has been ably enforced by Mr. Coleridge in one of the most eloquent addresses delivered in Westminster Hall. But, on the other hand, we must remember that in the contract of marriage there often enter other considerations besides those of love and affection. There are worldly and prudential considerations, and it cannot be excluded from the consideration of a jury upon the breach of an engagement of marriage, that expectations of this nature, and of comforts and advantages which go a long way to make up the sum of human happiness, have been disappointed." Verdict for the plaintiff—damages 2,000*l.*

11.—Movement among the higher circles in London to abolish the practice of tradesmen giving gratuities to servants. The Prince of Wales causes a circular to be issued to-day, checking the system in his own household. "Concluding that every tradesman would lend his co-operation in putting down such a practice—dishonest in itself, and equally prejudicial to the interests of his employer and himself—he has directed to discharge from his service every servant who may receive, and to cease employing every tradesman who may pay, such a percentage; or who may make a present of any kind in consideration of his Royal Highness's custom."

12.—Victor Townley, the Derbyshire murderer, commits suicide by throwing himself over the staircase of Pentonville Prison. A fellow-prisoner who sat next to him in the chapel said:—"Townley remained till the last two verses of the last hymn were being sung, when he got up and said to me, 'It is the 319th Hymn,' which it was, and having opened the book, he sang two verses in a very loud voice. I never heard him do that before, for he scarcely ever opened his lips. When the hymn was finished he shut the book, and taking it in his hands, walked out of the chapel, followed by me. He made a full stop at the bottom step leading out of the chapel into the circular gallery, dropped his prayer-book, took hold of the rails of the gallery with both hands, and with his two feet on the steps of the stair, made a spring over. He went head over heels, and fell flat on his face below." The surgeon who examined the body after death said there was no traceable disease of the brain. The chaplain said that he found Townley perfectly insensible to the sin of the murder he had committed. He thought him morally insane. The coroner's verdict was "Suicide when in an unsound state of mind."

12.—Died Algernon Percy, Duke of Northumberland, First Lord of the Admiralty in Lord Derby's Administration.

14.—On a motion of the Bishop of Oxford, the Upper House of Convocation agree to present an address to her Majesty praying for an increase of the Episcopate.

15.—Died, at his residence, York-place, Baker-street, Cardinal Wiseman, aged 63. A solemn requiem mass was celebrated on the 23d, in Moorfields Cathedral, and the body afterwards conveyed in great state to Kensal-green Cemetery.

17.—In both Houses of Convocation discussion takes place concerning the constitution of the Court of Final Appeal in ecclesiastical causes. Petitions praying for a change from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were ordered to lie on the table.

—Charleston evacuated by General Hardee, and the city taken possession of by the Federals under General Gillmore.

18.—The Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, communicates to the Vice-Chancellor of the University the determination of the Dean and Chapter of that House to increase the yearly salary of the Regius Professor of Greek (Professor Jowett) to the sum of 500*l*. Counsel to whom the case had been submitted were of opinion that while the Dean and Chapter were not under any obligation to augment the professorship to any amount beyond the 40*l*. at present paid, they had come to the conclusion, "on grounds of general expediency," and "under the great difficulties of the case," to recommend that such measures should be taken as would secure increase to the above amount.

22.—The Federals seize Wilmington.

23.—Saville House, Leicester-square, destroyed by fire, originating in an escape of gas from the cellars.

24.—Capture of the Cornhill burglars. Inspector Potter of the G division thus described the seizure:—"Between two and three o'clock this afternoon I went to 142, White-chapel-road, in company with Inspector Brennan, of the F division, Sergeant Moss, of the City Police, and other officers. I placed constables at the back of the house, and then entered the shop, where I found the two Jeffreys and the two Brewertons. I said, 'Barret and Bruton,' the names by which I knew them, 'You must consider yourselves in custody for being concerned in several jewel robberies in the City and the Strand.' We seized the two men by the collar, upon which I saw the woman Jeffrey pass something to the woman Brewerton. I immediately gave her into the custody of Ranger and another officer. The woman Brewerton ran upstairs, and I followed her. She succeeded in locking herself into a room before I could get to her. I said, 'Let me in immediately, or I will break open the door.' She did not open it, and I therefore broke it in. I saw her putting jewellery into her pockets, and I seized her. She struck me in the face, and caught hold of me by the whiskers. Sergeant Moss came to my assistance, and released me. I said, 'Give me what I saw you putting into your pockets.' She said, 'I have nothing.' We secured her, and took from her pocket three parcels containing ten, twenty-five, and thirty gold chains respectively, together with some other articles of jewellery, all of which have been identified by Mr. Walker. Hearing a scuffle below, I left her in charge of a constable and ran down stairs, where I found Brewerton struggling with the officer who had him in charge. We took the four prisoners to the police-station, and, returning afterwards to the house, we found more jewellery there. At the station I took three gold rings from the woman Brewerton's fingers, and a pair of earrings from her ears. Subsequently, I went with Sergeant Moss and others to 13, Ely-terrace, at the back of the Bow-road. I there saw the woman Caseley. She put her head out of a window, and asked who we were. I told her we were police-officers, and as she refused to open the door, we forced it in. I ran upstairs and saw a woman leaving a room. On reaching the top of the stairs I saw Caseley in the front room, where I had seen the other woman. By this time I had officers in uniform posted at both the front and back door of the house. I entered the apartment which the woman had just left, accompanied by Moss. Caseley said that 'Billy' (meaning Jeffreys) lived in the room. There was a box in the room, locked. It was broken open by Moss. It contained a number of gold watches—I believe, fifty-two—several gold Albert chains, and various other articles of jewellery. There was a life-preserver lying on the bed in the room, with a false moustache and whiskers. There was besides a quantity of silks and other property, all of which I believe to be the produce of robberies. We made a further search, and then removed the prisoners and the property to the station-house." The immediate effect of the arrest was the recovery of about 1,400*l.* worth of the jewellery stolen from the premises of Mr. Walker, in Cornhill, and a considerable sum of money supposed to have been the produce of several burglaries. During the greater part of the 25th Mr. Walker and his sons were engaged with the police in identifying property found in the possession of the prisoners. The result was that they recognised 128 gold chains and 52 gold watches, some of which, of great value, belong to customers, and were in their hands at the time of the robbery undergoing alteration or repair. In the search 20*l.* 10*s.* in gold was found, in three separate sums of 19*l.* 10*s.* and 5*l.*; also a 20*l.* Bank of England note, seven 5*l.* notes, and two deposit notes of the London and Westminster Bank (Whitechapel branch) for 250*l.* and 150*l.*; so that the money, and securities for money, in the possession of the prisoners, amounted in all to 656*l.* odd. A number of watches were also dragged up from the Thames, where they had been sunk when the thieves became aware the police-officers were on their track.

24.—St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, reopened after a complete restoration, at the cost of 150,000*l.*, wholly sustained by Mr. Guinness, brewer.

— Mr. Pope Hennessy's motion for an address to the Crown expressing the regret of the House at the decline of the population of Ireland, negatived by a majority of 107 to 31.

25.—Fall of a sugar refinery in Bonnington-road, Leith, and loss of four lives.

28.—Upsetting of a boat belonging to the training ship Worcester, in the Thames, off Erith. Of twenty-two cadets who had entered the boat for the purpose of inspecting the Drainage-works, eight were drowned—some of them sinking quite close to the shore in the attempt to save their comrades.

March 1.—King Victor Emmanuel makes a triumphal entry into his new capital of Milan.

— Mr. Edward Senior, Poor Law Commissioner, killed by a railway train at a level crossing of the Irish Midland Great Western Railway, near Longford Bridge.

2.—Gregorio Mogni, tried at the Central Criminal Court for the manslaughter of Harrington, in the disturbance at the Anchor public-house, Saffron-hill—a crime for which Pelizzioni, before mentioned, had been sentenced to be hung. The latter had been respited mainly through the exertions of an Italian committee, headed by Mr. Negretti, who procured, after the trial, much new evidence concerning the perpetration of the deed. Mogni was a cousin of Pelizzioni, and was working in Birmingham when he gave himself up to Mr. Negretti to save his friend, who had been unjustly condemned. As the disturbance turned out to have more the appearance of a general riot than was at first supposed, Mogni was only indicted for manslaughter, and being now found guilty—partly on the evidence of Pelizzioni—was sentenced to penal servitude for five years. Pelizzioni was again placed at the bar on the 12th of April, charged with stabbing the potman Rebbeck, in the same disastrous brawl in which Harrington was killed. After a trial extending over four days, in the course of which evidence of the most conflicting and complicated character was produced, the jury returned a verdict of Not guilty. The convict Mogni was put into the witness-box on one of the days, and admitted that it was he, and not Pelizzioni, who stabbed the potman. Pelizzioni, who had thus repeatedly escaped from the meshes of the law, was afterwards liberated on a free pardon.

3.—Mr. Newdegate's motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the existence, character, and increase of monastic or conventual establishments in Great Britain, negatived by a majority of 106 to 79.

4.—Matthew Atkinson sentenced to be executed at Durham for beating his wife to death at "The Spen," near Winlaton. In passing sentence, Mr. Justice Mellor commented severely on the cowardice of his neighbours, who were cognizant of the murderous work he was engaged in, but expressed themselves as afraid to venture into the house when he was in such a state of drunken fury. They heard him declare that he meant to kill her, but he threatened to shoot the first man that entered, and no one gave him a chance. He even came out and had a talk about the matter in the course of the fatal process, conversing for nearly fifteen minutes with some of his fellow-workmen; but, on his remarking that he must finish his victim, they allowed him to go back and do it. About half-past twelve he came out again and intimated his entire success. "I've finished her," he said, "this time," and when they went in they saw that he had almost finished the fire-irons in doing it. A shocking scene occurred at his execution on the morning of the 16th. When the drop moved the rope snapped close to the noose, and the prisoner fell a distance of about fifteen feet. It was thought that, if not killed, he must be considerably injured by the fall. About twenty minutes afterwards a workman appeared on the scaffold, and replaced the drop. Soon afterwards the hangman re-appeared and attached a new rope to the beam. A few minutes afterwards the condemned man a second time ascended the scaffold, with a firm step, apparently none the worse for the fall he had received. The deadly pallor which overspread his features when he ascended the scaffold on the first occasion seemed to have disappeared, and the murderer placed himself beneath the drop without assistance, and seemed anxious to give the executioner as little trouble as possible. Askern, the executioner, performed his office this time with great celerity, and in less than a minute Atkinson had ceased to exist.

4.—The South Staffordshire ironmasters turn out their workmen and blow off furnaces, in order to compel the North Staffordshire men then on strike to come to terms with their employers. In all, about 70,000 men were thus idle, and 100,000*l.* per week, formerly paid as wages, directed into other channels.

—Inauguration of Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson, as President and Vice-President of America. The President maintained his lofty honour with homely dignity; but the Vice-President created great scandal by appearing in a most excited, and, as was commonly reported, intoxicated state. "He had not," writes a spectator, "uttered two sentences when everybody saw something was wrong. 'He is drunk,' said one; 'He is crazy,' said another; 'This is disgraceful,' said a third. Mr. Seward and the Ministers looked uneasily on the ground, or moved uneasily in their seats. The judges of the supreme court manifested by their faces their pain and their surprise. 'I am a-going for to tell you'—(said the Vice-president) 'here—to-day—yes, I am a-going for to tell you all that I am a plebeian. I glory in it. I am a plebeian. The people—yes, the people of the United States, the great people—have made me what I am; and I am a-going for to tell you here to-day—yes—here to-day—in this place—that the people are everything. We owe all to them. If it be not too presumptuous, I will tell the Foreign Ministers sitting there that I am one of the people. I will say to Senators and others before me, I will say to the Supreme Court which sits before me, that you all get your power and place from the people. And, Mr. Chase,' he said, suddenly addressing the surprised Chief Justice by name, 'your position depends upon the people.' Turning to the other side of the House, where sat Mr. Seward, and the other Ministers, he severally addressed them as he had addressed Mr. Chase. 'And I will say to you, Mr. Secretary Seward, and to you, Mr. Secretary Stanton, and to you, Mr. Secretary —.' Here he hesitated for a name, and according to the public report in the Washington papers of this morning, bent down and asked Mr. Hamlin if he knew who was Secretary of the Navy. Having been informed, he continued in the same loud tone, 'And to you, Mr. Secretary Welles, you, all of you, derive your power from the people.' These words were uttered with strong emphasis upon the word 'you,' which Mr. Johnson invariably pronounced 'yeoo!'"

6.—Lord Stanley draws the attention of the House of Commons to the rumour concerning the irregularities committed by Mr. Edmunds as Clerk of the Patent Office. The Attorney-General promised to lay a report on the subject before the House when the pending inquiries were completed. The following evening the Lord Chancellor went at length into the circumstances connected with Mr. Edmunds' retirement, and admitted that he was aware of irregularities in the Patent Office when he presented a petition to their Lordships in which that gentleman resigned the office he held in the House of Lords, and prayed that he might be permitted to retire on the ordinary pension. The Earl of Derby, and others, expressed an opinion that the Lord Chancellor was to blame for bringing the claim of Mr. Edmunds for a pension before the House, and concealing the irregularities of which he was aware. A committee was appointed to inquire into the case.

6.—In the Court of Arches, Rev. Mr. Drury, Vicar of Claydon, was admonished, and condemned in costs, on a suit promoted by the Bishop, for officiating at the "Monastery" of Norwich, an unlicensed and unconsecrated place.

7.—Sir Fitzroy Kelly's motion "that in any future remission of individual taxation, the House should take into consideration the duty on malt, with a view to its early reduction and ultimate repeal," defeated by 251 against 170.

9.—In the Rolls Court, the Duke of Wellington obtains an interim injunction against Lord Robert Montagu, preventing him from disposing of certain letters addressed to Lady Olivia Sparrow, by the late Duke and Duchess.

10.—Great excitement caused in Birmingham, by the stoppage of the old-established bank of Attwood, Spooner, and Co., with liabilities estimated at over 1,000,000*l.*

—Died at Paris, aged 53, the Duke de Morny, an early friend of the present Emperor and prominent statesman of the second Empire.

—The Edinburgh Court of Session give judgment on Miss Longworth's petition to refer her entire case to the oath of Major Yelverton. The court by a majority refused the reference, holding it to be a matter in their equitable discretion, and that as this was a question of status, affecting the right of third parties, already established by final judgment, the petition could not be granted. The reference was as to the nature of a contract, to which contract Mrs. Forbes and children could not be parties, and there was no precedent for sustaining a reference in such a case. Lord Deas differed, holding that reference to a party's oath was a competent mode of proof; that the object was to ascertain the truth; that if Major Yelverton affirmed the alleged marriage with Miss Longworth on oath he was to be believed; and, therefore, that if the rights of Mrs. Forbes and children were affected, they suffered no injustice from the law, being simply in the same position as if the first marriage had been established by evidence in the cause. His lordship held that under a reference to oath of the first marriage it would be incompetent to inquire whether there had been a second marriage at all. "Miss Longworth's" counsel then moved the court to cite Mrs. Forbes-Yelverton, but the court decided that the case was at an end.

13.—Discussion in the House of Commons on the defences of Canada, arising from a report laid on the table by Government. Mr. Bright severely censured the politicians and the press of this country for the countenance and favour they had shown to the Confederates.

— Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the riots in Belfast laid upon the table of the House of Commons. They recommended that Belfast should be converted into a county; that the police force should be raised to 400 men by the addition of 140, the cost to be borne, one-half by the county and the other by the Consolidated Fund; that the force should be under a chief-constable with magisterial functions, although without a seat at petty sessions; and lastly, that two stipendiary magistrates be appointed—the one Protestant and the other Roman Catholic. The Commissioners express their apprehension that the recurrence of riots similar to those which have so often disgraced the town is not improbable, and they state that, as Irishmen, they make their report with shame and sorrow.

14.—The Queen visits the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton, and inspects with great minuteness the method adopted for the relief of the patients.

— At the Maidstone Assizes, an action was brought by Elizabeth Aford against the Honourable William Felix Lionel Tollemache, commonly known as Lord Huntingtower, to recover 15*l.*, one quarter's annuity granted to her by the defendant in consideration of past cohabitation. Defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was his wife, and that she consequently had no ground of action against him. He also pleaded that she had broken the condition upon which the annuity was granted to her, by molesting and annoying him. After hearing evidence, the Lord Chief Baron said in his opinion there was prima facie evidence to establish the plea that the plaintiff was the wife of the defendant. The verdict would therefore be for the defendant upon that plea, and for the plaintiff upon the other, alleging that she had forfeited the condition of the bond, by molesting the defendant, to support which not a tittle of evidence had been adduced. He should, however, reserve for further consideration the question whether he was correct in his view of the law upon the subject of the plea of marriage. A verdict to the effect named was accordingly returned.

15.—The Belfast rioters sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from two years to three months. Laverty, charged with shooting Gorman, was acquitted, as the jury could not agree upon a verdict.

15.—The Marquis of Hartington brings forward the Army Estimates in a Committee of Supply. The amount was 14,348,447*l.*, being a decrease from the previous year of 495,641*l.*

17.—Charlotte Winsor and Mary Jane Harris tried at Exeter for the murder of the infant child of Harris, an unmarried servant girl. The prisoner Winsor was a woman with whom the child had been placed to nurse; no one witnessed the murder, if such it was; but one day when Harris was at the cottage, the grandchild of Winsor, a little girl of seven years, who nursed the child and became attached to it, was sent on an errand, and when she returned the child had disappeared, the woman saying its aunt had taken it away. After their apprehension the women made statements criminating each other, but not bearing the semblance of truth. The jury, after being locked up from seven o'clock till nearly midnight, said they could not agree, and Mr. Baron Channell discharged them, but ordered the prisoners to be detained in custody.

20.—The Lord Chancellor delivers the judgment of the Privy Council in the Colenso appeal case. Their Lordships intended, he said, humbly to report to her Majesty their judgment and opinion that the proceedings taken by the Bishop of Capetown, and the judgment or sentence pronounced by him against the Bishop of Natal, were null and void in law. The ground of this decision was, that the Crown has by law no power to constitute a bishopric, or to confer coercive jurisdiction, within any colony possessing an independent legislature; and that the letters patent which purport to create the existing see of Capetown and the existing see of Natal, were issued after these colonies respectively had acquired such legislatures. Consequently the sees do not exist; neither bishop is in the eye of the law the bishop of his see, nor has either of them in law any jurisdiction whatever.

22.—Amongst the last, if not the very last letter written by Mr. Cobden, was one addressed to Mr. T. B. Potter, on Mr. Hare's new scheme of representation. "I return," he wrote, "Mill's letter. Everything from him is entitled to respectful consideration. But I confess, after the best attention to the proposed representation of minorities which I can give it, I am so stupid as to fail to see its merits. . . . After all, it is opinions that are to be represented. If the minority have a faith that their opinions, and not those of the majority, are the true ones, then let them agitate and discuss until their principles are in the ascendant. This is the motive for political action, and the healthy agitation of public life. I do not like to recognise the necessity of dealing with the working man, as a class, in the extension of the franchise. The small shopkeeper and the artisan of the towns are socially on a level."

that he had just received a telegram from Lord Monck, stating that the Government at Washington intended to withdraw the notice they had given for the abrogation of the Treaty of 1817, and that the passport system was to cease immediately. The intelligence was received with loud cheering.

23.—Dr. Pusey writes to the Churchman with reference to the late decision of the Privy Council in the Colenso case:—"It is no concern of ours which of the two sets of lawyers was right. The present advisers of her Majesty have limited the Church's powers; and we may thank God for the limitation, and pardon gladly the gratuitous insolence of the Erastianism of the preamble, for the results which, with no goodwill of Erastians, must result from it. The Church of South Africa then is free; and this freedom is far better than a temporal jurisdiction created by the State. It is the temporal jurisdiction which is the weakness of the Church. Had the decision against Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson in the Court of Arches involved only spiritual consequences, it would not have been made legal for clergymen to deny hell or the inspiration of God's Word. The South African Church will have to organize itself as the Scotch Church and the Church in the United States had to do before them."

24.—Thomas Ellis, known at Shrewsbury as "John Morgan," sentenced to five years' penal servitude for assuming the character of a police inspector, and procuring the apprehension of Charles Ashworth on a charge of theft.

25.—The statues of Professor Wilson and Allan Ramsay unveiled in Princes-street Gardens, Edinburgh.

— Sheffield theatre destroyed by fire.

27.—The Morning Herald draws public attention to a new scandal against the Lord Chancellor, arising out of his proceedings in filling up the office of Registrar in Bankruptcy at Leeds.

— In moving the second reading of the Union Chargeability Bill, Mr. Villiers insisted that the measure introduced no novel principle, but was in strict conformity with the original design of the Poor Law, the promoters of which had always intended the Union to supersede the parish for every purpose connected with the relief of the poor. The bill proposed to remove the restraint hitherto imposed on the free circulation of labour, and it would also place the burthen of maintaining the indigent on a wider basis than at present. In committee, an adverse amendment was moved by Mr. Bentinck, to the effect that it be an instruction to the Committee, with a view to rendering the working of the system of Union Chargeability more just and equal, to facilitate in certain cases the alterations of the limits of existing Unions. This was lost on a division, as was also another proposal made by Mr.

Henley to refer the whole subject to a Select Committee. Mr. Villiers' measure ultimately passed through both Houses, and received the Royal assent.

28.—In the course of a debate on Mr. Dillwyn's motion, "That the present position of the Irish Church Establishment is unsatisfactory and calls for the early attention of her Majesty's Government," the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) said:—"There is not the slightest doubt that if the Church of England is a national Church, and that if the condition upon which the ecclesiastical endowments are held were altered at the Reformation, that alteration was made mainly with the view that these endowments should be entrusted to a body ministering to the wants of a great majority of the people. I am bound to add my belief that those who directed the government of this country in the reign of Queen Elizabeth acted in the firm conviction that that which had happened in England would happen in Ireland; and they would probably be not a little surprised if they could look down the vista of time, and see that in the year 1865 the result of all their labours had been that, after 300 years, the Church which they had endowed and established, ministered to the religious wants of only one-eighth or one-ninth part of the community." Though he was not prepared to submit the remedy required, he could not refuse his consent to so much of Mr. Dillwyn's resolutions as declared that the condition of the Irish Church was unsatisfactory. "It is a proposition," he said, "commonly maintained that tithes are not paid by the soil, but are paid by the landlord, and therefore that entitles the tithes to be applied exclusively to the maintenance of the system which, in the great majority of cases, is the religion of the landlord. But I apprehend it to be perfectly clear, that while not the property of the agriculturist, they are not the property of the landlord either, but that they are property subject to restraint and conditions, and for the right disposal of which the country and the Legislature of the country are responsible—(cheers)—and which, considered as property, undoubtedly, if their hands were free, in any new case it would be their duty to apply for the benefit of the largest and the neediest portion of the community. All this appears to me to indicate in the present position of the Church of Ireland inherent elements which show that her difficulties cannot be surmounted by her rulers or by the piety and devotion of her clergy, but that they are essential elements of a false position. This I say without in the slightest degree pointing to what ought to be done if it were in our choice with respect to the Church of Ireland. I have spoken entirely with reference to her present position as the exclusive possessor of the largest endowments of the country; and I confess I am obliged to come to the conclusion to which the argument of the hon. gentleman who preceded me seems to lead, that this is an unsatisfactory state of things. . . . The dictates of propriety and good sense must govern the proceedings of any Administration which means to do its duty to the country. These principles must govern us on this occasion, whether or not we may be able to deny the proposition of the hon. gentleman with reference to the position of the Irish Church; and I, for one, am not able to deny it. We, therefore, feel that we ought to decline to follow him into the lobby, and declare that it is the duty of the Government to give their early attention to the subject; because, if we gave a vote to that effect, we should be committing one of the gravest offences of which a Government could be guilty—namely, giving a deliberate, a solemn promise to the country, which promise it would be out of our power to fulfil.” Mr. Whiteside replied at some length to the speech of Mr. Gladstone, and contended that the modern Irish Church was the true representative of the ancient one. “The want of principle, the want of policy, the want of profound convictions upon such questions as the present could not be supplied by eloquence, however great, or abilities, however they might captivate, might also mislead.” He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to consider the speech he had made. What motive had he in making that extraordinary speech? He censured the hon. member for Leominster for stating that he considered the Irish Church to be in a satisfactory condition. Did he think that the Church of England was in a satisfactory condition? What opinion did the Bishop of London hold on that subject as regarded the Church in London? Was the Church in Wales in a satisfactory condition? He (Mr. Whiteside) had had sent him a newspaper the other day in which was contained an account of a dinner given to Mr. Dillwyn, and the mover of one of the resolutions stated that, as soon as the hon. member had disposed of the Church in Ireland, he would be better able to attack the Church in England. Was it a proper mode to deal with a great institution, linked with the Monarchy, planted in the soil of the country, the ministry, as he believed of the Monarchy itself, to ask whether it was in a satisfactory condition? Why, the condition of the Christian Church was scarcely satisfactory in any part of the world. It had still to contend against the vices and sins and crimes and follies of mankind; it was sometimes baffled and defeated, but he did not show himself to possess a very exalted idea of the Christian Church who relied upon its comparative failure as a reason for its abolition.” (Cheers.) The adjournment of the debate was carried on a division by 221 to 106, but it was not resumed during the present session.

30.—Close of Colonel Waugh's eight years' litigation in bankruptcy, Commissioner Goulburn this day handing him his certificate, with the remark that he thought he had been sufficiently punished.

31.—Discussion in the House of Commons on Mr. Maguire's motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the laws regulating the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, with a view to their more equitable adjustment. On the termination of the debate Mr. Maguire agreed to adopt Lord Palmerston's suggestion, for the appointment of a committee with the limited object of inquiring into the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland under the Act 23 and 24 Victoria, cap. 153.

April 1.—Close of the sale of the Pourtalès Collection, Paris, the twenty-seven days' sale having produced 109,241*l.* The amount was about equally made up between paintings, bronzes, Etruscan vases, engraved stones, jewelry, and coins.

— Sir Charles Trevelyan's India Budget shows a large deficiency in revenue. Government afterwards refused to sanction his scheme.

2.—After a siege, conducted with more or less closeness and activity, for 1,452 days, and in the course of which many desperate engagements took place, the Confederates retire from their capital, Richmond, and leave an unopposed entry to be made by General Grant. The streets were crowded with furniture and every description of wares, dashed down to be trampled in the mud or burnt where they lay. All the Government storehouses were thrown open, and what could not be got off by the Government was left to the people, who, everywhere ahead of the flames, rushed in and secured immense amounts of bacon, clothing, boots, &c. Near the river the destruction of property was fearfully complete. The Danville and Petersburg Railroad depôts, with the buildings and shedding attached thereto, for the distance of half a mile from the north side of Main-street to the river, and between Eighth and Fifteenth streets, embracing upwards of twenty blocks, presented one waste of smoking ruins, blackened walls, and charred embers. The flames gradually died out at various points as material failed to feed them; but in particular localities the work of destruction went on until towards three or four o'clock, when the mastery of the flames was obtained, and Richmond was saved from utter desolation. The chief fighting which led to this step took place with the army under General Sherman at an outwork known as Little Five Forks. The news of this Federal victory, which virtually closed the campaign against the South, was received with great rejoicings at Washington, and arrived here by the Australasian on the 15th. With the fall of Richmond closed the long series of battles which had been waged between the Northern and Southern States. The total number fought was said to be 252. Of these, 89 took place on Virginia soil, 37 in Tennessee, 25 in Missouri, 12 in Georgia, 10 in South Carolina, 11 in North Carolina, 7 in Alabama, 5 in Florida, 14 in Kentucky, 1 in the Indian territory. Once the wave of war rolled into a Northern State, and broke in the great billow of Gettysburg. Of the above, 17 were naval engagements.

2.—Died at his residence, Suffolk-street, aged 60, Richard Cobden, M.P., an apostle of Free Trade in its early and unpopular days, and a zealous labourer in later times for its extension to other countries. "The two great achievements of Mr. Cobden's life," said Lord Palmerston, when referring to the loss which the House had sustained, "were, in the first place, the abrogation of those laws which regulated the importation of corn, and the great development which that gave to the industry of the country; and, in the second place, those commercial arrangements which he negotiated with France, and which have largely tended to improve the trade and extend the commercial intercourse of the two countries. When this last achievement was accomplished it was my lot to offer to Mr. Cobden those honours which the Crown could bestow for such important services, and which were not derogatory for him to accept; but that same disinterested spirit which regulated all his private and public conduct led him to decline those honours which might most properly have recognised and acknowledged his public services. I can only say that the country has sustained a loss, and every man in it." Speaking for the Opposition, Mr. Disraeli said, "There were some men who, although they were not present, were still members of the House—independent of dissolutions or the caprices of constituencies, and even of the course of time. I think that Mr. Cobden is one of those men; and I believe that when the verdict of posterity shall be recorded upon his life and conduct, it will be said of him that he was, without doubt, the greatest politician that the upper-middle class of this country has as yet produced, and that he was not only an ornament to the House of Commons, but an honour to England." Mr. Bright (who was most deeply affected, and hardly audible) said:—"I am utterly unable to address the House, but the sympathy shown on all sides for my departed friend has deeply gratified me. I cannot now attempt to utter the feelings with which I am overwhelmed. At some calmer moment, when I may have the opportunity of addressing my countrymen, I will endeavour to show the lesson which I think may be learned from the life and character of my friend. I can only say that, after many years of most intimate and most brotherly friendship with him, I little knew how much I loved him until I found that I had lost him." The funeral of the deceased statesman took place at Lavington on the 7th, and was attended by all his old friends of the League, with Mr. Gladstone and about one-twelfth of the entire House of Commons. The French Government and press also paid the highest tributes to the memory of Mr. Cobden.

3.—Addressing a meeting at Rochdale called (547) for the purpose of selecting a successor to Mr. Cobden in the representation of the borough, Mr. Bright thus touched upon Mr. Brett, the Conservative candidate:—"These men are all in favour of the good that has been done by men who have given years of their lives—(loud cheers) men you have encouraged from youth to manhood, in the spread of just principles and the establishment of wise laws, and who have done all this in the teeth of the combined opposition—of all the Mr. Bretts in England. Then the Mr. Bretts come forward, and say that the repeal of the Corn-laws was a good thing and the French treaty a valuable measure, and the freedom of the press a great blessing; but still Mr. Brett stands with Lord Derby—and if you will ask him about any one single question, not of the past, but of the future—of the next twenty years, you will have to fight as great a fight for every future good against the Mr. Bretts, just as you have fought against his class and order of mind during the last twenty years." (Cheers.) At the close of the poll the numbers were—Potter, 646; Brett, 496.

3.—The chief magistrates of the burghs or Scotland entertain the Lord Provost of Edinburgh (Lawson) to dinner in the new hall of the Douglas Hotel.

4.—The great southern section of the Main Drainage Works of the Metropolis opened by the Prince of Wales. The length of this Cloaca Maxima is ten miles, with a sewer of four feet diameter at the upper end and two huge culverts at the lower, seven feet both ways, and of which a section was exhibited above ground this day at Crossness. At a luncheon prepared for the large company of Royal and distinguished visitors who witnessed the opening ceremony, the Prince of Wales wished success to the great undertaking.

5.—The lock-out in South Staffordshire terminated, the masters opening their works on condition that the men did not subscribe for the maintenance of those out on strike in the northern part of the county.

7.—Close of the Southern struggle for independence. General Grant writes to General Lee:—"The result of the last week must convince you of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the army of Northern Virginia in this struggle. I feel that it is so, and regard it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood, by asking of you the surrender of that portion of the Confederate States army known as the Army of Northern Virginia." Lee answered:—"Though not entirely of the opinion you express of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia, I reciprocate your desire to avoid useless effusion of blood, and therefore, before considering your proposition, ask the terms you will offer on condition of its surrender." After the exchange of certain other notes, Grant wrote on the 9th :—"Rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate—one copy to be given to an officer designated by me, the other to be retained by such officer as you may designate. The officers to give their individual paroles not to take arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander to sign a like parole for the men of his command. The arms, artillery, and public property to be parked and stacked, and turned over to the officers appointed by me to receive them. This will not embrace the side-arms of the officers, nor their private horses or baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to their homes, not to be disturbed by the United States authority, so long as they observe their parole, and the laws in force where they may reside." Lee at once replied that the terms were accepted, and that he would proceed to designate the proper officers to carry the stipulation into effect.

10.—"Tattersall's" removed from the old familiar spot at St. George's Corner, Hyde-park, to new premises at Knightsbridge-green.

— The Emperor of Mexico promulgates an Imperial Constitution.

13.— Outbreak of disturbances between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic. Today the Paraguayans seize two war-steamers. War was declared on the 16th.

14.—An unlooked-for and terrible calamity befel the American nation this day in the assassination of President Lincoln. "It has become my distressing duty," writes Mr. Stanton to the American Minister in London, "to announce to you, that last night his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, was assassinated about the hour of half-past ten o'clock, in his private box at Lord's Theatre in the city [of Washington]. The President about nine o'clock accompanied Mrs. Lincoln to the theatre. Another lady and gentleman were within the box. About half-past ten, during a pause in the performance, the assassin entered the box, the door of which was unguarded. He hastily approached the President from behind, discharging a pistol at his head. The bullet entered the back of his head, and penetrated nearly through. The assassin then leaped from the box on to the stage, brandishing a large knife or dagger, and exclaiming 'Sic semper tyrannus,' and escaped in the rear of the theatre. Immediately upon the discharge the President fell to the floor insensible, and continued in that state till twenty minutes past seven this morning, when he breathed his last. About the same time the murder was being committed at the theatre, another assassin presented himself at the door of Mr. Seward's residence, gained admission by representing he had a prescription from Mr. Seward's physician which he was directed to see administered, and hurried up to the third storey chamber, where Mr. Seward was lying. He here discovered Mr. Frederick Seward, and struck him over the head, inflicting severe and, it is feared, mortal wounds, and fracturing the skull in two places. He then rushed into the room where Mr. Seward was in bed, attended by a young daughter and a male nurse. The male attendant was stabbed through the lungs, and it is believed will die. The assassin then struck Mr. Seward with a knife or dagger twice in the throat and twice in the face, inflicting terrible wounds. By this time Major Seward, eldest son of the Secretary, and another attendant, reached the room, and rushed to the rescue of the Secretary. They were also wounded in the conflict, and the assassin escaped. No artery or important blood-vessel was severed by any of the wounds inflicted upon him, but he was for a long time insensible from the loss of blood." A spectator near the President's box records still more graphically the details of this, probably the most exciting and dramatic occurrence of modern times. "I remember that a man passed me and inquired of one sitting near who the President's messenger was, and learning, exhibited to him an envelope having a printed heading, and superscribed in a bold hand. Soon after I was disturbed in my seat by the approach of a man who desired to pass up on the aisle in which I was sitting. Giving him room by bending my chair forward, he passed me, and stepped one step down upon the level below me. Standing there, he was almost in my line of sight, and I saw him while watching the play. He stood, as I remember, one step above the messenger, and remained perhaps one minute apparently looking at the stage and orchestra below. Then he drew a number of visiting cards from his pocket, from which, with some attention, he drew or selected one. These things I saw distinctly. I saw him stoop, and, I think, descend to the level with the messenger, and by his right side. He showed the card to the messenger, and as my attention was then more closely fixed upon the play, I do not know whether the card was carried in by the messenger, or his consent given to the entrance of the man who presented it. I saw, a few moments after, the same man entering the door of the lobby leading to the box and the door closing behind him. This was seen because I could not fail from my position to observe it; the door-side of the proscenium-box and stage were all within the direct and oblique lines of my sight. How long I watched the play after his entering I do not know. It was, perhaps, two or three minutes, possibly four. The house was perfectly still, the large audience listening to the dialogue between 'Florence Trenchard' and 'May Meredith,' when the sharp report of a pistol rang through the house. It was apparently fired behind the scenes on the right of the stage. Looking towards it and behind the Presidential box, while it startled all, it was evidently accepted by every one in the theatre as an introduction to some new passage, several of which had been interpolated in the early part of the play. A moment after a man leaped from the front of the box directly down nine feet on the stage and ran rapidly across it, bare-headed, holding an unsheathed dagger in his right hand, the blade of which flashed brightly in the gas-light as he came within ten feet of the opposite rear exit." The report of the pistol did not appear to excite much attention. The screams of Mrs. Lincoln first disclosed the fact to the audience that the President had been shot, when all present rose to their feet and rushed towards the stage, many exclaiming, "Hang him! hang him!" The excitement was of the wildest description, and of course there was an abrupt termination of the theatrical performance. The "leading lady" of the theatre, Miss Laura Keane, who stood at the side of the stage when the assassin sprang from the box, endeavoured in vain to restore consciousness to the dying President. "It was a strange spectacle," says a reporter of the scene, "the head and ruler of thirty millions of people lying insensible in the lap of an actress, the mingled blood and brain oozing out and staining her gaudy robe." In a few minutes there was a rush towards the President's box, when cries were heard of "Stand back and give him air! Has any one stimulants?" On a hasty examination it was found that the President was shot through the head, above and below the temporal bone, and that some of the brain was oozing out. He was removed to a private house opposite the theatre, and the Surgeon-General of the Army, and other surgeons, sent for to attend to his condition. On an examination of the private box, blood was discovered on the back of the cushioned rocking-chair on which the President had been sitting, also on the partition; and a common single-barrelled pocket-pistol was found on the carpet. M. B. Field saw the President in his last moments:—"I proceeded at once to the room in which the President was lying, which was a bedroom in an extension, on the first or parlour floor of the house. The room was small, and ornamented with prints—a very familiar one of Landseer's, a white horse, being prominently over the bed. The bed was a double one, and I found the President lying diagonally across it, with his head at the outside. The pillows were saturated with blood, and there was considerable blood on the floor immediately under him. There was a patchwork coverlid thrown over the President, which was only so far removed, from time to time, as to enable the physicians in attendance to feel the arteries of the neck or the heart, and he appeared to have been divested of all clothing. His eyes were closed and injected with blood; both the lids, and the portion surrounding the eyes, being as black as if they had been bruised by violence. He was breathing regularly, but with effort, and did not seem to be struggling or suffering. For several hours the breathing continued regularly, and apparently without pain or consciousness. But about seven o'clock a change occurred, and the breathing which had been continuous, was interrupted at intervals. These intervals became more frequent and of longer duration, and the breathing more feeble. Several times the interval was so long that we thought him dead; and the surgeon applied his finger to the pulse, evidently to ascertain if such was the fact. But it was not till twenty-two minutes past seven o'clock in the morning that the flame flickered out." The assassin of the President was recognised on the spot to be a person named John Wilkes Booth (the son of an actor once well known in England as a rival of Edmund Kean), and it was soon learned that he had an associate named Harrold. In spite of the vigilance of a large force of police, they contrived to effect their escape on horseback from the capital. Booth was known to have engaged a horse to be ready for mounting near the theatre when the deed was perpetrated. They were traced, on the 26th, to a barn near Port Royal, in Maryland, where Booth was seen supporting himself on crutches; it was then known, he had broken his ankle in the leap from the President's box to the stage, his spur, it was said, having caught in the folds of the Union flag. After some little parley, Harrold surrendered, but Booth steadily refusing to do so, and being well armed, the barn was fired; and whilst the unhappy man was endeavouring to extinguish the flames he was shot dead by a cavalry sergeant of the name of Corbett. Harrold was conveyed to Washington, and afterwards put on his trial along with the assailant of Mr. Seward, and some others. The body of Booth, it is said, was cut into pieces and sunk in the Potomac. Every possible honour was paid to the remains of President Lincoln; the body was embalmed, and, after solemn funeral ceremonies, especially in Washington and New York, removed to Springfield, in Illinois, for interment. The news of the assassination called forth expressions of sincere sympathy from every part of Europe; innumerable addresses from public bodies, and miscellaneous meetings were forwarded, through the American Minister, to the people of the United States; besides which, Queen Victoria and the Empress Eugénie addressed autograph letters of condolence to the widow of the President. The Queen's was addressed, "From a widow to a widow." Any acknowledgment that may have been received was not made public. Addresses of condolence were voted in both Houses of Parliament, Mr. Disraeli remarking in the Commons, that assassination had never changed the history of the world.—"I will not refer," he said, "to the remote past, though an accident has made the most memorable instance of antiquity fresh in the minds and memory of all around me. But even the costly sacrifice of a Cæsar did not propitiate the inexorable destiny of his country. If we look to modern times, to times at least with the feelings of which we are familiar, and the people of which were animated and influenced by the same interests as ourselves, the violent deaths of two heroic men—Henry IV. of France, and the Prince of Orange—are conspicuous illustrations of this truth. In expressing our unaffected and profound sympathy with the citizens of the United States, on this untimely end of their elected chief, let us not therefore sanction any feelings of depression, but rather let us express a fervent hope that from out of the awful trials of the last four years, of which this violent demise is not the least, the various populations of North America may issue elevated and chastened, rich with the accumulated wisdom, and strong in the disciplined energy which a young nation can only acquire in a protracted and perilous struggle. Then they will be enabled, not merely to renew their career of power and prosperity, but they will renew it to contribute to the general happiness of mankind." Intimation of the calamity was at once made to Vice-President Johnson, who took the necessary oaths as President Lincoln's successor on the following day.

19.—Barned's Banking Company at Liverpool stop payment.

24.—Died at Nice, aged 21, the Czarewitch Nicholas, heir-apparent to the Emperor of Russia.

25.—Great excitement caused in London by a statement in the evening papers that the mystery of the Road murder (see June 29, 1860) was at length solved, and that Miss Constance Kent had given herself up as the murderess. Shortly before four o'clock two inspectors conducted the prisoner to the private room of Sir Thomas Henry, Bow-street. Miss Kent was attired in deep mourning, and wore a thick veil which almost screened her face from view. She was said to be slender and much taller than when formerly in custody. She was attended by the Lady Superior of St. Mary's Hospital, Brighton, in which establishment she had been a "visitor" during the last two years, and by the Rev. A. D. Wagner, of St. Paul's, Brighton, to whom she had confessed her guilt. He detailed the circumstances under which the confession was made; and in answer to questions put in various forms, said the act was entirely spontaneous on her part; he held out no inducement to her, and was merely a passive agent in the matter. He understood it not as a private but an open public confession. Again warned by the presiding magistrate as to the serious character of the step she was taking, Miss Kent handed to the clerk a written confession:—"I Constance Emilie Kent, alone and unaided, on the night of the 29th of June, 1860, murdered at Road

Hill House, Wiltshire, one Francis Saville Kent. Before the act was done no one knew of my intention, nor afterwards of my guilt. No one assisted me in the crime nor in the evasion of discovery." She spoke firmly though sadly, and was accommodated with a seat during the inquiry. She was then given into the custody of an inspector, who, in company with Mr. Wagner and Miss Graem, conveyed her to Trowbridge for examination by the Wilts magistrates, and by whom she was ultimately committed for trial.

26.—In anticipation of the efforts being made to organize measures for ejecting Mr. Gladstone from the representation of Oxford University, the Rev. E. B. Pusey writes to the Times, that "knowing his high principles, firm belief, and religious character, I have perfect confidence in his future course. Amid the troublous times in which our lot is cast, and looking on to a future of our Church which on earth I may never see, I have more confidence in his high-principled sagacity and far-sightedness than I have (however much I may respect some) in any other statesman." Sir J. T. Coleridge and others also addressed the electors on Mr. Gladstone's claims on their support.

27.—Lord Chelmsford calls the attention of the House of Lords to the treatment which certain British subjects were receiving in Abyssinia. Earl Russell, in reply, said the delay in answering the King's letter, which was said to be the immediate cause of the arrest, was owing in a great measure to the disturbed state of Abyssinia.

— In introducing a bill for regulating the police force in Belfast, Sir Robert Peel said that during the late riots, 316 people were seriously injured, 146 were arrested, and 13 were killed. The loss caused by the stoppage of mills and other works was 50,000*l.*; and in order to put an end to the strife it was necessary during the three worst days, August 15-17, to introduce into the town, in addition to the local police, a constabulary force of 978 men; 12 officers and 252 cavalry; 57 officers and 1,045 infantry; 3 officers and 36 men of the artillery, with two guns. He proposed to increase the police force from 161, its present number, to 450, one-half to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund.

— The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces his annual financial statement, being the seventh he had presented to the House since the commencement of the present Parliament. The revenue for the year was calculated at 70,170,000*l.*, and the expenditure at 66,139,000*l.* The relief given by the proposed reduction was on tea, 2,300,000*l.*; Income-tax (reduced from 6*d.* to 4*d.*), 2,600,000*l.*; fire-insurance duty, 520,000*l.*—in all 5,420,000*l.*

28.—Illness of Lord Palmerston. A rumour was generally circulated this evening that the Premier was lying dangerously ill at Bocket Hall, and not likely to recover.

30.—Died by his own hands, and in his own house, Admiral Fitzroy, chief of the Government Meteorological Department.

May 2.—In the Divorce Court, in the cases of Codrington v. Codrington, and Chetwynd v. Chetwynd, the decree nisi was made absolute.

3.—Mr. Baines' bill for reducing the borough franchise rejected by a majority of 288 to 214. Lord Elcho moved, and Mr. Adam Black seconded, the opposition to the measure. Mr. Lowe censured the proposal in severe terms. "The British Constitution," he said, "was the most complicated the world had ever seen. The number and variety of interests, and the manner in which these are entwined with each other, serve to make up a most curious piece of mechanism, but, in practice, well confirms the precept which Aristotle laid down two thousand years ago in the words, 'Happy and well governed are those states where the middle part is strong and the extreme weak.' (Cheers.) That description well embodies the leading merit of our Constitution. Are we prepared to do away with a system of such well-tried efficiency as no other country was ever happy enough to possess since the world was a world, and to substitute for it a form of government with which we are well acquainted—that of clear Democracy? In America it answers its purpose very well. In States like those of Greece it may have been desirable. But for England in its present state of development and civilization, to make a step in the direction of Democracy, appears to me the strangest and wildest proposition that was ever broached by man. The good government which America enjoys under her Democracy—whatever estimate hon. gentlemen may be disposed to place upon it—is absolutely unattainable by England under a Democracy; and for this reason, America in her boundless and fertile lands has a resource which removes and carries off all the peccant political humours of the body politic. Turbulent demagogues out there become contented cultivators of the land; there are no questions between landlord and tenant—every one can hold land if he chooses, and transmit it to his children. The wealth which America possesses is of a kind which America did not make, and which she cannot destroy. It is due to the boundless beneficence of the Giver, beside whose works those undertaken and executed by the human race sink into insignificance. The valleys even of the Nile, the Tigris, the Euphrates, seem ridiculously small when compared with the valley of the Mississippi, which it has been calculated would afford residence to 240,000,000 people without overcrowding. No tumult, no sedition can ever destroy these natural advantages. But what is our property here? It is the fabric of the labour of generations, raised slowly and with infinite toil, and to continue it it is indispensable that it should rest on secure foundations."

— The Emperor Napoleon visits Algeria, and issues a proclamation instructing the Arabs from the Koran in the path of duty and submission.

4.—Treaty of alliance against Paraguay signed by the Argentine Republic, Brazil, and Uruguay.

9.—The Committee appointed to inquire into the "Edmunds scandal" present their Report to the House of Lords. They found the first charge, that of purchasing stamps with the public money and appropriating the discount, fully established in evidence; the additional charges of retaining the public money in his own hands and employing the same to his own use they also found proven. With regard to the Lord Chancellor, the Committee, after a debate and division, reported that they could not coincide with the view taken by him of his public duty. In their opinion it was incumbent on him, who presented the petition of Mr. Edmunds to the House of Lords, in some manner to have apprised the Parliament-office Committee of the circumstances under which Mr. Edmunds's resignation of the clerkship had taken place, and with which the Lord Chancellor was officially acquainted, and not to have left them to decide the question of a pension with no clearer light than that which could be derived from vague and uncertain rumours. "The Committee have, however, no reason to believe that the Lord Chancellor was influenced by any unworthy or unbecoming motives in thus abstaining from giving any information to the Committee. . . . All the witnesses concur in stating that these transactions took place without the slightest knowledge of them on the part of Lord Brougham; that he was no party to the arrangement for the appropriation of any part of the salary of the Clerk of the Patents in any other manner than for the sole benefit of Mr. Edmunds."

— The Dublin International Exhibition opened by the Prince of Wales.

10.—Mr. Jefferson Davis captured by a company of Federal cavalry near Irwinsville, Georgia. He was accompanied by his family and a few friends.

12.—The Marquis of Westmeath draws the attention of the House of Lords to the conduct of the Rev. A. D. Wagner in refusing to answer a question put to him by the magistrates at Trowbridge, on the ground that what he knew was communicated to him under the seal of confession. The Lord Chancellor (Bethell) said he must congratulate the noble Marquis on the industry and success with which he had accomplished the understanding of the law in England on this subject; an understanding so complete that it was quite supererogatory to put any question to the Lord Chancellor. "The noble Marquis has very correctly stated the law, and with a much greater profusion of words than it would have been in the power of the Lord Chancellor to utter. . . . There can be no doubt that in a suit or criminal proceeding a clergyman of the Church of England is not privileged so as to decline to answer a question which is put to him for the purposes of justice, on the ground that his answer would reveal something that he has known in confession. He is compelled to answer such a question, and the law of England does not even extend the privilege of refusing to answer to Roman Catholic clergymen in dealing with a person of their own persuasion. There can be no doubt, therefore, that Mr. Wagner was under an obligation to have answered the question put to him if it had been insisted on. The magistrates appear to have had ample material without the information which Mr. Wagner declined to give, and therefore I must assume that they acted on good grounds in not visiting him with the consequences with which he might have been visited."

12.—The Earl of Shaftesbury moves an address to the Crown praying that her Majesty would be pleased to direct the Children's Employment Commissioners to inquire into an organized and demoralizing system of labour known as "agricultural gangs." Agreed to.

14.—The monument to Dante, at Florence, unveiled in presence of the King of Italy and a brilliant assembly.

15.—At the inauguration of a statue to the First Napoleon at Ajaccio, Prince Napoleon makes a speech on the consistency of the Napoleonic traditions. "I love liberty," he said, "under all its forms, but I will not conceal my decided preference for that which I call the liberty of all—a liberty influenced by free public opinion manifested by free and public meetings." The Emperor thereupon addressed his cousin:—"The political programme which you place under the aegis of the Emperor can only serve the enemies of my Government. To judgments which I cannot accept you add sentiments of hate and rancour which no longer belong to our time." Referring to the colossal figure of the First Napoleon, he said it was impossible to take the whole in at once. "But what is clear to the eyes of every one is, that in order to prevent intellectual anarchy, the formidable enemy of true liberty, the Emperor established, first in his family and then in his Government, a severe discipline which admitted of but one will and one action. I cannot henceforth depart from the same line of conduct." The Prince in consequence resigned his office of Vice-President of the Privy Council.

—The Rev. A. D. Wagner writes to the Times that he has been most unjustly charged by a portion of the community with committing the grave offence of betraying Miss Constance Kent's sacramental confession:—"It was at Miss Kent's own request, and by her authority, that I communicated to two persons only the fact of her guilt. These two were Sir George Grey and Miss Graem, and the following document, written by Miss Kent herself, and given to me a few days before Easter, proves that I have only acted in all I have done in accordance with her instructions. The note, which is entirely Miss Kent's own composition, is as follows: 'Sir,—It is by particular request that the bearer now informs you of my guilt which it is my desire to have publicly made known.—Constance E. Kent. To Sir G. Grey.' I may add that the written paper which Miss Kent gave to Sir Thomas Henry at Bow-street was also, to the best of my belief, entirely her own composition. I never saw it, nor was I aware of her having written any paper at all, till she herself produced it in court."

15.—In reply to Lord Houghton's question respecting the intention of her Majesty's Government to withdraw the recognition of belligerent rights from the Southern States, Earl Russell said belligerent rights had never been acceded to them. "We simply recognised a state of war which existed, beyond any doubt, between the Federal and the Confederate States. The United States Government, in fact, recognised the existence of such a war by the proclamation which the President issued in March 1861, in which he declared the ports of the Confederate States under blockade. As soon as that proclamation was issued, the English Government had only the alternative either to acknowledge the belligerent rights of the North, and on the other hand of the South, or to refuse to acknowledge the blockade. The English Government took the former course, which followed inevitably upon their acknowledgment of the rights of blockade claimed by the United States."

—Mr. Ferrand draws the attention of the House of Commons to the position of the Lord Chancellor with reference to recent appointments in the Leeds Court of Bankruptcy, proceedings which the Attorney-General explains, and to some extent defends. As the Lord Chancellor was said to court inquiry in this matter, Government consented to the appointment of a Select Committee, when the question was again brought before them on the 23d inst. (See June 27.)

16.—After a discussion extending over several days, and during which various motions and amendments were proposed, the Lower House of Convocation agree to a general resolution, that "the present Court of Final Appeal on ecclesiastical matters is open to grave objection, and that its working is unsatisfactory." Two days afterwards it was agreed, in conjunction with the Upper House, to address her Majesty on the subject of altering the 36th Canon, relating to subscription.

20.—Mr. Disraeli issues an address to the Buckinghamshire electors:—"Although the state of public affairs is, on the surface, little disturbed, the impending appeal to the country involves consequences as momentous as any recurrence to its sense by the Crown has, perhaps, hitherto offered. Six years ago Lord Derby, then Minister, proposed a measure on Church-rates, which, while it maintained the principle of a National Church, relieved the conscientious scruples of Dissenters from its doctrines or polity. It was defeated by a large majority, on the ground that nothing short of abolition could be satisfactory. A month afterwards, anxious to free alike the Crown and the Parliament from the embarrassments in which they were placed in reference to the question of the parliamentary suffrage, he introduced a measure which would have greatly extended it on principles in harmony with the Constitution, which wisely recognises the electoral franchise as a privilege and not as a right. This measure was also defeated by a large majority, on the ground that no extension of the suffrage could be sufficient which did not involve a lowering of the franchise in boroughs. In this state of affairs Lord Derby advised an appeal to the country, and not having obtained a majority resigned office; an Administration being formed pledged to the total abolition of Church-rates, and to a measure of Parliamentary Reform which should secure the lowering of the borough franchise. The maintenance of a National Church involves the question—Whether the principle of religion shall be an element of our political Constitution; whether the State shall be consecrated; or whether, dismissing the sanctions that appeal to the higher feelings of man, our scheme of government should degenerate into a mere system of police. I see nothing in such a result but the corruption of nations and the fall of empires. On the extension of the electoral franchise depends, in fact, the distribution of power. It appears to me that the primary plan of our ancient Constitution, so rich in various wisdom, indicates the course we ought to pursue in this matter. It secured our popular rights by entrusting power, not to an indiscriminate multitude, but to the Estate, or Order, of the Commons; and a wise Government should be careful that the elements of that Estate should bear a due relation to the moral and material development of the country. Public opinion may not, perhaps, be yet ripe enough to legislate on the subject, but it is sufficiently interested in the question to ponder over it with advantage. So that, when the time comes for action, we may legislate in the spirit of the English Constitution, which would absorb the best of every class, and not fall into a democracy, which is the tyranny of one class, and that one the least enlightened. The leaders of the Conservative party, although they will never shrink from the responsibility of their acts, are not obtrusive candidates for office. Place without power may gratify the vain, but can never satisfy a noble ambition. Who may be the Ministers of the Queen, is an accident of history; what will remain on that enduring page is the policy pursued and its consequences on her realm. That will much depend upon the decision and determination of the constituencies of the United Kingdom in the impending general election."

24.—The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, by a majority of 173 to 140, condemns the "innovation" made in the form of worship in Old Greyfriars Church by Dr. Lee, particularly with reference to the use of the organ and reading of prayers.

26.—Kirby Smith, the last of the Confederate generals in arms, closes the war of secession by surrendering.

— A crowded and disorderly meeting held at Brighton to protest against the practice of the confessional in the Church of England. Mr. Whalley was the chief speaker, complaining much of the indifference shown by the House of Commons on the subject. Mr. Wagner was attacked in the streets on the following Sunday, and compelled to give his assailants into custody.

— Died at his seat, Walton Hall, Wakefield, aged 83, Charles Waterton, Esq., traveller and naturalist.

30.—Commercial treaty concluded between Great Britain and Prussia.

June 2.—Earl Russell writes to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that "the armies hitherto kept in the field by the Confederate States having for the most part surrendered or dispersed, her Majesty's Government are of opinion that neutral nations cannot but consider the civil war in North America at an end. As a necessary consequence, her Majesty's several authorities in all ports, harbours, or waters, must henceforth refuse permission to any vessel of war carrying a Confederate flag to enter."

3.—This morning, at eighteen minutes past one o'clock, her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales was safely delivered of a Prince.

5.—Royal Dramatic College at Woking opened by the Prince of Wales.

— Died at Lancrigg, near Grasmere, aged 78, Sir John Richardson, F.R.S., an eminent naturalist and Polar voyager.

7.—Accident on the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway at Rednal, resulting in the death of seven passengers and serious injury to about fifty others. After a long investigation the coroner's jury returned a verdict of accidental death, but at the same time expressed their opinion that great blame was attached to the officials of the Great Western Railway in not providing sufficient break-power, and better carriages and engines for the trains.

— The marriage of Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild with Miss Evelina Rothschild celebrated with great pomp at the residence of the bride's father, Piccadilly.

8.—Rev. Henry Edward Manning, D.D., formerly of Balliol College, Oxford, and Rector of Wood-Lavington, consecrated Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster in the church of St. Mary, Moorfields.

— Died at Rockhills, Sydenham, aged 62, Sir Joseph Paxton, designer of the Crystal Palace.

— Questioned on the subject of the Irish Church, Mr. Gladstone writes to the Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond (Dr. Hannah):—"It would be very difficult for me to subscribe to any interpretation of my speech on the Irish Church like that of your correspondent, which contains so many conditions and bases of a plan for dealing with a question apparently remote, and at the same time full of difficulties on every side. My reasons are, I think, plain. First, because the question is remote, and apparently out of all bearing on the practical politics of the day, I think it would be for me worse than superfluous to determine upon any scheme or basis of a scheme with respect to it. Secondly, because it is difficult, even if I anticipated any likelihood of being called upon to deal with it, I should think it right to take no decision beforehand on the mode of dealing with the difficulties. But the first reason is that which chiefly weighs. As far as I know, my speech signifies pretty clearly the broad distinction which I make between the abstract and the practical views of the subject. And I think I have stated strongly my sense of the responsibility attaching to the opening of such a question, except in a state of things which gave promise of satisfactorily closing it. For this reason it is that I have been so silent about the matter, and may probably be so again; but I could not as a minister and as member for Oxford allow it to be debated an indefinite number of times and remain silent. One thing, however, I may add, because I think it a clear landmark. In any measure dealing with the Irish Church, I think (though I scarcely expect ever to be called on to share in such a measure) the Act of Union must be recognised and must have important consequences, especially with reference to the position of the hierarchy." The letter concluded with a hope that Dr. Hannah would "see and approve my reasons for not wishing to carry my own mind further into a question lying at a distance I cannot measure."

9.—While the accident on the Shrewsbury and Chester line was engaging public attention, the feeling of insecurity was again aroused this day by another alarming occurrence on the South-Eastern line, near Staplehurst. The first tidal train timed to leave Folkestone at 2.30 P.M. started with about 110 passengers, and proceeded all right for about thirty miles. At Staplehurst the line crosses a stream which, in summer, shrinks to the proportions of a rivulet. On the bridge itself the line was under repair, the rails being lifted and an opening of some width made in the soil. Into this gap the train dashed at full speed, and eight of the fourteen carriages were thrown into the ravine beneath. The destruction was so complete that the broken fragments did not occupy a greater space than one entire carriage. The injury to life and limb was of the most appalling character. Ten of the passengers were dragged to the bank bruised to death or drowned in the stream, and twenty others maimed so frightfully that it was with great difficulty they could be removed from the scene of disaster. The most immediate assistance was given by the passengers in the carriages which remained on the line, prominent amongst them being Mr. Charles Dickens and Mr. S. Reed of the Illustrated News. The evidence produced before the coroner showed that the regulation of the company for the safety of the passengers had been neglected, and the jury accordingly returned a verdict of Manslaughter against Joseph Gallimore, district inspector, and Henry Bengé, foreman platelayer.

14.—The French Courts pronounce a decision in the case of the Countess de Civity against the Duke of Brunswick. About a year ago the Countess—who represented herself as the daughter of the Duke—and "Lady Charlotte Colville" made a demand upon him for 35,000 francs for board and lodgings. Mr. Allan, who appeared for the defendant, stated that "Lady Colville" was simply a beauty of the demi-monde named Charlotte Munden, and that the Duke had met her in the green room of Drury-lane Theatre. The Court declared the claim set up by the Countess to be unfounded, and dismissed the suit.

— Mr. Göschen's Oxford Test Abolition Bill read a second time by a majority of 206 to 190.

16.—Explosion of fire-damp in the New Pit Colliery, Tredegar, causing the death of twenty-six workmen.

19.—Died, Richard Thornton, Esq., one of the most daring and successful merchants of the city of London. He left a fortune estimated at between two and three millions sterling.

— The Lord Chancellor lays on the table a bill for completing the revision of the statute-law and expurgation of the Statute-book. The noble Lord said that the statutes of the realm at present filled forty-four quarto volumes. The bills presented by him on former occasions carried the revision and expurgation down to the reign of James II. inclusive, and the bill which he had now the honour to introduce completed the entire work of revision. If it passed into a law, the new edition of the whole of the living statutes which would follow would probably be comprised in ten volumes only, of the same average size as at present. The next step would be to arrange the statute-law in the form of a digest, under the most appropriate heads, forming a complete analytical arrangement, and then to revise and expurgate the unwieldy and still increasing mass of the decided cases, reducing them to such as constituted the body of existing authorities, and which might in their turn be digested and arranged.

21.—Mr. Samuel Baker, the African traveller, writes from Khartoum:—"There is no longer any mystery connected with the Nile, nor any necessity for expeditions on that head, unless it be desired to explore the great lake I have discovered—the Albert Nyanza. This can only be done by building a vessel for the purpose on the lake. I shall never undertake another expedition in Africa. For the last three years I have not had one day of enjoyment, nothing but anxieties, difficulties, fatigue, and fever. . . I should not have been contented to see a foreigner share the honour of discovering the Nile-sources with Speke and Grant; it happily belongs to England."

24.—The Prussian Government fix upon Kiel as the principal station for their new fleet.

26.—The Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs intimates to the Papal Nuncio that his Government had now determined to recognise the new kingdom of Italy, and so put an end to the isolation of Spain from other European Courts on Italian questions.

— Alsen attacked by the Prussians; surrendered on the 29th.

— The ship William Nelson, with 448 emigrants on board, burned in latitude $41^{\circ} 20'$, long. $52^{\circ} 23'$. Passengers and crew were nearly all consumed or lost in the sea in their attempt to escape to the boats. A few survivors were picked up by the Lafayette, and landed at Havre.

27.—The Committee on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court Inquiry present their report to the House of Commons. So far as the Lord Chancellor was concerned, they entirely exonerated him from any intention of appointing his son to Leeds; they were also satisfied "that no imputation can fairly be made against the Lord Chancellor with regard to the appointment of Mr. Welch; and they further consider that no improper motives are to be imputed to the Lord Chancellor in connexion with the resignation of Mr. Wilde and the granting him a pension, although they believe the pension was granted hastily and without due examination." In the debate which ensued on the presentation of the Report, Lord Palmerston said he thought the Lord Chancellor had not got fair play.

— Treaty of peace and commerce concluded between Great Britain and Madagascar.

— The cattle-plague or "Rinderpest" begins to be noticed spreading in the dairies at Islington and Lambeth. In the former district one cowkeeper lost 106 animals.

— The Russians in Central Asia make another advance towards Bokhara, by seizing the important stronghold of Tachkend.

28.—Discovery of the Nile-source Albert Nyanza. Earl Russell causes intimation to be made to the Geographical Society that letters had been received from Khartoum, dated 10th May, stating that Mr. Baker had succeeded in discovering the second great source of the Nile—second not in importance, but only in the order of discovery, to the Victoria Nyanza of Speke. Mr. Consul Stanley, from Alexandria, spoke of the discovery as that of "The second and main source of the Nile, at Lake Albert Nyanza, north latitude $2^{\circ} 17'$."

— Died at Stanford Rivers, aged 77, Isaac Taylor, member of an old literary family, and a contemplative essayist of great reputation.

29.—Fire at Sotheby & Co.'s auction rooms, destroying literary property of great value, including the Biblical portion of Mr. Ofor's library, then being disposed of.

30.—The Derby won for the first time by a foreign horse—Count Lagrange's Gladiateur.

July 3.—Disaster to Mr. Coxwell's balloon, Research, ascending with a party from the Royal Botanic Gardens, Belfast. The balloon continued its course with success, till an endeavour was made to effect a landing on ground which turned out not to be suitable for the purpose. Here the car got a good deal knocked about, and at Mr. Coxwell's suggestion a leap was made by the voyagers for their lives. Three reached the ground, bruised and frightened, when the balloon, lightened of its weight, shot up with great rapidity, before the other two could escape. One of them was subsequently thrown out, and fell a distance of about twenty feet; while the other was again borne upwards and carried through the clouds for hours, vainly endeavouring during a portion of the time to pierce the silk for the purpose of letting the gas out. Ground was at one time neared, at Glengariff, but the balloon again ascended with velocity, and shaped a course towards the Irish Channel. Seizing an opportunity when it was bumping along the coast, the solitary occupant of the car, Mr. Runge, threw himself out, fortunately at a spot where the fall was broken by a hedge. The balloon was found torn to pieces on the shore of Islay.

— Commenced before the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, the trial of Dr. Edward William Pritchard, Glasgow, charged with poisoning his wife and mother-in-law, in the course of the months of February and March last. The apprehension of the prisoner on his return from burying Mrs. Pritchard, in Edinburgh, excited an interest which increased in intensity as step by step the complicated succession of cruelties came to be unravelled. The leading facts brought out in evidence by the Crown were, that Mrs. Pritchard was seized with illness, the symptoms being constantly recurring sickness and vomiting. In November last she went to Edinburgh, on a visit to her parents, and while there recovered tolerable health. On returning to her husband's house, a few days before Christmas, she had a relapse of the old complaint, which continued at intervals with greater or less severity down to the day of her death. On the 10th of February Mrs. Taylor came from Edinburgh to nurse her daughter. Two days afterwards that lady had an attack of sickness on eating some tapioca which had been prepared for her daughter; and on the evening of the 25th was suddenly seized with an illness, which terminated her life within four or five hours. Dr. James Paterson, who had been sent for to see the old lady on her death-bed, declined when called upon to grant a certificate, and sent a letter to the Registrar, intimating that in his opinion the death was sudden, unexpected, and mysterious. The Registrar took no action in the matter beyond applying to Pritchard, who forthwith gave a certificate, falsifying at once the cause of death and the duration of illness. Three weeks later Mrs. Pritchard herself died, her symptoms having been the same as those she had exhibited throughout. The examination of her body showed that the illness which Pritchard described as gastric fever was in reality due to the oft-repeated administration of tartarised antimony, which the prisoner was known to have purchased in large quantities. It was shown, too, that throughout his wife's illness he had been in close attendance upon her. The poor woman's food had sometimes been taken to her by his hands; sometimes it had been prepared under his supervision; and at all times he had had easy access to her cup and platter. The servant girls, on tasting food prepared for their mistress—but which in some way or other had passed through their master's hands—were seized with sickness; while other inmates of the house suffered in the same way, probably in consequence of using dishes in which poisoned food had been served. In the case of Mrs. Taylor, it was proved that she too had been dosed with antimony, but the symptoms manifested just before her death were shown to be the effects of aconite, a poison, which the prisoner had in his possession, and which was discovered by Dr. Penny to have been introduced into a bottle of Battley's mixture used by the old lady. At the time all this slow poisoning was going on in the prisoner's household his circumstances were in a state rendering the removal of his victims in the highest degree advantageous to him. Another feature brought out in evidence was the unparalleled combination of consummate hypocrisy with relentless cruelty shown by the prisoner's letters and diaries. In a letter to his father-in-law, dated 3d March, the prisoner wrote—"We found dear Mary Jane (his wife) had been very sick between two and three o'clock. . . . No sleep came to her longing wish last night—and oft she woke me—to know why no slumber came. This is very trying to her, and more heartrending to me." Again, on the 6th of the same month: "Mary Jane has had no sleep—still I am in great hopes she is somewhat better otherwise, not being so sick, and feeling more strength." In a letter to his daughter, dated 13th March, he wrote: "I am so sorry to tell you dearest mamma is too weak to write to-day, and did not like you should have no letter." Then, in subsequent letters to Mr. Taylor, occurred such expressions as the following:—"I am vexed and grieved deeply that dear Mary Jane seems making little progress," and "We are all in grief at Minnie's wretched nights—no sleep, and the sickness has been worse yesterday and to-day." Still more significant were such entries as the following:—"March 2, Th. : Buried Mrs. Taylor, poor dear grandma, in Grange Cemetery;" or, "18th, Sat. : At 1 A.M., Mary Jane, my beloved, passed away;" or again, "18th, Saturday: Died here, at 1 A.M., Mary Jane, my own beloved wife, aged 38 years—no torment surrounded her bedside—but, like a calm, peaceful lamb of God, passed Minnie away. May God and Jesus, Holy Ghost, One in Three, welcome Minnie. Prayer on prayer till mine be o'er, everlasting love. Save us, Lord, for thy dear Son."—The principal witnesses for the Crown were servants in the prisoner's family, with one of whom he had formed an improper intimacy—and chemical experts, who revealed with rare exactness and clearness the manner in which the crime had been accomplished. An attempt was made in cross-examination to weaken their testimony, but no scientific witnesses were called in the prisoner's favour. In summing up the Lord Justice Clerk commented in severe terms on the carelessness of Dr. Paterson in not making known his suspicion as to the poisoning of Mrs. Taylor. On the fifth day of trial the jury returned a verdict of Guilty on both charges as libelled, and the prisoner was thereafter sentenced to be executed at Glasgow, on the morning of the 28th instant. Between the date of his conviction and execution Pritchard made a variety of confessions with reference to his crimes—first that his wife's death was the result of an overdose of chloroform which he wilfully administered in a moment of excitement; and that Mrs. Taylor's death was the result of an overdose of Battley's solution of opium, with which he had nothing more to do than placing the aconite in the bottle after death to prevent suspicion, should any inquiry take place. A second confession was so untruthful that it was never made public; a third, given out ten days before his execution, admitted the perpetration of both crimes, and the justice of his sentence. He was hanged in front of Glasgow gaol in presence of an immense crowd.

3.—Censure of the Lord Chancellor by the House of Commons. After a lengthened debate, in which various attempts were made to modify its terms, Mr. Ward Hunt carried the following resolution in its original form as against "the previous question," by a majority of 177 to 163 :—"That the evidence taken before the Committee of this House on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, discloses that a great facility exists for obtaining public appointments by corrupt means ; that such evidence, and also that taken before a Committee of the House of Lords in the case of Leonard Edmunds, and laid before this House, shows a laxity of practice and a want of caution on the part of the Lord Chancellor in sanctioning the grant of retiring pensions to public officers over whose heads grave charges are impending, and in filling up the vacancies made by retirement of such officers, whereby great encouragement has been given to corrupt practices ; and that such laxity and want of caution, even in the absence of any improper motive, are, in the opinion of this House, highly reprehensible, and calculated to throw discredit on the administration of the high offices of State."

5.—Royal assent given to Earl Granville's bill based on the Report of the Royal Commissioners for relaxing the subscription to certain clerical oaths. In lieu of the old form pledging his "assent and consent" to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer, the Declaration proposed by the Bill to be made before Ordination, was as follows :—"I assent to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion and the Book of Common Prayer, and of the ordering of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. I believe the doctrine of the United Church of England and Ireland as therein set forth to be agreeable to the Word of God ; and in public prayer and administration of the Sacraments, I will use the form in the said Book prescribed, and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority." An attempt was made by the Archbishop of Dublin to postpone the bill till Convocation in Ireland had been consulted ; but the measure, as proposed, passed through both Houses.

— In consequence of the refusal of the Prussian Chamber to vote supplies, the King issues a Royal decree, countersigned by all the Ministers, intimating that he placed at the disposal of the Minister of Marine a sum not to exceed 500,000 thalers for the construction of heavy cast steel guns for the fleet, and the Minister of Marine and Finance would require to account to him for the employment of the sum used at the end of the year.

— Resignation of Lord Chancellor Bethell. He took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock, and proceeded at once to make his statement. "I have deemed it my duty," he said, "out of the deep respect I owe to your Lordships, to attend here to-day that I may in person announce to you that I tendered the resignation of my office yesterday to her Majesty, and that it has been by her Majesty most graciously accepted. My Lords, the step which I took yesterday only, I should have taken several months ago, if I had only followed the dictates of my own judgment—(cheers)—and acted on my own views alone. But I felt that I was not at liberty to do so. As a member of the Government I could not take such a step without the permission and sanction of the Government. As far as I was myself personally concerned, possessing, as I had the happiness to do, the friendship of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and of the members of the Cabinet, I laid aside my own feelings, being satisfied that my honour and my sense of duty would be safe if I followed their opinion rather than my own. My Lords, I believe that the holder of the Great Seal ought never to be in the position of an accused person ; and such unfortunately being the case, for my own part, I felt it due to the great office that I hold that I should retire from it, and meet any accusation in the character of a private person. But my noble friend at the head of the Government combated that view, and I think with great justice. He said it would not do to admit this as a principle of political conduct, for the consequence would be that whoever brought up an accusation would at once succeed in driving the Lord Chancellor from office. . . . With regard to the opinion which the House of Commons has pronounced, I do not presume to say a word. I am bound to accept the decision. I may, however, express the hope that after an interval of time calmer thoughts will prevail, and a more favourable view be taken of my conduct. I am thankful for the opportunity which my tenure of office has afforded me to propose and pass measures which have received your Lordships' approbation, and which, I believe—nay, I will venture from experience to predict—will be productive of great benefit to the country. With these measures I hope my name will be associated. (Cheers.) I regret deeply that a great measure which I had at heart—I refer to the formation of a digest of the whole law—I have been unable to inaugurate ; for it was not until this session that the means were afforded by Parliament for that purpose. That great scheme, my Lords, I bequeath to my successor. As to the future, I can only venture to promise that it will be my anxious endeavour, in the character of a private member of your Lordships' House, to promote and assist in the accomplishment of all those reforms and improvements in the administration of justice which I feel yet remain to be carried out. I may add, in reference to the appellate jurisdiction of your Lordships' House, that I am happy to say it is left in a state which will, I think, be found to be satisfactory. There will not be at the close of the session a single judgment in arrear, save one in which the arguments, after occupying several days, were brought to a conclusion only yesterday. In the Court of Chancery, I am glad to be able to inform your Lordships, that I trust there will not remain at the end of the present sittings, one appeal unheard, or one judgment undelivered. I mention these things simply to show that it has been my earnest desire, from the moment I assumed the seals of office, to devote all the energies I possessed, and all the industry of which I was capable, to the public service. (Cheers.) My Lords, it only remains to thank you, which I do most sincerely, for the kindness which I have uniformly received at your hands. It is very possible that by some words inadvertently used, some abruptness of manner, I may have given pain, or exposed myself to your unfavourable opinion. If that be so, I beg of you to accept the expression of my regret, while I indulge in the hope that the circumstance may be erased from your memories. I have no more to say, my Lords, except to thank you for the kindness with which you have listened to these observations." (Loud cheers.)

6.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. At twelve o'clock the Lords Commissioners entered the House. Sir Augustus Clifford having summoned the Commons to be present, Earl Granville read the Royal Speech. The House was then prorogued to the 12th instant. The two Houses having formally saluted each other, the Commons returned to their own Chamber, where the Speaker, standing at the table, read the Royal Speech. The members present, headed by Mr. Brand, then advanced to the table, shook hands with Mr. Denison, and exchanged congratulations upon the termination of the Session. This Parliament (the twenty-eighth of Queen Victoria) was dissolved by a Royal Proclamation made public the same day.

— Numerous election addresses published from candidates for the new Parliament. To Tiverton the Premier writes:—"How long the Ministry of which I have the honour to be a member may continue to direct the affairs of this great nation must depend upon the will of the Parliament now about to be elected; but I think I may be allowed to say for myself and my colleagues that a just judgment of our past administration will entitle us to the same measure of goodwill which has been extended to us by the Parliament now dissolved."—To Birmingham Mr. Bright writes:—"The Administration which, in 1859, climbed into office under the pretence of its devotion to the question of Parliamentary Reform has violated its solemn pledges. Its chiefs have purposely betrayed the cause they undertook to defend, and the less eminent members of it have tamely acquiesced in that betrayal. The Ministry have for six years held office, which, but for promises they made, and which they have broken, they could not have obtained possession of even for a day. . . The Parliament is about to expire—the Ministry will soon undergo such changes as will make it totter to its fall; but the question of Reform lives, and at this moment in the eyes of its opponents takes a more distinct shape than at any other period since the passing of the bill of 1832. I trust the result of the coming general election will show that, notwithstanding the treachery of official statesmen and the indifference of the expiring Parliament, the cause of freedom based on a true representation of the nation is advancing with an irresistible force to its final triumph." To Cambridge University Mr. Walpole said:—"The Conservative principles which have always guided me in my public conduct—combining, as they do, a firm determination to maintain in their integrity our invaluable institutions both in Church and State, with a sincere desire to improve and amend them, so as to secure them, in their utmost efficiency, for those who came after as well as for ourselves—are, I believe, and am happy to think, steadily and constantly gaining ground, and that, too, notwithstanding the efforts which have recently been made to democratize, if possible, by organic changes, our mixed form of government, and to undermine the basis of our National Church Establishment in England and Ireland."—Mr. J. S. Mill, writing from Avignon, gave a lengthy exposition of his principles to the electors of Westminster:—"With regard to Reform Bills, I should vote at once both for Mr. Baines's bill and for Mr. Locke King's, and for measures going far beyond either of them. I would open the suffrage to all grown persons, both men and women, who can read, write, and perform a sum in the rule of three, and who have not, within some small number of years, received parish relief. At the same time, utterly abominating all class ascendancy, I would not vote for giving the suffrage in such a manner that any class, even though it be the most numerous, could swamp all other classes taken together. In the first place, I think that all considerable minorities in the country or in a locality should be represented in proportion to their numbers. What other adjustments of the electoral system to a universal, or nearly universal, suffrage might prove practically the best adapted to secure to every portion of the community its just share of influence, while preventing any class from acquiring an unjust degree of preponderance either by means of property or of numbers, is a question which may be answered in many different ways, and which will require much sifting and public discussion before the best can be selected. In the meanwhile I should be prepared to support a measure which would give to the labouring classes a clear half of the national representation."

7.—Payne, Azteroth, Harrold, and Mrs. Surratt, executed at Washington for their share in the assassination of President Lincoln.

10.—The Court of Queen's Bench give judgment in the case of Dr. Therry and another v. Lord Fermoy and another—an action brought to recover 30,000*l.*, half in cash and half in shares, the alleged price of a concession from the Austrian Government for establishing a Bank in Vienna obtained by the plaintiffs, and assigned to the defendants. The Lord Chief Justice, in delivering the decision of the court for the plaintiffs, said they were to have been paid 10,000*l.* in cash and 10,000*l.* in shares; but as these were now valueless, it was impossible to fix an amount of damage in respect of them. Consequently, the judgment of the court would be substantially for 10,000*l.*, and the amount of expenses agreed upon between the parties that had been incurred in obtaining the definite concession.

11.—The first election for the new Parliament took place this day. In the city of London, Göschen, Crawford, Lawrence, and Rothschild, all Liberals, were elected, over Fowler and Lyell, Conservatives. In Westminster, Mr. Mill was at the head of the poll; the numbers being—Mill, 4,384; Grosvenor, 4,379; Smith, 3,812. In Lambeth, Hughes and Doulton were successful. Walpole and Selwyn were returned unopposed for Cambridge, and F. Peel ejected at Bury. In Edinburgh the contest was unusually keen, and resulted in the defeat of the old member, Mr. Adam Black. The numbers there were—M'Laren, 4,354; Moncrieff, 4,148; Black, 3,797; Miller, 3,721. Of the 657 members returned to the new Parliament, 367 were described as Liberals, and 290 as Conservatives. In the change, the Liberals lost 33 seats, and gained 57. There was one double return for the county of Dumbarton, and Mr. Gathorne Hardy was returned for two places—Leominster and Oxford University. At Cheltenham, one man was shot during an election brawl.

12.—At the nomination at Birmingham, Mr. Bright made a pointed attack on Mr. Disraeli. "Five millions of grown-up men," he said, "had no direct representation in the House of Commons, in a country whose great foundation of government was a representative system, and the representative principle. What was the answer made to this claim? The Prime Minister answers it by contemptuous silence. He has not referred to it in that long and carefully-written address he has issued not only to the electors of Tiverton, but to the electors of the United Kingdom. But what says Lord Derby, speaking through the mouth of his prophet Disraeli? Why, he says, lateral extension of the franchise is what is wanted. He says to the great body of working men—to these five million men—it is true you are shut out; the Reform Bill was not satisfactory; the representation may be amended; your complaint is just, and we will admit—somebody else. Now, Mr. Disraeli is a man of brains, of genius, of a great capacity of action, of a wonderful tenacity of purpose, and of a rare courage. He would have been a statesman if his powers had been directed by any ennobling principle or idea, but, unhappily, he prefers a temporary and worthless distinction as the head of a decaying party, fighting for impossible ends, to the priceless memories of services rendered to his country and to freedom, upon which only in our age an enduring fame can be built up. (Loud cheers.) The 'fancy franchise' has failed. The lateral extension will also fail; we who advocate honest, open, clearly-understood and definite measures—we shall succeed."

13.—In his speech from the hustings at Aylesbury, Mr. Disraeli took occasion to ask what Mr. Gladstone had done with the Terminable Annuities. "Nobody knows. It has been kept a profound secret; but as Parliament has been dissolved, I will tell you. It was a most wonderful thing. Parliament was assembled, the House was very full, as it always is when Mr. Gladstone is going to make a great speech, or to perform some considerable feat. We knew that he was going to perform some considerable feat that night. He had 2,200,000*l.* of taxation which was dying a natural death. It was a fund to which Englishmen had been looking for relief for half a century. There was not a sore or distressed interest in the country which did not say to itself, 'Ecod, when these terminable annuities fall in we shall have a chance.' The men who paid income-tax said, 'Well, Peel took us in about that; he told us we should only have it for four years, and now it's increased, but there is an end to the longest lane, and when those terminable annuities fall in we shall have a good cut at the income-tax.' My friend thought that the malt-tax payers would get a chance. Well, what did Mr. Gladstone do with them? It was a feat of legerdemain which exceeded any conjuring of M. Robert. He took one million and turned it into ducks, then he took another million and turned it into drakes, and for half-an-hour these ducks and drakes flew cackling about the House of Commons, until at last we got ashamed of one another, and we ordered strangers to withdraw, and determined to keep it a profound secret until Parliament was dissolved." (Laughter.)

14.—Emma, ex-Queen of the Sandwich Islands, arrives at Southampton, on a visit to this country for the purpose of obtaining aid to erect a Christian Church at Honolulu.

—Fatal occurrence on the Matterhorn. Mr. E. Whymper, the Rev. Charles Hudson, Mr. Hadow, and Lord Francis Douglas, members of the Alpine Club, set out from Zermatt, on the 13th, all equally desirous of conquering the peak of the Matterhorn, or Mont Cervin, hitherto inaccessible. Mr. Hudson had brought from London wire cables to facilitate the ascent, but finding Mr. Whymper ready to start he left them at the hotel, and set off with his unexpected comrades. They passed the night of the 13th on the snow at the foot of the Cervin, with their guides, Michael Croz, of Chamounix, Peter Taugwalder, of Zermatt, and his son. Lord Francis Douglas, who was but nineteen years of age, alone slept, overcome by fatigue; the others remained awake. At daybreak they pursued their journey, and finding the ascent much easier than they expected, pushed on, and reached the summit about two o'clock in the afternoon. At that time they were distinctly seen from Zermatt with the aid of a telescope; they remained on the summit till three o'clock, when they began to descend. The story of the disaster was thus told by Mr. Whympster:—"The greatest care was being taken. Only one man was moving at a time; when he was firmly planted, the next advanced, and so on. The average distance between each was probably twenty feet. I was detached from the others, and following them; but after about a quarter of an hour Lord F. Douglas asked me to tie on to old Taugwalder, as he feared, he said, that if there was a slip Taugwalder would not be able to hold him. This was done hardly ten minutes before the accident, and undoubtedly saved Taugwalder's life. As far as I know, at the moment of the accident, no one was actually moving: I cannot speak with certainty, neither can the Taugwalders, because the two leading men were partially hidden from our sight by an intervening mass of rock. Poor Croz had laid aside his axe, and in order to give Mr. Hadow greater security, was absolutely taking hold of his legs and putting his feet, one by one, into their proper positions. From the movements of their shoulders, it is my belief that Croz, having done as I have said, was in the act of turning round to go down a step or two himself; at this moment Mr. Hadow slipped, fell on him, and knocked him over. I heard one startled exclamation from Croz, then saw him and Mr. Hadow flying downwards: in another moment Hudson was dragged from his steps, and Lord F. Douglas immediately after him. All this was the work of a moment; but immediately we heard Croz's exclamation, Taugwalder and myself planted ourselves as firmly as the rocks would permit; the rope was tight between us, and the shock came on us both as on one man. We held, but the rope broke midway between Taugwalder and Lord F. Douglas. For two or three seconds we saw our unfortunate companions sliding downwards on their backs, and spreading out their hands endeavouring to save themselves; then they disappeared one by one, and fell from precipice to precipice on to the Matterhorn Glacier below, a distance of nearly 4,000 feet in height. For the space of half an hour we remained on the spot without moving a single step. The two men, paralysed by terror, cried like infants, and trembled in such a manner as to threaten us with the fate of the others. . . . For more than two hours afterwards I thought every moment that the next would be my last; for the Taugwalders, utterly unnerved, were not only incapable of giving assistance, but were in such a state that a slip might have been expected from one or the other at any moment. I do the younger man, however, no injustice, when I say that immediately we got on to the easy part of the descent he was able to laugh, smoke, and eat, as if nothing had happened. There is no occasion to say any more about the descent. I looked frequently, but in vain, for traces of my unfortunate companions, and we were in consequence surprised by the night when still at a height of 13,000 feet. We arrived at Zermatt, at 10.30 on Saturday morning, July 15."—On the following morning three of the bodies were discovered; that of Lord Francis could not be found. As it was thought impracticable to remove the remains, they were buried in the snow with a brief service, but afterwards brought down and interred in the cemetery at Zermatt. Later in the season portions of the body of the young nobleman were discovered through the exertions of Lord Queensberry.—The feeling of regret occasioned by this Alpine disaster was greatly deepened by the intelligence received about the same time that the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Fellow of Trinity, had lost his life on the Riffelberg.

16.—At the Winchester Assizes, George Bloomfield, a person of considerable means, was sentenced to death for shooting Caroline Colborne, at Shirley. He endeavoured to destroy himself at the same time, but the shots were not directed against any vital part. A defence of insanity was set up, but Mr. Justice Keating ruled that the aberration would require to be of such an extent as to disable the prisoner from distinguishing between right and wrong, with reference to the nature and guilt of the act which he had committed.

18.—Defeat of Mr. Gladstone at the University of Oxford. The polling commenced in the Convocation House at nine o'clock on the morning of the 13th. At the close of the first day Mr. Gladstone was in a minority of 6 below his opponent, Mr. Gathorne Hardy. On Saturday the minority had increased to 74, and on Monday to 230. On this day a circular, signed by Sir J. T. Coleridge, chairman of Mr. Gladstone's Committee, was issued to the electors still unpledged, intimating that there was reason to fear the seat was in danger, and pressing upon them the duty of recording their votes in his favour. "The Committee do not scruple to advocate his cause on grounds above the common level of politics. They claim for him the gratitude due to one whose public life has for eighteen years reflected a lustre on the University herself. They confidently invite you to consider whether his pure and exalted character, his splendid abilities, and his eminent services to Church and State, do not constitute the highest of all qualifications for an academical seat, and entitle him to be judged by his constituents as he will assuredly be judged by posterity." On the 18th (Thursday), the last day of polling, the contest was less exciting than at the commencement, as it was certain Mr. Gladstone had little chance of success. He managed, however, to lessen the majority against him, the numbers at the close being,—Heathcote, 3,236; Hardy, 1,904; Gladstone, 1,724: majority of Hardy over Gladstone, 180. The total number of voters who polled was 3,850—a number nearly double that on any former occasion. In the course of the contest Mr. Gladstone received 415 plumpers; Heathcote, 43; and Hardy, 16. The votes split between Gladstone and Heathcote were 1,307; between Heathcote and Hardy, 1,886; between Gladstone and Hardy, 2. Balliol gave 107 votes to Gladstone, and 90 to Hardy; Christ Church, 206 to Gladstone, and 291 to Hardy. Of the 3,669 who actually voted, 689 voted in person, and 2,980 by voting-papers; 2,532 clergymen voted, and 1,137 laymen. Of the former, 1,166 voted for Gladstone, and 1,328 for Hardy. The latter had also a majority of 18 in the laity. At a meeting held in the Theatre, after the close of the poll, Sir W. Heathcote and Mr. Gathorne Hardy were declared duly elected. "Gentlemen," wrote Mr. Gladstone from Hawarden, "after an arduous connexion of eighteen years, I bid you respectfully farewell. My earnest purpose to serve you, my many faults and shortcomings, the incidents of the political relation between the University and myself established in 1847, so often questioned in vain, and now at length finally dissolved, I leave to the judgment of the future. It is one imperative duty, and one alone, which induces me to trouble you with these few parting words—the duty of expressing my profound and lasting gratitude for indulgence as generous, and for support as warm and enthusiastic in itself, and as honourable from the character and distinction of those who have given it, as has, in my belief, ever been accorded by any constituency to any representative."

18.—Mr. Gladstone a candidate for South Lancashire. He was nominated on the 17th with other candidates at the little town of Newton. "I appear before you," he wrote, "as a candidate for the suffrages of your division of my native county. Time forbids me to enlarge on the numerous topics which justly engage the public interest. I will bring them all to a single head. You are conversant—few so much so—with the legislation of the last thirty-five years. You have seen—you have felt its results. You cannot fail to have observed the verdict which the country generally has, within the last eight days, pronounced upon the relative claims and positions of the two great political parties with respect to that legislation in the past, and to the prospective administration of public affairs. I humbly, but confidently—without the least disparagement to many excellent persons from whom I have the misfortune frequently to differ—ask you to give your powerful voice in confirmation of that verdict, and to pronounce with significance as to the direction in which you desire the wheels of the State to move. Before these words can be read I hope to be among you in the hives of your teeming enterprise." Mr. Gladstone made his appearance in Manchester in the afternoon of this day, and addressed a crowded meeting in the Free-trade Hall. "At last, my friends," he said, "I am come among you—and I am come, to use an expression which has become very famous, and is not likely to be forgotten, I am come among you 'unmuzzled.' (Enthusiastic and prolonged cheers.) After an anxious struggle of eighteen years, during which the unbounded devotion and indulgence of my friends maintained me in the arduous position of representative of the University of Oxford, I have been driven from my seat. I have no complaint to make of the party which has refused to me the resumption of that place. I cannot say that I am glad of it, but they are the majority, and they have used their power. As they have used it, I appeal to you, the men of my native county, to know whether that which has disqualified me from representing the University of Oxford has also disabled me from representing you. But, gentlemen, do not let me come among you under false colours, or with false pretences. I have loved the University of Oxford with a deep and passionate love, and as long as I breathe that attachment will continue; if my affection is of the smallest advantage to that great, that ancient, that noble institution, that advantage such as it is, and it is most insignificant, Oxford will possess as long as I live. But don't mistake the issue which has been raised. The University has at length, after eighteen years of self-denial, been drawn by what I might, perhaps, call an overweening exercise of power, into the vortex of mere politics. Well, you will readily understand why, as long as I had a hope that the zeal and kindness of my friends might keep me in my place, it was impossible for me to abandon them. Could they have returned me by a majority of one, painful as it is to a man of my time of life, and feeling the weight of public cares, to be incessantly struggling for his seat, nothing could have induced me to quit that University to which I had so long ago devoted my best care and attachment. But by no act of mine I am free to come among you. (Great cheering.) And, having been thus set free, I need hardly tell you that it is with joy, with thankfulness, and enthusiasm, that I now, at this eleventh hour, a candidate without an address, make my appeal to the heart and the mind of South Lancashire, and ask you to pronounce upon that appeal. (Renewed cheers.) Mr. Bazley and Gentlemen,—As I have said, I am aware of no cause for the votes which have given a majority against me in the University of Oxford, except the fact that the strongest conviction that the human mind can receive, that an overpowering sense of the public interests, that the practical teachings of experience, to which from my youth Oxford herself taught me to lay open my mind—all these had shown me the folly, and, I will say, the madness, of refusing to join in the generous sympathies of my countrymen, by adopting what I must call an obstructive policy." The polling took place on the 20th, when Mr. Gladstone was returned third, the numbers being :—Egerton, 9,171; Turner, 8,806; Gladstone, 8,786; Legh, 8,476; Thompson, 7,703; Heywood, 7,653. The first, second, and fourth, stood as Conservatives; the third, fifth, and sixth, as Liberals.

18.—Earthquake on the slope of Mount Etna, destroying the village of Fondi di Macchia, with considerable loss of life.

20.—The foundation-stone of the new Blackfriars Bridge laid by the Lord Mayor, in presence of the Corporation and chief civic dignitaries.

21.—Came on at Salisbury Assizes, before Mr. Justice Willes, the trial of Constance Emilie Kent, charged on her own confession with the murder of her brother, Francis Saville Kent, on the night of 29th June, 1860. The prisoner appeared in the dock dressed in deep mourning, and having on a thick veil. She first went to the back of the dock and had some conversation with her solicitor; she then put up her veil and came to the front. The Clerk of Assizes stated the nature of the indictment, and asked the prisoner, "How say you, Constance Emilie Kent, are you guilty or not guilty?" The prisoner in a low voice said, "Guilty." Mr. Justice Willes: "Are you aware that you are charged with having wilfully, and intentionally, and with malice, killed your brother?" Prisoner made no reply. After a pause, the Judge proceeded: "Do you plead guilty to that?" No reply. The Judge: "What is your answer?" Prisoner was understood to say "Yes." The Judge: "I repeat, you are charged with having wilfully, intentionally, and with malice, killed your brother. Are you guilty or not guilty?" Prisoner: "Guilty, my Lord." The Judge: "The plea must be recorded." Mr. Coleridge, as counsel for Constance Emilie Kent, acting in her behalf under her own direct instructions, said: "I desire to say two things before your Lordship passes sentence. First, solemnly in the presence of Almighty God as a person who values her own soul, she desires me to say that the guilt is hers alone; that her father and others who have so long suffered most unjust and cruel suspicions are wholly and absolutely innocent. Next, she desires me to say that she was not driven to this act, as has been asserted, by any unkind treatment of her mother-in-law; she met with nothing at home but tender, forbearing love. I hope I may add, my Lord, not improperly, that it gives me a melancholy pleasure to be made the organ of these statements, because, on my honour, I believe them to be true." The learned judge in the usual terms, but deeply affected, passed the awful sentence of the law upon the prisoner, who, after standing for a short time in the dock, covered her face with her veil and was conducted back to her cell.

23.—A splice having been made with the shore end of the Atlantic Cable off Valentia.

the Great Eastern sets out on her paying-out voyage across the Atlantic, accompanied by the Sphinx and Terrible. Faults were discovered next day, when 84 miles had been paid out; and again on the 29th, 707 miles; but on each of these occasions the cable was recovered from the bed of the ocean and the defects made good.

25.—Mary Jane Harris, aged 23, and Charlotte Winsor, aged 45, again brought up at Exeter Assizes, on the charge of murdering the infant child of the first-mentioned prisoner. This time it was resolved that Harris should be admitted as Queen's evidence. She made a revelation which not only shocked the Court, but sent a thrill of horror through every household in the kingdom. "In February last," she said, "I was a servant at Mrs. Wansey's, Tamar Villas, Torquay. Before I went there I had been confined of a male child. I took the child to Mrs. Winsor's, near Shipley Bridge. As we were taking the child there I said there had been one child picked up in the country. The prisoner said, 'I wonder I had not got myself into it once before.' She had put away one for a girl who was confined at her house, who had promised to give her 3*l.*, but she did not give it her. I asked her how she did it. She said she put her finger under the jugular vein. She said she had stifled one three weeks old for Elizabeth Darwin, and thrown it into Torbay, and when it was picked up it was nearly washed all to pieces; that she had put away one for her sister. While her sister was staying at the house, she had directed a letter to be left at the Jolly Sailor for the father of the child, and she received a 5*l.* note by return of post. She said she only gave her 2*l.*, but that when her husband returned from sea, she would make her a handsome present; but she had not done it. I then went on with her to her house and had tea. I asked her if she was not afraid. She said, 'To — with you; it's doing good,' and she would help any one that would not split upon her. I was leaving, and she said, 'I'll do whatever lays in my power for your child.' I said, 'All right,' and went away. I saw my child a fortnight after in Mrs. Wansey's kitchen. The prisoner brought it. She said if I would give her 5*l.* she would do away with the child. I said I had not 5*l.* to give her. She asked me to give her a note to the father of the child. I said I could not do that. She said, 'Get it anyhow else; I'll put them all by for thee if thee hast forty.' I said I should not do any such thing. She said she did, and I could do the same." A little while after the women met again, and Mrs. Winsor renewed her offer:—"She said if I would give her the 5*l.* she would do away with the child. I said she might if she liked. I asked her how she could do it; she said she could get something at the chemist's. On the 8th of February I asked leave to go out, but I went out on the 9th to the prisoner's, and got there at half-past three; the baby was tied in the chair, and the grand-daughter playing with it. The prisoner was sitting on a stool. After talking a little time she sent the little girl out. After she was gone the prisoner said she did not do it before I came out, because if I told on her I must tell on myself, for one would be as bad as the other. I said I would never tell if we were never found out. She asked me if she should do it. I asked her how she would do it. She said, put it between the bed ticks. She then took the child into the girl Pratt's bedroom. I did not go. She stayed there ten minutes, then came back without the baby. She asked me to look in; she said it would soon die. I looked in, and saw the bed made, but no child. The child did not cry. The prisoner's husband came in, and asked, 'Where's the boy?' She said her aunt had been and taken it away. He said, 'Oh!' She brought him a pail and he fastened the handle. He went away, and the prisoner said to me, 'Did you hear the child cry?' I said, 'No.' She said, 'I did, and I was afraid my husband would hear it.' The girl Pratt came back and stayed a short time, but was sent out again by the prisoner to fetch some buns. The girl went out, and the prisoner said she must make haste, as her girl would soon be back. She went out of the room, and came back with the baby. It was dead. She undressed it, and we went into the bedroom and opened a box. I took out the things it contained. She wrapped the child up in newspapers, and then she put it into the box. I put down the lid, and she locked it and put the key in her pocket." The jury now found Winsor guilty; and Mr. Justice Keating sentenced her to death, holding out no hope of mercy. Without seeking to justify the frightful crimes proved against her, this wretched woman's case was afterwards taken up on constitutional grounds, Lord Wensleydale urging it to be without parallel that any person should be tried twice for the same offence. The question was solemnly deliberated upon by the Judges at Westminster, the capital sentence being from time to time deferred till a decision could be arrived at. This decision was in favour of the conviction, but the criminal had been so often reprieved that it was thought public justice would be satisfied with inflicting a punishment short of the original sentence. She was, therefore, consigned to a prison for the term of her natural life.

and he was discharged. Bengé was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

29.—Meeting of members of the Guild of Literature and Art, at Stevenage, to celebrate the completion of three houses erected by the Guild on land given by Sir E. B. Lytton. At the dinner which followed at Knebworth, the host described the new buildings as comprising "three houses, for the artist, the scholar, and the man of letters, modest in themselves, but of such a character that a gentleman may inhabit them with a small but well-assured pension. I associate," he continued, "with the toast of the evening the name of a man whose writings are equally the delight of the scholar and the artisan; whose creations dwell in our hearts as familiarly and fondly as if they were our own kinsfolk, and who has united an unrivalled mastery over the laughter and the tears of millions with as genial and sweet a philosophy as ever made the passions move at the command of virtue." Mr. Dickens replied, speaking in the handsomest terms of the genius of their accomplished host. "The ladies and gentlemen," he said, "whom we shall invite to occupy the houses we have built will never be placed under any social disadvantage. They will be invited to occupy them as artists, receiving them as a mark of the high respect in which they are held by their fellow-workers. As artists I hope they will often exercise their calling within those walls for the general advantages; and they will always claim on equal terms the hospitality of their generous neighbours."

— The Inman steamer Glasgow destroyed by fire on her voyage from New York to Liverpool. The passengers and crew were saved, with the ship's plate and a portion of the luggage. The fire had its origin in the accidental fall of a lamp among the cotton in the steerage.

August 2.—The Privy Council' cause intimation to be given to the President of the Royal Agricultural Society, of the steps they had taken for checking the spread of the cattle-plague, and of the symptoms by which the disease might be detected.

— "A sad and memorable day," writes Mr. W. Russell, "in the annals of Atlantic telegraphy. After midnight the wind rose, accompanied by heavy showers of rain and dense drifts of fog, and increased to a strong gale from the south-west, but the ship scarcely felt it, and went on paying out cable without let or hindrance at a high rate of speed—seven knots an hour. At 8 A.M., when in about 2,000 fathoms water, and with 1,186 miles of cable paid out, a serious fault was discovered to exist about six miles from the ship." To recover this portion the Great Eastern was stopped, and the cable passed from the stern to the bow of the ship. After getting in two miles,—the fault being still overboard,—the engine's eccentric gear and the picking-up machinery got out of order, and the cable unfortunately snapped asunder. "The machinery was still in motion, the cable and the rope travelled aft together, one towards the capstan, the other towards the drum, when, just as the cable reached the dynamometer, it parted, thirty feet from the bow, and with one bound leaped, as it were, over and flashed into the sea. It is not possible for any words to portray the dismay with which the sight was witnessed and the news heard. It was enough to move one to tears, and when a man came aft with the inner end still lashed to the chain, and one saw the tortured strands, torn wires, and lacerated core, it is no exaggeration to say that a strange feeling of pity, as though for some sentient creature mutilated and dragged asunder by brutal force, passed through the hearts of the spectators. But of what avail was sentimental abstraction, when instant strenuous action was demanded? Alas, action! There, around, spread the placid Atlantic, smiling in the sun, and not a dimple to show where lay so many hopes buried." It was at once resolved to put the Great Eastern over the track of the cable, and if possible lift it with the powerful grapple apparatus on board. It was hooked on the 3d, and when 2,200 yards of the rope had been hauled in, a swivel in the latter gave way, and 2,800 yards of rope were lost, the cable having been lifted 1,200 yards from the bottom. On the 4th, a buoy was moored with flag and ball to mark the place—lat. $51^{\circ} 35'$, long. $38^{\circ} 42' 30''$. Another attempt was made on the 10th, which failed on account of the grapple chain having fouled the flukes of the grapple. The last attempt, on the 11th, was in N. lat. $51^{\circ} 24'$; W. long. $38^{\circ} 59'$. "At 5.20 A.M. the grapple was hauled up on deck, and it was discovered that the chain to which the shank was attached had taken a half hitch round one of the flukes, so as to have prevented the instrument catching on the bottom. It appeared from the length of wire-rope covered with ooze that there was not more than 1,950 fathoms when it was down. A host of amateurs, more or less scientific, scraped out the sand and bottled it with assiduity. It appeared like liquid putty in colour, and such imperfect microscopes as were on board failed to show any organic substance in it. The ship's head varied from W.N.W. to W. by S., and as the rope came in the screw was 'set gently to work at times to keep it to the wind, which had increased somewhat, accompanied by showers of rain. The dynamometer index rose higher and higher, till it reached 80 cwt., and once, as a shackle came through the machinery, flew up to 106 cwt. It was a certainty that the Atlantic cable had been caught for the third time, and was fast held in the grapple coming up from its oozy bed. Is there need to say that the alternations of hope and fear which agitated all on board reached their climax? There was an intensity of quiet excitement among us, such as men feel when they await some supreme decree. Some remained below, others refused to go forward, where the least jar of the machinery put their hearts in their mouths; others walked in the saloon or upon the after deck abstractedly. In the bows Captain Anderson, Mr. Canning, Mr. Clifford, and their men toiled on, and thence came constant signals through an acoustic tube and whistle to the bridge to go ahead with the screw or to stop, as the strain on the dynamometer indicated. I had come up from dinner, leaving many at table, and was walking forward from the bridge, when I heard the whistle blow, and a cry of 'Stop it' from the bow. Captain Moriarty had just come up from below with the information that we must certainly have gone over the cable, but the commotion in the bow, and exclamations of grief and regret, told us our last bolt had been sped. At 9.40 P.M., Greenwich time, just as 765 fathoms had been got in, a shackle on the hemp hawser passed through the machinery, and in a moment afterwards the rope parted near the capstan, and flew over the bow with a whistling sound like the rush of a round shot. In all the crowd of labourers not one was touched, because the men held on to their stoppers, and kept the end straight, but the danger appeared so great that with the shout 'It is gone' mingled the eager demand from Mr. Canning and others, who rushed to the bow, Is any one hurt? None. But there lay the cable beneath us, once more buried under coils of rope and wire, to which had just been added 1,750 fathoms more. Signal was at once made to the Terrible, orders were given to get up steam, and all haste made to return from the disastrous spot, which will bear no monument of such solicitous energy, such noble toils, such ill-requited labours. The buoys which mark the place where so much went down will soon be waifs and strays in the strong seas of autumn, and nothing will be left of the expedition but entries in log-books, 'Lat. $51^{\circ} 24'$, long. $38^{\circ} 59'$, end of cable $1\frac{3}{4}$ miles N., 50 W.' and such memories as strengthen those who have witnessed brave fights with adverse fortune and are encouraged to persevere in the sure conviction that the good work will be accomplished in the end." After a parting salute from the Terrible, the Great Eastern turned homeward, and reached Crookhaven on the 17th, and Sheerness on the 20th.

8.—Stephen Forwood, alias Ernest Southey, murders three children of a woman with whom he cohabited, and then shot his own wife and child. Three children, boys, were brought by Southey on the 6th, to a coffee-house in Red Lion-street, Holborn, to be provided with beds for a night or two preparatory to their leaving for Australia. On Tuesday evening, the 7th, he saw them off to bed, the two youngest, aged six and eight, in one room; the eldest, aged ten, in another. He returned to the house soon after this, asked for a candle to see that the children were all right, remained upstairs with them a short time, and went away, promising to return in the morning. In the morning the children did not come down, and on the chambermaid entering the room, she found them all dead—apparently suffocated. Steps were immediately taken to discover the man who had brought the children to the coffee-house, but he was not apprehended before he had greatly aggravated the horror of his crime. The children, it appeared, were not his own, but belonged to a woman named White, who lived away from her husband, and with Southey. His own wife was living in distress with her daughter at Ramsgate. Thither Southey went the morning following, and, gaining access to the room which they occupied, shot both wife and daughter dead at the fireplace. He was immediately taken into custody, when it was found that he was the person “wanted” for the triple murder in Red Lion-street. Southey was known to have been living a loose blackguard life lately, frequenting gaming-houses, and trying to entrap thoughtless players into his toils. He now threw the blame of his crimes on “Society.” “I took the three children,” he said, “whom I claim as mine by the strongest ties, to Starr’s Coffee-house, Red Lion-street, Holborn. I felt for these children all the affection a parent could feel. I had utterly worn out and exhausted every power of mind and body in my efforts to secure a home, training, and future for those children, also the other five persons I felt hopelessly dependent on me. I could struggle and bear up no longer, for the last support had been withdrawn from me. My sufferings were no longer supportable. My very last hope had perished by my bitter and painful experience of our present iniquitously defective social justice, and for this I shall be charged with murder, for criminal murder as well in the truest, strongest sense of the charge. I deny and repudiate the charge, and charge it back on many who have, by their gross and criminal neglect, brought about this sad and fearful crisis. I charge back the guilt of these crimes on those high dignitaries of the State, the Church, and Justice, who have turned a deaf ear to my heartbroken appeals; who have refused me fellow-help in all my frenzied efforts, my exhausted struggles; who have impiously denied the sacredness of human life, the mutual dependence of man, and the fundamental and sacred principles on which our social system itself is based.” Southey was committed to Maidstone Gaol on the verdict of the coroner’s jury, and tried at the assizes in December, for the murder of his wife and daughter. An attempt was made to feign madness, and even to prove it in evidence, but the jury, after a few minutes’ deliberation, brought in a verdict of Guilty. The murderer was executed at Maidstone on the 11th January, 1866.

10.—Mr. Secretary Seward, in acknowledging the receipt of an interlocutory decree pronounced by the Vice-Chancellor, in the case of the United States against Prideaux and others, to recover 1,356 bales of cotton, writes to Mr. Adams:—“The United States do not admit that the combination of disloyal citizens which have raised the standard of insurrection is now, or at any time has been, a Government de facto, or in any sense a political power, capable of giving, taking, holding, or maintaining corporate rights in any form, whether municipal or international.”

The murderer was seen to give a smile of satisfaction when the victim of his revenge dropped into the arms of a brother officer, and permitted himself quietly to be taken into custody. He was tried for the crime at the Central Criminal Court, found guilty, and executed at Maidstone October 12.

Austria agreed to cede Lauenberg to Prussia for 2,500,000 Danish dollars; Kiel to be made a Federal harbour for the new German fleet. Concerning this treaty, Earl Russell wrote, “All rights, old or new, whether based upon a solemn agreement between Sovereigns, or on the clear and precise expression of the popular will, have been trodden under foot by the Gastein Convention, and the authority of force is the sole power which has been consulted and recognised. Violence and conquest, such are the chief bases upon which the dividing Powers have established the Convention.” The smaller German States manifested their opposition to the Convention in the Diet at Frankfurt.

— Constance Kent makes a further detailed confession as to the manner in which she accomplished the murder of the infant Richard Saville Kent. She was examined by Dr. Bucknill and Mr. Rodway, her solicitor, with the permission of the Lord Chancellor. The former reported that "A few days before the murder she obtained possession of a razor from a green case in her father's wardrobe, and secreted it. This was the sole instrument which she used. She also secreted a candle, with matches, in a corner of the closet in the garden, where the murder was committed. On the night of the murder she undressed herself and went to bed, because she expected that her sister would visit her room. She watched until she thought all the household were asleep, and soon after midnight she left her bedroom, went down stairs, and opened the drawing-room door and window shutters. She next went up into the nursery, withdrew the blanket from between the sheet and counterpane, and placed it on the side of the cot. She then took the child from his bed and carried him down stairs. She had on her night-dress, and in the drawing-room put on her goloshes. Having the child in one arm, she raised the drawing-room window with the other hand, went round the house and into the closet, lighted the candle, and placed it on the seat. The child was wrapped in the blanket and still asleep, and while he was in this position she inflicted the wound in the throat. She says that she thought that the blood would never come, and that the child was not killed; so she thrust the razor into its left side, and put the body, with the blanket round it, into the vault. The light burned out. The piece of flannel which she had with her was torn from an old flannel garment placed in the waste-bag, and which she had taken some time before and used in washing herself. She went back into her bedroom, examined her night-dress, and found only two spots of blood on it. These she washed out in the basin, and threw the water, which was but little discoloured, into the pan in which she had washed her feet. She put on another of her night-dresses and got into bed. In the morning her night-dress had become dry where it had been washed. She folded it up and put it into the drawer. Her three night-dresses were examined by Mr. Foley, the police superintendent, and she believes also by Mr. Parsons, the medical adviser of the family. She thought the blood stains had been effectually washed out, but on holding the dress up to the light a day or two afterwards, she found that the stains were still visible. She secreted the dress, moving it from place to place, and eventually burned it in her own bedroom, putting the ashes or tinder into the kitchen grate. It was about five or six days after the child's death, that she burned the night-dress. On the Saturday morning, having cleaned the razor, she took an opportunity of replacing it unobserved in the case in the wardrobe. She abstracted her night-dress from the clothes-basket when the housemaid went to fetch a glass of water. The stained garment found in the boiler hole had no connexion whatever with the deed. As regards the motive of her crime," says Dr. Bucknill, "it seems that, although she entertained at one time a great regard for the present Mrs. Kent, yet if any remark was at any time made which in her opinion was disparaging to any member of the first family, she treasured it up and determined to avenge it. She had no ill-will against the little boy except as one of the children of her stepmother." She said she had not said her prayers for a year before the murder, and that the circumstance which revived religious feelings in her mind was thinking about receiving sacrament when confirmed. She stated, too, that if the nursemaid had been convicted she should at once have confessed. Dr. Bucknill said that the circumstances of her early life indicated a peculiarity of disposition and great determination of character, which foreboded that for good or evil her future life would be remarkable. Although he advised her counsel that at the time of her trial she was sane, Dr. B. is "of opinion that owing to the peculiarities of her constitution, it is probable that under prolonged solitary confinement she would become insane. The validity of this opinion is of importance now that the sentence of death has been commuted to penal servitude for life; for no one could desire that the punishment of the criminal should be so carried out as to cause danger of a further and a greater punishment not contemplated by the law."

They may not exterminate themselves, but they are not the less the fons et origo of extermination. The French knowing this, exterminated their aristocracy, and every honest revolution must imitate that of France. We must do the same. But you asked me, How are we to get them down by the pens of their Voltaires, and then slay them by the hands of their Sans-culottes? We can do as much. Revolution—as it is understood on the Continent—as it is understood in every country where men are sane—has no other object but the subversion of aristocracy. It is nonsense to assert that many of the titled class may be excellent men, and should be received by the people as useful recruits of the popular cause. My reply is, Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. I even fear The O'Donoghue, believing him to be a tool of the aristocracy. The Irish aristocracy must be pounded down by the Liberal press, and slain afterwards by the hands of an aroused and infuriated people. This is the only way to liberate Ireland. Everything else is nonsense." The principal witness against the Dublin Fenians was an informer, named Nagle, who spoke to the circulation of treasonable documents, the collection of money, and secret drilling.

7.—Outbreak of negroes in Jamaica. About 150 men, armed with sticks, came this day (Saturday) to Morant Bay with the avowed purpose of rescuing a person who was to be tried there for some trifling offence. The apprehension of one of their number for disorderly conduct in the Court House led to great fighting and confusion, and compelled the Custos of the district, Baron von Ketelholdt, to issue warrants for the apprehension of twenty-eight of the more prominent of the rioters. On endeavouring to take one Paul Bogle into custody, he was surrounded and protected by a large company of armed blacks, who seized the policemen and compelled them to take an oath that they would act against the Government. On the 11th an encounter took place in the square of the Court House, the rioters overpowering the few volunteers present, and setting fire to the building. They then commenced a wild murderous onslaught on the white people, killing and mutilating in the most shocking manner all whom they came across, and even extending the area of their excesses to the plantations bordering on Morant Bay. "Skin for skin," wrote Paul Bogle, "the iron bars is now broken in this parish, the white people send a proclamation to the Governor to make war against us, which we all must put our shoulders to the wheels and pull together. The Maroons send the proclamation to meet them at Hayfield at once without delay, that they will put us in a way how to act. Every one of you must leave your house, take your guns; who don't have guns take your cutlasses down at once. Come over to Stony Gut, that we might march over to meet the Maroons at once without delay. Blow your shells! roll your drums; house to house take out every man; march them down to Stony Gut; any that you find take them in the way; take them down with their arms; war is at us, my black skins! war is at hand from to-day till to-morrow. Every black man must turn at once, for the oppression is too great, the white people are now cleaning up they guns for us, which we must prepare to meet them too. Cheer, men, cheer, in heart we looking for you a part of the night or before daybreak." When the news reached Governor Eyre at Spanish Town, he caused a body of troops to be sent by sea to Morant Bay, and issued a proclamation declaring that martial law prevailed throughout the entire county of Surrey, except in the city of Kingston. He proceeded to Morant Bay himself in the Cornwall, and saw the commanding officers mete out summary justice to the persons concerned most prominently in the revolt. Short trials, followed in most instances by shooting or hanging, went on for many days in succession. Five tried on board the Wolverine were hanged on the stone archway of the burnt Court House, where the worst of the massacres had taken place. Throughout his tour, the Governor wrote, "I found everywhere the most unmistakable evidence that George William Gordon, a coloured member of the House of Assembly, had not only been mixed up in the matter, but was himself, through his own misrepresentation and seditious language addressed to the ignorant black people, the chief cause and origin of the whole rebellion. Mr. Gordon was now in Kingston, and it became necessary to decide what action should be taken with regard to him. Having obtained a deposition on oath that certain seditious printed notices had been sent through the post office, directed in his handwriting, to the parties who had been leaders in the rebellion, I at once called upon the Custos to issue a warrant and capture him. For some little time he managed to evade capture, but finding that sooner or later it was inevitable, he proceeded to the house of General O'Connor and there gave himself up. I at once had him placed on board the Wolverine for safe custody and conveyance to Morant Bay." He was tried by court-martial there, and hanged on the morning of the 23d. "I have seen," writes Governor Eyre, "the proceedings of the court, and concur both in the justice of the sentence and the policy of carrying it out." Besides Gordon, the Governor wrote that the persons prominently concerned in the outbreak were black people of the Baptist persuasion connected with him, political demagogues and agitators, a few Baptist missionaries, and a portion of the press. Humanly speaking, he said he believed that the promptitude and vigour of action which had at once grappled with and punished the rebellion, had been the saving of Jamaica. Although the steps taken by Governor Eyre met with the entire approval of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, it was thought by many persons in this country that he had shown undue haste and severity in his treatment of the rebels, and Government resolved to suspend him, at least till inquiry could be made into the extent and character of the outbreak. Sir Henry Storks was sent out as temporary Governor, and a Royal Commission of Inquiry was issued at the close of the year.

11.—Publication in the Gazette of the neutrality correspondence between Earl Russell and Mr. Adams, the American Minister. As comprehending the whole duty of this country the former submitted:—"Her Majesty's Government are ready to consent to the appointment of a Commission to which shall be referred all claims arising out of the late civil war which the two Powers shall agree to refer to the Commissioners."

12.—Died, aged 50, W. Vincent Wallace, Esq., composer of "Maritana" and other operas.

16.—Great Fenian Congress at Philadelphia, continuing over several days. There were 600 delegates present, presided over by "Head Centre" Colonel J. O. Mahoney of the 99th New York Militia.

17.—Illness of Lord Palmerston. The following bulletin was issued at 5 P.M.:—"In consequence of having taken cold, Lord Palmerston has been seriously ill, but he has steadily improved during the last three days, and is now much better." At 9 A.M. next morning:—"Lord Palmerston's condition altered suddenly for the worse in the evening of yesterday, and he is now gradually sinking."

18.—Died at Brockett Hall, Henry John Temple, third and last Viscount Palmerston, K.G., Prime Minister of England. He was within two days of completing his eighty-first year, and had sat in the House since 1806, when he entered it as member for Horsham. He was buried with public honours in Westminster Abbey on the 27th. The death of the Premier caused a fall of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in Consols.

23.—H.M.S. Bulldog grounded in the harbour of Cape Haytien, whither she had been sent in vindication of certain outrages perpetrated on the British flag. She was subsequently blown up to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. A court-martial found that negligence had been shown by Captain Wake and Mr. Behena. Both were reprimanded, and the former was dismissed the ship.

25.—Writing from Morant Bay, Lieutenant Adcock reports to Brigadier-General Nelson the result of his pursuit of the rebel blacks. "I have the honour to inform you that on the morning of the 23d instant I started with thirty men for Duckinfield, and visited several estates and villages. I burnt seven houses in all, but did not even see a rebel. On returning to Golden Grove in the evening, sixty-seven prisoners had been sent in by the Maroons. I disposed of as many as possible, but was too tired to continue after dark. On the morning of the 24th I started for Morant Bay, having first flogged four and hung six rebels. I beg to state that I did not meet a single man upon the road up to Keith Hall; there were a few prisoners here, all of whom I flogged, and then proceeded to John's-town and Beckford. At the latter place I burned seven houses and one meeting-house; in the former four houses. We came so suddenly upon these two villages that the rebels had no time to retire with their plunder; nearly 300 rushed down into a gully, but I could not get a single shot, the bushes being so thick. We could all distinctly hear their voices in the wood all round, but after the first rush not a man was to be seen, and to follow them with any advantage was impossible." Captain Ford writes on the same subject:—"We made a raid with thirty men, flogging nine men and burning their negro houses. We held a court-martial on the prisoners, who amounted to about fifty or sixty. Several were flogged without court-martial, from a simple examination. . . . This is a picture of martial law. The soldiers enjoy it—the inhabitants here dread it. If they run on their approach they are shot for running away."

28.—The cattle attacked with rinderpest during the past week, so far as came under the notice of the Inspectors, were 1,873. Since the outbreak the total number reported to be attacked were 17,673; killed, 6,866; died, 7,912; under treatment, 2,047; recovered, 848.

31.—Explosion of a gasometer in the works of the London Gas Company, Nine Elms. A large building called the meter-house was completely destroyed and ten of the workmen killed. Those who saw the explosion described it as one vast upheaving of flame, shooting high in the air with a burst which shook everything around. People nearly a mile off were thrown violently down, and persons who lived in houses adjacent were severely scorched. The flames mounted so high that even though it was the middle of the day, they guided the firemen to the scene from long distances.

— The Commission appointed to investigate the origin, nature, and extent of the disease prevailing among cattle, make their first report. Appended to the document was a series of practical suggestions drawn up by three members of the Commission who were professionally qualified to deal with sanitary subjects, and which it was thought might be useful at this time to owners of cattle. A majority only of the Commissioners assented to the following paragraph:—"Against a disease which is highly contagious, undiscoverable at a certain stage, and too widely diffused for an army of inspectors to cope with it, there is clearly but one remedy which would be certainly and absolutely effectual. That remedy is to prohibit everywhere, for a limited time, any movement of cattle from one place to another. Enforce this, and within a time which cannot last very long the disease is at an end. It must stand still and it must starve for want of nutriment. This great sacrifice would certainly eradicate the evil; we cannot say so of any sacrifice less than this."

November 1.—Mr. Gladstone visits Glasgow, and is presented with the freedom of the city. In his reply, he made a touching allusion sion to the heavy losses which the country had recently sustained in the ranks of official life. "It has been my lot to follow to the grave several of those distinguished men who have been called away from the scene of their honourable labours—not, indeed, before they had acquired the esteem and confidence of the country, but still at a period when the minds and expectations of their fellow-countrymen were fondly fixed upon the thought of what they might yet achieve for the public good. Two of your own countrymen—Lord Elgin and Lord Dalhousie—Lord Canning, Lord Herbert, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and the Duke of Newcastle, by some singular dispensation of Providence, have been swept away in the full maturity of their faculties and in the early stages of middle life—a body of men strong enough of themselves in all the gifts of wisdom and of knowledge, of experience and of eloquence, to have equipped a Cabinet for the service of the country. And therefore, my Lord, when I look back upon the years that have passed, though they have been joyful years in many respects, because they have been years in which the Parliament of this country has earned fresh and numerous titles to the augmented confidence of its citizens, they are also mournful in that I seem to see the long procession of the figures of the dead, and I feel that those who are left behind are, in one sense, solitary upon the stage of public life." (Cheers.) The Chancellor of the Exchequer visited Edinburgh on the 3d, and delivered to the students his valedictory address as Rector of the University, the subject selected for illustration being—"The Place of Ancient Greece in the providential Order of the World."

1.—Died at Acton-green, aged 66, John Lindley, F.R.S., an eminent botanist and landscape-gardener.

4.—Dr. Beke leaves London on a mission to Abyssinia, in connexion with the Abyssinian Captives' Liberation Fund.

5.—The Master of the Rolls gives judgment in a case which had come before the Court in various forms as to a bequest of a sum of about 60,000*l.* in the will of the late Lord Henry Seymour. The will was made in France, and written in the French language; the passage causing the controversy being—"Aux Hospices de Paris et de Londres." The question the English courts had to determine was, what institutions were included under the word "hospices." After examining a number of French definitions of the word, his Honour held that such a word, and the gift covered by it, did not include "hospitals" as generally understood in this country, but must be confined to such institutions as gratuitously received within their walls and permanently provided for persons incapacitated from taking care of themselves, either from old age combined with poverty, or neglected infancy, or mental incapacity, or from bodily ailments not susceptible of cure. Such a gift did not include such hospitals as discharged their patients when cured or when incurable, such as Bartholomew's and St. George's Hospitals; or hospitals merely for the relief of sickness, and not admitting inmates, such as dispensaries. The gift must be construed and confined strictly within the meaning of the French word "hospice," and the various claimants must be marshalled accordingly.

6.—The Confederate cruiser, Shenandoah, arrives in the Mersey and is deserted by her officers and crew. According to the statement of Captain Waddell, she disarmed and started for England as soon as authentic intelligence was obtained of the close of the war. The vessel was delivered over to the Consul of the United States on the 9th.

—The Gazette announces the accession of Earl Russell to the office of First Lord of the Treasury, vacant by the death of Lord Palmerston. The Earl of Clarendon succeeded to the Foreign Office. In the other offices there was no change from the Palmerston Cabinet.

11.—Mr. Carlyle elected Rector of Edinburgh University by a majority of 657 to 310 over Mr. Disraeli.

—James Stephens, the Fenian head centre, captured and lodged in Richmond Bridewell, Dublin.

15.—Conference between prelates of the Anglican and Greek Churches to promote harmonious intercourse.

—Disorderly proceedings in Highgate Cemetery, on the occasion of the funeral of Tom Sayers, the pugilist, which was attended from his residence in Camden Town, by a long procession of costermongers, dog-fanciers, professional fighters, and thieves. They overpowered the police at the cemetery gates, took forcible possession of the ground, and kept up a scene of fighting and disorder, which, it was feared, might end in some cases fatally.

16.—Meeting of Oxford University in the hall of Oriel College, to consider the question of the extension of the University, with a view especially of the education of persons needing assistance, and desirous of admission to the Christian ministry. After some discussion, it was resolved that each college and hall should name one member to make up a committee to consider what steps should be taken with a view to the extension of the University.

24.—Through the connivance of a warder, the Fenian head centre, James Stephens, escapes from Richmond Prison, Dublin. A reward of 1,000*l.* was offered for his apprehension.

—Came on for hearing in the Divorce Court, the case of Broadwood v. Broadwood and the Duke of St. Albans, a suit instituted by the petitioner for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from the respondent on the ground of adultery with the co-respondent and others, known as "the Colonel" and "O." The respondent, in her pleas, denied the adultery, and charged the petitioner with condeuing thereto by his own cruelty, neglect, and adultery with a Mrs. Plunkett, with whom he was at present living. Before her marriage, the respondent appeared to have introduced herself to the young Duke of St. Albans as "a fast and very loose young female, up to every vice under the sun, except humbug, and well worthy of your notice." The jury found that the respondent had been guilty of adultery with the co-respondent and others, and that Broadwood himself had been guilty of adultery. The Judge dismissed the petition with costs as against Mrs. Broadwood, but made no order as against the Duke of St. Albans.

27.—Came on in the Court of Queen's Bench the case of the Queen v. Cobbett, the defendant being charged under fifty-five counts with engaging subjects to serve in arms against a foreign Power not at war with England. He was captain of the Sea King, which left London ostensibly for Bombay, but put into Madeira, where she was boarded by Confederate officers, and equipped as a cruiser, under the name of the Shenandoah. On the main question, whether the defendant induced any person to enlist in a foreign service, or prevailed upon any of his crew to remain after the vessel was sold, the jury returned a verdict of Not guilty.

30.—Fenian trials commenced at Dublin, before the Special Commission. Thomas Clarke Luby, of the Irish People, was first placed at the bar on the restricted charge of treason-felony. The informer, Nagle, said that at certain meetings in the People office, drill-forms were produced. "There was a blank space in which the name of the captain, or B, was entered; the squares then showed how the captain, the sergeant, or C, and the rank and file, or D, were armed; also the strength of the company. A V signified a man armed with a rifle; the inverted V signified a man armed with a gun or pistol. A stroke signified that the man was armed with a pike. A circle signified a man not armed at all. I learned from Mulchay that the object of the society was to overthrow the Queen's Government in Ireland, and when that was done the Republic was to be established." Mr. Best addressed the Court for the prisoners, but called no witnesses. The jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and Luby was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude. John O'Leary was sentenced to penal servitude for a similar term. O'Donovan (Rosa) was sentenced to penal servitude for life.

An important question in the law of international copyright heard before the Lords Justices, in the form of an appeal from a judgment pronounced by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., publishers, instituted the suit to restrain Messrs. Routledge and Co., publishers, from printing, publishing, or selling the work by Miss S. Cummins, entitled "Haunted Hearts," which was published by Messrs. Low and Co. in May 1864. Miss Cummins, a native of the United States, resided at Montreal at the time of the assignment of the copyright to the plaintiffs, and also at the time of their entry of the assignment at Stationers' Hall, and they submitted that, though she was an alien and a native of a country between which and the United Kingdom no international law of copyright subsists, her residence within British dominions at those periods, and the publication of her work for the first time in England, were sufficient to meet the objection of the defendants, that being a native of the United States she could neither possess nor assign copyright in her work. The Vice-Chancellor decided in favour of the plaintiffs: hence this appeal by the defendants. Lord Justice Turner gave judgment at considerable length, remarking, in conclusion, that the question in this case was not what were the rights of the authoress in Canada, but what were her rights in this country, and the law of the country left no doubt upon that question. The 25th section of the Act under consideration enacted that all copyright should be deemed to be personal property, and it was decided that an alien might by common law acquire within this realm, by gift or other lawful means, personal property, and might maintain an action in respect of it. Therefore he agreed with the Vice-Chancellor, and the appeal must be dismissed. Lord Justice Knight Bruce was of the same opinion. The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs.

December 4.—In the annual Message to Congress, President Johnson makes allusion to the differences with Great Britain, arising from the damage committed upon American commerce by Confederate cruisers—"The formal accordance of belligerent rights to the insurgent States was unprecedented, and has not been justified by the issue. . . . The sincere desire for peace by which I am animated led me to approve the proposal already made to submit the questions which had thus arisen between the countries to arbitration. These questions are of such moment that they must have commanded the attention of the great Powers, and are so interwoven with the peace and interests of every one of them as to have insured an impartial decision. I regret to inform you that Great Britain declined the arbitration, but, on the other hand, invited us to the formation of a joint commission to settle mutual claims between the two countries, from which those for the depredations before mentioned should be excluded. The proposition, in that very unsatisfactory form, has been declined."

—Commenced in Edinburgh, before Lord Jarviswood and a jury, the case of Longworth (Mrs. Yelverton) v. Beresford Hope and Cooke, being an action for an alleged libellous article inserted in the Saturday Review, regarding the plaintiff. "We have no notion," wrote the critic, "of making a heroine of such a person as Miss Longworth. She is out of keeping with society, both as it is and as it ought to be. She is an adventuress, launched into the world nobody knows how, with a previous history which has never been told. She is a sœur de charité, but she meets and courts adventures little in keeping with her semi-conventual dress and office. She sinner it and saints it by turns or at once. She is made up of passion and prudence, of hard intellectual vigour, and sensuous thoughts and feelings. She writes as no modest woman writes, and she schemes as no modest woman would scheme. She has religious scruples, but they do not restrain her from provoking at least to sin. The best that can be hoped for her is that she will abandon that world which will act most kindly by forgetting her, and forgiving her offence against society." The jury, by a majority of nine to three, returned a verdict for the defendants.

8.—The judges of the Court of Session, in Edinburgh, decide unanimously against the Rev. G. H. Forbes, who had appealed against the authority of the recent canons adopted by the Scottish Church, declaring the Communion Office in the English service to be of primary use, and permitting the Scotch Office only under certain restrictions. Lord Neaves gave an elaborate judgment, tracing the history of Episcopacy in Scotland from the Revolution to the present time.

— Mr. Secretary Cardwell having desired on behalf of her Majesty's Government that Governor Eyre should furnish more exact information than he had yet done concerning the military shootings and hangings at Morant Bay, the Governor now writes:—"It is very probable that some occurrences may have taken place which cannot be justified during the prevalence of martial law, and where so much was necessarily left to the discretion of, or where an unforeseen responsibility was by circumstances forced upon, subordinate authorities, differing greatly in character, ability, temper, experience, and judgment. Such cases can only be sincerely deplored. It would have been impossible, under the excitement and urgency of the circumstances attending the outbreak, to have either guarded against or prevented their taking place. It must be remembered, too, that the threatening accounts received from the other districts of the colony, and the limited means of meeting any difficulties which might arise there, made it a matter of simple self-defence that the outbreak in the east should both be put down with the least possible delay, and be punished in the most summary manner. The safety, in fact the preservation of the colony, made this imperative. As regards the general features of, and mode of carrying out, the retribution which was so necessarily and justly dealt to those who were principals in this most cruel and unprovoked insurrection, I do not doubt but that ample justification will be forthcoming by the officers under whose immediate directions and supervision it took place. Those officers were Major-General O'Connor, in Kingston; Brigadier-General Nelson, in the districts east of Morant Bay; and Colonel Hobbs, in the district north-west of Morant Bay."

10.—Died, at Laeken, Brussels, Leopold, first King of the Belgians, in his 75th year.

11.—Meeting held in Exeter-hall to denounce Governor Eyre and his subordinates, for the excessive severity used in suppressing the Jamaica insurrection.

— Miss Mary Eyre, sister of the Governor of Jamaica, indignant at the course pursued by the Abolition party in this country, wrote to the Star,—"It is not fair, sir, it is not English to publish only letters abusing a man, and stigmatizing him as 'a wholesale murderer and a Robespierre,' who ought to be hung with the same rope with which he hung Gordon, and none in his defence. His sister surely may say a word for him." This brought down on her a number of anonymous communications, two of which she sent to the Times:—"Madam, you have done a smart thing, no doubt, trying to defend your bloody murderous brother, who deserves a rope if any one ever did, and I hope he will get it. The 50l. you speak of makes his character the blacker. It is stolen goods; plunder from the poor blacks. A greater scoundrel never walked the earth, and to help him he got the bloody Nelson and others to work, and 'rum'd' the sailors, that they might cut up the poor people because they are black and coloured. The curse of the nation and the world will ever rest upon your family for those bloody crimes. 'Blood cries for vengeance upon you all.'"—"Madam, I have just read your silly letter, and just as sure as your dastard of a brother murdered poor Mr. Gordon, so shall he swing for it at the Old Bailey."

— Sir Henry Storks appointed temporary Governor of Jamaica. He left England on the 18th with the Commissioners (Messrs. Gurney and Maule) appointed to inquire into the recent disturbances.

12.—Exhibition of Arts and Industry opened at Glasgow by the Duke of Argyll. It continued a source of considerable attraction till the close of March 1866.

13.—The Samphire mail-steamer, plying between Dover and Calais, run into by the American barque Fanny Buck. Several of the passengers were drowned.

14.—The Emperor of Austria opens the Hungarian Diet at Pesth, and announces that after the settlement of certain questions affecting the Constitution, the representatives might discuss the programme of the coronation.

16.—The cattle-plague inspectors report that the number of animals attacked during the past week had risen to 6,054. The number now reported as attacked since the outbreak was 73,549; killed, 13,931; died, 41,491; under treatment, 11,082; recovered, 7,045.

19.—Count Eulenberg sentenced to four months' imprisonment for his participation in the fatal attack on M. Ott, Prince Alfred's cook.

20.—The Ibis steamer, trading between London and Cork, lost on the Julien Rock, near the harbour of the latter port. Her machinery first broke down, and then the rope of the Sabrina, by which she was taken in tow, snapped asunder.

— Explosion of fire-damp in the Upper Gethin coal-pit, Merthyr Tydvil, causing the death of thirty men and boys, nearly all who were on the heading at the east level when the disaster occurred.

23.—Died, at Pisa, aged 72, Sir C. L. Eastlake, President of the Royal Academy.

28.—The eight hundredth anniversary of the foundation of Westminster Abbey celebrated by special service, the sermon being preached by Dean Stanley.

1866.

January 1.—Fire in St. Katherine's Dock, consuming portion of two bonded warehouses, and a large quantity of tallow and oil.

3.—In an address at Rochdale on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, Mr. Bright remarked that he had seen a paragraph the other day cut from an Indian newspaper which, describing the immensely extensive household of a native prince, stated that there were hundreds of what were called prophesying Brahmins in his establishment. "A Brahmin is a Hindoo priest, and is of great authority. Now, I have no doubt whatever that there are prophesying Brahmins in the great Whig House somewhere, and I dare say they are foretelling all sorts of evils that may come from the passing of this bill. I venture to foretell Lord Russell that their counsels, if followed, will be not only perilous, but I believe they will be fatal counsels to him and to his Government. There is in an old poem that I read with great pleasure many years ago—the 'Faery Queen'—a line which I think may teach us something in our present position, 'No fort is fencible, no wall is strong, but that continual battery may rive.' I feel certain that the fort of selfishness and monopoly cannot be held for ever, and that the walls of privilege cannot through all time resist the multitude that are gathering to the assault. In all the nations of the world of this day, I believe the powers of Good are gaining steadily on the powers of Evil. I think it is eminently so in this country. Let us take courage then. We are endeavouring by constitutional means to compass a great constitutional end; to make Parliament not only the organ of the will, but the honest and faithful guardian of the interests of all classes in the country. It is a great and noble purpose which we have set ourselves to do, but it is a purpose which cannot fail, if we are true to it and to ourselves." (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

3.—Crewe Hall, Cheshire, the seat of Lord Crewe, destroyed by fire. From the moment the flames were discovered on the top of the eastern wing, the progress of the fire was extremely rapid; and before anything like combined efforts could be made to arrest it the flames had spread along the marble hall, picture gallery, drawing-room, and chapel.

4.—The Bank of England raises the rate of discount from 7 to 8 per cent.

8.—A member of the Pall Mall staff of writers (Mr. James Greenwood) passes this night in the casual ward of Lambeth workhouse, and reveals in a graphic narrative the irregularity, neglect, and disorder which prevailed in such places. The revelations made led to casual wards being placed under the control of the police.

— M. du Chaillu attends a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, and details the adventures which had befallen him in the course of his second journey into Western Equatorial Africa. He described the existence of a race of dwarves averaging from four feet four to four feet five inches in height, in the existence of which the chairman, Mr. Crawford, felt himself compelled to state he entirely disbelieved.

9.—Commenced in the Admiralty Court, the pleadings in the great Banda and Kirwee Prize-money case, involving the distribution of a sum estimated at 800,000*l.* The claimants were the respective armies, divisions, or columns under General Sir George Whitlock, Sir Hugh Rose, General Robinson, General Smith, Sir Thomas Hamilton, General Wheeler, General Carthew, the Futtehpore column (which was afterwards under General Maxwell), General Sir J. Roberts, and lastly the executors of the late Lord Clyde, who was Commander-in-chief in India at the time. The proceedings in the suit were printed, and filled seven folio volumes, some of them containing upwards of three hundred pages, and there were between thirty and forty counsel (including twelve Queen's Counsel) engaged in the case. The questions to be decided were whether the actual captors—Sir George Whitlock and his army—were entitled to the whole of the booty, or whether the other columns supporting the military movements which made the capture possible were entitled to share to any extent, and also whether the executors of the late Lord Clyde were entitled to a share. On one of the days of hearing, Mr. Bovill brought forward a Scriptural argument bearing on the division of prize-money. In the Book of Samuel, it was narrated that David, with a part of his army, pursued the Amalekites, and took much spoil; and since some portions of David's army had been left on the road in charge of the baggage while the remainder pursued the enemy, the question was raised whether the pursuers alone should take the booty, or share it with those who remained behind. King David decided that the whole army should share the spoil, because those who had been left behind on duty formed a necessary part of the scheme of capture. The arguments were now protracted till the 28th Feb. Dr. Lushington delivered judgment on the 30th June. He disallowed Sir Hugh Rose's claim as a constructive captor on the ground that no junction had ever been effected between his forces and those of General Whitlock. "The result of the judgment is," he said, "that I declare Lord Clyde and his staff, personal as well as general, entitled to share in the booty captured at Banda and Kirwee; and, subject to this right, I award the whole of the booty to General Whitlock and his forces, including amongst the latter the troops under General Keating, and any other troops left by General Whitlock on his march, but who, at the time of the capture, formed a portion of his division, and were still under his command. I disallow all other claims. I shall direct that the costs of the various parties be paid out of the fund." These costs, it was thought, would amount to 75,000*l.* The judgment alone filled twenty-nine printed pages.

10.—Severe storm in the English Channel. Off Torbay as many as thirty wrecks were observed at onetime. The loss of life there and at other places along the coast was considerable. A heavy snow also interrupted for a time the greater part of the telegraphic system.

11.—Mr. Göschen appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and made a Cabinet Minister.

—Wreck of the iron steamship London in the Bay of Biscay, and loss of 220 lives. She left Gravesend on the 30th December, but met with such severe weather in the Channel that she was obliged to put into St. Helen's Road for shelter. She arrived at Plymouth on the 4th, and embarked an unusually large number of passengers. On the 7th she encountered a fierce gale, and being heavily laden sustained considerable damage. On the 8th and 9th fresh disasters occurred, the masts being carried away by the deck and also the port life-boat. Though the sea was in the wildest commotion the screw was still kept moving, and Captain Martin resolved to put back to Plymouth; but this design was frustrated by a huge sea breaking over the vessel on the night of the 10th. The hatchway over the engine-room was entirely demolished, and the fires submerged. The chief engineer remained at his post until the water had risen above his waist, when he went on deck and reported that his fires were out and his engines rendered useless. Captain Martin, with calm conviction, remarked that he was not surprised; on the contrary, he had expected such a result. Finding his ship at length little more than a log on the water, he immediately ordered the maintop-sail to be set, in the hope of keeping her before the wind. This difficult work had scarcely been accomplished, when the force of the tempest tore the sail into ribbons, with the exception of one corner, under which the ship lay to throughout the night. The donkey-engine (supplied with steam by a boiler upon deck) and all the deck pumps were kept going throughout the night, and the passengers of all classes, now aroused to a sense of their imminent danger, shared with the crew the most arduous labour. Notwithstanding every effort the water gained upon the pumps, and the gale continuing at its height, cross-seas with tremendous force were constantly breaking over the vessel, which at length succumbed to the unequal conflict. From this moment the motion of the ship was low and heavy, and she refused to rise to the action of the waves. At a quarter after 4 o'clock on the morning of the 11th she was struck by a sea, which carried away four of her sternposts and admitted floods of water through the breach. From this time all efforts were useless, and at daybreak Captain Martin, whose cool intrepidity had never for a moment forsaken him, entered the cuddy, where all classes of passengers had now taken refuge, and, responding to a universal appeal, calmly announced the end of all human hope. His solemn words were as solemnly received—a resigned silence prevailing throughout the assembly, broken only at brief intervals by the well-timed and appropriate exhortations of the Rev. Mr. Draper, whose spiritual services had been incessant during the last twenty-four hours. At 10 A.M., the ship still rolling deeply, an attempt was made to launch the starboard-pinnace, but a sea struck her as she reached the water, and the boat sank, leaving a crew of five men struggling for their lives. As the ship was lying to three of them managed to scramble up the sides of the ship, and the other two were caught up by ropes thrown to them. After this the exhausted crew appeared indifferent to their fate, and no further effort at launching the remaining boats was made until 1 o'clock, when the ship was evidently settling down, and the port-pinnace was got over the side. Even at this moment the sea was so heavy that those of the passengers who were within reach of the boat appeared to prefer the frail shelter of the sinking vessel to the obvious dangers of a small boat in a raging sea. At this crisis Captain Martin, always at hand, addressing Mr. Greenhill, his chief engineer, under whose command this particular boat was rated, said, "There is not much chance for the boat. There is none for the ship. Your duty is done. Mine is to remain here. Get in and take the command of the few it will hold." Thus prompted, Mr. Greenhill, with his fellow-engineers and some few others, numbering only nineteen souls, among whom were only three second-class passengers, quitted the ship, with only a few biscuits in the shape of provisions, and no water. The pinnace had scarcely cleared the wake of the vessel, upon the poop of which upwards of fifty of the passengers were grouped, when a tremendous sea was seen to break over the doomed circle. When the ship rose slowly again, they were discovered to have been swept into the surging waters. Another moment and the vessel herself, settling down stern foremost, threw up her bow into the air and sank beneath the waves. The pinnace having no sails on board would only keep afloat before the wind, and was repeatedly in danger of swamping. At 3 A.M. on the 12th they sighted the sails of a brig the crew of which overheard their shouts, but failing to get into the track of the boat after several fruitless attempts, she bore away. A few hours later they were sighted by the Italian barque Adrianople, which bore down on the drifting pinnace and rescued the miserable occupants from the dreadful fate which for so many hours had been staring them in the face. These few survivors of the great company of the London were landed safely at Falmouth. Among those who went down with the ship were G. V. Brooke, tragedian (who wrought with great eagerness to keep her afloat), Dr. Woolley, Principal of Sydney College, Rev. Daniel Draper, a Wesleyan minister, and Mr. Palmer, editor of the Lark Review. The inquiry which took place did not show that any precaution to secure the safety of the vessel had been omitted, but the opinion of some of the survivors was that she was too heavily loaded with dead weight.

18.—Died in his 75th year, Dr. Petrie, Vice-President of the Royal Irish Academy, and a writer of deserved authority in the archæology of his native country.

19.—Died in his 74th year, Rev. S. R. Maitland, D.D., for many years Librarian at Lambeth Palace, and author of various works in the department of theological history.

23.—The writ of error in the conviction of Charlotte Winsor argued before the judges in the Court of Queen's Bench. Twenty-five pleas were raised:—1. That she had not been tried and convicted according to law. 2. That the jury on the first trial were discharged without agreeing to a verdict. 3. That they were discharged without the consent or motion of the convict or the prosecution. 4. That there was no illness on the part of any of the jury, rendering it necessary to discharge them. 5. That the jurors were not any of them incapacitated from giving a verdict on the evidence. 6. There was no sufficient cause shown why the learned judge took upon himself to discharge the jury. 7. That when he found the jury could not agree, the learned judge ought to have directed the jury to return a verdict of Not guilty. 8. That the jury having been so discharged, Winsor ought to have been discharged, and not again put in peril for the same murder. 9. was a similar objection, and the remaining allegations, though varied in form, were the same in substance, except one, that the evidence of the approver was illegal. The convict was brought up, in custody, from Newgate, where she had been confined since last term. At the close of the pleadings the Court gave judgment for the Crown, thus re-affirming the conviction of the prisoner. (See July 25, 1865.)

24.—M. de Cabrowe and his mother, French people of good birth, but in a state of extreme destitution, commit suicide together by hanging themselves in their lodgings in Paddington. Written instructions regarding the disposal of their bodies were found in the room, with a statement of the extreme sufferings they had endured.

25.—The Jamaica Special Commission commence to take evidence at Spanish Town.

26.—Died at Rome, aged 75, John Gibson, Esq., R. A., sculptor. He left 32,000*l.* to the Royal Academy, on condition that a sufficient space was allowed for the easy exhibition of his works, open to the use of students to the Royal Academy, and exposed to the public according to such regulations as the Council might deem best.

27.—From the second report of the Cattle Plague Commissioners, it appeared that up to this date, out of the 120,740 cases of disease reported, 16,742 had been killed, 73,750 died, 16,086 had been under treatment, and 14,162 recovered. In Yorkshire, 19,331 cases had been reported, and in the comparatively small county of Cheshire, 17,971.

29.—Formation of a secret mercantile confederacy to buy up, and thereby raise the price of pig iron. It was quoted to-day at 6*s.*; but the purchasing operations were carried through on a scale of such magnitude, that early in April producers to keep their time-bargains had to purchase back on their own account at 8*s.* The amount involved in the speculation was said to be over 2,000,000*l.*

February 1.—A memorial from the English Church Union on the subject of the Ritualistic innovations in the Church, signed by about 500 clergymen, presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth. His Grace assured the deputation that it was his most anxious desire to promote uniformity in public worship to the utmost of his power, and to reconcile the conflicting interests of the different parties in the Church without any sacrifice of principle.—On the same day, Earl Russell was waited upon by a deputation representing "The Association for promoting a Revision of the Prayer-book, and for securing Purity and Simplicity in the Public Worship of the Church of England." His Lordship undertook to bring the question before the Cabinet, and especially to consult with the Archbishop of Canterbury.

1.—The new Parliament commences its labours by electing Mr. Evelyn Denison to the office of Speaker. The swearing-in of members was then proceeded with.

—Mr. Francis Grant elected President of the Royal Academy, Sir Edwin Landseer declining to accede to the wishes of a large majority that he would accept the office.

2.—The Convocation of the Provinces of Canterbury and York commence their sittings.

6.—Commenced in the Court of Queen's Bench the case of Fitzgerald v. Northcote and Stone. The plaintiff was the son of the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, one of the Puisne judges of the Irish Court of Queen's Bench; the defendants were Dr. Northcote, Principal of the Roman Catholic College at Ascott, near Birmingham, and Mr. Stone, the "Prefect" or disciplinary officer of that establishment. Nominally, the action was for assault and false imprisonment, and to recover a pocket-book; the real issue was whether the plaintiff's son was properly or improperly expelled the college. The defendants pleaded in justification various special pleas, the substance of which was that the youth had started a "conspiracy," as it was called among the lay boys of the college, against the clerical boys, or the boys destined for the priesthood, with the object of holding them up to ridicule and obloquy, and that it was necessary, in order to uphold the discipline of the college, to seize his pocket-book in order to find out all about the supposed conspiracy, and then to expel him; further, until he could be expelled, to separate him from the other students, and with that view to confine him in his room. Dr. Northcote himself was the principal witness for the defence, and was cross-examined with considerable humour and ingenuity by Mr. Coleridge. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages 5*l.*

—Died, at Mount Trenchard, Limerick, aged 76, Lord Monteagle—formerly Mr. Spring Rice, and Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1835 to 1839.

—Parliament opened by the Queen in person. The Royal Speech, which was read from the Throne by the Lord Chancellor, made reference to our friendly relations with foreign Powers, the close of the civil war in the United States, the renewal of diplomatic relations with Brazil, the outbreak in Jamaica, the commercial treaties entered into with Japan and Austria, the cattle-plague, and the Fenian disturbance in Ireland. On the subject of Parliamentary Reform, it was said:—"I have directed that information should be procured in reference to the right of voting in the election of members to serve in Parliament for counties, cities, and boroughs. When that information is complete the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained, with a view to such improvements in the laws which regulate the right of voting in the election of Members of the House of Commons, as may tend to strengthen our free institutions and conduce to the public welfare." The Address was agreed to without a division in the House of Lords. In the Commons The O'Donoghue sought to insert a paragraph calling upon Ministers to examine into and remove the disaffection in Ireland, but was defeated on a division by 346 to 25. The conduct of Governor Eyre in suppressing the Jamaica insurrection, and the policy of the Government orders on the cattle-plague, were discussed at subsequent sittings.

6.—Sir Charles Wood resigns the office of Secretary of State for India, and is raised to the Upper House as Viscount Halifax. He was succeeded by Earl de Grey in the India Office. The Marquis of Hartington entered the War Office.

7.—Several of the morning newspapers comment on an interview said to have taken place between Earl Russell and Mr. Bright, on the subject of Parliamentary Reform.

12.—Sir George Grey introduces the Government Bill for suppressing the cattle-plague. Mr. Bright objected to the compensation clauses as contrary to the principle adopted by Parliament on past occasions of public suffering to vote money out of taxes to remedy a misfortune of this kind; and it was a grievance which every tax-payer would complain of, if his money were applied to the compensation of well-to-do farmers and rich landowners who might suffer from the affliction.—Mr. Lowe said, the object was not to compensate people for what they had lost, but for what they had lost through the direct agency of the Government by the destruction of their property for the public good.—Mr. Stuart Mill did not object to compensation on principle, because no one proposed that farmers should be compensated merely for what they lost, but only for that which it was proposed to destroy under the Act; and any juster claim for compensation than that could scarcely exist. But the more reasons there were for granting compensation, the greater was the reason for taking care that that compensation should not be excessive; and he thought if the infected animal were shown not to be worth two-thirds of what, if healthy, it would fetch in the market, that proposition would be excessive. Again, the Bill did what it ought not, and did not do what it ought. It compensated an entire class of persons connected with the land for that of which they bore their share with the rest of the community; and it did not do what it ought to do in equalizing the circumstances of that class itself. For, inasmuch as the compensation was to be a local charge, the consequence was that those portions of the agricultural interest which had not suffered at all would have to pay least; and those who suffered most would have to pay most. On the whole, therefore, he preferred a general rate upon the land or upon cattle to any local rate.

—Earl Russell informs Lord Ebury that it is not the intention of Government to advise the issuing of any Commission for the revision of the Liturgy. "The former Commission," he writes, "upon the terms of subscription arrived at a conclusion which gave greater freedom of opinion to every person in holy orders; but a Commission for the revision of the Liturgy would in all probability lead to heated discussion, and its report, if it framed any, would be sure to offend and irritate a large party in the Church. As her Majesty's Government are most anxious to promote peace and goodwill, and not to open the way to discord, they must decline to adopt the proposal which your Lordship and the deputation accompanying you have made."

13.—Sir George Grey obtains leave to introduce a bill for the purpose of reducing all the oaths taken by members of Parliament to one simple form:—"I do swear I will bear true allegiance to Queen Victoria, and defend her to the utmost of my power from all conspiracies and treasons against her person, crown, and dignity."

— Cholera conference opened at Constantinople.

14.—Commenced in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, the case of Walker v. Milner—an action raised by Mr. Walker, jeweller, Cornhill, against the firm of Milner and Son, of Moorgate-street, for breach of a warranty on the sale of an iron safe. The declaration stated that Mr. Milner agreed to sell the plaintiff a certain iron safe, and promised that it was sufficiently strong to resist any attempt or violence that might be made upon it by thieves; and that he, relying upon that promise, bought and paid for it, but that it was not sufficiently strong to resist the efforts of thieves to break it open, and was, in fact, broken open, and property stolen therefrom to the amount of 6,000*l.* The case was chiefly remarkable for the insight it gave into the manner the robbery had been effected in Mr. Walker's premises on the 4th February last. The convict Caseley was put into the witness-box, and described with perfect frankness every detail of the burglary, from the time it was planned till its successful completion. It was this Caseley who forced the safe, and he now gave a minute account of the manner in which it was accomplished. Several points of law were raised on the part of the defendants—first, that there was no evidence of any warranty; secondly, that there was no implied authority given to the shopman to give a warranty, and that in the absence of expressed orders, none could in law be implied; thirdly, that if there was a warranty binding on the defendants, the Statute of Limitations operated, more than six years having elapsed since the plaintiff purchased the safe. He contended that the breach of warranty must be assumed to have taken place at the time of the sale, and not when the safe was broken up. The Lord Chief Justice said he thought there was no evidence to go to the jury on the question of warranty, but he would give leave to move the Court above upon the point as to the Statute of Limitations. Mr. Hopley, the foreman who sold the safe, being called, stated that he never gave a warranty, and was expressly prohibited in writing by his employers, Milner and Co., from giving a warranty. He produced a letter to that effect. It appeared, however, that in a prospectus issued before the burglary, the defendants had held out their safes as giving "perfect security" against thieves; but after the burglary they changed the expression to "the strongest security." The jury found that there was no warranty, which was, of course, a verdict for the defendant.

14.—Fire in Oxford-street, destroying a considerable portion of Laurie and Marner's carriage factory.

— The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland informs the Government that, after the most careful consideration, the time, in his opinion, had arrived for a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. "The state of affairs," he wrote, "is very serious. The conspirators, undeterred by the punishment of so many of their leaders, are actively organizing an outbreak to destroy the Queen's authority. Sir Hugh Rose details the various plans they have in contemplation, and he draws no exaggerated picture. There are scattered over the country a number of agents who are swearing-in members, and who are prepared to take the command when the moment arrives. These men are of the most dangerous class. They are Irishmen imbued with American notions, and possessed of considerable military experience. There are 340 such men known to the police in the provinces, and about 160 in Dublin. There are several hundred men who have come over from England and Scotland, who receive 1*s.* 6*d.* a day, and are waiting for the time of action. Any one may observe these men loitering about at the corners of the streets. As to arms, we have found no less than three regular manufactories of pikes, bullets, and cartridges in Dublin. . . . The most dangerous feature of the present movement is the attempt to seduce the troops. . . . I have watched every symptom here for many months, and it is my deliberate conviction that no time should now be lost in suspending the Act. I cannot be responsible for the safety of the country, if power is not forthwith given to the Government to seize the leaders."

15.—Mr. Hunt's proposal that no cattle should be moved on a railway before the 28th of March, carried in committee against the Government by 264 to 181 votes. Speaking again on the question of compensation, Mr. Lowe questioned the truth of a statement made that the English cattle producer would gain on account of a rise in prices. "Has he not," he asked, "got powerful competition, and will not advanced prices increase an importation of 10,000 head of cattle to 20,000? That which is to be the indemnification of the English cattle-dealer will have to be divided with all Europe, and some of the money will go to Transatlantic producers." Mr. Mill replied at once that in an article of general consumption the effect of a scarcity was generally a rise in prices out of all proportions to the extent of that scarcity. Mr. Lowe had asked if it was not to be considered absurd that because a man or any of his family is not mad, he is not to be taxed for a lunatic asylum. "Now, I ask, is there any economical law by which the patients of a lunatic asylum are compensated for the expense of their maintenance in that asylum?"

15.—Mr. Cardwell obtains leave to bring in a bill for the government of Jamaica similar to that now in operation at Trinidad. He proposed that an Order in Council should give it effect for three years, and if successful that it should be made perpetual.

17.—Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland passes both Houses of Parliament. It gave power to the Lord Lieutenant to detain in custody any suspected person whom he may have already arrested, and, with the concurrence of six members of the Privy Council in Ireland, to arrest any others between this date and the 1st of March, 1867, and detain them up to that time, the prisoners not having any legal remedy in the meantime. In the debate to which the introduction of the bill gave rise, Mr. Bright said he had never spoken in the House with a deeper sense of shame and humiliation. "It was no consolation," he said, "to learn that a great portion of the present disaffection came from America. There can be no continued fire without fuel, and all the Irish in America, and all the citizens in America, with all their organization and all their vast resources, would not in England or in Scotland raise the very slightest flame of sedition or insurrectionary movement. I want to know why they could do it in Ireland. Are you to say, as some people say of the black men in America and Jamaica, that nothing can be made of the Irishman? Everything can be made of him in every country but his own. When he has passed through the American school—I speak of his children in the second generation—he is as industrious, as frugal, as loyal, as good a citizen of the American republic, as any man born within the boundaries of that Power. Why is he not so in Ireland? Why is it that no Scotchman who leaves Scotland—as the Scotch have been taunted and jeered at for leaving Scotland to seek a better climate and a better soil—cherishes the smallest hostility to the people, the institutions, and the Government of his native country? Why does the Irishman who goes to the United States to better his condition sit down there with a feeling of ineradicable hatred to the country and institutions of England? It is not in human nature that men should be content with such institutions as existed in Ireland; and I call on the House not to let the year pass over till it has done something to rid us of this blot, for blot it is, upon the reign of the Queen and the administration of her statesmen, upon the civilization and justice of the people of this country."

20.—Mr. Clay, M.P. for Hull, obtains the assent of the House to introduce a bill conferring an educational franchise. (See May 30.)

21.—Disorderly midnight meeting in London, called with a view of reclaiming fallen women.

22.—In the Prussian Chamber, a motion favoured by the Government having been rejected by a large majority, Count Bismarck read two decrees amid the breathless silence of the House, calling the Deputies to the Palace, and summarily proroguing the sitting.

— The allowance to the Princess Helena fixed at 6,000*l.* a year, and her dowry at 30,000*l.*, as in the case of the Princess Alice. The provision for Prince Alfred fixed at 15,000*l.* a year, payable from the day on which he attains his majority.

— The House of Commons agree to an address to the Queen, praying her Majesty to order the erection of a monument to Lord Palmerston in Westminster Abbey.

— Revolution at Bucharest, a body of troops surrounding the house of Prince Couza, and compelling him to abdicate.

24.—Dr. Whewell, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, thrown from his horse between Shelford and Trumpington, and injured so severely that death resulted on the 6th March. He was born in 1795.

— Died, at his residence, St. James's Palace, the Hon. Sir C. B. Phipps, Keeper of her Majesty's Privy Purse.

26.—Lord C. Paget introduces the Navy Estimates. Amount required for the year, 10,388,153*l.*

28.—The Times gives currency to a rumour that Earl Russell had tendered his resignation, and recommended the Duke of Somerset as his successor.

March 2.—In the Divorce Court, the jury in the case of Cavendish v. Cavendish (Lady Elinor) and Lord Cecil Gordon, give a verdict for the petitioner, and assess the damages on the co-respondent at 10,000*l.*

— Mr. Gregory introduces, but afterwards withdraws, a resolution, urging that it should be a recognised maxim of maritime law that private property was free from capture.

3.—Benjamin Coleman, editor of the Spiritual Magazine, fined 50*l.* for circulating libels defamatory of the character of Mr. Sothorn, actor.

4.—Great Fenian mass-meeting at New York, presided over by Mahony, who announced that fighting had commenced in Ireland, and asked that funds might be furnished to such an extent as would enable an expedition to leave America within six weeks.

5.—Heard, in the Court of Probate, the testamentary suit of Bellew v. Bellew and others. The question was whether a document propounded by Mr. Henry Bellew as the will of his late sister, Miss Caroline (commonly called Countess) Bellew, was her will, or a forgery on the part of a Mrs. Casse, a friend and neighbour of the deceased, who lived at Stockleigh House, Regent's Park. Miss Frances Bellew, eldest sister of the deceased, opposed probate. In 1863, Mrs. Casse said the Countess called on her and expressed her intention of making out a new will, as one she had made in 1851 was lost. The proposed new will was accordingly drawn up and executed, a copy taken, and left with Mrs. Casse. This copy was now produced, no original being found, and probate asked. It disposed of about 26,000*l.*, giving her sister 500*l.* "to keep her from want," a sum of 500*l.* to Mrs. Casse, and the residue, after small legacies, to her brother. Mrs. Casse, who was now upwards of eighty years of age, admitted in cross-examination that she lived for many years with the late Lord Saltoun as his wife, and made a claim upon his estate on the faith of documents which the executor successfully resisted as not genuine. The jury now returned a verdict that they were not satisfied as to the genuineness of the will. The decision was followed by the prosecution of Mrs. Casse for forgery, and of one Verlander for perjury.

— The Marquis of Hartington moves the Army Estimates, explaining in detail how the vote of 14,095,000*l.* was to be appropriated.

7.—Mr. Hardcastle's Church-rate Abolition Bill carried through a second reading by 285 to 252, the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressing it as his opinion that though Government were not prepared to take up the question, the time had arrived when a settlement might be made acceptable to Churchmen on the one hand and Dissenters on the other.

— Publication of the Queen's Warrant instituting a new decoration of the "Albert Medal," to be awarded in cases where it shall be considered fit, to such persons as shall endanger their own lives in saving or endeavouring to save the lives of others from shipwreck or other perils of the sea.

12.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the Government Reform Bill. Assuming in his exordium that Reform was emphatically the business of the House of Commons, he reviewed the recent history of the question, explained the difficulties and complications with which it was beset, and argued that from the time now at the disposal of the Parliament the Government were compelled to restrict their labours to a Franchise Bill alone. He proposed first to create an occupation franchise in counties, including houses beginning at 14*l.* rental, and reaching up to 50*l.*—the present occupation franchise; secondly "to introduce into counties the provision which copyholders and leaseholders within parliamentary boroughs now possess for the purpose of county votes. The third is a savings-bank franchise, which will operate in counties and towns, but which will have a more important operation in the counties. In towns we propose to place compound householders on the same footing as ratepayers. We propose to abolish tax and rate-paying clauses, and to reduce 10*l.* clear annual value, and to bring in the gross estimate rental from the rate-book as the measure of the value, thus, pro tanto, making the rate-book the register. We propose also to introduce a lodger franchise, both for those persons holding part of a house with separate and independent access, and for those who hold part of a house as inmates of the family of another person. Then there is the 10*l.* clear annual value of apartments without reference to furniture. We propose to abolish the necessity in the case of registered voters for residence at the time of voting. And lastly—I say lastly, because there are some other provisions, but I do not think it needful to trouble the House with them now—we propose to follow the example set us by the right hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Government of Lord Derby, in 1859, and sustained and supported, I must say, by many great authorities, and to introduce a clause disabling from voting persons who are employed in the Government yards. . . . If issue is taken adversely on the bill, I hope it will be taken directly. I trust it will be taken upon the question whether there is or is not to be an enfranchisement downwards, or if it is to be taken at all. We have felt that to be essential to usefulness; essential to the character and credit not merely of the Government, not merely of party, but of this House, and of successive Parliaments and Governments, who all stand pledged with respect to this question of the representation. We cannot consent to look upon this large addition, considerable although it may be, to the political power of the working classes of this country, as if it were an addition fraught with nothing but danger. We cannot look upon it as the Trojan horse approaching the walls of the sacred city, and filled with armed men, bent upon ruin, plunder, and confiscation. We cannot join in comparing it with that monstrum infelix—we cannot say,—

'Scandit fatalis machina muros,
Fœta armis: mediæque minas illabitur urbi.'

I believe that those persons whom we ask you to enfranchise ought rather to be welcomed as you would welcome recruits to your army. We ask you to give within what you consider to be the just limits of prudence and circumspection; but, having determined those limits, to give with an ungrudging hand. Consider what you can safely and justly afford to do in admitting new subjects and citizens within the pale of the parliamentary constitution ; and, having so considered it, don't do it as if you were compounding with danger and misfortune. Do it as if you were conferring a boon that will be felt and reciprocated in grateful attachment. Give to those persons new interests in the Constitution—new interests which, by the beneficent working of the laws of nature and Providence, shall beget in them new attachment to the Constitution : for the attachment of the people to the Throne, and to the laws under which they live, is, after all, more than your gold and your silver, more than your fleets and your armies—at once the strength, the glory, and the safety of the land.”

13.—The adjourned debate on the Reform Bill was resumed in a very full House by Mr. Lowe, who began by referring to the great power which had been won by the House of Commons :—“It has outlived,” he said, “the influence of the Crown. It has shaken off the dictation of the aristocracy. In finance and in taxation it is supreme. It has a very large share in legislation, and it can control, unmake, and sometimes nearly make, the executive government. Probably when the time shall arrive that the history of this country shall be written as the history of that which has passed away, it may be thought that too much power, too much influence was concentrated and condensed in this great assembly, and that England put too much to hazard on the personal qualifications of those who sat in it. But, Sir, in proportion as the powers of this great assembly are great and paramount, is the exploit of amending its Constitution one of the highest and noblest efforts of statesmanship : and to tamper with it lightly, or to deal with it unskilfully, is one of the most signal marks of presumption and folly.” Speaking of the present constituencies he used the following words, which were frequently commented on by the Reforming party in the subsequent agitation :—“You have had the opportunity of knowing some of the constituencies of this country, and I ask, if you want venality, ignorance, drunkenness, and the means of intimidation—if you want impulsive, unreflecting, and violent people, where will you go to look for them—to the top or to the bottom? It is ridiculous to blink the fact, that since the Reform Act, great competition has prevailed amongst the voters of between 20*l.* and 10*l.* rental—the 10*l.* lodging and beerhouse keepers. . . . We know what sort of persons live in these small houses ; we have all had experience of them under the name of ‘freemen,’ and it would be a good thing if they were disfranchised altogether. . . . The Chancellor of the Exchequer,” he concluded, “though he had no time for reasons, had found time for a quotation. It was a quotation of a very curious kind : for, not finding in his large classical repertory anything that would describe the state of perfect bliss which his bill would produce, he was induced to give us one to show what the bill would not do, he said—

‘Scandit fatalis machina muros,
Fœta armis.’

That, said the right hon. gentleman, is not my bill. Now, that is not a very apt quotation ; but there was a curious felicity about it which he little dreamed of. The House will remember that among the proofs of the degree in which public opinion was enlisted in the cause of Reform, he stated that this is the fifth Reform Bill which has been brought forward since 1851. Now just attend to the sequel of the quotation. I am no believer, I am happy to say, in the ‘sortes Virgilianæ,’ but I wish the House to hear what follows :—

‘O Divum domus Ilium, et inelyta bello
Mœnia Dardanidum ! quater ipso in limine porta
Substitit, atque utero sonitum quater arma dedere.’

But that was not all :—

‘Instamus tamen immemores cœcique furore
Et monstrum infelix sacratâ sistimus arce.’

(Cheers and laughter.) I abominate the pre-sage conveyed in these last two lines ; but I mix my confidence with fear. I know that I am addressing a new Parliament, whose intentions are as yet hidden under the veil of futurity. It may be that they will not take the advice that was tendered to us with so much eloquence and authority by my right hon. friend ; it may be that we are destined to avoid this enormous danger by which we are confronted, and that, to use the language of my right hon. friend, we may not be forced to compound with danger and misfortune. But it may be otherwise. All I can say is, that if my right hon. friend succeeds in carrying this measure through Parliament, when the passions and interests of the day have gone by, I shall not envy his retrospect. I covet not a single leaf of the laurel that may encircle his brow. His be the glory, if such it be, of carrying this measure. Mine be it that, to the very utmost of my ability, I have resisted it.—Mr. Bright said Mr. Horsman was the first member of this new Parliament who had expressed his grief. “He retired into what may be called his political Cave of Adullam, to which he invited every one who was in distress, and every one who was discontented. He has long been anxious to found a party in this House, and there is scarcely a member at this end of the House who is able to address us with effect, or to take much part, whom he has not tried to bring over to his party and his cabal. At last he has succeeded in hooking the right hon. gentleman the member for Calne. I know it was the opinion many years ago of a member of the Cabinet, that two men could make a party—and a party formed of two men so amiable, so genial, as both of those right hon. gentlemen—we may hope to see for the first time in Parliament, a party perfectly harmonious, and distinguished by a mutual and unbroken trust. But there is one great difficulty in the way. It is very much like the case of the Scotch terrier that was so covered with hair that you could not tell which was the head and which was the tail. (Laughter.)

Now, I said at the beginning that I did not rise to defend the bill. I rose for the purpose of explaining it. It is not the bill which, if I had been consulted by its framers, I should have recommended. If I had been a Minister, it is not the bill which I should have consented to present to the House. I think it is not adequate to the occasion, and that its concessions are not sufficient. But I know the difficulties under which the Ministers labour, and I know the disinclination of Parliament to do much in the direction of this question. I shall give it my support because, as far as it goes, it is a simple and honest measure, and because I believe if it becomes law it will give some solidity and duration to everything that is good in the Constitution, and to everything that is noble in the character of the people of these realms."

17.—The morning papers announce that a Conservative gathering was held yesterday at the residence of the Marquis of Salisbury, when it was unanimously agreed that the Government Reform Bill should be opposed.

20.—Day of humiliation in London, appointed by the Bishop of the diocese to be observed on account of the cattle-plague.

— Judge Wilde pronounces judgment in the case of Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee, in which the plaintiff, formerly a Mormon, sought legal release from the woman with whom he contracted a so-called marriage in Utah, but who declined to follow him when he renounced Mormonism, and betook herself to another man. The question was whether the connexion could be considered a marriage so as to be voidable by the Court, or whether it was no marriage in the eye of English law. The Judge decided that it was no marriage, and that the petition could not, therefore, be entertained.

— Earl Grosvenor gives notice that he intends to move on the second reading of the Reform Bill:—"That this House, while ready to consider, with a view to its settlement, the question of Parliamentary Reform, is of opinion that it is inexpedient to discuss a bill for the reduction of the franchise in England and Wales until the House has before it the entire scheme contemplated by Government for the amendment of the representation of the people."

21.—Oxford Tests Abolition Bill read a second time by a majority of 217 to 103. Mr. J. D. Coleridge in a "maiden speech" introduced the measure, and was followed by Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, who also spoke for the first time, and supported the bill.

— Prince Alfred installed as Master of the Trinity House.

22.—Government censured by a majority of 101 against 70 for limiting the designs for the new Law Courts to six architects.

23.—With reference to the amendment proposed by Earl Grosvenor that it was inexpedient to consider the bill for the reduction of the franchise until the House had before it the entire scheme for the representation of the people, the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimates to-night that the Government would not only resist that amendment, but treat it as a vote of want of confidence. He promised, however, that after the second reading and before going into Committee, Government would be prepared to state distinctly their intentions with reference to the franchises for Scotland and Ireland, and also as to the redistribution of seats. Mr. Kinglake and Mr. Oliphant thereupon withdrew the amendments which stood in their names.

24.—Died at Claremont, where she had resided in quiet dignity during her long exile, Marie Amélie, ex-queen of the French, aged 84.

— Prussia forwards a circular-despatch to the minor German States, in which she points out the necessity for their taking up a definite position upon one side or other "in the struggle which the armaments of Austria seem to render more and more imminent." The note accuses Austria of having violated the Treaty of Gastein, and assumed a threatening attitude. "It is urgent for Prussia to know if, and to what extent, she may rely upon assistance in case she should be attacked by Austria or forced into war by unmistakable menaces." The Austrian Minister at Berlin presented a despatch on the 31st, disclaiming hostile intentions.

26.—Reform meeting at Birmingham. A letter was read from Mr. Bright, in which he said:—"Parliament is never hearty for Reform or for any good measure. It hated the Reform Bill of 1831 and 1832. It does not like the franchise bill now upon its table. It is to a large extent the offspring of landed power in the counties and of tumult and corruption in the boroughs, and it would be strange if such a Parliament were in favour of freedom and of an honest representation of the people. But, notwithstanding such a Parliament, this bill will pass if Birmingham and other towns do their duty." Referring to the Opposition as "a dirty conspiracy," he continued: "What should be done and what must be done under these circumstances? You know what your fathers did thirty-four years ago, and you know the result. The men who, in every speech they utter, insult the working men, describing them as a multitude given up to ignorance and vice, will be the first to yield when the popular will is loudly and resolutely expressed. If Parliament-street from Charing-cross to the venerable Abbey were filled with men seeking a Reform Bill as it was two years ago with men come to do honour to an illustrious Italian, these slanderers of their countrymen would learn to be civil if they did not learn to love freedom." At Manchester Mr. Bright urged an immediate organization for meetings and petitions—"as men living in a free country, with representative institutions, determined to partake in some measure of that representation, and to be free."

27.—Alliance offensive and defensive between Prussia and Italy. Italy engages to declare war against Austria as soon as Prussia shall have either declared war or committed an act of hostility. Prussia engages to carry on the war until the mainland of Venetia, with the exception of the fortresses, and the city of Venice, is in the hands of the Italians, or until Austria declares herself ready to cede it voluntarily. The Prussian Government further engages to obtain for Italy the possession of the mainland of Venetia, always excepting the fortresses, and will guarantee to Italy the maintenance of her present possessions. King Victor Emmanuel, upon his part, declares that he will attack Austria upon the Mincio with 80,000 men, and will throw 40,000 across the Po; at the same time the Italian fleet will cruise in the Mediterranean, engage the Austrian men-of-war, and make an attack upon Venice. King Victor Emmanuel further promises not to lay down his arms until the Prussians shall be in legal possession of the Elbe Duchies.

28.—The eminent American merchant, Mr. Peabody, having added another donation to his munificent gift of last year for the improvement of the dwellings of the poor of London, her Majesty addressed to him the following autograph letter:—"The Queen hears that Mr. Peabody intends shortly to return to America, and she would be sorry that he should leave England without being assured by herself how deeply she appreciates the noble act of more than princely munificence by which he has sought to relieve the wants of the poorer class of her subjects residing in London. It is an act, as the Queen believes, wholly without parallel, and which will carry its best reward in the consciousness of having contributed so largely to the assistance of those who can little help themselves. The Queen would not, however, have been satisfied without giving Mr. Peabody some public mark of her sense of his munificence, and she would gladly have conferred upon him either a baronetcy or the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, but that she understands Mr. Peabody to feel himself debarred from accepting such distinctions. It only remains, therefore, for the Queen to give Mr. Peabody the assurance of her personal feelings, which she would further wish to mark, by asking him to accept a miniature portrait of herself, which she will desire to have painted for him, and which, when finished, can either be sent to America, or given to him on his return, which, she rejoices to hear, he meditates, to the country that owes him so much." Mr. Peabody replied on the 3d April, from the Palace Hotel, Buckingham Gate:—"Madam,—I feel seriously my inability to express in adequate terms the gratification with which I have read the letter which your Majesty has done me the high honour of transmitting by the hands of Earl Russell. On the occasion which has attracted your Majesty's attention of setting apart a portion of my property to ameliorate the condition and augment the comforts of the poor of London, I have been actuated by a deep sense of gratitude to God who has blessed me with prosperity, and of attachment to this great country, where, under your Majesty's benign rule, I have received so much personal kindness, and enjoyed so many years of happiness. Next to the approval of my own conscience, I shall always prize the assurance which your Majesty's letter conveys to me of the approbation of the Queen of England, whose whole life has attested that her exalted station has in no degree diminished her sympathy with the humblest of her subjects. The portrait which your Majesty is graciously pleased to bestow on me I shall value as the most precious heirloom that I can leave in the land of my birth, where, together with the letter which your Majesty has addressed to me, it will ever be regarded as an evidence of the kindly feeling of the Queen of the United Kingdom to a citizen of the United States."

29.—Died at Bournemouth, aged 74, the Rev. John Keble, vicar of Hursley, the amiable and accomplished author of "The Christian Year."

April 1.—Sunday riot at Northmoor-green, Bridgewater, caused by the incumbent attempting to celebrate Easter service with great ritualistic pomp.

2.—Thomas Carlyle installed as Lord Rector of Edinburgh University. He was received with extraordinary enthusiasm, and delivered an extemporaneous address, full of all his old fire and originality, to a crowded company of students and admiring friends. He began by referring to his connexion with the University fifty-six years since, counselled the students to learn, not to cram—to find out the work they were fitted for, and to regard all honest labour as the best cure for the miseries of life. He recommended the study of history—particularly the history of our own country—advised them to avoid literature as a profession—eulogized Cromwell and Knox, and spoke regretfully of the "vocality" of the present age. "It seems to me," he said, "that the finest nations in the world—England and America—are all going to wind and tongue. This will appear sufficiently tragical by and by, long after I am away out of it. Silence is the eternal duty of a man. He won't get to any real understanding of what is complex, and what is more than any other pertinent to his interests, without maintaining silence." Again, "We have got into the age of revolution. All kinds of things are coming to be subjected to fire, as it were: hotter and hotter the wind rises around everything. Curious to say, now, in Oxford and other places that used to seem to lie at anchor in the stream of time, regardless of all changes, they are getting into the highest humour of mutation, and all sorts of new ideas are getting afloat. It is evident that whatever is not made of asbestos will have to perish in this world. It will not stand the heat it is getting exposed to. And in saying that, it is but saying in other words that we are in an epoch of anarchy—anarchy plus the constable. There is nobody that picks one's pocket without some policeman being ready to take him up. But in every other thing he is the son, not of Cosmos, but of Chaos. He is a disobedient, and reckless, and altogether a waste kind of object. A commonplace man in these epochs, and the wiser kind of man—the select, of whom I hope you will be part—has more and more to see to it, to look forward, and will require to move with double wisdom; and will find, in short, that the crooked things that he has to pull straight in his own life or round about, wherever he may be, are manifold, and will task his strength, wherever he may go." Reminding his young hearers that there was a nobler ambition than the gaining of all the gold in California or the votes on the whole planet, he urged them to attend to their health as the greatest of all temporal blessings, and to stand up to their work whatever it might be—not in sorrows or contradictions to yield—but to push on towards the goal. Delivering with tender earnestness, "a small bit of verse from Goethe—a kind of marching music of mankind," he added, "one last word, Wir heissen euch hoffen" (we bid you be of good hope).

6.—Among the numerous meetings held during Easter-week, in England, on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, the greatest interest was excited by the gathering in Liverpool, attended as it was by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and several other Cabinet Ministers, and where the pledge was renewed that the Government would stand or fall by their bill. "Having produced this measure," said Mr. Gladstone, "founded in a spirit of moderation, we hope to support it with decision. It is not in our power to secure the passing of the measure; that rests more with you, and more with those whom you represent, and of whom you are a sample, than it does with us. Still we have a great responsibility, and are conscious of it; and we do not intend to flinch from it. (Here the whole audience rose in a body, and cheered for several minutes.) We stake ourselves—we stake our existence as a Government—and we also stake our political character on the adoption of the bill in its main provisions. You have a right to expect from us that we should tell you what we mean, and that the trumpet which it is our business to blow should give forth no uncertain sound. Its sound has not been, and, I trust, will not be, uncertain. We have passed the Rubicon—we have broken the bridge, and burned the boats behind us. We have advisedly cut off the means of retreat, and having done this, we hope that, as far as time is yet permitted, we have done our duty to the Crown and to the nation."

9.—The Commissioners appointed to inquire on the spot into the origin, nature, and circumstances of the disturbances in Jamaica conclude their report,—finding, "1. That the disturbances in St. Thomas-in-the-East had their immediate origin in a planned resistance to lawful authority. 2. That the causes leading to the determination to offer that resistance were manifold: (a) That a principal object of the disturbers of order was the obtaining of land free from the payment of rent; (b) that an additional incentive to the violation of the law arose from the want of confidence generally felt by the labouring classes in the tribunals before which most of the disputes affecting their interests were carried for adjudication; (c) that some, moreover, were animated by feelings of hostility towards political and personal opponents, while not a few contemplated the attainment of their ends by the death or expulsion of the white inhabitants of the island. 3. That though the original design for the overthrow of constituted authority was confined to a small portion of the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, yet that the disorder in fact spread with singular rapidity over an extensive tract of country, and that such was the state of excitement prevailing in other parts of the island that, had more than a momentary success been obtained by the insurgents, their ultimate overthrow would have been attended with a still more fearful loss of life and property. 4. That praise is due to Governor Eyre for the skill, promptitude, and vigour which he manifested during the early stages of the insurrection; to the exercise of which qualities its speedy termination is in a great degree to be attributed. 5. That the military and naval operations appear to us to have been prompt and judicious. 6. That by the continuance of martial law in its full force to the extreme limit of its statutory operation, the people were deprived for a longer than the necessary period of the great constitutional privileges by which the security of life and property is provided for. Lastly, that the punishments inflicted were excessive: (a) that the punishment of death was unnecessarily frequent; (b) that the floggings were reckless, and at Bath positively barbarous; (c) that the burning of 1,000 houses was wanton and cruel. All which we humbly submit to your Majesty's consideration."

11.—Mysterious murder in Cannon-street. The victim, a widow, named Sarah Millson, was housekeeper to, and lived on the premises of Messrs. Bevington, leather-sellers. About nine o'clock at night, when sitting by the fire in company with another servant, the street-bell was heard to ring, and Millson went down to the front, remarking to her neighbour that she knew who it was. She did not return, although for an hour this did not excite any suspicion, as she was in the habit of holding conversations at the street-door. A little after ten o'clock the other woman—Elizabeth Lowes—went down and found Millson dead at the bottom of the stairs, the blood then flowing profusely from a number of deep wounds in the head. Her shoes had been taken off, and were lying on a table in the hall, and as there was no blood on them it was presumed this was done before the murder. The house-keeper's keys were also found on the stairs. Opening the door to procure assistance, Lowes observed a woman on the doorstep, screening herself apparently from the rain which was falling heavily at the time. She moved off as soon as the door was opened, saying in answer to the request for assistance,—“Oh dear, no; I can't come in!” The gas over the door had been lighted as usual, at eight o'clock, but was now out, although not turned off at the meter. A policeman and surgeon were soon on the premises, and removed the body. The evidence taken by the coroner showed that the instrument of murder had probably been a small crowbar used to wrench open packing-cases; one was found near the body unstained with blood, and another was missing from the premises. From documents found in possession of the murdered woman, suspicion was directed towards William Smith, living with his sister at Eton, and who was known to have been employed to recover money said to be due by Millson to an inmate of one of the work-houses. With this clue to begin the inquiry the police succeeded in weaving round Smith a web of circumstantial testimony which led to his being committed for trial.

12.—Debate commenced on the second reading of the Reform Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke at some length on the necessity for legislating on the subject, the propriety of proceeding by stages, and defended the working classes from the charges which he said had been brought against them of ignorance, drunkenness, venality, and violence.—Mr. Lowe protested against the gross systematic and wilful perversion of his words. He had spoken, he said, entirely of the venality and violence which election committees had shown to prevail in existing constituencies:—“No man in the world has been subjected to more abuse than I have been during the last month, and that abuse has been procured by the deliberate misrepresentation of my language. I make my protest in the face of the House against this species of political warfare.” Earl Grosvenor moved his amendment, which was seconded by Lord Stanley. Mr. Kinglake, Mr. J. S. Mill, and Sir George Grey were among those who spoke in favour of the Government; and Sir E. B. Lytton, Lord Robert Montague, and General Peel against.

16.—The Emperor of Russia fired at while entering his carriage at St. Petersburg. The pistol was turned aside by a workman, who was enabled for the act.

17.—After many stupendous and ingenious efforts to complete the launch of H. M. iron-clad vessel the Northumberland, a sufficiency of propelling power was this day put forth, and the huge mass glided safely into the Thames amid the cheers of a great company whom the novelty of the scientific appliances had drawn together.

—At the Guildhall Mr. George Peabody distributed the prizes gained by the successful competitors at the Working Classes Industrial Exhibition.

20.—Letters from Aden of this date make mention that news had been received from Captain Cameron, dated Magdala, February 26, stating that he and his fellow prisoners had been released from their chains on the previous day, and were about to proceed to Gaffat, to be given up to Mr. Rassam. The letter further reported everything as being friendly, and stated that Messrs. Stern and Rosenthal were not to be subjected to any further trial.

21.—In reply to an Austrian proposal to disarm, Prussia replies that she would do so when Austria herself set the example.

—Considerable excitement was created today (Saturday), by the Times announcing, in a prominent manner, that the Austrian Ambassador had been withdrawn from Berlin. In the next publication it was intimated that the document on which the statement was based was a forgery, though purporting to have emanated from the Foreign Office with the authority of Lord Clarendon.

25.—The Fellowship of Colleges Declaration Bill, brought in by Mr. Bouverie, carried through committee in the Commons by 208 to 186 votes.

26.—On this the seventh evening of the debate on the Reform Bill, Mr. Lowe spoke with extraordinary vigour for two hours and a half against the measure, endeavouring to show the false principles upon which it was founded, the avowed coercion which was being brought to bear on the House of Commons, the extensive and powerful tyranny which would be exercised through the bill by trades unions, and the fatal injuries which democracy would inflict upon the English Constitution. Amid the triumphant cheers of a large portion of the House, he devoted considerable time to proving that the principle of Mr. Gladstone's measure, and the idea that, however covertly, lay at the root of all his reasoning, was the fitness of the poorer classes for the franchise, and their indefeasible claim to it as soon as they were fit—and not any conviction that the objects of good government would be materially aided by their admission. He pointed out that every one of Mr. Gladstone's plans went, not towards enfranchising 200,000 men, but towards enfranchising all, since all were "flesh and blood—fellow-citizens and Christians—and fathers of families." "It seems to me," he said, "that we have more reason every day we live to regret the loss of Lord Palmerston. By way of a mortuary contribution, it seems to me that the remaining members of his Cabinet laid in his grave all their moderation, all their prudence, and all their statesmanship. The Government have performed an immense exploit. They have carried the great mass of their party—men of moderate opinions and views—they have carried them over from their own views and laid them at the feet of the member for Birmingham. They are brought into contact now with men and principles from which six months ago they would have recoiled. (No, and Opposition cheers.) That is what has happened to part of them. The rest of us are left like sheep in the wilderness. And after the success of this extraordinary combination—for I can give it no other name—we, who remain where we were, are charged with being conspirators and traitors. We are told that we are bound by every tie to support Lord Russell. I dispute that. I never served under him. I have served, unfortunately, for a little less than ten years under two Prime Ministers, one being Lord Aberdeen, and the other, Lord Palmerston. Both these Governments Lord Russell joined; both these Governments he abandoned; and both these Governments he assisted to destroy. I owe him no allegiance. I am not afraid of the people of this country; they have shown remarkable good sense, remarkable indeed in contrast with the harangues that have been addressed to them. Nor am I afraid of those who lead them; and here I differ from my right honourable and gallant friend the member for Huntingdon. Demagogues are the commonplaces of history; they are found everywhere where there is popular commotion. They have all a family likeness. Their names float lightly on the stream of time; they finally contrive to be handed down somehow, but they are as little to be regarded for themselves as the foam which rides on the top of the stormy wave, and bespatters the rock it cannot shake; but what I do fear, what fills me with the gloomiest misgivings, is when I see a number of gentlemen of rank, property and intelligence, carried away without even being convinced, or even over-persuaded, to support a policy which many of them in their hearts detest and abhor. Monarchies exist by loyalty, aristocracies by honour, popular assemblies by political virtue. When these things begin to fail, it is in their loss, and not in comets, eclipses, and earthquakes, that we are to look for the portents that herald the fall of states." Though he could not agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there was, happily, one common ground left them—the Second Æneid. "My right honourable friend returned again to the poor old Trojan horse. I will add one more to the excerpt from the story of that noble animal, after which

I will promise to turn him out to grass for the remainder of his life. The passage which I wish to call attention to presents a sketch of the army, and not only of the army, but of the general also:—

' Arduus armatos mediis in manibus adstant
Fundit equus, victorque Sinon incendia miscet
Insultans, portis alii bipatentibus adsunt,
Millia quot magnis nunquam venère Mycenis.'
('The fatal horse pours forth the human tide,
Insulting Sinon flings his firebrands wide :
The gates are burnt ; the ancient rampart falls ;
And swarming myriads climb its crumbling walls.')

I have now, Sir, traced as well as I could what I believe would be the natural result of a measure which seems to my poor imagination destined to absorb and destroy one after the other those institutions which have made England what she has hitherto been, and what I believe no other country ever was, or ever will be. Surely the heroic work of so many centuries, the matchless achievements of so many wise heads and strong hands, deserve a nobler consummation than to be sacrificed to revolutionary passion, or to the maudlin enthusiasm of humanity. But if we do fall, we shall fall deservedly. Unconstrained by any external force, not beaten down by any intestine calamity: in the plethora of wealth and the surfeit of our too exuberant prosperity, we are about, with our own rash and unconstrained hands, to pluck down on our own heads the venerable temple of our own liberty and our law. History may record other catastrophes as signal and as disastrous, but none more wanton and more disgraceful."

— Conclusion of the debate on the second reading of the Reform Bill. Besides the division itself, the main feature of this the eighth and last night's discussion of the measure were the speeches of Viscount Cranborne and Mr. Disraeli, and the closing reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The leader of the Opposition spoke for nearly three hours, insisting that it was impossible to fathom the effects of this Franchise Bill till the complete scheme was before them; defending Conservatives from the charges now brought against them of dealing unfairly with this and other questions; and laying down such principles as he thought ought to be kept in view in framing a Reform Bill. "These principles," he said, "are English and not American principles. It ought to proceed upon the principle that we are the House of Commons, and not the House of the people; and that we represent a great political order of the State, and not an indiscriminate multitude. And in estimating what share the working classes should possess in the power of the State—a share which I do not at all begrudge them—we ought to act and to form that estimate according to the spirit of the English Constitution."—Mr. Gladstone spoke in his most effective style for fully two hours. Repudiating with scorn Mr. Lowe's assertion that he wished to coerce the House of Commons, he asked, "Does my right honourable friend not recollect that, in one of his plays, Aristophanes conveys, through the medium of some character or other, a rebuke to some prevailing tendency or sentiment of the time—I cannot recollect now what it was—it is too long ago since I read it—but that character, addressing the audience, says—'But now, my good Athenians, pray recollect I am not speaking of the city; I am not speaking of the public, I am only speaking of certain depraved and crooked little men.'" (Laughter.) And if I may be permitted to make a metaphorical application of these epithets—doing so only metaphorically, purely in a political sense, and solely with reference to this question of Reform, I would say it was not of the House of Commons, but of 'certain depraved and crooked little men,' that I used these words; and I frankly own now in candour my right hon. friend is first and foremost among them. Had I been Earl Russell—(cheers)—there might have been some temptation to go to excess in the exercise of authority, and to apply a pressure to this House in itself unjustifiable. But I am not Earl Russell. The right hon. gentleman, secure in the recollection of his own consistency, has taunted me with the errors of my boyhood. The right hon. gentleman, when he addressed the hon. member for Westminster, showed his magnanimity by declaring that he would not take the philosopher to task for what he wrote twenty-five years ago; but when he caught one who thirty-six years ago, just emerged from boyhood, and still an undergraduate at Oxford, had expressed an opinion adverse to the Reform Bill of 1832, of which he had so long and bitterly repented, then the right hon. gentleman could not resist the temptation. He, a parliamentary leader of twenty years' standing, is so ignorant of the House of Commons that he positively thought that he got a parliamentary advantage in exhibiting me to the public as an opponent of the Reform Bill of 1832. (Cheers.) As the right hon. gentleman has exhibited me, let me exhibit myself. It is true, I deeply regret it, but I was bred under the shadow of the great name of Canning; every influence connected with that name governed the politics of my childhood and my youth; with Canning I rejoiced in the removal of religious disabilities, and in the character which he gave to our policy abroad; with Canning I rejoiced in the opening he made towards the establishment of free commercial interchanges between nations; with Canning, and under the shadow of that great name, and under the shadow of that yet more venerable name of Burke, I grant, my youthful mind and imagination were impressed just the same as the mature mind of the right hon. gentleman is now impressed. I had conceived that fear and alarm of the first Reform Bill in the days of my undergraduate career at Oxford which the right hon. gentleman now feels; and the only difference between us is this—I thank him for bringing it out—that, having those views, I moved the Oxford Union Debating Society to express them clearly, plainly, forcibly, in downright English, and that the right hon. gentleman is still obliged to skulk under the cover of the amendment of the noble Lord. I envy him not one particle of the polemical advantage which he has gained by his discreet reference to the proceedings of the Oxford Union Debating Society. My position in regard to the Liberal party is in all points the opposite of Earl Russell's. Earl Russell might have been misled possibly, had he been in this place, into using language which would have been unfit coming from another person. But it could not be the same with me—I am too well aware of the relations which subsist between us. I have none of the claims he possesses. I came among you an outcast from those with whom I associated, driven from them by the slow and resistless force of conviction. I came among you, to make use of the legal phraseology, in formâ pauperis. I had nothing to offer you but faithful and honourable service. You received me with kindness, indulgence, generosity, and I may even say with some measure of confidence—and the relation between us is this—that you never can be my debtors, but that I must for ever be in your debt. It is not from me, under such circumstances, that any word will proceed that can savour of the character which the right hon. gentleman imputes to me." Mr. Gladstone closed the debate with the renewed assurance that the Government would stand or fall by the bill. "We stand with it now," he said, "we may fall with it a short time hence, and if we do we shall rise with it hereafter. I shall not attempt to measure with precision the forces that are to be arrayed in the coming struggle. Perhaps the great division of to-night is not the last that must take place in the struggle. You may possibly succeed at some point of the contest. You may drive us from our seats. You may bury the bill that we have introduced, but for its epitaph we will write upon its gravestone this line, with certain confidence in its fulfilment—

'Exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor.'

You cannot fight against the future. Time is on our side. The great social forces which move on in their might and majesty, and which the tumult of our debates does not for a moment impede or disturb—those great social forces are against you; they are marshalled on our side, and the banner which we now carry, though perhaps at this moment it may droop over our sinking heads, yet it soon again will float in the eye of heaven, and it will be borne by the firm hands of the united people of the three kingdoms, perhaps not to an easy, but to a certain and to a not distant victory." (The right hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid loud and long-continued cheering.)

27.—Scene at the division on the Reform Bill. "When Mr. Gladstone sat down, the Speaker," writes a spectator, "put the question in the dry technical form so puzzling to strangers, 'The question I have to put is, that the words to be left out stand part of the question. You that say Aye, say Aye.' (A tremendous shout of assent from the Ministerial benches.) 'You that say No, say No.' (A still more deafening shout from the Opposition.) 'Strangers must withdraw.' The members then rose to their feet and made their way to their respective lobbies. Slowly the crowd filtered through the wickets, and were numbered by the tellers. The Ayes gathered in crowds at the bar, and the Noes behind the Speaker's chair; but by degrees members found their way to their seats on the floor and in the galleries. In about twenty minutes a strange electric-like excitement began to manifest itself. Mr. Walpole passed along the front Opposition bench, and whispered to Mr. Disraeli the word 'six.' It was eagerly caught up, and repeated along the Opposition benches, but it was generally believed to be only a guess at the probable Ministerial majority. Mr. Brand then made his appearance. He had 'told' the Noes; and then the ominous figures '313' flew from mouth to mouth as the number of the Opposition. It was larger than the Liberals had feared or the Tories hoped; and although the numbers for the Government were not yet known, the number of the 'Noes' increased the excitement on the Conservative benches. At length Mr. Childers burst through the mob at the bar, and rushing up the floor to the Treasury bench, delivered the ill-news in a half-audible whisper to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He seemed to repeat the word 'Five!' in a tone of disappointment. The Tories did not hear this, and the House had still to wait for the appearance of the Government teller. After a movement of the crowd at the bar, and amid cries of 'make way for the tellers,' Mr. Adam emerged and made his way up the floor. The House was charged with electricity like a vast thundercloud; and now the spark was about to be applied. Strangers in the galleries rose in their seats—Conservative M.P.'s sat upon the edges of benches—the crowd at the bar pushed its way half up the floor—the Royal princes leaned forward in their inconvenient standing-place—and the officers of the House, participating in the universal excitement, had no eyes or ears for any breach of rule or order. The tellers range themselves in due form and order.—Mr. Brand, with the paper in his hand, on his left Mr. Adam, next him Lord Stanley, and then Earl Grosvenor. They bow and walk up the floor, and again make due obedience to the chair. Then Mr. Brand, in loud, distinct, and manly tones, reads—Ayes to the right, 318; Noes to the left, 313. Hardly had the words left his lips than there arose a wild, raging, mad-brained shout from floor and gallery such as has never been heard in the present House of Commons. Dozens of half-frantic Tories stood up in their seats, madly waved their hats, and hurrahed at the very top of their voices. Strangers in both galleries clapped their hands. The Adullamites on the Ministerial benches, carried away by the delirium of the moment, waved their hats in sympathy with the Opposition, and cheered as loud as any. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech had politely performed the operation of 'holding a candle to'—Lucifer; and he, the prince of the revolt, the leader, instigator, and prime mover of the conspiracy, stood up in the excitement of the moment—flushed, triumphant, and avenged. His hair, brighter than silver, shone and glistened in the brilliant light. His complexion had deepened into something like bishop's purple. His small, regular, and almost woman-like features, always instinct with intelligence, now mantled with liveliest pleasure. He took off his hat, waved it in wide and triumphant circles over the heads of the very men who had just gone into the lobby against him. 'Who would have thought there was so much in Bob Lowe?' said one member to another; 'why, he was one of the cleverest men in Lord Palmerston's Government?' 'All this comes of Lord Russell's sending for Göschel?' was the reply. 'Disraeli did not half so signally avenge himself against Peel,' interposed another; 'Lowe has very nearly broken up the Liberal party.' These may seem to be exaggerated estimates of the situation; but in that moment of agitation and excitement, I daresay a hundred sillier things were said and agreed to. Anyhow, there he stood, that usually cold, undemonstrative, intellectual, white-headed, red-faced, venerable-looking arch-conspirator! shouting himself hoarse, like the ringleader of schoolboys at a successful barring out, and amply repaid at that moment for all Skye-terrier witticisms and any amount of popular obloquy! But see, the Chancellor of the Exchequer lifts up his hand to bespeak silence, as if he had something to say in regard to the result of the division. But the more the great orator lifts his hand beseechingly, the more the cheers are renewed and the hats waved. At length the noise comes to an end by the process of exhaustion, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer rises. Then there is a universal hush, and you might hear a pin drop. He simply says—'Sir, I propose to fix the Committee for Monday, and I will then state the order of business.' It was twilight brightening into day when we got out into the welcome fresh air of New Palace Yard. Early as was the hour, about three hundred persons were assembled to see the members come out, and to cheer the friends of the Bill. It was a night to be long remembered. The House of Commons had listened to the grandest oration ever yet delivered by the greatest orator of his age; and had then to ask itself how it happened that the Liberal party had been disunited, and a Liberal majority of sixty 'muddled away.' There voted for the Government 318 Liberals and 2 Conservatives against 282 Conservatives and 33 Liberals. There was one pair—Roebuck and Treherne; absent, 6 Liberals and 3 Conservatives, mostly from serious illness. These, with the 11 seats vacant, and the Speaker, made up the full House of 658. The division was amongst the largest, if not the very largest, which ever took place within the walls of the House of Commons.

28.—Prussia makes a peremptory demand on Saxony to give an account of the reasons for increasing her army.

— Fall of a railway bridge on the Mitcham and Sutton Railway, causing the death of six men.

30.—O'Neill, a Dublin policeman, shot while on duty near Ormond Market.

— Collision on the South Coast Railway near Caterham Junction, a passenger train running into a train laden with chalk. Two persons were killed and several injured.

— Prussian note despatched to Vienna, declaring that Austria's proposals for disarmament were completely nullified by the measures she had taken against Italy. "The Government of his Majesty," wrote Count Bismarck, "thinks there is no reason why Austria should prepare to ward off an attack on her possessions in Italy. If Austria should not think fit to place the whole Imperial army on a real peace footing, it will not be possible for Prussia to carry on the important and momentous negotiations with the Imperial Government in any other way than by maintaining an equilibrium in the warlike preparations of the two Powers." Count Mensdorff replied, "It is our duty to provide for the defence of the Monarchy, and if the Prussian Government finds, in our measures against Italy, a motive for upholding her own readiness for war, we can but fulfil that duty which admits of no foreign control, without entering into any further discussion as to the priority or magnitude of the several military movements."

May 1.—Address to the Crown agreed to for the appointment of Commissioners to inquire into the corrupt practices prevailing at the last election of members for Totnes, Yarmouth, Reigate, and Lancaster, in all of which members had been unseated by Parliamentary Committees.

2.—Order issued by the Austrian Government to place the armies on a war footing.

— A bill for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, thrown out on a second reading by 174 to 155.

3.—Debate in the French Corps Législatif on the impending conflict between Italy and Austria. M. Rouher, Minister of State, said:—"We do not claim to exercise any guardianship over Italy. She is unfettered in her resolutions, because she is alone responsible for them; but the interest we feel towards her obliged us to explain ourselves categorically. She knows that, as we should highly disapprove of Austria making any attack upon her, so also are we thoroughly determined to throw upon her all the perils and risks of any attack she may make upon Austria. The declaration of the Government is summed up as follows:—"A pacific policy, an honest neutrality, and complete liberty of action."—M. Thiers declared that France, which had lavished treasure and blood for Italy, had the right to prevent her from any act of aggression that she might contemplate, and that Italy was bound in gratitude to listen to France.

3.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the annual Budget. He calculated the expenditure for the year at 66,225,000*l.*, and the revenue at 67,575,000*l.* He proposed to remove the duty from timber and pepper, to modify the duty on wine in regard to the proportion of alcohol, and to reduce the stage-carriage and post-horse duty from a farthing to a penny a mile. This would absorb 562,000*l.* of the estimated surplus of 1,350,000*l.* The balance he proposed applying to the reduction of the National Debt. He showed at some length that the expense of our present armaments, and the interest on the debts which have been bequeathed to us by former wars, amount together to 83 per cent. of the national expenditure, leaving only 17 per cent. to defray the civil charges. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also referred to the debt of other countries as compared with our own, and the provisions that might require to be made for maintaining our industrial supremacy in view of the possible exhaustion of our coal-fields.

4.—The King of Italy issues a decree ordering the formation of twenty battalions of volunteers to be placed under the command of Garibaldi.

5.—The annual banquet of the Royal Academy was this year honoured with the presence of the Prince of Wales and several other royal personages. The new President, Sir Francis Grant, presided for the first time.

6.—In reply to an address from the inhabitants of Auxerre, the Emperor Napoleon said:—"I am happy to see that the reminiscences of the first Empire have not been effaced from your memory. Be certain that, on my side, I have inherited the sentiments of the head of my family for the energetic and patriotic populations who supported the Emperor in good and evil fortunes. I have, moreover, a debt of gratitude to pay to the department of the Yonne. It was one of the first to give me its suffrages in 1848, because it knew, like the majority of the French nation, that its interests were mine, and that, like it, I detested those treaties of 1815 which some parties of the day wish to make the sole basis of our foreign policy. I thank you for your sentiments. In the midst of you I breathe at ease, for it is among the laborious populations of the towns and rural districts, that I find the true genius of France."

6.—Destruction of Scott, Inglis, and Co.'s spinning works, Bridgeton, Glasgow. Sixty thousand spindles in working order, and sixty thousand in preparation, were destroyed.

7.—Attempt to assassinate Count Bismarck when returning on foot along the Unter den Linden, after an audience with the King. Upon reaching the Schadow Strasse, he was fired at from behind by a man who discharged at him two barrels of a revolver. Both shots missed the Count, who immediately turned and seized the man. In the struggle which ensued between them three more shots were fired, but the Count remained unhurt, with the exception of a slight contusion. His clothes were also burned by the three last discharges. The assassin, a young student named Blind, committed suicide in prison by stabbing himself with a pocket-knife.

— The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the Distribution of Seats Bill. By grouping together a number of small boroughs, giving one or two representatives only to each group, he gained forty-one seats, and eight others were to be reduced to one representative each, making a total of forty-nine. These he proposed to distribute among populous counties to the number of twenty-six; to give an extra representative to Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and Salford; to divide the Tower Hamlets into two divisions, with two members each; to create seven new electoral boroughs with one member each, and one (Kensington and Chelsea) with two; and to give seven seats to Scotland. The Scotch and Irish Reform Bills were also introduced, the former by the Lord Advocate, and the latter by Mr. Secretary Fortescue.

9.—The Frankfort Diet resolves to support Saxony, and to ask specific assurances from Prussia.

— Colonel Hobbs commits suicide by throwing himself from the deck of the Tyne on her voyage between Kingston and St. Thomas. The inquiry as to the part he had taken in suppressing the Jamaica outbreak, and the criticism to which he was in consequence subjected, had so affected Colonel Hobbs that he was pronounced of unsound mind, and was coming home invalided in the charge of an army surgeon.

10.—Disastrous commercial panic. Suspension of Overend, Gurney, and Co. (limited). "We regret to announce," wrote the secretary about half-past three o'clock, "that a severe run on our deposits and resources has compelled us to suspend payment, this course being considered under advice the best calculated to protect the interest of all parties." The liabilities were stated at the enormous amount of 11,000,000*l.* When the private firm was transformed into a limited company last year, the capital was set down at 5,000,000*l.* in 100,000 shares of 50*l.* each, the paid-up capital being 1,500,000*l.* As a private firm the profits were understood to be about 250,000*l.* per annum. Some months back the shares touched ten per cent., but the bankruptcy of a large contractor, with heavy losses through the failure and frauds of Pinto, Percy, Ashby, and Co., operated to shake the establishment very seriously. It also got to be generally known that the firm was trading vastly beyond even its fixed capital. This (Thursday) morning the shares opened at about 3 discount, but afterwards dropped to 4½ discount, and closed at 10½ to 9½ discount. The excitement when the doors closed, and the intelligence became generally known, was intense. The Bank of England was applied to for assistance, and there appeared every disposition to afford it, but after examining the books of the company, and consulting with the heads of other banking establishments, it was found that no assistance which could be given would be effectual. The market was under the influence of a favourable telegram from Vienna when a sudden and severe fall in Overend shares completely changed its character.

11.—To-day, "Black Friday," the commercial panic swept over the City with most disastrous results. All descriptions of securities were indiscriminately pressed for sale with an absolute disregard of their value, and speculative engagements were closed by the brokers in the greatest possible haste, without reference to their clients, and in many cases contrary to their instructions. In some cases bank and finance shares were offered for nothing. This morning the Bank raised the rate of discount from 8 to 9 per cent., and for special advance to 10 per cent. The pressure even at these terms was enormous, and it was only on an exceptional bill that accommodation could be obtained. Meanwhile disaster after disaster was reported at the Stock Exchange. First came the English Joint Stock, for 800,000*l.*; then the great contracting firm of Peto and Betts, for 4,000,000*l.*; followed by Shrimpton, railway contractor, for 200,000*l.*; the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, whose paid-up capital was 500,000*l.*; and the Consolidated Discount Company, 250,000*l.* All day the crowd surged along Lombard-street; banking-houses were crammed with customers having more the appearance of an unruly plundering mob than sober capitalists; and here and there speculators mustered in sullen steadiness before the closed doors of some establishment whose credit had crumbled to ruins in the storm. Further disaster was still in prospect. The shares of Agra and Mastermans' Bank, which at the beginning of the year were 33 premium, closed this day at 1 discount.

throwing himself off the Clifton Suspension Bridge.

11.—About midnight Mr. Gladstone intimated in the House of Commons that, as the result of numerous and protracted interviews with bank directors and the heads of other financial projects, Government had determined on authorizing the suspension of the Bank Charter Act. Through a desire to extend relief, the Bank of England had that day raised its loan and discounts to something over 4,000,000*l.*, thereby reducing the reserves to about 3,000,000*l.* The necessary authority, he said, would be forwarded to the Directors in the morning. This greatly allayed the panic, though numerous failures continued to be reported day after day, chiefly in connexion with the great firms which had fallen in the first fury of the storm.

12.—An irruption of water from old adjoining workings takes place into the Furze-hill Wood Mine near Harrowbridge.

— Meeting at Lambeth Palace, presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury, to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Keble. It was resolved that a sum of 50,000*l.* be raised for the accomplishment of an object which he was known to have much at heart—namely, the establishment of a college or other institution in which young men now debarred from University education might be trained in simple and religious habits, and in strict fidelity to the Church of England, with the hope that, among other advantages, it would tend to promote the supply of candidates for Holy Orders.

14.—The second reading of the Redistribution Bill carried without a division, the sitting being chiefly taken up by Mr. Disraeli, who made a lengthened adverse criticism of the Government proposals.

— The cattle-plague appears in Ireland, at Drennan, County Down, but through the energetic measures adopted it was prevented from spreading.

15.—At the annual meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, the Earl of Shaftesbury took occasion to express the following opinion regarding the new anonymous work "Ecce Homo," which was at this time exciting a wide interest in religious circles:—"Sir," he said, "how men are deluded, how they are misled by those who should be their guides! I confess I was perfectly aghast the other day when speaking to a clergyman, and asking him his opinion of the most pestilential book ever vomited, I think, from the jaws of hell—I mean 'Ecce Homo.' When I asked him what was his opinion of that book, he deliberately told me—he being a great professor of evangelical religion—that the book had excited his deepest admiration, and that he did not hesitate to say that it had conferred great benefit upon his own soul. Why, if we are to have this miserable and uncertain teaching,—if the guides to whom we look for light and help can approve such works as that, how can we expect that the mass of the people, the mass even of the educated middle classes, who are supposed to think for themselves, will not be led to wander out of the right way?"

16.—President Johnson vetoes the Bill admitting Colorado as a State of the American Union.

— Epsom.—The Derby won by Lord Lyon, and on the 18th the Oaks by Tormentor.

18.—At a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel it was resolved to postpone the election of Bishop Colenso as vice-president. A resolution was also carried:—"That the Bishop of Capetown be requested under existing circumstances to give such episcopal superintendence, and supply for the present such Episcopal ministrations as he may be able to afford, or to obtain from any other South African bishops, to the Society's missionaries in Natal."

19.—Died at Paris, aged 61, Rev. Francis Mahoney, better known as "Father Prout," wit, poet, and journalist.

— New Museum at Edinburgh opened by Prince Alfred, who, a few days later, was created duke, with the name of the city for title.

20.—The Russian troops in Central Asia gained an important victory over the Ameer of Bokhara near Idjar. The latter fled to Djonzah, nearly eighty miles southward, being unable to rally on the rear-guard at Oratepe.

25.—Invitations for a Conference despatched by England, France, and Russia, to Austria, Prussia, Italy, and the German Diet.

— Fire at Ottery St. Mary, Exeter, destroying a large number of small houses and the National School.

28.—Government defeated by 248 to 238 on Sir R. Knightley's motion,—"That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Franchise Bill to make provision for the prevention of corruption and bribery." The motion to consider the Franchise Bill and the Distribution Bill together was adopted without discussion. The debate was adjourned on Captain Hayter's resolution—"That this House, although desirous that the subject of franchise and the redistribution of seats should be considered together, is of opinion that the system of grouping proposed in the present bill for the redistribution of seats is neither convenient nor equitable, and that the scheme is otherwise not sufficiently matured to form the basis of a satisfactory measure."

— The Consolidated Bank, which had just taken up the business of the Bank of London, suspends payment.

30.—Discussion on the second reading of Mr. Clay's Education Franchise Bill adjourned without a division. Mr. Clay afterwards withdrew the Bill.

31.—In the adjourned debate on Captain Hayter's resolution, Mr. Lowe made another speech of marked ability in opposition to the Government proposals, closing with one more earnest protest against Democracy. "We are about to exchange," he said, "certain good for more than doubtful change; we are about to barter maxims and traditions that have never failed, for theories and doctrines that have never succeeded. Democracy you may have at any time. Night and day the gate is open that leads to that bare and level plain where every ant's nest is a mountain and every thistle a forest tree. But a Government, such as that of England, is the work of no human hand. It has grown up the imperceptible aggregation of centuries. It is a thing which we only can enjoy, which we cannot impart to others, and which, once lost, we cannot recover for ourselves. Because you have contrived to be at once dilatory and hasty, it is no reason for pressing forward rashly and improvidently. To precipitate a decision even in the case of a single human life would be cruel; it is more than cruel—it is parricide—in the case of a Constitution which is the life of this great nation. If it is to perish as all mortal things must perish, give it at any rate time to gather its robe around it that it may fall with decency and deliberation."

"To-morrow!

Oh, that's sudden! spare it! spare it!
It ought not so to die!"

31.—At the trial of the Fenian Sergeant M'Carthy in Dublin to-day, Detective Talbot stated in evidence that on the 6th January he was at Clonmel with the prisoner by appointment, with Morris, a working "B," and a person named Daniel, a sub-centre, and that there, in Burke's public-house in Clonmel, in company with bombardier Low of the Artillery, M'Carthy stated here was the man who had enlisted the forty-four Fenians of whatever artillery was then in Clonmel. The object of the Fenian brotherhood the witness stated to be was to make war on the Queen, to establish a republic, to seize on all property and kill every person who opposed them. They were to rise on a certain night, when arms would be distributed to them.

June 1.—The German Diet informed by Austria that all efforts to arrange amicably the dispute with Prussia concerning the Duchies had been fruitless.

2.—The Canadian Volunteers march against a party of Fenians who had crossed the Niagara river near Buffalo, and established themselves in an empty mill known as Fort Erie. The Volunteers were in the first instance unsuccessful, but being reinforced in large numbers they afterwards drove the Fenians across the river, where many of them were captured by the Federal soldiers. Six seized on the Canada side were tried by drum-head court-martial and shot. On the 7th President Johnson issued a proclamation against the Fenians, and on the same day Roberts, a head-centre, was arrested in New York. General Sweeney, the organizer of the raid, was arrested at St. Alban's on the 6th.

4.—As inducing him to return to the Liberal ranks and vote against Captain Hayter's motion, Earl Grosvenor said that its success might lead to the breaking up of the Government, and in the present state of European politics, it would be a great misfortune if the country were deprived of the services of Lord Clarendon.—Mr. Disraeli took occasion to comment on this, and referred to the repeated failures of the Foreign Secretary in Congresses and Conferences, charging him, among other shortcomings, with entering into a conspiracy to trammel the free press of Belgium.—The following evening Lord Clarendon brought up the subject in the House of Lords, and quoted the following as his answer to the proposition on the subject made at the Congress of Paris:—"As regards the observations offered by Count Walewski on the excesses of the Belgian press, and the dangers which result therefrom for the adjoining countries, the Plenipotentiaries of England admit their importance, but as the representative of a country in which a free and independent press is, so to say, one of the fundamental institutions, they cannot associate themselves to measures of coercion against the press of another State." "The right honourable gentleman," he continued, "either knew or did not know of the protocol from which I have quoted when he made the charge against me. If he did know of it, then I should be prepared to characterise the charge against me as it deserves; but if he did not know of what I said or did upon that occasion, I scarcely think your Lordships will believe the declaration I have made to be altogether unnecessary."—Mr. Disraeli returned to the charge on the 8th, and described the various understandings come to at the Congress of Paris as culminating in the Conspiracy Bill which drove Lord Palmerston's Government from office.

— Much to the relief of the Government— which was considered in peril—Captain Hayter consents to withdraw his resolutions. A scene of great irregularity and violence took place in the division lobbies at the close of the debate, when the motion was put that the Speaker leave the chair.

5.—Abandonment of the proposed Conference at Paris in consequence of the refusal of Austria to assent to the programme for the settlement of disputes without hostilities, she demanding as a previous stipulation that no territorial addition should be made to any of the contending states.

— Testimonial presented to Captain Maury, at Willis's Rooms.

6.—Stoppage of the Agra and Mastermans' Bank, causing, from the peculiar character of its operations, and its numerous agencies in the East, a greater amount of loss and inconvenience than had yet been felt by any recent commercial disaster. Some idea of the run upon this bank may be gathered from the fact that since the commencement of the crisis, they had paid no less than 3,000,000*l.* over the counter. The immediate cause of the failure was a run on the branches in India, produced by false telegrams from London that the mother bank had stopped.

6.—Fire in Westmoreland-street, Dublin : six persons burned to death in consequence of the breaking of the fire-escape.

— The debate on the third reading of Fellows of Colleges Declaration Bill, adjourned without a division till 18th July.

— Came on for hearing, in the Court of Probate, before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Judge Wilde, and a special jury, the case of Ryves and Ryves v. the Attorney-General, involving important interests under the Legitimacy Declaration Act. The petitioners instituting the suit were, Lavinia Jannetta Horton Ryves, of Maitland-park, St. Pancras, and her son William Henry Ryves. The petition alleged that the petitioners were natural-born subjects of her Majesty, and that the first-named petitioner was the legitimate daughter of John Thomas Serres and Olive, his wife, the said Olive being, while living, a natural-born British subject, and that the petitioners were legally domiciled in England; that the first-named petitioner's mother, Olive, was the legitimate daughter of Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, and Olive Wilmot, his wife, respectively deceased; and that the said Olive was born on the 3d of April, 1772; that the first-named petitioner's grand-parents, the said Duke of Cumberland and Olive Wilmot, were, on the 4th of March, 1767, lawfully married in England at the house of Thomas Lord Archer, in Grosvenor-square, London, and that the said marriage was solemnized by the Rev. James Wilmot, D.D., who was the father of the said Olive Wilmot; that the first-named petitioner was lawfully married on the 22d of November, 1822, to Anthony Thomas Ryves, from whom she was, on the 16th of February, 1841, divorced a mensâ et thoro by the Arches Court of Canterbury, and that there was issue of the marriage William Henry Ryves, the second petitioner, and other children; that the petitioner, William Henry Ryves, was the legitimate son of the first-named petitioner, and was born at Durham-cottage, Vauxhall, in the parish of Lambeth, on the 3d of March, 1833, and was baptized at Lambeth Church on the 30th of June, 1840. The petition prayed the Court to pronounce that Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, and Olive, his wife, were, on the 4th of March, 1767, lawfully married, and that the mother of the first-named petitioner, the said Olive, afterwards Olive Serres, was their legitimate child, and that she was born on the 3d of April, 1772; and that the first-named petitioner was lawfully married to Anthony Thomas Ryves, and that the second petitioner is their legitimate son and heir, and a natural-born subject of her Majesty. The Attorney-General had been cited in pursuance of the Act, and filed an answer denying that the first-named petitioner's mother was the legitimate daughter of Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, and Olive Wilmot, and that the said petitioner's alleged mother was born as set forth in the petition, and that Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, was lawfully married to Olive Wilmot, as set forth in the petition, and that the other allegations in the petition were true. The answer concluded with a prayer for the rejection of the petition. Issue was joined upon this answer. The case was supported by a multitude of semi-official documents, of the nature of wills, certificates, and memoranda relating to the alleged marriage of the Duke of Cumberland with Olive Wilmot, and purporting to be signed by King George III., the Earl of Chatham, Solicitor-General Dunning, Lord Brook, and the Rev. Dr. Wilmot, who was reputed to have performed that, as well as other secret Royal marriages, and whose certificates seemed planned from the beginning to connect a scheme of elaborate imposture. The documents were of the following character:—"I solemnly certify that I married Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, to Olive Wilmot, March the fourth, 1767, and that such marriage was lawfully solemnized at Thomas Lord Archer's house, at nine in the evening, in Grosvenor-square, London.—J. WILMOT. Witnesses to this marriage, BROOK, J. ADDEY. Attested before CHATHAM, J. DUNNING." "April four, 1772. G. R. Whereas it is our Royal will that Olive, our niece, be baptized Olive Wilmot, to operate during our Royal pleasure." "G. R. We hereby are pleased to create Olive of Cumberland Duchess of Lancaster, and to grant our Royal authority for Olive our said niece, to bear and use the title and arms of Lancaster should she be in existence at the period of our Royal demise.—Given at our Palace of St. James's, May 17th, 1773. CHATHAM, J. DUNNING." "May 3, 1774. G. R. In the face of Almighty God we, the undersigned, solemnly certify that his Majesty gave his Royal command that Olive, the legitimate daughter of Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, by Olive, his first wife, should be re-baptized as the supposed child of Robert Wilmot, of Warwick, to save her Royal father, who had committed an act of bigamy by marrying Ann Horton.—J. WILMOT, J. DUNNING." "I solemnly certify that I privately was married to the Princess of Poland, the sister to the King of Poland. But an unhappy family difference induced us to keep our union secret. One dear child blessed myself, who married the Duke of Cumberland, March 4, 1767, and died in the prime of life of a broken heart, December 5th, 1774, in France.—J. WILMOT, Jan. 1st, 1780." These documents had nearly all been through the law courts before, in connexion with the claim set up forty years since by the so-called Olive, Princess of Cumberland (or Serres), mother of the senior petitioner. Experts were now put into the witness-box, who gravely testified to the genuineness of the signatures, with one or two qualified exceptions; but the weight of the evidence, as gleaned in cross-examination, was not only against their authenticity, but tended to show that the occurrences they certified could not possibly have happened. The Attorney-General treated them as the creation of a vain, disordered brain, and more than hinted that the mother of the petitioner had, in her day, been the prime mover in the absurd claim. An insurmountable technical difficulty also arose in the progress of the case. If Mrs. Ryve succeeded in making out that her mother was a Royal Princess, she would have established at the same time her own illegitimacy. The alleged marriage of the Duke of Cumberland was celebrated before the Royal Marriage Act; and, consequently, if Mrs. Serres had been the Duke's daughter, she would have been a Princess of the Blood Royal. But that Act had been passed before her marriage with Mr. Serres, and would have rendered it invalid, so that her issue would have been illegitimate. After a trial extending over seven days, in the course of which the aged petitioner herself was subjected to a close cross-examination, the petition was dismissed and the documents ordered to be impounded.

7.—Discussion on Lord Stanley's proposal to postpone clause 4 of the Reform Bill, relating to the county franchise, till the re-distribution clauses were settled. Negated by 287 to 260.

8.—The Duke of Edinburgh takes his seat in the House of Lords.

9.—Inquiry into the alleged neglect and irregularity prevailing in the Strand Union Workhouse, where a poor man, Owen Daly, had been permitted to die mainly of bed-sores.

10.—Triple collision in the Welwyn Tunnel of the Great Northern Railway, resulting in the death of a guard and fireman.

11.—Garibaldi arrives at Genoa from Caprera.

— In committee on the Reform Bill, Mr. Hunt moved:—"That the 14*l.* franchise in counties should be rateable value instead of gross estimated rental." This was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the debate was continued until it was moved that the Committee report progress. Negated by 303 to 254. It was then moved that the House adjourn; but this, after a sharp debate, was negated by 254 to 212.

— In the Commons Mr. Kinglake makes a speech on the complications which at present threatened the peace of Europe. He remarked that the Government, in consenting to enter the Conference without first ascertaining what the views of Austria were, had departed from Lord John Russell's pitiless logic of two years since. In answer to the question whether there was any ground for believing that peace might be preserved, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was afraid there was none upon which any solid expectations could be built, although there was a momentary arrest of the military proceedings in Prussia, and in the departure of the King from Berlin.

11.—In a letter to M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the Emperor of the French expresses his desire to avoid participation in the continental war, and states his opinion that Austria for an equitable compensation should cede Venetia to Italy.

12.—Prince Teck married, at Kew, to the Princess Mary of Cambridge.

— In the House of Commons, Mr. Hussey-Vivian introduces an interesting discussion on the subject of our national coal-fields, and combats the views of Jevons and Armstrong as to their probable early extinction.

— In the House of Commons, Lord Duncannon gives notice of his intention to move, "That the proposed 7*l.* borough franchise be a rating qualification."

— Diplomatic relations cease between Prussia and Austria. A Prussian declaration of war followed immediately thereafter, and on the 15th her armies entered Saxony and Hanover. On the 17th one division took possession of Stade, and on the 18th another entered Dresden.

13.—Mr. Coleridge's Test Abolition Bill passed through committee, after an amendment, moved by Sir W. Heathcote, for securing fellowships and headships of colleges against Dissenters, had been negated by 245 to 171.

14.—Explosion of fire-damp in Dukinfield Colliery, near Ashton. A few were brought at once to the surface alive, but injured, others made their escape to distant portions of the workings, but the number suffocated amounted to thirty-seven, making, it was said, the dreadful total of 386 lives lost in this pit since its commencement, five years ago.

— Commenced at the Old Bailey the trial of William Smith, alias Denton, for the Cannon-street murder. The prisoner proved a complete alibi. About a dozen witnesses from Windsor were examined, who accounted almost minute by minute for the prisoner's time throughout the evening of the murder. He appeared to have been chiefly occupied in playing at cards for pints of beer at a local public-house. The jury, without any hesitation, found the prisoner Not Guilty. The prisoner exclaimed, "Thank you, gentlemen; I am as innocent as a baby," and the judge added that it was due to the prisoner to say that he was "not merely not guilty, but innocent." The jury said, "We think so too, my Lord."

16.—Austria declares her intention to afford Saxony military aid against Prussia, who accepts this as a declaration of war.

17.—The Emperor of Austria issues a war manifesto addressed "to my Peoples," in which he reviews the course of events which had at length compelled him to draw the sword. "We shall not be alone in the struggle which is about to take place. The princes and peoples of Germany know that their liberty and independence are menaced by a Power which listens but to the dictates of egotism, and is under the influence of an ungovernable craving after aggrandizement; and they also know that in Austria they have an upholder of the freedom, power, and integrity of the whole of the German Fatherland. We and our German brethren have taken up arms in defence of the most precious rights of nations. We have been forced so to do, and we neither can nor will disarm until the internal development of my Empire and of the German States which are allied with it has been secured, and also their power and influence in Europe." General Benedek was appointed Commander-in-chief of the Austrian army of the North, and his forces were distributed along the frontier separating Moravia from Saxony and Silesia. The plan of the Prussian campaign was arranged by General von Moltke in Berlin. They were also greatly indebted to their needle-guns (Zündnadelgewehr), a breech-loading musket, which enabled them to fire with terrible rapidity, and at times almost paralysed the Austrians.

18.—Government defeated on Lord Dunkellin's amendment in favour of a borough franchise based on rating instead of rental, by a majority of 315 to 304. "Frequent as had been the exciting divisions during the session, this scene," says the Times, "surpassed them all in the frantic enthusiasm with which the defeat of the Government was received. When Lord Dunkellin took from the clerk the paper containing the numbers, the storm of cheers prevented him reading them out for a good minute; and when the decisive character of the majority became known, it was again accompanied by the waving of hats, clapping of hands, not only by members, but by strangers, and other unparliamentary demonstrations." Mr. Gladstone fixed the renewal of the Committee for the evening sitting at six o'clock, adding the significant intimation, that no Government business would now be taken at the twelve o'clock sitting."

— The Bishop of London presents a petition to the House of Lords from Miss Burdett Coutts, praying that in any measure for amending the law with respect to the bishops and clergy in the colonies of Capetown, Adelaide, and British Columbia, full legal effect might be given to her Majesty's Royal letters patent constituting the sees of those colonies respectively; and that, in case any of the bishops of the said sees should surrender his letters patent, the funds forming the endowment of his bishopric might be applied according to the intentions of the founder thereof or else revert to the founder. A debate ensued, which resulted in the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into this and other petitions of a similar character.

19.—Earl Russell in the House of Lords, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Commons, intimate that, in consequence of the result in the division yesterday on Lord Dunkellin's motion, they had communicated to her Majesty (then at Balmoral) the result of their deliberations at the Cabinet Council held in the afternoon. Both Houses adjourned to Monday the 25th.

— The armies of Prince Frederick Charles and of the Crown Prince of Prussia receive orders to march against Austria.

20.—Italy declares war against Austria.

22.—Prince Frederick Charles issues from Görlitz a general order to the First Army:—"Soldiers! Austria, faithless and regardless of treaties, has for some time, without declaring war, not respected the Prussian frontier in Upper Silesia. I therefore, likewise without a declaration of war, might have passed the frontier of Bohemia. To-day I have caused a public declaration to be sent, and to-day we enter the territory of the enemy in order to defend our own country. . . . We rely on the God of our fathers, who will be mighty in us, and will bless the arms of Prussia. So forward, with our old battle-cry,—'With God for King and fatherland! Long live the King!'"

23.—Mr. Gladstone's sinking fund scheme abandoned, and a supplementary estimate of 495,000*l.* voted.

— The Italian army, numbering between 80,000 and 90,000 men, crossed the Mincio on their march against the Austrians. They were met at Custozza next day by Archduke Albert, and defeated after a severe engagement of two hours' duration.

24.—Fire at Newcastle, destroying property valued at 70,000*l.* and damaging the lower road way of the high level bridge.

25.—Intimation made in both Houses of Parliament that Ministers had tendered their resignation, but that her Majesty, hesitating to accept the same till she could have personal communication with them, was then journeying towards Windsor, and had appointed tomorrow at one o'clock for an audience.

26.—The Court of Session, Edinburgh, gave judgment in the case of Campbell v. Campbell, involving the succession to the earldom and estates of Breadalbane. Judgment was given by ten to two for Campbell of Glenfalloch, and against Campbell of Boreland, who challenged the legitimacy of Glenfalloch's father.

— Engagement between the First Prussian Army and the Austrians, near Reichenberg. The latter fell back upon Münchengrätz, which they made an unsuccessful attempt to defend on the 28th.

— The Queen sends for Lord Derby and entrusts him with the formation of a Ministry.

— Earl Russell makes a statement of the steps taken by Ministers since the late defeat.

On tendering their resignation to her Majesty, she desired them to reconsider their determination, as it appeared to her that they had only been defeated on a point of detail; and it was further urged that the present state of the Continent made it very inexpedient that a change of Government should take place. Subsequent communication with her Majesty led her to attach more importance to the defeat, and the construction of a new Ministry would now be entrusted to other hands. Earl Russell complained that the treatment which the Reform Bill had received was hardly in accordance with the voluntary promise of Lord Derby that his friends would offer it no factious opposition.—Lord Derby repudiated this charge with great warmth, and stated that he had never advised any of his friends to meet the bill with more than reasonable opposition. It had been defeated, he said, not by the opponents of the noble Earl, but by those whom he included among his political supporters. The House adjourned till Friday the 29th.—In the Commons Mr. Gladstone explained the circumstances which led the Government to determine that they would stand or fall by their measure. "It was a pledge," he said, "a Government should rarely give. It was the last weapon in the armoury of the Government: it should not be lightly taken down from the walls; and if it is taken down, it should not be lightly replaced, nor till it has served the purposes it was meant to fulfil. The pledge had been given, however, under the deepest conviction of public duty, and had the effect of making them use every effort in their power to avoid offence, to conciliate, support, and unite, instead of distracting." The House adjourned till next day, on the understanding that a further adjournment might then take place. There was considerable excitement in Palace Yard to-night on the assembling of the House.

27.—The Second Prussian Army under the Crown Prince defeats the Austrians at Nachod, but their advance was for a time checked by the Austrian Ramming Brigade and a division of heavy cavalry. The Crown Prince opportunely arrived to relieve his leading columns, and a hotly-contested battle ensued, in which the Austrians were said to have lost in killed and wounded about 4,000 men. A successful action was fought the same day by the Crown Prince at Trautenau.

29.—Earl Derby having sought to include in the new Ministry certain members of the Liberal party, Earl Grosvenor waits upon him this day and intimates that those members who had attended a meeting called to consider the proposal had resolved unanimously not to accept office, though some of them might give him an independent support.

—Reform demonstration in Trafalgar-square, attended by about 10,000 people. A resolution was passed declaring Earl Russell deserving of censure for not having advised her Majesty to dissolve the present anti-Reform Parliament, and declaring that the people would not in future support any measure of Reform short of registered manhood suffrage. It was also declared that "the meeting views with alarm the advent of the Tories to power, as being destructive to freedom at home and favourable to despotism abroad." The Reformers then proceeded to Carlton-gardens, where the loud cries of "Gladstone for ever" brought Mrs. Gladstone to the balcony, accompanied, in the absence of her husband, by some members of her family. They afterwards traversed Pall Mall hooting and cheering as they passed the different club-houses on their route.

29.—The Austrian Archduke Leopold engaged the Prussians before Skalitz, but is compelled to retire and leave the town in possession of the enemy. Count Clam Gallas with the First Austrian Corps d'Armée attacks Prince Frederick Charles, but is beaten back through the town of Gitschin. This exposed the left flank of General Benedek, at Dubenee, and he therefore ordered his army to fall back in the direction of Königgrätz. The Prussians were at this time not only on his left but in his rear, and at the same time another great army was marching to effect its junction with them where he was altogether exposed. He instantly wheeled back his left and centre, and then retiring his left took up a line at Königgrätz, at right angles to the line he had occupied to the west of Josephstadt. Alarmed at the position which he felt himself compelled to take up, Benedek is said to have telegraphed to the Emperor, at Vienna:—"Sire, you must make peace."

30.—The King of Prussia sets out from Berlin for the seat of war.

—The Great Eastern leaves the Medway for Berehaven, with the new Atlantic cable on board.

July 2.—Reform demonstration in Trafalgar-square.

3.—Battle of Sadowa or Königgrätz—the greatest engagement of the war and the most disastrous for Austria. "It was ten o'clock," writes Lieut. Hozier of the Times, "when Prince Frederick Charles sent General Stubnow to order the attack on Sadowa, Dohilnitz, and Mokrowens. The columns advanced covered by skirmishers, and reached the river-bank without much loss, but from there they had to fight every inch of their way. The Austrian infantry held the bridges and villages in forces, and fired first upon them as they approached. The Prussians could advance but slowly along the narrow ways and against the defences of the houses, and the volleys sweeping through the ranks seemed to tear the soldiers down. The Prussians fired much more quickly than their opponents; but they could not see to take their aim; the houses, trees, and smoke from the Austrian discharges shrouded the villages. Sheltered by this the

Austrian Jägers fired blindly where they could tell by hearing that the attacking columns were, and the shots told tremendously on the Prussians in their close formations; but the latter improved their position, though slowly, and by dint of sheer courage and perseverance, for they lost men at every yard of their advance, and in some places almost paved their way with wounded. Then, to help the infantry, the Prussian artillery turned its fire, regardless of the enemy's batteries, on the villages, and made tremendous havoc among the houses." In the wood above Benatek the 27th Prussian regiment went in nearly 3,000 strong with 90 officers, and came out on the further side with only two officers and between 300 and 400 men standing; all the rest were killed or wounded. The Austrians were pressing hard and successfully against their enemy, when about half-past one o'clock the nature of the engagement was entirely changed by the arrival of the Crown Prince of Prussia with the First Army, and who at once made a harassing attack on the Austrian right. "Suddenly," says another Times correspondent who viewed it from the tower of Königgrätz, "a spattering of musketry breaks out of the trees and houses of Klum right down on the Austrian gunners, and on the columns of infantry drawn up on the slopes below. The gunners fall on all sides, their horses are disabled—the firing increases in intensity—the Prussians press on over the plateau: this is an awful catastrophe; two columns of Austrians are led against the village, but they cannot stand the fire, and after three attempts to carry it retreat leaving the hill-sides covered with the fallen. It is a terrible moment. The Prussians see their advantage; they here enter into the very centre of the position. In vain the staff officers fly to the reserves and hasten to call back some of the artillery from the front. The dark blue regiments multiply on all sides, and from their edges roll perpetually sparkling musketry. Their guns hurry up, and from the slope take both the Austrians on the extreme right and the reserve in flank. They spread away to the woods near the Prague road and fire into the rear of the Austrian gunners. . . . The lines of dark blue which came in sight from the right teemed from the vales below as if the earth yielded them. They filled the whole background of the awful picture of which Klum was the centre. They pressed down on the left of the Prague road. In square, in column, deployed, or wheeling hither and thither—everywhere pouring in showers of shot with deadly precision—penetrating the whole line of the Austrians. Still they could not force their stubborn enemy to fly. On all sides they met brave but unfortunate men ready to die if they could do no more. At the side of the Prague road the fight went on with incredible vehemence. The Austrians had still an immense force of artillery, and although its concentrated fire swept the ground before it, its effect was lost in some degree by reason of the rising ground above, and at last by its divergence to so many points to answer the enemy's cannon. . . . Chesta and Visa were now burning, so that from right to left the flames of ten villages, and the flashes of guns and musketry, contended with the sun that pierced the clouds for the honour of illuminating the seas of steel and the fields of carnage. It was three o'clock. The efforts of the Austrians to occupy Klum and free their centre had failed, their right was driven down in a helpless mass towards Königgrätz, quivering and palpitating as shot and shell tore through it. 'Alles ist verloren!' Artillery still thundered with a force and violence which might have led a stranger to such scenes to think no enemy could withstand it. The Austrian cavalry still hung like white thunder-clouds on the flanks, and threatened the front of the Prussians, keeping them in square and solid columns. But already the trains were steaming away from Königgrätz, placing the Elbe and Adler between them and the enemy."

3.—Garibaldi attacks the Austrians at Monte Suello, but is compelled to retire after receiving a wound in the thigh. He crossed the frontier into the French district on the 14th.

5.—The Moniteur makes public the important announcement that Austria had ceded Venetia to France. At the Bourse a scene of indescribable confusion took place. Entrance into the building became impossible from the multitude of speculators of all classes who thronged its precincts, eager to realize the profits of the expected rise. The advance in prices proved to be beyond all former precedents. Italian Five per Cents, which lately stood at 36, opened at once at 59, and rose during the day to 60½. The shares of the Crédit Mobilier rose nearly 200 fr. In London Italian stock advanced from 40 to 64.

— The marriage of the Princess Helena with Prince Christian solemnized at Windsor Castle.

6.—In the House of Commons new writs were ordered for the seats occupied by members of the new Ministry.

— At a banquet given by the Lord Mayor to the King and Queen of the Belgians, Mr. Disraeli returns thanks for the toast of the new Ministers.

8.—Meeting of the National Rifle Association at Wimbledon.

9.—In the House of Lords Earl Derby explains the circumstances connected with the formation of his new Ministry, and the policy it would support. Without desiring to give it anything of the character of a coalition, he had at first attempted to construct one on an enlarged basis, by including within it some members of the Liberal party who had helped to bring about the present crisis; but he had been unable to accomplish this, and was therefore compelled to construct the Ministry out of his own more immediate supporters. Disputing a report now being widely spread that a Conservative Government was necessarily a warlike Government, he said it would be their earnest endeavour to keep this country on terms of goodwill with all surrounding nations, and not to entangle it with any single monopolizing alliance; neither to interfere vexatiously, nor to volunteer unasked advice. On the subject of Reform, he described himself and his colleagues as entirely unpledged, and they were not likely to introduce any measure without having a fair prospect of carrying it. "Nothing," he said, "would give me greater pleasure than to see a very considerable portion of the class now excluded admitted to the franchise; but on the other hand I am afraid that the portion of the community who are most clamorous for the passing of a Reform Bill are not that portion who would be satisfied with any measure such as could be approved of by the two great political parties in the country. I do not mean to say it is an argument against introducing it, but I greatly fear that any such measure would not put a stop to the agitation which prevails, and would only be made a stepping-stone for further organic changes. As I said before, I reserve to myself the most entire liberty as to whether the present Government should or should not undertake in a future session to bring in a measure for the amendment of the representation of the people." After a short discussion the House adjourned to allow time for the re-election of Ministers.

10.—Collision in the English Channel between the steam sloop-of-war Amazon (Comm. Hunter, R.N.) and the screw steamer Osprey. As the vessels neared each other, about one o'clock A.M., the Amazon put her helm hard a-starboard, and exhibited the green light, while the Osprey put her helm hard a-port, and exhibited the red light. The result was that the Amazon ran into the Osprey on her port quarter, striking her at about one-third of her length from the stern. As it was seen from the first there was no hope of keeping her afloat, a few of the crew and passengers managed to creep along the bowsprit of the Amazon, and the boats of the latter also picked up a number who threw themselves overboard. The whole of the saloon passengers—mostly women and children—went down with the Osprey. An inspection of the Amazon now revealed the appalling fact that it was not likely she could be kept afloat for many minutes, a large hole forward letting in water in such quantities as drowned the fires, and even forced the engineers to abandon the engine-room. Under the orders of Captain Hunter six boats were launched with the greatest order and regularity; the survivors of the Osprey and her own officers and crew filled them, under safe direction, to the water-edge; and the entire company put off as the Amazon was beginning to settle in the sea, though the actual sinking could not be noticed on account of a slight fog. They were at this time eighteen miles off Dartmouth. No provisions, water or property of any kind could be taken with them. The survivors made for the land, and fortunately met with three fishing smacks, who took on board as many as possible to lighten the boats. They all reached Torquay about four P.M. on the 11th. At the inquiry which subsequently took place, the court pronounced an opinion that the Amazon was lost by a grave error of judgment on the part of sub-Lieut. Loveridge, the officer of the watch, in putting the helm to starboard instead of port when first sighting the Osprey. Commander Hunter had his sword returned, and received the praise of the court for his energy, promptness, and humanity.

10.—Manifesto issued by the Emperor of Austria:—"To my people! The heavy misfortunes which have befallen my Army of the North, notwithstanding its most heroic resistance to the enemy, the increased dangers thereby menacing the Fatherland, the calamities of war with which my beloved kingdom of Bohemia is being desolated, and which threaten other parts of my empire, and the painful and irreparable losses sustained by so many thousands of families, have moved to its inmost core my heart, which beats with so warm and fatherly a feeling for the good of my peoples. But the reliance which I expressed in my manifesto of the 17th June—a reliance on your unalterable and faithful devotion and readiness for any self-sacrifice—a reliance on the courage of my army, which even misfortune cannot subdue—a reliance upon God and my good and sacred right—this has not wavered for a single moment. I have addressed myself to the Emperor of the French, requesting his good offices for bringing about an armistice with Italy. Not merely did the Emperor readily respond to my demand, but, with the noble intention of preventing any further bloodshed, he even of his own accord offered to mediate with Prussia for a suspension of hostilities, and for opening negotiations for peace. This offer I have accepted. I am prepared to make peace upon honourable conditions, in order to put an end to the bloodshed and ravages of war. But I will never sanction a treaty of peace by which the fundamental conditions of Austria's position as a great Power would be shaken: sooner than that this should be the case, I am resolved to carry on the war to the utmost extremity; and in this I am sure of my people's approval. All available troops are being concentrated, and the gaps in the ranks of the army are being filled up by the conscription which has been ordered and the large enrolment of volunteers called to arms by the newly-awakened spirit of patriotism. Austria has been severely visited by misfortune, but she is not humiliated or bowed down. My people! have confidence in your Emperor. The people of Austria have never shown themselves greater than in misfortune. I will follow the example of my forefathers, and will lead you on with determination, perseverance, and unshaken confidence in God.—FRANCIS JOSEPH. Given at my residence in the capital of Vienna, this tenth day of July, 1866.”

12.—Volunteer dinner at Wimbledon to the Belgian riflemen.

13.—In the course of a discussion in Committee of Supply, General Peel intimates that it is the intention of Government to furnish the army with breech-loaders.

— The Great Eastern commences paying out the Atlantic telegraph off Valentia, the track taken being about midway between the lines of 1858 and 1865. By noon next day she had gone 136 miles, and lowered 145 knots of cable. In the course of the evening a telegram was received on board from the seat of war in Venetia, announcing that the Austrians had evacuated the whole country between the Mincio and the Alps. On this occasion nothing occurred to mar the steady progress of the expedition.

14.—The Birmingham Banking Company, established in 1829, suspends payment, with liabilities estimated at 2,000,000*l.*

— The German Federals defeated at Aschaffenburg by the Prussians.

16.—The new Cabinet Ministers take their seats in the Commons after re-election. The only one unseated was the Scotch Lord Advocate (Paton) at Bridgewater.

— Sir J. P. Grant appointed Governor of Jamaica in room of Lieutenant Eyre. He was sworn into office at Kingston on the 6th of August.

18.—Mr. Clay withdraws his bill for an educational franchise.

— Queen Emma, of the Hawaiian Islands, attends a meeting of the Hawaiian Mission Fund, held in Willis's Rooms. Her Majesty left England the following week on a visit to America.

19.—Discussion in both Houses on the present condition of affairs on the continent of Europe. In the Commons Lord Stanley delivered his “maiden speech” as Minister for Foreign Affairs, and defended the proceedings of the Government in taking conjoint action with France to secure a cessation of hostilities.

— Referring to the prohibition issued against holding political meetings in Hyde-park, the new Home Secretary (Walpole) stated to-night in the Commons:—“There is nothing in the notice signed by Sir Richard Mayne to imply that processions, orderly conducted, are illegal—there is nothing in that notice to prevent persons from holding meetings in the usual way for the purpose of discussing politics, or any other subject; but I think that any one holding the office which I have the honour to hold is bound to attend to the public peace of this metropolis; and if he believes that the parks, which are open by the permission of her Majesty for the benefit of all her Majesty's subjects, are likely to be devoted to any purpose that would interfere with the quiet recreation of the people, and might lead to riot and disorderly demonstrations, he would be most blameable if he did not issue an order similar to that which I have given.”

20.—In expressing his inability to be present at the Reform Meeting in Hyde-park, Mr. Bright thus writes to the Council of the League regarding the resolution come to by Government to prevent the meeting being held where it was proposed:—“You have asserted your right to meet on Primrose-hill and in Trafalgar-square. I hope after Monday night no one will doubt your right to meet in Hyde-park. If a public meeting in a public park is denied you, and if millions of intelligent and honest men are denied the franchise, on what foundation do our liberties rest, or is there in the country any liberty but the toleration of the ruling class? This is a serious question, but it is necessary to ask it, and some answer must be given to it.”

— Naval engagement off Lissa, in which the Austrian fleet under Admiral Tegethoff defeats the Italian fleet under Admiral Persano. The former consisted of 7 iron-clads, 6 frigates, 1 line-of-battle ship, 9 gunboats, and 3 paddle steamers—in all 26 sail; the latter was more numerous, there being 11 ironclads, a steam-ram, the Affondatore, on board of which the Admiral hoisted his flag, and a line-of-battle ship. The Palestro was blown up with all on board when approaching to assist the Re d'Italia, when hard pressed by the Austrian ironclads. The engagement lasted two hours.

21.—First meeting of the Cobden Club at Richmond. Mr. Gladstone presided, and passed a warm eulogium on the great free-trade statesman. Earl Russell took advantage of the opportunity to defend his home and foreign policy, and censured Ministers for being a party to an arrangement with France regarding Venetia, which could not but be offensive to the Italians.

22.—Armistice for five days agreed upon between Prussia and Austria.

23.—Riot in Hyde Park, arising out of an order by Government prohibiting its use by the Reform League for a great political demonstration. Early in the afternoon a notice signed by Sir Richard Mayne was extensively posted throughout London, stating that the park gates would be closed to the public at five o'clock. The Committee of the Reform League met in the afternoon to conclude their arrangements, and resolved not to abandon what they considered their line of duty. The numerous processions were to march with banners and music to the Marble Arch, where properly appointed persons would demand admittance on their behalf if necessary.

By five o'clock thousands were standing near the chief entrances. The police were at first posted inside the gates; but a few missiles, now a stone and then a stick, being thrown, the men were marched outside. A line of ordinary policemen, in a semicircle, stood before the gates, protected in front by mounted constables. As soon as the banners of the first procession were seen, a cheer was raised, and a space was opened for the leaders to pass along to the gates. Mr. Edmond Beales, Colonel Dickson, Mr. George Brooke, and other prominent members of the Reform League, alighted from the foremost carriage, and, addressing the nearest mounted officer, Mr. Beales requested a quiet admittance to the Park: the officer told him he could not go in, and in answer to Mr. Beales' question, "Why?" he said, "I have authority to prevent you." Mr. Beales asked who gave him the authority, and the reply was, "Our Commissioner." The leaders of the Reform party, thus repulsed, stepped back into their carriages amidst loud cheering, and a little murmuring on the part of those whose curiosity would, perhaps, have been better satisfied had resistance been carried further. As much of the procession as could be organized in the dense mass, variously estimated at from a hundred to two hundred thousand persons, followed the carriages of the Committee towards Oxford-street, along which they proceeded. At length the head of the demonstration reached Trafalgar-square, where the speaking was brief, and confined to the proposing and seconding of two resolutions, urging the prosecution of lawful and constitutional means for the extension of the franchise, and thanking Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, and others, for being faithful to the cause, while others had basely deserted it. While the leaders were marching to Trafalgar-square, however, more exciting work engaged the attention of the crowds who remained in Hyde Park. A large portion finding a forcible entry by the gate prevented, moved westward, and in one bold dash smashed in the railings of the park in sight of the police, and entered the ground cheering and waving handkerchiefs. The railings at Park-lane were broken in about the same time, and in a few minutes several thousands had entered the park. Encounters between the police and mob now became rife, the former using their truncheons freely, and the latter stones and other missiles. Before long several prisoners and wounded persons were removed; and the most serious consequences were apprehended when a detachment of Foot Guards arrived, under the command of Colonel Lane Fox. The Guards were cheered by the mob, and took up a position near the gate, where they remained throughout. A body of the Life Guards soon after arrived, and were cheered in the same manner. They, however, galloped off to some other part of the park. When the police were left to themselves, they were again pelted and attacked by the mob, and one or two of their number unhorsed. After a series of charges against the mob the police were reinforced by a second detachment of Foot Guards, drawn up in front of the gate, and who, with the first detachment, received orders to be in readiness to fire should it become necessary. Encounters between the police and the mob then became less frequent, and finally quiet was restored when another body of Life Guards augmented the soldiery, and combined to help in removing the mob from the park.

25.—In compliance with a wish expressed by the Home Secretary, a deputation from the Reform League, consisting of Mr. Beales, Colonel Dickson, and others, wait upon the right hon. gentleman at the Home Office, with reference to the recent disturbances in Hyde-park. Mr. Beales said it was impossible to overrate the gravity of the present crisis, and, as an essential means of restoring quiet, advised the Government to withdraw the police and military from the park. On their part they would do what they could to soothe the exasperation under which the public were naturally labouring. Mr. Walpole:—"I have to thank you in the first place for coming here, and in the second for the conciliatory tone you have all used in reference to the present unhappy proceedings." The right hon. gentleman paused for a few seconds, evidently much affected. He then went on to say that if he had been previously informed they intended to try their right to the use of the park in a legal way, Government would have given them every facility for doing so. On condition that they would not insist on their presumed right in the meantime, and would assure their friends that Government had only one desire, namely, to meet them in the frankest manner, and further on condition that there was no disturbance and no attack on property, the Home Secretary undertook that there should be no display of military or police in the park. Mr. Beales and his friends thereupon proceeded to the park, and caused intimation to be given that no further attempt would be made to hold a meeting there "except only on next Monday afternoon (July 30) at six o'clock, by arrangement with the Government."

27.—Completion of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable. This evening, at about five o'clock, English time, the cable was completed between Europe and America. Conversation had been carried on throughout the day between the electricians Gooch and Glass, until word was sent to Valencia to cease signalling, as they were about to make the splice with the shore-end at Trinity Bay. This was completely effected on the 28th. Lord Stanley was at once informed "that the most perfect communication had been established between England and America." Messages passed from the Queen to the President, expressing a hope that it would be an additional bond of union between the two nations; and the Earl of Carnarvon caused her Majesty's congratulations to be conveyed to Viscount Monk, at Ottawa, on the successful completion of the undertaking. On the 31st messages passed along the cable and across the American continent to Vancouver's Island.

30.—John Richard Jeffrey murders his son, a child about six years of age, by hanging him with a handkerchief in a cellar in Seven Dials. The murderer gave himself up, though not till evidence had been obtained clearly connecting him with the crime. He was tried for the offence before Mr. Justice Willes, on the 20th of September, found guilty, and sentenced to be executed on the 9th of October.

— With reference to the severe visitation of cholera in the Bethnal-green district, Mr. Glaisher, the meteorologist, records this day :— “On looking from the grounds of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, under the trees towards the boundary walls of the park, I saw the same dense blue mist, which has continued without intermission to the present time, though somewhat less in density this morning. Ordinary mists pass away when the wind blows with a pressure of $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. on the square foot. Since last Monday we have had pressure of the wind varying from $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. to 9 lbs. blowing continually for sixty to seventy hours, yet there has been no change in this blue appearance. I have examined the atmosphere daily for this blueness, particularly during the last twelve months, and have never seen anything like it since 1854. This blue mist is apparent on all sides; it extends fully to the top of the trees, though it is not then so easy to distinguish. It is most easily discernible through as much atmosphere as possible, viewed from under a tree, looking under other trees. Thus seen, the boundary walls of Greenwich Park, and all objects near them, are coloured blue; or through gaps in trees, if there are others at a sufficient distance to form a background, when it resembles thin smoke from a wood fire. The intensity of the blue is increased when viewed through a telescope with a low power. It is of great importance to know whether it is general over the country. The only other tint of mist I know connected with the prevalence of epidemic is that of a yellow mist, perceptible in like manner, when scarlatina is prevalent: in neither case is there any excess of humidity in the air.”

31.—Mr. Chas. Buxton brings the Jamaica disturbances before the House of Commons, and moves a series of resolutions, the effect of which, as he explained, was to condemn what was done after the disturbances were suppressed, and to award compensation to persons who had relations killed or property destroyed. After a debate, one resolution, expressing in general terms regret at the occurrence of the outbreak, was agreed to.

August 1.—Mr. Gladstone's Compulsory (600)

Church Rate Abolition Bill read a second time, the understanding being that it would not be carried further.

2.—The Queen subscribes 500*l.* to the Bishop of London's Fund for relieving the cholera sick and suffering of the East end of London. “The sufferings,” wrote her Majesty, “of a large number of poor persons from cholera in a particular district of London, though fortunately as yet only in a limited one, have most painfully attracted the Queen's attention; and her Majesty consequently learnt with satisfaction the proposal contained in your letter published this morning, to arrange with the Metropolitan Relief and District Visiting Association, of which your Lordship is President, for the proper administration of a special Cholera Fund.” Mrs. Gladstone also originated a scheme to provide a temporary home for children whose parents had died of the epidemic.

— A bill to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland from the 1st September to 1st March passed through Committee by 105 to 31 votes, and passed its final stage in the House of Lords on the 8th.

3.—Came on for hearing in Edinburgh, before the Lord President and a jury, the Esk pollution case, involving important interest to manufacturers and residents along the banks of rivers. The prosecutors were the Duke of Buccleuch, owner of Dalkeith Park, and Viscount Melville, owner of Melville Castle, who proceeded against the owners of eight paper mills on the banks of the North Esk in Mid Lothian. On their behalf numerous witnesses were called to prove that twenty or thirty years ago the stream had been a good trouting river, that the water was fit and was used for domestic purposes, for the watering of cattle, &c., whereas now, owing to the enormous increase of the paper trade, and the consequent increase of pollution, the fish could not live in the river, and the water was not only unavailable for domestic uses, but emitted putrescent odours, and was covered with froth, while in the bed there was a deposit of precipitated organic matter, which, whenever stirred from any cause or when the river was low, gave off offensive effluvia. Medical testimony was adduced to prove the quantity of organic matter emanating from the paper mills, and the effects on the comfort and health of the inhabitants. For the defence it was observed that the paper mills had been in the river since 1709. Professional witnesses of eminence gave evidence that the organic matters from the paper mill discharges were inconsiderable, and that the oxidizing power of the atmosphere and the flow of the river had a rapid effect upon them, so that the water practically recovered itself in the run between one mill and another. It was also sought to be shown that the sewage of a populous locality admitted to the river was much more noxious than the mill discharges. The great interest of the case to the paper manufacturers was also dwelt upon, their mills being the chief source of employment to the villagers. The success of the prosecution in this case, it was said, would extinguish the paper trade on the North Esk, at present supplying several thousand persons. The jury, after three hours' absence, by a majority of nine to three gave a verdict against the mills.

4.—Rev. Professor James Martineau (Unitarian) having been brought forward as a candidate for the vacant chair of Mental Philosophy and Logic in University College, London, the Council this day, by a majority of five to four, agree to a motion proposed by Mr. Grote, that they "consider it inconsistent with the complete religious neutrality proclaimed and adopted by University College to appoint to the chair of the Philosophy of Mind and Logic a candidate eminent as a minister and preacher of any one among the various sects dividing the religious world."

— During the past week 1,053 deaths from cholera were reported in London.

5.—On opening the Berlin Chambers the King returned thanks "for God's gracious goodness, which has assisted Prussia amid heavy but successful sacrifices, not only in averting from our frontiers the danger of hostile attack, but in enabling the army of the country, by a rapid career of victory, to add fresh laurels to its inherited fame, and to smooth the course for the national development of Germany."

8.—In consequence of the large territorial additions made to Prussia in terms of the late treaty with Austria, the Emperor Napoleon makes a demand for a rectification of the frontier of France in accordance with the treaty of 1814. The territory claimed included Sarrelouis and Laudun. Prussia at once refused, and the Emperor withdrew his demand.

— Reform meeting in the Guildhall, presided over by the Lord Mayor (Phillips). With the exception of the heads of the League the chief speakers were working men. The ordinary resolutions were carried concerning residential and registered manhood suffrage and the ballot.

— Lieut. Brand, R.N., of Jamaica Court-martial notoriety, writes to Mr. Chas. Buxton, M.P., who had charged him with recklessly causing the death of upwards of 200 persons:—"You may be a very fine buckra among the polished gentlemen at Exeter Hall who wanted Mr. Eyre suspended with a rope, and the old ladies of Clapham; but when you come with your peculiar little assertions in print, and such barefaced lies too, I think it is time for the trampled worm to turn. If you have a spark of gentlemanly or generous feeling left, you will contradict your letter relative to my court, or I shall expect you to give me satisfaction in a way more suited to my tastes. And you know, Sir, that it is a damned cowardly thing for you to write officers (who did their best, and whose acts were fully approved by their superiors) down, when you well know that they are not allowed to write to a newspaper. However, England and the Admiralty are my judges, not Buxton and Co. P.S.—I have written 'private' on this by advice, as my friends say, 'He was not ashamed to write falsehoods about the beardless boy, so he may sneak into the Admiralty and say he is afraid of him; but you need not be so. We have a new Admiralty, my friend.'" In reply to an offer that the disgrace of publication might be avoided if an apology were offered, Brand wrote by the following mail from Jamaica:—"You may publish this too if you like, also your answer to my first; it will only be telling the world of your own cowardice. Only do not clip them at all. Fair play is my motto, and true blue my colour. Please do not write any more, as I am very nervous, and you frighten me." Having satisfied themselves of the authenticity of the letters, the Admiralty suspended Lieutenant Brand, and caused him to be sent home.

9.—Visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to York. On the 11th 25,000 Volunteers were reviewed in their presence by the Duke of Cambridge, and on the 12th the ceremonial unveiling took place of the Prince Consort memorial window in the Guildhall.

10.—Parliament prorogued by commission. The Royal Speech made reference to the war between Prussia and Austria, Fenian disturbances in Ireland and Canada, recent commercial disasters, the lessening severity of the cattle-plague, and the spread of cholera.

11.—The Emperor Napoleon makes offer of Venetia to Italy. "My purpose has always been to restore it to itself, so that Italy should be free from the Alps to the Adriatic. Mistress of her own destinies, Venetia will soon be able to express her will by universal suffrage. Your Majesty will recognise that in these circumstances the action of France has again been exercised in favour of humanity and the independence of population.

12.—Ex-Governor Eyre arrives at Southampton from Jamaica.

15.—Several persons killed in the crowd at the Emperor's fête in Paris.

16.—After ninety-seven days, the longest interval by far of so high a rate, the Bank Directors, this morning, reduced the minimum rate of interest from 10 to 8 per cent. In 1857 10 per cent. was sustained for forty-two days. Previously the highest rate had been 8 per cent. for twenty-eight days, in 1847.

— A Royal message laid on the table of the Prussian Chamber of Deputies, for the incorporation of Hanover, Electoral Hesse, Nassau, and Frankfort. Bills were immediately introduced, establishing universal suffrage, and providing for a deputy to every 100,000 electors.

— Calcutta letters of this date record that there are sights to be witnessed in that city which would lead the stranger to believe that it was perishing of famine and pestilence. "Since the famine has been allowed to reach such hideous proportions in the rural districts, it is inundating the capital. All who can crowd from the interior afflicted subdivision of Jehawabad, in the rich country of Hooghly, and the misery of what was once the flourishing indigo district of Medda, as well as from the more wretched Midnapore and distant Orissa, flock to the charities of Calcutta. Official reports, giving statistics, show that at twenty-two places 17,475 poor are daily fed, in addition to the sick in the hospitals; and as this number is increasing by about 250 a day, it may be said that 20,000 starvelings are now subsisting on charity daily in Calcutta. The number of pauper bodies buried at one ghaut alone rose from fifty, at which it stood last year, to 329 in the first nine days of this month."

16.—Concluded at Philadelphia the meetings of the great National Convention convened to support President Johnson in his determination to permit Constitutional freedom in the Southern States.

— Bribery Inquiry Commissioners commence their sittings. Great Yarmouth was opened to-day, Reigate on the 22d, Totnes on the 23d, and Lancashire on the 27th.

17.—The King of Italy grants an amnesty to the Aspromonte offenders.

19.—Collision off Aldborough, between the screw steamer Haswell and the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer Bruiser. The latter had on board 128 persons, 99 of whom were taken on board the Haswell. The others went down with the Bruiser, which sunk within fifteen minutes after the collision.

21.—Ex-Governor Eyre entertained at a public banquet at Southampton. Professor Kingsley and Earls Cardigan and Hardwicke made speeches in praise of the energy, humanity, and wise discretion of their guest.

22.—The British Association commences its sittings at Nottingham. The President, Mr. W. R. Grove, Q. C., delivered an inaugural address on "Continuity" which gave rise to considerable criticism and controversy. At this meeting the Association consented to make a new department for the discussion of the various questions arising out of the researches of Anthropologists. In the Geographical section, Sir S. W. Baker and Mr. Palgrave gave an account of the countries visited by them.

— The Tornado, of Glasgow, seized off Madeira by the Spanish frigate Gerona, on pretence that she was destined as a vessel of war for the Chilian service. Her owners, Isaac Campbell and Co., at once communicated with Lord Stanley, stating that the vessel "was British built, carries a British register, is manned by a British crew, and is owned by ourselves, who are British subjects. She was cleared from the port of Leith on the 9th inst. for Rio Janeiro by her Majesty's Custom authorities, and by the Brazilian consul. She is, moreover, totally unarmed, and carries nothing but coals, provisions, and stores necessary for the voyage." Lord Stanley instructed our minister at Madrid to inquire into the circumstances of the seizure, and report without loss of time.

23.—Treaty of peace executed at Prague between Prussia and Austria. The Emperor accedes to the union of Venetia with Italy, recognises the dissolution of the hitherto-existing Germanic Confederation, and consents to a new organization of Germany without the participation of the Austrian empire. By Article 11 the Emperor engages, in order to cover part of the costs incurred by Prussia in the war, to pay the King the sum of forty million Prussian dollars, subject to a deduction to be made for the war costs in Schleswig, and the free provisioning of the Prussian army until the conclusion of peace.

— Writing in reply to many communications addressed to him as the presumed chairman of the Eyre Defence Fund, Mr. T. Carlyle writes:—"For my own share, all the light that has yet reached me on Mr. Eyre and his history in the world goes steadily to establish the conclusion that he is a just, humane, and valiant man, faithful to his trusts everywhere, and with no ordinary faculty of executing them; that his late services in Jamaica were of great, perhaps of incalculable value, as certainly they were of perilous and appalling difficulty—something like the case of 'fire' suddenly reported in the ship's powder-room in mid-ocean, where the moments mean the ages, and life and death hang on your use or misuse of the moments; and, in short, that penalty and clamour are not the things the Governor merits from any of us, but honour and thanks, and wise imitation, should similar emergencies arise, on the great scale or on the small, in whatever we are governing. The English nation have never loved anarchy, nor was wont to spend its sympathy on miserable mad seditions, especially of this inhuman and half-brutish type, but always loved order, and the prompt suppression of seditions, and reserved its tears for something worthier than the promoters of such delirious and fatal enterprises who had got their wages for their sad industry. Has the English nation changed, then, altogether? I flatter myself it has not—not yet quite; but only that certain loose superficial portions of it have become a great deal louder, and not any wiser, than they formerly used to be. At any rate, though much averse at any time, and at this time in particular, to figure on committees, or run into public noises without call, I do at once feel that as a British citizen I should and must make you welcome to my name for your Committee, and to whatever good it can do you; with the hope only that many other British men, of far more significance in such a matter, will at once or gradually do the like; and that, in fine, by wise effort and persistence, a blind and disgraceful act of public injustice may be prevented, and an egregious folly as well—not to say, for none can say or compute what a vital detriment throughout the British empire, in such an example set to all the colonies and governors, the British empire has.”

23.—The new Lord Lieutenant (the Marquis of Abercorn) makes a triumphal entry into Dublin.

24.—Treaty signed between Austria and France respecting the cession of Venetia.

26.—Holland and Hareland's saw mills and workshops, Bloomsbury, destroyed by fire.

27.—Reform demonstration at Birmingham, the number attending being estimated by newspapers favourable to the movement at 250,000. An immense procession left the city for Brook Fields, where various platforms were erected to accommodate the speakers who addressed the crowds. The rain fell heavily during the greater part of the proceedings, but the Reformers determined in carrying out their original programme, and kept the gathering together till the afternoon. The principal resolution carried was to the following effect:—“That the present House of Commons has, by its rejection of the very moderate measure of Parliamentary Reform proposed by the late Government, proved itself utterly unworthy of our confidence and support, and that it in no sense represents the wishes of the Commons of Great Britain. We, therefore, hereby pledge ourselves to demand, to agitate for, and use all lawful means to obtain registered residential manhood suffrage, as the only just basis of representation, and the ballot to protect us from undue influence and intimidation at elections.” A meeting for a similar purpose was held in the Town-hall in the evening, and was addressed by Mr. Bright, Mr. Scholefield, and Mr. Beales—the last of whom made publication of the fact that, for the part he had taken in this agitation, he had been removed from the office of Revising Barrister for Middlesex. Mr. Bright was especially severe on Mr. Lowe, whom he accused of maligning the working classes in his speech of 13th March last, and urged his hearers to press on in their agitation for restoring the British Constitution with all its freedom to the British people.

28.—The Turks gain a victory over the Cretans at Aghios Myron.

29.—First meeting of a committee formed to establish an Eyre Defence Fund, Mr. T. Carlyle in the chair. The following evening a meeting composed chiefly of working men was held at Clerkenwell-green, at which the ex-Governor was denounced as a monster and murderer, and burnt in effigy.

31.—After a stormy meeting of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway in St. James's Hall, it was agreed to appoint a committee to investigate the affairs of the company.

September 1.—The new Cannon-street terminus of the South Eastern Railway opened for passenger traffic. There was some confusion and delay incident to the despatch of an extraordinary number of trains for the first day, but no serious casualty occurred.

1.—Thomas Grimes executed in Liverpool for the murder of James Barton at the Bokerburn Colliery, near Wigan, in January 1863. The unfortunate victim in this case, after being robbed, was thrown into the furnace, whether before or after death was never clearly established, and nothing could be found belonging to him except a few buttons among the ashes. The circumstances of the crime were now brought to light by a confederate who turned upon Grimes and put the police on the track of the murdered man's watch, found in the canal. Grimes himself was at the time undergoing penal servitude for another offence, but his friends readily admitted that they had seen the watch produced in his possession immediately after the murder. He made various criminatory statements after his conviction, but died this morning affirming his innocence.

2.—As Eliza Hawkins, one of the sect of Plymouth Brethren, was preaching to a crowd in the immediate neighbourhood of the ruins of the late fire at Ottery St. Mary's, Devon, a tottering chimney fell, killing six, and more or less injuring twelve.

—The Great Eastern succeeds in raising the Atlantic cable of 1865. “Precisely at 12.50 this (Sunday) morning” (writes the Secretary) “the cable made its appearance upon the grapnel, and, save when the voices of Captain Anderson and Mr. Canning were heard giving an order, one could almost hear a pin drop, such was the perfect silence which prevailed. No excitement, no cheering, as there was on the Sunday when we lifted it before. All was calm and quiet, the men scarcely spoke above their breath. The cable hands having had the bow-lines slipped over them, the men were lowered down over the bows, and placed huge hamper stoppers on the cable, which was speedily attached to 5-inch ropes, one being placed to protect the eastward side of the bight, and the other the westward. This took the best part of three-quarters of an hour. It was then found that the bight was so firmly caught in the springs of the grapnel, that one of the brave hands who put on the stoppers was sent lower down to the grapnel, and, with hammer and marlinspike and other implements, the rope was ultimately freed from the tenacious gripe of the flukes. The signal being given to haul up, the western end of the bight was cut with a saw, and grandly and majestically the cable rose up to the frowning brows of the Great Eastern, slowly passing round the sheave of the east, and then over the wheels on the forepart of the deck. Even then there was no excitement, but now men were seen to cross the platform and to touch the rope in order to feel satisfied that success had been achieved. The greatest possible care had to be taken by Mr. Canning and his assistants to secure the cable by putting stoppers on between the V wheel and the pick-up machinery, and to watch the progress of the grapnel rope and shackles round the drum, before it received the cable itself. This occupied a considerable time, and now it became evident that ere long the end would be passed down as far aft as the electrician's room. There awaiting its arrival were Mr. Gooch, M.P., Mr. Cyrus Field, Captain Hamilton, Mr. Canning, Mr. Clifford, Professor Thompson, Mr. Deane, and others. At last, Mr. Willoughby Smith, the chief electrician, made his appearance at the door with the end of the cable in his hand, and the connexions having been made he sat down opposite the instrument. A breathless silence prevailed. Not a word was spoken, all eyes being directed upon the experienced operator, whose expression of countenance indicated the deep anxiety he felt in making the test. At the expiration of some ten minutes he relieved our suspense by stating that, as far as he had then gone, he believed the tests to be perfect; but another minute had scarcely elapsed when he took off his hat and gave a cheer, which, as can be easily understood, was lustily taken up in the room, and having been heard outside, was echoed from stem to stern of the ship." A successful splice having been effected with the cable on board, the paying-out process was recommenced and continued without mishap or interruption till the 8th, when the great ship entered Trinity Bay, and a perfect connexion was formed with the American continent.

2.—M. Drouyn d'Lhuys resigns the portfolio of Foreign Affairs to the French Government, and is succeeded by the Marquis de Moustier.

3.—The amount received at the Mansion House up to this evening for the relief of the sufferers from cholera was 17,000*l.* Of this sum 7,000 had been dispensed in grants to local committees, and 5,000*l.* set apart for the maintenance of children made orphans.

—The Welsh hold a national Eisteddfod at Chester, where competitive performances take place on the harp, and in the recitation of Welsh songs. Apologizing for not being present, Mr. Matthew Arnold wrote to the Chairman of the Social Science Section, that the cultivation of Celticism was an antidote to the English vice of Philistinism. "A representation," he wrote, "to the University of Oxford from the Eisteddfod urging the importance of establishing a chair of Celtic at Oxford could not, I think, but have weight with the University. . . . We in England have come to that point, when the continued advance and greatness of our nation is threatened by one cause, and one cause above all—far more than by the helplessness of an aristocracy whose day is fast coming to an end—far more than by the rawness of a lower class whose day is just only beginning—we are imperilled by what I call the Philistinism of our middle classes. On the side of beauty and taste, vulga-ry; on the side of morals and feelings, coarseness; on the side of mind and spirit, unintelligence—"this is Philistinism."

6.—Died, at Stratton, Hants, aged 70, Lord Northbrooke, formerly Sir Francis Baring, and Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Ministry of Lord Melbourne.

—Close of the great annual ocean race from Foo-chow-foo to London. The Serica, Ariel, and Taeeping passed Foo-chow-foo bar, for London, on the 30th of May. The Fiery Cross sailed from the same place on the previous day, and the Taitaing left on the 31st. The next heard of them was from Anger, Straits of Sunda, as follows:—Fiery Cross passed through on the 19th of June; the Ariel, Serica, Taeeping, and Taitaing on the 23d June, all within a few hours of each other—running the distance from Foo-chow-foo, about 2,780 miles, in twenty-three days. Yesterday, Lloyd's agent telegraphed the arrival of three of the ships in the Downs. The Ariel and Taeeping, arrived at 8 A.M., and the Serica passed Deal at 1 P.M. They had all steam-tugs in attendance, and were pushing on for the river with all expedition. The distance, 14,060 miles, was run in 99 days; and it appeared that the Ariel and Taeeping ran almost neck and neck the whole passage, the Serica following close in their wake. The Ariel and Taeeping, which had lost sight of each other for 70 days, found themselves yesterday morning, at eight o'clock, off the Lizard, running neck and neck up the Channel, under every stitch of canvas that could be set, with a strong westerly wind. During the whole day the two ships kept their position, dashing up Channel side by side in splendid style, sometimes almost on their beam ends, every sea sweeping their decks. On approaching the pilot station off Dungeness the next morning, they each fired blue lights to signalize their position. At daybreak the pilots boarded them at the same moment, and the race was continued in the most exciting style till they arrived in the Downs, where they took steam-tugs to tow them up the river. The Taeeping, however, was fortunate enough to have a superiority in the power of the steam-tugs, and reached Gravesend some time before the Ariel. The Serica followed closely upon them. She passed Deal at noon, and got into the river with the same tide which carried the Taeeping and Ariel up the river to the docks, when the result of this extraordinary race was declared to be as follows:—Taeeping, docked in London Docks 9.45 P.M.—1; Ariel, docked in East India Docks 10.15 P.M.—2; Serica, docked in West India Docks 11.30 P.M.—3. The Taeeping, therefore, was winner of the premium, about 5,000*l.*, to be paid to the first sailing vessel in dock with new teas from Foo-chow-foo.

7.—In reply to an address from the inhabitants of Salisbury Mr. Gladstone delivered a political speech defending the proceedings of the Government with reference to the introduction and management of the late Reform Bill, and promising that a fair consideration would be given to any well-digested scheme brought forward by their successors—provided it was introduced promptly and showed a spirit of moderation and justice.

13.—A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, commenting upon the neglected state of the monuments of our Plantagenet kings in the ruined abbey of Fontevrault, suggests that it would be a graceful act for the Emperor of the French to present them to this country. "The graves have been long ago plundered, but there are still preserved hidden in a dark corner of the convent chapel, begrimed with the dust and dirt of ages, the effigies in marble which once adorned the tombs of Henry II. and Eleanor of Guienne, of Richard Cœur de Lion, and—most beautiful and best preserved of all—Isabelle d'Angoulême, the wife of John."

14.—Letters from Orissa mention that as many as eighty corpses of starved natives are found lying in the streets in the morning. In the Cuttack district 3,000 deaths from famine and pestilence were reported in one week.

16.—An Imperial manifesto, signed by M. Lavalette on behalf of the Emperor Napoleon, explains to the French diplomatic agents in foreign parts the language they are to hold in their communications regarding recent events on the Continent. The document was on the whole of a peaceable character:—"From the elevated point of view from which the Imperial Government regards the destinies of Europe, the horizon appears to be cleared of all menacing eventualities; formidable problems which ought to have been resolved because they could not be evaded pressed upon the destinies of the people: they might have been imposed at a more inopportune period; they have received their natural solution without too violent shocks, and without the dangerous co-operation of revolutionary passions. A peace which reposes upon such basis will be a durable peace. As to France, in whatever direction she looks, she can perceive nothing which can impede her progress or interrupt her prosperity. Preserving friendly relations with all Powers, directed by a policy which has generosity and moderation for its strength, relying upon her imposing unity; with all her extended genius, her treasures, and her credit, which fertilize Europe; with her developed military forces, surrounded henceforth by independent nations; she will appear not less great, she will remain not less respected."

18.—Captain Jervis dismissed from her Majesty's service for having (according to the principal charge), at Simla, on the 22d May, "neglected to obey the order of his Excellency the Commander-in-chief communicated to him by the military secretary, to attend a committee of audit which had been assembled by orders of his Excellency for the purpose of testing the accounts kept by Captain Jervis on behalf of the Commander-in-chief, the said committee having been ordered for the purpose of affording Captain Jervis an opportunity of relieving himself from the imputations on his character as an officer and a gentleman."

Mr. Bright spoke in the evening, again attacking Mr. Lowe and describing Lord Derby as no leader of his party in a high sense. "He is not its educator, he is not its guide; but he is its leader in all foolish contests in which, in its ignorance and all its selfishness, it involves itself with the people."

28.—Meeting at the Mansion House to organize measures to relieve the famishing natives of Orissa.

October 1.—The layers of the Atlantic cable entertained at Liverpool at a banquet presided over by Sir Stafford Northcote, President of the Board of Trade. 8.—A demonstration in favour of Reform is made by the West Riding of Yorkshire at Woodhouse-moor, Leeds. Mr. Bright was present, with Mr. Beales and Mr. Ernest Jones.

9.—Church Congress assembles at York, presided over by the Archbishop of York.

— The Empress of Mexico reported to have become insane since her arrival in Europe on a mission relating to the disturbed condition of her husband's empire. Her unfortunate condition was first manifested in an interview with the Pope, at which she declared there had been a conspiracy set on foot to destroy her by poison.

— The evacuation of the Quadrilateral commenced by Austria.

10.—Peschiera handed over by the French Commissioner to the Italian municipality. Next day, General Menebrea, the Italian negotiator at Vienna, handed over to the Austrian Government 87½ million liras, being the amount of the Italian indemnity, and received from Count Mensdorff the iron crown of Lombardy.

— Addressing his constituents at Elgin, Mr. Grant Duff, M.P., spoke of the complaints made against Mr. Gladstone as leader of the Liberal party:—"I watched him closely, and I really cannot say that I think this reproach is well-founded. Far from it. I think, considering the well-known peculiarities of Mr. Gladstone's disposition, he put a very remarkable restraint upon himself, and met a singularly malignant Opposition in a very good spirit. I am speaking, of course, strictly of his conduct as leader of the House; for I have no means of knowing how far he is or is not responsible for the general errors in the management of the party to which I have already alluded. The only mistake in tactics which was obviously entirely his own was that truly astounding speech which he made on the Oxford Tests Bill, a speech which put the Liberal party in the absurd position of gaining its one great victory in this unhappy session at once over its enemies and its commander-in-chief. I had, perhaps, more reason than any one to feel annoyance at his gratuitous onslaught upon his best friends; but after the first vexation was over, I soon forgot it in reflecting on the amusing glimpse which it affords into the state of mind of this highly-gifted man. Just at this stage of his career, the neophyte leader of the Liberals, he is, indeed, a most curious study. His intellect disapproves the dogged Toryism of Mr. Hardy; he is revolted by the sceptical, half-ironical Toryism of Mr. Disraeli; but what he hates most, hates with that concentrated malignity which a great living poet has described in his soliloquy in a Spanish cloister, is that thorough-going Liberalism which extends to every department of thought, and in which every part fits into every other. And why does he hate it? Because he has a suspicion—a suspicion which he has hardly yet begun to whisper to himself—that the line on which he has been moving, when produced, leads to that end. He has a horrible foreboding that—to use his own words—time is on the side of those very politicians who, when he started in public life, were at the opposite pole of the political sphere, against whom all the strength of his youth and of his manhood was directed. Read his early speeches, study his early books; he has travelled far since then, and may well murmur from time to time at that destiny which may lead him, before he dies, like the Sicambrian of old, to burn what he adored, and to adore what he burnt."

12.—Another stormy meeting of the Chatham and Dover Railway Company in St. James' Hall. The nature of the report presented was such as to preclude the Times from offering any suggestions as to the best mode of extricating the Company from its difficulties, on account of the utter impossibility of arriving at any positive conclusions from the chaotic mass of transactions which constituted the entire history of the undertaking. Sir Morton Peto was accused of receiving 303,900*l.* to retire debentures, and applying 128,000*l.* of the sum for other purposes. In explanation, he said that a financial company held an enormous amount of the securities of his firm, and they lodged with them debentures more than equal to all they owed them; he therefore thought that, as no loss could accrue to the railway or to the financial company, he was justified in using the money as he did. Several of the directors admitted the irregularities which prevailed in the management, and advised the shareholders to place business men at the head of their affairs.

15.—Attempt made by agents of the Saw-grinders' Union in Sheffield to kill or maim one Fearnough, who had withdrawn from their society. His house was blown up with gunpowder, but the inmates escaped with trifling injuries. The masters offered 1,000*l.* reward, and the Government 100*l.*, for such information as would lead to a discovery of the perpetrators.

— The Great Yarmouth Election Commission close their sittings in the borough by examining the Mayor as to what he knew of the practices at former elections.

16.—Reform demonstration in Glasgow. The Times estimated the number present at 150,000. Addressing a meeting in the evening Mr. Bright spoke of the House of Commons as utterly unworthy of the confidence of the people. "If the clerk of the House," he said, "were placed at Temple Bar, and had orders to lay his hand upon the shoulder of every well-dressed and apparently clean-washed man who passed through the ancient bar until he had numbered 658, and if the Crown summoned those 658 to be the Parliament for the United Kingdom, my honest conviction is that you would have a better Parliament than now exists."

— The Queen opens the Aberdeen Waterworks, designed to supply 6,000,000 gallons of pure water from the Dee. Her Majesty, on this occasion, addressed the assembly personally for the first time since the death of the Prince Consort.

— New constitution promulgated for the government of Jamaica.

17.—In the course of a journey in Scotland the Archbishop of Canterbury lays the foundation-stone of an ecclesiastical building at Inverness, to be called the Cathedral of Moray. The Primate was entertained at a public banquet in the afternoon, when he took occasion to say, "I rejoice to be able to give testimony to my anxious desire to seal the union and communion between the Episcopal Church in Scotland and the Church of England. The Episcopal Church is the only true representative of the Church of England in Scotland." The Times, in a leading article, censured the Archbishop's taking part in the ceremony as a gratuitous interference in the ecclesiastical affairs of a sister kingdom, where the established form of worship was so far different from his own as to make him a Dissenter.

18.—Some unpleasantness having arisen in the Church Conference on the 11th through the misapprehension of a phrase used by Dr. A. J. Stephens in the debates on the Teignmouth case, he writes to say:—"I deny that I ever designated or intended to designate the mixed chalice of water and wine as either

'negus' or 'grog.' A discussion arose before the Commissioners at Exeter as to the meaning of the word 'wine.' Dr. Deane contended, on behalf of the respondent, that 'wine' and 'wine and water' meant the same thing; and if he could have established that proposition, it is clear the mixed chalice could be legally used in the United Church. I replied, If water be mixed either with wine or spirit, the character of the liquid is changed as well as its name, the one being called 'negus' and the other 'grog.'"

19.—Venice was handed over to the municipal authorities this morning at eight o'clock. At the same moment General Alemann left for Trieste amid marks of respect from the crowd. The Italian flag was hoisted on the tower of St. Mark and saluted with a salvo of 101 guns. General di Revel, the municipal authorities, and the National Guard proceeded to the railway station to meet the Italian troops, who were received with great enthusiasm. The city was decorated with flags, and a general illumination took place in the evening.

20.—King Leopold gives a banquet at Brussels to the English Volunteers who crossed the Channel to compete with their Belgian brethren.

21.—Another riot at Northmoor Green, Bridgewater, arising out of the ritualistic practices of the rector, Mr. Hewitt. On this occasion a procession of disreputable characters paraded the streets with paper decorations, and otherwise commenced disturbances which threatened for a time the destruction of both life and property.

— Risk Allah Bey tried at Brussels on a charge of murdering Charles Ready. In December 1857 Risk Allah, formerly a colonel in the Turkish army, and also a licentiate of the London College of Surgeons, married Mrs. Lewis, a widow with a child by a former husband, the above Charles Ready. The mother of the young man died in 1860, leaving to Risk Allah her fortune of 25,000*l.*, of which 5,000*l.* was to revert to Charles Ready on attaining his majority. In the event of Ready's premature death, the 5,000*l.* would of course become the property of Risk Allah, who had further insured Ready's life for 1,000*l.* In March 1865 Risk Allah and his step-son were staying at the Hotel du Rhin, Antwerp, where Ready became somewhat unwell, and had need of much attendance. Besides themselves, there was in the hotel only a sea captain and his wife, who left on the 30th. At three o'clock on that morning Ready rang his bell, and the porter having answered the summons, was asked to fetch Risk Allah. They together found Ready reclining against the bed, and having induced him to lie down, they left. The chambermaid of the hotel, Philoméne Brouwers, on coming down stairs at seven o'clock, peeped through the keyhole, and, as she states, distinctly saw Ready lying asleep, breathing peacefully. The sea captain and his wife had by this time left the hotel :

there were, consequently, in the house no strangers except Charles Ready and his stepfather. About half-past seven Risk Allah descended, took breakfast, and walked about in front of the hotel till nine o'clock. Then he went up stairs, knocked at Ready's door, received no answer, and thereupon called up one or two of the servants. The outer door being locked, they entered by a door communicating with another room; and here Philomène said that an article of furniture which was generally placed against this door at night had been removed. Ready was found bathed in blood, a large wound being apparent on the left side of the neck. A gun which Risk Allah had at one time carried into the room was found discharged; and he, lifting it, was said to have apostrophized it in these words: "Wicked gun, it is you who are the cause of this!" He also picked up a bit of paper which had been lying on the table, and showed the words written on it, "I have done it!" to the people with this remark, "See, the poor fellow says that he has done it himself." Risk Allah then approached the body, and, according to the testimony of the people present, pulled out one of the arms of the young man from beneath the coverlet in order to see whether he was yet cold. It was shown that Ready's arms were both underneath the coverlet, and contended that the muzzle of the gun, to have produced such a wound, must have been some little distance from the young man's neck. The circumstances looking suspicious, Risk Allah was arrested; but the court liberated him the same day, holding that Ready had committed suicide. A singular train of circumstances led to the revival of the case. Last February two forged letters of exchange, drawn on the National Bank in favour of "Charles Ready," were presented for payment at a bank in Brussels. Risk Allah had, on January 30, dropped a blank cheque-book in Paris, and the forged cheques were found to be part of this book. Detectives were set to work, and speedily discovered that a suspicious intimacy had existed between Risk Allah and a man named Osman, who had been convicted of villainy in various parts of the world. It seemed to them that the two men had entered into a partnership in fraud, and as the business of inquiry progressed, serious doubts began to be raised about the Antwerp affair, especially when it became known how much Risk Allah had profited by young Ready's death. Finally, for Belgian law admits of an acquitted person being recalled for further examination, Risk Allah was put upon his trial. It extended over six days, in the course of which numerous witnesses were examined as to the relations existing between the prisoner and Ready, and touching the possibility of the latter committing suicide in the position in which he was found in bed. The President of the Court submitted no less than sixty distinct questions to the jury, on which they were required to give separate findings. All of these questions, with the exception of the last two, referred to the two cheques negotiated by Osman in Brussels. On each of the sixty issues submitted to the jury at the close of the trial, it was necessary for the foreman to take the votes of his fellow-jurors by ballot. On returning into court, the foreman read out the findings of the jury to the several questions, and declared the result to be the acquittal of the accused.

23.—At the usual Christchurch annual dinner, Lord Malmesbury, who presided, denied the statement recently made by Mr. Bright to the effect that, if a Reform Bill were passed by the Commons, it would be sure to be rejected by the Lords. There was nothing, he said, in the past history of the House of Peers to justify such an assumption, and he believed that the members of that Assembly would always be ready to accept the clear and deliberate judgment of the country whenever it should be manifested through the votes of their representatives in the other House of Parliament.

25.—The Rev. F. D. Maurice, of Vere-street Chapel, elected Professor of Casuistry, Moral Philosophy, and Moral Theology, at Cambridge.

29.—The voting in Venetia for or against incorporation with Italy resulted in 641,758 in favour, and 69 against.

—Explosion of fire-damp in Pelton Fell Colliery, near Newcastle, causing the death of twenty-four men and boys employed in the Busty or ninety-four fathom seam. Three at the bottom of the shaft were saved, but much injured. One of them stated that he was sitting talking to another of the survivors, when, without the slightest warning, the explosion came upon them. It was a black flame. He had been sitting with his back against a brick wall, but the force of the explosion lifted him off his seat, turned him round, and dashed him against the side of the pit. The flame then flew past him, and it was hardly gone before he was buried beneath a shower of stones. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that there was no evidence to show what was the cause of the explosion, but they were of opinion that negligence had been manifested by the officials down the pit in not enforcing the rules, and also on the part of the men in not carrying them out.

30.—The new buildings of the Cambridge Union Society formally opened, Earl Powis, High Steward of the University, presiding. Lord Houghton delivered an inaugural address, in which he said:—"This is not my Cambridge Union. My Cambridge Union was a low, ill-ventilated, ill-lit apartment at the back of the Red Lion Inn, cavernous, tavernous—something between a commercial-room and a district branch meeting-house. How can I compare it with this superb building—these commodious apartments—these perhaps over-luxurious accompaniments of architecture, which you will have to enjoy? But I remember that these old and humble walls, at the time I first stood within them, had recently echoed voices which England would not willingly let die. . . . It was in company with Mr. Sunderland and Mr. Arthur Hallam that I formed part of a deputation sent from the Union of Cambridge to the Union of Oxford. And what do you think we went about? Why, we went to assert the claims of Mr. Shelley to be regarded as a greater poet than Lord Byron. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, at that time we were all very full of Mr. Shelley. We had printed his 'Adonais' for the first time in England, and a friend of ours suggested that, as he had been expelled from Oxford, and very badly treated in that University, it would be a grand thing for us to defend him there. So, with the full permission of the authorities here, we went to Oxford—at that time a long, dreary post-chaise journey of ten hours—and we were hospitably entertained by a young student of the name of Gladstone; who, by the by, has himself been since expelled. (Laughter and renewed cheering.) We had a very interesting debate, one of the principal speakers at which reminded me of the circumstance the other day—he at present enjoying a somewhat different position—namely, that of Archbishop in the Roman Catholic Church. We were very much shocked, and our vanity not a little wounded, to find that nobody at Oxford knew anything about Mr. Shelley." At the close of the inaugural proceedings, a debate was engaged in, the question being, "That this house views with regret the late substitution of a Conservative Government for a Liberal one."

30.—At a banquet given to Mr. Bright by the Dublin Liberals in the Rotunda, the member for Birmingham delivered a long address on the evils of Ireland, which he traced mainly to the Established Church, and the dispossession of the soil by the Irish people. "You will recollect," he said, "that the ancient Hebrew in his captivity had his window open towards Jerusalem when he prayed, you know that the follower of Mohammed, when he prays, turns his face towards Mecca: and the Irish peasant, when he asks for food and freedom and blessings, his eye follows the setting sun; the aspiration of his heart reaches beyond the wide Atlantic, and in spirit he grasps hands with the great Republic of the West. If that be so, I say then that the disease is not only serious, but that it is even desperate."

November 3.—Some controversy having been raised by Lord Houghton's reference to the Shelley debate at Oxford, Archbishop Manning now writes:—"It was, I think, a passage of arms got up by the Eton men of the two Unions. My share, if any, was only as a member of the august committee of the green-baize table. I can, however, well remember the irruption of the three Cambridge orators. We Oxford men were precise, orderly, and morbidly afraid of excess (609) in word or manner. The Cambridge oratory came in like a flood into a mill-pond. Both Monckton Milnes and Hallam took us aback by the boldness and freedom of their manner. But I remember the effect of Sunderland's declamation to this day. It had never been seen or heard before among us; we cowered like birds and ran like sheep. I was the other day reminding the Secretary of the India Board of the damage he did me. He was my private tutor, and was terrifically sitting right opposite to me. I had just rounded a period when I saw him make, as I believed in my agony, a sign of contempt, which all but brought me down. I acknowledge that we were utterly routed. Lord Houghton's beautiful reviving of those old days has in it something fragrant and sweet, and brings back old faces and old friendships very dear as life is drawing to its close."

5.—The Czar formally recognises the Hospodar as Prince of the Danubian Principalities.

—Berwick, mariner, Webb, mariner, and Dean, commission agent, examined at the Mansion House on the charge of scuttling the ship Severn while on her voyage from Newport to Shanghai, with intent to defraud the underwriters. (See February 1, 1867.)

—Fire at Hampstead-road, resulting in the death of three children, chiefly through the negligence, as found by the coroner's jury, of two police-constables on duty at the time.

6.—The Master of the Rolls delivers judgment in the case of Colenso v. Gladstone and others, which had excited considerable interest in ecclesiastical circles, from its bearing on the status of the Colonial Episcopate. Dr. Colenso filed a bill against Mr. Gladstone, M.P., Vice-Chancellor Wood, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and others, Trustees of the Colonial Bishops' Fund, calling upon them to set aside a sum of 10,000*l.* out of the fund, for the purpose of securing the income of the Bishop of Natal, and calling upon them also to pay him his salary of 362*l.*, which they had withheld since 1864 on account of a deprivation from his office by Bishop Gray, Metropolitan of South Africa, which the judgment of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council had since declared to be illegal. The defendants contended that according to that judgment Dr. Colenso had never been a Bishop at all within the meaning of the original founders of the Colonial Bishops' Fund, who intended that the Bishop of Natal should be subject to the Metropolitan. The Trustees, therefore, did not feel themselves justified in paying over their funds to a Bishop of that class. Lord Romilly now pronounced an elaborate judgment, in which he entered at length into the duties and functions of a Bishop, the extent to which the letters patent of the Crown had failed in enabling the plaintiff to perform these duties, the objects for which the funds in the hands of the defendants were contributed, and the contract which they had entered into with the Crown on the one hand and the plaintiff on the other. Verdict for the plaintiff, with costs.

7.—The Times announces that it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to withdraw their diplomatic representative from the Court of Saxony, and to break up the establishment of the British Legation at Dresden.

— The King of Italy makes a triumphal entry into Venice.

9.—Came on for hearing, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the case of Murray v. Burgess, involving important points in connexion with the Church in the Colonies. Murray was Moderator of the Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church at the Cape, and the respondent was the clergyman of that persuasion in the colony of Hanover. The Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa suspended the respondent for denying the existence of the devil and the sinfulness of Christ's human nature. He brought an action in the Supreme Court of the colony, and that court decided last year that the sentence of the Synodical Commission was null and void. Hence the present appeal, alleging that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction in a sentence passed for a spiritual offence; and that the decision of the Supreme Court was contrary to law and erroneous. The respondent, on the other hand, alleged that the words attributed to him were not proved; and, further, that the Synod which suspended him was not legally constituted.

— Great rejoicings at St. Petersburg on the occasion of the marriage of the Czarewitch with the Princess Dagmar of Denmark.

10.—Dr. Livingstone writes from the "country of the Chepets:"—"It has been quite impossible to send a letter coastwise ever since we left the Rovuma. The Arab slave-traders take to their heels as soon as they hear the English are on the road. I am a perfect bugbear to them. Eight parties thus skeddaddled; and last of all my Johanna men, frightened out of their wits by stories told them by a member of a ninth party who had been plundered of his slaves, walked off and left me to face the terrible Mazitu with nine Nassick boys. The fear which the English name has struck into the souls of the slave-traders has thus been an inconvenience. I could not go round the north end of the lake for fear that my Johanna men, at sight of danger, would do there what they actually did at the southern end; and the owners of two dhows now on the lake kept them out of sight, lest I should burn them as slavers, and I could not cross in the middle. Rounding the southern end, we got up Kirk's Range, and among Manganja not yet made slave-sellers. This was a great treat, for, like all who have not been contaminated by that blight, they were very kind; and, having been worried enough by unwilling Sepoys and cowardly Johanna men, I followed my bent by easy marches among friendly generous people, to whom I tried to impart some new ideas in return for their hospitality. The country is elevated, and the climate cool." Additions were made to the above in January, when the traveller was among the Bibisa, and in February, when he was in Bemba; but this intelligence of safety under his own hand did not reach England till April 1868.

10.—Wreck of the screw-steamer Ceres at Carnsore Point, near Wexford. She went ashore in a gale, about 6 P.M., and out of forty-two passengers twenty-nine were lost, with nine of the crew. The Board of Trade censured the master, Captain Pascoe, for not using the lead, and suspended his certificate for two years.

11.—The Royal mail steamship Atrato placed in quarantine, having arrived in Southampton Water with many cases of yellow fever.

12.—C. F. Brown, or "Artemus Ward," opens his entertainment in the Egyptian Hall.

14.—Meteor shower of great splendour and duration. "From midnight to 1 o'clock," writes Mr. Hind, from the Observatory at Twickenham, "1,120 meteors were noted, the numbers gradually increasing. From 1 A.M. to 1 h. 7 m. 5 s. no less than 514 were counted, and we were conscious of having missed very many, owing to the rapidity of their succession. At the latter moment there was a rather sudden increase to an extent which rendered it impossible to count the number, but after 1.20 a decline became perceptible. The maximum was judged to have taken place about 1.10; and at this time the appearance of the whole heavens was very beautiful, not to say magnificent. Beyond their immense number, however, the meteors were not particularly remarkable, either as regards brilliancy or the persistence of their trains, few of which were visible more than three seconds. M. du Chailu said that in these respects the meteors fell far short of those of the April period, which he had witnessed under a fine sky in equatorial Africa. From 1.52 to 2, 93,000 were registered; from 3.9 to 3.24, 100; from 4.42 to 5, the number seen was 12, and these mostly faint; and from 5.45 to 6, only five were counted. No person acquainted with the constellations, who carefully watched the display, could have any doubt as to the accuracy of the astronomical theory relative to these bodies. The radiant in Leo was most strikingly manifested: while the meteors in the opposite quarter of the sky traversed acres of many degrees, in the vicinity of the diverging point they shone out for a few seconds without appreciable motion, and might have been momentarily mistaken for stars by any one to whom the configuration of the heavens in that direction was not familiar. Several very vivid flashes of lightning were remarked during the night. The last, at 3.54, was particularly brilliant, of a deep orange colour, and apparently emanated below the radiant in Leo. The horizon in that quarter was occupied by a pale glow, resembling what has often been remarked during exhibitions of the Aurora borealis."

15.—Unveiling of the Franklin memorial, erected in Waterloo-place, from designs by Noble, "to the great Arctic navigator and his brave companions, who sacrificed their lives in completing the discovery of the North-west Passage, 1847. Erected by the unanimous vote of Parliament."

— For the first time since October no deaths from cholera were registered this day for the East district of London. During the prevalence of the epidemic, 5,548 were known to have fallen victims, exclusive of 2,692 who died from diarrhoea and other cognate ailments. The Mansion House Relief Fund held a closing meeting November 29th.

16.—Great floods in Derbyshire and Lancashire, spreading over tracts of country never known to be under water before, and destroying much exposed property along the river banks.

17.—The Spectator announces that Professor de Morgan had resigned his chair in University College, in consequence of the recent decision arrived at by the Council of that body to reject Professor Martineau's candidature for the chair of Philosophy and Logic on the ground of his denominational reputation.

— Reform demonstration in Edinburgh.

20.—Ecclesiastical gathering in the British Hotel, Jermyn-street, to hear a statement made by M. Julius Ferrette, who claimed to be Bishop of Iona. He produced letters of consecration purporting to show that "Julius, Metropolitan of the World, who is Peter the Humble, otherwise styled Metropolitan of the See of the Syrians, and the Most Reverend Julius, Archbishop Œcumenic of the Orthodox Syrians and Metropolitan of Syria, resident in Homs (Emesa), has thought good to direct his attention to the state of the English Church, and he makes it known that on the 2d of June, 1866, in the divinely preserved city of Emesa, as the servant of God, the Presbyter Julius Ferrette has been ordained Bishop by the imposition of our hands, and has been appointed to the Island of Iona and its dependencies." Bishop Julius offered to re-ordain priests and deacons in the English Church without altering their status therein; but his ecclesiastical pretensions did not meet with any countenance.

— Sir John Lawrence holds a darbar at Agra remarkable for splendour and the number of native chiefs who assembled to do homage. The city and the river Jumna were illuminated.

— Reform banquet at Birmingham, attended by Mr. Bright and twenty-five other members of Parliament.

21.—Sudden outbreak of cholera in Fife. (611)

In the village of Methill-hill, Leven, there were thirty deaths in the three days preceding the present.

26.—Lord Chief Justice Erle retires from his seat in the Court of Common Pleas, the Attorney-General, in name of the bar, eulogising the great ability with which his Lordship had reconciled positive law with moral justice. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley retired from the Court of Chancery at the same time.

— Lord John Manners refuses to let the League Reformers arrange their intended procession in Hyde Park, though solicited as a favour, and without prejudice to the dispute presently pending as to the right of the people so to occupy any of the parks.

30.—The Queen visits Wolverhampton to unveil the memorial erected there to the Prince Consort. At the conclusion of the ceremony, her Majesty conferred the honour of knighthood upon the Mayor, Mr. Morris.

December 1.—Concluded in the Court of Queen's Bench the case of Hunter v. Sharpe, being an action raised by a physician against the printer of the Pall Mall Gazette, for a libel published therein on the 10th November last. After obtaining an M.D. degree in New York University the plaintiff commenced practising in that city. Resolving to make pulmonary diseases his specialty, Hunter studied the symptoms of his own delicate constitution, and adopted the practice of inhalation, which eminent medical men had previously recommended, but had not till then been systematically carried out. He had such a large practice that four medical men, each holding an English degree, were engaged to assist him. In 1858 Hunter came to England, where he published a book setting forth his system, and spent, according to his own testimony, about 1,000*l.* in advertising. In 1865 a Mrs. Merrick accused him of taking improper liberties with her, and pending the investigation of that charge the libel now complained of appeared. It was headed, "Impostors and Dupes," and said: "One of the evils which were a curse to English society was the advertising practices of a certain class of medical impostors." Referring to plaintiff as one of them, the article continued: "The Merrick-Hunter story is a fresh illustration of the state of the law in the matter of these abominable advertisements." On behalf of the plaintiff, evidence was led showing the extent of his trade and the success attending his mode of treatment. On the other side, various eminent medical practitioners expressed opinions adverse to the plaintiff's system. In summing up, at the close of the fifth day's trial, the Lord Chief Justice laid it down that the defendant would be entitled to a verdict on the plea of Not guilty if the jury were of opinion that though the article was not in all respects completely correct, it was nevertheless written with remarkable care, in good faith, and in a moderate spirit. He fully endorsed the proposition that if a public writer, in commenting upon a matter of public concern, exercised honestly his powers of criticism, he would be justified in so doing, even although the facts might fall short of what he had supposed them to be. The criticism in such a case was privileged, and he was entitled to the protection of his privilege. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages, one farthing.

3.—London Trades Demonstration in favour of Reform. For days previously the League party had given out that this was to be one of the most mighty gatherings yet witnessed in support of their principles, and much pre-arrangement and negotiation was undertaken with the view of permitting it to pass along the thoroughfares in an effective and orderly manner. The day turned out to be unfavourable for such a demonstration. The anticipated 200,000 workmen dwindled down to between 25,000 and 30,000, and the march from the parade-ground, Whitehall, to Beaufort House, Chiswick, was accomplished in a quite peaceable, if somewhat irregular, order. Many of them, indeed, did not reach the scene of the display till evening had set in, and some then turned homewards without taking further part in the demonstration. Brief speeches were made by Mr. Beales and Colonel Dickson. One Leicester, a glass-blower, spoke with exceptional vehemence:—“Every stage of that contest had called forth its martyrs, and they had a martyr before them in Mr. Beales. The question was, would they suffer these little-minded, decrepit, hump-backed, one-eyed scoundrels who sat in the House of Commons to rob and defraud them any longer of their rights—whether those who had squandered the people’s earnings like water should continue to do so? From one end to the other of this land their fiat had gone forth that they meant to be free. What had Lord Derby done? He had translated Homer. But he could not make one of those beautiful specimens of glass work which had been carried in procession that day. There was not a stocking-weaver in Leicester, or a clodhopper in the kingdom, rendering service to the State, who was not quite as useful as Lord Derby. What the people meant to do was to drive the devil out of the House of Commons and let God Almighty in.” The crowd dispersed with cheers for Bright, Gladstone, and Beales.

4.—At a Reform meeting of the London Trades-to-night in St. James’s Hall, Mr. Bright urged continued agitation and organization. Mr. Ayrton, M.P., censured the Queen for not recognising the people when they gathered in such numbers in front of one of her palaces. Mr. Bright at once repudiated the insinuation contained in the speech of the member for the Tower Hamlets. “I am not accustomed,” he said, “to stand up in defence of those who are possessors of crowns. But I could not sit and hear that observation without a sensation of wonder and of pain. (Loud cheers.) I think there has been, by many persons, a great injustice done to the Queen in reference to her desolate and widowed position. (Cheers.) And I venture to say this, that a woman, be she the Queen of a great realm, or be she the wife of one of your labouring men, who can keep alive in her heart a great sorrow for the lost object of her life and affection, is not at all likely to be wanting in a great and generous sympathy with you. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)” Mr. Ayrton afterwards sought to make an explanation, but could not get a hearing.

4.—The Convent of Arkadi, Crete, attacked by the Turks, was blown up by its defenders, and between 300 and 400 killed.

6.—The Roman Catholics of the metropolis hold a meeting in St. James’s Hall to express sympathy with the Pope.

7.—In consequence of the activity of the Fenian plotters in Ireland, the Lord-Lieutenant issues a proclamation placing such portions of Kildare and Mayo as had not been previously proclaimed under the provision of the Peace Preservation Act.

11.—The last detachment of French troops leaves Rome. At eight o’clock this morning the French flag upon the Castle of St. Angelo was hauled down and the Pontifical hoisted in its stead. General Montebello said to the Pope on leaving: “The Emperor withdraws his troops from Rome, but not his support—his Majesty leaves in the Eternal City the protection of France.” His Holiness granted his benediction, and promised to pray for the Emperor. “It is said that his health is not good; I pray for his health. It is said that his soul is not at peace; I pray for his soul. The French nation is Christian. Its chief ought to be Christian also.”

—In the Divorce Court Sir James Wilde lays down an important legal precedent in the case of March v. March and Palumbo. Hitherto the Court had been in the habit of making provision for a woman out of her husband’s means; but where the wife was the guilty party, the same rule was not applied. Mrs. March, the respondent, had an income of about 1,400*l.*; and the judge now directed that 200*l.* should be appropriated yearly to the education of a child of the marriage, and that 440*l.* per annum should be paid to the petitioner. The jurisdiction for this purpose had been recently created by statute, and the judge pointed out the grounds of public morality and policy on which it is founded. “It would be of evil example (he said) if this Court were to decide that the entire fortune of a wealthy married woman was to be reckoned as part of the prospects of an adulterer, or the resources of a second home for the guilty woman.”

12.—Explosion in the Oaks Colliery, near Barnsley, causing a destruction of life unparalleled in the history of such calamities. About six o'clock in the morning the whole of the hewers, boys, and drivers, numbering about 370, went down the shaft to commence their daily labour. They continued in the workings till twenty minutes past one this afternoon, when the banksman was alarmed by the sound of an explosion in the pit and a tempestuous rush of air and soot up the shaft. One of the cages, and the rope to which it was attached, were considerably damaged by the explosion; but in the face of those obstacles no time was lost by the authorities in descending the pit. At the bottom of the workings, immediately adjoining the shaft, eighteen men seriously injured, but still living, were discovered, and at once conveyed to the surface, where they were promptly attended to. The appearance presented in the workings showed the tremendous force of the explosion, which had changed the ordinarily busy scene of industry into a vast charnel-house. The brattings and the stoppings had been torn down in every direction, and all means of ventilation in the pit were of course destroyed. The stables, in which were about eighteen horses and ponies, had been burned, and the whole of the animals killed. The sides of the workings were in many cases broken down, while the workings themselves were altogether unapproachable on account of the masses of coal blocking up the entrances. One survivor stated that, though the fire injured him but slightly, he was quite overcome by the after-damp, and believed he remained for some time in an unconscious state. On recovering somewhat he made his way with enormous difficulty to the shaft, stumbling almost at every step. In his progress through the workings he met with many prostrate forms. All were dead. In order to satisfy himself of this, he knelt over all those about whom he had any doubt, and with his ear close to their mouths listened to their breathing. Dead bodies lay on all hands—in some places as many as thirty or forty together. A few were without burns or bruises, but others were greatly disfigured, charred and blackened as if roasted. Between thirty and forty bodies had been brought to the surface when a second explosion occurred, the following morning, causing the death of a company of twenty-eight searchers who had gallantly volunteered to enter the workings. Among these were Mr. Jeffcock, mining engineer, Sheffield, Jewitt, Newcastle, Smith, manager of Lundhill Colliery, Sugden, deputy, and C. Seddon, under-deputy. As this second explosion not only destroyed any hope that might exist of recovering men alive from the workings, but made a renewed descent almost impossible, the distracted relatives, who till then had crowded round the pit, were now gently removed to places of greater safety. About five o'clock on the morning of the 14th, the signal-bell was heard to ring, giving indications that some one was alive at the bottom of the shaft. Mr. Mammott, who was in attendance, and Embleton, junior, resolved once more to brave the perils of the pit; and on descending found Samuel Brown, one of the explorers of the previous day. When the cage came to the surface, the excitement was of the most intense description. Brown, though weak, was quite conscious and able to give an account of his experiences. He had wandered about the north incline for a long distance, falling over the mangled corpses of those slain by the blast. At last he found his way to the shaft and pulled the signal. He was of opinion there was no other living being in the pit. As explosion after explosion continued to take place, the consulting engineers resolved upon extinguishing the fire raging through the workings by filling up the shaft—an undertaking only accomplished after protracted and perilous labour. The bodies recovered were interred in the cemetery at Barnsley the following Sunday, the 23d, the different companies of mourners presenting most touching spectacles from the earnestness of their grief and the great number of bereaved widows and children. The Bishop of Ripon had been most unceasing in his exertions to impart comfort to the bereaved households. The Queen also showed her sympathy by two telegraphic messages; one inquiring for the particulars of the calamity, and the other announcing a relief of 200*l.* for the use of the sufferers. A relief fund was immediately organized, and contributions flowed abundantly in from all parts of the kingdom. The total number who perished through the disaster was set down at 340. Eighty-six were recovered from the pit; eighteen of whom were alive, though six of these died soon after being brought to the surface.

13.—While the public mind was excited by the Oaks calamity, another colliery disaster of great magnitude happened at Talk-o'-the-Hill, North Staffordshire. About 200 men and boys were at work in the pit when the explosion took place at noon. Shaft No. 1, leading to the workings, was much damaged; but No. 2 was in fair order, and down this crowds of eager volunteers hastened to search the pit. Their efforts were attended with considerable success. Fifty in a short time were sent alive to the surface, and throughout the afternoon twos and threes were frequently brought up in the cage to the relief of distracted households. Still the loss was considerable, and but for the overwhelming occurrence at Barnsley would have engaged the public mind as among the most calamitous events in the annals of colliery disasters. The deaths amounted to eighty-five. Evidence was adduced before the coroner's jury to show that the explosion had been caused by the carelessness of workmen in the pit exposing their safety lamps, and that in general there had been a lax observance of the rules laid down for securing the safety of those employed in the workings. As in the Oaks case, much public sympathy was shown, from the Queen downwards, for the bereaved and suffering families.

13.—Died at Edinburgh, aged 56, Joseph Robertson, LL.D., a zealous and accomplished antiquarian, particularly in the department of records and ecclesiastical history.

14.—In an address to the electors of Guildford, Mr. Garth, M.P., charged Mr. Bright with never having dared to stand for his own place, with refusing to subscribe to the cotton famine relief fund, and with wishing to support the suffering workmen by loans that he might have them as serfs at his beck and call. A correspondence ensued, which ended in the charges being explained away. "On a review of your speech and your letter," writes Mr. Bright, "I came to this conclusion—that you wished to get into Parliament, and were not particular as to the path which might lead to it. You threw dirt during your canvass, doubtless knowing that if needful you could eat it afterwards. There are many men who go through dirt to dignities, and I suspect you have no objection to be one of them." Another correspondence relating to misrepresentations of Mr. Bright by Mr. H. D. Seymour in the Fortnightly Review was at this time being carried on. On the 25th January Mr. Bright was presented with an address by his workmen expressive of "their entire sympathy with and respect for him under the malignant slanders which had been urged against him as their employer."

19.—Fall of an iron girder at the Aldersgate Station of the Metropolitan Railway, causing the death of four people who were in the last carriage of a passing train.

22.—J. H. Surratt, an alleged accomplice in the murder of President Lincoln, and afterwards a soldier in the Pope's Zouave corps, surrenders to the American authorities at Alexandria.

25.—Yacht race across the Atlantic. The Henrietta, Vesta, and Fleetwing started from New York at 1 P.M. on the 11th, and the first of the three which arrived at Cowes was to receive a prize of 90,000 dollars. At 5.40 this afternoon the Henrietta appeared off Cowes, having accomplished the passage in 14 days 4 hours and 40 minutes. The Fleetwing arrived about twelve hours after the Henrietta, and the Vesta two hours after the Fleetwing. With the exception of the Dreadnought, the Henrietta made the quickest passage on record. She had no accident, did not lose a rope, and made the entire passage on one tack. She averaged throughout the passage 218 miles a day. The Fleetwing when eight days out encountered a heavy southerly gale; the sea boarded her, carrying away her jibboom, and washed six men overboard, all of whom were lost.

26.—Mazzini issues a proclamation to the Italian people urging them to concentrate their hearts on Rome. "Rome," he said, "represents the mission of Italy among the nations; the word of our people; the eternal gospel of unification to the peoples. Can I bid her annex herself as a subaltern and an appendix to Florence? Can I, without profanation, counsel Rome to give the consecration of her prestige to a dying institution, and throw the gigantic shadow of her glory over the errors, the crimes, the servility to the foreigner, of a monarchy which uttered no word of protest in your favour in 1849; which has uttered no word of protest for you during your eighteen years of slavery; and which has declared, by the lips of its ministers, We will never go to Rome unless by permission of France and the Pope? No; Rome ought never to annex herself to Florence: we are all bound to annex ourselves to Rome. The material utility of Italy is nearly complete. All that we want is a symbol to represent that moral unity which can only be realized by the Republic. What we now have is the body without the soul. We await the soul from Rome; but Rome can only inspire the inert form with soul, on condition of preserving herself pure from the defilement by which it is now contaminated. Should Rome accept that, Rome, too, would fail; and with her, for I know not how long, the grand destiny of Italy in Europe."

30.—Fire at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, destroying or greatly injuring the Tropical Department, the whole of the Natural History Collection, the Assyrian, Alhambra, and Byzantine Courts, the Queen's apartments, the Library and Printing Offices, the Indian, Architectural, Model, and Marine Galleries. The fire appeared to have originated in a paint and store room in the north-eastern wing, and spread rapidly towards the main body of the building, along the flooring and other woodwork, which in the tropical end had become exceedingly inflammable. Being Sunday, there were fewer watchmen on the premises than usual; and some difficulty was also experienced in collecting the workmen belonging to the Palace to render the necessary assistance. Captain Shaw arrived with a detachment of the Metropolitan Brigade and performed services of the greatest value, afterwards formally acknowledged by the directors. The damage sustained by this national temple of instruction and amusement excited the widest feelings of regret among all classes.

31.—J. G. Bennett, New York, makes offer of his yacht Henrietta as a present to Prince Alfred. "The unbounded hospitality with which the American yachtmen have been received by all classes in England will always be remembered in the United States with the warmest gratitude, and I sincerely hope that you will not deprive me of the opportunity of acknowledging this most cordial reception by presenting the winning yacht to the representative of English yachtsmen." Prince Alfred, writing on January 22d, said he felt himself compelled to decline the generous offer, "with a sincere hope that such friendly rivalry may be the only description of contest in which our respective countries may ever be engaged. . . I feel assured that if my professional duties in command of one of her Majesty's ships should ever take me to your shores, I should there meet on the part of my brother seamen with a reception not less hearty than that which we have been happy to afford you here."

January 2.—Replying to Mr. Guedalla, a member of the Reform League, who desired to know whether the recent Reform meetings had not modified his harsh, unjust, and unfortunate opinion about the working classes, Mr. Lowe writes:—"The Reform League having fastened upon me assertions which I have not made, has loaded me with the most virulent abuse, and has striven to make me an object of the hatred, perhaps a mark for the vengeance, of my fellow-countrymen. With such a body and its leaders, of whom you appear to be one, I have no courtesies to interchange. When I think proper to give an opinion on the recent popular demonstrations, it is not to the Reform League that I shall offer it."

— Heavy fall of snow in London, followed by a severe frost, which continued about a fortnight. On some of the days traffic was almost put a stop to in the metropolis, and for cabs fares as high as 15s. and even 20s. were charged for journeys of about a mile. When the thaw came, much damage was caused by the ice and floods in the river.

— The Emperor of Austria issues an imperial patent, dissolving the old and commanding the election of new Diets throughout the empire.

6.—The parish church of St. John the Baptist at Croydon destroyed by fire, originating in the over-heating of a flue. The registers dating from 1538 were saved; but the fine series of archiepiscopal monuments was destroyed.

7.—A reorganization having been effected of the Agra Bank, trampled down during the last money panic, the company again commenced trading this day.

— At Washington the House of Representatives pass a resolution directing a committee to inquire into offences committed by the President, the vote being—Ayes, 107; Noes, 38. This was the first step to an impeachment.

10.—J. F. Wilkinson, late managing director of the Joint Stock Discount Company, sentenced at the Central Criminal Court to five years penal servitude for misappropriating the Company's funds.

— Double execution at Maidstone; Fletcher for the murder of a warder in Chatham convict prison, and Ann Lawrence for the murder of her child.

15.—A long series of isolated accidents on the ice was crowned this day by one of fearful magnitude, which took place on that part of the ornamental water in the Regent's Park immediately opposite Sussex-terrace. Although the ice there was looked upon by the icemen as unsafe, being formed chiefly of melted snow, there were, it was thought, about 500 skaters exercising thereon in the afternoon—some of them ladies—and no less than 2,000 others looking on from the banks. Suddenly, and without any warning, the ice at the sides gave way, and in a few seconds the entire sheet split up into fragments a few yards square. A general rush was made to the banks, which, unfortunately, broke up the soft ice into still smaller pieces. Score after score of those who had been enjoying themselves on its surface slipped down between the pieces and appeared to be at once sucked under the ice. At least 200 were at one time struggling in the water and screaming for help. A few with great presence of mind threw themselves flat upon the surface of the broken sheet, and thus not only preserved their own lives, but were instrumental in saving others. The icemen on duty, and spectators of all kinds and conditions, did their best to drag people to land, but in the wild excitement of the first moment's surprise many went down without a chance of recovery. Men, women, and children were seen clinging to the edges of the broken ice, shouting for the assistance which those who witnessed their sufferings were powerless to render, and in a brief time sinking with a few faint waves of the hands above the water. A detachment of police was soon on the spot, and rendered great service in preserving order, and permitting systematic efforts to be made for recovering bodies. This unexpected and overwhelming calamity threw a feeling of sadness over the entire metropolis. The number drowned amounted to forty-one.

16.—The Court of Queen's Bench gives judgment in the case of Hornby v. Clive, an appeal from the decision of magistrates at Bradford dismissing an information under the Friendly Societies Act against the treasurer of a society of working men, on the ground that the objects of the society, being partly those of a trade union, were not within the Act. The Lord Chief Justice confirmed the decision of the Court below. "I am far from saying (he remarked) that a trade union constituted for such purposes would bring the members within the criminal law, but the rules are certainly such as would operate in restraint of trade, and would, therefore, in that sense be unlawful; and upon the same principle upon which a Court of Error held (confirming a decision of this Court) that a bond given by a master to observe rules which were in restraint of trade was so far unlawful that it could not be enforced in law, we think that these rules of a society of workmen having a like effect are in the same sense illegal. That is to say, if a civil action was brought on any contract or obligation arising out of the rules, they could not be recognised and enforced in such action."

19.—The Emperor Napoleon issues a decree authorizing members of the Senaté and Legislative body to address interpellations to the Government.

21.—Meeting at the Mansion House to decide measures for relieving the distress in the East end of London.

— Conference at the London Coffee House concerning the alleged indifference of the working classes to public worship.

24.—Judgment given by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Bryant v. Foot—an action raised by the rector of Horton, Bucks, to determine his right to receive a marriage fee of 13s. From the year 1808 to the year 1854 the fee actually paid was either 13s. 6d. or 13s., with an occasional additional sum, varying from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d., for the publication of banns. There was no evidence as to what had been paid before 1808. Upon this state of facts it was argued, on the one side, that there was sufficient evidence from which to presume an ancient fee; and that the Court were bound to draw the inference that the fee was ancient, and therefore to hold it valid and legal. On the other side, it was insisted that the mere amount of the fee claimed, considering the difference in the value of money in ancient and modern times, showed that it could not be ancient, but, in legal language, "rank." The case was argued at length in a former term, and the Court took time to consider their judgment. The judges were now divided in opinion, and therefore delivered judgment separately. Mr. Justice Mellor first gave judgment against the rector, that the fee was not legal. The rule laid down appeared to be that, in general, the presumption was to be made that the payment was immemorial, unless some evidence was given to the contrary. He thought the "rankness" of the fee sufficient to disprove its antiquity. The Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Lush were also against the fee, and Mr. Justice Blackburn in favour of the rector.

31.—Sir E. Landseer's long-promised lions for the base of the Nelson monument unveiled, with little or no ceremony.

February 1.—Tried, at the Central Criminal Court, the four prisoners committed on (616)

the charge of scuttling the ship Severn. They were Holdsworth, an insurance-broker in London and Liverpool; Berwick, a retired merchant captain, living near Liverpool; Webb, chief mate of the vessel; and Dean, who pretended to act as clerk to Holdsworth. Captain Leyland was admitted Queen's evidence, and confessed that he was cognisant of the nefarious proceeding. The ship was scuttled by Webb boring holes in her bottom, and a log-book afterwards forged to show that she had been lost through stress of weather. The hull of the vessel had been insured for 9,500*l.*, the freight for 3,600*l.*, and some cases said to contain swords and fire arms, but really full of salt, had been specially insured for 1,500*l.* Altogether the insurances were at least 5,000*l.* beyond the value of ship and cargo. Suspicion was raised that the ship had been wilfully scuttled, and eventually a prosecution was instituted by Lloyd's Salvage Association. The defence set up by the several prisoners was in each case self-exculpatory at the expense of the others, and the jury found them all guilty, but recommended Dean to mercy as the tool of Holdsworth. After the verdict, it was stated that Berwick had on two previous occasions been directly charged with the wilful destruction of ships, and that no less than fifteen vessels, belonging either to him or his father-in-law, had been sunk at sea. Berwick and Holdsworth were sentenced to twenty years penal servitude, Webb to ten years, and Dean to five years.

1.—Mr. J. Stuart Mill, M. P., installed Rector of the University of St. Andrew's. His inaugural address had reference chiefly to the proper subjects of University training. He maintained that the function of a University was not to make educated men specialists, and that what the student ought to bring away was a general culture to illuminate the technicalities of his future special pursuits.

2.—A Reichsrath extraordinary, summoned by the Emperor of Austria early in January, was this day revoked in consequence of an arrangement having been effected with Hungary.

5.—Parliament opened by the Queen in person. The Royal Speech, read by the Lord Chancellor, made reference to the termination of the German war, the negotiation with the United States regarding the Alabama claims, the war between Chili and Peru, the insurrection in Crete, the union of the provinces of Nova Scotia, the famine in India, the condition of Ireland, and the supply of water to the metropolis. On the subject of Parliamentary Reform one paragraph stated, "Your attention will be again called to the representation of the people in Parliament, and I trust that your deliberations, conducted in a spirit of moderation and mutual forbearance, may lead to the adoption of measures which, without unduly disturbing the balance of political power, shall freely extend the elective franchise." It was also intimated that a Trades' Union Commission had been appointed, and bills were promised on the subject of the Factory Act, mercantile marine discipline, local charges on shipping, embarrassed railway companies, the metropolitan poor, bankruptcy amendment, and compensation for improvements in Ireland. In the course of the debate on the Address, Earl Russell complained that instead of the Reform Bill of last year getting fair play, as Earl Derby promised on behalf of his party, it had been met by underhand methods and factious combination on the part of those who could combine for nothing else. Earl Derby declined to follow Earl Russell through the history of late Reform Bills, and promised that the scheme of the Government would be submitted on the 11th. In each House the Address was agreed to without a division.

6.—Application made at Bow-street police-court for warrants to apprehend Colonel Nelson, late Brigadier-General at Jamaica, and Lieut. Herbert Brand, the president of the court-martial upon G. W. Gordon, on a charge of wilful murder. Mr. Fitzjames Stephen founded his application upon the following propositions:—1. The legality of the proceedings depended upon the meaning of the Jamaica Acts. 2. The Jamaica Acts do not define martial law. 3. The common law prevails in Jamaica, except in so far as it is altered by the island legislation. 4. Therefore we must resort to the common law to ascertain the meaning of the expression "martial law" in the Jamaica Acts. 5. Martial law may mean one of two things: (a) It may mean a system of rules enforced by sanctions of their own, which can be substituted for the common law by proclamation when anything happens which the Government chooses to call rebellion, the common law being for the time altogether abolished. (b) It may mean the exercise of military power for the purpose of suppressing armed resistance, such exercise of power being authorized and limited by the common law. 6. If the first meaning is the true one, those who execute martial law are not responsible for any excess which they may commit, except to their own officers, because the common law being suspended, no offence against it can be committed. If the second meaning is the true one, then those who execute martial law are responsible for any excess which they may commit, for they are acting as ministers of the common law, and in the discharge of a duty imposed upon them by it; and excess in the discharge of such a duty is a crime. 7. Martial law is legal in England only in the second, and not in the first sense; and, therefore, by propositions 1 to 4, it is legal in Jamaica also, in the second sense only, and not in the first. 8. Therefore the proposition that those who put Mr. Gordon to death have a right to rely simply on the fact that they acted under martial law, without proving before a jury that what they did was necessary in fact, involves the proposition that the Crown may suspend the common law at pleasure, and substitute for it a different system called martial law in cases of rebellion. 9. But if this be true, the sovereign is above the law, and is able to suspend it when he thinks such a step necessary for his own safety; and this is absurd.—Apart from this he argued that if the Jamaica Legislature used the words "martial law" in any other sense than that explained above, they acted ultra vires, because they acted in direct opposition to the Petition of Right; but these arguments were quite independent. The facts of Gordon's arrest, the proclamation of martial law, and of the trial, sentence, and execution of Gordon, were then formally proved by witnesses from Jamaica. But the evidence that Colonel Nelson and Lieutenant Brand were in London being somewhat vague, the case was adjourned till next day, when more definite evidence was adduced. Both officers afterwards attended the Court, and after a lengthened examination of witnesses, Sir T. Henry ordered them both for trial at the Central Criminal Court, bail however being accepted in both cases.

7.—Heard in the Court of Queen's Bench the case of Strauss v. the Athenæum. Plaintiff's novel, "The Old Ledger," having been described as "vulgar, profane, and indelicate," he brought an action at Kingston Assizes for libel; but at the earnest request of his own counsel, Serjeant Ballantyne, this was settled by the defendant consenting to the withdrawal of a juror, each party to pay his own costs. The Athenæum of 7th April, 1866, contained an article written by the editor, Mr. Dixon, justifying the original criticism, and pleading for the creation of some simple court, of easy access, in which vexatious suits at law might be checked in their initiatory stage. For this second criticism Dr. Strauss now brought another action. Evidence having been heard on both sides, Chief Justice Cockburn said to the jury: "It is all very well for the plaintiff's counsel to contend that literature should be free and unfettered. Be it so. But then if you give on the one hand the utmost latitude to literary composition, there ought to be at least the same latitude to literary criticism. It was urged by the plaintiff's counsel, truly enough, that in criticising a man's work it is not proper to allude to his private circumstances. But in this instance the object was to explain how the defendants came to consent to waive a verdict, and to show that they had substantially attained the same result; because if they had got a verdict, in all probability they would not have obtained their costs. If you think that the allusion was brought in only to make an attack upon the circumstances or character of the plaintiff, it would be malicious and actionable; but if it was adverted to merely in order to explain and vindicate the course taken by the defendants, then you would probably think that it was not unfairly introduced: and in the result, if you think the article on the whole was not unfair and malicious, find for the defendants; if you think it was so, then for the plaintiff." The jury, after a few minutes' consultation, found a verdict for the defendants.

8.—The Home Secretary obtains leave to bring in a bill to enable Commissioners to take evidence upon oath respecting trades' union outrages at Sheffield. One deputation of employers had placed in his hand a list of 200 alleged outrages, and another, composed of working unionists, expressed a strong desire to have them investigated. The bill afterwards passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent.

9.—In the Vice-Chancellor's Court, Sir R. Malins decides that the shareholders in Overend, Gurney, & Co. could not escape liability on the plea that the directors had made false statements in the prospectus of the company.

11.—Alarm at Chester, caused by a body of Fenians entering the town with the supposed design of taking possession of the Castle. The attack had been planned in Liverpool some days previously, but the police and military authorities were duly prepared, and no outbreak occurred. When they saw the preparations, many of the reputed Fenians stole secretly out of the town to neighbouring villages.

—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the Government scheme of Reform by announcing, in a speech of considerable length, that it was his intention to proceed by means of resolutions. The two principles which had been observed in framing them was that no borough was to be wholly disfranchised except for bribery, and that in re-arranging the districts representatives would be given to all places reasonably entitled to the privilege. Mr. Disraeli spoke for fully two hours, detailing the various schemes of Reform which had been submitted to the House of Commons in recent years, and the causes of their failure. He defended the House of Commons from the charges brought against it out of doors, maintaining that England, in the vicissitudes of her heroic history, had chiefly by her House of Commons maintained and cherished that public spirit which was the soul of commonwealths, and without which empire had no glory, and the wealth of nations was but the means of corruption and decay. He concluded by moving that on the 25th the House resolve itself into a committee to take into consideration the second and third of William IV. chapter 45. The resolutions submitted to the House were:—1. That the number of electors for counties and boroughs in England and Wales ought to be increased. 2. That such increase may best be effected by both reducing the value of the qualifying tenement in counties and boroughs, and by adding other franchises not dependent on such value. 3. That while it is desirable that a more direct representation should be given to the labouring class, it is contrary to the constitution of this realm to give to any one class or interest a predominating power over the rest of the community. 4. That the occupation franchise in counties and boroughs shall be based upon the principle of rating. 5. That the principle of plurality of votes, if adopted by Parliament, would facilitate the settlement of the borough franchise on an extensive basis. 6. That it is expedient to revise the existing distribution of seats. 7. That in such revision it is not expedient that any borough now represented in Parliament should be wholly disfranchised. 8. That, in revising the existing distribution of seats, this House will acknowledge, as its main consideration, the expediency of supplying representation to places not at present represented, and which may be considered entitled to that privilege. 9. That it is expedient that provision should be made for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at elections. 10. That it is expedient that the system of registration of voters in counties should be assimilated, as far as possible, to that which prevails in boroughs. 11. That it shall be open to every Parliamentary elector, if he thinks fit, to record his vote by means of a polling paper, duly signed and authenticated. 12. That provision be made for diminishing the distance which voters have to travel for the purpose of recording their votes, so that no expenditure for such purpose shall hereafter be legal. 13. That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to form and submit to the consideration of Parliament a scheme for new and enlarged boundaries of the existing Parliamentary boroughs, where the population extends beyond the limits now assigned to such boroughs, and to fix, subject to the decision of Parliament, the boundaries of such other boroughs as Parliament may deem fit to be represented in this House.

11.—Reform demonstration in the Agricultural Hall, Islington. In the course of the evening some members who had driven rapidly from the House announced to the meeting the intentions of the Government as to Reform. The Resolutions were received with marked disfavour.

12.—Earl Russell presents, but afterwards withdrew, a petition from Mr. Rigby Wason, charging Lord Chief Baron Kelly with having, on the 11th April, 1835, while pleading as Queen's Counsel before an Election Committee, pledged his honour as a gentleman to the truth of a statement which he knew to be false. The Lord Chancellor and Lord St. Leonards made severe strictures on the falsehood and malignity of the statements in the petition.

—Fenian rising in the neighbourhood of Killarney. The police and military were speedily concentrated in that quarter, and the leaders—many of whom had arms and treasonable documents in their possession—taken into custody. Captain Moriarty was captured next day near Cahirciveen.

13.—Imperial Rescript read in the Hungarian Diet, announcing that the Emperor assented to the demands embodied in the Diet's address of 17th January last, relative to the re-organization of the army, and adjourned it for Parliamentary treatment.

14.—Intimation made that it was intended to raise Sir H. Cairns to the peerage, and also Lord Justice M'Neil of the Scotch bar.

15.—Discussion in the House of Lords on the anomalous position of the Church in the colonies as regulated by the late Privy Council judgments. The Earl of Carnarvon assented to the production of the papers asked for by the Bishop of London.

— In answer to various members who were placing notices on the paper regarding the Reform resolutions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that on the evening of the 25th he would give such explanation regarding these resolutions as was due to the House.

— In the course of a discussion on the affairs of Crete and Servia, Lord Stanley said that England had endeavoured to offer advice in such a manner as to leave with the Porte itself, to whom it more properly belongs, the initiative in making such concessions as were considered necessary, and our representations on the subject had been met in a spirit of moderation and good sense.

17.—Lieut. Brand having been dismissed her Majesty's service, now writes to Mr. Buxton :—"I have learned enough to convince me that you could not have been actuated by any other than an honest conviction that you were fulfilling a public duty, and stating what you believed to be true. I therefore regret that I should have written to you as I did, and I feel sure that if you are not already convinced the heavy charges against me were not well founded, you will, before long, be assured of the fact by the issue of the proceedings which have been taken against me." Mr. Buxton, in reply, admitted that some words he had spoken were extremely harsh, although he could not as yet withdraw them.

18.—In answer to an inquiry in the House of Commons, as to the Government defence furnished to Colonel Nelson and Lieut. Brand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had no doubt whatever that when an officer in her Majesty's service, obeying the commands of his superior officers, performs acts which are afterwards legally impugned, it was the duty of the Government to defend him.

19.—Deputation from the members of the National Club to the Archbishop of Canterbury for the purpose of presenting an address on ritualism. The address set forth that some of the clergy had revived Romish practices in the Reformed Church, among which habitual confession to a priest, the wearing of Romish vestments, the use of incense, and of candles lighted in the daytime, the mixing of water with wine, and the offering of the Holy Sacrament as a propitiatory sacrifice, were particularly specified. It appealed to his Grace to use his great influence as Primate to discourage and suppress these innovations. In his reply the Archbishop said :—"Whatever changes may be fairly considered to be symbolical of erroneous doctrine, and to favour that which was deliberately rejected by the Church of England—whatever I have reason to believe is offensive to the great bulk of a congregation, and calculated to estrange them from the church of their forefathers—all this I shall readily discountenance ; but I must not be understood to promise any interference with that legitimate latitude which is permitted in the ordering of the services of the Church."

19.—Discussion in the House of Commons on Mr. Seely's resolution condemning our dockyard and Admiralty administration.

20.—The Princess of Wales delivered of a son. Bulletins for some days previously had been making reference to the sufferings of her Royal Highness from acute rheumatism.

22.—Riotous proceedings at Wolverhampton, caused by attacks made on Roman Catholics by Murphy, an itinerant Protestant lecturer. The military and special constables were called out.

— The House of Commons pass a bill further suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland.

— The Archbishop of Canterbury issues invitations to "bishops in visible communion with the United Church of England and Ireland" to attend a Pan-Anglican Council, to be held at Lambeth, under his Presidency, on the 24th September and three following days. "Such a meeting," he wrote, "would not be competent to make declarations or lay down definitions in points of doctrine. But united worship and common councils would greatly tend to maintain practically the unity of the faith, while they would bind us in straiter bonds of peace and worldly charity."

— Meeting of Ministerial supporters at Lord Derby's official residence. The details of the measures to be submitted to the House in the evening were gone over, the Premier making a declaration that this would be the last time he would attempt to deal with the question of Reform. Further, nothing, he said, would induce him to accept again the onerous post he now occupied.

23.—Died, aged 90, Sir George T. Smart, musical conductor.

25.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer details the scheme of Reform intended to be based on the resolutions submitted to the House. The occupation franchise in boroughs was to be reduced to 6*l.* rating ; in counties to 20*l.* : the franchise was also to be extended to any person having 50*l.* in the Funds, 30*l.* in savings' bank for a year, payment of 20*l.* of direct taxes, a University degree, the profession of a clergyman, or any minister of religion, any learned profession, or a certificated schoolmaster. (619)

Yarmouth, Lancaster, Reigate, and Totnes were to be disfranchised, and twenty-three boroughs with less than 7,000 inhabitants were to have one member each. Of the thirty seats thus placed at the disposal of the House he proposed to allocate fourteen to new boroughs in the northern and midland districts, fifteen to counties, and one to the London University. The new Parliamentary boroughs were Hartlepool, Darlington, Burnley, Staleybridge, St. Helen's, Dewsbury, Barnsley, Middlesborough, Croydon, Gravesend, and Torquay. The second division of the Tower Hamlets to return two members. New county divisions to have two additional members each—North Lancashire, North Lincolnshire, West Kent, East Surrey, Middlesex, South Staffordshire, and South Devon. South Lancashire to be divided, and to have one additional member. The total expected addition, to borough constituencies would be 212,000; and to county do. 206,500. Mr. Lowe opposed the method of proceeding by resolution, and called for a plain simple bill which would bring the matter fairly to an issue. Mr. Gladstone would not oppose the plan submitted by Government, provided the resolutions were made more definite. From a phrase used a few nights later by a member of the Cabinet as to the hurried manner in which this measure was prepared, it came to be spoken of as "The Ten Minutes' Bill."

26.—The North American Confederation Bill read a third time in the House of Lords.

—A meeting of 289 members of the Opposition takes place at the residence of Mr. Gladstone, to consider the position of the House with reference to Reform. It was agreed to defer any action till the resolutions were embodied in a bill.

—The Chancellor of the Exchequer announces the intention of the Government to abandon the method of proceeding by resolutions on the Reform question, and promises to introduce a bill on the earliest possible day, probably Thursday, 7th March.

March 1.—Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald arrives at Bombay to assume the government of the presidency in room of Sir Bartle Frere.

2.—At the close of a Cabinet Council today, when a majority present consented to introduce a "real and satisfactory" Reform Bill, three of the Ministers resigned—General Peel, War Secretary; Earl of Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary; and Lord Cranborne, Secretary for India. Explanations were made in both Houses of Parliament on the evening of the 4th, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announcing that the split in the Cabinet had been caused by the wish of the majority to return to their original policy on the Reform question. He proposed to introduce the new bill on the 18th. The fuller explanation given in the House of Lords by the Premier and the Earl of Carnarvon (who let out that the new bill would make an entire transfer of political power in five-sixths of the boroughs) gave rise to some complaints in the Lower House; but Mr. Disraeli refused to make any disclosures regarding his measure.

2.—Second meeting of the Cobden Club, presided over by Lord Houghton.

—In the Divorce Court, in the case of Maxwell v. Maxwell and Westcar, the jury returned a verdict for 10,000*l.* damages against the co-respondent, who had attempted to prove connivance and carelessness on the part of the plaintiff.

—Dr. Milman installed as Bishop of Calcutta, in Calcutta Cathedral.

4.—Nine children burnt in a school-room at Accrington, Lancashire, the premises taking fire in an apartment on the ground floor, used as a head-knitting room. Though the retreat of the children from the upper floor was cut off with alarming suddenness, about ninety were rescued by neighbours, who courageously mounted ladders placed against the burning building, and drew the scholars out by the windows. Those who perished appeared to have been suffocated by the smoke.

—President Johnson vetoes the Military Government Bill, and the Tenure of Office Bill, by which the Executive was prohibited for the future from removing any public officers without the consent of the Senate.

5.—Renewed Fenian disturbances throughout Leinster and Munster. At the police barracks at Tallaght one of the insurgents was shot, and at Glencullen they succeeded in capturing the police force and a number of weapons. The constables were released after a short detention, and the Fenian party fled with the arms and ammunition towards Kilkakee. At Drogheda and Thurles the telegraph wires were cut and the railway torn up; and at Kilmallock there was a smart encounter between the Fenians and the constabulary, three of the former being killed and fourteen taken prisoners. Dermore police barracks were burnt down, and a coastguard station near Kilrush plundered. To add to the alarm, the mail train from Cork to Dublin was sent off the rails; but no disaster ensued. The police station at Burnfoot, between Blarney and Mallow, was sacked and burnt, the constables surrendering, after narrowly escaping being burnt to death. The insurgents seemed to have had an intention of converging on the Mallow Junction, but their own timidity and the rapid movement of troops defeated the design, and they withdrew in the direction of the Toomes mountains.

—Further Ministerial explanations in the House of Commons by Mr. Disraeli, Lord Cranborne, and General Peel. Lord Stanley said:—"Right hon. gentlemen have spoken as if it were the intention of those who sat upon these benches to go in a more democratic direction than even gentlemen opposite would be inclined to take, and to bring in a bill which would reduce the franchise to an excessive extent. I say plainly and frankly that I can conceive no circumstances which would render the adoption of such a course by us in our position either expedient or honourable, even were any who sit on these benches prepared to follow it. I say this distinctly, because I wish to save some hon. members on that side of the House disappointment. If the member for Calne, or any of those who sit near him, believe seriously that it is the intention of the Government to bring in a bill which shall be in accordance with the view which has always been so ably and so consistently advocated by the member for Birmingham, they are greatly mistaken."

6.—Died at Southampton, aged 33, Charles Brown, "Artemus Ward," humourist.

— Mr. Coleridge's Oxford Tests' Abolition Bill read a second time in the House of Commons.

— Panic on the French Bourse, occasioned by warlike rumours on the Luxemburg question.

7.—Lord Stanley intimates in the House of Commons that, in consequence of the interest felt in this country on the subject, the Emperor Napoleon had offered the Plantagenet tombs at Fontevault as a gift to the Queen, and they would be removed as early as possible. He was not aware, he said, that former applications of the English Government had been refused, nor did he know that it was at the earnest entreaty of the people of Anjou that the statues had been removed from Versailles to their original site. The proposed removal giving rise to considerable dissatisfaction in France, the tombs were permitted to remain at Fontevault.

— Report received that the African traveller, Dr. Livingstone, had been murdered by the Mazitu, on the western side of Lake Nyassa. The intelligence was brought to Zanzibar by a party of Johanna men who had set out with the great explorer to accompany him on his travels, and who declared they saw him fall under the blows of his assailants. In writing to the chairman of the Geographical Society on the 11th, the President, Sir R. Murchison, indicated the points in which their narrative required confirmation, and the desirability of at once taking steps for testing the accuracy of the report.

8.—The Lord Mayor of Dublin having been made a Deputy-Lieutenant for the county, Lord Cloncurry writes to the Lord-Lieutenant (Howth) to cause his name "to be removed from that dishonoured list. In the present unhappy and disgraced state of Ireland, entirely caused by the mendacious, mercenary, professional agitators who so abound in this unfortunate country, it is a singular time to select to honour one who for many years was only notorious as a fomentor of agrarious disturbances."

— Mr. Disraeli announces to the Commons that the re-construction of the Ministry was complete.

11.—The Earl of Shaftesbury introduces a bill regulating the use of sacrificial vestments, which was read a first time.

13.—Edward Simpson, better known as "Flint Jack," and widely celebrated for his manufacture of sham antique and geological specimens, sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment at Bedford.

— Sir Colman O'Loghlen's Libel Bill referred to a select committee. He proposed to make speakers at public meetings liable for what they said, and to relieve from responsibility the printer of a faithful and accurate report of a libellous speech, unless he refused to publish an explanation; also to prevent a plaintiff recovering costs unless he was awarded more than 5*l.* damages. It also permitted a defendant to pay a sum of money as damages into court, and thereby—if the jury should think the sum sufficient—entitle him to recover costs from an unsuccessful plaintiff. When money was so lodged in court, a judge at chambers to have power to compel the plaintiff to give security for costs before proceeding further. Lastly, the bill prohibited indictments for libel being preferred without the leave of the Attorney-General.

14.—Continued illness of the Princess of Wales. The bulletin of this day announces "no important change in the condition of her Royal Highness. The inflammation of the knee-joint, though still causing pain, and interrupting sleep, is slowly diminishing."

15.—Resolution carried in the House of Commons abolishing flogging in the army in time of peace, the numbers on the division being 108 to 107.

16.—The French troops leave Mexico.

18.—In the presence of a crowded House, and of many illustrious visitors, the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the new Reform Bill. The proposals, embodied in a long address, were—That in boroughs the electors should be all who paid rates, or twenty shillings in direct taxes; the franchise should also be extended to certain classes qualified by education, or by the possession of a stated amount of property in the Funds, or in savings' banks; rated householders to have a second vote. As in the former bill, seats were to be taken from the smaller boroughs and those recently reported against for bribery, and given to more populous places—fourteen to boroughs, fifteen to counties, and one to London University. As a security against the power of mere numbers, he described minutely a system of checks, based on residence, rating, and dual voting. Mr. Gladstone criticised the scheme with some severity, and described the securities as illusions or frauds, which would be abandoned whenever it suited the Ministry.

— Exciting scene in the French Chamber, caused by M. Rouher making reference to the 2d of December as saving the nation from anarchy. M. Thiers, who had been proscribed, and M. Jules Favre excitedly declared their desire that the day might be buried in oblivion.

18.—The Queen of Denmark arrives in London on a visit to the Princess of Wales, still lying in a precarious condition. The King arrived on the 20th.

19.—Publication of secret treaties of July and August 1866 between Prussia and the Southern States of Germany, in terms of which the military contingents of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, &c., are placed at the disposal of Prussia, thus incorporating Germany into one entire empire for defensive military purposes.

20.—Second reading of Mr. Hardcastle's Bill for the Abolition of Church Rates carried by a majority of 263 to 187. Mr. Newdegate's Church Rates Commutation Bill thrown out by 177 to 45.

25.—At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society reports were read from Dr. Seward and Dr. Kirk concerning the reported death of Dr. Livingstone. The President, Sir R. Murchison, still clung to the hope that he was alive. There was a particular route traversed by the Portuguese in 1796, which he thought it possible Dr. Livingstone had taken. This would also account for no letters being received from him. Sir Samuel Baker said it was with great pain that he entertained a different opinion, but from his own experience in Africa he felt perfectly certain of what had been Dr. Livingstone's fate. Mr. Crawford agreed with the last speaker that the great traveller was dead. Dr. Kirk, he said, was a man of great discrimination, and he expressed no hope whatever as to the safety of the eminent explorer. Mr. Waller believed that Dr. Livingstone had fallen with his face to the enemy, and that enemy was the slave-trade. Captain Sherard Osborne considered it to be the duty of that Society not to wait, but to explore.

—The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the second reading of the Reform Bill, Mr. Gladstone criticised at considerable length its defects: (1), the absence of a larger franchise; (2), the absence of means to prevent the traffic in votes that would infallibly arise in a large scheme affecting the lowest class of householders; (3), the vexatious distinctions between compound householders and direct ratepayers which the bill contained and aggravated; (4), the tax-paying franchise; (5), the dual vote; (6), the inadequacy of the redistribution scheme; (7), the high figure of the county franchise; (8), the use of voting papers; (9), the fancy or special franchises. He also pleaded that Government should give the House a clear intimation of its intentions regarding the bill, that they might know whether there was any possibility of bringing it to a satisfactory condition in committee.

26.—In the House of Lords the Archbishop of Canterbury intimates that the bishops had abandoned their contemplated bill on vestments, as there was a probability of a Royal Commission being issued to inquire into the practices complained of.

26.—In the discussion on the second reading, Mr. Bright declared that if he was driven now, or at any future stage of the Reform Bill, to oppose the Government, it was because the measure bore upon its face marks of deception and disappointment, and because "I will be no party to any measure which shall cheat the great body of my countrymen of the possession of that power in this House on which they have set their hearts, and which I believe by the constitution of this country they may most justly claim." In closing the debate, Mr. Disraeli said:—"I hear much of the struggle of parties in this House, and I hear much of combinations that may occur, and courses that may be taken, which may affect the fate of this bill. All I can say on the part of my colleagues and myself is, that we have no other wish at the present moment than, with the co-operation of this House, to bring the question of Parliamentary Reform to a settlement. (Loud cheers.) I know the Parliamentary incredulity with which many will receive avowals on our part that we are only influenced in the course we are taking by a sense of duty, but I do assure the House, if they need such assurances after what we have gone through, after the sacrifices we have made, after having surrendered our political connexions with men whom we more than respected—I can assure them that we have no other principle that animates us, but a conviction that we ought not to desert our posts until this question has been settled. Rest assured that it is not for the weal of England that this settlement should be delayed. You may think that the horizon is not disturbed at the present moment. You may think that surrounding circumstances may be favourable to dilatory action. Some of you may think, in the excitement of the moment, that ambition may be gratified, and that the country may look favourably upon those who prevent the passing of this bill. Do not believe it. There is a deep responsibility with regard to this question, which rests not upon the Government merely, but upon the whole House of Commons. We are prepared, as I think I have shown, to act in all sincerity in this matter. Act with us, cordially and candidly, and assist us to carry out—as we are prepared to do as far as we can act in accordance with the principles which we have not concealed from you—this measure, which we hope will lead to a settlement of the question consistent with the maintenance of the representative character of this House. Act with us, I say, cordially and candidly: you will find on our side complete reciprocity of feeling. Pass the bill, and then change the Ministry if you like." The bill was read a second time without a division.

—The engineers and firemen of the Brighton railway strike for shorter hours.

29.—The magistrates of Market Drayton having issued a warrant against ex-Governor Eyre at the instance of the Jamaica Committee, now refuse to commit him on the charge of wilful murder, on the ground of no sufficient evidence of guilty malice, and no likelihood that a jury would convict.

— The Esterhazy jewels sold by Christie and Manson for 37,760*l.* A sword belt adorned with a single stone of seventeen carats realized 4,000*l.*, and the well-known Hungarian uniform of pearls, 2,175*l.* 10*s.*

— Scene in the House of Commons, occasioned by Sir H. Edwards declaring that Orangemen had as much right to be represented in that House as Fenians or Fenian sympathisers. A motion was made to have the words taken down, but after a remonstrance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarding the revival of the evil personalities of thirty years since, an explanation took place, and the offensive words were withdrawn.

30.—Discussion in the North German Parliament regarding the cession of Luxemburg to France by the King of Holland. Count Bismarck said the Prussian Government does not adopt the opinion that an arrangement has been entered into between Holland and France, but cannot on the other hand assert the contrary to be the case. He was “prevented from giving any further explanation by the nature of the affair.”

— In the course of an interview with Mr. Gladstone, one of the League deputation objected to the savings' bank franchise, on the ground that depositors were intensely selfish, and generally not interested in politics. They felt that for men who left others to struggle for their political rights, and for the maintenance or advancement of their wages, or for the maintenance of privileges with regard to their trade,—that for these to be the first to receive political enfranchisement would be a gross injustice. Mr. Beales announced the intention of the League to have another demonstration in Hyde Park on a convenient day after Easter.

— Lord Stanley forwards a despatch to the Spanish Government demanding compensation and apology for the outrage on the British ship Queen Victoria, seized fourteen miles from the coast, on pretence of being engaged in the Chilian service, and taken into Cadiz for condemnation before the prize court.

April 2.—In the House of Lords, the Duke of Buckingham, replying to the Earl of Clarendon, states that negotiations had certainly been entered into for the sale of Russian America to the United States, but he did not think the transaction was one calculated to create any uneasiness regarding our own North American colonies.

— Lord Derby and the Chancellor of the Exchequer receive a deputation from the Reform League, who urge the abandonment of the residential qualification and the rating clause, and the adoption of a lodger franchise.

4.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the annual financial statement. He estimated the income at 69,340,000*l.* and the expenditure at 68,134,000*l.*, showing a surplus of 1,206,000*l.* Criticising in the most favourable manner Mr. Gladstone's scheme of terminable annuities, he proposed, he said, to follow the principle so far as to convert 6,000,000*l.*, yielding an interest of 180,000*l.*, into an annuity of 444,000*l.*, terminating in April 1885. This would absorb 750,000*l.* He also proposed to equalize the marine insurance duty at its present lowest rates, so as to avoid the present unfair practice of taxing risk, or imposing a penalty upon the incurring of danger. This would dispose of 210,000*l.*, leaving 246,000*l.*, which he thought would be an adequate surplus to retain in hand, considering the state of the balance and the general condition of the revenue. The statement this year was of an unusually simple and brief description, and was favourably received.—Mr. Gladstone took advantage of the opportunity to urge the importance of reducing our debt, and referred triumphantly to the example now being set by America—sufficient, he said, not only to incite us, but to shame the nations of the Continent into an abandonment of that suicidal policy by which they were wasting in warlike preparations the resources created by the thrift and industry of the people.

5.—At a large meeting of Liberal members at Mr. Gladstone's house (about 240 were said to be present) it was arranged to entrust Mr. Coleridge with a resolution to propose, on the House going into committee on the Reform Bill on the 8th:—“That it be an instruction to the committee that they have power to alter the law of rating, and to provide that in every Parliamentary borough the occupiers of tenements below a given rateable value be relieved from liability to personal rating, with the view to fix a line for the borough franchise, at which all occupiers should be entered on the rate-book, and should have equal facilities for the enjoyment of such franchise as a residential occupation franchise.” In the course of the discussion to which the proposal gave rise, Mr. Gladstone admitted that the borough franchise and lodger franchise might be dealt with in committee, but in regard to personal rating they must put a gentle pressure on the Government, and arm the committee with power to alter the law of rating, so as to deal with the exemption from personal liability below a certain line.—Mr. Locke thought the instruction should be limited to that portion which gave power to alter the law of rating, as the last clause was objectionable to many who take a different view as to the mode in which the question should be settled.

— Mr. Lowe's motion, asking the House to dissent from so much of the minute of the Committee of Council, on Education as provided for an increase of the grant now made to primary schools, negatived by a majority of 203 to 40.

5.—In answer to Sir Robert Peel, Lord Stanley said that he knew nothing about any written protest from Russia against the cession of Luxemburg. Considering the scheme proposed by the King of Holland was conditional both upon the consent of the people and of Prussia, and seeing from the first that the latter was not likely to be given, he did not feel himself called upon to make any remonstrance on the part of the British Government.

8.—Addressing a deputation representing various Constitutional Working Men's Associations, the Chancellor of the Exchequer described Mr. Coleridge's "Instructions" as emanating from the most factious party tactics, and, under the hypocritical pretence of friendship, designed to strike at the very root and cardinal principles of the measure.

— In the "Tea Room" of the House of Commons a meeting takes place of between 40 and 50 Liberal members who dissented from Mr. Gladstone's policy of binding the committee by Instructions. After a slight opposition by two or three members, a proposal was formally made and carried, to cut down the Instructions; and a deputation was appointed to wait on Mr. Gladstone to inform him of what had been done, but to assure him at the same time that they would support him with the utmost loyalty during the discussion in committee. To avoid an open division, and, after this defection, an almost certain defeat, Mr. Gladstone arranged to limit the Instructions to the first clause of the resolution. As the members comprising this meeting kept more or less together in the discussions which afterwards took place on the Reform Bill, they came to be popularly known as the Tea-Room party.

— When the House of Commons assembled this afternoon, Mr. Locke asked whether, in the event of the second clause being withdrawn from the Instructions, Government would accept the first. Mr. Disraeli declined at first to answer a hypothetical question, but on being assured that it had been put with the knowledge of Mr. Coleridge, he said that Government had all along presumed the Committee would have power to alter the rating, so that to induce them to accept it did not require even a gentle pressure. He also thought it would have been as well that the mover of the resolution should have declared his own intentions. — Mr. Coleridge disclaimed any intention to disturb or oppose the Government; and though no precise arrangement had been made with Mr. Locke, he was on the whole not unwilling to withdraw the latter part of the resolution if it would facilitate the passing of the measure this year. Mr. Gore moved the adjournment of the House on the ground that the sudden collapse of Mr. Coleridge's resolution made it impossible to proceed. This was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a desultory debate ensued, in which Mr. B. Osborne and Mr. Lowe were the chief speakers. The House afterwards went into committee on the bill.

8.—Special commission for the trial of the Fenian prisoners opened at Dublin. The calendar contained the names of about 300; one-half indicted for treason, and the other for treason-felony.

— From the complications likely to arise out of the Luxemburg question, Consols, which during the last week had ranged at about 91 to $\frac{1}{8}$, fell to-day to 89 $\frac{3}{4}$.

9.—In consequence of Mr. Gladstone having given notice of a series of resolutions on Reform, Mr. Disraeli intimates to his supporters that they are the relinquished Instructions in another form, and if any of them are adopted, it will be impossible for the Government to proceed with the bill.

10.—The Tests Abolition (Oxford) Bill passes through committee, with a clause added to embrace Cambridge within its operation.

— Lord Chief Justice Cockburn attends at the Central Criminal Court, and charges the Grand Jury in the case of General Nelson and Lieut. Brand. His address occupied nearly six hours. It dealt in the most careful manner with all the complicated questions of law and fact to which the imputed offences gave rise, tracing with great minuteness the history of martial law and of military law, which ultimately took the form of "articles of war," and pointing out to the jury how the principles he set before them bore on the prisoners. The Chief Justice laid down these propositions:— First, that though it is a great and fundamental principle of our laws and Constitution that martial law, as it is called, cannot be legally proclaimed or established at the arbitrary will of the Executive, and without the authority, expressed or implied, of the Legislature; yet that in the particular case of the late Jamaica insurrection such authority in fact existed. To use the words of the Chief Justice:—"According to the view 'of the inhabitants of Jamaica' (with reference to what is the law of the island), the Governor, either from his commission, or from this enactment of the Jamaica Legislature, was entitled and empowered to proclaim martial law." Secondly, that though the legality of Gordon's original arrest may be questionable, and though his removal for trial from Kingston (where martial law was in force) was undoubtedly illegal; still, when the man was actually brought down to the tribunal in Morant Bay, "it was not for the tribunal" (viz. that of which Colonel Nelson and Lieutenant Brand were members) "to inquire how he (Gordon) came amongst them." The only question for that tribunal then was, "whether, being in fact within the jurisdiction of martial law, Gordon was or was not liable to be tried?" Thirdly, the Chief Justice laid it down that though the evidence on which Gordon was convicted by the military tribunal was such that no civil judge in England could have held to be legally sufficient, yet if the military judges, having, as they had jurisdiction, acted honestly and bonâ fide on the belief that this evidence proved the man's guilt, that exonerated them. "I should say," said the Chief Justice, "that where there is jurisdiction, but the person having that jurisdiction, acting under some misapprehension, exercises it in a case in which it ought not to be exercised, then he is not responsible." The Grand Jury, after deliberating for about half an hour, came into court to announce that they returned with both bills "not found." The prisoners were thereupon discharged.

11.—In the early part of the business of the House of Commons this afternoon, Mr. Hibbert asked the Government whether they would agree to an amendment of which he had given notice, to the effect that it should only be necessary for a compound householder to tender the amount of his composition-rate in order to entitle him to be registered. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that the question was one of great difficulty, but at the same time it was one for fair discussion. In the adjourned debate which took place next day, Mr. B. Osborne brought out that an understanding had been come to on this amendment between the Government "whip," Colonel Taylor, on the one side, and Mr. Dillwyn, on behalf of various Opposition members, on the other. Certain minutes were produced embodying the arrangement, but after they had been read an explanation was offered that the conversation out of which the minutes had arisen turned chiefly on the expediency of adjourning the debate till after Easter, in order to enable the Cabinet to consider more maturely the various amendments proposed on the bill.

— Commencement of discussion in Committee on the Reform Bill. Clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to without much discussion. Clause 3, as submitted by Government, was, that every man should be entitled to be registered as a voter possessed of these qualifications:—1. Is of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity; 2. Is on the last day of July in any year, and has, during the whole of the preceding two years, been an inhabitant, occupier, or owner, or tenant of any dwelling-house within the borough; 3. Has, during the time of such occupation, been rated in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; and 4. Has before the 20th day of July in the same year paid all poor-rates that have become payable by him in respect of the said premises up to the preceding 5th January. On qualifications 2, 3, and 4, Mr. Gladstone had the following amendments on the paper:—2. Whether he in person, or his landlord, be rated to the relief of the poor, he is, on the last day of July in any year, and has been during the whole preceding twelve months, the occupier of any house, shop, or other building, being either separately or jointly with any land within such borough occupied by him as owner, or occupied by him as tenant under the same landlord; 3. Such premises must be of the yearly value of 5*l.*, or upwards; 4. Such occupier must have resided in the borough, or within seven statute miles of some part of the borough, for the six months immediately preceding the said last day of July in such year. The debate on these rival clauses extended over two nights, the discussion having reference chiefly to the comparatively limited scheme of enfranchisement as proposed by Government in so far as it virtually fined all compound householders below a 10*l.* rental who sought to exercise the right of voting. On the second evening of the debate, Mr. Beresford Hope, after a taunting allusion to the Tadpoles and Tapers of certain amusing story-books, declared that, sink or swim, dissolution or no dissolution, whether he was in the next Parliament or out of it, he for one, with his whole heart and conscience, would vote against the Asian mystery. "I can assure the hon. gentleman," replied Mr. Disraeli, "that I listened with great pleasure to the invectives he delivered against me. I admire his style; it is a very great armament to discussion, but it requires practice. I listen with the greatest satisfaction to all his exhibitions in this House—(oh! oh!)—and when he talks about an Asian mystery, I will tell him that there are Batavian graces in all that he says, which I notice with satisfaction, and which charm me." The discussion ended in a vote, which took place amid great excitement, and showed a majority of 21 for Government in a House of 599 members. An adjournment was then made till over Easter.

12.—The House of Lords give judgment in the case of Forbes v. Eden, the question being whether the new canons enacted by the Scotch Episcopal Synod were binding upon the appellant, and whether he was not entitled to damages for the injuries and loss he had sustained by their enforcement. The appellant was Episcopal minister of Burntisland, and the respondent, Dr. Eden, Primus of the Scotch Episcopal Church. The Lord Chancellor gave it as his opinion that no civil court could take cognizance of the rules of a voluntary religious society, made for the regulation of its own affairs, except so far as they related to collateral questions affecting the disposal of property. Appeal dismissed.

— An address presented by the Roman Catholic nobility to Dr. Newman expressive of their sorrow at recent anonymous attacks to which he had been subjected, and assuring him "how heartily we appreciate the services which, under God, you have been the means of rendering to our holy religion."

15.—Admiral Persano found guilty by the Italian Senate of cowardice at the battle of Lissa, and dismissed the service. The charge

was made out partly by the admission of the Admiral himself, and partly from his leaving his own flagship, the Re d'Italia, to take refuge in the turret of the Affondatore.

18.—The Lancet announces that a small but appreciable change for the better had taken place in the condition of the Princess of Wales.

— Withdrawal of Mr. Gladstone from the leadership of the Liberal party. In answer to a question by Mr. Crawford, one of the members for the City, as to whether he intended to persevere in moving the different amendments, of which he had given notice, on the Reform Bill, Mr. Gladstone now writes: "The country can hardly fail now to be aware that those gentlemen of Liberal opinions whose convictions allow them to act untidily upon this question, are not a majority, but a minority of the existing House of Commons, and that they have not the power they were supposed to possess of limiting or directing the action of the Administration, or of shaping the provisions of the Reform Bill. Still, having regard to the support which my proposal with respect to personal rating received from so large a number of Liberal members, I am not less willing than heretofore to remain at the service of the party to which they belong; and when any suitable occasion shall arise, if it shall be their wish, I shall be prepared again to attempt concerted action upon this or any other subject for the public good. But, until then, desirous to avoid misleading the country and our friends, I feel that prudence requires me to withdraw from my attempts to assume the initiative in amending a measure which cannot, perhaps, be effectually amended except by a reversal, either formal or virtual, of the vote of Friday the 11th; for such attempts, if made by me, would, I believe, at the present critical moment, not be the most likely means of advancing their own purpose. Accordingly, I shall not proceed with the amendments now on the paper in my name, nor give notice of other amendments such as I had contemplated; but I shall gladly accompany others in voting against any attempt, from whatever quarter, to limit yet further the scanty modicum of enfranchisement proposed by the Government, or in improving, where it may be practicable, the provision of the Bill."

— Died, aged 86, Sir Robert Smirke, architect.

22.—At a great Reform Demonstration in Birmingham Mr. Bright said that from the preamble of the Government Bill to the last word in it there was not a single proposition any real, earnest, intelligent reformer would consent to. The Bill, he continued, has gone into Committee, and the very first vote in the Committee has confirmed the very worst feature of the Bill. The Liberal party has, by the treachery of some of its members, abdicated its functions, and handed the future fortunes of the Bill over to its friends who were not the friends of Reform. Speaking of Mr. Gladstone, "I will venture," he said, "to say this, that since 1832 there has been no man of the official rank or class, and no statesman who has imported into this question of Reform so much of conviction, so much of earnestness, so much of zeal, as has been imparted during the last two years by the present leader of the Liberal party. (Cheers.) Who is there in the House of Commons who equals him in knowledge of all political questions? Who equals him in earnestness? Who equals him in eloquence? Who equals him in courage and fidelity to his convictions? If these gentlemen who say they will not follow him have any one who is equal, let them show him. If they can point out any statesman who can add dignity and grandeur to the stature of Mr. Gladstone, let them produce him. It is a deplorable thing that last year a small section of forty men or thereabouts, of professing Liberals, destroyed the honest and acceptable —I speak of the people—the acceptable Bill of the late Government, and with it also destroyed the Government which proposed it. About an equal number have this year to a great extent destroyed the power of the Opposition, and may assist an anti-reforming Government to pass a very bad measure on the greatest question of our time; and having done all the mischief which they could, they begin to write silly letters to their constituents. What can be done in parliamentary parties if every man is to pursue his own little game? A costermonger and donkey would take a week to travel from here to London, and yet by running athwart the London and North-Western line they might bring to total destruction a great express train; and so, very small men—(loud cheers)—very small men, who during their whole political lives have not advanced the question of Reform by one hair's breadth, or by one moment in time, can, at a critical hour like this, throw themselves athwart the objects of a great party, and mar, it may be, a great measure that ought to affect the interests of the country beneficially for all time."

22.—Intimation given to the British Government that Spain had agreed to restore the Queen Victoria and her cargo, to indemnify the owners for their losses, and to punish their officers who were in fault for seizing the vessel.

— Strike of the London tailors to compel the masters to agree to a universal and uniform time-log, by which the time allowed for making a garment, and each portion of it, should be fixed, the wages for that time to be paid as each locality might determine. At a meeting in the Alhambra it was announced that an offensive and defensive alliance had been made with the operative tailors of Paris and Brussels, in terms of which workmen in those cities would refuse to fill up the places of those on strike.

22.—Sir R. Murchison writes that a Livingstone search expedition should be at once organized, as letters had been received from Zanzibar which afforded ground for believing the traveller to be still alive.

23.—At Buckhurst-hill, near Woodford, Essex, Frederick Alexander Watkins makes a murderous attack with a dagger upon Matilda Griggs, a young woman with whom he was keeping company. She was found by a policeman saturated with blood, and leaning heavily against a paling in a field near where the assault was committed. As she was to all appearance dying, a formal declaration was taken, in which she declared that she met Watkins outside her father's house. "He asked me if I would walk with him, and while we were walking along he charged me with speaking to other young men, and I said that I did not. He then asked me to get into a field over a paling, and I did so. He then struck me on the head two or three times, and afterwards drew out a dagger, which he stabbed into my back, breast, and face, several times. I saw the dagger, and knew, besides, that he was in the habit of carrying one with him. When I fell on the grass he ran away. I lay for a long time, and heard the clock of Buckhurst-hill strike ten. When I felt my strength returning, I crawled along the grass through a fence into another field, and there I again lay down for some time. I once more got up, and was making my way home when the policeman met me." When Watkins left the poor girl he said he knew that she was not dead, but thought she would not last long. He ran away in the direction of Epping Forest, attempting to poison himself with oxalic acid, but finding it ineffectual, walked into Epping police-station and gave himself up about five o'clock the following morning. Contrary to all expectation, Matilda Griggs recovered, and on the case coming on for trial, refused to give evidence against her assailant.

— Sir W. Gray succeeds Sir Cecil Beadon as Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

27.—Died in London, from the effects of a gun-shot wound, Lord Llanover, formerly Sir Benjamin Hall, at one time Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests.

29.—Intimation made by Lord Stanley in the House of Commons that there was every reason for believing that France and Prussia would accept the proposal made by the neutral Powers for a conference on the Luxemburg question.

30.—Mr. Trevelyan's resolution for the abolition of the purchase system in the army negatived by 116 to 75.

May 1. — Proclamation issued from the Home Office warning and admonishing all people to abstain from attending or taking any part in the League meeting announced to be held in Hyde Park on the 6th. In the evening the League issued a counter-manifesto calling on the people to assert their right to use the parks, and to attend the meeting called as they came from their work. A meeting was also held in the evening, when, after certain violent allusions to resistance, a resolution was carried, pledging all present to attend the meeting in the Park, and declaring, "that the consequence of endeavouring to prevent it must rest with those who are wicked enough to take this course."

1.—The Fenian prisoners Burke and Doran convicted of high treason at Dublin, and sentenced to death. The principal witnesses were the "informers" Keogh and Massy, who had been associated with the prisoners in all their recent movements, and described their designs with great minuteness. Burke made a speech stigmatising the manner in which he had been convicted, but expressing himself ready to die for Ireland.

— Mr. Stern writes from his prison in Abyssinia: "The ruthless ferocity of the King has exhausted the patience of the most timid and servile, and all appear now to be animated by one deep and ardent passion—the overthrow of the tyrant. The army he once had at his behest is scattered in bands of rebels all over the country; and as he can never recruit again his incredibly diminished hordes, he will either be forced to make the Amba his last asylum and tomb, or, followed by a few faithful adherents, and the most valuable captives, seek a home in the marshy jungles and entangled fever-villages of the lowlands."

2.—Government defeated in Committee on Mr. Ayrton's amendment that the period of residences in boroughs at rentals below 10*l.* should be one year instead of two. Vote, 278 to 197. The following evening the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that Government would accept the alteration.

3.—After a smart debate regarding the intimation made by the League that they were determined to hold their demonstration in Hyde Park, Mr. Walpole obtains leave to bring in a bill, providing that no meeting of a public character should take place in any of the royal parks without the permission of her Majesty; and that any one convening or assisting at such a meeting should, on conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10*l.*, or two months' imprisonment.

— Mr. Bright presents a petition to the House regarding the sentences of "excessive and irritating severity" passed upon Fenian prisoners, and praying "that the punishments might be more applicable to men whose crime and whose offence are alike free from dishonour, however misled they may be as to the special end in view, or the means they have adopted to attain that end." After a brief discussion touching the language in which the prayer of the petition was couched, it was ordered to lie on the table.

4.—Numerous swearings-in of special constables in anticipation of the League meeting.

6.—At a meeting of his parliamentary supporters in Downing-street, Lord Derby made an elaborate defence of the Home Secretary against the undeserved censures which were being poured upon him for his proceedings in connexion with the Hyde Park meeting. He also explained the law of the case, which certainly supported the Crown to an indisputable right to the Park, though the manner of enforcing that right was admittedly a matter of great difficulty. As now advised, the meeting appeared to be perfectly legal, and the Government had no intention of putting it down by force, though they considered it right to make the most complete preparations for restoring the peace in the event of any disorder arising out of the assembling together of so many people.

— Reform League Demonstration in Hyde Park. The people assembled peaceably in large numbers, and were addressed at ten different platforms or sections by members of the League Executive and one or two members of Parliament. Contrasting somewhat with the severe and even denunciatory character of certain speeches, there was a good deal of noisy fun and running backwards and forwards to the different platforms, but nothing in the slightest degree approaching to any outbreak against constituted authority. The gathering was described as rather flat, and as orderly as an Exeter Hall May meeting.

— In committee on the Reform Bill, Government consents to Mr. Hibbert's proposal that the whole amount of rate paid by the tenant should be deducted from the landlord's rent. It was also intimated that a properly-regulated lodger franchise would not be opposed.

7.—First meeting of the London Conference on the Luxemburg Question, under the presidency of Lord Stanley.

— Discussion on Sir J. Gray's proposal to fix a night for the House taking into consideration the temporalities and privileges of the Established Church in Ireland with a view to remove their anomalies. Mr. Gladstone welcomed the "previous question" as a relief from the necessity of affirming a proposition which might excite hopes at present impossible to be realized. The time, however, he thought was not far distant when the Parliament of England, which at present undoubtedly had its hands full of other important business engagements, would feel it to be a duty to look this question fairly and fully in the face; "and I confess that I am sanguine enough to cherish a hope that, though not without difficulty, a satisfactory result will be arrived at, the consequences of which will be so happy and pleasant for us all that we shall wonder at the folly which has so long prevented its being brought about." The Attorney-General for Ireland characterised Mr. Gladstone's speech as directly communistic in its tendency; and insisted that every argument he had used for the spoliation of the Irish Church was equally applicable to the property of individuals. The "previous question" was carried by 195 to 183.

8.—The North German Constitution adopted by the Prussian Chamber of Deputies.

9.—The retirement of Mr. Walpole intimated in the House of Lords by the Premier, who declared that the Home Secretary was no more to blame for the apparently vacillating conduct of the Cabinet than any other member. The department had recently great extra labour thrown upon it at a time, unfortunately, when it was deprived of the services of a permanent efficient Under-Secretary. Mr. Walpole was succeeded at the Home Office by Mr. Gathorne Hardy.

— In committee on the Reform Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the occupant of premises claiming to vote must have been rated as an "ordinary occupier" in respect of his premises, and not compounded for. Carried, after a long debate, by 322 against 256. In the course of the debate the Chancellor of the Exchequer took an opportunity of challenging Mr. Gladstone's imputation that the Government had been guilty of fraud and dissimulation. The words were withdrawn, but the withdrawal was accompanied by a statement that the measure had been adjusted to give the appearance of an extension of the franchise, while care was taken that it should not be realized. "Now," said the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "I must say I prefer the original invector of the right hon. gentleman—the denunciations of Torquemada to the interpretation of Loyola. I prefer to meet a clear charge of fraud and dissimulation, rather than be told in language like that I have just named to the House, that we have been guilty of conduct unworthy, in my opinion, of all public men."

—The 100th Anniversary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, celebrated in St. James's Hall, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

11.—Signed in London a treaty for the evacuation of Luxemburg by the Prussians, the demolition of the fortress, and the neutralization of the territory under the joint guarantee of the great Powers.

—Deputations from various provincial Reform Associations, accompanied by several members of Parliament, wait upon Mr. Gladstone to present addresses expressive of confidence in him as a leader of the Liberal party. After referring to the unfortunate divisions among themselves, he passed on to speak of the delusive character of the Government scheme of Reform: "An arrangement which it is proposed to found in the absurd, preposterous, and mischievous distinctions of personal rating, as now regulated in this country for social purposes, I hold to be a totally unfit basis for the franchise. Any measure which rests on such a basis I wholly disown and reject; and if it should be clothed with that perfect authority which belongs to the law in this country, I shall combine my obedience to that law with the liberty to which every man is entitled to endeavour, by every legitimate means, to effect a change in a portion of it which I deemed to be so unjust to the people. . . . To these enactments, while I continue to be on the floor of the House of Commons, I shall continue to offer an unqualified and unhesitating opposition." The Chancellor of the Exchequer was understood to refer to this speech on the Monday night following, when, in consequence of violent language used out of doors, he was led to express a hope that attempts would not be made surreptitiously to rescind or perplex the vote the House had already come to on the rate-paying clauses of the Bill. "I should have been very glad if these spouters of stale seditious had not taken the course they have done. It may be their function to appear at noisy meetings, but I regret very much they should have come forward as obsolete incendiaries of that character to pay homage to one who, wherever he may sit, must always be the pride and ornament of this House

"Who would not smile if such a man there be,
Who would not weep if Atticus were he."

Mr. Gladstone curtly replied, that when authority came into the field for the purpose of forbidding and denouncing, unless it could carry its prohibition or denunciation to some positive issue, the result was that authority itself lost credit and power.

13.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the Scotch Reform Bill; the franchise to be similar to the English; but it was proposed to give seven additional members to that division of the kingdom—three for counties, two for boroughs, and two for Universities. There was also to be a re-arrangement of, and an addition to, the present system of grouping. The House then went into committee on the English Bill, and a lodger franchise was carried to operate where there was a twelve-month's residence, and a clear yearly value of 10*l*.

14.—Lord Shaftesbury's Clerical Vestments Bill thrown out on a second reading by 61 votes against 46. A Royal Commission was now promised to inquire into the ritualistic observances.

—Greatorex and the brothers Grimshaw tried at Edinburgh, and sentenced, the former to twenty years' and the two latter to fifteen years' penal servitude, for forging and uttering upwards of 1300 one-pound notes of the Union Bank. Part of the gang were detected at Dalkeith, and from inquiries then instituted the entire set of lithographic and engraving materials used in the manufacture of the notes was seized in Glasgow. Greatorex had been followed to New York and apprehended there.

15.—The long-protracted and fierce dispute between the Imperial and Republican forces in Mexico terminates to-day, in the betrayal of the Emperor Maximilian to the Juarist General Escobado, by General Lopez. He had been shut up in the city of Quaretero since the 1st of April.

16.—In consequence of the adverse criticism which the scheme had experienced, Lord R. Montagu intimates that it was not intended that the South Kensington officials should persevere with the publication of their Art Catalogue in the Times.

17.—Fracas in the House between Mr. Layard and Mr. H. Lewis, the former having asked in the lobby if the latter was not afraid of certain symptoms in going back to his constituents, and receiving an answer admitted to be couched in strong Saxon English. The House declined to take any notice of the encounter, the Speaker expressing a determination not to permit such expressions to be again brought up for discussion.

—The House of Commons consider the abolition of the compound householders, in terms of a resolution submitted by Mr. Hodgkinson, proposing to add to clause 3, that no person other than the occupier shall be rated to parochial rates in respect of premises occupied by him within the limits of a parliamentary borough, all acts to the contrary notwithstanding. In the course of the discussion, Mr. Lowe made another animated appeal to some of the gentlemen of England with their ancestry behind them and their posterity before them, to save the Constitution from the hands of a multitude struggling with want and discontent. "I was taunted the other night," he said, "by the hon. member for the Elgin boroughs, that the fates and destinies had been too strong for me. I have no fear of them, sir; what has been too strong for me is the shabbiness, the littleness, and the meanness, that have met together. Upon a former occasion when I addressed the House, I took upon myself to make a prophecy. I said that if we embarked upon this course of democracy, we should either ruin our party or our country. Sir, I was wrong; it is not a question of alternatives; we are going to ruin both." The final settlement of the clause was delayed till the 27th, when the House finally resolved that there should be no more compounding. On the same evening Mr. Mill's proposal to substitute "person" for "man" in the county franchise clause was rejected by 196 to 73. A majority of 201 to 157 carried a proposal to grant the franchise to copyholds of the annual value of 5*l*.

—Grand ball at the British Embassy, Paris, in honour of the visit of the Prince of Wales.

17.—Died, aged 73, Clarkson Stanfield, R.A.

20.—The Queen attended at South Kensington to lay the first stone of the Albert Hall of Arts and Sciences, designed to perpetuate the memory of the late Prince Consort. In replying to an address read by the Prince of Wales, her Majesty said: "It has been with a struggle that I have nerved myself to a compliance with the wish that I should take part in this day's ceremony; but I have been sustained by the thought that I should assist by my presence in promoting the accomplishment of his great designs to whose memory the gratitude and affection of the country are now rearing a noble monument, which I trust may yet look down on such a centre of institutions for the promotion of art and science, as it was his fond wish to establish here. It is my wish that the hall should bear his name to whom it will have owed its existence, and be called the 'Royal Albert Hall of Arts and Sciences.'" The foundation-stone was then lowered into its place, and the customary formalities having been gone through by her Majesty, the Archbishop of Canterbury offered up a prayer that the arts there fostered might be the arts of peace, ministering to the welfare and happiness of mankind. The orchestra and chorus then proceeded to deliver the vocal and instrumental music of "L'Invocazione all' Armonia," composed by the late Prince Consort. The solo tenor parts of the piece were given by Signor Mario with such beautiful distinctness and effect that her Majesty stopped to thank him when passing from the building. The proceedings were brought to a close by the "National Anthem."

21.—Commenced in the Court of Arches the discussion on the admission of the articles in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, involving the legality of the ritualistic practices observed in celebrating worship in the church of St. Alban's, Holborn. After some discussion it was decided that the articles should be sent back to be reformed in two particulars, as to the greater degree of the elevation of the consecrated elements, and as to the law, statute and ecclesiastical, under which the offences were charged.

— Royal Proclamation issued, declaring the British North American provinces one division, with the name of Canada.

22.—Epsom. The Derby stakes won by Mr. Chaplin's Hermit (100 to 1 agst.). Snow on the course.

23.—The Duke of Edinburgh left London to join the Galatea on a voyage to the Australian colonies.

— Died, aged 74, Sir Archibald Alison, historian of the wars of the French Revolution.

25.—In addressing a meeting of "Brother and Sister Reformers" in St. James's Hall, Mr. J. S. Mill said, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not deceived the House of Commons, he had at least encouraged members a good deal to deceive themselves. "I ought to be ashamed to make the confession myself, but he quite succeeded with me." In the House, Mr. Mill afterwards admitted that Mr. Disraeli had completely acquitted himself.

27.—In committee the county occupation franchise was fixed at 12*l.*, as a mean between 10*l.* and 15*l.*, the qualification to be either house and land, or house or land. On the first proposal, which was to omit the words of the clause for the purpose of afterwards allowing the insertion of an amendment, to prevent the creation of faggot votes, by making it compulsory to have a dwelling-house on the land, Government were beaten by 196 to 193; but when the substantive motion was put to insert "dwelling-house," it was rejected by 212 to 209.

28.—Government withdraw their proposals to attach the franchise to educational or pecuniary qualifications; and also the dual vote clause.

29.—Mr. Fawcett's Act of Uniformity Amendment Bill read a second time by 200 to 156. Petitions were presented against it by Sir W. Heathcote and Mr. Selwyn, and it was also opposed by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Hardy.

30.—The franchise clauses of the Reform Bill being now settled, the House, in committee, proceeded to deal with the redistribution part of the scheme. The disfranchisement of Yarmouth, Lancaster, Reigate, and Totnes was agreed to after a faint protest from Sir G. Bowyer, as to the penal character of the measure. On clause 9, Mr. Mill brought forward his scheme for the representation of minorities, founded on the principle that any member might be returned by as many voters residing anywhere as was equal to the gross number of names of the entire register divided by 658; or if less than 658 candidates received the full quota of votes, then those who had the largest number. The proposal was withdrawn after discussion.

31.—Discussion on the Government redistribution scheme, by which it was proposed to cut down all constituencies under 7,000 to one member each. Mr. Laing's proposal to fix the minimum at 10,000, and secure thirty-five seats instead of twenty-three, was carried against Government by 306 to 171. Serjeant Gazelee afterwards proposed to disfranchise all boroughs which had a population of less than 5,000, but this was rejected by a majority of 269 to 217.

June 1.—Royal visits to Paris. The Emperor Alexander of Russia arrived to-day; the King of Prussia on the 5th; the Viceroy of Egypt on the 16th; and the Sultan on the 30th.

3.—The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the perpetration of trade outrages in Sheffield commence their sittings.

3.—First stone of the Holborn Valley Viaduct laid.

— Royal Commission authorized to inquire into the differences of practice which had arisen "from varying interpretations put upon the rubrics, orders, and directions for regulating the course and conduct of public worship, the administration of the sacraments, and the other services contained in the Book of Common Prayer, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, and more especially with reference to the ornaments used in the churches and chapels of the said United Church, and the vestments worn by the ministers thereof at the time of their ministrations."

5.—Several letters appear in this morning's Times complaining of robberies and assaults committed by an organized body of "roughs" who accompanied a militia regiment in its march through the streets of the metropolis on the 3d.

— By a majority of 164 to 150, it was agreed to refer to a Select Committee Mr. Ewart's Oxford and Cambridge Education Bill, designed, as he explained, to restore the ancient University system, and to open them to all classes as national institutions, without subjecting the students to any tests.

6.—Berezowski, a Pole, attempts to assassinate the Czar by firing into a carriage in which he was seated with the Emperor Napoleon and his two sons. Both sovereigns escaped unhurt, but the horse of one of the equestrians was wounded; a second attempt was made, but the barrel burst and rendered powerless the assassin's hand. In its account of the outrage, the Moniteur said that the Emperor Napoleon, turning towards the Emperor Alexander smiling, said, "Sire, we shall have been under fire together." The Czar replied, more seriously, "Our destinies are in the hands of Providence." Berezowski was at once arrested, and with difficulty saved from being torn to pieces.

8.—The Emperor and Empress of Austria crowned King and Queen of Hungary at Pesth, amid circumstances of great outward festivity and splendour. It was noticed that among the absentees was M. Deak, who had wrought so eagerly for this mark of Imperial favour to his country.

9.—Departure of the Livingstone Search Expedition under the command of Mr. E. D. Young.

— Died at Dublin, aged 73, Dr. Anster, translator of "Faust."

— Died at Vienna, from injuries received by fire, the Archduchess Mathilde, daughter of the Archduke Albrecht, aged twenty-one years.

13.—The Court of Exchequer gives judgment in the case of Slade v. Slade, involving the title to certain landed estates and a baro-netcy. An action of ejectment was brought by General Marcus Slade, Colonel of the 50th Regiment, and brother of the late Sir Frederick Slade, Q.C., against Sir Alfred Slade, the eldest son of Sir Frederick, to recover possession of the manor of North Petherton, in the county of Somerset, and other lands entailed in the Slade family. Sir Frederick married in December 1833, at St. George's, Hanover-square, Maria Barbara, daughter of Charles Browne Mostyn, of Kiddington, and had by her several children, of whom Alfred, the defendant, was one, and the eldest son. The case on the part of the General was that the marriage between Sir Frederick and his wife was void because the lady had previously contracted marriage at Milan, in 1825, with an Austrian gentleman named Baron C. Von Körber, who survived till the year 1853. In reply to this, it was urged that the marriage of Lady Slade at Milan was void, and that she was, therefore, free to marry again. The validity of Lady Slade's marriage turned entirely upon the Austrian law, which was the law in force in Milan in 1825, and on this point many professional and learned men had been examined on both sides under a commission. The grounds on which the Milanese marriage was assailed were, first, because the bans had not been duly published, and that the priest, Feld-Superior Nagy, who performed the ceremony, was not competent to do so. By the Austrian law, bans must be published for the bride as well as the bridegroom; and if the bride had not dwelt six weeks in the parish in which she was to be married, her bans must be published not only there, but in the parish in which she last had an uninterrupted residence of at least six weeks. For the defence the argument was that Miss Mostyn had not lived six weeks in Sta. Babyla, that her last parish of six weeks' residence was Sta. Maria; that her bans ought, therefore, to have been published in both these parishes, and that they were published in neither. Lady Slade being almost the only person surviving who was at Milan, and knew anything about the marriage there in 1825, the facts of the case had to be gathered chiefly from the contents and from the silence of the marriage register, and of certain vouchers and documents which accompanied it, and from which the plaintiff insisted that the bans were published, while the defendant drew an inference the opposite way. Again, it was said that Feld-Superior Nagy was incompetent to marry Miss Mostyn to Baron von Körber. There was no dispute that the only person competent by Austrian law to celebrate a marriage was a clergyman who had the cure of souls over one of the bridal persons. The defendant's contention was that Nagy, being a Roman Catholic priest, had no cure of souls over a Protestant officer. The plaintiff conceded that this would be true in the case of civilians, but maintained that the special legislation for the Austrian army created an exception for the case of Protestant military men. It was further contended by the defendant, and denied by the plaintiff, that by Austrian law, whenever a Protestant married a Catholic, the marriage could be validly performed only by the priest who had cure of souls over the Catholic party; and that as Nagy had certainly not cure of souls of Miss Mostyn, the marriage was void. Lastly, it was contended by the defendant, and denied by the plaintiff, that at the time of the marriage, on the 6th of October, 1825, Lieutenant von Körber had been transferred from Milan to Gratz, and had thus passed under the jurisdiction of another Feld-Superior, by whom (if by any Feld-Superior) his marriage ought to have been celebrated. The plaintiff also contended that whether the alleged impediments to the Milanese marriage existed or not, it was too late to set them up now; that by Austrian law there was one appointed way of obtaining a declaration of invalidity of marriage at the suit of determinate persons, and by a prescribed mode of procedure; and that now, after the death of Baron von Körber, it was too late to obtain such a declaration of invalidity, so that the Milanese marriage must remain and be considered valid. To all this a direct and elaborate contradiction was offered by the defendant; and on this point, more perhaps than on any other, the arguments on both sides dealt with technical points of Austrian law. Their Lordships were now divided in opinion, Baron Bramwell and Baron Pigott being in favour of the plaintiff, and the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Martin for the defendant. As is customary in such cases, the junior Baron withdrew his judgment, and a verdict was entered for the defendant.

13.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer intimates that in consequence of the success of Mr. Laing's amendment, placing additional seats at the disposal of the House, 20 would be given to counties, 19 to boroughs, and 1 to the Universities of London and Durham united.

17.—In Committee, Mr. Laing's amendment that six boroughs, having each a population above 150,000, should have three members instead of two, negatived by 247 to 239. On the Government proposal to unite the University of Durham with that of London in returning a representative, a division took place, when an amendment to omit the word "University" was carried by 183 to 169. Next day, the motion to insert the word "Universities" in place of the omitted "University," was carried by 226 to 225; but the motion to insert Durham after London, in the same clause, was rejected by 234 to 226.

— A Conservative meeting, convened in St. James's Hall to protest against the continued agitation of the League, overpowered by a band of Reformers, who forced their way into the building.

— Numerous arrests at Birmingham (632) arising out of the riots connected with anti-Popery lectures. Mr. Whalley, M.P., and Murphy addressed their adherents this evening in the Town-hall, the latter declaring that he would carry out his lecture though they walked across his dead body. The Mayor, who had ordered him to leave the town (he said), was his servant, and must protect him.

18.—After considerable discussion in Convocation, the University of Oxford agree, by a majority of 32 to 31, to grant from the University chest a contribution of 500*l.* towards the fund now being raised for the exploration of Palestine.

19.—Disgraceful trade union disclosures in Sheffield. The Special Commissioners of Inquiry sitting there had a few days since committed a sawgrinder, named James Hallam, to prison for refusing to disclose all he knew regarding the working of the union. He now agreed to tell all, and apparently did so under promise of a certificate of indemnity. The examination thus proceeded. Mr. Overend—On the Saturday night before Linley was shot, were you not seen in Wilson's snug with a pistol in your pocket? (No answer; the prisoner showed signs of distress, his breathing became heavy, and his face wore an expression of anxiety.) Say yes or no. After a slight pause the witness collected himself, and answered: Yes, I was. (Sensation.) Where did you get that pistol from? (No answer.) Where did you get that pistol from? (No answer, the witness looking fixedly at Mr. Overend, and apparently struggling with a choking sensation in the throat.) For what purpose did you buy the pistol? (No answer.) You know, if you tell the truth, you have nothing to be afraid of. You will be entitled to your certificate if you tell the whole truth. Now, I ask you for what purpose did you buy that pistol? (No answer. The witness shook from head to foot.) Answer the question. Now, for what purpose did you buy it? (The witness looked fixedly at Mr. Overend for a few seconds, and then, trembling so violently as scarcely to be able to support himself, he rose from his seat, staggered up to Mr. Overend, and whispered something which could only be heard by the examiners.) Mr. Overend—Oh, we'll give you the indemnity if you will tell the truth. Witness—And the party that was with me too? Mr. Overend—And him too, if he will tell the truth; if he will come forward and ask for his indemnity. Now, I ask you. The witness attempted to stagger back to his seat, but was unable to guide himself to it, and Mr. Jackson supported him. After sitting a second or two in the chair, trembling more violently than ever, he leaned back and fainted. He was laid down upon the floor, and the usual means of restoration were applied, his hands being chafed, a smelling-bottle applied to his nostrils, and brandy poured down his throat. In about five minutes he opened his eyes, made a convulsive snatch at his throat, and relapsed into unconsciousness. He was then carried into an adjoining room, and laid upon an ottoman under an open window. After about a quarter of an hour he was led into court again, weak as an infant, and trembling in every limb. Mr. Overend—Will you tell me for what purpose you bought that pistol? Witness, sadly—To shoot Linley. Was there anybody associated or joined with you in shooting Linley? Yes. Who was it? Crookes. Who shot him—did you or Crookes? The witness was unable for a moment to answer this question; recovering himself, he said, in an all but inaudible whisper—I compelled Crookes to shoot him. Samuel Crookes was afterwards examined, Broadhead calling out, as he stepped into the witness-box, “Tell the truth, Sam; everything.” He confessed to shooting Linley. He had no quarrel with him, nor did he intend to kill him, but Linley was doing a great deal of injury to them at that time, for he was employing a great many boys, and injuring the trade altogether. They spoke to Broadhead about this, and Broadhead agreed to give them, he thought, 20*l*. They were to injure Linley, but not to kill him. Witness did not want to do it then, but Hallam compelled him. Witness wanted to hit him in the shoulder, but Linley was in such a position when he fired that he hit his head.

19.—The Emperor Maximilian shot at Quaretero along with Generals Miramon and Mejia. At the Emperor's request they were all confined together, and passed the greater part of the night preceding their execution in religious exercises. At seven o'clock the notes of a military band were heard, and Captain Gonzalès entered the chapel with bandages to blindfold the prisoners. Miramon submitted to the operation quietly. Mejia refused, and as the captain was about to use force, the Bishop whispered a few words to the General, who then acquiesced. But the Emperor, coming forward, declared that, as to himself, he would not be blindfolded. After a moment's hesitation, Gonzalès, with a friendly salutation to Maximilian, went and took his place at the head of the escorting party. The procession then moved forward, a squadron of Lancers in front, followed by the band playing a funeral march. A battalion of infantry, formed in two lines, composed the remainder of the escort. When it reached the principal gate of the hospital, Mejia said aloud, “Sire, give to us for the last time the example of your noble courage; we follow your Majesty.” The Franciscan friars now appeared, the two in front bearing the cross and holy water, the others holding tapers. Each of the three coffins intended for the doomed men was carried by a group of four Indians; three black crosses, to be fixed where each prisoner knelt for execution, were borne last. Captain Gonzalès then made a sign to Maximilian to move forward. The Emperor advanced courageously, saying to the two generals: “Vamos nos a libertad!” (Let us go to freedom.) The procession slowly ascended the street leading to the cemetery, behind the church, and by the road approaching the aqueduct. It soon came out upon the height overlooking the plain, and seen from below the appearance was most impressive. The Emperor walked first, having the Abbé Fischer on his right, and the Bishop on his left. Immediately behind came Miramon, supported on each side by Franciscans, and Mejia between two priests belonging to the parish of Santa Cruz. When the procession reached the summit of the hill, Maximilian looked steadily for a moment at the rising sun; then, taking out his watch, he pressed a spring which concealed a portrait in miniature of the Empress Charlotte. He kissed it, and handing it to the Abbé Fischer, said: “Carry this souvenir to Europe to my dear wife; and if she be ever able to understand you, say that my eyes closed with the impression of her image, which I shall carry with me above!” The cortège had now reached the great exterior wall of the cemetery, and the bells were slowly tolling for a funeral knell; only those composing the escort were present, for the crowd had been debarred from ascending the hill. Three small benches, with the wooden crosses, were placed against the wall, and the three shooting parties, each having two non-commissioned officers as a reserve for the coup de grâce, approached within a few feet of the prisoners. The Emperor, at the noise made by the movement of the muskets, thought the soldiers were about to fire, and, rapidly turning to his two companions, embraced them most affectionately. Miramon, surprised, very nearly sank upon the seat, where he remained quite helpless, and the Franciscans raised him in their arms. Mejia returned the embrace of Maximilian, whispering some broken words, which were not overheard; he then folded his arms and remained standing. The Bishop, advancing, addressed the Emperor: “Sire, give to Mexico, without any exception, the kiss of reconciliation in my person; let your Majesty, in this supreme moment, accord pardon to all.” The Emperor was unable to conceal the emotion which agitated him; he allowed the Bishop to embrace him; then, raising his voice, he said: “Tell Lopez that I forgive him his treachery; tell all Mexico that I pardon its crime.” His Majesty then pressed the hand of the Abbé Fischer, who, unable to utter a word, sank at the feet of the Emperor, bathing with tears the hand which he kissed. Many present wept bitterly. Maximilian gently extricated his hands, and advancing a step, said with a melancholy smile to the officer commanding the executing party: “A la disposicion de usted.” At this moment, on a sign given by the officer, the muskets were levelled against the Emperor's breast: he murmured a few words in German, and the discharge enveloped the spectators in smoke. Miramon fell heavily to the ground; Mejia remained erect, and waved his arms about. A ball through his head ended his agony. The Emperor fell back upon the cross which sustained his corpse; the body was immediately raised and placed in the coffin, as were those of the two generals. All three were buried without delay in the cemetery, the Bishop giving the absolution. General Corona subsequently summoned the prelate, and demanded the surrender of the letters. The one addressed to the Archduchess Sophia was not opened, as she, being the mother of the Emperor, could not be supposed to receive any dangerous communication from her son. That to the Empress Charlotte was unsealed. It was written in French. "My dear beloved Carlotta,—If God one day permits your recovery, and you read these lines, you will learn the cruelty of the ill-fortune which has unceasingly pursued me since your departure for Europe. You took with you all my chance and all my soul. Why did I not listen to your counsel? So many events, alas! so many sudden blows have broken all my hopes, that death is for me a happy deliverance, and not an agony. I fall gloriously, as a soldier, as a king—vanquished, but not dishonoured. If your sufferings be too great, if God call you speedily to rejoin me, I will bless the Divine hand which has so heavily pressed upon us. Adieu, adieu! Your poor Max."

21.—The excitement regarding the Sheffield trade union outrages culminated to-day in the examination of the arch-plotter Broadhead. His confession was thus summarised:—1. He hired Dennis Clark to blow up Helliwell for being brought into the trade contrary to rule. "We expected if he was admitted a member we should have him on the box, and it was to drive him from the trade he was blown up." Price either 3*l.* or 5*l.* 2. He caused the horse of Elisha Parker to be hamstringed. 3. He hired George Peace to hire some one to shoot Parker. Price 20*l.* to 30*l.* 4. He hired some one (he thought Crookes, the murderer of Linley) to blow up the boilers of Firth & Son. Price 5*l.* 5. He hired Crookes to lame Helliwell. He explained laming to mean "wounding him in one of his limbs so as to prevent him working." Crookes watched him several nights with a gun, and was in the act of firing when another man got in the way. 6. He wrote a threatening letter to Messrs. Firth & Son, of Sheffield, saying, "If I but move my finger you are sent to eternity as sure as fate." 7. He paid Crookes for throwing a canister of gunpowder down the chimney of the house of Samuel Baxter. Baxter had "held himself aloof from the trade," and Broadhead thought he "ought to contribute." 8. He hired Crookes to try and blow up Joseph Wilson's house. Price perhaps 10*l.* 9. He employed Crookes to throw a can of powder down Pool's chimney. The object was "to alarm Linley, who was living with Pool" (his brother-in-law). "Pool has done us no harm whatever." Price 5*l.* or 10*l.* 10. He employed Crookes to blow up Holdsworth, by putting powder in his cellar, for employing non-society men. Price 6*l.* 11. He employed Crookes to blow up Reaney's house for giving Fearnough work. 12. He paid Crookes 15*l.* to blow up Fearnough. 13. He embezzled 30*l.* to pay for shooting Parker. He wrote letters expressing his abhorrence of these acts, "and for that," he says, "I know I shall be held up to the execration of the whole world." Upon making this observation, "he commenced weeping."

29.—Collision on the railway at Walton Junction, near Warrington, a passenger train running into some coal trucks then being shunted. The fore part of the passenger engine was driven into the breaksman's van of the coal train and firmly lodged there. The first two passenger carriages were smashed to pieces, five of the passengers being taken out dead, and thirty-five seriously hurt. Two of the latter died afterwards. This calamity was occasioned by the points not having been shifted when the passenger train came up.

— In the House of Lords the Earl of Derby read a despatch relating to the Emperor Maximilian, which had been received this afternoon from the Paris embassy:—"Moustier has just received a telegram from the French Minister at Mexico, dated the 27th of June. It reports that the Emperor Maximilian was shot on the 19th, in spite of every effort made to save him.

The tone of the victorious party was defiant toward all foreign Powers, including the United States; they refused to give up the Emperor's body. The French Minister was preparing to depart with his legation, but although hitherto unmolested, he thought he might be detained as a hostage for the surrender of General Almonte." "My Lords," the Earl of Derby said, "I must say that I share in the feelings of all your lordships at this most unnecessary, most cruel, and most barbarous murder, which must excite horror in every civilized country. It is a murder purely gratuitous, and so far from producing any beneficial effect, can only add to the miseries of which that unhappy country has been so many years the subject, and which I fear it is only too probable that it will have to sustain for many years to come."

10.—The solicitor to the Jamaica Committee urges Mr. Attorney-General Rolt to institute proceedings against ex-Governor Eyre under the provisions of the Act 42 George III., cap. 85. On the 13th the Attorney-General replied, that having looked over the statement submitted, he saw nothing that could induce him to alter the conclusions at which he had previously arrived.

11.—About 2,400 Belgian volunteers arrive in London, on an invitation from a committee of English riflemen. They were entertained next day by the Lord Mayor, and afterwards visited many places of interest in and about the metropolis. On the 13th they were received by their brother volunteers at Wimbledon, where, though the weather was somewhat unfavourable, the combined troops were reviewed by the Prince of Wales.

12.—The Sultan arrives at Dover on a visit to her Majesty. He was met on landing by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and his tributary, the Viceroy of Egypt, also then on a visit to England. A special train of great length conveyed his Majesty and suite to Charing Cross Station, where a reception was accorded him of extraordinary enthusiasm and splendour. Accompanied by various members of the Royal Family, her Majesty's ministers, and a detachment of Grenadier Guards, the Sultan drove slowly down Parliament Street and along the Mall to Buckingham Palace, the residence set apart for his Majesty. He visited the Queen at Windsor next day. On the 15th a state visit was made to Covent Garden Opera House, and on the 16th he attended a festival performance given in his honour at the Crystal Palace. The fleet was reviewed at Spithead on the 17th, in presence of the Queen, the Sultan, and the Viceroy of Egypt, and on the same evening an entertainment was given to the Sultan by the City corporation in the Guildhall. The series of festive welcomes culminated in a grand reception and ball given by Government in the New India Office on the evening of the 18th. The only private visit made was paid to Lady Palmerston on the 22d. The Sultan left London on the 23d, proceeding to Constantinople by way of Vienna.

15.—The cloud of amendments which had gathered round the Reform Bill in its progress through Committee were this evening cleared off, and the measure read a third time. The occasion was taken advantage of by Lord Cranborne and Mr. Lowe to censure what they described as the vacillating and deceitful conduct of Ministers. "If you borrow your political ethics," said the late Secretary for India, "from the ethics of the political adventurer, you may depend upon it the whole of your representative institutions will crumble beneath your feet. It is only because of that mutual trust in each other by which we ought to be animated, it is only because we believe that expressions and convictions expressed and promises made will be followed by deeds, that we are enabled to carry on this party Government which has led this country to so high a pitch of greatness. I entreat hon. gentlemen opposite not to believe that my feelings on this subject are dictated simply by my hostility to this measure, though I object to it most strongly, as the House is aware. But even if I took a contrary view, if I deemed it to be most advantageous, I still should deeply regret to find that the House of Commons has applauded a policy of legerdemain. And I should above all things regret that this great gift to the people—if gift you think it—should have been purchased by a political betrayal which has no parallel in our parliamentary annals, which strikes at the root of all that mutual confidence which is the very soul of our party Government, and on which only the strength and freedom of our representative institutions can be sustained." Mr. Lowe said: "The right hon. member for Lancashire proposed last year a 5*l.* rating, and he had to give it up. Then comes the hon. member for Birmingham; what does he say? He had been agitating the country for household suffrage—not meaning, as we see by his conduct this session, to get household suffrage. He has got it now, and I ask, is he of opinion that it is easy to stop when you like in the path of concession? The hon. member is something like Don Giovanni—which, by the way, is Italian for John. The Don asked the Commendatore to supper because he thought he could not come; but the Commendatore did come. He said, 'Don Giovanni, you have invited me; and I am here!' (Loud laughter.) That is very much the position of the hon. member for Birmingham. He invited household suffrage, and it has come; you can never stop when once you set the ball rolling. But there was another consideration, and a more elevated one:—I disapproved in my heart of the change that was about to be made, and I ask, are we to be false cowards, who because we are overborne are at once to go over to the enemy? Was Athens to yield up everything after the battle of Chæroneæ? Was England to abandon all her principles after the battle of Hastings? Is it come to this? Are Englishmen shrunk so low that men are to be censured for not shrinking from their principles?

'Cur indecores in limine primo
Deficimus? Cur ante tubam tremor occupat artus?'

But was I to be a prophet? Gentlemen opposite told me that they would not hear of the lowering of the franchise. The gentleman said that if he was offered a franchise of 9*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* he would not accept it. After all their declarations, after accepting our help, that help by which they got into office, was it in human foresight to expect that they would have done what they have done? Was it to be conceived that hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury bench would, for the sake of keeping a few leaders in office for a short time, and getting the patronage of half-a-dozen lawyers and a couple of bishops, give up every conviction, of their lives, would overturn the institutions of their country, for the sake of sitting behind gentlemen who had to listen, with the knowledge that it was true, to such language as that of the noble lord who had just sat down.

'Egregiam vero laudem et spolia ampla refertis.'

You are well rewarded. (Cheers.) How was I to foresee that the middle class, which, to the great benefit of the country had been intrusted with the electoral power, would so tamely and miserably give it up and allow it to be transferred to the poorer classes? How was I to see that the right hon. gentleman, with a body-guard of ducal families, would come forward to overthrow the moderate system under which we live? And yet, unless I had foreseen all this, I am not in any sense guilty, because if right hon. gentlemen had been true to what they said and pledged themselves to last year, we should never have seen what we have—not only a union of the two extremes of society, the highest and the lowest, but the union of the two parties for the same purpose, both hating and detesting each other—the one tied by pledges, the other by party alliances. Therefore I say no one has a right to reproach me if I stood alone. The disgrace is not on me, but on those who, believing what I say, never ventured to say one word on the subject. (Cheers.) . . . I believe it will be absolutely necessary to compel our future masters to learn their letters. (Cheers and laughter.) It will not be unworthy of a Conservative Government, at any rate, to do what can be done in that direction. I was opposed to centralization. I am ready to accept centralization. I was opposed to an education rate. I am now ready to accept it. This question is no longer a religious question; it is a political one. From the moment that you intrust the masses with power, their education becomes an absolute necessity, and I believe that the existing system is one which is much superior to the much-vaunted continental system. But we shall have to destroy it; it is not quality but quantity we shall require. You have placed the government in the hands of the masses, and you must therefore give them education. You must take education up the very first question, and you must press it on without delay for the peace of the country. Sir, I was looking to-day at the head of the lion which was sculptured in Greece during her last agony after the battle of Chæronea, to commemorate that event, and I admired the power and the spirit which portrayed in the face of that noble beast the rage, the disappointment, and the scorn of a perishing nation and of a down-trodden civilization, and I said to myself, 'Oh for an orator, oh for an historian, oh for a poet, who would do the same thing for us!' We also have had our battle of Chæronea; we have had our dishonest victory. That England, that was wont to conquer other nations, has gained a shameful victory over herself; and oh that a man would rise in order that he might set forth in words that could not die, the shame, the rage, the scorn, the indignation, and the despair with which the measure is viewed by every Englishman who is not a slave to the trammels of party, or who is not dazzled by the glare of a temporary and ignoble success!" (Cheers, and loud cries of dissent.)—Mr. Disraeli wound up the debate in a speech of considerable length and power, taking Mr. Lowe to task at its conclusion for the language he had used towards the Government. "Our conduct, according to him, is infamous—that is his statement—because in office we are supporting Parliamentary Reform, which he disapproves, and to which we have hitherto been opposed. Well, if we disapprove the Bill which we are recommending the House to accept and sanction to-night, our conduct certainly is objectionable. If we from the bottom of our hearts believe that the measure which we are now requesting you to pass is not, on the whole, the wisest and best that could be passed under the circumstances, I would even admit that our conduct was infamous. But I want to know what the right hon. gentleman thinks of his own conduct when, having assisted in turning out the Government of Lord Derby in 1859, because they would not reduce the borough franchise—he, if I am not much mistaken, having been one of the most active managers in that intrigue—he accepted office in 1860 under the Government of Lord Palmerston, who brought forward a measure of Parliamentary Reform which he disapproved, and more than disapproved, because he invited his political opponents to defeat it? And yet the right hon. gentleman talks to us of infamy. Sir, the prognostications of evil uttered by the noble lord I can respect, because I know they are sincere—the warnings and the prophecies of the right hon. gentleman I treat in another spirit. I for my part do not believe that the country is in danger. I think England is safe in the race of men who inhabit her, that she is safe in something much more precious than her accumulated capital—her accumulated experience—she is safe in her national character, in her fame, in the tradition of a thousand years, and in that glorious future which I believe awaits her."

16.—The Increase of the Episcopate Bill, permitting the erection of three new sees at Southwell, St. Alban's, and Cornwall, read a second time in the House of Commons by a majority of 45 to 34.

—The House of Lords affirm the decision of the Scotch Court of Session in favour of the claim made by Campbell of Glenfalloch to the Breadalbane estates.

Other newspapers, into which the articles complained of had been copied, were ordered to pay their own costs.

18.—The Earl of Shaftesbury's Bill, providing that no girl under the age of thirteen should be employed in agricultural labour for hire, and that no girl under the age of eighteen should be employed at all in a public gang, read a second time in the House of Lords.

—Ball given to the Belgian Volunteers at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. In anticipation of a visit from the Sultan, the hall was decorated with extraordinary splendour, and supper was set out for over 7,000. The Prince of Wales and many of the nobility were present.

20.—George Britten murders his wife at Woolverton, near Road, by beating her on the head, and then attempts to conceal the crime by setting fire to his house and partly burning the body. He was executed at Taunton on the 29th of August.

22.—Debate in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Reform Bill. In recommending the measure to their lordships, the Earl of Derby said he believed the Bill to be at once large, extensive, and conservative, and if it should receive their sanction, it would effect a settlement that would for a long time be considered satisfactory for a question which, while it remained unsettled, must be a source of perpetual agitation, and an obstruction to all other useful legislation.—Earl Grey, who spoke under evident physical debility, proposed an amendment, that the Bill was at present unsatisfactory, but might be improved in future stages.—The Earl of Carnarvon severely censured the Government for the inconsistent policy they had shown in connexion with the Bill. "Your lordships," he said, "are called to hazard a great experiment in a country of old traditions, and with an area of soil both limited and coveted—on a country whose trade is sensitive, and whose commerce rests on the precarious footing of credit. Even if success were to crown your work, you would not be justified. The mere fact that you are making such an experiment under such circumstances is a sufficient condemnation of it. It is very painful for me to have to speak in these terms of a measure introduced by those with whom I have for a great number of years acted in relations of political and personal friendship; still there are times when even personal feelings are but as dust in the balance, and when even the displeasure of personal and political friends must be cheerfully accepted. I have spoken very freely and very strongly, and it may, perhaps, be thought by some very bitterly also; but there has not in fact been any personal bitterness in what I have said. If, indeed, I had wished to speak bitterly, I could easily have done so. I need only have gone back to those famous speeches of 1846 and 1847, in which the right hon. gentleman, now Chancellor of the Exchequer, made the iron of his sarcasm enter into the soul of one who, whatever the shortcomings of his policy, was, I believe, a high-minded and disinterested statesman." He pleaded with Earl Grey not to press his amendment, as there would be sufficient time to make amendments in committee, and they would enter upon its consideration in a better and higher spirit if the subject were lifted altogether above party prejudice and promise. In the adjourned debate which took place the following evening, the measure was sharply censured by Earl Russell and the Earl of Shaftesbury, and as warmly defended by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns. The Earl of Derby, in replying to the Earl of Carnarvon's disclaimer of personal hostility, said it reminded him of the barrister who said, "'Now, my lord, I have an argument which I will not mention, and it is this.' In the same way my noble friend in substance remarked, 'If I inclined to be bitter, which I won't be, I should allude to a subject which I won't allude to—namely, the conduct of the right hon. gentleman towards Sir Robert Peel in 1846.' Remembering the words of the Psalmist, I would rather say, 'Let the righteous rather smite me friendly, and reprove me.' I confess that I bow my head to the chastisement which my noble friend has thought fit to inflict upon me, and I only thank my stars that, after such an exhibition of his friendship, I am not likewise to incur his hostility. (Laughter.) God help those who are subjected to the outpouring of the venom of his wrath!" All opposition being withdrawn, the Bill was read a second time and sent to committee.

22.—The Empress of the French visits the Queen at Osborne.

— The Scotch Reform Bill read a second time without discussion.

24.—Mr. Fawcett's Bill, throwing open the (638)

Fellowships and Foundation Scholarships of Dublin University to students of all denominations, thrown out by the casting vote of the Speaker, the division showing 108 on each side.

25.—The Tests Abolition (Oxford and Cambridge) Bill thrown out in the House of Lords on a second reading, by a majority of 74 to 46.

26.—In the course of a debate on the Abyssinian captives, Lord Stanley intimates that Government had under their consideration a variety of schemes for organizing an expedition to rescue the prisoners.

29.—In committee on the Reform Bill, Viscount Halifax's resolution, declaring the redistribution clauses insufficient, rejected by 100 to 59. Lord Cairns' amendment to admit the occupants of rooms in halls and colleges carried by 124 to 76, and a second also proposed by him, limiting the lodger franchise to 15% instead of 10%, was carried by 121 against 89. The Earl of Harrowby's amendment, raising the copyhold franchise from 5% to 10%, was carried by 110 to 56.

30.—The Lords in committee reject Earl Grey's proposal to omit the clause of the Reform Bill relating to compound householders by 143 to 43. Lord Lytton's amendment, "That no one should be allowed to vote who could not write legibly," was rejected without a division, as was also the Marquis of Clanricarde's for disqualifying borough freemen. Lord Cairns' proposal, "That no person should vote for more than two candidates (except in the City of London, when three might be voted for)," was carried on a division by 142 against 51.

— The House of Lords give judgment in the appeal raised by Mrs. Yelverton, or Longworth, and argued by her at the bar of the House, to refer the matters in dispute between herself and Major Yelverton to the oath of the latter. In defence, it was pleaded that the case had already been finally decided; that the rights of third parties were involved; and that it involved a charge of bigamy against the respondent. Judgment was now given that reference to oath was inadmissible.

August 1.—Earl Grey's resolution raising the limit at which towns should return two members from 10,000 to 12,000, rejected, after a sharp debate, by 98 votes to 86. Lord Lyveden's proposal to disfranchise all boroughs with less than 5,000 inhabitants was also rejected by 93 to 37.

— Debate on Mr. Seymour's motion, censuring the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal (Sir C. Beadon) for his share in the deplorable series of regulations which had so greatly aggravated the famine in Orissa. The motion was withdrawn after discussion, and the papers requested ordered to be laid before the House.

— The Marquis of Salisbury's voting-papers clause added to the Reform Bill, by a majority of 93 to 27.

1.—Report presented to the Trades' Union Commissioners by the Examiners appointed to inquire into the acts of intimidation and outrage committed in Sheffield. It simply detailed the lawless proceeding of the Unions as established in evidence, and made no recommendation for their future regulation.

5.—The League held another Reform demonstration in Hyde Park, convened by placards, headed "To your tents, O Israel," and calling upon the working classes to express the public indignation at the Parks Prohibition Bill, attempted to be passed through an expiring and self-condemned Parliament by the enemies of all popular rights; and also to protest against the attempt of the House of Lords to rob the lodger of his franchise. The gathering turned out to be insignificant and harmless.

— The committee [on the Ecclesiastical Titles Act] decide by the casting vote of the chairman, to report that the repeal of the Act would in no way enable the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church to assume any civil or temporal precedence within the realms, or cause any detriment or inconvenience to the State, or to any class of her Majesty's subjects. Mr. Walpole and five others dissented.

— On the motion of Earl Russell the House of Lords agreed to restore the lodger qualification in the franchise bill to 10*l.*, as originally fixed by the House of Commons.

6.—Frightful outbreak of cholera at Albano, Italy. During the evening of this, the first day, 117 cases and 15 deaths occurred in a population of 6,000. The Queen Dowager of Naples was among the early victims.

— The Reform Bill read a third time in the House of Lords, Lord Stratheden making an unsuccessful attempt to get a clause inserted empowering the House of Commons after every general election to find seats for persons accidentally excluded, and who might be considered of importance to the country. In closing the debate on the measure the Earl of Derby said: "I have had the honour of holding a seat in one or the other Houses of Parliament for five and forty years, and during that space of time I do not recollect another instance of a measure of such vast importance, and involving such great and extensive change, passing through Parliament with so little display of party spirit, or so little of acerbity and acrimony, as have marked the progress of the Bill to which your lordships have just given your assent. . . I have felt strongly the necessity and the importance of passing this Bill—first of all, because, after being accepted by the House of Commons, its rejection by the other House of Parliament would have been fraught with imminent peril; and next, because I indulged a hope, which I am glad to see has been shared by noble lords opposite, that in the adoption of this Bill we may find the means of putting a stop to continued agitation on a question which, as long as it remained unsettled, only stood in the way of all useful legislation. No doubt we are making a great experiment, and taking a leap in the dark, but I have the greatest confidence in the sound sense of my fellow-countrymen, and I entertain a strong hope that the extended franchise which we are now conferring upon them will be the means of placing the institutions of this country on a firmer basis, and that the passing of the measure will tend to increase the loyalty and contentment of a great portion of her Majesty's subjects."

6.—Mr. Brett's resolution for an address praying that her Majesty would give effect to the recommendation to mercy which the Simla court martial had coupled with its finding against Captain Jervis, negatived by 64 votes to 48.

— In addressing a meeting called at Manchester to protest against the alterations made in the Reform Bill by the House of Lords, Mr. Bright described the changes introduced as "the offspring and spawn of feeble minds." He condemned and repudiated the whole scheme from beginning to end, and said that any one who adopted the principle of the representation of minorities must shake the faith and lose the confidence of every true friend of reform and of freedom.

— Sir F. Wilde delivers the judgment of the Court of Probate in the case of Smith and others v. Tebitt and others. The object of the suit was to establish the validity of the will (which disposed of nearly half a million of property) of Mrs. Thwaites, late of Charmandean, Worthing, and Hyde-park Gardens, London, and the question involved was whether certain grotesque religious delusions under which it was alleged she had for years laboured were such as to affect her testamentary capacity. It was alleged in evidence that the testatrix believed that she was on terms of intimacy with the Creator; that she was the third person in the Trinity; that Dr. Smith was the Father; that they would both assist in the judgment of the world, which would take place in her drawing-room, which she had furnished at great cost, in the conviction that she was there to give birth to the Saviour. Having referred to the alienation from the members of the family, and her relations with Dr. Smith and his brother, Mr. Samuel Smith, his lordship, in conclusion, declared that he could not reconcile her conduct with the action of a sound mind, and that the court should, therefore, pronounce against the will. The will left large legacies, and made Mr. Samuel Smith, who had acted as a sort of manager of her property, residuary legatee. The decision now given was in favour of the relatives, from whom, while living, the testatrix held completely aloof.

8.—Died at Weybridge, Surrey, in her 74th year, Sarah Austin, widow of the author of "The Province of Jurisprudence determined," a translator from the French and German, who had won the praise of the highest critical tribunals, and an active worker in social schemes of practical utility and beneficence.

8.—The Commons consider the Lords' amendments on the Representation of the People Bill. The first, which altered "rate for the relief of the poor" into "poor rate" in clause 3 was rejected, as was also the next, which gave votes to the resident graduates and undergraduates for Oxford and Cambridge cities. Clause 5, giving votes to copyholders of 5*l.* annual value, which the Lords had struck out, was restored after a division of 235 to 188. The clause for restricting the number of candidates to be voted for where there are more than two to be elected was agreed to after a division of 253 to 204, and 258 to 188. The clause providing for the voting by papers was rejected by 258 to 206. Several verbal amendments were also agreed to, and a committee appointed to draw up the reasons to be assigned to the Lords for their dissent.

— The Church Rate Abolition Bill thrown out in the Commons by 82 votes to 24.

12.—President Johnson dismisses Mr. Secretary Stanton from the War Office.

13.—The Sheffield Saw-Grinders' Society, after full deliberation, refuse to expel Broadhead and Crookes, on the ground that the deeds with which their names stood connected were not crimes, but arose from the want of properly regulated tribunals for binding workmen to what was "honourable, just, and good."

— Replying to the toast of the House of Commons at the Lord Mayor's banquet this evening, Mr. Disraeli propounded the newest theory of Toryism: "I have seen, in my time, several monopolies terminated; and recently I have seen the termination of the monopoly of Liberalism. Nor are we to be surprised that when certain persons believed that they had an hereditary right, whenever it was necessary, to renovate the institutions of their country, they should be somewhat displeased that any other persons should presume to interfere with those changes which, I hope in the spirit of true patriotism, they believed the requirements of the State rendered necessary. But I am sure that when the hubbub has subsided—when the shrieks and screams which were heard some time ago, and which have already subsided into sobs and sighs, shall be entirely appeased—nothing more terrible will be discovered to have occurred than that the Tory party has resumed its natural functions in the government of the country. For, my Lord Mayor, what is the Tory party unless it represents national feeling? (Cheers.) If it do not represent national feeling, Toryism is nothing. It does not depend upon hereditary coteries of exclusive nobles. It does not attempt power by attracting to itself the spurious force which may accidentally arise from advocating cosmopolitan principles or talking cosmopolitan jargon. The Tory party is nothing unless it represent and uphold the institutions of the country. (Cheers.) For what are the institutions of the country? They are entirely in theory, and ought to be entirely, as I am glad to see they are likely to be, in practice, the embodiment of the national necessities and the only security for popular privileges. (Cheers.) Well, then, I cannot help believing that because my Lord Derby and his colleagues have taken a happy opportunity to enlarge the privileges of the people of England, we have not done anything but strengthen the institutions of this country, the essence of whose force is that they represent the interests and guard the rights of the people." (Cheers.)

13.—The Public Parks Regulation Bill "talked out" of the House of Commons.

14.—The Cathedral Church of St. Bartholomew, Frankfort, destroyed by fire.

— Mathilde Frigard, thirty-five years of age, tried at the Assize Court, Melun, for the mysterious murder of Sidonia Margaret Mertens in the Forest of Fontainebleau. The deceased was understood to be a widow, of light habits, and possessed of considerable property. Soon after the two became acquainted the prisoner obtained possession of certain deposit receipt books belonging to deceased, and thus became interested in procuring her death. Her attention to Madame Mertens redoubled. She took her out constantly to restaurants, gave her delicious dinners, and induced her to drink wines, which always brought on a strange kind of drowsiness. On May 7, Frigard proposed a trip to Fontainebleau. They arrived at 7 P.M. of that day, and passed the night at the Hôtel de France et d'Angleterre. A letter written by Madame Mertens to a M. Lasserre left no doubt as to the object of the journey in her mind. The next day, May 8, at seven A.M., the two women took a carriage to the forest. The woman Frigard returned alone. She inquired if her friend had come in, and on being answered in the negative, said she had lost her in the forest. She then said she would doubtless find her at the railway station, and added it was not the first time they had parted company when out together. She left for Paris by the quarter-past six train. For several days following, persons going along the Mont Fessart road observed, at a point distant about three kilometres from Fontainebleau, a woman lying on the grass about twenty-five yards off the road, her head concealed by a parasol. At last, on May 13, some one who had seen her in the same position more than once suspected something wrong, went off the road to look closer, and found a corpse in a state of decomposition. The body was lying on the back. The right hand clutched a handful of grass, which seemed to have been torn up in the agony of dying. This corpse was that of Madame Mertens. She had on her a gold chain and several jewels; but her portemonnaie, in which there was at least 300 francs when she left Paris, contained only ten centimes. Her keys—the keys of her lodgings, and the key of her strong box, in which she kept her money and papers—were gone. The position of her bonnet, gloves, and fan showed that death must have surprised her in her sleep. The medical men reported that she must have been suffocated by a simultaneous pressure on the neck with the hand, and on the epigastrium with the knee. Returning to Paris, the prisoner, according to the prosecution, forged documents, which gave her possession of the property of the deceased, and bought the goodwill of a shop in the Rue Montholon. In order to struggle against the evidence, the prisoner introduced on the scene an imaginary personage, to whom she gave the name of Williams. They met him, the prisoner said, near the Franchart Restaurant; she withdrew in order to leave Mertens alone with him; and not seeing anything of them after waiting an hour and a half, she went back to Fontainebleau. Among the witnesses was Kelly, an Englishman. His name was, he said, Williams Kelly, so that he might be the Williams referred to by the prisoner. He was a barrister, but had never practised. He believed he was married to Madame Mertens on February 2, 1862, but was not sure about the date. He believed that he had left her, and not she him, immediately after marriage. He received anonymous letters on the wedding-day, telling him disagreeable things about her. The consequence was that after the wedding in Boulogne, his wife left for England, and he left for Paris. He never knew where his wife lived, and was only made aware of her death by an accidental communication from a friend of what had appeared in the papers. He had no friend or acquaintance of the name of Williams. The jury in the end found Frigid guilty with extenuating circumstances.

15.—Lord Lyttelton's Increase of the Episcopate Bill thrown out in the House of Lords on the discussion for accepting or rejecting the Commons' amendments.

— Royal assent given to the Reform Bill by the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Malmesbury and Lord Colville acting as Commissioners for that purpose. The proceedings were of the ordinary formal and routine kind, and attended by only a few members of Government.

— The House of Lords give judgment in the case of Oakes v. Turquand, and Peek v. Turquand, representative cases put forward to decide the question of liability on the part of certain contributories to the company of Overend, Gurney, and Co. The two appellants were shareholders, and the question was whether they would be relieved from their liability as contributories now that the estate is winding up, on the ground, as alleged by them, that they had been induced to join the company by fraudulent misrepresentations. In the Court below Vice-Chancellor Malins thought that the directors had been guilty of fraud, and if the question had been merely between the company and the appellants, he would have had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the latter were entitled to the relief they sought; but whatever might be their rights against the company, the petitioners could have no right to have their names erased from the list of contributories until the whole of the debts of the company were paid. The Lord Chancellor, in now giving judgment, said these appeals were of the greatest importance, as the decision of their lordships would determine for the future the rights of shareholders under circumstances similar to those here presented. His lordship was of opinion that there had been fraudulent suppression of facts in the prospectus. The distinction between void and voidable contracts was one which must be borne in mind in considering the application of the Companies' Act of 1862. It was a settled rule of law that a contract induced by fraud was not void, but voidable only at the application of the party defrauded. If the company had realized the expectations held out by its prospectus, the appellants would probably have retained their shares, and therefore it must be held that when the order for winding-up came, the agreement was a subsisting one, and the parties were members of the company. With regard to another point, if persons failed to make themselves acquainted with the memorandum of association and the articles, it was to their own detriment. The appellant Oakes had an opportunity during ten months of inspecting the memorandum of association, and his voluntary ignorance, therefore, precluded him altogether from raising an objection on this score. His opinion was that the decree of Vice-Chancellor Malins ought to be affirmed, but with a variation as to costs, which must be borne by each of the appellants in respect of his own case.

17.—Renewal of insurrectionary attempts in Spain. Madrid declared to be under martial law.

18.—Imperial interview at Salzburg between the Emperor Napoleon and the Emperor of Austria, which gave rise to much anxiety and discussion, as the object was generally reported to be the formation of an anti-Prussian alliance.

19.—The Greek blockade-runner Arkaði's captured and destroyed by the Turkish warship Jeddin.

— The Royal Commissioners on Ritualism agree upon their first Report. Directing their earliest attention to vestments, the Commissioners report that they found that "while vestments are regarded by some witnesses as symbolical of doctrine, and by others as a distinctive vesture whereby they desire to do honour to the Holy Communion as the highest act of Christian worship, they are by some regarded as essential, and they give grave offence to many. We are of opinion that it is expedient to restrain, in the public services of the United Church of England and Ireland, all variations in respect of vesture from that which has long been the established usage of the said United Church; and we think this may be best secured by providing aggrieved parishioners with an easy and effectual process for complaint and redress. We are not yet prepared to recommend to your Majesty the best mode of giving effect to these conclusions, with a view at once to secure the objects proposed, and to promote the peace of the Church; but we have thought it our duty in a matter to which great interest is attached, not to delay the communication to your Majesty of the results at which we have already arrived." R. J. Phillimore, Beresford Hope, and T. W. Perry signed the report with explanations.

19.—Sir D. Brewster writes to the Athenæum that the so-called Newton-Pascal correspondence said to have been discovered by M. Chasles, and published in the Comptes Rendus, must be forgeries. He mentioned, among other reasons, that Newton never wrote in French; his letters to Varignon and other French savants were always in Latin—a statement afterwards corroborated by Professor De Morgan, showing from the philosopher's own admission that at the age of thirty-one he could not read French without the continual use of a dictionary.

21.—Parliament prorogued by Commission. The Royal Speech read on the occasion made reference to a peremptory demand addressed to the King of Abyssinia regarding the prisoners, and which would be supported by force if necessary. Among the other measures noticed as having engaged the attention of Parliament was the Reform Bill, and a hope was expressed that the large number of "my subjects admitted for the first time to the exercise of the elective franchise, might discharge the duties devolving upon them in a manner worthy of themselves, and of the confidence which Parliament had reposed in them."

— The Queen visits the Duke of Roxburgh at Floors Castle, on her journey to Balmoral.

— The Mont Cenis Summit Railway (Fell's system) traversed over its whole length of forty-eight miles by an engine and two carriages, conveying the engineers and various officers of the company.

22.—Sixteen journeymen tailors convicted at the Old Bailey of illegally practising the "picket" system in carrying on the strike against the employers. After a suitable admonition from Baron Bramwell, they were dismissed upon their own recognizances to appear for judgment when called on, with the exception of one found guilty of assault in addition, and who was sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

22.—The Sheffield magistrates refuse to grant a renewal of a public-house licence to William Broadhead.

24.—Horrible case of murder and mutilation of a child at Alton. Early in the afternoon, while a band of children were playing in the meadow near Alton Church, a young man came up to the group and to increase their amusement distributed some coppers among them. He spoke in particular to one pretty little girl, named Fanny Adams, and, according to the story of the other children, endeavoured to get her to accompany him into a hop plantation close at hand. Exhibiting an unwillingness to walk in that direction, he lifted her in his arms and carried her off. Later in the day she was missed by her parents, and on search being made the first indication of foul play was the discovery of a pool of blood near the entrance to the plantation. A little further on the searchers came upon the dissevered head of the poor child, resting on two hop poles laid along the ground. Within twenty yards, and between the growing hops, were found a leg and thigh, with a stocking and a boot on; and near the same spot the right arm and hand, severed from the body, were discovered. A little farther to the right the left hand, severed from the wrist, was found, and some distance below were the mutilated remains of the trunk. The other foot, which was the left, was picked up in a field adjoining the hop plantation, where it had evidently been thrown with sufficient force to carry it over two high hedges and an intervening lane. The left arm was also picked up in the same field. At this time the intestines and heart were missing, but on the following Sunday morning further search was made, when both these portions were discovered, the former not far from the spot where the trunk had been found, and the heart in an adjoining field, where it had been thrown. The body displayed several stabs and gashes, the ribs being severely punctured. The calves of the legs and thighs had been completely ripped up, and the intestines entirely removed, leaving the mere frame of the body only. The right ear was picked up in a corner of the hop ground by itself. The eyes were found by a police-constable floating in the river Wye. Suspicion being at once directed against Frederick Baker, clerk in a solicitor's office, he was taken into custody, and several marks of blood discovered on his clothes. In his office desk was also found a diary, recording, in his own handwriting, under date Saturday, 24th August, "Killed a young girl; it was fine and hot." He admitted the writing to be his, and also indirectly confessed to the barbarities. "I did not mean to do it," he said, "but was intoxicated after I saw the women." The circumstances of suspicion were so numerous, and bore so directly on Baker, that he was committed for trial.

25.—Died at his residence, Regent's Park, aged 73, Professor Faraday, the greatest of modern chemists.

26.—When setting out for Lille, the Emperor of the French authorized Baron Rothschild to announce to the financial world, if he so pleased, that his intentions were perfectly pacific. Addressing the President of the Chamber of Commerce at Lille, the Emperor said, "Business would progress better if certain journals did not exaggerate the situation. I hope that commerce will improve with the certainty of peace, and I shall do everything in my power to re-establish confidence."

27.—The municipal authorities of Paris supposed the exhibition of the miraculous cures pretended to have been made, by the Zouave Jacob.

September 3.—At a meeting of the London Working Men's Association, concerned in organizing a Reform Banquet in the Crystal Palace, letters were read from Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone. The former, in declining the invitation in consequence of a visit to Ireland, said: "It would not be candid of me to stop here. I must add, therefore, that I am too uncertain what effects Lord Derby's 'leap in the dark' may produce to be a fit and enthusiastic companion for those who wish to celebrate the passing of the Reform Bill of 1867. Other measures unconnected with the Reform of Parliament appear to me to be necessary to assure the future of this country." Mr. Gladstone wrote: "It appears to me that such a celebration as your committee propose, is amply justified by the great extension of the franchise which has been given by the Act, and that it will tend to create an enhanced sense of the duty which it imposes, as well as the powers and privileges it confers."

4.—Louis Bardier, a currier, residing in Old Kent-road, murders Emma Snow, who resided in his house, and by whom he had three children. The murderer committed the crime after considerable forethought, and the poor victim lived long enough to make a declaration that she was awake by Bardier's application of the knife to her throat. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court, found guilty, and executed on the 15th.

— Trades Union Inquiry opened at Manchester, leading to startling revelations of the tyranny practised by many trade societies, but most perseveringly and systematically by the bricklayers. The outrages particularly spoken to by men who had taken part in them were the midnight attacks at Rusholm, in April 1862, and at Smallshallowfield, near Ashton, in June of the same year.

5.—The Council of India meet for the first time in the new India Office.

7.—Count Bismarck issues a circular to the diplomatic agents of Prussia in Germany, on the subject of the late Salzburg interview. He had heard with great satisfaction the assurance from the Austrian and French governments that the visit of the Emperor Napoleon was due to a sentiment which the Prussian Government honours, and in which it participates, and that the interview of the two sovereigns retained the character of its origin. "According to these explanations, the internal affairs of Germany were not the topic of the conversations of Salzburg in the manner which the first rumour led us to suppose. This fact is particularly fortunate, seeing that the reception which these rumours and suppositions met with in all Germany showed once more how insupportable to the German national sentiment is the idea of seeing the development of the affairs of the German nation put under the tutelage of a foreign element, or governed by other considerations than those which the national interests of Germany demand. From the beginning we imposed on ourselves the task of directing the current of the national development of Germany into a channel where it can produce not a disturbing but a fruitful influence. We have avoided all that could precipitate the national movement, and have sought to improve, and not to excite. These efforts, we venture to hope, will be crowned with success, if foreign powers will avoid, with equal care, everything which can lead the German people to believe that they are the subject of foreign combinations which would legitimately excite their sentiments of dignity and of national independence."

8.—Accident on the Midland Railway, caused by a cattle train running into a ballast train in the Peak Forest Tunnel.

— An International Peace Congress assembles at Geneva under the presidency of Garibaldi. The discussions were conducted in such a disorderly manner that the Conference broke up in confusion on the 12th. When the peace deputies had taken their departure from the Canton, the welcome intelligence was spread abroad, "Geneva is now quiet." In one of his addresses Garibaldi said, "It is no longer 'Rome or death,' it is 'Rome and life.' Our enemies are not the priests only; our chief enemy is the French Emperor. There is no Italy without Rome. We are told that there are 40,000 there. If we make a new appeal we shall not be 40,000, but 1,000,000, and united with a brave army we shall accomplish our redemption. Many of us are accustomed to the fire of battle, but we shall not bestow the honour of the bayonet on mercenaries and priests. We shall bundle them out with the butt-ends of our guns."

— The last of the Prussian troops leave Luxemburg.

18.—Fenian rescue at Manchester, and murder of Police-sergeant Brett. Some days since two men were arrested as vagrants in the city; and in the course of their examination before the magistrate, it turned out that they were the two prominent Fenian conspirators known as "Colonel" Kelly and "Captain" Deasy. Remanded for further inquiry, they were this afternoon about to be removed in the police-van to the gaol, a short distance from the city. Before the van started the police observed some indications that a rescue was attempted. Two men were seen hovering in a suspicious manner about the precincts of the court, and one of them was apprehended, though not till he had drawn a dagger and attempted to wound his captor. In consequence of this it was thought necessary to put Kelly and Deasy in irons before taking them to the van, which was guarded by eleven policemen. As it proved, however, far more formidable precautions were necessary. The van had proceeded down Hyde Road to a point where it is crossed by a viaduct, when a volley was suddenly fired into it, and a party of between thirty and forty Fenians, well armed, rushed upon the policemen. The attacking party appeared to be under the command of a man named William O'Meara Allen, who received a signal of the approach of the van from a man walking along the road with a crutch. He stepped into the road, firing a revolver, first at the driver, then at a policeman seated on the box, and subsequently at the horses, which were killed. The van being thus stopped, was immediately surrounded, and a confused encounter took place, in which the police were for a few minutes completely beaten off. The sergeant in charge inside the van refusing to open the door, Allen fired a pistol through the ventilator, and wounded him so severely that he died in a short time. The door was then forced open, the keys of the inner apartments taken from Brett's person, and the two ironed Fenians liberated from their boxes. The attack, as it appeared to a female prisoner in the open lobby of the van, was thus described: "I heard a sound like a large stone being thrown at the side of the van, and then a pistol fired, like as it were at the horse's head, in front. Then some one came to the back of the van, at the outside, and the trap-door was opened. It had been open on the swivel all the time we were going. Brett closed the trap, but did not fasten it. Some one came and began to knock at the back of the door. Brett looked through the ventilator, and said, 'Oh, my God, it's these Fenians!' The women began to scream, and said they should all be killed. The man outside then asked Brett to give him the keys, but he would not, although the attacking party promised they would do no harm beyond letting two men out of the van. Brett said, 'No, I will stick to my post to the last.' Some one then on the top of the van got a large stone and beat a hole through above Brett. The women said, as they were pulling him back, 'You'll be killed,' as a stone was then being forced into the trap, and Brett could not close it again. A man came and put a pistol through the trap, as Brett was looking through the higher part of the ventilator. I pulled him back then, crying, "Oh, Charlie, come away; look there." When I was doing this his head came on a level with the trap, and the pistol was then discharged. Brett fell in a stooping position against the door. Allen came to the door and asked for the keys, but we said we dare not give them up. He threatened to blow our brains out if we did not, when another woman took the keys out of Brett's pocket, and handed them through the opening." The police soon succeeded in apprehending Allen, and two other prominent actors named Larkin and Gould, but Kelly and Deasy managed to elude their vigilance.

19.—At the harvest-home at Hughenden, Mr. Disraeli carefully omitted all allusion to party warfare on the plea that he was not "quite up to politics" in September. His address had reference mainly to the cultivation of the soil and the improvement of labourers' dwellings.

—The new docks at Barrow-on-Furness opened with great display and ceremony, the inaugural banquet being attended by the Dukes of Devonshire and Buccleuch, Mr. Gladstone, numerous members of Parliament, and a host of city dignitaries. In the course of the evening Mr. Gladstone proposed the toast of "The Town and Trade of Barrow," which twenty years since was a hamlet with a population of less than 400, but, through the discovery of a rich bed of ironstone, was now ringing with the industry of 17,000.

21.—In answer to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dean Stanley writes that he hesitates to take upon himself the responsibility of granting the use of Westminster Abbey to the members of the Lambeth Conference, but he would be very glad if they could see their way to attend there for the promotion of some special object in connexion with home or foreign missions of unquestioned importance, or "for the promotion of brotherly good-will and mutual edification amongst all members of the Anglican communion." The Archbishop replied, regretting "that we shall not be able to avail ourselves of your kind offer under the specified conditions. It is obvious from the tenor of your letter that the Abbey is not open to us."

24.—The Pan-Anglican Synod commences its sittings at Lambeth. The opening sermon was delivered by the Bishop of Illinois. There were 78 prelates present, of whom 18 were English, 9 Irish, 7 Scotch, 23 from British colonies, and 21 from the United States of America. The subjects discussed were (1) The best way of promoting the reunion of Christendom; (2) The notification of the establishment of new sees; (3) Letters commendatory from clergymen and laymen passing to distant dioceses; (4) Subordination in our Colonial Church to Metropolitan; (5) Court of the Metropolitan; (6) Questions of Appeal; (7) Condition of Union with the Church at home; (8) Notification of proposed missionary bishop-rics; (9) Subordination of missionaries. In connexion with the Conference, a series of public services took place at the church of St. Lawrence, Jewry.

24.—The Italian Government issue a proclamation, designed to check the Garibaldian agitation, which, “under the glorious name of Rome, is trying to force the country to violate international stipulations consecrated by the vote of the Parliament and the honour of the nation. In a free State no citizen can rise above the law, or substitute himself in the place of the high powers of the nation, and thus disturb, by violent means, the organization of the country, and lead her into the gravest complications.”

— Garibaldi arrested in Sinalunga, Arezzo, by order of the Italian Government, when organizing measures for invading the Pontifical territory. There was a slight attempt at disturbance in consequence in several Italian cities, but it was put down without bloodshed. Garibaldi was taken in the first instance to Alexandria, but afterwards permitted to proceed home to Caprera.

— Allocation pronounced by the Pope, deploring and rebuking the great injuries and the serious wrongs inflicted for several years by the sub-Alpine Government, “in despite of all Divine and human laws, as well as ecclesiastical censures and punishments, upon the Catholic Church, upon us [and this Apostolic seat, upon the bishops and ministers, upon the religious orders of both sexes, and upon other pious institutions.”

26.—The prisoners implicated in the Fenian outrage at Manchester examined before the sitting magistrate at the police court. Their safe-conduct from the city gaol to the court was secured by an escort of horse and foot soldiers, and the van in which they were confined was driven at a rapid pace through the streets. An application made by counsel for the removal of the handcuffs from all the prisoners was disallowed, on the plea that the police-officers were responsible for their safety, and knew best what was necessary to secure it. The result of the examination was that twenty-seven of the prisoners were charged with murder, and remanded.

28.—McDonnell, a bandsman of the 2d Life Guards, shot in Vernon-place, Bloomsbury-square, by a person presumed to be acting in Fenian interests.

30.—Reform fête at the Crystal Palace.

October 1.—In the Church Congress presently sitting at Wolverhampton an important debate takes place to-day on “the best means of bringing Nonconformists into union with the Church.”

2.—The new docks at Belfast opened by the Lord Lieutenant.

— Lord Brougham writes to the Globe: “Lord Brougham has attained his ninetieth year, and is anxious about the course things are to take after him. His most important death-bed legacy is the repression of electoral corruptions. These want no new laws, but the vigorous improvement of the existing laws. The law is clear that the ex-official power is sufficient to arm the Government with all proper authority.”

2.—Panic on the French Bourse, originating in unfounded reports concerning the Emperor's health, and warlike intentions.

3.—In addressing his constituents at Elgin, Mr. Grant Duff said that democracy lay before them on a not very distant horizon. The wisest course for all was to accept the inevitable, and take care that all our political and social arrangements should be reviewed during the next thirty years. He commented with some severity on the conduct of Lord Elcho and the Adullamite party. “These more or less moon-struck gentlemen found a congenial leader in a distinguished person, who would seem to labour under the strange hallucination that he is the dispenser of oracles, ‘the lord of life, and poesy, and light.’ How is it that he never rises even to strike down the peaceable representative of Perth without seeming to say, by gesture if not by word of mouth,

‘I am the eye by which the universe
Beholds itself, and knows itself Divine.’

Against two of us north country members, Mr. Dyce Nicol and myself—poor children of the Arctic night—humble but harmless creatures—this bright being has been of late discharging his shafts; but the lightning of Jove hallows that which it strikes, and why not the missiles of an allied and hardly less exalted divinity.”

— The Empress of the French and the Prince Imperial narrowly escape drowning at St. Jean de Luz.

7.—The advance brigade of the Abyssinian expedition leaves the harbour of Bombay. They landed at Zulla on the 21st.

— Dr. Smith, formerly senior physician to the Royal Berks Hospital, commits suicide while labouring under mental depression.

— Fire in Stephen's ship-building yard, Dundee, destroying two vessels ready for launching, the most of the timber in that and an adjoining yard, and all the working sheds. The damage was set down at 60,000.

9.—Explosion in Hammond's fire-work factory, Canongate, Edinburgh, causing the death of five persons, and serious injury to eleven. The thickly-peopled tenement in which the disaster occurred was either destroyed by the violence of the explosion, or the fire which succeeded. The city was still further excited by a calamitous fire which took place in the same neighbourhood the following night, commencing in a tan-yard in Gray's Close, off the High-street, and spreading with alarming rapidity among the crowded dwellings adjoining. The sense of public insecurity was excited to an alarming degree by a rumour, circulated during the height of the disaster, that a party of Fenian conspirators had set fire to the General Post Office, the windows of which were lighted up by the conflagration.

10.—The modification of the Concordat discussed in the Austrian Lower House of the Reichsrath.

— Earl Russell writes from Raby Castle to contradict a paragraph which had appeared in the John Bull, that he had fallen down in a fit during his recent visit to Ireland.

— Fire at Dalhousie Castle, near Edinburgh, destroying a portion of the building and various articles of furniture.

13.—Engagement between Garibaldian and Papal troops at Monte Libretto. The General made his escape from Caprera next day.

15.—Scene at Newgate, at the execution of John Wiggins, for the murder of Agnes Oaks, with whom he lived. He refused to advance on to the drop, seized the rope with his hand, and kept screaming convulsively for several minutes that he was innocent. After a severe struggle the warders got the rope out of his grasp, and kept him by force on the drop till Calcraft made the necessary preparations for drawing the bolt. The Frenchman, Bardier, was executed at the same time, at Horsemonger-lane, for the murder of his paramour, Ann Snow.

16.—At a banquet given at Dublin to Father Lavelle, of Partry, the health of the Archbishop of Tuam was proposed, as “a prelate venerable in years, mild as a child, pure as a virgin, holy as St. Patrick, and patriotic as Heber M’Mahon or Lawrence O’Toole.” In addressing the company, Father Lavelle said that resistance to authority, simply as such, was never condemned by the Irish Church. The only societies ever condemned by the Church were those that conspired against honest and legitimate authority; and, so far from cursing or condemning people honestly standing up in their might against unjust authority, the Church of God in her mercy and wisdom bestowed upon them her divinest blessing.

17.—Lord Derby entertained at a banquet in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. In responding to the toast of “the health of the Premier,” his lordship defended the policy of the Government with reference to Reform, contrasting the stability of the principle on which it was settled with the shifting schemes of the Opposition, and expressing a belief that classes enfranchised by its operation would discharge their trust honestly and with advantage to all interests in the kingdom. He had been taken to task for describing the measure as “a leap in the dark,” but he was not inclined to withdraw the phrase, though its use by him was possibly imprudent. Noticing a current report that he intended to resign, Lord Derby said he had not the slightest intention of doing so. “At my time of life, with the increasing frequency of these attacks, which from time to time unfit me for the discharge of public business, it is impossible I can look forward to any very lengthened period of public service, but I have no present intention of relinquishing the position which I hold by the favour of my Sovereign, and the support of the great Conservative party.”

19.—Tailors’ strike terminated in the metropolis.

21.—The King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria meet at Oss.

— John Thomas Bell, otherwise known as “the Hon. Mr. Bruce,” sentenced to five years’ penal servitude for stealing rings and other articles, valued at 800*l.*, from the bedroom of the Marchioness of Hastings at an hotel in Albemarle-street. When arrested the prisoner stated that he met a lady he did not know in Bond-street, spoke to her, went with her to her house, and was presented by her with the rings—a story which, fostered perhaps by the magistrate talking of “mystery,” gave rise to various scandals.

22.—Garibaldi, having escaped from Caprera, harangues the people of Florence, and starts to join the insurgent bands on the Roman frontier. He also issued the following proclamation:—“Italians, at Rome our brothers are raising barricades, and since yesterday evening they have been fighting against the bravos of Papal tyranny. Italy expects of us that every one will do his duty.”

— Insurrectionary movement in Rome, leading to various desultory engagements between the Papal troops and insurgent volunteers. The most serious feature in the outbreak was the blowing up of the Serristori Barracks, which led to the death of between thirty and forty Zouaves. (See Nov. 24, 1868.)

— At the adjourned inquest on the body of the bandsman M’Donnell, a female witness, named Janman, who pretended to have witnessed the attack, broke down in cross-examination, and a police inspector gave it as the result of inquiries at Diss and Chichester that she was a “notorious liar and schemer.”

— Intimation given in the Moniteur that France did not intend to proceed with any armed intervention in favour of Rome.

23.—Intelligence received by the Cape mail that Dr. Livingstone had been seen alive beyond the scene of his reputed murder.

— Special Commission opened at Manchester for the trial of the twenty-six Fenian prisoners charged with attacking the policeman and murdering Police-sergeant Brett. In charging the grand jury, Mr. Justice Blackburn said: “Not as a matter of law, but as a matter of practical common sense, he must say it could not be doubted that those who continued the attack on the police after fire-arms had been used—continuing to aid and assist those who they knew intended dangerous violence—which did in fact cause the death of the unfortunate man Brett, were concerned in the common design of using dangerous violence against the police, and guilty of murder, though they might have had no ill-will against Brett individually. It was possible they did not know that Brett was in the van—they might not even know of his existence—yet still they were all responsible for the act that one of their company committed in carrying out the common design of using dangerous violence towards any of the police who might resist their efforts in procuring the rescue of the prisoners. All who were engaged in the common design were guilty of murder equally with the man who fired the shot. The only difficulty in considering the case was in regard to the number of the prisoners concerned in the attack. He need not tell them that the case against each individual prisoner was to be looked at as the evidence bore upon him in particular. They would have to look to the design, which resulted in the death of Brett,—whether the prisoner was doing such acts, and conducting himself in such a way as to lead to the conclusion that he was one who had this common end in view; and they must consider that point in regard to each individual prisoner." The grand jury retired for upwards of an hour, and returned with a true bill against Allen, Larkin, Gould, Maguire, and Shore. An attempt made to remove the trial to the Central Criminal Court was at once disposed of by Mr. Justice Blackburn as impossible, seeing they were there under a Special Commission issued on the advice of the responsible advisers of the Crown, and the judges could do nothing to contradict or defeat the special object for which they were sent.

23.—The Emperor of Austria arrives in Paris on a visit to the Emperor Napoleon.

25.—Circular issued to diplomatic agents by the French Government explanatory of its position towards Italy, and suggesting a Congress for the settlement of the Roman question. "As soon," it was said, "as the Pontifical territory shall be liberated, and security is re-established, we shall have accomplished our task, and we shall withdraw."

— General Cialdini being unable to form a Government at Florence, the task was undertaken by General Menabrea, formerly Ambassador at Vienna.

26.—A French iron-clad squadron leaves Toulon for Civita Vecchia with troops to support the Pope.

— Garibaldi, at the head of four battalions of volunteers, defeats the Pontifical troops at Monte Rotondo.

27.—The King of Italy issues a proclamation to put down the insurgents on the frontier, as bands "excited and seduced by a party without my authorization, or that of my Government. . . The dangers which disorders and rash schemes may create amongst us must be opposed by maintaining the firm authority of the Government and the inviolability of the laws. The honour of the country is in my hands, and the confidence the nation has shown in me during the saddest periods cannot fail me. When calm shall be restored to men's minds, and public order shall be fully re-established, according to the vote of Parliament, my Government, in agreement with that of France, will endeavour with all loyalty to make a practicable arrangement calculated to put an end to the serious and important Roman question."

27.—The King of Greece married at St. Petersburg to the Grand Duchess Olga Constantinovna.

29.—A destructive hurricane sweeps across the West India islands, the first despatch reporting the Rhone lost at Peter Island, the Wye at Buck Island, the Corway at Tortola, the Dervent ashore at St. Thomas, the Tyne and Solent dismasted, but serviceable. St. Thomas presented one wide scene of desolation and death, as many as 500 lives being reported as lost. The island of Tortola was said to have been completely submerged with all the inhabitants, and though more exact information showed this to be an exaggeration, it was found that little in the way of either life or produce had been left on the island.

— Conservative banquet given to Mr. Disraeli in the Corn Exchange, Edinburgh. The hall was crowded, about 1,300 sitting down to dinner, and 120 ladies (among whom was Mrs. Disraeli) accommodated in a gallery at the lower end of the room. In acknowledging the enthusiastic manner in which his health had been toasted, the Chancellor of the Exchequer took occasion to vindicate the Government scheme of Reform, by showing that the Conservative party were quite at liberty to deal with it, and that they had so dealt with it as to make something like a permanent settlement:—"Seven memorable years elapsed from 1859. to 1866, when Lord Derby was called again to power, and during these seven years the question of Parliamentary Reform was before the public mind and under the examination of Parliament. During that period of seven years, with the advice—I may say under the instructions—of my colleagues, I expressed the principles upon which any measure of Parliamentary Reform ought to be established. Now, mark this, because there are things which you may not have heard in any speech which has been made in the city of Edinburgh. (Laughter.) I had to prepare the mind of the country, and to educate—if it be not arrogant to use such a phrase—to educate our party. It is a large party, and requires its attention to be called to questions of this kind with some pressure. I had to prepare the mind of Parliament and of the country on this question of Reform." Mr. Disraeli made allusion to the absence of Sir John Sinclair, who had declined to let his name be placed on the Committee. "Pardon," he said, "some feeling on my part, when I remember that it is in consequence of my conduct—in consequence of our unprincipled withdrawal of securities, and the betrayal of our friends, who insisted upon being betrayed, that I miss to-day the presence of one of my oldest and most valued friends. I should have liked to have been welcomed by his cordial heart, and with the ripe scholarship which no one appreciated more than myself. He has commemorated the withdrawal of his confidence in a letter, which, strange to say, has not a quotation. (A laugh.) No one could have furnished a happier one. I can picture him, Sir—I can picture him to myself at this moment, in the castellated shades of Thurso, with the Edinburgh Review on one side, and on the other the 'Conservative Surrender.' (Laughter and loud cheers, which were again and again renewed.) The man who has written the summary of the session in the Edinburgh is not mounted, I fear, on the fiery barb of Francis Jeffrey. I should say that the article was written by a very clever man, who has made a very great mistake. I see many gentlemen who have doubtless been, as magistrates, like myself, inspectors of peculiar asylums. (Laughter.) You meet there some cases which I have always thought at the same time the most absurd and the most distressing. It is when the inmate believes that all the world is mad, and that he himself is alone sane. (Laughter, and loud and continued cheering.) But to pass from such gloomy images. Really these Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews no one more admires than myself. But I admire them as I do first-class, first-rate post-houses, which in old days, for half-a-century or so, to use a Manchester phrase, 'carried on a roaring trade.' Then there comes some revolution of progress which nobody can ever have contemplated. They find things are altered. Boots of the 'Blue Bell' and the chambermaid of the 'Red Lion' embrace, and they are quite of accord in this—in denouncing the infamy of railroads." (Laughter and cheers.) Having stated his conviction that it was not only the interest but the intention of the great Powers of Europe to favour permanently the cause of peace, Mr. Disraeli concluded:—"I am the last man who would attempt to depreciate the difficulties which a British Minister has to meet, or would attempt to exaggerate the qualities which my colleagues possess. Indeed, when I remember the interests of these British isles, so vast, so various, and so complicated—when I even recall to recollection the differences of race, which, however blended, leave a very significant characteristic—when I recollect that the great majority of the population of the United Kingdom rise every day and depend for their daily sustenance on their daily labour—when I recollect the delicate nature of our credit, more wonderful in my opinion than all our accumulated capital—when I remember that it is on the common sense, the prudence, and the courage of a community thus circumstanced, that depends the fate of uncouth millions in ancient provinces, and that around the globe there is a circle of domestic settlements that watch us for example and inspiration—when I know that not a sun rises upon a British Minister that does not bring him care, and even inexpressible anxiety—an unexpected war, a disturbed and discontented colony, a pestilence, a famine, a mutiny, a declining trade, a decaying revenue, a collapse of credit, perhaps some insane and fantastic conspiracy—I declare I feel very often, I wonder where there is the strength of heart to deal with such colossal circumstances. (Hear, hear.) But when I withdraw from the pressure of individual interest, and take a larger and deeper view of human affairs, I recognise that in this country, whatever may have been the tumult and the turmoil of our now almost countless generations, there have been three master influences that have at all times controlled and commanded our powers and passions, and they are industry, liberty, and religion. (Hear, hear.) So long as this sacred combination influences the destiny of this country, it will not die—history will recognise its life, not record its decline and fall. (Cheers.) It will say, this is a great and understanding people, and it is from such materials we make the magnificence of the nation establish the splendour of the terrestrial globe."

30.—General Menabrea, the new Italian Premier, issues a diplomatic note announcing that his Government had now authorized the advance of troops across the frontier. Three days later the following appeared in the official Gazette:—"The French Moniteur having announced that the French flag waves upon the walls of Civita Vecchia, the Government of the King, in conformity with the declarations made by it previously to friendly Powers, and in view of such an eventuality, has given the order to the royal troops to cross the frontier and occupy certain points in the Pontifical territory."

— The French troops, under General Dumont, enter Rome. They were said to have been silently and sullenly received, but without any open manifestation of hostilities.

— Freedom of the city of Edinburgh conferred upon Mr. Disraeli. The University also honoured him with the degree of LL.D. along with Mr. Lowe, M.P., then on a visit to the city to address the members of the Philosophical Institution on the subject of "Education, Primary and Classical."

31.—Orange demonstration at Hillsborough, presided over by the Marquis of Downshire. The proceedings were orderly.

— Died, at Monkston, aged 67, the Earl of Rosse, celebrated for the monster telescope constructed by himself at Birr Castle.

— Two police constables shot in Dublin early this morning while on duty.

November 1.— A cyclone of great fury bursts over Bengal. In the city of Calcutta it was reported to be even more destructive than that of 1864. It was calculated that as many as 1,000 lives were lost, and 30,000 native huts swept away. About 3 P.M. the barometer began to fall, and the wind came down in fierce gusts. At dusk it increased slightly in violence. By 10 P.M. the fastenings of doors and windows began to be severely tested, and the storm (writes a witness) rushed over the city with a fierce, murmuring roar, like a heavy surf beating on a shingle beach. This roar never lulled till daybreak, but every minute swelled up into a tempest of wind and rain, marking the approach of furious squalls. The hurricane fortunately swept down the river, and had thus to battle with the tide, instead of bringing with it so dreaded an auxiliary as the storm wave. The ships in harbour were therefore enabled to ride out the storm with less injury than might have been anticipated.

— Dr. Norman Macleod and Dr. Watson entertained at dinner in Willis's Rooms preparatory to leaving for India as a deputation to the Scotch Presbyterian mission there.

— The Marquis de Moustier forwards a despatch to Florence strongly condemning the occupation of Papal territory by the King's troops. "However the Italian intervention in the States of the Holy See may be restricted, with whatever promptness it may come, and by whatever circumspection it may be surrounded, the French Government, which, as an adviser, has always blamed such a step, could not now in any way invest it with its approval. If the Government of the King of Italy believes that he may expect from us even a tacit adhesion, such a belief is an illusion which we must not hesitate to dispel."

— Conviction of Fenian prisoners at Manchester. The evidence for the Crown went to show that Allen used a hammer and stones upon the door of the van, trying to break it open, and that he fired the shot which killed Brett, after threatening to shoot him unless he gave up the keys. He also shot a constable in the leg, and a bystander in the foot; and repeatedly threatened to "blow out the brains" of any one who came near him to interfere. Larkin hammered with a stone at the door of the van, and took an active part in the stone-throwing. He also fired three shots at one policeman without effect. Gould fired a shot which grazed a policeman's coat. Shore was proved to have thrown stones; but of Maguire it was only established that he was "loafing about" with Allen and Gould before the outrage, and handed up stones to a man at the top of the van. For others an alibi was set up, and, sometimes under the correction of the judges, Mr. Seymour did what he could for the prisoners by getting the witnesses to contradict themselves. After an absence of two hours the jury returned a verdict of Guilty against all the five prisoners. Allen expressed himself as pleased with his position; Larkin said his life had been sworn away falsely; Gould claimed the protection due to an American citizen. Shore and Maguire denied being present, the latter referring to the ten years he had spent in her Majesty's navy as a proof that he was not likely to be a conspirator. All expressed regret for the death of Brett. Sentence of death was passed by Mr. Justice Mellor.

1.—The new Metropolitan Street Traffic Act comes into operation.

2.—Dinner given to Charles Dickens, in the Freemasons' Tavern, before his departure on a tour through America.

3.—Garibaldi abandons his position at Monte Rotondo, with the object, as he explained, of first concentrating the volunteer forces at Tivoli, and then withdrawing from all active participation in the insurrection. "We shall now look on," he said, "as spectators, and await the solution which our troops and the French army will give to the Roman problem; and, in the event of that solution not being in conformity with the wishes of the nation, the country will find within itself fresh forces to begin again and solve the vital question by itself."

— Paris Exhibition closed.

4.—In addressing the Lord Mayor elect (Allen) on presentation, the Lord Chancellor said:—"With regard to the rights and privileges of the Corporation, this is an age in which nothing can be expected to stand on foundations of mere custom and antiquity. . . If anything requires reformation, you will do well to apply your mind to it with that view, instead of allowing a rude hand to be laid upon these rights and privileges, which may sweep them away entirely." The ancient state coach was dispensed with this year in the procession.

— Bread riots at Exeter. The military called out, and Riot Act read.

— After a series of sharp engagements the Garibaldian garrison of Mentana capitulate to the united Papal and French troops.

— Garibaldi arrested at Figline on his journey to Caprera, and carried to Spezzia. The general protested against the act, and claimed the protection due to an Italian deputy and an American citizen. He was released on the 26th.

5.—On this and the following evening a Garibaldian demonstration, amounting to a serious insurrection, takes place in Milan.

— The Gazette announces the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into, and report upon, the Irish Church, its revenues and incumbrances, as well as their management, administration, and distribution.

— Commencement of a series of riots at Oxford arising out of the usual disorderly celebration of Guy Fawkes' Day, combined with some irritation at the price of bread.

6.—The second batch of Fenian prisoners (649) at Manchester acquitted of the charge of murder. The remaining lot were dismissed next day.

7.—The Canadian United Parliament of the New Dominion opened at Ottawa for the first time with great ceremony by Lord Monck.

8.—Disastrous explosion in the Ferndale Colliery, Rhondda Vach Valley, South Wales. About 170 men and boys went down in the morning to the four-fathom seam, where the famous Merthyr steam coal was wrought. Things went on as usual till shortly after one o'clock, when an explosion occurred which shook the pit and set the whole workings in a blaze. Three men employed at the bottom of the shaft to hitch the trams on the carriage were blown away, two of them being killed, and the third escaping in an extraordinary manner without injury. The blast then ascended the shaft with a tremendous roar, and drove the men at the top from their posts. As soon as the shaft was sufficiently clear to permit of a descent being made, an exploring party entered the workings, and made the sad discovery that there could not be more than two or three survivors of all the company of workmen who were engaged in the pit. The roley ways being blocked up in many places by masses of fallen coal, the work of recovering the bodies was often difficult, and always dangerous, but within a week they were nearly all got at and sent to the pit-mouth, which was surrounded day and night by distressed relatives and spectators.

11.—Conservative demonstration in the Crystal Palace, composed chiefly of the working men of the metropolis. Lord John Manners addressed the company after dinner on the political future of England.

12.—Admiral Tegethoff is permitted to leave Mexico with the body of the Emperor Maximilian.

15.—This evening the following appalling, and, as it turned out, exaggerated, intelligence was received by the Atlantic Cable:—"New York, November 15, 6 P.M. The island of Tortola has been submerged; 10,000 lives were lost." (See Oct. 29.)

16.—The three Fenian leaders, "Colonel" Warren, "General" Halpin, and "Captain" Costello, found guilty of treason-felony at the Dublin Special Commission, were brought up for judgment, and sentenced—the two first-mentioned to fifteen years' and the last to twelve years' penal servitude. All three claimed to be citizens of the United States, and made violent speeches, Warren declaring that he "would not give 37½ cents for a lease of the British Constitution."

—Died, aged 80 years, Madame de Flahault, a prominent member of the upper diplomatic circles in Europe, and a grand-daughter of Thrale, the friend of Dr. Johnson.

18.—The French Chambers opened by the Emperor. His Majesty was at pains to declare (650) that he "accepts frankly" the changes which have taken place in Germany. As to the occupation of Rome, he explained that it was only provisional; that the September Convention existed for him only till it was replaced by a new international act; that he had invited a conference to meet; and that the speedy recall of his army might be anticipated.

18.—A deputation of Fenian sympathisers, headed by one Finlen, force their way into the Home Office for the purpose of urging a commutation of the sentence of death passed upon the Manchester murderers. Mr. Gathorne Hardy refusing to see them, a letter was handed to Finlen on the stairs by one of the office-keepers, who also intimated that no noisy discussion could be permitted. Finlen thereupon peremptorily ordered him to hold his tongue, telling him that he was "a mere servant of the place, and not a member of the deputation." A discussion followed, and several speeches of a threatening character were made. Mr. Hardy's request, through the door-keeper, that they would withdraw, was received with derisive groans and hisses. Finlen again addressed the wonder-stricken door-keeper, "We are going, sir; stand back;" then turning to the mob, who kept possession of the stairs and lobbies, "We will use every effort, thew and muscle, to save these men's lives. They shall not be sacrificed. I would turn all the Tory Governments into the sea rather than see these brave, plucky, and glorious Fenians immolated in the way it is intended to do. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Hardy is in that room, and he and his colleagues must know that it shall be proclaimed far and wide that if these men's lives are sacrificed, their own lives will not be held sacred, or their position as advisers of a good and gracious Queen maintained in the face of such paltry, bloody, and miserable conduct." This noisy, and for the place unprecedented display, was cut short by the entrance of the police, who summarily turned out the intruders while declaring that they would hold torch-light meetings nightly, and solicit help from all the large towns in the kingdom.

19.—Meeting of Ritualists in St. James's Hall to adopt a memorial to the Royal Commissioners that it was inexpedient to promote any alteration of the existing law, or in any way to restrain the lawful liberty of the clergy and the right of the laity.

—Parliament opened by Commission, the Royal Speech making mention that it was called together at this unusual season mainly to sanction the expedition which it had been judged necessary to organize for the purpose of rescuing the helpless captives in Abyssinia. "I confidently rely upon the support and co-operation of my Parliament in my endeavour at once to relieve their countrymen from an unjust imprisonment, and to vindicate the honour of my Crown." Referring to the disturbance in Italy, a hope was expressed now that the object for which interference had been made was accomplished, that the Emperor Napoleon would find himself enabled, by an early withdrawal of his troops, to remove any possible grounds of misunderstanding between his Majesty and the King of Italy. Reform bills were promised for Scotland and Ireland, and also measures relating to public schools, education, mercantile marine, law amendment, and the modification of the orders in Council prohibiting the importation of foreign cattle. The address was agreed to in each House without a division; the Speaker in the Lower making feeling reference to the illness of Mrs. Disraeli, which naturally toned down the spirit of the debate.

21.—The Fenian convict Shore respited.

22.—Intimation made in the House of Commons that the Fenian convict Maguire, condemned at Manchester, had not only been respited, but restored to her Majesty's service.

— A deputation, consisting of Finlen and two other Fenian sympathisers, travel to Windsor for the purpose of submitting an address to the Queen, in person urging clemency to the Manchester convicts. Sir John Cowell and General Grey returned their memorial, with an intimation that it must be presented through the Secretary of State.

23.—Allen, Larkin, and Gould executed at Manchester. Every possible preparation was made in anticipation of a disturbance, but nothing occurred calling for the interference of either military or special constables, a large number of which had been sworn in during the week. Owing, doubtless, to the earnest entreaties of the magistrates, the number of people present was greatly under that at ordinary executions. Allen stepped on to the scaffold first, and at his appearance all noise in the crowd below was hushed. Every head was uncovered, and some few hands, it was said, were clapped; but whether as rejoicing in his execution, or sympathising with the murder he had committed, it was impossible to say. The rope was put round his neck, his feet were fastened, and the white cap drawn over his face amid solemn silence. Gould came next, praying, with the clergyman, earnestly and fervently. When Gould came out upon the drop he shuffled near to Allen, and as well as his bonds allowed, shook hands with him and kissed him through his white cap. It may have been that Larkin saw something of this final leave-taking between men passing into eternity; or possibly that, seeing his companions thus capped and bound for death, unnerved him; for his courage seemed to sink at the last moment, and he could barely totter on to the drop. Hardly had he done so, and the white cap been drawn over him, than he fainted, and fell heavily against Gould. In an instant the under-hangman seized Larkin and held him upright; while the exhortations to bear this last ordeal with firmness as an atonement for their great sins were pressed upon them in loud prayers. The men turned their faces towards the sounds, and gave from beneath their white caps muffled sounds of earnest responses. In spite, however, of his evident efforts, Larkin seemed to grow more faint, his knees sunk two or three times, and the hangman hurriedly warning those near at hand from the vicinity of the drop, stepped back, and casting one professional glance of eager interest to see that all was right, drew a little bolt: amid a loud boom the men dropped, and the long suppressed noises of the crowd broke out in a subdued muffled hum of terror and surprise, above which arose distinctly the solemn words of prayer for those that were dying. Allen died almost instantly, so also did Gould. The sufferings of Larkin, however, seemed very great, and it was nearly two minutes before he ceased beating the air in ineffectual struggles.

23.—Discussion in Committee of Supply upon the credit of 2,000,000*l.* demanded by Government for the Abyssinian Expedition. This sum, as explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was all that could be spent within the financial year; and if King Theodore should surrender the captives without actual war, it would about represent the cost of placing Sir R. Napier's force in Abyssinia. Any objection offered to the vote was based on the allegation that the Government, in defiance of the spirit of the Constitution, involved the country in a war without consulting Parliament, and even after an intimation had been given that war might be avoided. The vote was agreed to after a somewhat languid discussion.

— The prisoners for whose deliverance the Abyssinian force was to operate, were at least eight in number—Mr. Cameron, her Majesty's Consul at Massowah, who arrived at Gondar in June, 1862, accompanied by his secretary, Mr. Kerans, and by three servants, named M'Kelvey, Makerer, and Pietro; the first three of the above-named were British, the fourth French, the fifth Italian. Mr. Rassam, her Majesty's envoy to Abyssinia, arrived at the Emperor's camp in January 1866, with Lieutenant Prideaux and Dr. Blanc, attached to the mission; the last two British, Mr. Rassam, a Syrian by birth, but British by employment. There were thirteen other persons stated to be detained in captivity by King Theodore, whose case was especially recommended to the British Commander-in-Chief, although the military force was not proceeding to Abyssinia specifically to effect their release. These were, M. Bardé (French), painter, and teacher of languages, formerly secretary to Consul Cameron; Rev. H. Stern (Hesse), and Rev. H. Rosenthal (Mecklenburgh), missionaries; Mrs. E. Rosenthal, British born; Rev. Mr. Flad, missionary, Mrs. Flad, and three children, all Prussians; Rev. M. Staiger and Rev. M. Brandeis, missionaries, belonging to Baden; M. Schiller (Prussian), and M. Esler (Hungarian), natural history collectors. Lastly, there were European workmen in the service of King Theodore, with their wives and children, thirty-five in all, not known to be imprisoned.

24.—Three funeral processions in memory of the "Manchester martyrs" traverse different portions of London, and assemble in Hyde Park to denounce the Government. At the conclusion of the speeches all the Roman Catholics present knelt down on the grass with their heads uncovered, and read the prayers prescribed by their Church for the souls of the dead, the responses being uttered by the crowd with great solemnity.

25.—Seven members of the family of Edward Cook suffocated in a fire which took place within a farm-house at Middlewich, Cheshire.

26.—The Douro arrives with the West India Mail, and full accounts of the disastrous hurricane at St. Thomas, and other islands on the 29th ult.

27.—The Evangelical party meet in Willis's Rooms to form a Church Association "to defend the menaced faith of the Protestant Church of England."

28.—The House of Commons vote an addition of a penny to the Income-tax to defray the expenses of the Abyssinian Expedition; and by a large majority sanction the payment of the Indian troops engaged out of Indian revenues.

29.—Commencement of a debate in the French Senate on the Roman Question, Cardinal de Bonnechose taking advantage of the occasion to describe Garibaldi as "The evil genius of the Italian peninsula." The Archbishop of Bordeaux asked if his hearers did not perceive in the attack on the temporal power "a threatened subversion of all morality, without which the elements of civilization would be confounded in an infernal chaos."

— The Greek war steamer Bubulino, lying in the Mersey, blown to pieces by the explosion of her boiler. Several of the crew were killed, and nearly all wounded.

December 1.—Commencement of a severe storm which extended over the greater part of England on this and the two following days. The destruction to shipping along the north-east coast was considerable.

2.—In the House of Lords, Earl Russell moves a series of resolutions relating to education, pressing for its extension among the middle and working classes, and the appointment of a Minister of Education, with a seat in the Cabinet. The discussion was closed by moving "the previous question."

3.—The London cabmen strike work at four o'clock this afternoon, as a demonstration against the provision of the Metropolitan Street Traffic Act which required a lamp to be carried after dark. At a preparatory meeting in Exeter Hall, a deputation was appointed to wait upon the Home Secretary next day, and on his undertaking to introduce a clause into the Bill, conferring a discretionary power upon himself as to the use of lamps, the cabs were again placed on their stations.

3.—The French flag formally lowered at Rome.

— It is publicly announced to-day that Dr. Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand, is to be transferred to the vacant see of Lichfield.

4.—In a debate on the Roman Question in the Corps Legislatif, M. Thiers said: "No sovereign should create voluntarily on his own frontier a state of twenty-five million of inhabitants. By commencing such a fault we have not promoted either the welfare of France, Italy, or Europe. Italy, in becoming a great monarchy, at the same time becomes a disturbing agent, and an instrument of revolution. The Germanic Confederation, which for fifty years was the principal authority for maintaining the peace of the world, has disappeared, and has been replaced by a military monarchy, which disposes of forty million of men. You are placed between two unities, one which you made, and the other which you permitted. They are joining hands over the Alps, and only consent to preserve peace on condition that you allow the one to complete itself by seizing on the States of the Pope, and the other to swallow up the German Governments of the South. . . . We have made no one happy, neither the Pope, nor Italy, nor France. You have not placed the Pope out of the reach of danger, and you have deprived Italy of her strength by removing her crown from the strong city of Turin to the soft and pleasant city of Florence, which received it with a smile. Sicily is absolutely detached from the Government; Naples ready to rise; Milan unsettled; and Turin, irritated, speaks openly of destroying Italian unity. And that unhappy King, enclosed in the Pitti Palace—built for the Medici, and not for the wolves of Savoy—not daring to return to his native country, where his statutes are overthrown, he is well punished for having played the Mazzinian part of the overthrower of thrones." Towards the close of the debate, M. Rouher created an extraordinary sensation by plainly announcing that Italy would not be permitted to seize upon Rome. France would never submit to such a violence on her honour and on Catholicity in general. "She demands from Italy the rigorous and energetic execution of the Convention of September; and if this be not conceded, she will supply the deficiency herself." M. Rouher afterwards explained, amid increasing confusion, that by Rome he intended to speak of the present Pontifical territory in all its integrity. The vote showed that the policy of Government was approved of by 237 to 17.

— Came on, in the Court of Arches, the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, involving the legality of the ritualistic practices at the church of St. Alban's, Holborn.

5.—Debate on the Abyssinian Expedition in the House of Lords, occasioned by the Earl of Derby asking the concurrence of their lordships to the resolution of the Commons, proportioning the expense to be charged to India. The Earl of Ellenborough said he viewed the expedition with the deepest regret, because it would be impossible for the troops to keep up their communication with the sea, and it would otherwise be likely to draw us into great and serious complications.

— Personal explanations in the House of Commons regarding a missing letter said to have been sent to the Queen by King Theodore, and lost in the Foreign Office during the Secretaryship of Mr. Layard. The latter commented with some asperity on the remark made by Dr. Beke, that he had given instructions to leave Mr. Stern in captivity on account of a personal quarrel.

— The King of Italy grants an amnesty to all engaged in the invasion of the Papal States.

6.—Her Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket (the Opera-house), destroyed by fire. Shortly before 11 P.M., people in Pall-mall and Regent-street were startled by an immense body of flame darting out from the roof of the theatre, and in less than ten minutes the entire building was seen to be one mass of fire. The wind was blowing strongly from the north-east, and the immense body of fire poured forth from the burning theatre like a volcano, emitting a thick shower of fiery flakes, which covered the roadways and pavements of the adjoining streets. When the engines arrived soon after eleven, the flames had taken possession of the houses on each side of the Opera Arcade, and the houses in Pall-mall, opposite the United Service Club; and at these points the firemen, mounting the colonnade in front of the houses, began to pour great bodies of water on the burning mass. At half-past eleven the fire had reached its most destructive aspect. The great height of the theatre caused the flames to be visible at a long distance; and by their light, masses of people could be seen blocking up the whole of the approaches to the building, while every window, house-top, and available space was also filled with spectators. At one o'clock the fire in the south portion of the theatre had burnt itself out, and the firemen were enabled to direct the whole of their efforts to the houses in Pall-mall. By this means the further spread of the fire in that direction was prevented. Mr. Mapleson, the lessee, lost property estimated at 12,000*l.*, and Madame Titiens 1,000*l.* in jewellery. The grand organ, which cost 800*l.*, and all the stage scenery and decorations, painted for the most part by Telbin, Grieve, and Colcott, were destroyed. Mr. Graves, print-seller, was among the sufferers, the fire having extended to his galleries in Pall-mall, and destroyed many paintings of great interest and value. The fire was thought to have originated in the overheating of flues under the stage.

6.—The advanced brigade of the Abyssinian Expedition reaches Senafé. The natives were reported to be friendly in their behaviour, and offering supplies. Water abundant.

7.—Parliament adjourned till February 13.

— A resolution for the impeachment of President Johnson defeated in the House of Representatives by 108 to 57 votes.

8.—The Pope signs a bull convening the universal Episcopate for an Ecumenical Council, to assemble at Rome in December 1869.

— This (Sunday) afternoon, a monster funeral procession paraded the streets of Dublin, in celebration of the execution of the Fenian "martyrs." An address was delivered at the Glasnevin Cemetery, by John Martin, of '48 notoriety, who denounced England, and English rule in Ireland, with great fervour. Other processions of a similar character took place at Middleton and Skibbereen, and in one or two English towns.

— The Roman Committee issue a document proclaiming Victor Emmanuel King in the capital.

10.—Sir Eardley Gideon Culling Eardley, Bart., brought up at Bow-street upon a warrant, charging him with having, on the 12th September, married a lady named Elizabeth Allen, his former wife, Emily Florence, whom he had married at New York in 1859, being still alive. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court, Jan. 18, found guilty and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour.

11.—About mid-day the authorities in Scotland-yard received an anonymous note:—"I have to report that I have just received information from a reliable source, to the effect that the rescue of Richard Burke from prison, in London, is contemplated. The plan is to blow up the exercise wall by means of gunpowder; the hour between 3 and 4 P.M.; and the signal for 'all right,' a white ball thrown up outside when he is at exercise." This information was at once communicated to the Governor of the House of Detention, and police arrangements made to counteract the conspiracy; but the officers placed on duty, notwithstanding the suspicious proceedings of which they were witnesses, appeared to think that the attempt, if made at all, would be in the way of undermining or blowing up the wicket-gate.

12.—An American Fenian "Senate" issue an address "to the liberty-loving people in England, in view of the efforts made by some of the leading English Liberals to save the lives of the men lately executed in Manchester, and to show to the English people that the hostility of Irish nationalists is directed not against them, but against the tyranny under which the people of England and Ireland both suffer."

12.—Frederick Baker tried at Winchester Assizes for the barbarous murder and mutilation of the child Fanny Adams, at Alton, on the 24th August last (p. 642). The only defence set up was a plea of insanity spoken to by relatives. A verdict of Guilty was returned, and Mr. Justice Mellor sentenced the prisoner to death, which sentence was carried into effect on the morning of the 24th. Baker left a written confession of his frightful crime.

— Proclamation issued from Dublin Castle, prohibiting funeral processions arranged to "honour certain persons lately executed at Manchester for the crime of murder."

13.—Fenian outrage at Clerkenwell House of Detention, to rescue the prisoners Burke and Casey. At about a quarter before four o'clock in the afternoon some persons were seen to wheel a barrel into the thoroughfare called Corporation-lane, one side of which for some distance is formed by the prison-wall. About midway along, the barrel was set down on end and covered with a piece of tarpauling. This was seen by many people, and the police at this very moment were on special duty round the walls of the prison, having got information that an attempt of some kind was to be made against it. What followed was also seen by a few, though the quickness of movement among the conspirators led to some confusion in actually identifying them. One man was seen to cross from the side opposite the barrel, place a squib or fuse in the end, and coolly apply a match, after which he hastened along a narrow court leading out of the lane; in another moment the explosion followed. The wall, for sixty yards, heaved and shook and fell inwards with a loud crash. Had Burke or Casey been taking exercise at the time, as was anticipated, they could hardly have escaped injury; but from information communicated to the Governor they were then locked up in their cells. One witness, a boy, Abbott, who was injured, said he was standing at Mr. Young's door, No. 5, when he saw a large barrel close to the wall of the prison. Shortly afterwards, a man crossed to it with a long squib in each hand. One of them he gave to some boys who were playing in the street, and the other he thrust into the barrel. One of the boys was smoking, and handed the man a light, which was applied to the squib. The man stayed a short time until he saw the squib begin to burn, and then ran away; a policeman ran after him, but when the policeman arrived opposite No. 5, the thing went off. Bird, a dairyman, who was in the neighbourhood, said he saw the barrel set down, one end against the wall and the other facing the houses. There was a "gentleman" standing some six or seven yards away from where the barrel lay; he approached towards it, and looked as if for a name or number. He put the light to the end of the barrel next the houses. A woman at this moment said to him, "For God's sake, what is the man after? We shall all be blown up." She ran away indoors. He afterwards met a policeman, and, having told him about the barrel, saw him walking towards it very lazily. A third witness, Young, also injured, said he saw one man in a court fling a box of matches to another in the street, who struck one of them, and affixed it to the blue paper stuck into the barrel. This man stood and watched it till it was well lighted, and when it began to sputter walked away. The two men ran up the court. When witness came to himself, he found the place in ruins. The damage to property and injury to life in the neighbourhood was of the most serious description. The tenements opposite the prison-wall were crowded with poor occupants, who felt themselves in one moment engulfed in the ruins of falling walls and heavy timber. Some of the houses were blown to pieces; others had their fronts torn down; and for a wide circle there was not a whole window to be seen. An explosion of this magnitude, heard as it was not only over the metropolis, but for miles around it, at once drew effective help to the spot, and eager workers were soon engaged in the painful task of removing the dead and injured to the neighbouring hospitals. Six persons were killed outright by the explosion, six more died from its effects, and 120 people were wounded. The locality was early taken possession of by the police, aided by a small military force, and none except those engaged in the work of rescue permitted to enter. Next morning the Chancellor of the Exchequer sent a responsible messenger, with 500*l.* of public money, to meet the most immediate wants of the survivors. The Queen was, as usual, benevolently active and anxious in her inquiries regarding the wounded in the hospitals—the larger portion of whom were women and children. The outrage created such a feeling in the metropolis that it became dangerous for any person to be known as in the slightest degree associated with members of the Fenian brotherhood or their guilty transactions. Three parties were instantly seized on suspicion of being concerned in the conspiracy: Timothy Desmond, a tailor by trade; Jeremiah Allen, bootmaker; and Ann Justice; all of whom had been in the habit of visiting the prisoners in the House of Detention, and were known to have been in or about Corporation-lane a few minutes before the explosion. Government offered a reward of 300*l.* for the conviction of the principal criminal—the man who actually fired the match—and 100*l.* for the conviction of any accomplice.

14.—On the Fenian prisoners, Burke and Casey, being brought up at Bow-street to-day, Dr. Kenealey, their counsel, announced that he felt constrained to retire from their case. He did not intend to impute that the prisoners had any complicity in the crime of Friday night, but he could not disguise from himself that those who instructed him may be probably supposed to sympathise with that outrage, and that it was their duty to satisfy him that they were not concerned in the act; as they had not done so, he must commit the defence of the prisoners to other hands.

17.—Explosion of nitro-glycerine on Newcastle Moor, whither it had been conveyed from the town to be cast into a waste gully. A policeman and two carters were blown to pieces; Mr. Bryson, town surveyor, was injured so severely that he died in a few days; and the sheriff, who had accompanied the party in an official capacity, was also much hurt. The public mind was so excited at this time that it naturally connected the secret storing of the inflammable compound in the neighbourhood of the local branch of the Bank of England with Fenian schemes; but it was not established, on full inquiry, that it was destined for any other than mercantile purposes.

19.—Sir Henry Storks made Comptroller-in-Chief at the War Office.

— In consequence of the alarming rumour regarding Fenian risings in the metropolis, large numbers of the inhabitants are on this and following days sworn in as special constables at the different police offices.

20.—Papal Allocution. "While Satan, his satellites, and his sons do not cease to set loose in the most horrible manner their fury against our divine religion, against us, and against the chair of St. Peter, to vex and torment the population of most unhappy Italy—so long devoted to us—the God of mercy and of goodness manifests Himself in the most ostensible and admirable manner to His Church. . . . You are aware, venerable brethren, how our soldiers, who are deserving of all praise, distinguished themselves by their fidelity; with what admirable courage they fought against the bands of those criminal men, and how gloriously they fell on the field for the sake of the Church. Nor are you ignorant that the most august and most powerful Emperor of the noble and generous French nation, considering the serious dangers that surrounded us, sent his valiant soldiers, who, as well as their distinguished commanders, with the utmost zeal and ardour, especially in the combats of Mentana and Monte Rotondo, rejoiced to come to the aid of our soldiers, to fight courageously in their ranks, and brave death for the Holy See, thus covering their name with glory."

— In the action for libel raised by Mr. Rigby Wason against the Times, arising out of the petition presented to the House of Lords by Lord John Russell against the Lord Chief Baron, the jury to-day returned a verdict for the defendant.

22.—The Italian Ministry resign in consequence of a defeat on their Roman policy by 201 to 199 votes. General Menabrea undertook the formation of a new Cabinet.

23.—The Roman Catholic Dean of Limerick, and eighteen of his brother priests, issue a declaration on the grievances of Ireland, in which they conclude, first, that Ireland is poor and helpless, not by any fault of the Irish race, but by the force and fault of English legislation. Secondly, that the said English legislation exercised its power not only in pauperising Ireland for a season, but in destroying nearly all the sources of Irish national wealth, and thus making poverty a permanent condition of the country. Thirdly, that the danger to public order, both at home and abroad, has been produced by said poverty and degradation. Fourthly, that the very nature of the remedies required to make Ireland rich and contented, renders it impossible for a British Parliament to adopt and apply them; and, besides that, home aspirations and the plea for Irish intervention from abroad can never be met unless by restoring Ireland her nationality—re-establishing the Sovereign and the Lords and Commons of Ireland.

27.—Died, at her residence, Richmond-terrace, Whitehall, aged 69, Maria, Countess of Harrington, formerly Miss Foote, a popular actress of the Kemble and O'Neill period.

— A party of Fenians seize a Martello tower at Queenstown, occupied by two coast-guardsmen, and carry off unnoticed about 300 lbs. of gunpowder.

28.—Explosion at Hall's powder-mills, Faversham, three buildings being blown up in succession and eleven lives destroyed. Beyond the fact that the accident commenced in the "cornig" mill, no explanation of its origin was ever ascertained, as all the witnesses perished in the disaster. For a time it was feared that the "glazing"-house and magazine would also blow up, as the powder in the former was lying about in heaps, and the six feet thick walls, much shaken by the concussion, were also greatly heated. Large elm-trees were torn up by the force of the explosion, in other places the ground was ploughed up into furrows, and the river front of the premises entirely swept away. Only a small portion of the remains of the workmen were recovered, and hardly any could be identified.

— Died at Paris, aged 62, Baron Marochetti, R.A., sculptor.

30.—In Cork, a party of eight Fenians enter the shop of Allpott, gunsmith, and in broad daylight, in a crowded thoroughfare, and without the slightest opposition even in the way of raising an alarm, gather up sixty revolvers, with 1,500 lbs. of gunpowder, and walk off with their plunder.

31.—Rev. J. J. Hornby elected Head Master of Eton College in room of Dr. Balston, resigned.

7.—Generals Woodford, Gomm, Ross, and Burgoyne, four Fenian veterans, gazetted to be Field-Marschals.

8.—The sudden and mysterious disappearance of the Rev. B. Speke creates an uneasy excitement in the metropolis, which was no way lessened by the circumstantial statements sent out by his friends as to his regular habits and exemplary life. He arrived in London this evening with the avowed intention of attending a friend's wedding, was known to have made at least one call, and purchased a hat, but afterwards left no trace of his proceedings. A reward of 500*l.* was offered for his recovery. He was discovered about the close of February at Padstow in Cornwall, habited as a bullock-driver, and apprehended as a person named Ayre whom the police were "wanting" at Hull. His sudden disappearance was said to be owing to the suffering he experienced from hypochondriasis.

9.—The Fenian prisoners, Burke, Casey, and Shore, or Mullady, finally examined at Bow-street, and committed for trial at Warwick Assizes.

11.—The Pope withdraws two briefs of rebuke pronounced in June 1866, and September 1867, against Cardinal Andrea, and restores him to the Bishopric of Sabine.

— The United States Senate reinstate Mr. Stanton as Secretary of the War Department.

— Michael Barrett and James O'Neil, apprehended in Glasgow for unlawfully using firearms on the Green, turn out, on examination before the magistrates, to be prominent members of the Fenian conspiracy, and are removed to London in custody. They were there identified as being concerned in the Clerkenwell explosion, Barrett being distinctly sworn to as the man who fired the barrel.

— Among those who applied for adjudication in bankruptcy at the Essex County Court was Matilda Griggs, aged seventeen, the young (656) woman who on the 23d April last was the victim of what was known as the Buckhurst Hill tragedy. She was detained in custody to satisfy a claim by the Crown of 40*l.*, the amount of recognizances entered into by her to appear and prosecute Watkins, who first seduced and then tried to murder her. After describing the attack made upon her, the manner in which she passed the night between the calves, and the intention she still had of marrying Watkins as being the cause of her reluctance to prosecute, the Registrar said that as she was not a trader he could not deal with her petition at present, and she must remain in gaol. Public attention having been drawn to the case, the claim of the Crown was paid by private generosity, Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Brown, of Bond-street, having the honour of sending each the full amount.

15.—Education Conference opened at Manchester. The chief points discussed were—Compulsory Rating, Secular Schools, the operation of India Civil Acts, and compulsory attendance. A committee was appointed to frame a bill on the subject.

16.—Disturbances in Japan, the three leading princes, Satsuma, Choisy, and Soso, seizing the young Mikado and taking possession of Yeddo.

— The body of the Emperor Maximilian received with honour at Trieste.

17.—The notorious George Francis Train arrested as a Fenian on the arrival of the Scotia at Queenstown. He was soon after liberated, and commenced a career of abuse against the Government, which was cut short by his being again arrested by his English creditors.

— In order to put an end to extensive competing schemes promoted by rival companies, the Caledonian and North British Railway Directors enter into an agreement to work their lines under a joint-purse arrangement.

18.—Intelligence received that the Livingstone Search Expedition had returned satisfied that the great traveller was not killed, as the Johanna men reported, but that they had deserted him when setting out from Marenga. They obtained traces of him further on, and were on the whole satisfied that he was still alive, and would probably return by the Nile.

— The Fenian leader Clancy captured in Tottenham Court-road by two police-officers. He threw one of them down and attempted to shoot the other, but the chase was continued till he was run down in Bedford-square. On the road to George-street station he said, "I think I have had a very good battle and fought a fair duel, and I am only sorry I have not got payment for it."

— Seditious Fenian placard posted on the front of the Mansion House.

— The remains of the Emperor Maximilian deposited in the Imperial crypt of the Capuchin Church at Vienna.

20.—Public intimation having been given that the Metropolitan of Capetown intended to consecrate—in Scotland or elsewhere—another Bishop of Natal in room of Dr. Colenso, the Bishop of London remonstrates with him on the impropriety and irregularity of the step. “You will remember from your recent presence at the Lambeth Conference—

1. That the assembled Bishops, under the direction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, deliberately abstained from affirming that Bishop Colenso's deposition was valid, either spiritually or in any other way.
2. That, at the adjourned meeting of the Conference, the report of the Committee, recommending the consecration of a new Bishop, was, by the wish of the Archbishop of Canterbury, as well as of the Bishops of Lincoln, Ely, Chester, and myself, with others, deliberately, not approved, but only received.
3. That many of the English Bishops, feeling strongly, like myself, how dangerous is the teaching of Bishop Colenso, still hold that his see is not vacant, since his deposition has been pronounced null and void in law by the highest courts of the realm.
4. That some also of our body, whose authority is very great in such matters, believe that (quite independently of questions of English law) the deposition is uncanonical. You will remember also,
5. That, whereas the words of 26 George III., cap. 84, declare that by the laws of this realm no person can be consecrated to the office of Bishop without the Royal authority—if any doubt exists as to the applicability of these words to your case—that Consecration Service, which alone can be lawfully used within the Church of England, prescribes that the Royal mandate shall be produced before the consecration is proceeded with; and, moreover, the Bishop elect is called upon to declare, in the face of the congregation, that he is persuaded he is truly called to his ministration in the office of a Bishop, not only according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, but also ‘according to the order of this realm.’ Under these circumstances, I venture to call upon you, my dear Lord, not to go further without the most perfect openness, and the most complete examination, by the authorities of Church and State, as to the legality and propriety of what you are doing. You surely will allow that you ought not otherwise to proceed to a step which must be fraught with the gravest consequences for the Church, both at home and in the colonies, and for which, certainly, there is no precedent since the schism of the Nonjurors.”

21.—Miss Milbourne murdered in her residence, Heneage-street, Manchester, by three men, who also robbed the house of all the valuables they could secure.

upon the late Reform measure, the Irish Church question, and the Abyssinian expedition.

22.—Died at his residence in London, aged 59, Charles Kean, actor.

— Writing on the Alabama claims, “Historicus” thus concludes an elaborate argument in the Times:—“Is the question whether a state of civil war did exist in the United States before the issue of the Queen's proclamation of May 13, 1861, a matter upon which any one either in England or America is entitled to entertain a reasonable doubt. I have shown what Mr. Seward, the recognised organ of the American Government, said at the time when the events were in progress. I have quoted the decision of a Court which is not only the supreme judicature of America, but the final Judge of the Constitution. If, in the teeth of such admissions, a Government is entitled to resuscitate a State claim, where is to be the end of liquidation? If, when you have not only got in writing the confession of your adversary that he has no claim against you, but have, further, a judicial decision in his own country, recorded at his instance, which authoritatively disproves his pretensions, you are again to submit the same question to arbitration, what subject is left on which you are safe from persecution? I can only say that a nation which, under such circumstances, should voluntarily submit itself to unreasonable vexation, would amply deserve the unjust and perpetual oppression which it would infallibly invite.”

23.—Conference at the Society of Arts on the subject of technical education. The programme discussed included:—

1. (a) The necessity for an improved national education for the working classes generally.
- (b) Improved primary education, and the measures necessary for securing the same.
- (c) Additional facilities in primary schools for affording elder children the means of learning the elements of scientific knowledge.
2. The necessity for the establishment of schools for technical and industrial education in relation to science and art, in which pupils, after leaving the primary schools, may obtain instruction suited to the special industries with which they may be connected as workmen, foremen, or managers.
3. The best means for securing the object.
4. How far technical education can be promoted by the aid of existing educational endowments.

24.—Violent storm, extending over the greater part of the island. On the west coast the wind-gauge showed a sudden rise in the pressure from 7 lbs. to 42 lbs. per square foot, while the velocity rose from 11 miles an hour to an average of 62, and in some of the fiercest gusts to 100 miles an hour.

February 1.—Came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, the action raised by the Countess D'Alteyrac, to recover certain goods and furnishings from Lord Willoughby

u v

D'Eresby. The plaintiff was the divorced wife of Count d'Alteyrac, of high family and position in France, and an officer in the French Navy; and the defendant was Grand Chamberlain of England. The parties became acquainted in Paris in 1847, and in 1849 they lived together as man and wife in London, and continued to do so until 1864, when a disagreement took place between them. A daughter, the result of the cohabitation of the plaintiff and defendant, was now living, and her education had been superintended by the defendant. The latter, after the separation, sold all the property at Caen Lodge, Twickenham, for 8,000*l.*, which property the plaintiff claimed as hers; and to recover it this action was raised. The plaintiff had watched Lord Willoughby through a long illness with great affection, and was addressed and treated by him and certain relatives as Mrs. Willoughby. His father, however, objected to the connexion, and cut the defendant off from succeeding to the large estates of the family, till he could show, to the satisfaction of trustees, that he was legally married to some other person. At the close of the first day's examination, the judge's suggestion for having the case settled out of court, was concurred in; and Mr. Vernon Harcourt, as referee, afterwards adjudged the sum of 5,000*l.* to be paid to the Countess, and 1,200*l.* a year secured for life.

4.—Mr. Bright addresses a meeting at Birmingham in support of his scheme for establishing a peasant proprietary in Ireland.

5.—The Central Protestant Defence Association hold a large meeting in Dublin to move resolutions—In favour of loyalty to the Throne; On Irish Protestant wealth, position, and intelligence; Its right to protection; and The wrong of dealing with Ireland as if it were a separate kingdom.

6.—Mr. Bonamy Price elected Professor of Political Economy at Oxford by a majority of 427 over Mr. Thorold Rogers.

7.—At a meeting of the Reichsrath Committee on the War Budget, Baron von Beust said he considered the foreign relations of Austria to be of so peaceful a nature that all danger of a war must appear as a thing only to be brought about by extraordinary events. On the other hand it appeared necessary to maintain the army on such a peace footing as would enable Austria if necessary to assume an attitude inspiring respect, and at a short notice to send her army into the field ready for action.

—Mr. Edward Thornton, the newly appointed Minister at Washington, presented to the President.

—The Fenian Captain Mackey, the leader of the attack on Ballyknockane Barracks in March last, arrested in Cork after a desperate resistance with loaded weapons.

9.—Mr. H. Rassam, one of the Abyssinian captives, writes from Magdala:—"You will be glad to learn that the Emperor still continues his mock friendship towards me, and constantly sends me very polite messages. He is now within eight hours' ride of this place, but at the rate he has been travelling, since he left Debra Tabor in October, he is not expected to join us here before the middle or end of next month. A large mortar, which he had cast in Debra Tabor, weighing about 1,500 lbs., has been the cause of his delays. He is determined to bring this huge piece of ordnance to the fortress. We are all looking anxiously for the arrival of the British force, and I have not the least fear that we shall be treated roughly by our captor when he hears of the approach of our troops. So long as he looks on me as a friend we are all right. Thank God, both my fellow-captives and myself are enjoying good health."

10.—Died, aged 87, Sir David Brewster, Principal of Edinburgh University, and an eminent writer on the science of light and optics.

—At Manchester a meeting called to express disapprobation of the Irish Church carries by a large majority an antagonistic resolution declining to pronounce an opinion in favour of its destruction, because there was no evidence before it to justify such a proceeding, and because the meeting had no desire to excite the angry passions of controversy throughout the country.

—Among other untoward items of intelligence from Abyssinia—principally relating to the transport service—Colonel Dunn is said to have been killed at Senafé by the accidental discharge of a fowling-piece.

—M. Arrivabene (a son it was reported of Count Arrivabene), member of the Stock Exchange, commits suicide by shooting himself in a wood near Maidenhead.

11.—The "Oxford Music-hall," London, burnt. The fire originated in a gallery opposite the stage, and completed its work of destruction within an hour of discovery.

12.—Education Conference at Willis's Rooms, called by Archdeacon Denison to consider a series of resolutions in favour of the denominational system and the exemption of State schools from the operation of a Conscience Clause.

—Lord Chief Justice Cockburn remonstrates with the Lord Chancellor against the judges being called upon to try election petitions:—"In conformity with your Lordship's wishes," wrote the Chief Justice, "I have consulted the judges, and I am charged by them, one and all, to convey to you their strong and unanimous feeling of insuperable repugnance to having these new and objectionable duties thrust upon them. We are unanimously of opinion that the inevitable consequence of putting judges to try election petitions will be to lower and degrade the judicial office, and to destroy, or at all events materially impair, the confidence of the public in the thorough impartiality and inflexible integrity of the judges, when, in the course of their ordinary duties, political matters come incidentally before them. . . . The functions which the judges are called upon to discharge are altogether beyond the scope of the duties which, on accepting the office of judges, we took on ourselves to fulfil. We are at a loss to see how Parliament can, with justice or propriety, impose on us labours wholly beyond the sphere of our constitutional duties, and which no one ever contemplated the possibility of our being called upon to perform. I have further to point out that we are thoroughly satisfied that the proposed scheme is impracticable, and that the performance by the judges of the onerous duties which this bill proposes to cast on them, is neither more nor less than a sheer impossibility. The time of the judges is known to be more than fully occupied. We would venture to ask which court is to be suspended, in order to furnish judges even for occasional petitions, to say nothing of the trial of petitions after a general election, when, if any material portion of the work of trying petitions is to be done by the judges, Westminster Hall would have to be shut up altogether? Is a judge to set aside her Majesty's commission, and have the goals undelivered, and causes untried, while he is occupied in investigating the unclean doings in a corrupt borough?" The Lord Chief Justice goes on to suggest that, owing to the accidents which determine professional success and business at the bar, there are always a certain number of counsel whose business is not proportioned to their known abilities and learning, and whose sound judgment and judicial aptitude are recognised by the references which are frequently submitted to them as arbitrators. "Many of these," he says, "would probably be willing to undertake the trial of election petitions, and it might safely and conveniently be entrusted to them, while to put such duties on the judges would be a most fatal mistake." In conclusion, he repeats an emphatic and earnest protest, and states that he and his brother judges rely on the Lord Chancellor, as the head of the profession, to protect them, if possible, against this, in every respect, most objectionable measure.

13.—Parliament resumes its sittings in pursuance of the adjournment in November last.

— The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduces the Government bill to amend the law relating to election petitions, and to provide more effectually for the prevention of corrupt practices. After describing the details of the scheme, and the opposition which had been made by the judges to the task of deciding upon petitions, he said it was now proposed to found a new Parliamentary Election Court, with judges at a salary of 2,000*l.* a year, and that appeals from decisions of revising barristers should also be referred to that Court.

— Died at Bristol, aged 71, William Herapath, chemist and toxicologist.

14.—In an all but empty House the Earl of Mayo moved for leave to bring in a bill to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland till March, 1869; or if Parliament should not then be sitting, till three weeks after the beginning of the Session. The number of persons now in custody under warrants signed by the Lord-Lieutenant was 96. The number of arrests had been—in January, 1867, 14; February, 21; March, 111; April, 31; May, 7; June, 38; July, 8. During August, September, and October there were only two arrests, but within the last three months the number had risen to 33. Of the persons arrested, 10 were described as officers, 25 clerks, 90 artisans, 11 farmers, 66 labourers, and 28 shopkeepers. Leave was given to bring in the bill, though several members expressed regret that it had not been preceded by remedial measures.

— Mr. Walpole moves the second reading of the Public Schools Bill—a measure based on the report of the Royal Commission, and substantially the same as that of last year, but excluding Merchant Taylors' and St. Paul's, as being more or less of a private character, under the control of two of the City Companies.

— The advance column of the Abyssinian expedition reaches Antalo.

16.—The Abyssinian army encamps at Aranzum. Sir Robert Napier held an interview of a satisfactory nature with Prince Kassai of Tigré on the 24th, and on the 26th set out for Antalo.

17.—Illness of Lord Derby. Considerable excitement was created in political circles by the continued illness of the Premier, who was now considered in so dangerous a state as to call Lord Stanley in great haste to Knowsley.

— Earl Russell publishes his views on the Irish question in the form of a letter to the Right Hon. Chichester Fortescue. Among the remedial measures which he concluded to be necessary, he said that the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, the endowment of the Presbyterian Church, and the reduction of the Protestant Episcopal Church to one-eighth of the present revenues of Ireland, would be just and salutary.

— The Lord Advocate introduces the Scotch Reform Bill, designed to assimilate the franchise there to what prevailed in England under the bill of last Session. It was proposed to give seven additional representatives to Scotland, and to increase the number of the House to that extent; two of the additional members to be given to the Universities, three to counties, and one to Glasgow.

18.—Fire at the Charing Cross Railway Station, originating in the "custom-house" adjoining the river, and destroying the south end of the platform roof.

— A deputation of Trade Societies' Delegates waits upon Mr. Gladstone for the purpose of explaining the actual working of Trades Unions, and of refuting the statements made by him in a speech at Oldham in December last.

18.—Died at Ampthill Park, Bedfordshire, Lord Wensleydale (Baron Parke), aged 86.

— The Upper House of Convocation (province of Canterbury) engage in the discussion of a resolution on Ritualism submitted by the Bishop of London:—"That this House, viewing with anxious concern the increasing diversity of practice in regard to ritual observances, as causing disquiet and contention, and perceiving with deep regret that the resolutions adopted at the Convocations of Canterbury and York have failed to secure unity, deems it expedient for the peace of the Church,—1. That the limits of ritual observance should not be left to the uncontrolled discretion of individual clergymen, and ought therefore to be defined by rightful authority. 2. That some easy and inexpensive process ought to be provided, whereby, while the liberties of the officiating clergymen and their parishioners are protected, the evils of unrestrained licence in such matters may be checked." The debate was protracted over two days, and ended in a division, showing a majority of 12 to 4 in favour of the resolution. The Bishop of Oxford urged the inconsistency of adopting two courses, one of which implied the failure of the other. "I do not," he said, "think this a likely way of restoring peace and truth to the Church. I think the only probable means of attaining such an end is that we should have a distinct statement of what the law of the Church is now; and that we should not invite men in one breath to have recourse to the law, and tell them with the next that, if the law is not in accordance with our views, we will have it made so." As finally agreed to and sent down to the Lower House, the resolution expressed that other means than individual discretion "should be provided for enforcing the rule laid down at the end of the rubric concerning the service of the Church, for duly interpreting all diversities taken from common usage, and if necessary for removing ambiguity in the existing law." The Lower House adjourned the discussion on the resolution, finding it inexpedient to proceed in that way in the meantime.

19.—Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Gladstone for the abolition of compulsory church-rates.

— The pass of Humaita, the bulwark of Paraguayan power, forced by Brazilian iron-clads under Captain de Carvahó.

— Mr. Gladstone's Compulsory Church-rates Abolition Bill read a second time. In the course of the debate Lord Cranborne asked, "What shall we gain if we adhere to the principle of 'No surrender'?" That is a question which must be answered by the circumstances of time. We must look not only to the disposition of the nation out of doors, but to the course of events in this House—the principles (660) upon which parties guide their movements—the laws by which public men regulate their own conduct. Looking to these matters, and taking the most impartial view in my power, I am bound to say that I do not think any gain to the Church will result from prolonging this contest. (Cheers). I do not conceal from the House for a moment that it is with the deepest reluctance of feeling that I give up anything that the Church possesses, but I am bound to look at both sides of the question, and not to content myself with a stolid opposition; not to give way to that tendency by which it seems so many of us are apt to be affected, of pursuing for many years a steady obstruction, and then giving way to an unreasonable panic. I think it wiser to accept the terms that are now offered to us, because I am distinctly of opinion that we may go further and fare worse. (Cheers.)"

19.—In the Lower House of Convocation Canon Seymour presented a petition praying that the Upper House would take measures for declaring—first, that the Church of England accepts as valid the excommunication of Dr. Colenso, and that until he be reconciled unto and received into the Church by proper authority, they will by the Thirty-third Article hold him to be "cut off from the Church and excommunicated;" and second, that they accept the spiritual validity of the act of the Bishop of Capetown in deposing Dr. Colenso. The petition was accepted, against an amendment proposed by the Dean of Ely; but the Upper House declined acceding to the prayer, and appointed a committee to inquire into the canonicity of the sentence of deposition, and to examine Dr. Colenso's writings since published.

— Mr. Beresford Hope elected member for Cambridge University in room of Lord Justice Selwyn by a majority of 531 over Mr. Cleasby. The gross number polled was 3,331.

21.—President Johnson issues an order removing Mr. Stanton from the office of War Secretary and appointing Adjutant-General Thomas ad interim. Mr. Stanton resisted the order, and caused Thomas to be apprehended. On the 24th the President sent a message to the Senate nominating Thomas Ewing permanent Secretary of War, vice Edward Stanton removed, and also a message in reply to the Senate's resolution of 21st February (declaring that the President had no power to remove Stanton), in which the President declared his right to remove the Secretary of War and appoint a successor ad interim. The fear of Stanton and his friends was that during the night the President might send a military force to take possession of the War Department building; the Secretary therefore determined to remain there all night, and in order to weaken Thomas as much as possible he resolved at once to invoke the aid of the "Tenure of Office Law," which declares that if any one shall, contrary to its provisions, accept any appointment, or attempt to hold any office, he shall be guilty of a "high misdemeanour," and be subjected to 10,000 dollars fine and five years' imprisonment. Making affidavit of the facts before Chief Justice Cartter, of the District of Columbia Court, that official issued a warrant for the arrest of Thomas, and bailiffs were at once sent in search of him. Stanton in the meantime remained in the War Office all night, a constant succession of prominent Republicans visiting and keeping watch with him. The rival Secretaries each issued orders on the 21st, that of Thomas being a direction to close the Department on the 22d, that day being the anniversary of the birth of Washington. A similar order was also issued by Stanton. The bailiffs who were in search of Thomas did not find him until the morning of the 22d, when they arrested him at his breakfast-table about eight o'clock. The proceedings were managed very quietly, and being taken before Chief Justice Cartter, that official told him to find bail, which Thomas after some delay did, and at ten o'clock he was released on 5,000 dollars bail to appear for trial on the morning of February 26th. After an interview with the President, Thomas again returned to the War Office, but failed in making any impression on Stanton either to vacate his seat or permit any other person to meddle with the war mails. When General Thomas appeared to answer the charge made against him by Stanton, the latter did not appear, and the prosecution was abandoned.

22.—The Times correspondent, writing from the camp Ad Abagin, states that letters had been received from the prisoners, dated Magdala, January 30, and from Mr. Flad, in Theodore's camp, dated the 19th of the same month. They say that Theodore was still engaged in his exertions to get his ordnance and heavy baggage into Magdala, and that, on account of the difficulties of the road, he would not be in that fortress until the first week of March. "The reports among the country people here are that Theodore is advancing against Wagshum Gobazyé, of Lasta, who is at Lalibala, in the south of his province. The Abyssinians assert positively that Theodore will fight the British army, and have not that confidence in our success against him which is felt in our own ranks."

— A young man named Lee commits suicide by throwing himself from the tower of the Crystal Palace.

24.—The House of Representatives, after a lengthy and exciting debate, resolve to impeach the President by 126 to 47.

25.—The Washington democrats delegate Thaddeus Stevens and John A. Bingham to appear at the bar of the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives to impeach the President of high crimes and misdemeanours. Next day the Senate referred the matter to a select committee of seven.

— Resignation of the Earl of Derby. In the House of Lords the Earl of Malmesbury intimates that in consequence of failing health the Premier had tendered his resignation to her Majesty, who was graciously pleased to accept the same, and empower the Chancellor of the Exchequer to form a Government if possible. A similar intimation was made in the House of Commons by Lord Stanley, who moved the adjournment of the House till the necessary arrangements could be completed. Mr. Gladstone said: "With reference to the special cause which the noble lord has by a singular destiny been called upon to be the person to announce to this House, I cannot help expressing for myself what I am sure will be the universal sentiment, the regret that a career so long, so active, and in many respects so distinguished and remarkable, as that of his father, should have been brought to a close by the failure of his bodily health and strength."

26.—At Newcastle Assizes two burglars were sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for breaking into a house at Haltwhistle in October last. The chief witness against them was a young girl named Elizabeth Storey, who defended her mistress and herself, first with an old gun and then with a poker, against the murderous assaults of the criminals. Mr. Justice Lush complimented Storey on her fidelity and courage, and ordered 5*l.* to be paid to her.

— Mr. Disraeli and the Premiership. The Owl this morning states that General Grey, who defeated Mr. Disraeli at High Wycombe in 1832, was the bearer from Osborne of the Queen's autograph letter, announcing that she had selected him as successor to Lord Derby, and commanding him "to submit what alterations in the Cabinet his experience suggested." The Times wrote:—"The Chancellor of the Exchequer has served the Conservative party for more than twenty years. He slowly re-constructed its Parliamentary organization, and has thrice brought it into power. By the public he has always been regarded as the ruling spirit of the Cabinet, and it has been evident to all men that the Reform Bill of last session was only carried by his courage, his readiness, and his unflinching temper in the House of Commons. The time has arrived for the servant to become the master; nor could Mr. Disraeli have accepted a lower place without a loss of dignity which would have been unworthy of himself and discreditable to his party." A few days later the Pall Mall Gazette wrote:—"One of the most grievous and constant puzzles of King David was the prosperity of the wicked and the scornful; and the same tremendous moral enigma has come down to our own days. In this respect the earth is in its older times what it was in its youth. Even so recently as last week the riddle once more presented itself in its most impressive shape. Like the Psalmist, the Liberal leader may well protest that verily he has cleansed his heart in vain and washed his hands in inno-gency; all day long he has been plagued by Whig Lords, and chastened every morning by Radical manufacturers; as blamelessly as any curate he has written about 'Ecce Homo;' and he has never made a speech, even in the smallest country town, without calling out, with David, How foolish am I, and how ignorant! For all this, what does he see? The scorners who shot out the lip and shook the head at him across the table of the House of Commons last session has now more than heart could wish; his eyes, speaking in an Oriental manner, stand out with fatness, he speaketh loftily, and pride compasseth him about as a chain. It is all very well to say that the candle of the wicked is put out in the long run, that they are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carries away. So we were told in other times of tribulation. This was the sort of consolation that used to be offered in the jaunty days of Lord Palmerston. People used then to soothe the earnest Liberal by the same kind of argument. 'Only wait,' it was said, 'until he has retired, and all will be well with us.' But no sooner has the storm carried away wicked Whig chaff than the heavens are forthwith darkened by new clouds of Tory chaff. That the writer of frivolous stories about 'Vivian Grey' and 'Coningsby' should grasp the sceptre before the writer of beautiful and serious things about 'Ecce Homo'—the man who is epigrammatic, flashy, arrogant, before the man who never perpetrated an epigram in his life, is always fervid, and would as soon die as admit that he had a shade more brain than his footman—the Radical corrupted into a Tory before the Tory purified and elevated into a Radical—is not this enough to make an honest man rend his mantle and shave his head and sit down among the ashes inconsolable? Let us play the too underrated part of Bildad the Shuhite for a space, while our chiefs thus have unwelcome leisure to scrape themselves with potsherds and to meditate upon the evil way of the world."

27.—In the action raised by Mr. Sinclair, engineer of the Great Eastern Railway, against Lord Redesdale, Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords, for having stated in the Times that the plaintiff had resigned, and was pecuniarily interested in Mr. Brassey's contract for the Dunmow branch, a verdict was given by consent against Lord Redesdale, with 40s. damages and costs.

— Mr. Disraeli has an audience of her Majesty, and kissed hands upon his appointment as First Lord of the Treasury. The first Cabinet Council was held on the 2d March.

— Sir Thomas Henry dismisses an application made at Bow-street Police Court for a warrant to apprehend Mr. Eyre for the murder of Gordon.

29.—Dismissal of Lord Chelmsford. The Chancellor had an audience of her Majesty to-day to deliver up the Great Seal. A person signing "Truth" wrote to the Herald:—"From the leading article in the Times of yesterday the public would naturally infer that Lord Chelmsford had voluntarily retired from the high position of Lord Chancellor. Such, however, is not the fact. His Lordship had no option but to resign the custody of the Great Seal when informed by Mr. Disraeli that his name could not be included in the list of the new Government. It is stated that Mr. Disraeli's object in removing Lord Chelmsford and in promoting Lord Cairns was to obtain additional debating power on the Ministerial side of the House of Lords; but, on reading this day's Times, I incline to a different conclusion, and I cannot but attribute his Lordship's removal from office to the last act of his ministry, which was to place on the Bench a judge chosen simply for his fitness to be a judge, in spite of unusual pressure upon him to make a less worthy choice." The Ministerial journal appended the following note:—"We publish the foregoing letter in deference to the desire of one who has a right to speak as to the facts of the case. Into Mr. Disraeli's motives we cannot of course enter. But we may state on the best authority that the terms of Mr. Disraeli's letter to Lord Chelmsford were courteous, and even flattering; stating, in effect, that although Mr. Disraeli could not, from various circumstances, offer the noble Lord the position he held in the late Administration, yet that it would afford him the greatest pleasure if the noble Lord would point out any other mode in which he might request her Majesty to signify her appreciation of his distinguished services."

March 2.—Murders at Todmorden Vicarage by Miles Wetherall. The criminal in this case had been paying his addresses to a servant maid living at the vicarage (the Rev. A. Plew); and in consequence of his visits the girl was discharged. On Sunday he went to York on a visit to her, and on returning on Monday appeared to have resolved on taking vengeance upon her late master and mistress, and upon the housemaid, who was supposed to have told of his visits. About half-past ten on Monday night Mr. Plew, who was preparing to retire to his bedroom, heard a noise at the back door. He passed out by the hall door and proceeded to the back of the house, where he saw Wetherall, who snapped a pistol at him, which missed fire. Wetherall next attacked Mr. Plew with a hatchet, but the vicar closing with him, they went struggling backwards into the lobby of the house, through the back door. The noise alarmed the servants, and the housemaid, cook, and nurse came to see what was the matter. Some of these seized Wetherall by the hair and clothes to hold him back. The result was that Mr. Plew escaped by the front hall door, but not until he had received two long scalp wounds at the back and another at the top of the head, several vertical cuts on the forehead, one ear torn from top to bottom, and other wounds. The housemaid sought shelter in the dining-room, and for a time kept the murderer at bay by placing her back against the door. Wetherall, however, contrived to get his right arm through the door, and discharged a pistol at her, shooting her dead. He next went into the kitchen, armed himself with a poker, and proceeded up-stairs to a bedroom, in which Mrs. Plew was lying, and where she had recently given birth to a child. The nurse said he could not go there, but he told her not to mind, as he had finished those below, and forced his way past her. Stripping down the bedclothes, he fired at Mrs. Plew, but the ball did not take effect. He next attacked her with the poker, inflicting some severe scalp wounds, breaking her nose, and otherwise injuring her. While in the act of striking another blow at her his arm was arrested by Mr. Stansfeld, the Church organist, who had seen Mr. Plew, and who was accompanied by two others. By these men he was secured and given over to the police. Mr. Plew was able not only to identify Wetherall, but described the mode of attack, and was thereafter subjected to a close examination by the prisoner. The reverend gentleman died from his wounds on the 12th, and the infant on the same day. Wetherall was tried at Manchester on the 13th, sentenced to death, and executed. Mr. Justice Lush, before whom the prisoner was brought, described the outrage as almost without parallel in the annals of crime.

2.—The Paraguayans make a night attack on two Brazilian ironclads. Twelve hundred picked men, armed with swords, revolvers, and hand grenades, in forty-eight canoes, boarded the vessels. They for a time gained possession of the decks; but the Brazilians, shutting themselves up in the revolving turrets of the monitors, opened a terrific fire on them, and eventually drove them back. A struggle of two hours' duration was put an end to by a third ironclad, which did great execution among the Paraguayans by running down their canoes. The Brazilians had thirty-two men and several officers killed and wounded. The Paraguayans lost, it is supposed, about 400 men. The Brazilian Admiral stated that, in the hope of rescuing those in the water, he caused boats to be lowered; but on their approach the Paraguayans invariably dived, thus preferring to be drowned rather than fall into the hands of their foes.

— The Washington House of Representatives adopts the articles of impeachment charging President Johnson with having violated the Tenure of Office Act in removing Stanton without the consent of the Senate, and with violating the Army Bill by trying to induce General Emory to obey orders not sent through General Grant, Commander-in-Chief.

— Lord Cairns sworn into the office of Lord Chancellor in presence of the Master of the Rolls and a crowded court.

— A grocer's firm in the Borough having written to Mr. Gladstone complaining of the growth of the co-operative movement among officials in the Civil Service, he replies that in the retail trade there was a total inversion of the natural order of things, which was that men in business should be borrowers from, not lenders to, men out of business. "This (the credit) system also aggravates the risk of bad debts, which form an additional charge to a good debtor; and it is connected with a general irregularity and uncertainty which must also be paid for. I do not doubt that we, the consumers, are much in fault. But I cannot help thinking that traders are much in fault also, and that much might be done by a vigorous effort and by combination among traders in favour of ready-money dealings, either absolutely or as encouraged by discounts."

2.—Barnum's Museum, New York, destroyed by fire.

3.—The Prussian Government issue a decree sequestrating the private property of the ex-King of Hanover.

5.—The new Premier addresses a meeting of his supporters in Downing-street. He began by alluding briefly to the loss the country, the Conservative party, and he personally had suffered in Lord Derby's retirement. But he was glad to be able to give assurance that the party would still have the benefit of the noble Lord's direction and counsel, and he expressed the hope that in a short time the noble Lord would be enabled to return to his old seat in the House of Lords. He admitted the difficulties that lay in their path as a minority having to deal with the great questions now pressing on their attention. But the past two years had given them great triumphs, and he had every confidence that with a firm front they might add to them fresh triumphs in 1868. Mr. Disraeli next alluded to the Scotch Reform Bill, which, he said, must be carried with its main features intact, in order that the whole question of Reform might not be re-opened; to the Irish Reform Bill, which would be introduced at once; and to the Report of the Boundary Commission, which, as the result of the deliberations of a thoroughly impartial tribunal, must be respected. In regard to the treatment of Irish questions, he left the Secretary of Ireland to make the Ministerial statement on the occasion of the discussion on Mr. Maguire's motion. The right hon. gentleman concluded, amidst great cheering, by expressing his confidence in the future, and reiterating his expressions of gratitude for the warm support he had experienced.

— The Disraeli Ministry take their seats. In the House of Lords the Earl of Malmesbury explained that he had not on a former occasion said Mr. Disraeli was authorized to form a Ministry "if possible," but "as soon as possible."—Earl Russell took an early opportunity of attacking the Government for inconsistency. "We know now," he said, "that for three years the Government has been carried on upon the principle that, having declared against any reduction whatever in the franchise, the Ministers of the Crown, while they were persuading people to follow them in that course, meant all the time to make a larger reduction in the franchise than was proposed by the Liberal party. The consequence was a course of deception, which has been called by another name, but which I think must prevent any reliance upon a Government which openly avows that it does not mean what it says, but professes one thing and means another. (Cheers.) The Duke of Marlborough (with some warmth) asked the noble Lord what he meant. Lord Russell :—“If the noble Duke wishes to know what I mean, I must refer him to a speech made by the present Prime Minister at Edinburgh, in which the course taken by the Government was not called a course of deception—it was not called, as Mr. Disraeli formerly called the Government of Sir Robert Peel, ‘an hypocrisy’—it was called a ‘process of education.’ (Laughter.) But the use of that word does not prevent the fact being quite clear, which the present First Lord of the Treasury did not endeavour to excuse or apologize for, of which he even boasted, that during seven years, during which the fears of the country had been excited respecting a reduction of the franchise, against which Mr. Disraeli protested in the House of Commons, afterwards congratulating the electors of Buckinghamshire that no such reduction of the franchise had taken place—during all that time he had been educating his party with a view to bring about a much greater reduction of the franchise, and what he would at one time have called a greater ‘degradation of the franchise,’ than any which his opponents had proposed. (Cheers.)”

5.—The House of Commons was crowded to hear the new Premier's declaration of policy. After a tribute to the great merits of the late Premier, Mr. Disraeli said :—“In succeeding to the position of Lord Derby I have succeeded to the principles on which he established his Administration some years ago, and which he has more or less advocated and upheld for the last twenty years, maintaining an unbroken and unswerving course. For twenty years past I have been in confidential co-operation with Lord Derby, and I must, therefore, be cognisant of the principles and opinions he holds on all the great questions of the day. With respect to the foreign policy of the present Administration, we shall follow that course which has been pursued under the guidance of my noble friend near me, I believe I may say, with the approbation of Parliament, and, I think I may add, with the confidence of Europe. (Cheers.) That policy is a policy of peace—not of peace at any price for the mere interests of England, but a policy of peace, from the conviction that such a policy is for the general interests of the world. We do not believe that policy is likely to be secured by selfish isolation, but, on the contrary, we believe it may be secured by sympathy with other countries, not merely in their prosperous fortunes, but even in their anxieties and troubles. If such a policy be continued, I have no doubt, when the occasion may arise—and periodical occasions will arise when the influence of England is necessary to maintain the peace of the world—that influence will not be found inefficient, because it is founded on respect and regard.” Next came his domestic policy :—“I say at once that the present Administration will pursue a liberal policy. (Cries of ‘Hear’ from different parts of the House.) I mean a truly liberal policy—a policy that will not shrink from any changes which are required by the wants of the age we live in, but will never forget that it is our happy lot to dwell in an ancient and historic country, rich in traditional influences, that are the best security for order and liberty, and the most valuable element of our national character and our national strength. (Cheers.)” Mr. Bouverie moved the adjournment of the House in order to make some comments on the Ministerial programme. “Why are Conservatives now in the possession of power? Simply because the Liberal party, though an undoubted majority in this House, and representing a vast preponderance of opinion in the country, does not deserve to be called a party. That may be an unpalatable truth, but it is truth notwithstanding. We have leaders that won't lead, and followers that won't follow. Instead of an organized party, we are little better than a rabble. (Laughter.) We have none of the advantages of party except strength of numbers, which the right hon. gentleman opposite wants. It is a great public calamity, most detrimental and injurious to the public interests, that the Government of the country should be carried on by those who are in a minority in the House of Commons. It must lead to a wavering, inconsistent, uncertain policy; and the experience of the last two years amply confirms this opinion. . . Looking to party questions and to party divisions, it seems as if the old party battle-fields were being swept away, as if the old standards of party were no longer to be raised, and as though we must contemplate some amalgamation or union of those who most sympathise in their general views of policy, apart from those great questions upon which our leading statesmen now separate from each other. . . The right hon. gentleman opposite must be sufficiently acquainted with the spirit of the times to know that he cannot make the Irish Church the battle-field on which to stake the existence of the Ministry. And upon the Irish land question are we not all practically agreed, except perhaps the hon. member for Westminster, who, by the way of wiping out the results and the effects of three great land confiscations in that country, proposes a fourth? Practically, are we not substantially agreed on both sides of this House that some interest must be given to the tenant in that country for the unexhausted improvements which he has effected upon the land? Are there any other questions which are likely to divide parties in this House for some time to come?

If there are not, I think the public interest has suffered by the right hon. gentleman having neglected to attempt some mode in which he might have brought to bear, for the advantage of the public, the talent to be found among gentlemen on this side of the House as, well as among those behind him, for the purpose of carrying, by a strong and united Government, those measures which he must be convinced are for the benefit of the country." The motion for the adjournment of the House was afterwards withdrawn, and the order of the day proceeded with.

5.—Thesecond reading of the Capital Punishments within Prisons Bill (now extended to Scotland) carried by a majority of 181 to 25.

6.—The Premier sends the following letter (dated Downing-street) to the newspapers with reference to Earl Russell's remarks in the House of Lords:—"Sir, Lord Russell observed last night in the House of Lords that I 'boasted at Edinburgh, that, while during seven years I opposed a reduction of the borough franchise, I had been all that time educating my party, with the view of bringing about a much greater reduction of the franchise than that which my opponents had proposed.' As a general rule, I never notice misrepresentation of what I may have said; but as this charge against me was made in an august assembly, and by a first Minister of the Crown, I will not refrain from observing that the charge has no foundation. Nothing of the kind was said by me at Edinburgh. I said there that the Tory party, after the failure of their bill of 1859, had been educated for seven years on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and during that interval had arrived at five conclusions, which with their authority I had at various times announced, viz.—1. That the measure should be complete. 2. That the representation of no place should be entirely abrogated. 3. That there must be a real Boundary Commission. 4. That the county representation should be considerably increased. 5. That the borough franchise should be established on the principle of rating. And that these five points were accomplished in the Act of 1867. This is what I said at Edinburgh, and it is true."

— In a debate on the Alabama claims, Lord Stanley said this country had conceded everything asked for when the dispute began. At that time the question of premature recognition of belligerent rights had not assumed its present importance. Incidentally it was mentioned, but that was all. "But by a curious process that grievance, whatever its value may be, has been gaining importance in the minds of American public men, just in proportion as we are willing to remove other causes of complaint. (Cheers.) The sole point unsettled between us is this—'You are willing,' the United States say, 'to refer to arbitration the question of the Alabama and other kindred vessels; are you willing to include, as a point in the reference, the question whether you were right or wrong in recognising the Confederates when you did?' To that the answer we have given in substance is that, as at present advised, I cannot see what bearing the two things have on each other. For all political purposes, as bearing on the events of 1862, you might as well include the question, whether we were right or wrong in the war of 1812."—He supposed that no one would contend that the Confederates had never at any period in the struggle become entitled to belligerent rights. "But if they were belligerents at some time, and not so when recognised as such, when did they become so? Take a date that would test the question. If ever they were belligerents, I suppose they were so after the celebrated battle at Bull Run. They had then a large force in the field, for a time at least they had achieved a military superiority, and, above all, Washington was threatened. Suppose we had recognised them after that battle, would any human being have found fault with us? Could any one have charged us with being precipitate in our recognition? And had we done that, how would it have affected the Alabama question? The Alabama escaped in April 1862; Bull Run was fought in July 1861. If I had chosen to take that line of argument in my despatch, it would have been competent for me to contend in this way—'I grant we were wrong in recognising the Confederacy when we did. We ought to have done it in August, and not in May. We were six months too soon. But, having admitted that, will you, the American Government, tell me how your case as regards the Alabama would be in any way affected if we had done what you contended we ought, and made the recognition six months, instead of twelve months, before the Alabama sailed.'" It was on this ground of irrelevancy that he (Lord Stanley) chiefly rested. "Suppose we had not recognised the South, and suppose that fortune had decided in their favour, would they be entitled to call us to account for not having recognised them soon enough, and thereby having injured their prospects? So stated, the question seems absurd. But if we are responsible one way, we are responsible the other. If damages are to be given for premature recognition, as injuring one side, why not for tardy recognition, as injuring the other? In what position is a neutral power placed whenever a war breaks out? This is not a question for the moment only. It is a question of general international law. It is a question which will create a precedent, and we are bound not merely to do what is convenient for the moment, but to do what is right in the light of the duties of nations in general towards each other. (Cheers.) After all, in recognising the Confederates, we simply declared that to be a civil war, which Mr. Seward, on the part of the American Government, had declared to be such. These documents were not private letters, but state papers, which have been since published and laid before the public. They bear date nine, twelve, and sixteen days before the Queen's Proclamation. I will read only one, and that shall be brief. On the 4th of May, nine days before the issue of the Queen's Proclamation, Mr. Seward writes in these terms—"The insurgents have instituted revolution, with open, flagrant, and deadly war, to compel the United States to acquiesce in the dismemberment of the Union. The United States have accepted this civil war as an inevitable necessity." (Correspondence relating to foreign affairs accompanying the President's Message to Congress in December 1861, p. 165.) I should be sorry to say anything that would look like want of courtesy to the eminent and accomplished diplomatist by whom the correspondence has been conducted throughout, and than whom no man in the United States has probably had greater experience. But if the question were one which we could discuss apart from politics, and if we were not thousands of miles apart, but could meet face to face, I should venture to ask him whether he could with gravity call upon me solemnly to refer to the arbitration of some neutral body, or some third party, this question, Whether we, the British Government, had a right, on the 13th of May, to declare that to be civil war, which, in various documents, especially in one dated the 4th of May, he, Mr. Seward himself, had christened by that name? (Cheers.) Let it be also noted that the highest Court in America had also declared the state of things then existing to be civil war. Besides, if there were no war, there was, of course, no blockade, and we might claim damages for every blockade-runner captured. Claims such as these would mount up to an almost inconceivable total, and I really cannot think that the statesmen of the United States would be willing to let in these enormous claims for the sake of insisting upon a point which practically, and in its immediate application, is not important, though I admit that indirectly it may have considerable importance."

6.—Came on for hearing in the Rolls Court the case of Lord Brougham v. Dr. Cauvin, being a claim for literary work performed by desire and for the interest of the plaintiff. From the preliminary proceedings which took place in this case it appeared that Dr. Cauvin was selected by Lord Brougham to prepare the memoir of his life, and in particular to look over and arrange the letters received from King William, Lord Melbourne, and other eminent men during the past half-century. There was no bargain as to remuneration, nor was there any principle laid down by which remuneration was to be afterwards fixed. When the first volume approached completion, Dr. Cauvin made an application for payment, on account, of a sum so large as induced William Brougham, on behalf of his brother, to object till a statement was furnished of the entire probable payment expected. Dr. Cauvin thereupon refused to restore the letters and other documents entrusted to him; and the aid of the Court of Chancery was now sought to enforce recovery of them. A special claim was made to-day to have Lord Murray's letters delivered up, but the Chief Clerk thought they had better remain in Dr. Cauvin's possession till an order was made regarding the whole.

7.—Fall of the premises in the Strand formerly occupied by Holloway and Son. The building was about to be removed in connexion with the improvements around the new Law Courts.

9.—The Scotch Reform Bill read a second time without a division. In the early part of the debate an amendment was moved by Mr. Hadfield opposing any increase of members of the House, but it was not pressed to a division.

10.—Debate on Mr. Maguire's motion, that the House resolve itself into a Committee to take the condition of Ireland into immediate consideration. The chief interest in the discussion was excited by Lord Mayo making a declaration of the intended Irish policy of the Government. A Commission was to be appointed to inquire into the whole state of the relations between landlord and tenant; and in the meantime a bill would be introduced providing for an easy compensation for money laid out in improvements, and another for rendering more efficient the working of Irish railways. The question of the general education of the people was already under the consideration of a Commission; and with regard to the Universities, the Government proposed to leave Trinity and the Queen's Colleges as they were, and to grant a charter to a Roman Catholic University. The senate would consist of a chancellor and a vice-chancellor, four prelates nominated by the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and six elected laymen. With regard to endowment, it would of course be necessary to ask Parliament to provide for the expenses of the building, and the officers and professors, and probably Parliament would not feel indisposed to endow certain University scholarships. He could not propose the endowment of any colleges until something was known of what the nature of the colleges were likely to be. With regard to the Irish Church, it was not proposed to take any immediate action during the present session of Parliament. Seeing that an inquiry was now going on, which would be completed in the course of a few months, it was not desirable to legislate until the result of that inquiry was made known. He did not believe that the Irish Church could be overthrown without a fierce and protracted struggle; and if it were to fall, it would inflict incalculable injury on the country. The debate was protracted over four nights, and ended in the withdrawal of Mr. Maguire's resolution. On the third night, Mr. Bright spoke against the Government proposals. "I recollect," he said, "that Addison, a good while ago now, writing about the curious things that happened in his time, said there was a man in his county

—I do not know whether it was in Buckinghamshire or not—(a laugh)—he was not a Cabinet Minister, he was only a mountebank—(great laughter)—but this man set up a stall, and to the country people he offered to sell pills that were very good against the earthquake. (Roars of laughter.)” And then Mr. Bright went on to apply his story by showing that there was a social and political earthquake in Ireland, and that the proposal to found a University for the sons of the Catholic gentlemen of Ireland was Mr. Disraeli’s pill against the earthquake.—Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli wound up the debate on the 16th. The former went at considerable length into the question of education in Ireland, the land laws, and the Church. Speaking of appeals which had been made urging the Irish people to loyalty and union, Mr. Gladstone concluded:—“Sir, that is our object too, but I am afraid that as to the means the differences are still profound, and it is idle, it is mocking, to use words unless we can sustain them by corresponding substance. That substance can be supplied only by the unreserved devotion of our efforts now, in this, perhaps the last, stage of the Irish crisis, to remove the scandal and the mischief which have so long weakened and afflicted the empire. For that work I trust strength will be given to us. If we are prudent men, I hope we shall endeavour as far as in us lies to make some provision for a contingent, a doubtful, and probably a dangerous future. If we be chivalrous men, I trust we shall endeavour to wipe away all those stains which the civilized world has for ages seen, or seemed to see, on the shield of England in her treatment of Ireland. If we be compassionate men, I hope we shall now, once for all, listen to the tale of woe which comes from her, and the reality of which, if not its justice, is testified by the continued migration of her people—that we shall ‘raze out the written troubles from her brain, and pluck from her memory the rooted sorrow.’ (Cheers.) But, above all, if we be just men, we shall go forward in the name of truth and right, bearing this in mind—that, when the case is proved, and the hour is come, justice delayed is justice denied.” Mr. Disraeli described himself as the most unfortunate of Ministers in being called upon to deal with “the crisis of a national controversy” almost before he had taken his seat. “But,” he asked, “what was the first element of this portentous crisis? It was the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. But the Government found it so when they came to office. They found that their predecessors, at whose head was the right hon. gentleman, attached much more gravity to this state of things than they did now. The other elements of the crisis were emigration and the Irish Church. But the right hon. gentleman had been a powerful member of the most powerful Government of the present day, yet he had not until now felt the immediate urgent necessity of dealing with these questions. The Government had already intimated that they were prepared to deal with every one of the questions raised by the right hon. gentleman when the proper time came; but in his opinion the first was the Irish Reform Bill, which would have been brought in that night if it had not been for this debate. He protested against the assumption that the Government intended to ask the House to endow and charter a Roman Catholic University. What they intended was to ask it to pay the same expenses as they did for the London University. The Government desired to show their recognition of the fact that something must be done for higher education in Ireland, and had proposed what they thought a most practicable plan, against which he had heard no valid objection.” . . . Speaking of the religious feelings of the Irish, Mr. Disraeli said:—“If there is a people who may be described as the most religious people in the world, it is the people of Ireland. It is there no affair of race; and whether a man be Presbyterian, or Anglican, or Roman, religion is one of the great elements of his life, and the day does not pass without religious convictions exercising an immense influence over his actions. Now, I say that a religious people will always be in favour of ecclesiastical endowments. They may quarrel among themselves upon particular points, but a religious people will always be in favour of co-operations that give importance and precision to their convictions; and therefore I think that we are embarking in a very dangerous course when, at a period at which no one could have anticipated it, a right hon. gentleman of great standing in the country comes forward suddenly, as it were from ambush—(oh, oh)—and announces that he proposes to destroy an institution which he has himself often advocated, and which he has told us to-night has existed from the time of the Tudors: but we are invited to follow this policy in deference to the principles of a greater master upon this subject, who, with the honourable candour which, I think, is part of his character, has told us what is the issue at stake—namely, whether we should terminate in this country ecclesiastical endowments.” Describing it as an indecency on the part of the present House of Commons to attempt to settle the question of the Irish Church without appealing to the enlarged constituencies, Mr. Disraeli concluded: “No one pretends that the material effect of endowments is not advantageous to Ireland, and there is no doubt that their abolition would be injurious. It would deprive a country which complains of an absentee proprietary of many residents who are men of character, with some affluence, and whose social action is admitted to be beneficial. It strikes me as a general principle that our mission in Ireland should be to create and not to destroy. (Cheers.) If the Church in Ireland is violently abolished, I should say you would add immensely to the elements of discord, violence, and confiscation.”

11.—In answer to a deputation which waited upon him with a memorial against Mr. Bouverie’s bill admitting Dissenters to the full enjoyment of University honours, the Archbishop of Canterbury said :—"Having been myself, as a Royal Commissioner, instrumental in the settlement by which, ten years since, the endowments of those Colleges were secured to the Church, I cannot be a party to any measure which would disturb that settlement, while it placed the government of the University, and the training of our youth within it, in the hands of those who might feel themselves in conscience bound not only to exclude from their teaching the distinctive doctrines of the Church of England, but even to sap the foundations of Christianity. What would be the character of the religious instruction given by those who might be of any creed or of no creed I will not attempt to describe ; but of this we may be assured, that under such a system religious teaching would in time be altogether abolished."

11.—Tried at Manchester Assizes William Dodd, treasurer of an Operative House-painters' Association, charged with having embezzled the funds of the Society to the amount of 800*l.*, and also with having forged a banker's pass-book in order to conceal his defalcations. The facts were not disputed ; but the defence set up was that the association was an illegal one, and that the charge of embezzlement could not, therefore, be sustained. With regard to the charge of forgery, it was urged that in law there was no account in existence as between the bankers and the society, and that, therefore, the crime of forgery could not have been committed. Mr. Justice Lush, after consulting with Mr. Justice Mellor, decided against both these pleas. "Although," said his Lordship, "it had been held that trade societies were not within the protection of the Friendly Societies Act, and therefore could not avail themselves of the special remedies given by that Act, they were in no other sense illegal societies, and their property, as well as their persons, were as much protected as the property and the persons of any other society." The prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

12.—Attempted assassination of the Duke of Edinburgh at Sydney. In the course of his visits over the colony the Duke consented to join in a picnic at Clontarf, organized partly in his own honour, and partly to benefit the funds of a Sailors' Home. While engaged in conversation with Sir William Manning, a little apart from the Governor and the Lord Chief Justice, a person was observed to take deliberate aim at his Royal Highness with a revolver, and, before the design could be frustrated, fire one barrel. The shot took effect about the middle of the back, an inch or two to the right of the spine. The Duke fell forward on his hands and knees, exclaiming, "Good God ! my back is broken." Sir William Manning instantly rushed on the assassin, who leaped back a step and aimed the weapon at Sir William. Stooping to evade the shot he lost his balance and fell. The second charge did not explode, and (668).

the third entered the ground, the assassin being seized at the moment of firing and his hands pinioned to his sides by Mr. Vial. His Royal Highness was conveyed to his tent with all gentleness and promptness, as it was evident he was suffering great pain. On examining the wound, it was found that the bullet had traversed the course of the ribs round by the right to the abdomen, and lodged there immediately below the surface. No vital part appeared to have been touched, and there was hope from the first that if the bullet could be extracted any fatal result might be avoided. To the anxious crowds who pressed round the tent the Duke sent a message :—"I am not much hurt ; I shall be better presently." He never lost consciousness, though he experienced considerable prostration from loss of blood and the shock to his nervous system. At five o'clock His Royal Highness was placed on a litter and borne by men of the Galatea to the deck of the Morpeth, a solemn silence being preserved by the people, who stood on either side while the cortège passed. The Prince, who was lying upon a stretcher with a soft mattress under him, and his head supported by pillows, was lowered into his barge, which was manned by a number of his own sailors. On arriving at the landing-place he was carefully raised out of the boat. The moment the assassin was seized a crowd gathered round him, and it was for some time feared that the people would not be dissuaded from inflicting summary vengeance on the spot. As it was, he was cut and bruised to an extent which made his removal to Darlinghurst prison a labour of some difficulty. He gave his name as Henry James O'Farrel, and plainly avowed that his intention was to have murdered his Royal Highness. It was at first widely reported that he was only one of several Fenian emissaries who had cast lots to take the Duke's life ; but this was afterwards disowned, and whatever his own political views were, it did not appear that any one beside himself was acquainted with the intended assassination. "I wish," O'Farrel said in his confession, "distinctly to assert that there was not a human being in existence who had the slightest idea of the object I had in view when I meditated on—and, through the merciful Providence of God, failed in carrying into effect—the death of the Duke of Edinburgh. I have written to the printers of two Irish periodicals an address to the people of Ireland. So certain was I of the death of the Duke of Edinburgh, that I stated therein that which I believed would be the fact ; and I think I have more than implied that I was but one of an organization to carry the same into effect. I need but say that the truth of the latter portion rests upon a slighter foundation than the former ; in fact, that, unless from mere hearsay, I had no foundation for stating that there was a Fenian organization in New South Wales." After various preliminary investigations O'Farrel was tried on the 26th, found guilty, and executed on the 21st April. The recovery of the Prince was so rapid that on the 18th he was pronounced convalescent; on the 24th he walked out and paid a visit to the Galatea, and on the 25th personally interceded with the governor in favour of O'Farrel. Though progressing thus far favourably, it was thought the climate might be against a complete recovery, and his Royal Highness was therefore ordered home with the Galatea. He received before leaving many evidences of the loyalty of the colonists, and the horror with which they viewed the attempt made upon his life.

13.—In the House of Lords the Duke of Argyll, when calling attention to the inconvenience arising out of the ratepaying clauses of the Reform Bill Act of last session, took occasion to censure Government for abandoning every issue they had raised in the discussion of the question, and the Conservative party for permitting themselves to be “educated” out of every opinion they had expressed. The misrepresentation (he said) in the letter of the Prime Minister of the points at issue between the two great contending parties was so broad—he had almost said so gross—that he conceived it absolutely necessary, for the honour of the Liberal party—for the honour of Parliament—that some of the misrepresentation should be exposed. As to the principle of rating, “it was utterly untrue” that it had ever been a point at issue between the two great parties—a statement which the noble Duke sought to substantiate by a reference to the Premier’s speeches, wherein it was stated that the most preposterous consequences would arise from the adoption of a rating instead of a value qualification. “And yet,” he repeated, “this very Minister now alleged that for seven years he had been urging this as a most important point upon the conscience and conviction of the country.” His account of the Reform contest was entirely inaccurate and wholly unjustified by the facts of the case; and he was grieved to observe that people seemed to be amused rather than shocked—were, indeed, beginning to regard these things as the ordinary tricks of professional politicians.—The Lord Chancellor in the course of his reply said:—“The term ‘personal rating’ is an equivocal term, and I could not help thinking that in the latter and larger part of his speech the noble Duke gave about as conspicuous an instance as could well be imagined of the personal rating which he so strongly deprecated. There is, however, one misfortune about the personal rating of this kind that the person rated happens not to be a member of your Lordship’s House; and I undertake to tell the noble Duke that if he had been a member of this House there would have been no doubt whatever that the rating would have been amply repaid.” The Lord Chancellor then went on to defend the Premier from the false issues which he described as having been raised by the Duke of Argyll concerning the disputed Edinburgh speech. The question was whether the Prime Minister admitted that he had pursued the tactics denounced by Earl Russell.

“I indignantly deny that anything of the kind was said at Edinburgh. The noble Duke became extremely fervid and eloquent about the tricks of politicians and the honour of your Lordships’ House. I rejoice to think that in your Lordship’s House accuracy of statement has always been regarded as it ought to be. I think, therefore, that before any member of the House makes a charge against the First Minister of the Crown, who cannot be here to rebut it, to the effect that he made at Edinburgh a particular statement which would have the result of depriving his Government of confidence, he ought at least to be satisfied that such a statement was made.” Earl Russell supported the Duke of Argyll, and complained that the charges against the Government had not been fairly met.

13.—Monsignor Lucien Buonaparte and eight other ecclesiastics created cardinals.

14.—His Excellency the Hon. C. T. Adams presented with an address by the British branch of the International League of Peace and Liberty on the occasion of retiring from the American Embassy in London.

—At the coroner’s inquest on the body of Lady Tichborne, the new claimant for the baronetcy is examined as a witness regarding the last days of the deceased. He had recently appeared in England claiming to be Roger Charles Doughty Tichborne, eleventh baronet, and heir to the title and estates of the family. The claimant stated that after meeting with various misfortunes, consequent on a voyage he had undertaken twenty-seven years ago, he reached Australia, and remained there up to the time of his leaving for England. He was admitted by the deceased lady to be her son, and was in immediate and friendly relation with her up to the time of her death; but his identity was denied by the other members of the family interested in the disposal of the property. At the funeral, on the 20th, the two parties quarrelled, and Lord Arundel of Wardour, the uncle of the infant now in possession of the estates, withdrew from the procession.

16.—Died, at Torquay, aged 64, Dr. Robert Lee, of Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh, a prominent minister of the Scotch Church, and Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Edinburgh.

19.—The Earl of Mayo introduces the Irish Reform Bill into the House of Commons. It proposed to fix the borough franchise at 47., occupiers below that rental not paying rates in Ireland. Dublin was to have a third member on the three-cornered principle, and there was to be a limited redistribution of seats, but no alteration in the number of members.

20.—In Paris, M. Greunier of the Figaro, and M. Richard of the Situation, were fined—the former 1,000 fr., the latter 5,000 fr.—for publishing articles disrespectful to the Legislative body.

20.—"Captain" Mackay, a Fenian leader, sentenced to twelve years' penal servitude for treason-felony.

21.—Defeat of the Papal party in Vienna. At to-day's sitting of the Upper House of the Reichsrath, a proposal of Count Mensdorff, that the debate upon the Civil Marriage Bill should be adjourned, was defeated by 65 votes against 45, and the proposals of the minority of the Committee were then rejected by 69 against 34 votes. In to-day's sitting of the Committee of the Upper House of the Reichsrath upon the Public Schools Bill, the majority agreed to all the principal features of the bill as passed by the Lower House. The minority proposed that the bill should be referred to a committee, which should be instructed to draw up a new bill, having for its basis the preservation of the influence of the Roman Catholic Church over the religious and moral education of the young, and the maintenance of the denominational system in the popular middle schools.

—The remains of the Italian patriot, Daniel Manin, conveyed with great pomp to Venice.

23.—Mr. Gladstone gives notice of his intention to move the following resolutions on the subject of the Irish Church:—"First, that in the opinion of this House it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment—due regard being had to all personal interests, and to all individual rights of property. Secondly, that, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity or involving individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament. And third, that an address be presented to her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to the purposes aforesaid, her Majesty be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament her interest in the temporalities of the archbishoprics, bishoprics, and other ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland, and in the custodies thereof." Mr. Disraeli undertook that arrangements would be made for commencing the discussion on Monday the 30th.

—President Johnson files answers to the articles of impeachment denying all the charges preferred against him. A delay of thirty days was requested, but refused by 41 to 12 votes.

24.—The Duke of Marlborough lays on the table of the House of Lords the Government measure relating to elementary education. It was proposed to give payments for results on a secular principle, so that when a school offered itself to be inspected, and showed that it complied with the conditions of the grant as to sanitary arrangements and space, it should not be denied the benefit of the Government grant. At the same time, it was intended to insert in the schedule of the bill the management clauses which relate to Church of England and other denominational schools, exactly as they now stand. In order that small schools, in poorer districts, might participate in the grant, it was proposed, without abandoning the system of certificates, to take a limit below which schools might receive a portion of the annual grant without the employment of a certificated teacher. The limit would be sixty-five scholars. Schools with less than that number of children, on applying for inspection, and being certified to be suitable in regard to cleanliness and space, might present their scholars for examination, and obtain the grant of 2s. 8d. on each head of reading, writing, and arithmetic, but without the payment of 4s. 10d. for attendance. The bill proposed, further, to make some addition to the building grants, to amend the conscience clause by providing that the religious teaching of the school should be left uninterfered with, but that every parent should have liberty to withdraw his child when religious instruction was being given, and to empower the Secretary of State for Education to take an educational census, so that Parliament might possess full information upon the subject.

24.—In reply to an address from the Conservative and Constitutional Association, the Premier writes to the President, the Earl of Dartmouth:—"We have heard something lately of the crisis of Ireland. In my opinion, the crisis of England is rather at hand; for the purpose is now avowed, and that by a powerful party, of destroying that sacred union between the Church and State which has hitherto been the chief means of our civilization, and is the only security for our religious liberty." The Earl of Derby, in reply to another address, wrote:—"It was not without a pang, and only under a conviction of the absolute necessity of the step, that I found myself compelled to ask permission to withdraw from the service of a sovereign to whose gracious favour I am so deeply indebted, and to sever my official connexion with a party which for so many years has honoured me with its confidence, and for many members of which I entertain a personal as well as political regard. It was, however, very satisfactory to me to be empowered to transfer the office which I had had the honour of holding to one whose co-operation and friendship I had enjoyed for more than twenty years, and who, I am persuaded, will prove himself not unmindful of those great constitutional principles which it has been the study of my life to uphold, and to which, so far as my health will permit, I shall not cease to give my earnest, though unofficial, support."

25.—The Prime Minister holds his first reception in the new Foreign Office, magnificently fitted up for the purpose. The company was large and distinguished, the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family being present.

25.—The Minister of Public Instruction threatens to close the University of Bologna in consequence of a demonstration made by the students in favour of three professors who had been suspended for expressing Republican sentiments.

26.—The House of Lords appoints a committee to inquire into the operation of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, a bill for the repeal of which was now before the House of Commons.

— In Committee on the Mutiny Bill, Mr. Otway, by a majority of 152 to 127, carried a motion prohibiting courts-martial from passing sentence of corporal punishment in time of peace within the Queen's dominions.

— President Johnson vetoes the bill prohibiting appeals from the Circuit to the Supreme Court on the ground that it leaves cases involving life and liberty wholly exposed to the judgment of the inferior courts, and has a retrospective effect in interdicting appeals already before the Supreme Court.

27.—Amid great cheering from the Ministerialists, Lord Stanley announced his intention this evening of proposing the following amendment on Monday next on the motion for going into Committee on the Irish Church Establishment:—"That this House, while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the united Church in Ireland may, after pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment, or disendowment, of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of the new Parliament." In answer to Mr. Gladstone, Lord Stanley said his resolution was not to be proposed as an amendment in Committee, but at the first stage of the discussion, on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair.

28.—Sir R. Phillimore delivers the judgment of the Arches Court in the ritual case of Martin v. Mackonochie. The cases of incense and mixing water with the wine were decided to be illegal. Lighted candles during the celebration of Holy Communion, the Dean held to be lawful; and with regard to the fourth charge—the "elevation" of the elements—that he thought should have been proceeded with before the bishop, and not as a criminal prosecution. This judgment was appealed from to the Privy Council, who on the 24th Dec. decided against Mr. Mackonochie on all points, and ordered him to pay the costs of suit and appeal.

— Toulon Railway Station burned.

— Rioting in Belgium, arising out of a dispute between the miners and their employers. At Charleroi the military were called out, and several of the rioters wounded.

— Died from the effects of a fall off his horse Earl Cardigan, aged 72.

— At a dinner given to Mr. Brand for the purpose of presenting him with a testimonial in recognition of his long services as Liberal whip Mr. Gladstone, who occupied the chair, made a speech of considerable significance with reference to the impending discussion on the Irish Church. "Having put our hand to the plough," he said, "we shall not look back. I have entertained from the first a confident hope and belief that a long and arduous struggle would be accompanied with complete success. After the sample with which we have become acquainted of the steps by which we are to be opposed, I feel more confident than ever of the completeness of our success. I feel less apprehensive as to the intolerable length of the conflict. These are very grave and serious matters, and we cannot too seriously ponder them. Rely upon it, the issues involved are not those of this or that Minister, nor are they even—which is far more important—of this or that party. They are in the highest degree imperial questions. They go to the very root of our national security and prosperity. Now, therefore, is the time to address ourselves, not as to a trivial work, but as to one demanding every exertion we can make, and with a firm determination that, so far as depends upon us, efforts shall not be wanting to establish throughout the civilized world the good name of England in her relation to her sister Ireland, and to make these kingdoms united not merely by the paper bonds of the law, but by the blessed law of concord and harmony, which is written on the heart of man."

30.—Commencement of the debate on Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church resolutions. The first division took place on the motion that the House go into Committee on the resolutions, as against Lord Stanley's amendment. Mr. Gladstone having moved that the Acts relating to the Irish Church be read, spoke for an hour and a half on the failure of the Establishment and the necessity that was now laid upon them of at least suspending appointments to any of the higher dignities. "If I was asked," he said, "as to my expectation of the issue of the struggle, I begin by frankly owning that I for one would not have entered into it unless I believed that the final hour was about to sound. (Hear, hear.) I hope the noble lord will forgive me if I say that before Friday last I thought the thread of the remaining life of the Irish Established Church was short. Since Friday last at half-past four o'clock, and since the few moments when he stood at the table, I regard it as shorter still. (Cheers.) The issue is not in our hands. What we have had and have to do is to consider well and deeply before we take that first step in an engagement such as this; but having entered into the controversy we must quit ourselves like men, and make every effort to remove what still remains of the scandal and calamity of the relation between England and Ireland, and use our best exertions to build up with the cement of honour and concord the noble fabric of the British empire."—Lord Stanley then submitted his resolution, urging the House to adopt it, as it would leave the new Parliament perfectly free and unfettered, and prevent them from rushing hastily into a question with which they were constitutionally incompetent to deal. Lord Cranborne denounced the Government for acting as if they meant to betray the Irish Church, and described their policy as unworthy and ambiguous. On the second night of the debate Mr. Hardy treated the resolutions as an attack upon the rights of property, and objected entirely to the principle of disestablishment. He also taunted Mr. Gladstone with hastily changing his views on the Irish Church, and quoted in corroboration a portion of the letter addressed by him to Dr. Hannah in 1865 (see p. 554). On the third night Mr. Lowe made a fierce attack on the Government as well as on the Irish Church. The former, he said, came before the House with two different lines of policy, as explained by Lord Stanley and Mr. Hunt, and generally was entrapping members in a manner calculated to lower the character of public men. Of the Church he said, "You may call it sacred, you may unite it by Acts of Parliament to the English Church, you may, like Mezentius, link the dead with the living. His object was to kill, for he knew that coupling with a dead body would be death to the living. Your object is to save, and yet you adopt the same process. You see the living Church of England, the dying Church of Ireland. Why are you so anxious to unite them, seeing how much they are different? You put machinery in motion which may destroy the Irish Church, and which may involve the English Church also. Rely on it all your efforts are in vain. You may do your utmost, but you will not save the Irish Church, nor will the country give you the power of having the pleasure of destroying her. You will not be able to play over again your game of last year. The net of the fowler will not again ensnare the birds. The Irish Church is founded on injustice, on the dominant rights of the few over the many, and it shall not stand. (Cheers.) You call it a missionary Church: if so, its mission is unfulfilled. It has utterly failed. It is like some exotic brought from a far country, tended with infinite pains and useless trouble. It is kept alive with the greatest difficulty and at great expense in an ungenial climate and an ungrateful soil. The curse of barrenness is upon it. It has no leaves, puts forth no blossom, and yields no fruit. Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" The debate was concluded on the night of the 3d April, the fourth night of discussion, in the course of which Mr. Disraeli defended himself and his colleagues, and replied also with some severity to Mr. Lowe. "The High Church Ritualists (he declared) and the followers of the Pope have been long in secret combination, and are now in open confederacy." In reply to the taunting laughter with which the statement was received, the Premier further alleged that the proposals of Mr. Gladstone were not confined to mere political arrangements, but attacked the Crown itself. Mr. Gladstone wound up the debate, remarking, in the course of his speech, that there were some portions of the Premier's statement of which he failed to see the relevancy, and other portions apparently due to the influence of a heated imagination. The division showed—for the resolutions, 331; against, 270: majority against Ministers, 61. The remaining members of the House were thus accounted for—Speaker, 1; tellers, 4; vacant seats, 6; pairs and absentees, 46.

30.—The impeachment of President Johnson opened before the Senate by General Butler.

31.—The negotiations of the Government with the Irish Roman Catholic prelates were thus described by Lord Mayo in reply to a communication of this day's date received from Archbishop Leahy and Bishop Derry:—"With great clearness and frankness you set forth the alterations which you recommended should be made in the framework of the new institution, as it was described in a memorandum which I had the honour of placing in your hands. The alterations which you said that you considered necessary were principally based on the assumption that there was not sufficient scope given in the constitution of the University and its governing body for the exercise by the Roman Catholic prelates of their authority in matters appertaining to faith and morals, or over the books that were to be used by the students. In order, therefore, fully to provide for the exercise of that episcopal control which you appear to deem essential, you said that it was not competent for laymen or even clergymen of the second order, however learned, to judge authoritatively of matters relating to faith and morality, and that the very least power that could be claimed for the bishops or the senate would be that of an absolute negative on the use of all books that might be deemed objectionable, and a power of veto on the first nomination of the professors of the University, as well as an authority for their dismissal. You also made propositions with regard to the election of the chancellor and the members of the senate, which would practically have put an end to anything like a system of free election on the part of the general body of the University. I apprised you in my letter of the 11th May, delayed, as I then informed you, by my unavoidable detention in Ireland, and my consequent inability to consult my colleagues, that these proposals could not be entertained; and on the 17th I received from you a note, which was but a simple acknowledgment of my letter. As no intimation was afterwards given of your desire to continue the correspondence, and as no notice beyond formal acknowledgment was taken of my last letter, I could come to no other conclusion than that the communications were at an end."

April 1.—Sir Robert Napier telegraphs:—"Head-quarters and 1st brigade at Abdiun, ten miles from the Jidda river. 2d Brigade twelve miles in rear; with elephant batteries, will concentrate at Sindary on the left bank of the Jidda, while the road across is being repaired. Distance from River Bashilo, 20 miles; from Magdala, 30 miles. Latest news from prisoners, 25th March, all well; troops all well." Received here 21st April.

1.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer obtains leave to introduce a bill enabling the Postmaster-General to acquire and maintain the electric telegraphs within the kingdom.

6.—News received in Washington of the murderous outrages perpetrated in Georgia by a new organized band of desperadoes known as the Ku-Klux-Klan.

— The Duke of Edinburgh leaves Sydney in the Galatea, being escorted to the Heads by a fleet of steamers and small boats.

— The Dresden Second Chamber sanction the abolition of capital punishment by a majority of two-thirds.

7.—Darcy M'Ghee, a prominent statesman in the New Dominions, shot on the steps of his residence in Ottawa. The victim in this case was said to have incurred bitter dislike by the zeal he had shown in the prosecution of disloyal Irishmen in Canada.

8.—Letters received in London from Dr Livingstone, dated from a district greatly beyond where he was said to have been murdered, and announcing that the traveller was in good health.

9.—With the view of excluding President Johnson from office, Mr. Sumner introduces a bill into the Senate, providing that no person should be eligible to the Presidency or Vice-Presidency for a second time.

— Sir Harry Parkes, British Minister at Jeddo, attacked by Japanese on his return to the Residency, after a visit to the Mikado.

— In a letter dated "Hughenden Manor, Maundy Thursday," the Prime Minister writes to the Vicar of Addington (Rev. A. Baker) :—"Reverend Sir, I have just received your letter, in which, as one of my constituents, you justify your right to ask for some explanation of my alleged assertion that the High Church Ritualists had been long in secret combination, and were now in open confederacy, with Irish Romanists for the destruction of the union between Church and State. I acknowledge your right to make this inquiry; and if I do not notice in detail the various suggestions in your letter, it is from no want of courtesy, but from the necessity of not needlessly involving myself in literary controversy. You are under a misapprehension if you suppose that I intended to cast any slur upon the High Church party. I have the highest respect for the High Church party; I believe there is no body of men in this country to which we have been more indebted, from the days of Queen Anne to the days of Queen Victoria, for the maintenance of the orthodox faith, the rights of the Crown, and the liberties of the people. In saying this I had no wish to intimate that the obligations of the country to the other great party in the Church are not equally significant. I have never looked upon the existence of parties in our Church as a calamity; I look upon them as a necessity, and a beneficent necessity. They are the natural and inevitable consequences of the mild and liberal principles of our ecclesiastical polity, and of the varying and opposite elements of the human mind and character. When I spoke, I referred to an extreme faction in the Church, of very modern date, that does not conceal its ambition to destroy the connexion between Church and State, and which I have reason to believe has been for some time in secret combination, and is now in open confederacy, with the Irish Romanists for the purpose. The Liberation Society, with its shallow and short-sighted fanaticism, is a mere instrument in the hands of this confederacy, and will probably be the first victim of the spiritual despotism the Liberation Society is now blindly working to establish. As I hold that the dissolution of the union between Church and State will cause permanently a greater revolution in this country than foreign conquest, I shall use my utmost energies to defeat these fatal machinations. Believe me, Rev. Sir, your faithful member and servant,—B. DISRAELI."

10.—Discovered in an empty house at Hackney Wick the body of a lunatic named Heaseman, who had committed suicide under circumstances leading to the belief that another mysterious and frightful murder was now brought to light.

— Release of the Abyssinian prisoners. Defeated in an engagement on the heights of Islamgie, King Theodore now began negotiations for the delivery of the European captives, though not till he had slain in the most remorseless manner a large number of his native prisoners. Lieutenant Prideaux and Mr. Flad were the parties fixed upon by the King to carry out the final negotiations. "We were dismissed," writes the former, "with the message, 'I had thought before this that I was a strong man, but I have now discovered that there are stronger: now reconcile me.' We then left him, accompanied by Dejay Alame, his son-in-law, for the British camp at Aroge, where we arrived after a two hours' ride, and were warmly greeted by the many friends I had not seen for so long a time, and had scarcely expected ever to see again. After breakfast and a short stay in the camp, we returned to his Majesty, bearing a letter from Sir Robert Napier, couched in firm but conciliatory terms, and assuring the King that, provided he submitted to the Queen of England and brought all his prisoners and the other Europeans to the British camp, honourable treatment would be accorded to himself and to all his family. When we arrived, he was sitting on the brow of Selasse, overlooking the British camp, and apparently in anything but a pleasant humour, having been previously joined by Mr. Waldmeier. We presented ourselves before him, and delivered to him a letter, which was twice translated to him. At the conclusion of the second reading he asked in a deliberate manner, 'What does honourable treatment mean; does it mean that the English will help me to subdue my enemies, or does it mean honourable treatment as a prisoner?' I replied to him that on the first point the Commander-in-Chief had said nothing, that all his wishes were contained in his letter, and that the English army had simply come into the country to rescue their fellow-countrymen, and, that object effected, they would then return. This answer evidently pleased him but little. All his hopes of re-establishing himself by British aid were dashed to the ground, and he had thenceforward to lead the precarious life of a brigand chief. His lips, always as thin as a sword-blade, quivered nervously; the horse-shoe on his forehead grew deeper: but controlling himself, he motioned us to seat ourselves at a little distance from him, while he dictated an answer to his chief scribe, and when it was finished, called us forward, delivered it over to us, and bade us depart. The pith of this incoherent epistle was simply that he had hitherto surrendered himself to no man, and was not prepared to do so now. Our second stay in the British camp lasted about a couple of hours, at the expiration of which time the Commander-in-Chief felt himself called upon to despatch us, however reluctantly, to the fortress. We took our departure hoping for the best, but fearing the worst. This time no letter was handed to us, but simply a verbal communication of the same purport as the former note. It was growing dusk as we neared Selasse for the second time; and we were beginning to make the last ascent, when we encountered a European, accompanied by several Abyssinians. This proved to be Meyer, one of the German artisans, who communicated to us the welcome intelligence that the King had liberated Mr. Rassam, Dr. Blanc, Consul Cameron, with the remaining Magdala prisoners, and that they were now descending the hill—news which was corroborated by the accompanying natives. On receipt of these tidings, we turned the heads of our mules, and, in company with Mr. Meyer, arrived in the camp as the bearers of good news, not only to ourselves, but to every one of those who surrounded us. Shortly afterwards, Mr. Rassam and his party arrived; and it was with heartfelt gratitude that we laid our heads on the pillow that night, secure at last after so many dangers. In the course of the following morning the remainder of the Europeans, accompanied by their families, arrived. The King also, as it was Easter Sunday, sent a present of 1,000 cows and 500 sheep to the Commander-in-Chief, who, seeing that his Majesty had avoided complying with, perhaps, the most important terms of the communication addressed to him—namely, his own sub-

10.—King Theodore writes to Sir R. Napier:—"In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, one God: the King of Kings, Theodorus! May it reach the beloved servant of the great Queen of England. I am writing to you without being able to address you by name, because our intercourse has arisen so unexpectedly. I am grieved at having sent you my writing of yesterday, and at having quarrelled with you, my friend. When I saw your manner of fighting, and the discipline of your army, and when my people failed to execute my orders, then I was consumed with sorrow to think that although I killed and punished my soldiers, yet they would not return to the battle. Whilst the fires of jealousy burned within me, Satan came to me in the night, and tempted me to kill myself with my own pistol; but reflecting that God would be angry with me if I were to go in this manner, and leave my army without a protector, I sent to you in a hurry, lest I might die and all things be in confusion before my messenger would reach you. After my messenger had gone, I cocked my pistol, and putting it in my mouth, pulled the trigger. Though I pulled and pulled, it would not go off. But when my people rushed upon me, and laid hold of the pistol, it was discharged just as they had drawn it from my mouth. God having thus signified to me that I should not die but live, I sent to you Mr. Rassam that same evening, that your heart might be made easy. To-day is Easter; be pleased to let me send a few cows to you. . . . You require from me all the Europeans, even to my best friend, Mr. Waldmeier. Well, be it so; they shall go. But, now that we are friends, you must not leave me without artisans, as I am a lover of the mechanical arts."

13.—Capture of Magdala. "By three o'clock," writes Sir Robert Napier, "the Abyssinians having nearly all cleared away from Islamgia, I ordered the attack of Magdala to be commenced at once. The attacking force consisted of the 2d Brigade, led by the 33d Regiment, accompanied by detachments of the Royal Engineers and Madras and Bombay Sappers and Miners, to clear away obstacles—the 1st Brigade to be a close support. The enemy carefully concealed themselves from view, so that the place seemed almost deserted; although when entered by our troops it was found to be thronged with soldiers who had thrown away their arms. The attack was ably conducted by Sir Charles Staveley, and gallantly carried out by the troops. The Royal Engineers and Sappers, and leading sections of the 33d Regiment, were long before they could force an entrance; and during this time nine officers and men received wounds. At length an entrance was effected by means of the ladders near the gate, and by the leading men of the 33d, who scaled a rock and turned the defence of the gateway. The enemy were driven to the second barricade, and when that was carried all resistance ceased. Amongst the dead near the outer gate were found several of Theodore's most devoted chiefs—one of whom had urged Theodore to murder all the captives, a course from which he was dissuaded by others. At the moment when the barricade was forced by the 33d Theodore fell—as we have since learned, by his own hands. His troops fled immediately—some by the Kaffir Burr gate, which we found choked with arms that had been cast away in their flight. The command of Magdala was entrusted to Brigadier-General Walby, who held it with the 33d and wing of the 45th Regiments. So thickly was the fortress inhabited, and so great was the crowd of people, that it was no easy matter to establish order. Guards were placed at the gates and such places as required protection. The family of Theodore were committed to the care of Mr. Rassam, who was requested to do all that was in his power for their comfort and protection."

14.—Engagement between Turkish] troops and the Cretan insurgents at Apocorona.

— The Prince and Princess of Wales leave London on a visit to Ireland.

15.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrive at Kingston, and proceed by road in an open carriage to Dublin, which was entered amid great enthusiasm. The address presented by the Corporation congratulated the Prince on becoming a Knight of St. Patrick, and on his intention of unveiling the statue of Edmund Burke. It also expressed a hope that the Queen would command a suitable residence to be prepared for her in Ireland, and would take an opportunity to dwell as frequently as possible among her subjects there. The Princess was separately addressed, as having justified the welcome which greeted her on landing by her deeds of charity and kindness in the country of her birth as well as in England. On the 16th, the Royal visitors attended Punchestown Races; on the 18th, the installation took place in St. Patrick's Cathedral, followed by a banquet; from the 20th to the 24th, the Prince and Princess were engaged in a round of visits and entertainments. They left Dublin on the evening of the last-mentioned day, and returned by way of Wales, a visit of considerable interest and ceremony being made to Caernarvon.

— Howard Featherstonhaugh, a Deputy-lieutenant of Westmeath, shot when driving home with his servant from Killacan station. He was one of the largest proprietors in the county, and there had recently been several evictions on his estate. The assassins stopped the vehicle in a secluded part of the road at Knocksheban, dragged their victim to the ground, and then fired at him so closely as to scorch the clothes he had on. Mr. Featherstonhaugh was returning from Dublin, whither he had gone to join in the welcome to the Prince of Wales.

16.—Decided in the Exchequer Court the action raised by the Duke of Buccleuch against the Metropolitan Board of Works. Some time since his Grace obtained a verdict for upwards of 8,000*l.* for the loss of a pier which the Board of Works had taken away from his new house at Whitehall when they made the Embankment. The Board brought an action into the Exchequer Court to set aside this verdict, on the ground that the lease of the land from the Crown to the Duke made no mention of a pier. It was proved, however, that the pier had always been there. Baron Martin pleasantly referred to the mention made of it in Sir Walter Scott's novel of the "Fortunes of Nigel," and the Court held that the lease, though it made no mention of a pier, must be supposed to convey it and everything else that belonged to the property at the time the lease was made. They therefore confirmed the verdict in favour of the Duke.

16.—Meeting in St. James's Hall, London, to express sympathy with the agitation now being carried on for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Earl Russell, who presided, said, so far as the question of disendowment was concerned, the great point was to secure equality. "I think the people of Ireland are entitled to demand that all her Majesty's subjects in that country should be placed upon a footing of equality, and it is rather a secondary question whether that equality should be obtained by endowment of all the different communions, or by the disendowment of them all. (Loud cries of 'disendowment.') I do not disguise my preferences on that subject; but I say, at once, that as I perceive that the Protestant people in general of England and Scotland do not wish to endow all these communions, and on the other hand that the Roman Catholics in Ireland do not wish to accept any endowment, I at once discard any preferences of my own, and seek for general disendowment." The meeting was large, enthusiastic, and orderly.

17.—Another meeting on the Irish Church question held in St. James's Hall, by "The United Protestant Defence Committee." The meeting was not so large as the one held under the auspices of the disendowment party, and the confusion was observed to be more violent and frequent.

18.—The North German Parliament adopts a resolution calling upon the Chancellor of the Confederation to open negotiations with foreign Powers for the purpose of establishing it as a fundamental principle of international law that private property at sea should not be considered liable to capture in time of war.

— Charles Dickens entertained at dinner at Delmonico's, New York, by the Press of the United States.

— Died at Harringer, Bury St. Edmunds, aged 76, General Simpson, a Peninsular veteran, who succeeded Lord Raglan as Commander-in-Chief in the Crimea.

— The Abyssinian expedition commences its return march from Magdala.

Justice said he thought there was no case against the woman Justice, and proceedings were therefore withdrawn against her so far as the charge of murder was concerned. This was also done with reference to O'Keefe on the 24th. An alibi was set up in defence of Barrett, witnesses being produced in Court who swore that they had seen and spoken to him in Glasgow the day before, and also on the afternoon of the explosion. Mr. Murdoch, a shoemaker, stated that he saw Barrett on the 12th December, when he came to his house in company with a man named Mullan. "He asked me if I would sole and heel a pair of boots; and I told him I would, and promised to have them ready the next evening. Barrett came the next morning, and then I had not touched the boots. He returned the next day about three o'clock, but the boots had not yet been touched. He then abused me. Two shoemakers of mine came in, and I asked them to do me a favour to sole and heel a pair of boots. While the boots were being repaired Barrett sent out for an evening paper. At that time he had, to the best of my belief, about three or four days' beard on him. I've never seen him since." The alibi was but indifferently supported in Court, and broke down altogether under an extra-judicial inquiry which subsequently took place. The proceedings were protracted till Monday the 27th, when the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty as regarded the two Desmonds and English, and Guilty as regarded Barrett. Previous to judgment the latter requested permission to address the Court, and entered at considerable length into the character of the evidence on which he had been convicted. He concluded by stating in an imposing manner that he hoped God in His infinite mercy might make the sacrifice of his humble life a means of benefiting his unfortunate country, and he would mount the scaffold with confidence in that hope. The Lord Chief Justice announced his concurrence in the verdict of the jury, and then solemnly adjudged the prisoner to be executed. The prosecution against the other prisoners on the main charges was abandoned.

20.—Sir Robert Napier issues an order of the day to the Abyssinian army:—"I congratulate you with all my heart on the noble way in which you have fulfilled the commands of our Sovereign. You have traversed, often under a tropical sun or storms of rain and sleet, 400 miles of mountainous and difficult country. You have crossed many steep and precipitous ranges of mountains more than 10,000 feet in altitude, where your supplies could not keep pace with you. When you arrived within reach of your enemy, though with scanty food, and some of you for many hours without either food or water, in four days you passed the formidable chasm of the Bashilo and defeated the army of Theodore, who poured down upon you from their lofty fortress, in the full confidence of victory. A host of many thousand have laid down their arms at your feet. You have captured or destroyed upwards of thirty pieces of artillery, many of great weight and efficiency, with ample store of ammunition. You have stormed the almost inaccessible fortress of Magdala, defended by Theodore with the desperate remnant of his chiefs and followers. After you forced the entrance, Theodore—who never showed mercy—distrusted the offer of mercy which had been held out to him, and died by his own hand. You have released not only the British captives, but also those of friendly nations; you have unloosed the chains of more than ninety of the principal chiefs of Abyssinia. Magdala, on which so many victims had been slaughtered, has been committed to the flames, and remains only a scorched rock. . . . I shall watch over your safety to the moment of your re-embarkation; and to the end of my life shall remember with pride that I have commanded you."

22.—Commercial treaty between Great Britain and Austria signed.

— Monster meeting in Mr. Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle on the Irish Church question, presided over by Mr. Bright.

— Count Bismarck defeated in the North German Parliament on the official responsibility clause of the Confederation Debt Bill by a majority of 18. The bill was afterwards withdrawn.

— Marriage of Prince Humbert with the Princess Margherita of Savoy celebrated at Turin.

— At Bow-street, the sitting magistrate declines to have the charge preferred against Mr. Eyre of issuing an illegal proclamation.

23.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Ward Hunt) introduces the annual financial statement. During the bygone year there had been a deficiency of 370,000*l.* of actual as compared with estimated revenue, arising principally from uncollected arrears in the income-tax department. The gross income for the ensuing year he estimated at 71,350,000*l.*, and the expenditure at 70,428,000*l.*, showing a surplus of 922,000*l.* This surplus, however, was only on ordinary outlay, and did not apply to the extra cost incurred by the Abyssinian expedition, for which Mr. Hunt calculated that 3,000,000*l.* would have to be provided in addition to the 2,000,000*l.* already granted. He proposed to meet that demand by increasing the income-tax to 6*d.* per pound, and issuing Exchequer bills in anticipation of income-tax to the amount of 1,000,000*l.* These, with the surplus on ordinary revenue, would make a net surplus, for 1868-9, of 722,000*l.* The Budget was favourably received.

— Died Lieutenant Pollard, "the Avenger of Nelson;" deceased being the midshipman on board the Victory who brought down the marksman from the main-top of the Redoubtable, whence the shot was fired so fatal to the hero of Trafalgar.

24.—To counteract rumours now being industriously circulated, Mr. Gladstone sends the following statement to the daily newspapers:—"Though reluctant to attempt any encroachment on your space with reference to personal matters, I feel that I have no alternative at a time when personal charges, however irrelevant, are employed as a means of injuring or impeding a great cause. Within the last fortnight, or thereabouts, the following statements, purporting to be of fact, have been assiduously circulated respecting me in different parts of the country:—First, that when at Rome I made arrangements with the Pope to destroy the Church Establishment in Ireland, with some other like matters—being myself a Roman Catholic at heart. Second, that during and since the Government of Sir Robert Peel I have resisted, and till now prevented, the preferment of Dr. Wynter. Third, that I have publicly condemned all support to the clergy in the three kingdoms from Church or public funds. Fourth, that when at Balmoral I refused to attend her Majesty at Crathie Church. Fifth, That I have received the thanks of the Pope for my proceedings respecting the Irish Church. Sixth, That I am a member of a High Church Ritualist congregation. Aware how in times of public excitement rumours grow and gather through the combined action of eagerness, credulity, and levity, I will not bestow a single harsh word on any of these statements; neither will I advert to the cause to which some of them may be due, for I am determined to avoid, as long as it may be possible, envenoming a great political controversy, and what I think a noble cause, with the elements of religious bigotry and hatred. But I will in the first place declare that these statements, one and all, are untrue in letter and in spirit, from the beginning to the end; and since it is impossible for me to continue entangled as I have recently been in the meshes of correspondence which such fictions entail, I venture to request all persons whatever, that may be interested in the matter, if any like statements should hereafter come under their view, in the interest of truth, to withhold their belief."

27.—The morning papers publish telegrams relating to the attempted assassination of the Duke of Edinburgh, by the Fenian, O'Farrel, at Sydney, and to the capture of Magdala and release of the Abyssinian captives. The first was in the form of a brief despatch from Earl Belmore to the Colonial Secretary. It reached London early on the morning of the 26th, but was not spread to any extent till the afternoon, in order that her Majesty might previously be made acquainted with the occurrence. In the evening special prayers were offered up in many of the churches, and in some the Queen's anthem was sung.—Sir Robert Napier's despatch was dated from Magdala, April 14, and made mention of the release of the captives and the successful assault on the fortress. "Our loss," he reported, "is small; and the army will return immediately."

27.—Addresses to the Queen agreed to in both Houses of Parliament expressive of sorrow and indignation at the attempt made on the life of the Duke of Edinburgh.

— In view of the unsettled condition in which he was leaving the country, Sir Robert Napier issues the following proclamation to the chiefs and people of Abyssinia:—"We proclaim that Dajazmaz Gobazee is the friend of the British. He appointed Dajaz Mashasha his representative here. Those who would be treated as friends by the British Commander should obey Dajazmaz Gobazee, the officers appointed by him, and no other. We desire there should be peace in the country."

— The Secretary of State for India sends the following Royal message to Sir Robert Napier:—"The Queen sends hearty congratulations and thanks to Sir Robert Napier and his gallant force on their brilliant success. I congratulate your Excellency with all my heart; you have taught us once more what is meant by an army that can go anywhere and do anything. From first to last all has been done well. I must ask leave for a motto. My own suggestion would be 'Qualis ab incepto.'"

— During the discussion in Committee of the first of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church resolutions, the Premier was appealed to in order to get the division taken to-night. He replied that Government, feeling the extreme importance of the issue, would afford every facility for its discussion, and he could give no pledge to interfere in any way with the full and free expression of the opinions of every member who desired to declare his views on a question which it was not concealed must lead to great and even revolutionary changes.

— Mandamus granted by the Court of Queen's Bench directing the Bishop of London to hear a charge of heresy against the Rev. W. J. E. Bennet of Frome.

28.—Commenced at the Central Criminal Court the trial of the Fenian prisoners, Burke, Casey, and Mullady, charged with treason-felony.

— In reply to a deputation, the Duke of Richmond said that the clause of the Railway Regulations Bill relating to the enclosure of parcels would be amended in Committee. The clause was afterwards withdrawn.

— The Earl of Derby draws the attention of the House of Lords to Mr. Gladstone's resolutions, as being unconstitutional, in so far as they asked her Majesty to place at the disposal of Parliament certain temporalities which had only been discussed in the Lower House.

30.—A force of 1,200 Argentines, under the command of General Rivas, effect a landing on the Chaco, below the part exposed to the fire of Humaita. Works were immediately thrown up: and when next day the Paraguayans, strengthened from Timbo, attempted to carry the position by assault, they were routed by the united fire of the infantry and of the Tamandare and Behia, whose guns protected the flanks. In their retreat towards the road to Humaita, the repulsed Paraguayans came suddenly upon the Argentine Exploring Legion of Volunteers, who shamefully broke their ranks and fled. Many threw themselves into the river, where the Tamandare, coming to their aid, picked them up. The remainder not killed or captured managed to escape to the Brazilians.

— Concluded, after a discussion extending over eleven nights, the debate in Committee on Mr. Gladstone's first resolution relating to the Irish Church. Mr. Gladstone replied this evening to his opponents, and Mr. Disraeli closed the discussion. The latter opposed the resolution, because there were many other institutions besides the Irish Church which did not fulfil the purposes for which they were instituted; because it would be impossible to avoid interfering with other Established Churches; and because the scheme involved elements of confiscation and revolution. Division:—For the resolution, 330; against, 265: majority against Government, 65. On the numbers being declared, Mr. Disraeli said:—"The vote at which the Committee has now arrived has altered the relations between the Government and the House of Commons; and therefore, as it is necessary for us to consider our position, I shall, with the permission of the House, move the adjournment of the House till Monday." Mr. Gladstone assented to this arrangement; but afterwards placed a notice on the paper, pledging the House to take up the second resolution on Monday, before proceeding with the Committee of Ways and Means. The House adjourned at 3 A.M. on Friday the 1st.

— Sir W. Collier applies to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of mandamus to hear the evidence against ex-Governor Eyre, and to proceed thereon. Granted.

— Lord Malmesbury intimates in the House of Lords that it is the intention of Government to refer the Church Rates Compulsory Abolition Bill to a Select Committee of the Upper House.

May 1.—Police-Constable David Paton shoots a brother constable, John Cruickshanks, in the village of Sherburn, Durham, and then commits suicide by shooting himself. Resentment at being "reported" was said to be the exciting cause of this deed.

— The brothers Arthur and Hector Smith, the former 14 and the latter 12 years of age, make a murderous assault upon Mary Ann Nunn, housekeeper in premises in Catherine-court, Seething-lane, London. Detected in the act of robbing the house, one brother seized the woman, while the other attacked her with a mallet, and inflicted the injuries.

2.—The impeachment of President Johnson quashed by a majority of two votes on the eleventh article of impeachment, charging him with denying the right of Congress to legislate.

4.—The Earl of Malmesbury in the House of Lords, and Mr. Disraeli in the House of Commons, enter into explanations regarding their proceedings since the adverse vote of the 30th. The Premier said that he had waited next day upon her Majesty, and told her that "the advice which her Ministers would, in the full spirit of the Constitution, offer her, would be that her Majesty should dissolve this Parliament, and take the opinion of the country upon the conduct of her Ministers, and on the question at issue: but, at the same time, with the full concurrence of my colleagues, I represented to her Majesty that there were important occasions on which it was wise that the Sovereign should not be embarrassed by personal claims, however constitutionally valid and meritorious; and that if her Majesty was of opinion that the question at issue could be more satisfactorily settled, or that the interests of the country would be promoted by the immediate retirement of the present Government from office, we were prepared to quit her Majesty's service immediately, with no other feeling but that which every Minister who has served the Queen must entertain, viz. a feeling of gratitude to her Majesty for the warm constitutional support which she always gives to her Ministers, and I may add—for it is a truth that cannot be concealed—for the aid and assistance which any Minister must experience from a Sovereign who has such a vast acquaintance with the public affairs. Sir, I in fact tendered my resignation to the Queen. Her Majesty commanded me to attend her in audience on the next day, when her Majesty was pleased to express her pleasure not to accept the resignation of her Ministers, and her readiness to dissolve Parliament so soon as the state of public business would permit. Under these circumstances, I advised her Majesty that, although the present constituency was no doubt admirably competent to decide upon the question of the disestablishment of the Church, still it was the opinion of her Majesty's Ministers that every effort should be made that the appeal should, if possible, be directed to the new constituencies which the wisdom of Parliament provided last year; and I expressed to her Majesty that, if we had the cordial co-operation of Parliament, I was advised by those who are experienced and skillful in these matters that it would be possible to make arrangements by which that dissolution could take place in the autumn of this year." Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Lowe, and Mr. Bright censured the Government for not resigning unqualifiedly, and said that from the circumstances connected with their accession to office they were not entitled to hold the rod over members as to whether they would appeal to the old or new constituencies.

4.—Greystoke Castle, Penrith, destroyed by fire.

5.—In answer to repeated questions in the House of Commons, Mr. Disraeli explains that the power held by the Government to dissolve Parliament related entirely to the Irish Church question, and that if any other difficulty arose, it would be the duty of Ministers again to repair to the Sovereign.

— Sir Robert Napier reaches Ashangi on the homeward march with the rear-guard of the Abyssinian army.

6.—Meeting in St. James's Hall, presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury, to express sympathy with the Irish branch of the National Church. Resolutions were proposed and spoken to by the Lord Mayor, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of London, and Dean Stanley. A statement made by the Dean, that the traditions of the Liberal party in this country were all in favour of the union between Church and State, was received with a storm of disapprobation, which compelled him to resume his seat.

7.—Mr. Gladstone's second and third Irish Church resolutions carried in Committee without a division. In a debate which followed, concerning the withdrawal of the Maynooth and other grants, considerable difference of opinion was manifested among the Liberal members, and displeasure expressed at the absence of Mr. Disraeli. The latter on returning said it was not his duty to obtrude his advice on the House with respect to every possible topic. The discussion, he continued, had only anticipated, what he always expected would be the case, that there would be a quarrel among the Liberal party over the division of the plunder. Mr. Bright retorted that Mr. Disraeli, in bringing the name of the Sovereign to the front in this question, had been guilty of the greatest crime and misdemeanour a Prime Minister could commit. "The right honourable gentleman," he said, "the other night, sometimes with pompousness and sometimes with servility—(oh! oh!)—talked at large of the interviews he had with his Sovereign. I venture to say that a Minister who deceives his Sovereign—(oh! oh!)—is as guilty as the conspirator who would dethrone her." Mr. Disraeli concluded the interlude by charging the member for Birmingham with indulging in stale invective, and challenged him to bring any charge he had to make to the vote of the House.

— Died at Cannes, in his 90th year, Henry Lord Brougham, lawyer, statesman, and philosopher. He was found dead in bed after a day's quiet exercise in his garden, and was buried at Cannes.

8.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Blackburn issues an order for Mr. Vaughan, the Bow-street police magistrate, to hear the charges preferred by the Jamaica Committee against ex-Governor Eyre, and to commit him for trial if necessary.

8.—Mr. Gladstone's resolutions, as finally reported to the House, were in these words:—"1. That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property. 2. That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any personal patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament. 3. That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament her interest in the temporalities of the archbishoprics, bishoprics, and other ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof. 4. That when legislative effect shall have been given to the first resolution of this committee, respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, due regard being had to all personal interests."

— Alexander Arthur Mackay, aged 18, murders his mistress, Emma Grossmith, of Artillery-passage, Norton-Folgate, by beating her with a rolling-pin and furnace-rake. He got clear off from the scene of his crime, but was apprehended next month at Maidstone, while undergoing imprisonment in the gaol there for another offence. He was tried for the crime at the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced by Mr. Justice Lush to be executed on 8th September. Mackay was the first executed within the precincts of Newgate under the Act of this session.

10.—The governor of Ayr Prison (Sutherland) commits suicide by cutting his throat in a London coffee-house.

11.—The bill providing for executions taking place only within the walls of prisons read a third time in the House of Lords and passed.

12.—Robert Smith executed at Dumfries for the murder of a little girl (whom he first violated) in a wood near Annan, followed by a murderous attack on an aged woman in Cummertrees village, with the view of concealing his crime.

— Lord Royston, Comptroller of the Household, appears in the House of Commons with her Majesty's answer to the address on the subject of the Irish Church:—"I have received your address praying that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present session, the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of public patronage, I would place at the disposal of Parliament my interest in the temporalities, the archbishoprics, bishoprics, and other ecclesiastical dignities and benefices of Ireland, and in the custody thereof. Relying on the wisdom of my Parliament, I desire that my interest in the temporalities of the United Church of England and Ireland in Ireland may not stand in the way of the consideration by Parliament of any measure relating thereto that may be entertained in the present session. (Cheers.)" Mr. Gladstone: "Having heard her Majesty's gracious answer to the address, I will to-morrow move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent for a limited time any new appointments in the Church in Ireland, and to restrain for the same period in certain respects the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As I suppose that it will be the wish of the House to have the bill printed and in the hands of members as soon as possible, there will be no objection to my asking for leave to bring in the bill to-morrow at any period when I may be able to do so."

13.—The foundation-stone of the new St. Thomas's Hospital laid by the Queen, on the right bank of the Thames, near Lambeth Palace, in presence of many peers, members of the House of Commons, the president and governors, and about 5,000 spectators. Her Majesty said:—"It is with sincere pleasure that I lay the first stone of the noble building which you are about to dedicate to the use of the suffering poor. St. Thomas's Hospital, founded by my predecessor, Edward VI., from the services which it rendered to humanity, naturally attracted the attention of my esteemed husband, whose heart and mind were ever interested in institutions of so beneficial a character. It is a solace to me to follow his example in promoting the objects which you have in view. I think that your hospital upon its new site, by various improvements which experience and sanitary skill suggest, will secure the greatest benefit to its suffering inmates, and provide an admirable school for nurses, and for the promotion of medical schools of science. I thank you for the loyal and sympathising expression of your feeling at the late attempt to take away the life of my dear son, the Duke of Edinburgh, and join in your prayers that the same good Providence which preserved him from the assassin will soon restore him in health and safety to his family and country."

14.—Mr. Gladstone obtains leave to bring in a bill suspending for a limited time the exercise of patronage in the Irish Church. Read a first time without a division.

— Mr. Barne, Oxford, accidentally shot by his friend, Mr. A. W. Gordon, while rowing in a punt on the river.

— The Washington House of Representatives pass a bill admitting North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana to representation in Congress, on condition of their having ratified the constitutional amendment, and of never depriving of suffrage those persons who are now entitled to vote.

14.—Russian progress in Central Asia. Today Samarcand was occupied, and four days afterwards a detachment was sent northward to seize and destroy the fortress of Tchilek. On the 23d about one-third of the entire Russian force left Samarcand to attack the important fortress of Ourgout, which was taken after a severe encounter with the Bokharians. Kara Tepe was next taken, and a camp formed at Katy-kurgan. The masses of Bokharians assembling here became so considerable that on the 11th June General Kaufmann marched in great haste from Samarcand and defeated the Khan's troops in a sharp engagement at Zera Boulak. During his absence an attempt was made to recapture Samarcand, but the Russians held the citadel with great bravery against overwhelming numbers, till General Kaufmann returned by forced marches and raised the siege.

— Lopez enrolls a regiment of Amazons to assist Paraguay against Brazil.

— An address on the subject of the Irish Church presented by Irish prelates to the Queen at Windsor.

15.—Mr. Serjeant Armstrong gives notice of a vote of censure on the Government: "That in the opinion of this House the position of her Majesty's Ministers is opposed to the principle of representative government, subversive of constitutional government, and incompatible with the character and dignity of Parliament."

— Six men killed at Cannock Chase Colliery by the breaking of a chain to which the cage they were descending in was attached.

— The widow of King Theodore of Abyssinia dies in the British camp at Haik-huilit.

18.—At the close of an uproarious meeting in Edinburgh, called to consider the question of adopting the Public Libraries Act, 71 vote in favour of it and 1,106 against.

— Mr. Baxter's motion that it be an instruction to the Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill to disfranchise all English boroughs which had a population of less than 5,000 at the last census, for the purpose of giving increased representation to Scotland, carried against Government by 217 to 196. Mr. Disraeli preferred Sir R. Knightley's plan, discussed at the same time, of reducing certain small boroughs at present returning two members. Mr. McLaren proposed, "That no arrangement respecting additional members can be just or satisfactory which does not treat Scotland, as regards the number of its representatives in Parliament, as an integral portion of the United Kingdom, entitled to be placed on a footing of perfect equality with England and Ireland in proportion to its present population, and the revenue which it yields to the national exchequer, as compared with the present proportion of revenue in England and Ireland; and that to establish this equality at least fifteen additional members should now be provided for Scotland." This was also carried against Government by 118 to 96. They immediately met with a third defeat by Mr. Bouverie carrying his proposal to insert a clause: ". . . is and has been, for a period of not less than twelve months next preceding the last day of July, an inhabitant, occupier, or a lodger of part of any dwelling-house, such part being of the annual value of £10 or upwards." Mr. Disraeli complained of this as an unjust decision, and moved that the Chairman report progress for the purpose of enabling Government to consider its position.

18.—Munches House, Galloway, struck by lightning and afterwards burnt to the ground.

20.—The Jamaica Committee make out such a preliminary case as induces Mr. Vaughan, Bow-street magistrate, to commit ex-Governor Eyre for trial. The latter said he had now been for two years and a half the victim of unceasing rancorous persecution, but he was convinced that those who had combined for such a purpose would not influence or be accepted "by the higher tribunal to which this action is now to be referred, or the large majority of my fellow-countrymen, to whose sense of justice and common sense I confidently entrust my honour as a gentleman and my character as a public servant."

— Sir Colman O'Loughlen's Press Libel Bill carried into Committee by 100 to 38.

21.—Mr. Disraeli makes a Ministerial statement with reference to the defeats sustained on the 18th. The Government looked upon Mr. Bouverie's amendment as very seriously interfering with the principle of the entire Reform scheme; but thinking the House had assented to it somewhat precipitately he proposed to add words to the effect that no elector in a Scotch burgh should be entitled to exercise the suffrage, who was not rated to the poor, and had not paid his rates. This compromise was afterwards accepted by the House.

— The Chicago Convention unanimously nominate General Grant for the Presidency.

22.—Vice-Chancellor Gifford gives judgment in the case of Lyon v. Home, a suit instituted in June 1867, to set aside certain gifts to the defendant, Daniel Home, the well-known spiritual "medium." Mrs. Lyon, 75 years of age, with some property of her own, married a wealthy husband, by whom she was left a widow in 1859, with about 100,000*l.* at her own disposal. She was devoted to the memory of her husband, and from mysterious intimations during his lifetime she was possessed with a belief that in some way she would meet him again at the end of seven years. In July 1866 she learnt that her expectations could be very simply fulfilled by applying to Mr. Home. He was then resident secretary of an institution called "The Spiritual Athenæum," in Sloane-street. Mrs. Lyon read his book entitled "Incidents of my Life," and wrote to him immediately afterwards. Receiving no answer, she called, on October 2, and had an interview with him. Within little more than a week from that date she had given him a sum of 24,000*l.* Immediately after this Mrs. Lyon and Mr. Home adopted towards each other the warm language of "mother" and "son;" and on the 8th of November the newly made mother made a will, in which she assigned all her property to this affectionate son. On the ensuing 10th of December she presented Mr. Home with another 6,000*l.*, to make up the 24,000*l.* to a round sum of 30,000*l.* Mr. Home then assumed the name of Lyon. Once more, towards the end of January 1867, she assigned him a mortgage security of 30,000*l.*, taking care, however, meanwhile to have a strong legal deed prepared in order to secure the interest as an annuity for herself. At this point Mr. Home's star had reached its zenith. In February Mrs. Lyon called in Sloane-street, and got back one of her letters. In March she ceased to sign herself "affectionate mother." In May she saw a solicitor, who assured her she had been imposed upon; but she could not accept the lawyer's advice without consulting another "medium." The familiar spirit of Miss Berry confirmed her suspicions, and in June she had an interview with Mr. Home, in which she indulged in vituperation not less warm than her previous expressions of affection. She demanded the surrender of the mortgage, and Mr. Home in a subsequent letter to his "dear mother" offered to resign the deed provided she would leave him and his "in undisputed possession" of the first 30,000*l.*, with permission to resume his own name. On the 17th the "mother" arrested her "son" and threw him into White-cross-street Prison; and this suit was instituted to set aside both the gift and the assignment of the mortgage. The judge was of opinion that the evidence proved that at the time when these gifts were made the relation of the defendant to the plaintiff was such as in cases decided by Lord Eldon and Lord Cottenham, when the Court held that the donor whilst making the gift was subject to hallucination, or under influence. Therefore there must be a decree for re-transfer of the 60,000*l.* by the defendant to the plaintiff, who was ordered to pay her own costs and those of Mr. Wilkinson, the solicitor. The defendant was ordered to pay his own costs only.

22.—The Irish Church Suspensory Bill read a second time by a majority of 312 to 258. The 5th June was fixed for going into Committee.

— Mr. Rearden (Athlone) gives notice that on Monday, the 25th, he would ask the (682)

First Lord of the Treasury whether it was true that Her Majesty, on account of ill-health, had gone to Scotland, and did not intend to return to England for the remainder of the season; and if so, whether it was the intention of the Government, out of consideration for her Majesty's health, comfort, and tranquillity, to advise her Majesty to abdicate? (Loud cries of "Order.") The Speaker: "The House has anticipated what I had to say by its expression of opinion in regard to the terms employed in the notice of the hon. member. No doubt any question may be addressed by a member of this House to the confidential advisers of the Crown on any matter relating to the discharge of public duties, but such questions must be addressed in respectful and Parliamentary terms. The question of the hon. member certainly does not appear to me to be couched in such terms. (Cheers.)" Mr. Rearden thereupon apologized.

22.—The First Division of the Court of Session give judgment in the case of Tennent v. Tennent's trustees. The pursuer, Gilbert Rainy Tennent, brought the action for the purpose of asserting his rights, as partner of the firm of J. and R. Tennent, Wellpark Brewery. It was not disputed that he had been a partner in 1855, but the question now was whether, by a deed executed in 1858, he had forfeited all interest therein. The Court by a majority held that the pursuer had not established his case, and assailed the defenders.

— Capture of Samarcand by the Russians. The force of the Ameer of Bokhara was said to have consisted of 400 Affghans and 8,000 contingents. The Russian General was at the head of 8,000 men with 16 guns. The battle occurred at the Khokan Gate of Samarcand, lasted from sunrise to breakfast-time, and ended in the death of from 300 to 400 of the defenders, and the wounding of 200. The Ameer's eldest son, Tora Kalan, was present, and, with Sikandar, proposed to hold out in the fort; but the citizens shut the gates against them, and Sikandar surrendered to the victors; Tora Kalan fled to Bokhara, 104 miles off, and the Ameer himself remained at Kermina. Next day the Russians entered the city, fired a salute at Timour's tomb, and seized the fort, with its stores and 23 guns.

24.—The Invalide Russe announces the conclusion of a treaty between Russia and Khokan.

— The Glasgow and Bordeaux steamer, Garonne, wrecked on her homeward voyage off the Land's End. At night, in thick weather, she struck on the Bucks rocks (about a mile and a half westward of Larnorna), filled rapidly, and in twenty minutes was totally lost with her captain, mate, two stewards, and fifteen of her passengers. Only two of the latter were saved. The inquiry instituted by the Board of Trade exonerated the owners from all blame, freed the crew from the charge of having saved themselves without trying to save the passengers, and attributed the loss to the captain, who had not made sufficient allowance for the state of the tide to eastward of the vessel, and at a critical period was not sufficiently collected to give distinct orders, but abandoned himself to despair.

26.—Michael Barrett executed in front of Newgate for his complicity in the Clerkenwell explosion of December last. The convict had been respited from the date originally fixed to allow of inquiries being made into the alibi set up during trial. He made no public confession, nor did he directly or indirectly allude to the justice of his sentence. The number of spectators was not large, and they were observed to conduct themselves with unusual decorum. The Private Execution Bill having now passed both Houses, and awaiting only the Royal assent, this was the last public hanging which took place.

— Explosion at Kensington Firework Factory, Liverpool, causing the death of three out of the five workmen employed on the premises.

— Mr. Gladstone writes to advise the electors of Worcestershire in a contest presently going on in the county:—"The Government proclaimed ten weeks ago that they were friendly to religious equality in Ireland, provided it was brought about by endowing other Churches, including the Romish, in Ireland, not by disendowing the Protestant Churches; and by way of earnest they propose at once to create a Roman Catholic University, and to pay the expenses out of the taxes of the country."

— President Johnson acquitted on the second and third articles of impeachment.

29.—In the House of Lords Earl Russell again censures the Government for continuing in office without having the confidence of the House of Commons, or being able to carry their measures. In the Commons Mr. Disraeli intimated that Government intended to confine the work of the session mainly to the Reform Bills and estimates, Foreign Cattle and Telegraph Bills, with perhaps the Bribery and Bankruptcy Bills.

— Explosion of a fog-signal manufactory at Saltley, arising from the building being ignited by lightning during a severe thunderstorm. Four girls employed in the works were killed.

30.—Revolutionary disturbances at Port-au-Prince, and defeat of Salnave, President of Hayti.

June 1.—The Premier opens an Industrial Exhibition at Hulton Park, Tring.

2.—The Vice-Chancellor gives judgment in the action raised by the Patent Office against Mr. Edmunds, late clerk of the patents. In one respect, the presiding judge said, the arguments and evidence which had been used and read on behalf of Mr. Edmunds had been in his favour; they had cleared his character from any imputation, and showed that his conduct arose from mistake. It was, therefore, not without regret that his Honour had come to the conclusion that the arguments which had been used on Mr. Edmunds' behalf upon the other points of the case were unsuccessful. There was abundant authority to show that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over accountants to the Crown existed. That being so, there came the question of the discounts for stamps. As to this, it was clear that if the sums on which the profits were made were Mr. Edmunds' own, he would be entitled to the discounts; if not, he would not be so entitled, on the well-known doctrine that a trustee cannot make profit of his trust. As to the question upon the construction of the statute, his Honour was clear that the sum of 12*l.* 10*s.*, charged for parchments, was one of those fees and emoluments in lieu of which the salary was given; and for these Mr. Edmunds must account. There would be declarations in conformity with the above rulings, and an account with all just allowances, and without any disturbance of settled accounts.

2.—Came on in the Court of Queen's Bench, before Mr. Justice Blackburn, the case of ex-Governor Eyre. His Lordship delivered a long charge to the grand jury, in the course of which he reviewed the law of the country with reference to the declaration and exercise of martial law, from Magna Charta down to the present time, and said that to keep up martial law for a period of thirty days after an armed resistance had been put down was unreasonable; and no one could doubt that it exceeded much the prerogative of the Crown. A third and great question was whether Mr. Eyre caused Gordon and four others to be brought into the proclaimed district and tried. There could be no doubt that Gordon was a pestilent firebrand, in close communication with those actually in insurrection, and using violent language, but he did not think the evidence against Gordon amounted to more than that. He thought he was a violent pestilent agitator, whose injudicious language caused the rebellion; but that he was not a party to an organized conspiracy for a rising throughout the island. It was, however, generally believed at the time that he was so, and no doubt Mr. Eyre really believed that he was guilty. If they thought that Mr. Eyre considered at the time that Gordon was a violent fellow, whom it was better not to try by the ordinary law of the island, conceiving that by some technicality he might escape punishment, but to send him to Morant Bay, try him by court-martial, and get rid of him, it was an act of great and lawless oppression, and they ought to find the bill; but if they were of opinion that he acted in a contrary spirit, and used ordinary firmness, judgment, and moderation, and from a bona fide belief in the honest discharge of his duties, they would not find the bill. The grand jury, after a long consultation, returned a verdict of No bill. At the sitting of the Court on the 8th, the Lord Chief Justice sought to remove a misapprehension that Mr. Justice Blackburn spoke in the name and with the authority of his brother judges. "Had I understood (he said) that the law would have been laid down as it is understood to have been stated, I should have felt it to be my duty to attend in my place in Court on the occasion of the charge being delivered, and to declare my views of the law to the jury. I must add, as my justification for not having done so, that I certainly understood from the learned judge—though I must now suppose I misunderstood him—that he deemed it unnecessary to raise the question of the legality of martial law, or the effect of the Jamaica statutes. As regards the very serious case of Mr. Gordon, I believe I am right in saying, that almost on the eve of the delivery of the charge, the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackburn himself was, that the apprehension and removal of Mr. Gordon were, in point of fact, unjustifiable. It is not without much pain, and only under an imperious sense of public duty, that I make these observations. The bar have known me long enough not to misconstrue my motives. I am influenced only by the desire of protecting myself against being held responsible for opinions from which I dissent, and to prevent doctrines from going forth stamped with the authority of this the highest Court of criminal jurisdiction in the realm—the House of Lords alone excepted—to which doctrines its assent has not been given." Mr. Justice Blackburn made a short statement in reply, in which he frankly acknowledged that he accepted the whole responsibility of his charge to the jury. Mr. Justice Lush being afterwards appealed to concerning the draft paper embodying the substance of the law intended to be laid down, wrote :—"I returned the paper to my brother Blackburn at the time, and I find it is now at his house; but I well remember that it contained only the general proposition mentioned by you in the Court yesterday, adding that the application of that principle to the particular case required him to tell the jury what was the law of Jamaica. In no other way did it refer to that law, nor did it state anything about martial law, or refer to the case of Gordon. I have shown this to my brother Blackburn, and he agrees that it is an accurate account of what the paper contains."

2.—Negro riots at Washington arising out of a local election contest between the Radicals and Conservatives.

3.—Ex-Governor Eyre publishes a letter defending his administration in Jamaica, and justifying the steps he had taken to suppress the rebellion.

—Mr. Bright attends a meeting of the Welsh National Reform Association at Liverpool, and delivers a speech strongly condemnatory of the Government and the Irish Church.

He was entertained at a public breakfast next morning in the Philharmonic Hall.

4.—The report was issued to-day of the trials lately concluded of the war ships Warrior, Minotaur, and Bellerophon. These iron-clads were tried in the usual manner at the measured mile, and afterwards for six hours' consecutive steaming outside the Isle of Wight. At the measured mile the following were the results :—Minotaur, 14'411 per hour; Warrior, 14'79; Bellerophon, 13'874. In the six hours' trial the Minotaur lost in speed '246 of a knot per hour, and her revolutions fell off '953 per minute; and the Warrior lost '143 of a knot, and her revolutions fell off '8 per minute; but in the Bellerophon the case was reversed—she gained '176 of a knot per hour in speed, increased the revolutions by '943 per minute, and developed about 200 more horse-power than on the measured mile. The Comptroller stated that these experiments proved that, with good coal and good stoking, there was but little difference between the results of a trial at the measured mile and one lasting for six hours on the open sea—all the circumstances being alike; that the bad performance of the Warrior, Minotaur, and Bellerophon during their cruise last autumn arose from causes over which the designers of these ships had no control; and that any judgment on the qualities of these ships, dependent on such records, would be illusory and misleading.

—Discussion in the House of Commons on Mr. Gladstone's letter to the electors of Worcestershire. In answer to Sir J. Bateson, Mr. Disraeli said he must have been imposed upon by an electioneering hoax, for the letter was not only a caricature of Mr. Gladstone's usual happy style, but contained assertions regarding the intentions of Government to endow the Roman Catholic priesthood which could not possibly be established. Mr. Gladstone owned the letter and defended the sentiments therein expressed by the following telegram forwarded from Downing-street to the Presbyterian General Assembly of Belfast :—"I am directed by Lord Derby to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, on the subject of the increase of the Regium Donum. His Lordship desires me to inform you that he regrets that, as the estimates for 1868 have been completed, it is impossible for anything to be done this year. The subject shall be borne in mind before the estimates for next year are prepared." Mr. Disraeli still disputed the assertion of the letter, and pointed out the distinction which existed between increasing the Regium Donum and endowing the Romish clergy. The Earl of Mayo also complained that an erroneous interpretation had been put upon his words.

5.—Mr. J. S. Mill presents a petition from the Home and Foreign Affairs Committee of Macclesfield, asking for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the unjustifiable war with Abyssinia and the murder of King Theodore.

7.—Seventeen persons stabbed in the streets of Trebizond by an infuriated Persian.

8.—Preliminary investigation at the Marlborough-street Police-court, into the charges preferred against Madame Rachel (or Levenson) of obtaining various sums of money from Mrs. Borradaile, with intent to defraud. In 1866 the widow Borradaile, attracted apparently by the prisoner's advertisement of the power she possessed of making people "beautiful for ever," called and consulted her as to something being done for her skin. The prisoner undertook to renew the widow by the use of cosmetics, and also promised to provide for her an advantageous matrimonial alliance. For the first 1,000*l.* was paid, and through representations made regarding the love with which she was said to have inspired Lord Ranelagh she was induced to advance 2,000*l.* more in cash, 600*l.* in jewellery, and a bond over certain properties for 600*l.* She was even informed, without exciting any suspicion, that his Lordship had been captivated by her appearance in the bathroom; nor did the foolish, ardent letter dictated by Madame Rachel to a tool "William," who represented his Lordship at various interviews, move her to any other feeling than joyous expectancy. To such an extent did Mrs. Borradaile lavish her means on Madame Rachel, that the latter, emboldened by success, caused her patron to be thrown into Whitecross-street Prison on a charge of failing to complete certain pecuniary obligations in which she had got involved. This led to more exact inquiry being made as to the relation in which Mrs. Borradaile stood to the vendor of cosmetics, and the result was that she was apprehended on the charge of obtaining money and goods on false pretences. The case was tried at the Old Bailey in August; but the jury being unable to agree upon a verdict, were discharged, and Madame Rachel removed to Newgate to await a new trial. On the second trial before Mr. Commissioner Kerr, the judge "charged" the jury strongly against the prisoner, chiefly on the ground that one of the letters produced showed that the whole might have been dictated by her for purposes of fraud. The jury found Madame Rachel guilty, and Mr. Commissioner Kerr sentenced her to five years' imprisonment.

— The Scotch Reform Bill passes through — Died at London, aged 84, John Crawford, Oriental linguist.

12.—Lord Mayo intimates that all negotiation for the granting of a charter to any Catholic University was at an end.

13.—Came on in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, the case of Risk Allah v. Whitehurst, being an action for libel against the Daily Telegraph, in which the damages were laid at 20,000*l.* The case arose out of the trial in Brussels, where the plaintiff was charged with the murder of his stepson, Ready. He now alleged that the defendant had, in a series of letters, which their special correspondent wrote from Brussels to the Telegraph, from the beginning to the end assumed the guilt of the plaintiff, and suppressed the great bulk of the evidence that was given in his favour; and that even when compelled to state some of the evidence given in his favour, they did everything they could to destroy its force. The plaintiff further complained that the report was altogether an unfair, partial, and one-sided report; that during the trial the grossest libels and calumnies were circulated against him; that after these letters had appeared, and when the trial was over, the plaintiff acquitted, and his innocence demonstrated, a leading article appeared in the defendant's paper reiterating all the charges—not in an honest and bold statement that the charges were true, but by insinuation and innuendo, declaring the belief of the writer that the plaintiff was a murderer and a forger. The trial extended over six days, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, 960*l.* Another action against the Standard failed, as an explanation had been inserted in their case.

15.—The Fell Railway over Mont Cenis opened for public traffic.

— The triennial Handel Festival commenced at the Crystal Palace.

16.—Mr. Bright's motion for a Committee to inquire into the allegations contained in a petition from the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, as to the dissatisfaction felt at the Confederation Act, rejected by 183 to 87 votes.

— The ignominious defeat of the Marquis of Hastings' mare, Lady Elizabeth, first favourite for the last Derby, gave rise to more than usual disputes on "settling day." Admiral Rous writes that when the Days discovered she had lost her form "they reversed a commission to back her for the 1,000 Guineas Stakes at Newmarket, and they declared that Lord Hastings would not bring her out before the Derby, on which he stood to win a great stake. I am informed that when Lord Hastings went to Danebury to see her gallop, they made excuses for her not to appear. If he had seen her move, the bubble would have burst; but the touters reported she was going like a bird. She has never been able to gallop the whole year. Lord Hastings has been shamefully deceived." Lord Hastings, in reply, denied that any deception had been practised on him, and stated that his second horse, the Earl, had been scratched by his own express desire and authority. This statement was confirmed by Mr. Henry Padwick.

17.—At a banquet in Merchant Taylors' Hall Mr. Disraeli delivers a manifesto on the Union of Church and State. "The Constitution of England," he said, "is not a paper constitution. It is an aggregate of institutions, many of them founded merely upon prescriptions, some of them fortified by muniments, but all of them the fruit and experience of an ancient and illustrious people. And the consequence of this peculiar constitution has been this—one experienced by no other European nation—that in England society has always been more powerful than the State—(hear)—for in moments of difficulty and danger, in moments of emergency, there has always in this country been something round which men could rally; and by those means we have achieved the two greatest blessings of civilized communities, which are seldom reconciled—the enjoyment alike of order and of liberty. Now, among these institutions, not the least considerable is the Church; and it is in the alliance between Church and State—an alliance between equal and independent powers, which entered into a solemn covenant for the national good—that one of the principal causes may be recognised (686)

why we have enjoyed those two great blessings of freedom and order. To that union we are indebted for this great result, that the exercise of authority in England has been connected with the principle of religion—a union which, even in rude times, made power responsible, and which prevented government, even in comparatively barbarous periods, from degenerating into mere police—(hear, hear)—a union which, in happier times, has elevated, and purified, and ennobled the exercise of power. And, my lords and gentlemen, in the age in which we live, the duties of government each year become more social than political. I am at a loss to know how these duties can be fulfilled if the State be not in intimate relation with an order of men set apart, who, by their piety, their learning, and their social devotion, not only guide and control, but soften and assuage, the asperities of conflicting creeds." Turning to foreign affairs Mr. Disraeli said:—"When we acceded to office, the name of England was a name of suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court and Cabinet. There was no possibility of that cordial action with any of the great Powers which is the only security for peace; and, in consequence of that want of cordiality, wars were frequently occurring. But since we entered upon office, and public affairs were administered by my noble friend who is deprived by a special diplomatic duty of the gratification of being here this evening, I say that all this has changed; that there never existed between England and foreign Powers a feeling of greater cordiality and confidence than now prevails; that while we have shrunk from bustling and arrogant intermeddling, we have never taken refuge in selfish isolation; and the result has been that there never was a Government in this country which has been more frequently appealed to for its friendly offices than the one which now exists."

18.—Mr. Gladstone's Suspensory Bill introduced into the House of Lords by the Earl of Clarendon, and read a first time.

— The steamer Feroze, with Sir Robert Napier on board, and the Mauritius, with Consul Cameron and General Staveley, arrive at Suez on their homeward journey.

22.—Disorderly meeting in the Guildhall, presided over by the Lord Mayor, and called for the purpose of expressing opinions on the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Resolutions condemning and approving of the Government policy were passed amid scenes of cheering and shouting which led in some instances to assault and battery.

22.—Came on before the House of Lords the appeal of Mrs. Ryves from the judgment of the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, which declared that Olive Serres was not the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, and that there was no valid marriage between the Duke and Olive Wilmot. Their Lordships, without going into the merits of the case, dismissed the appeal, on the objection that no application being originally made for a new trial, and no bill of exceptions having been tendered to the ruling of the learned judge in the Court below, an appeal under such circumstances did not lie to their Lordships.

— Her Majesty holds a "breakfast" in the gardens of Buckingham Palace.

— The Pope delivers an allocution respecting religious affairs in Austria. His Holiness deplored and condemned as abominable the marriage and other laws depriving the Church of control over schools, and establishing freedom of the press and liberty of conscience. The Pope declared these laws null and void, censured their authors, approvers, and executors, praised the conduct of the Austrian bishops as defenders of the Concordat, and hoped that the Hungarian prelates would follow in their footsteps.

24.—The Servian elections show a majority in favour of the accession to the throne of Prince Milan, nephew of the late Prince Michael. He was proclaimed by the Skuptschina on the 2d July.

Protestant England cordially sympathises with an occasion which unites the Protestant princes and peoples of Germany."

— In the House of Commons, in reply to Mr. Grant Duff's criticism on the Premier's speech at Merchant Taylors' Hall, which he described as a repetition of the Slough offence of 1858, Mr. Disraeli owned to the correctness of the report so far as our foreign relations were concerned when the present Government acceded to power, and stated further that the words so reported expressed the literal truth of the state of affairs. It was not his intention however to cast any imputation on the abilities of the Earl of Clarendon, who had been in the Foreign Office only a few months before. Earl Russell was the Minister mainly responsible for the untoward state of our foreign relations.—Mr. Gladstone censured the Premier for indulging in exaggerated eulogy upon his own policy, and censuring political opponents whom it was well known Lord Derby wished to include in his Cabinet.

25.—In an unusually large House Earl Granville moves the second reading of the Irish Church Suspensory Bill. It was opposed by Earl Grey, the Earl of Malmesbury, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Earl of Derby. The latter protested against the bill as an invasion of the rights of property, and because it was based on principles which, when applied to Ireland, could not fail to be extended to England, creating confusion and dissension for a lengthened period on subjects that were most likely of all others to produce angry feeling and contention among different classes. On the second night of the debate the Earl of Carnarvon said that, bearing in mind the attitude of the Government towards the clergy of the English Church in their education scheme, he regarded the policy of the Government with distrust and suspicion, whose courting of the Roman Catholics with one hand and the Orangemen with the other could only result in discredit and failure. It would be safer for the Irish Church, whilst still unbroken by defeat, to come to terms with her declared opponents than to place trust in her professed friends. The debate was continued over a third night, June 29th. A division took place about 3 A.M. the following morning. Contents, 97; Not Contents, 192: majority against the bill, 95. Apart from the spiritual Peers, there were 6 Dukes, 4 Marquises, 25 Earls, 3 Viscounts, and 59 Barons on the Liberal side; against 7 Dukes, 7 Marquises, 56 Earls, 15 Viscounts, and 85 Barons on the Conservative benches.

All ecclesiastics entitled to be present were enjoined to appear, or, if prevented, to be represented by proxy. The Bull expressed a hope that princes and other rulers would afford the ecclesiastics all possible facilities for making the journey to Rome—the object of the Council being to secure the integrity of the faith, respect for religion and the ecclesiastical laws, the improvement of public morals, the establishment of peace and concord, and the removal of the ills afflicting civil and religious societies. The Bull finally adverted to the necessity for maintaining the temporal power, the sanctity of matrimony and the religious education of youth, and deplored the efforts of the enemies of the Church to overthrow these principles.

30.—The Irish Reform Bill read a second time in the House of Lords.

— New writ moved for Bristol, Mr. Miles being unseated on petition.

— Sir Robert Napier entertained by the British Ambassador at Paris, and presented with an address. He arrived at Dover the following morning, and was received by the Mayor and Corporation. He proceeded to London during the day, and in the evening to Windsor on a visit to the Queen.

2.—Thanks of both Houses of Parliament voted to Sir Robert Napier and the army of Abyssinia. In the Lords the resolution was moved by the Earl of Malmesbury, and seconded by Earl Russell; in the Commons, by Mr. Disraeli, and seconded by Mr. Gladstone. Speaking of the difficulties encountered by the Commander-in-Chief, the Premier said:—"He had, in order to enter the country which he was about to invade, to construct a road over a wall of mountain, using the bed of an exhausted torrent for this purpose, and actually entered a high table-land, wild and in great part barren, continuously intersected with chains of mountains of a very high elevation, sometimes breaking into gorges and ravines which appeared unfathomable. Yet over this country, for more than 300 miles, he guided and sustained a numerous host—many thousands of fighting men—as numerous a following of camp attendants, and vast caravans of camels, which in number exceeded both. He led cavalry and infantry over this country; and, what was perhaps the most remarkable part of this expedition, he led the elephants of Asia, bearing the artillery of Europe, over broken passes, which might have startled the trapper, and appalled the hunter of the Alps. (Cheers.) When he arrived at the place of his critical rendezvous, he encountered no mean foe; and if the manly qualities of the Abyssinians sunk before the resources of our warlike science, our troops had still after that engagement to scale a mountain fortress of such intrinsic strength that it would have been impregnable to the world had it been defended by the persons who assaulted it. (Cheers.) Thus all these difficulties and all these obstacles were overcome, and that was accomplished which not one of us ten years ago could have fancied even in his dreams, and which it must be peculiarly interesting to Englishmen under all circumstances to recall to mind; and we find the standard of St. George hoisted upon the mountains of Rasselas."

2.—During a discussion in Committee on the Boundaries Bill in the House of Lords, Earl Beauchamp proposed to amend one clause so far as to enlarge the boundaries of Birmingham and Birkenhead. Earl Granville and Earl Russell protested against this course as a violation of the understanding come to in the Commons respecting the settlement embodied in the bill. Earl Malmesbury supported the alteration, and said "the House of Lords could not be controlled in its action by the Commons." Seeing the Government determined to press the alteration, the Opposition Peers rose in a body and left the House. Earl Beauchamp disowning any attempt to take the House by surprise, thereupon consented to adjourn further discussion on his amendment till the 6th. Next night, however, after explanations by Earl Malmesbury, it was withdrawn altogether.

The amendment was rejected next evening by the Lords, and not further insisted on.

14.—Mr. Bright entertained at Limerick, and presented with an address. Referring, in reply, to his sojourn with Mr. Peabody in the valley of the Shannon, he said that Ireland could be made one of the fairest flowers of the earth. He suggested to the Imperial Parliament to undo the legislation of the last 300 years, without doing any great injury to the ecclesiastical arrangements of the country, and so as not to affect individual interests. He referred to the land question, showing that his plan was to restore to the farming classes a proprietary right, without any spoliation of the interests of the present owners of the soil. Speaking of the Established Church, he said that it was to be earnest, thoughtful, and honestly-minded Protestants in the country that the argument was to be addressed; and were he addressing a similar number of those men to that of which the meeting was composed, he would ask them if they approved of the ecclesiastical settlement of the country made 300 years ago, or whether the present state of the country was satisfactory? The gentleman concluded as follows:—"We are met in the city of the violated treaty—violated, as I admit, incessantly during almost centuries of time. Let us make a new treaty—not on parchment, not bound with an oath. Its end should be this—justice on the part of Great Britain, forgiveness on the part of Ireland. (Cheers.) It shall be written in the hearts of three nations, and they would pray to the common Father of all, in whose hands were the destinies of nations and of States, that He would make it last for ever and ever."

15.—Inauguration of the Memorial Window set up in Guildhall by the operatives of the Lancashire cotton districts in acknowledgment of the sum of 500,000*l.* raised by the Mansion House Relief Committee during the cotton famine.

16.—Professor Henry Morley publishes in the Times an Epitaph which he considers to be the work of Milton, and to have been written by him on the blank leaf of the Museum copy of Milton's English and Latin Poems, 1645. The genuineness of the Epitaph was disputed by competent critics.

— Engagement at Humaiti between the Brazilian allies and Paraguayans, in which the former were reported to have lost between 4,000 and 5,000 men. The garrison was afterwards withdrawn from the fortress, and joined the army of Lopez on the Tebicuari.

17.—Six boys drowned while bathing near the village of Prestatyn, North Wales.

— Prince Gortschakoff writes to Russian representatives at foreign Courts: "Russia having assented to the proposals of the Berlin Cabinet, that commissioners and experts from the different Governments should meet at St. Petersburg to draw up a protocol, excluding the use of explosive missiles in future warfare, these commissioners will assemble on the 13th October."

18.—A deputation from the Hyde Park Demonstration Committee, headed by the notorious Finlen, waited upon Mr. Gladstone at his residence in Carlton-house-terrace to assure him of the continued support of the working classes, to express the hope that he would not be discouraged by the adverse vote of the House of Lords, and to inform him of the intention of the working men of London to hold a demonstration in Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon condemnatory of the recent vote in the House of Lords. Mr. Gladstone said he was always happy to receive a deputation of real working men, such as the one before him. He was not discouraged by the vote of the House of Lords, and had no doubt they would be alive to the public opinion as expressed at the next election. With respect to the demonstration, that was a matter for the consideration of themselves, and about which he was not called upon to express an opinion farther than to say that some good reasons had been urged by the deputation why it should be held. The demonstration was held next day (Sunday). This interview was referred to in the House of Commons by Sir Charles Russell on the 24th, when Mr. Gladstone defended himself from the imputation sought to be cast on his proceedings.

18.—Mr. Fawcett's proposal to throw returning officers' expenses at elections upon the rates carried by 78 to 69.

20.—Government defeated in Committee on the Irish Registration Bill, the polling booth clause being thrown out by a majority of 84 to 74.

— Came on at Carlisle Assizes, before the Lord Chief Baron, the trial of Jonathan Armstrong, yeoman, charged with forging the will of his late father with intent to regain possession of certain land, which his mother had sold under the real will. The prisoner's father died in December 1854, having previously made a will in 1847, devising his whole real and personal estate to his wife. The property was subsequently bought by a Mr. Cooke, of Cameron Hall. He having also died, his executors sought to recover possession of certain closes of land not mentioned in the devise of John Armstrong. On the solicitor of the plaintiff visiting York Court to inspect Armstrong's will, he found to his astonishment that it had been revoked by a new will giving to the wife only a life interest in the property, and insuring its reversion to the son on her death: this new will was followed by a codicil, which directed that the persons named therein should lose all benefits of its bequests if they disputed the validity of the will. The documents were put into the hands of an expert, who speedily showed that they were clumsy forgeries, and undoubtedly in the handwriting of young Armstrong. The spelling was bad, and the prisoner was connected by this bad spelling with other writing which was certainly his. Armstrong was found guilty, and sentenced to seven years penal servitude.

— In allusion to coercive measures alleged to be exercised by the Duke of Portland towards his tenants, his Grace writes:—"There is not a single individual in the kingdom thoroughly well acquainted with public affairs who, if a gentleman, would deny upon his honour, or, if otherwise, on his oath, (unless a fit subject for committal for perjury!) that party motives, and party motives alone, have been the guiding star of the mover of the present onslaught on the Church and unholy alliance with Demagogues and Papists, whose openly-avowed objects are to pull down the best and most ancient institutions of the country, and set up Yankeeism in politics, and Voluntarism and Popishdom in religion. I have only further to remark that the threat of swamping public opinion by force of money—'a thousand pounds subscription, and others,' you say—is all of a piece with the farce of the whole article, coming, as it does, from so professedly virtuous and indignant a politician; and in regard to the mysterious allusion to 'drawing-room influence,' I presume that is a hit at the well-known opinions of the highest personage in the realm, our beloved Queen—the ablest, and best, and most patriotic sovereign this country ever had the blessing to possess, and whose rare gift of insight into the true character of the public men around her has too truly taught her the danger of the advent to power of those who now so recklessly, at all hazards, aspire to it, no matter at what cost to the best interests of the country."

21.—The Government bill for acquiring the electric telegraphs of the kingdom passes through Committee.

— Inauguration at Romsey of the Palmerston Memorials—a statue in the town and a stained glass window in the Abbey Church. A large number of the deceased Premier's friends and political supporters took part in the proceedings.

— Disturbances in the Danubian Principalities. Engagements take place to-day near Rustschuck.

22.—Lord Napier presented with the freedom of the City of London.

23.—In the discussion which ensued on bringing up the report of the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, the Commons reject the amendment formerly carried by Mr. Fawcett charging the expenses of hustings, polling places, &c., on the local rates.

— Thomas Walls, railway porter, tried at Dover Assizes for shooting A. Walsh, station-master, Dover, on the 1st May. He was found guilty, and sentenced, in terms of the recent Act, to be executed within the walls of Maidstone Prison on the 13th August.

24.—Flood at Baltimore, destroying a large part of the town, and causing the death of many of the inhabitants.

26.—Clause introduced into the Railway Regulation Bill enjoining railway companies, unless specially excused by the Board of Trade, to attach a smoking carriage to every train consisting of more than one carriage of each class.

— Died at Holwood, Kent, aged 78, Lord Cranworth (Rolfe), Lord Chancellor in the Ministries of Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell.

27.—Trial of the Servian conspirators at Belgrade. With the exception of José Jeremiah, who was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, and against whom no proof of complicity in the assassination of Prince Michael was discovered, all the other accused persons who had been arrested, to the number of fourteen, were condemned to death to-day. Prince Alexander Karageorgewich, his secretary Trivowich, and Philip Hankovich, who had not been captured, were sentenced, in default, to twenty years' imprisonment. The condemned conspirators were executed next day in the Black Valley.

— Cadore, North Italy, destroyed by the fall of the hill of Antelao, supposed to have been loosened from the adjoining mass by the action of melted snow.

— Lord Napier of Magdala takes his seat in the House of Lords.

28.—Lord Strathnairn, Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, calls the attention of the House of Lords to the necessity which existed for increasing the number of polling places at Irish elections, in order that voters might have more adequate protection than had hitherto been afforded them. Lord Malmesbury said the fault in this matter did not rest with the Government, but with the Opposition, who had designedly and wickedly thrown out of the Corrupt Practices Bill a clause specially designed to increase polling places in Ireland.

29.—The marriage of Mdle. Adelina Patti with the Marquis de Caux celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church, Park-place, Clapham.

— At a banquet given to her Majesty's Ministers by the Lord Mayor, Mr. Disraeli defended the past session from the charge of barrenness brought against it, congratulated his hearers on the peace which the Government had been able to keep with foreign countries, and spoke with great confidence of the manner in which the enlarged constituencies would discharge the trust now reposed in them. "I do not (he said) wish on this occasion to go into controverted matters, but I believe that on this great question the heart of the country is sound, and that they will return a House of Commons determined to maintain the institutions of the country, and also that civil and religious liberty on the security of which those institutions so much depend. (Hear, hear.) Making allowance for some infirmities and some mistakes, the retrospect of the present House of Commons is on the whole a noble one. It has moved forward in the path of progress and enlightenment, and done its duty to the country. I trust that when the new Parliament shall close its career, it may be able to point to a proud history, to many measures of usefulness, to a career of enlightenment, and that it may leave unimpaired that great Constitution which we have inherited from our forefathers; and that, with the progress of ideas and expansion of trade and commerce, and greater freedom in religious matters, we may still look forward, come what may, to that bond of union between Church and State which has been the pride and glory and security of the country."

29.—At a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Bishop of Capetown intimates that, as all difficulties with regard to the consecration of a Bishop of Natal had now been removed, it was his intention to proceed shortly to South Africa and consecrate Mr. Macrorie "as bishop for the faithful clergy in the diocese of Natal."

— Garibaldi writes from Caprera:—"Our people, without abandoning the labour which preserves the body, should think of freeing their mind. For what kind of liberty is to be expected from a nation which every day falls down at the feet of priests, the pedestal of every tyranny, and the soldiers of the most atrocious of Italy's tyrants? I shall believe that our people mean freedom when I see the shop of St. Peter turned into an asylum for the indigent, when I see the flask of St. Januarius broken on the tonsured pate of the ludicrous sorcerer. Come what will, I shall die unhappy if on the day you fight for Italy's liberty—which I hope will be soon—I cannot follow you, at least in an ambulance."

30.—The Thames Embankment from Westminster Bridge to the Temple opened for traffic, with little ceremony.

— Disastrous panic in Manchester, arising out of an alarm of fire raised in Lang's Victoria Music Hall. The occupants of the upper gallery, alarmed at the breaking of a gas pendant, rushed in large numbers down the winding staircase leading to the street, and with such fury that those who stumbled or fell were trampled to death by their excited neighbours. The centre rail of the stairs also gave way under the violent pressure to which it was subjected, and a large number of the terrified victims of their own fear were thrown in a mass to the bottom. When relief came, a few of those on the top were found to be alive, but others near the bottom were inextricably wedged together, and died from suffocation or bruises. Twenty-three were known to have lost their lives in this calamity, while at least an equal number suffered from external or internal injuries. The Coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but at the same time expressed an opinion that the staircase and handrails were quite insufficient for a place where such large numbers assembled, and that suitable provision should at once be made for the safety of future audiences. They further recommended that power should be given to the Corporation to appoint an officer to inspect theatres, music halls, and places of a similar description, and that no licences should be granted to the lessees of such buildings unless they could provide properly for the public safety.

31.—Close of the last Parliament elected under the Reform Bill of 1832. The Royal Commissioners took their seats at two o'clock, shortly after which the Royal Assent was given to a large number of bills, the Electric Telegraph Bill among the rest. The Lord Chancellor read the Queen's Speech, congratulating Parliament on the friendly relations of this country with foreign Powers, the success of the Abyssinian expedition, and the restoration of comparative quiet in Ireland. "It is my intention," the Speech concluded, "to dissolve the present Parliament at the earliest day that will enable my people to reap the benefit of the extended system of representation which the wisdom of Parliament has provided for them. I look with entire confidence to their proving themselves worthy of the high privilege with which they have thus been invested, and trust that, under the blessings of Divine Providence, the expression of their opinion on the great questions of public policy which have occupied the attention of Parliament and remain undecided may tend to maintain unimpaired that civil and religious freedom which has been secured to all my subjects by the institutions and settlements of my realm."

August 1.—A duel arising out of an article entitled "The Epilogue," which appeared in La Liberté, takes place this evening between MM. Jecker and Odysse Barrot. They met on the skirts of the forest of Soignée, near the avenue which leads to Waterloo. Barrot was hit in the region of the abdomen, but the ball appeared to have been turned aside by a button, and was afterwards found in his waistcoat pocket. Mutual explanations then took place, and the principals left the ground with their friends.

3.—Rumoured failure of one of the Atlantic telegraph cables.

— Insurrectionary movements reported from Spain, bands of armed citizens suddenly appearing over the province of Arragon. Ministerial organs pronounced them to be smugglers, but admitted that they were acting under the direction of a Brigadier-General.

4.—Jefferson Davis, late President of the Confederate States, arrives at Liverpool.

5.—Unveiling of Foley's statue of Lord Clyde erected in Glasgow.

— M. Rochefort fined 50 f. for refusing to insert a Government communiqué in the Lanterne. On the 14th he was fined (in absence) 10,000f. for another offence against the Government, and sentenced also to one year's imprisonment. The publication was afterwards suppressed with great assiduity.

— Mr. Gladstone commences his electoral campaign in South-west Lancashire, by addressing the constituency at St. Helen's. His views on the Irish Church question were, if possible, more pronounced than he had expressed in the House of Commons. "There are a great number of things," he said, "that are absolutely impossible. You can't amend this Church in one respect or direction, without offending in some other respect or direction, and making the case worse than before. The reason of it is that there is no basis. It is wholly disabled and disqualified for performing the purposes for which it exists; and consequently I spoke in literal truth, and not in mere sarcasm, when I said, 'You must not take away its abuses, because if you take them away there will be nothing left.'" Speaking of the effect of the proposed disestablishment on the Church here, he said nothing appeared to him more idle than to attempt to draw a parallel between the case of the Church of Ireland and the case of the Church of England. "The duty of a religious establishment is a duty to the nation at large. The idea of a religious establishment ministering only to a handful of the people is an unnatural and monstrous idea; and when you have arrived at such a state of things, it is time that Establishment should cease to exist. (Cheers.) In many parts of the country the Church of England is the sole, and in many other parts the principal, if not the sole, religious agency; and only in the most populous parts is she confronted by the friendly competition of the other religious bodies. Still I think the Church of England enters into the natural life and purpose of the country, and is associated in a great degree with the feelings, the traditions, as well as the history of England; and there are, in my opinion, very many who do not formally belong to her communion, who would with deep regret witness her downfall. (Cheers.) The great difference between the two Churches is summed up in the fact that the Church of Ireland is a Church established by law, which neither does nor can do the work of an Establishment; but the Church of England, established by law also, in most parts of the country does the sole, and in many others the chief, part of the work of an Establishment." Mr. Gladstone was accompanied by his colleague, Mr. H. R. Grenfell. Other addresses were delivered in rapid succession at Warrington, Liverpool, Newton-Bridge, Wigan, and Ormskirk.

5.—The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet adopt the principle of the Organization Bill, by a majority of 235 against 33 votes.

6.—Fire at the Brighton Railway Terminus, London Bridge, confined mainly to the vaults under the platform, in which it originated.

— Her Majesty, whose health had recently caused much anxiety in the Royal household, sets out on a journey to Switzerland. She passed from Cherbourg to Paris on the 7th, and arrived at Lucerne on the 8th.

8.—The Dublin Gazette announces the elevation of the Marquis of Abercorn to a dukedom.

—Lord Napier of Magdala entertained at Welshpool. He made a speech on the occasion in defence of the policy he had pursued from the day he landed in Abyssinia, and emphatically asserted that Theodore had not been deceived, as was alleged, into freeing the captives, on condition that his fortress should not be attacked.

9.—The morning journals criticise, generally unfavourably, the rumoured appointment of the Earl of Mayo as Governor-General of India. Other governors appointed at this time by Mr. Disraeli were, Sir James Fergusson to South Australia, and Mr. Ducane to Tasmania.

—In answer to an address presented by the Mayor of Troyes, the Emperor Napoleon urged the citizens to continued industry, "for nothing to-day threatens the peace of Europe."

10.—Fire in King-street, Southwark, destroying several cottages and four large hop warehouses.

11.—Died, in Paris, Ada Menken, actress and equestrian performer.

—The Parisian students make a hostile political demonstration on the occasion of the Prince Imperial distributing the annual prizes at the Sorbonne. Young Cavaignac, who had obtained the first prize for Greek, refused to accept his reward at the hands of the Prince, a proceeding in which he was encouraged by the advice of his mother and the frantic cheers of the students.

13.—Died, aged 75, Thaddeus Stevens, an active and influential politician of the United States.

—Earthquake in Central America, destroying within a few days the cities of Arica, Arequipa, Iquique, and Ecuador, with fleets of merchant vessels along the entire coast. The loss of life was beyond all precedent—as many it was thought as 40,000 having perished in the ruins of falling cities, or been engulfed in the yawning earth. In many places the sea first retired a space, and then rushed over the towns on the shore with great violence. At Arequipa an eye-witness writes:—"We are now living in a tent on the river bank. No one dares go to town, as the shocks still continue to bring down what little is left standing. They occur at intervals of half an hour each. This evening some of the shocks have been very violent. So far there have been about 70 shocks up to 8 P.M. The river Paucarpata has changed to three colours, which makes us believe the volcanoes are at work. Everything is confusion, and the cries and lamentations that we hear are heartrending. Thus the work of the Arequipinos for 300 years has been destroyed in a few minutes; it will take 500 years to do the same work again. The débris of the Jesuits' Church was hurled to a distance of 100 yards. The picture presented by our desolate city is sad indeed. God grant that our fears be not realized, for Mount Misti is vomiting lava, clouds of smoke, and quantities of mud, and darkness hides its belching from our view. We hear the constant noise of falling rocks and earth, and the river is impassable, owing to its black colour and sulphurous odour." "In the city of Quito," another wrote, "all the churches, convents, and a large number of houses are in a state of complete ruin. The undulation was from north to south. On the 16th, nine severe shocks were felt, every one of which added to the destruction and the general panic that prevailed. The people of the capital have all deserted their homes, and fled to the open country for safety. The sufferings of these poor people, who are wandering over the country without money, without food and clothing, cannot be described. Business of all kinds is totally suspended." The intelligence from Arica was:—"The hour was that when by custom most of the inhabitants had just closed their daily labours and were at their homes. The instant the startling indications of an earthquake were felt there was a general rush for uncovered spaces, which were reached by many uninjured, but not by all. The streets became a scene of terror. All the houses in the city trembled like a person affected with the ague. Then they surged, and some of them fell to pieces with crash after crash. At this juncture, when the undulations were active, the earth opened in several places in long and almost regular lines. The fissures were from one to three inches in width. The sensation was distinct, as though something was rolling underneath. From every fissure there belched forth dry earth like dust, which was followed by a stifling gas. Owing to the demolition of buildings and the general destruction of all kinds of property, and the dust belched forth as well as that set in motion by the general tumult, a dense cloud was formed over the city and obscured the light. Beneath the cloud was the gas, which severely oppressed every living creature, and would have suffocated all these if it had lingered longer stationary than it did, which was only about 90 seconds. The undulations were three in number, each succeeding one being of greater magnitude than the former." The intelligence produced a fall in this country of 1½ per cent. in Peruvian, and 1¼ in Ecuador bonds.

14.—Collision off the Eddystone Lighthouse between H.M.S. Warrior and Royal Oak, two of the Channel squadron then proceeding to Ireland. The gale in which the squadron was caught increasing in severity, a signal was made from the admiral's ship to take in a second reef of topsails. While the ships were so employed, the Warrior forged ahead, came up under the lee of the Royal Oak, and ran into her starboard quarter. The vessels were twenty minutes locked together, and sustained considerable damage. Some blame was at first thought to attach to Captain Boys of the Warrior, but a court-martial afterwards summoned at Devonport entirely acquitted him.

14.—Dr. Pusey addresses a letter to the President of the Wesleyan Conference, pleading that the Methodists should co-operate with the Oxford Tories in resisting Mr. Coleridge's scheme for throwing open the honours and emoluments of the Universities to men of all creeds and denominations. "Supposing the present state of things to be changed," Dr. Pusey suggested "two alternative expedients." The first was that subscription to the Nicene Creed should be substituted for subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles; the other, that new colleges should be founded out of the revenues of the old ones for "the different bodies who hold the faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." He observed that "either of these ways would be a religious way," and would be "far preferable" to Mr. Coleridge's plan, "which would entrust the education of our youth to (as it may be) deist or atheist." Conference decided to abstain from dealing with the subject "for the present." It was of this letter the Rev. J. W. Burgon, of Oriel, declared, "That of all the wild expedients I have ever seen committed to paper by a good man, I have never in my life met with anything more wild, more impracticable, than this to which you have subscribed your honoured name." He said it must not be thought for an instant that Dr. Pusey has expressed the sentiment of the University, for he believes that not five Churchmen in the University would endorse it. He held that Mr. Coleridge's bill, irreligious as it was, would have been far less mischievous in its operation than the proposal of which Dr. Pusey is the advocate.

—Died Matthew James Higgins, well known in the public controversies of the day as "Jacob Omnium."

—Mr. W. Scully's bailiff and a policeman murdered at Ballicohey, Tipperary, while serving notices of eviction.

15.—His Excellency Mr. Reverdy Johnson, the new United States Minister, lands at Southampton.

—Certain questions having been proposed by General Rosencranz regarding the wishes and intentions of the inhabitants of the Southern States, General Lee answers to-day:—"The people earnestly desire tranquillity and the restoration of the Union; they deprecate disorder and excitement as the most serious obstacle to their prosperity. They ask a restoration of their rights under the Constitution; they desire relief from oppressive misrule. Above all, they would appeal to their countrymen for the re-establishment in the Southern States of that which has justly been regarded as the birthright of every American, the right of self-government. Establish these on a firm basis, and we can safely promise on behalf of the Southern people that they will faithfully obey the Constitution and laws of the United States, treat the negro with kindness and humanity, and fulfil every duty incumbent on peaceful citizens, loyal to the Constitution of their country."

16.—Telegrams from Madrid of this evening's date announce that the Spanish Government is in a disorganized state.

17.—Demonstration at the Crystal Palace in professed defence of the Throne, the Church, and the Constitution, but more particularly of the Irish Church. The gathering, which was thinly attended and passed off peaceably, was presided over by Lord Fitzwalter. The only Bishop present was the Australian Bishop of Perth, and the only M. P. Mr. Newdegate. It was intimated in the course of the proceedings that the Duke of Portland had subscribed 2,000*l.* to aid the cause of the association.

19.—Great eclipse. To-day a shadow, such as never before fell on the earth within historic times, swept at the rate of 200 miles per hour from the Straits of Bab-el-Mandel across the two Indian peninsulas, over Borneo and Celebes, and, touching the northern extremity of Australia, passed out many hundreds of miles (before leaving the earth) upon the Pacific Ocean.

—Sir W. Brett, solicitor-general, Serjeant Hayes, and Mr. Cleasby, Q. C., mentioned as the judges to be appointed under the Bribery Act of last session for trying election petitions.

—Fire at Northumberland House, destroying portions of the picture-gallery, ball-room, and stables.

—Appalling accident to the Irish limited mail train at Abergelle, North Wales. After leaving Chester the train proceeded at its usual high speed, till nearing Abergelle it came into violent collision with certain trucks which had broken off at the station and run down the incline. The effects were most disastrous. The engine was completely smashed, several of the foremost carriages were thrown across the line, and a number of the passengers killed or injured. But the loss of life in this way must have been trifling compared with what followed. A few of the passengers had liberated themselves from their carriages, and were doing what they could to assist each other, when the horrible discovery was made that the front carriages were enveloped in flames. The petroleum with which the trucks had been loaded swept along with a swiftness and intensity which made escape or even aid impossible. Death was so sudden that at the inquiry which subsequently took place few could say they either saw the sufferings of their fellow-passengers or heard their cry for help. Twenty-eight parcels of charred human remains were laid in Abergele Church, to await the Coroner's inquest. They were in such a condition as made it difficult to distinguish sex, or even to be sure of the number of persons represented. Other five were less mutilated, and gave encouragement to the belief that all had died instantaneously either from the collision itself or the sudden ignition of the petroleum by which it was followed. Of the thirty-three killed, ten were thought to be males, thirteen females, and of ten the sex could not be distinguished. The remains were buried in one grave in Abergele Churchyard. Lord and Lady Farnham with a companion and three attendants, were among those who perished in the disaster. The Duchess of Abercorn and family were in the train, but, occupying an end carriage, escaped with others unhurt. The manner in which the Coroner at first conducted the inquiry gave rise to some dissatisfaction among relatives, but they latterly concurred in his proceedings, and lent what help they could to carry them out. After a lengthened examination of witnesses, the jury found a verdict of manslaughter against the two breaksmen of the goods train. They also censured the Llandulas station-master for neglect of duty; recommended that longer time should be allowed for shunting before passenger trains are due; and that during the shunting process the points should be kept open into the siding, to prevent runaway trucks escaping to the main line. They were satisfied that the doors of the carriages were not locked on the platform side, and expressed the deepest sympathy with the relatives. The breaksmen surrendered and were admitted to bail.

20.—Mr. Gladstone replies to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's defence of the finance schemes of the Government. "We left the income-tax (he said) at 4*l.* in the pound. The expenditure of 1859-60 was arranged by the Tory Government. It was early in July that, on coming into office, I had to meet a deficit of, I think, four and a half millions, in a year of which all the arrangements had been made, and of which between three and four months had actually gone." A detailed statement dealt with the expenditure for the army, navy, and Civil Service—the extent to which these had fallen short of or exceeded the estimates proposed by different Governments. The Liberal party, he calculated, saved about 1,800,000*l.* between 1862 and 1865, while the Tory Government exceeded in two years 1,145,000*l.*, besides the cost of the Abyssinian war. The financial schemes carried through between 1862 and 1865 gave the country reduction of taxation to the extent of 2,276,000*l.* annually. "From thence it follows that the policy of the Liberal party has been to reduce the public charges, and to keep the expenditure within the estimates, and, as a result, to diminish the taxation of the country and the national debt; that the policy of the Tory Government, since they took office in 1866, has been to increase the public charges, and to allow the departments to spend more than their estimates, and, as a result, to create deficits, and to render the reduction of taxation impossible. Which policy will the country prefer?" The Chancellor of the Exchequer afterwards wrote to Mr. Cross, the Conservative candidate for South-west Lancashire:—"Speaking in round numbers—that is sufficiently accurate—the difference between the estimates presented to Parliament by the late Government for 1866-7 and by the present Government for 1868-9, after making all necessary corrections for alterations in account and transfer of charges from the Consolidated and other funds, amounts, I believe, to 2,815,654*l.* First, the excess of the army estimates of 1868-9 over the original estimates of 1866-7 amounts to 1,360,000*l.* The excess of the navy estimates of 1868-9 over the original estimates of 1866-7, added to the supplemental estimate of March 1866, after making the necessary adjustment for alterations in the account, amounts to 584,914*l.* The excess of the Civil Service and revenue estimates, as finally voted for 1868-9, over the original estimates of 1866-7, after making the necessary adjustment for alterations in the account, amounts to 870,740*l.* From this should be deducted, say, 300,000*l.*, being that portion of the supplemental estimates for 1866-7 excluding extraordinary services which ought to have been provided for in original estimates." This extra expenditure Mr. Hunt accounted for by the increase of pay to the army, the arming of fortifications, and the furnishing of breech-loaders.

20.—Replying to claims for compensation made by the owners of the captured Tornado, Lord Stanley writes that, after having consulted the proper law advisers of the Crown, he considers that the final issue of the proceedings in the Tornado case must be awaited before any decision is arrived at as to the course to be adopted with reference to the claim of members of the crew for compensation.

26.—A letter appearing in the Times purporting to be from the Hon. Stuart Wortley, and offering to restore 18,000*l.* which he had received through his connexion with the Credit Foncier, Mr. Wortley now writes that the epistle was a hoax, and that he had never received 18,000*l.*, "or any sum in any degree approaching to that amount."

29.—General Garibaldi resigns his seat as Deputy in the Italian Parliament.

30.—Duel at Vesinet, near St. Germain, between M. Paul Cassagnac, of the Pays, and M. Lissagary, editor of the Avenir, published in the Gris, and which had laid itself out to oppose the re-election of M. Garnier de Cassagnac for that department. M. Lissagary was dangerously wounded.

September 1.—The Earl of Mayo announces to the electors of Cockermouth that he did not intend to ask their suffrages on the occasion of the present election, as he had accepted the office of Governor-General of India.

3.—The Archbishop of Dublin in his Visitation Charge tells his clergy that the Irish Church was assailed by Englishmen because Irish outrages have overflowed into England. He asserted that the Roman Catholic priesthood will never allow the Roman Catholic population under their influence to be thoroughly reconciled to Imperial rule. The proposal to disestablish the Irish Church was made, the Archbishop thought, with levity and precipitation. "The Roman Catholics will be but feebly and languidly pleased, whilst the Protestants will entertain the liveliest and most enduring resentment for the wrong inflicted upon them."

— Died at Baden, aged 69, Professor Schönbein, famous as the discoverer of ozone and the inventor of gun-cotton.

— Mr. Reverdy Johnson entertained at a banquet in Sheffield. He spoke in a hopeful way of our relations with the United States, and trusted that both countries would always be found standing side by side. Later in the evening, Mr. Roebuck created some surprise by speaking of the admixture of races in America as something different from what is found here, and as a difference for the worse. He asked his hearers to picture to themselves the wild Irishman, the fiery Frenchman, the assassinating Italian, and the dumbfounded Spaniard all going out in one mass to be worked up in America.

4.—Fire in Southampton Docks, destroying the greater portion of the West India Company's factory.

5.—This day (Saturday) the great cab strike which had been threatened through the week in the metropolis reached its culminating point. With the exception of what were termed privileged cabs, there were few or none plying for hire, any that attempted being generally surrounded by a mob of cabmen and hustled back to the yard. At a meeting convened on Primrose-hill, a resolution was agreed to—"That we, the cab-drivers of London, on account of the unfair treatment and refusal of the various railway companies to throw open their stations to us, are reluctantly but fully determined not to take out any proprietor's cabs until such time as those railways are open to each and all of us; and that this resolution is to take effect from this day." The strike failed in its purpose of opening up the railway stations to all cabs.

6.—An informal announcement made that Government, as a response to the recent Russian successes in Central Asia, have resolved to occupy a portion of Southern Afghanistan; to fortify Quetta, near the Bolan Pass, in Beloochistan; to form several strategical lines of railway across the Punjab, and otherwise set the Indian frontier in order either for offence or defence.

14.—Mr. Reverdy Johnson presents his credentials to the Queen at Windsor.

15.—In a speech at Kiel the King of Prussia said:—"I do not see throughout Europe any cause for the disturbance of peace. What will still more reassure you, I perceive in the representatives of the army and navy assembled here the vigour of the fatherland, who have proved that they do not shun the combat if compelled to fight it out."

— Wheelan tried at Ottawa for the murder of Mr. Darcy M'Ghee, and sentenced to be executed on the 10th December. He denied being a Fenian, or entertaining any feeling of hostility whatever against M'Ghee.

18.—Announcement made to-day that Sir John Young (formerly Governor of the Ionian Islands) had been selected to succeed Lord Monck as Governor-General of the Canadian Confederation.

— Interview at San Sebastian between the Queen of Spain and the Emperor Napoleon III. It was immediately rumoured that the aid solicited by the Queen had been refused.

— Explosion in the cartridge manufactory of Metz, causing the death of thirty men and six women. As many as 110 were said to have been injured.

— The King of Prussia, in replying to an address presented by the Burgomaster of Kiel, said:—"I thank you for this festive reception. I remember my former presence among you in 1864. Then the future of the Elbe Duchies was still uncertain; now their destiny is decided. This reception is a moral guarantee that public opinion is no longer antagonistic to the established Parliaments, and is now becoming reconciled to the changes which have taken place." His Majesty also assured the clergy of Schleswig-Holstein that by the annexation to Prussia complete freedom of worship has been guaranteed to all creeds.

18.—Revolution in Spain. The banished generals return from the Canary Islands and raise the standard of insurrection in Andalusia. The fleet pronounce against the present Government, as does also the garrison of Cadiz. Great excitement in Madrid, but no fighting. It was rumoured in the capital that the Queen, then at St. Sebastian, had consented to abdicate. Reports from the provinces were for several days confused and contradictory.

21.—Gobazye said to have crowned himself Emperor of Abyssinia.

22.—Telegram received at Madrid that the whole of the provinces of Andalusia, Galicia, Corunna, and Santander, with the whole of the soldiers and sailors in Ferrol, had pronounced in favour of the revolution. There was sharp fighting at Santander, terminating in the defeat of the Government party. In several places the statues of the Queen were thrown down. Her friends also admit to-day that she could not leave San Sebastian with any reasonable hope of reaching the capital in safety. The country declared to be in a state of siege.

24.—Died, at Queen's-hill Lodge, Ascot, aged 77, the Very Rev. Henry Hart Milman, Dean of St. Paul's, author of "The History of the Jews," "Latin Christianity," &c.

25.—Fall of the "Old Sugar House" at Hull. Seven people employed on the premises were killed and two boys in the street.

— Bouverie - Mill Correspondence. — Mr. Edwin Chadwick, C.B., having appeared as a candidate before the electors of the Kilmarnock district of burghs, armed with a strong recommendation in his favour by the member for Westminster, Mr. Bouverie now complains of this as tending to divide the Liberal ranks, and wanting in that toleration for minor differences, without which party action was impossible.—Mr. Mill replied, from Avignon, that every man should consider first not his own claims and wishes, but the public interest. "For my own part I can disclaim acting ungenerously towards yourself when I warmly support the candidature of Mr. Chadwick, because I would very gladly put him in my own place if I saw a probability of success. I consider Mr. Chadwick to be an altogether exceptional man, to whom it would be an honour to any other man to give way, because, however superior he may consider himself, or might actually be to Mr. Chadwick in some things, there are others (of extreme importance in Parliament) in which Mr. Chadwick has not his equal in England, nor, so far as I know, in Europe." To this Mr. Bouverie replied:—"If I were to act on your advice, the result would be a substitution of your individual opinion for the free choice of the constituency. In Westminster, where Mr. Chadwick is, perhaps, better known than in Scotland, I have your high authority for the statement, that the constituency would not be likely to accept him, even upon your recommendation. Upon what knowledge, may I ask, of the Kilmarnock burghs do you presume that he would be more acceptable to them? If you are a fit judge of Westminster in this matter, may not I be permitted to form a judgment of Kilmarnock? If I knew anything of my present constituency, I should say they would be extremely likely to form opinions for themselves without the aid of anybody, however eminent, and that those who have just been added to the register will not be a whit less keen and discerning than their neighbours in forming and exercising their own judgment. You will pardon me, therefore, for declining your invitation to give way for the purpose of obtaining the return of Mr. Chadwick, as unconstitutional, unwise, and not likely to be attended with success; and if you will permit me a word of advice in return, I would say that the best hope of our common political adversaries lies in the Liberal constituencies being exposed to a contest among Liberals, and that those who aspire to play leading parts among us would do well not to exaggerate this evil."

27.—Died, aged 58, Count Walewski, formerly French Ambassador at the Court of St. James's.

— Explosion at the Moxley Steel and Iron Works, Wolverhampton, killing 11 puddlers, and injuring others, some of them at a great distance from the furnace.

29.—Encounter between the Spanish insurgent troops, under Marshal Serrano, and the Royalists, under the Marquis de Novaliches, at Ancola Bridge. The latter was defeated, and severely wounded. The provinces generally were now giving in their adhesion to the revolution, and at Madrid the Cabinet ceased even pretending to carry on the Government of the country in the name of Queen Isabella. Her Majesty left St. Sebastian on the morning of the 30th, and was accompanied to the frontier by Spanish halberdiers. Her Majesty breakfasted at Hendaye at 11 A.M., and arrived at Biarritz at 2.25, where she had an interview, lasting fifteen minutes, with the Emperor Napoleon, the Empress Eugenie, and the Prince Imperial. She arrived at Bayonne at 2.45 P.M. by special train, accompanied by the Prefect of the Lower Pyrenees. The Queen was received at the railway station by the Sub-Prefect, the Mayor, and several members of the late Spanish Ministry. Senor Gonzales Bravo had five minutes' conversation with Queen Isabella. The royal fugitives, with Marfori, Intendant of the Palace, her husband and family, took up their residence at the Castle of Pau, placed at her Majesty's disposal by the Emperor Napoleon. On the day of her flight the Queen issued a protest against the conspiracy which has "flung Spain into all the horrors of anarchy. . . If the towns and the provinces, yielding to the first pressure of violence, submit for a time to the yoke of the insurgents, soon public feeling, hurt in its most sensitive and noblest parts, will shake off its torpor, and show the world that the eclipse of reason and of honour in Spain cannot last long. Until that time arrives, I have thought proper, as Queen of Spain, and after due deliberation and sound advice, to seek in the states of an august ally the security requisite to enable me to act under these difficult circumstances in conformity with my position as a queen, and with the duty that devolves on me to transmit unimpaired to my son my rights sanctioned by law, acknowledged and sworn to by the nation, and fortified by thirty-five years of sacrifice, vicissitudes, and tender affection. . . A monarchy embodying fifteen centuries of struggles, patriotism, victories, and grandeur cannot be destroyed by fifteen days of perjury and treason. Let us have faith in the future. The glory of the Spanish people was ever connected with its kings. The misfortunes of its kings ever fell heavily on the people. In my firm and patriotic hope that right, honour, and legitimacy will be maintained, I believe that your minds and your efforts will ever unite with the energetic decisions and maternal affections of your Queen."

— Explosion in the Green Pit Colliery, Ruabon, Wales, causing the death of ten workmen and injuring eleven others.

2.—In his address to the electors of Buckinghamshire, the Premier writes:—"The leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons seized the occasion of an expiring Parliament, which had proclaimed its inadequate representation of the country, to recommend a change of the fundamental laws of the realm, and to propose a dissolution of the union between Church and State. Her Majesty's Government offered and will offer to this policy an uncompromising resistance. The connexion of religion with the exercise of political authority is one of the main safeguards of the civilization of man. It instils some sense of responsibility even into the depositaries of absolute power; but, under any circumstances, the absence or severance of such a tie will lower the character and duties of Government, and tend to the degradation of society. . . Instead of Ireland being made an exception to the fundamental condition of our Constitution, there are many important reasons why the Established Church should be maintained in that country. Its suppression would aggravate religious hostility and party rancour, (698) would suppress a resident class of men whose social virtues are conducive, as all agree, to the welfare of the country, and would further diminish the security of property in a land where its tenure and enjoyment are not as unquestioned as they hitherto have been in other parts of her Majesty's dominions. But even in Great Britain the spoliation of the Church in Ireland would not be without its effect. Confiscation is contagious, and when once a community has been seduced into plunder, its predatory acts have seldom been single. . . . Amidst the discordant activity of many factions, there moves the supreme purpose of one power. The philosopher may flatter himself he is advancing the cause of enlightened progress; the sectarian may be roused to exertion by anticipations of the downfall of ecclesiastical systems. These are transient efforts—vain and passing aspirations. The ultimate triumph, were our Church to fall, would be to that power which would substitute for the authority of our sovereign the supremacy of a foreign prince—to that power with whose traditions, learning, discipline, and organization our Church alone has hitherto been able to cope, and that, too, only when supported by a determined and devoted people."

2.—Taking advantage of the approaching dissolution of Parliament, Sir W. Heathcote retires from the representation of Oxford University, on the ground of ill-health. The Liberal party at once put themselves into communication with Sir Roundell Palmer, for the purpose of inducing him to come forward as a candidate. He at first consented; but the chances appearing to be against his election, Sir Roundell afterwards returned to his Richmond constituents.

— Successful experiments with the Moncrieff gun-carriage at Shoeburyness. They were repeated a week afterwards.

4.—Boat upset on the Thames, near Westminster Bridge, and four of the passengers drowned.

5.—Interview between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Papal emissaries regarding the forthcoming Œcumenical Council called at Rome. On behalf of the Greek Church the Patriarch declared the convening of the Council vain and fruitless, so long as Rome held—(1) That there is in the Universal Church of Christ any bishop, supreme ruler, or head, other than the Lord. (2) That there is any patriarch infallible and unerring, speaking ex cathedra and above Œcumenical Councils, in which latter is infallibility, when they are in accordance with Scripture and Apostolic tradition. (3) That the Apostles were unequal. (4) That the Pope had pre-eminence of seat not by human and synodical arrangement, but by Divine right. After an appeal from the Latin priests, based mainly on the decrees of the Council of Florence, the Protosyncallus was directed to return the Papal letter to the bearers.

5.—A Provisional Government installed at Madrid, presided over by Generals Serrano and Prim and Senor Olozaga.

7.—General Prim enters Madrid, and is enthusiastically received by the people.

— The Herald announces that the Queen had nominated the Very Rev. the Dean of Cork (McGhee) to the See of Peterborough; and that the Rev. Henry Longueville Mansell, D.D., Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church, had been appointed to the Deanery of St. Paul's.

— Lord Ranelagh addresses a letter to the South Middlesex Corps, of which he was colonel, for the purpose of explaining his connexion with the Rachel affair. He described himself as the victim of "an idle curiosity," which tempted him, in common with other gentlemen, to drop occasionally into Rachel's shop, and thus give her an opportunity of using his name, and making him a mark for public scandal. He also complained of the conduct of Mr. Serjeant Ballantine during the progress of the case, and expressed a reluctance to change moralities with him. "If those who live in glass houses should abstain from stone-throwing, surely those who occupy regular crystal palaces should be still more guarded in that respect."

8.—The Prince and Princess of Wales visit Glasgow, and lay the foundation-stone of the new University buildings on Gilmore-hill. The Lord Provost (Lumsden) was knighted soon afterwards, in acknowledgment of the magnificent reception accorded to the Royal visitors.

9.—Mr. Gladstone issues an address to the electors of South-west Lancashire. After reviewing the facts connected with the downfall of the last Russell Ministry, he passed on to advocate a repeal of the rate-paying limitations in the Reform Act, and condemned as unnecessary the addition of 3,000,000*l.* more, by the present Government, to the public expenditure of the country. In the removal of the Irish Establishment he saw the discharge of a debt of civil justice, and the disappearance of a national, almost a world-wide, reproach. "In the manner of proceeding we ought, I think, to be governed by three considerations: a regard for Irish interest and feeling; an enlarged equity to those who would lose in point of civil privilege; and a careful heed to the spirit of equal dealing throughout the detailed arrangements. After all that these rules can warrant has been done, there may remain a considerable property at the disposal of the State. The mode of its application can only, in my judgment, be suggested to Parliament by those who, as a Government, may have means and authority to examine fully the provision made by law for the various public and social wants of Ireland, and to compare, in each case, both the emergency of the demand and the facility of meeting it with general satisfaction. It would, however, ill consist with the principle of the measure for which we are now contending, if the State, having disestablished the Church, were to apply its funds to the teaching of religion in any other form. To sum up this great subject: Rest as we are, by common consent, we cannot. Endowment of all, after the events of the last session, is out of the question. Retrenchment or mutilation of the existing Church, by reduction of its spiritual offices, has been proposed by a Royal Commission; but I do not yet learn, from the last and most authentic declarations of the Ministry, that they adopt it, or indeed any other method of proceeding. We (the Opposition) have done our part. The matter now rests with you. Our path at least lies before you, broad, open, and well defined; our policy has advocates who do not shrink from its avowal. It is the policy of bringing absolutely to an end the civil establishment of the Church in Ireland. It has received the solemn sanction of the representatives whom the nation chose in 1865. For the line of action, the only one just and the only one available, I confidently ask your approval." Mr. Gladstone spoke within the next few days at Warrington, Liverpool, Newton Bridge, and Southport.

9.—Died, in Edinburgh, aged 79, Sir George Sinclair, of Ulbster, a popular and accomplished country gentleman, who had been greatly mixed up in Scottish ecclesiastical controversies.

11.—Lord Westbury withdraws from the Scottish Law Inquiry Commission. "You will pardon me," he writes to Lord-Advocate Gordon, "if I see in what has passed clear proof that you and certain persons in Edinburgh had determined that Lord Colonsay should be the head and regulate the inquiries of the Commission, and that you were indifferent whether I assented to it or not. I have read the names of your Commissioners, and I decline to serve on your Commission with much regret." In a previous letter Lord Westbury had indicated ill-health, and possible absence from the country, as a reason for not serving on the Commission.

12.—General Prim, writing to Le Gaulois, (699) expresses astonishment at certain portions of the press alleging that Spain was not proceeding with the work of regeneration fast enough. "Eight days sufficed for us to overthrow a dynasty three hundred years old, and to establish a new Government. We shall not delay now to consolidate our position through a Constituent Assembly on the basis of our programme, which is known to you. We shall then have succeeded in attaining the political ideal contemporary Spain, namely, a really constitutional monarchy founded upon the most extended Liberal basis compatible with that kind of Government."

12.—In the case of Glen v. the Caledonian Railway Company, the Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) recalls the interdict formerly granted against the payment of dividend declared at last general meeting of the Company.

14.—The Bishop of Chichester inhibits the Rev. Mr. Purchas from carrying on his ritualistic services at Brighton.

— Died at Bristol, aged 46, Dr. Herapath, a well-known analytical chemist.

16.—General Peel announces his intention of withdrawing from the representation of Huntingdon.

Another commanded the suppression of all convents and monasteries founded since 1837, and the reduction of all in existence prior to that date; property, movable and immovable, to revert to the State.

— In the course of an electioneering speech at Sheffield, Mr. Roebuck referred to a speech he had made at a meeting in Paradise-square during the struggle between the Northern and Southern States of America, and to the opinion entertained of it by the Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston:—"The moment I got into his room—he was standing writing at his desk, as he always did—he turned round and put out his hands, and said, 'Roebuck, Roebuck, what a devilish good speech you made in Sheffield!' (Cheers and laughter.) I said, 'My Lord, I am greatly obliged to you, and flattered for the kind phrase you have used about my speech'—though it was rather a hard one you know—(laughter)—'I am very much flattered.' 'Flattered?' he said. 'Why, I am entirely of your opinion, but I dare not officially say so.' Now that struck me, according to the old woman's phrase, all of a heap,—that a man in power should say to me openly and without disguise, that he was entirely of my opinion, and lead the people of England directly the opposite way. That, said I, is modern political morality. (Laughter.) I did my work with the gay and pleasant old Lord, and bowed my way out of his room."

20.—In the Austrian Reichsrath, Count Taufe presented a bill relating to the military forces, particularly to the Landwehr and

Landsturm. He stated that the proposals submitted by him were based upon the principles of freedom. The term of service in the line would be three years, and in the reserve seven years. The strength of the army and navy on a war footing would be 800,000 men; and he showed that these figures demonstrated the unity of the two portions of the empire.

21.—Mr. Bright declines to become arbiter on the claims of the different Liberals presently contesting Nottingham. "The question in dispute is one for the electors, and I do not see how any person or persons outside your borough can hope to be of use in an attempt to settle it."

22.—The Hon. Reverdy Johnson presented with an address, and entertained at Liverpool at a banquet attended by Lord Stanley, Mr. Gladstone, and others. The new ambassador referred to two of the questions in dispute between America and this country as all but settled, and the third as likely to be settled equally honourably. Lord Stanley said:—"I never like to look forward too confidently to the future, but if it should happen that in the next few weeks the American Minister and I should have an opportunity of settling those questions which are still pending between the two countries, and thereby throw over the last chance of difference, and the least pretext for a quarrel, I can only say I for one shall feel that result as in itself an ample compensation for all the delay, for all the responsibility, and for all the anxiety which is attached to that conspicuous but not always enviable position of being Foreign Secretary." In replying to the toast of the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone spoke hopefully of the increase of commerce as likely to lessen the chances of war and bloodshed, and highly eulogized the new ambassador.

— The Australian on her voyage from Sydney to London wrecked on the north of St. Christopher's. The crew, passengers, and 3,100 ounces of gold were saved.

23.—Case of Mr. Doulton, M.P., heard before the Constitutional Tribunal, Brussels. Mr. Doulton negotiated the carrying out of certain public works (the purification of the Seine) in favour of the Belgian Public Works Company, and he further obtained a contract from a Belgian contractor, named Mention, to carry out certain works for the sum of 500,000*l.* This was afterwards discovered when the works were being carried out by the same contractor at a contract made with the Company itself, and negotiated by the defendant Doulton, of 600,000*l.* It came out in evidence at the trial of Mr. Doulton, who was charged with making a fraudulent contract with his contractor, that the sum of 100,000*l.* was to be handed over to Mr. Doulton, who actually received, at the rate of 16½ per cent. on the payments made to Mention, about 148,000 francs; part of which, it was stated in evidence, was divided with Mr. Albert Grant, late M.P. for Kidderminster. Doulton was to have 100,000*l.* in deferred shares for his services, and become managing director, with a salary of 4,000*l.* a year. The verdict of the Court was that Mr. Doulton had fraudulently received the money, and, in fact, had made a fraudulent contract; but the Court held he had not brought himself within the meshes of the Belgian Penal Code. The Deputy Procureur at once entered an appeal against this decision, but it was confirmed at the close of the year.

24.—The Devon, Government lighter, lost on the Prissor rocks, Penzance, and sixteen of her crew drowned.

— Manifesto issued by the Spanish Provisional Government setting forth the results of the revolution, and promising to respect the popular decision regarding the future form of government.

25.—The Spanish Provisional Government recognised by England, France, Russia, and Portugal.

27.—At a banquet given by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce and Cotton Supply Association, the Marquis of Salisbury, speaking of the House of Lords, said the Upper House was not yet one of the subjects of the day; he expected that it would become one, and looked forward to that contingency with nothing of apprehension. Everybody was the better for being looked after, and he would abide by the principle that any institution which could not hold its own ground on the free and fair discussion of its merits should cease to exist.

— Letters from Madrid mention that the Provisional Government were about to deliver up the Tornado, and pay an indemnification of 25,000*l.* to the owners, and 12,500*l.* to the crew.

— Died at Stafford House the Dowager Duchess of Sutherland, Mistress of the Robes to her Majesty during the different Whig Administrations, till the death of the late Duke in 1861.

— Died at Addington Park, aged 74, Charles Thomas Longley, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, a man of calm and benignant spirit, of great discretion and unobtrusive but thoroughly practical piety. His policy was uniformly moderate, and his aim conciliatory.

— The sporting world and many outside thrown into consternation by a report that in all probability the Derby would not be run at Epsom in future, and possibly not at all for the next few years, in consequence of a dispute with the present lessee of the ground.

— A new map of France issued, showing that the increase of Prussia had not destroyed the balance of power to her detriment, and that with her army, 40,000,000 people, and Algeria, she had "nothing to fear from any one."

— In conformity with a fiat for a writ of error granted by the Attorney-General, application was made at the Central Criminal Court for a record of the facts upon which the conviction of Madame Rachel had taken place.

The chief point at issue was whether Mr. Kerr, as a judge of the City of London Court, had any legal right to dispose of cases at the Old Bailey, and the special object of the application was to obtain a record that the trial took place before him at the last sessions. Statement furnished.

27.—Inquiry at the Marlborough-street Police-court into the charge of bigamy preferred by Major W. B. Lumley against his reputed wife, Eliza Wright Haines.

30.—The Recruiting Bill passed by the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath; the army not to be increased in the meantime.

— Fall of a warehouse in Rigby-street, Liverpool, four of the workmen inside being smothered under the linseed stored on the fourth floor.

31.— Earthquake shocks experienced at Leamington.

November 2.—Died suddenly, in Edinburgh, James B. Manson, of the Daily Review.

3.—Mr. Bright presented with the freedom of the City of Edinburgh. Referring to the exertions he had made, in company with Mr. Cobden, for the repeal of the Corn Laws, he said:—"When I look back to him whose name must ever be foremost in any history or memory of that struggle—when I consider his remarkable industry, his wonderful sagacity, his enlarged information, the combined force and gentleness of his character, his most persuasive speech—when I look back upon his transcendent merits—I confess that I am amazed that it took all that, and the energy, and the labour, and the resolution of scores and hundreds and thousands besides, to repeal the Corn Laws: I say I am amazed that on so clear a question it should be necessary to make so great an effort to bring Parliament and the people to comprehend their true interests. . . I am one of those who have never believed that there is anything very mysterious in the art or knowledge of politics; that, with regard to what we call statesmanship—honest statesmanship—it is not an abstruse and a difficult branch of knowledge; that if, when we come to consider a public question, we were able to strip it of all the things which do not really belong to it, and to get at the pith and kernel of the matter, I think that our intellects are so much on a par, and that as a whole we are so anxious to act honestly and rightly, that nearly on all occasions we should be able to come to an early and a wise agreement as to the course which the public shall pursue." Again, speaking of the Russian war, he said:—"I always said that no country justice—and there are not many of them who are very particular—(laughter)—would send any man to jail for three months on evidence such as the people of England—I beg pardon of a gentleman in Glasgow who writes to me on the subject—I mean the people of Great Britain and Ireland—went into that unhappy struggle. The result was that 250,000 men died or were killed in the course of that conflict, and that hundreds of millions of treasure created by the nations engaged were squandered—that the armaments all over Europe and in this country have been maintained at a higher rate ever since—that we in this country have found our military armaments increasing by 10,000,000*l.* a year, and 10,000,000*l.* in twenty years comes to 200,000,000*l.*, besides that sum spent in the war itself. And after all this, we find that there is still a great Eastern question—that Russia is stronger than ever, for Russia has manumitted her serfs, and that Turkey is not stronger but weaker from the efforts made to save her." Mr. Bright concluded:—"The century in which we live—and the middle of which we have passed—is a century remarkable for its changes; and I have no doubt whatever that it will be so regarded in future times. There is a great battle going on at this moment, and without exaggeration one may say that it is a battle with confused noise, although it is not a battle like that which the prophet described, 'with garments rolled in blood.' But there is a confused noise throughout the country from John o' Groat's to Land's End; all over Great Britain and over Ireland men are discussing great questions—questions which are to affect the unity of the empire, our own condition, the condition of the posterity that are to follow us, and to affect all the narratives of the future historians of this kingdom. Well, I say, then, let us in this battle, and in these discussions, bear our part; let us avoid heat of passion as much as we can; let us strip from all these questions that which does not belong to them; let us grasp with all our might the pith and kernel of them; and let us honestly endeavour to find a true solution for whatever difficulties beset the nation." (Applause.)

3.—A cable telegram announces that General Grant had been elected President, and S. Colfax Vice-President, of the United States.

—Sir James Fergusson entertained at a banquet in Willis's Rooms previous to taking his departure for South Australia.

4.—Diet opened by the King of Prussia, who stated that his relations with foreign Powers were in every respect satisfactory and friendly. He also expressed his good wishes for the "future prosperity and power" of the Spanish nation, and concluded by remarking that "the sentiments of the sovereigns of Europe, and the national desire for peace, give ground for trusting that the advancing development of the general welfare will not only suffer no material disturbance, but will also be freed from those obstructing and paralysing effects which have only too often been created by groundless fears, taken advantage of by the enemies of peace and public order."

5.—Mr. Bright elected an honorary member of the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce, making a speech on the occasion, in which he recommended his hearers to press for a "Free Breakfast Table," or an abolition of the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar. He was presented with a congratulatory address in the Corn Exchange in the evening, and again spoke at length on the questions of taxation, retrenchment, and education. He had no notion of calling a country happy and prosperous when pauperism was increasing to the extent it was doing here. "You may have an ancient monarchy, with the dazzling glitter of the sovereign; and you may have an ancient nobility, with grand mansions and parks, and great estates; and you may have an ecclesiastical hierarchy, covering with worldly pomp that religion whose virtue is humility; but, notwithstanding all this, the whole fabric is rotten, and doomed ultimately to fall; for the great mass of the people by whom it is supported is poor, and suffering, and degraded."

6.—The Archbishop of York opens the session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution with an address on the present condition of philosophy.

—The new French ambassador to Rome, the Marquis de Bonneville, received by the Pope, who expressed the most cordial sentiments towards the Emperor and France.

9.—At the Lord Mayor's banquet to-night, the principal interest centred in the speeches of Mr. Reverdy Johnson and the Premier. Referring to the differences between this country and America, the former said they were now ended. "How that end has been brought about I forbear to say, except that it has been brought about without touching in the slightest degree the rights or the honour of either nation. (Cheers.) From 1846 to the present time, from one cause or other, there were clouds which alarmed the people of both countries. We have removed those clouds, and leave both nations in an undimmed sunshine of peace."—Mr. Disraeli, noticing the rival jealousies of France and Prussia, thought that Lord Stanley, who had so successfully terminated the difference in the severe, long-enduring misunderstanding with America, "can do nothing better than confer with the other great Powers of Europe, and step in between these two great countries, animated, as I believe they are, by no aggressive feeling, but occupying the position which they do from peculiar causes, which could not have been anticipated, and which seldom or ever occurred before. I say that with the wise and generous mediation of the other equal Powers of Europe I have myself the conviction that as happy a termination will be brought to this misunderstanding as has been brought to the misconceptions which existed between the United States and ourselves—(cheers)—and I hope that when this day next year I have the honour of responding to the toast of her Majesty's Government—(great laughter and cheers)—I may be permitted, my Lord Mayor, to remind you of these observations, and that the ambassadors of France and Prussia may make similar observations to those which have fallen from my hon. friend the minister for the United States."

9.—Died at his London residence, aged 26, the Marquis of Hastings, celebrated in the sporting world for the extent of his bets and their unsuccessful result. In the absence of male issue the marquise became extinct.

— The Court of Common Pleas gives judgment in the case of Miss Becker, which involved the right of women to exercise the suffrage. The judges all agreed that there was not sufficient evidence for saying that by the common law women had a right to vote for members of Parliament, while on the other hand there was the uninterrupted practice of centuries to show that women had not so voted. The Lord Chief Justice thought the term "men" in the Act did not include women; and even if it did, then women would come within the term "incapacitated."

— Sentence passed at Belgrade on the rest of the prisoners accused of complicity in the murder of Prince Michael. Maistrovich, in accordance with the demand of the public prosecutor, was condemned to death, three to five years' imprisonment, and three others were acquitted.

10.—Some disappointment was experienced by a statement in the newspapers this evening, that Mr. Reverdy Johnson's announcement concerning the settlement of the differences between this country and America did not mean that they were absolutely disposed of, but only that such arrangements for their settlement had been made as would transfer them from the sphere of political negotiation to the arbitrament of a disinterested and decisive tribunal. The Times remarked, apparently upon authority, that the questions between England and America arising out of the war are to be referred to a mixed commission; that the question of the liability of England for the depredations of the Alabama is to be referred to "a European sovereign of the first class," described in such a way as to suggest that the person meant was the King of Prussia; that the question whether the recognition of the Confederates was right or wrong is to be left to remain as it is, each party retaining its own opinion as to the justice, friendliness, and necessity of the course pursued; that the question as to the maintenance of the maxim "Nemo potest exire patriam" is to be dealt with by legislation; and that the dispute about San Juan is to be referred to the President of the Swiss Confederation.

— Spanish electoral law promulgated: every citizen of twenty-five years, who was not deprived of his political rights, entitled to vote; the voting to be by provinces; and the number of deputies to the Cortes to be 350.

— The French Avenir National, Tribune, and several provincial newspapers seized for publishing a list of subscriptions for the purpose of erecting a monument in the cemetery of Montmartre to M. Baudin, a representative of the people, who was killed during the coup d'état in 1851 (see p. 216). The Government alleged that the publication of these subscription lists was an attempt to disturb the public peace. The aged Legitimist, M. Berryer, wrote:—"On the 2d of December, 1851, I proposed and obtained from the National Assembly, united at the Mairie of the 10th Arrondissement, a decree declaring the dismissal and outlawry of the President of the Republic, inviting citizens to resistance against the violation of the law of which the President was guilty. This decree was made as public as possible in Paris. My colleague, M. Baudin, energetically obeyed the orders of the Assembly; he fell a victim to them, and I feel myself obliged to take part in the subscription which has been opened for the erection of an expiatory monument over his tomb."

10.—Convention signed between England and the United States for the settlement of outstanding claims. The fourth article was in these words:—"The Commissioners shall have power to adjudicate upon the class of claims referred to in the official correspondence between the two Governments as the 'Alabama claims;' but before any of such claims are taken into consideration by them, the two high contracting parties shall fix upon some sovereign or head of a friendly State as arbitrator in respect of such claims, to whom such class of claims shall be referred in case the Commissioners shall be unable to come to a unanimous decision upon the same."

— Addressing a meeting of gun manufacturers in Birmingham on the question of national expenditure, Mr. Bright recommended that the framing of the estimates should be taken out of the hands of the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, and the Cabinet, and placed under the control of a Committee of the House of Commons.

— Agitation among the undergraduates at Cambridge to improve the college dinners. The subject was discussed to-day in the Union, and a resolution carried, by 23 to 17, that the present system was execrable, and no permanent improvement possible until irresponsible cooks were made college servants.

11.—Committee formed in London for the protection of holders of foreign bonds, 400,000,000*l.* worth of which were said by Mr. Göschen to be negotiated in the City.

— A supplement to the Gazette contains a proclamation for dissolving the present Parliament and ordering the writs for a new one to be returnable on the 10th December next. The election excitement, which had been raging in many places for months, was now greatly heightened, and dwarfed all other matters of domestic interest. Probably the widest and keenest interest was felt in the Westminster and South-West Lancashire contests; the former centring in Mr. J. S. Mill, and the latter in Mr. Gladstone. Local excitement appeared to be most violent at Newport and at Blackburn, where the Protestant lecturer Murphy had succeeded in rousing the polemical feelings of the people. A troop of cavalry and an infantry company were despatched thither on the 12th.

12.—Excitement at Paris caused by the Premier's suggestion at the Mansion House banquet that the Foreign Secretary should interfere between France and Prussia.

— Imperial ukase issued at St. Petersburg, ordering a conscription of four persons in every thousand throughout the empire.

13.—Addressing his constituents at King's Lynn, Lord Stanley said that every month which had passed since the Reform Bill became law has lessened the anxiety felt, and confirmed him in the judgment that the Government had acted quite right. If causes of quarrel could be avoided for a year or two, he thought that mere weariness or exhaustion would bring about at least a partial disarmament. Trouble, he said, was gathering in the East. "It may come too quickly, or it may be deferred for years, but come it probably will. Now, that is a state of things to which we ought not to shut our eyes. Fifteen years ago, we refused to see in time what was then obviously impending; and the result was that, to everybody's dissatisfaction, we drifted—it was a very happy phrase—into the Crimean war. I do not think that the dangers which threaten the Turkish empire arise from the same source now as then. It is rather internal than external peril by which that empire is threatened. No foreign alliances, no European guarantee, can protect a Government against financial collapse, or against rebellion in its own provinces. In those matters every country must be left to work out its own destiny. Greece, that little State about which our grandfathers were so enthusiastic, and which we in the present day are rather too much inclined to depreciate—Greece might be the model State of the East, and exercise on the Christian race an almost incalculable influence if, instead of indulging in vain dreams of aggrandisement, they would make their internal government more worthy of a civilized country, and of the destinies which I believe to be before them."

14.—The Tribunal of the Correctional Police of the Seine gives judgment in the case of the journalists prosecuted for publishing a list of subscriptions to the Baudin Monument, and of others who had taken part in a demonstration at his grave. They were fined in sums varying from 2,000 f. to 650 f., with the alternative of imprisonment from one month to six.

15.—Died at Passy, near Paris, aged 76, Giacomo Rossini, the most popular composer of Italian lyric drama in the present century.

16.—Numerous borough and city nominations throughout England. In most places (704).

where a poll was demanded the voting took place the following day. London returned three Liberals and one Conservative, Baron Rothschild being among the defeated; Westminster one Liberal and one Conservative—Mr. W. H. Smith polling about 1,500 votes over his opponent, Mr. J. S. Mill. It was also noticed that the most of those who had little else than Mr. Mill's recommendation to commend them to a constituency failed in their contests; the most prominent instances, probably, being Mr. Beales at the Tower Hamlets, Mr. Bradlaugh at Northampton, Mr. Odgers at Chelsea, and Mr. Chadwick at Kilmarnock. There was no contest at the Universities, Mr. Mowbray taking the place of Mr. Heathcote at Oxford, and Mr. Walpole and Mr. Hope being re-elected for Cambridge. Mr. Lowe was elected the first member for London University without opposition. As the prospects of Mr. Gladstone in South-west Lancashire were at least doubtful, he was put up for Greenwich and carried along with Mr. Alderman Salomons by about 1,700 over his highest Conservative opponent. At Exeter the Solicitor-General was rejected in favour of Mr. J. D. Coleridge. In Leeds and Manchester the minority clause permitted the Conservatives to secure seats; but in Glasgow and Birmingham, where it also prevailed, they were defeated. Mr. Roebuck lost his seat at Sheffield, Mr. Osborne at Nottingham, Mr. Horsman at Falkirk, Mr. H. A. Bruce at Merthyr-Tydvil, Lord Amberley at South Devon, Mr. Milner Gibson at Ashton, and Sir G. Bowyer at Dundalk. A personal dispute between the two Liberal candidates for Middlesex—Lord Enfield and Mr. Labouchere—permitted the Conservatives to carry Lord George F. Hamilton.

16.—It is now announced with confidence that Dr. Tait, Bishop of London, is to be promoted to the See of Canterbury.

17.—Election riot at Cambridge, resulting in the death of a porter belonging to Christ's College.

19.—Salnavé repulsed in an attack on the Haytian fortress of Jacmel, and 300 of his followers reported as killed.

— Nomination day for Bucks. The Premier, addressing his constituents at Aylesbury, claimed credit for passing the Reform Bill, praised Lord Stanley, and deprecated the haste of Mr. Gladstone in bringing the Irish Church to the front when the Ministry were prepared to bow to the decision of the country. He repeated that when they succeeded to office the relations of England to foreign countries were full of courtesy rather than confidence. He did not blame Lord Clarendon, who had been Foreign Secretary only a few months. "We were viewed with suspicion and distrust, and that suspicion and distrust were occasioned by the management of our affairs by Earl Russell in Denmark, in Germany, in Russia—by the line which he took with reference to Denmark, to Germany, and to Poland. The consequence was that he had estranged this country. It required a great deal to do it, but he did it." Fenianism the Premier traced to a foreign origin. "In America, where a great many military men were Irish—and the Irish are a valorous and adventurous people—they had acquired great skill and experience, and they knew that in Ireland there is always a degree of morbid discontent which they believed they might fan into flame, and which might lead to the revolutionary result they desired. The whole nature of the race will account for it. An Irishman is an imaginative being. He lives on an island in a damp climate, and contiguous to the melancholy ocean. He has no variety of pursuit. There is no nation in the world that leads so monotonous a life as the Irish, because their only occupation is the cultivation of the soil before them. These men are discontented because they are not amused. The Irishman, in other countries where he has a fair field for his talents in various occupations, is equal, if not superior, to most races; and it is not the fault of the Government that there is not that variety of occupation in Ireland. I may say with frankness that I think it is the fault of the Irish. If they led that kind of life which would invite the introduction of capital into the country, all this ability might be utilized; and instead of those feelings which they acquire by brooding over the history of their country, a great part of which is merely traditional, you would find men acquiring fortunes, and arriving at conclusions on politics entirely different from those which they now offer." The Premier was elected without opposition, along with Mr. Dupre and Mr. Lambert, both supporters of his Government.

19.—Judgment given in the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the legality of the meetings known as "Sunday Evenings for the People."

20.—Mr. Burlingame (American) and his colleagues of the Chinese embassy are presented to the Queen by Lord Stanley, and deliver their credentials. An arrangement was afterwards made with Lord Clarendon for having disputes between the two countries referred to the supreme Government of each.

—The Lord Justice-General (Inglis) elected Chancellor of Edinburgh University—an office rendered vacant by the death of Lord Brougham—by 210 votes over Mr. Gladstone, the polling being 1,730 against 1,570.

21.—Nomination day for South-west Lancashire. Mr. Gladstone spoke amid considerable interruption on the question of Reform, economy, and the Irish Church, and sought to show that the position he had taken up with regard to the whole of them entitled him to ask with confidence that the constituency he was addressing would again return him to Parliament. "Some persons, have said that you need not return me for South-west Lancashire because I may sit somewhere else. They say that I had better go away—(cries of "No, no")—from the place where I was born, from the place where I was bred, from the place where my family have been for ninety years, and where they still pursue the honourable commerce of this country. You may just as well, in my opinion, say, 'I will turn a man out of his proper house because somebody else will have the charity to take him in as a beggar and a vagrant.' I don't, gentlemen, desire to be a Parliamentary vagrant. My ambition is not merely to have a seat in Parliament, but to have that seat which you are going to give me. (Cheers.) I agree with my friends who have warned me that time is flying, and I will ask you to listen to me no longer than while I say this. My wishes and desires have been true to you, as the needle to the pole. I have not spoken a word, I have not drawn a scratch of the pen, to obtain any other seat in Parliament than yours. (Cheers.) And now the question for you, gentlemen, is, when the voice of the nation sounds in your ears, and speaks in accents which not even Mr. Turner or Mr. Cross can misunderstand—for I know that Mr. Cross will not deny that the battle of this election is already fought and won throughout the country—(cheers)—I ask you, therefore, gentlemen, not to separate yourselves from the body of the nation. (Great cheering.) You are part of England. (Cheers.) You are great; but England is greater. (Renewed cheering.) With England Scotland joins, and with Scotland Ireland—(cheers)—for in Ireland, too, many of the Protestants in the north—(loud cheering, and great interruption)—we know by the news of to-day that for the Tory town of Belfast—(cheers)—and the yet more Tory town of Londonderry—(renewed cheering)—a Liberal candidate is returned. (Great cheers.) Voices, gentlemen, are to be weighed as well as counted; and of you I ask, with the fullest confidence that you will accept, seal, and grant the request, that I may have not merely a seat in Parliament, but that I may be permitted and enabled to speak the words of truth and justice in the House of Commons in the name and with the authority of the men of South-west Lancashire." The polling took place on the 24th, and resulted in the defeat of the Opposition leader by 260 votes. He thereupon issued an address to his supporters, and another to the electors of Greenwich thanking them for their "unparalleled kindness."

22.—The literature of the Irish Church question receives an addition to-day by the publication of the pamphlet "A Chapter of Autobiography," by Mr. Gladstone. "At time," he said in the Introduction, "when the Established Church of Ireland is on her trial, it is not unfair that her assailants should be placed on their trial too: most of all, if they have at one time been her sanguine defenders. But if not, the matter of the indictment against them, at any rate that of their defence, should be kept apart, as far as they are concerned, from the public controversy, that it may not darken or perplex the greater issue. It is in the character of the author of a book called 'The State in its Relations with the Church' that I offer these pages to those who may feel a disposition to examine them. They were written at the date attached to them, but their publication has been delayed until after the stress of the general elections."

24.—The two Italian soldiers Monti and Tognetti executed at Rome for their participation in the attack on the Serristori barracks in October 1867. The event caused considerable excitement at Florence, and in the Chamber of Deputies next day Signor Curti asked the Government what course they intended to take after this fresh defiance by the Papacy to Italy. General Menabrea said that he did not disguise the political significance of the unjustifiable act of the Pontifical Government, which the Italian Government made every possible effort to avert, but deprecated discussion as inexpedient. General Bixio and others spoke warmly in favour of a vigorous and decided policy in respect to the Papacy and French intervention in Rome, and ultimately the following motion was adopted by 147 to 119 votes:—"The Chamber fully concurring in the censure passed by the Government upon the acts of the Papacy, passes to the order of the day."

— The Italian Chamber re-assembles. There was no speech from the Throne.

— The Croatian deputies appear for the first time in the Hungarian Diet, and were warmly received. The magnates took their seats in the Upper House next day.

25.—In the case of Wason v. Walter (of the Times), involving the right of a newspaper to publish a report of a debate in the House of Lords, in which statements were made of a defamatory character, the Queen's Bench give judgment in favour of the defendant.

— Wreck of the Hibernia steam-ship, ten days from New York to Glasgow, and about 700 miles off the Irish coast. The previous day, during a heavy gale, the screw shaft broke in the steam-pipe, and the screw itself became a kind of battering ram by which the stern quarter of the ship was completely opened up. Although the pumps were used with great assiduity, and attempts made to lighten her by throwing cargo overboard, the water gained so rapidly that Captain Munro, who behaved throughout with great coolness and intrepidity, ordered the boats to be got ready about four A.M. They were five in number, three lifeboats and two quarter-boats. Of that described as No. 1 the captain took the command himself, though he was the last to leave the vessel. No. 2 was commanded by the first officer; No. 3 by the second officer (Davies); (No. 4 had been destroyed a few days previously; No. 5 by the third officer; and No. 6 by the boatswain. In boat No. 1 there were originally 33 persons, (706)

but two afterwards swam to No. 5; in No. 2, also 33; in No. 3 there were 28; and Nos. 5 and 6 had each 21. The weather at the time of launching was a little rough, but all were let down in order, quietness, and safety, delicate ladies entering the boats without a murmur, carrying children happily insensible to the perils they had to encounter. A little provision and water was allowed to each boat, and all pushed off from the sinking ship with the wish to keep as close together in the track of vessels as possible. This design was frustrated by the weather. The boats got separated in the gale, and the chief mate's, in which a mast and sail had been fitted up, was observed to capsize with all on board—thirty-three in number. The captain's boat, thought to be the heaviest loaded, was picked up about seven P.M. by the Star of Hope (Captain Talbot), bound from Quebec to Aberdeen. About midnight the boatswain's boat was also picked up with all on board safe; but though the Star of Hope remained many hours in the neighbourhood of the wreck, no trace could be obtained of those still missing. Of No. 2, described as being extra well furnished, no intelligence could be ascertained. Boat No. 3, under the charge of Davies, was associated with a series of calamities and privations unparalleled in even the gloomy annals of seafaring disaster. As both water and provisions were limited, the supply for the twenty-eight on board was fixed at the lowest minimum capable of sustaining existence. The orders of Davies were implicitly obeyed by all who had sense to follow them. A few, maddened by drinking salt water, were from time to time bound to the bottom of the boat; two others, to escape the horror of the privations, committed suicide while in a state of delirium; and four among them, a mother and child, died from exhaustion and exposure. For an entire week, and without anything to vary the monotony of their sufferings, the miserable survivors strove to reach the Irish shore. On the evening of the eighth day from the wreck, a wave struck the already disabled boat, when the bulk of those on board, moving in one helpless mass, caused her to capsize, and all were thrown into the sea. Nineteen perished here. Three of those who came to the surface—Davies himself, with Quartermaster Blair, and Reilly, a common seaman, contrived to get hold of the boat while riding keel upwards, clambered up the sides, and sat on the keel for an hour, till a wave again capsized her, and all three were once more thrown into the sea. They again came up together, held on till the boat righted, and, bruised and exhausted as they were, again made for the coast. After two days of indescribable agony, they sighted Tory Lighthouse on Sunday evening, but had to keep out again that night, as the sea was running dangerously high. They made land next day, and ran the boat ashore at a well-selected point on Fannet shore, Donegal. They were noticed by a few fishermen, who carefully conveyed them to what shelter they could afford, and attended to their wants till assistance was obtained through the owners of the Hibernia.

25.—Mr. J. A. Froude elected Rector of St. Andrew's University by a majority of 14 over Mr. Disraeli.

26.—Explosion in the north-west section of the Hindley Green (Arley) Pit, Wigan, causing the death of 61 of the 70 people engaged in that portion of the workings. As the shaft was comparatively uninjured, and the pit free from fire, a descent was soon made, and the most of those in the other sections relieved. Of those killed, the great majority had fallen under the influence of the choke-damp. Fifteen at least appeared to have lost their life in the confusion resulting from the first alarm of the explosion. A few found near the shaft were presumed to have been burnt to death by the flames from the pit furnaces, which were forced by the temporary reversion of the ventilation into the adjacent roads.

— At Cairo, Lord Napier of Magdala invests the Viceroy of Egypt with the Order of the Star of India.

27.—Collision of H. M. S. Crocodile with the Canadian barque John Dwyer, from Callao to Antwerp. The latter sunk, with four of her crew; the rest, eight in number, were saved in boats from the Crocodile.

28.—The Gazette of this date confirms a rumour current for a few days, that Mrs. Disraeli had been elevated to the peerage, with the title of Viscountess Beaconsfield of Beaconsfield.

29.—Republican demonstration in Madrid.

— Died at Angerville, aged 78, M. Berryer, a brilliant orator of the French bar, and foremost of the Legitimist politicians. He addressed a note to the Count de Chambord as his sovereign a few hours before his death.

30.—The elections being now nearly over, it was seen that the greatness of the Liberal majority placed all doubt as to the fate of the present Ministry at an end. To-day it was calculated at 121, or 60 over the majority understood to be available in the last Parliament. The numbers were thus made up:—English boroughs, 213 Liberals, 94 Conservatives; Scotch burghs, 25 Liberals, 0 Conservatives; Irish boroughs, 28 Liberals, 13 Conservatives; English counties, 50 Liberals, 114 Conservatives; Scotch counties, 23 Liberals, 7 Conservatives; Irish counties, 34 Liberals, 24 Conservatives. Lancashire showed a majority of two to one in favour of the Conservatives, Northumberland about the same for the Liberals, and Durham more than five to one. In North Lancashire, where the houses of Stanley and Devonshire were understood to be interested in the contest, the Marquis of Hartington, representing the latter, was defeated by about 1,500 votes. The most extraordinary Liberal victories were, however, gained in the Scotch counties. Perth and Dumfries were carried by unknown strangers against Government candidates of great local influence. Mid-Lothian, the centre of the Buccleuch influence, and North Ayrshire, a new division, were also won by Liberals.

December 1.—The Italian Deputies approve of a bill granting civil and political rights to all Italians of the provinces of the peninsula not yet united to the kingdom of Italy.

2.—Resignation of the Disraeli Ministry. This morning the Premier proceeded to Windsor, and had a consultation with her Majesty. He returned to town in time for a Cabinet Council, which sat an hour and a half. In the evening, Mr. Disraeli addressed his statement from Downing-street to the London papers. After a recital of the circumstances which led to the dissolution, he wrote:—“Although the general election has elicited, in the decision of numerous and vast constituencies, an expression of feeling which, in a remarkable degree, has justified their anticipations, and which, in dealing with the question in controversy, no wise statesman would disregard, it is now clear that the present Administration cannot expect to command the confidence of the newly-elected House of Commons. Under these circumstances, her Majesty's Ministers felt it due to their own honour, and to the policy they support, not to retain office unnecessarily for a single day. They hold it to be more consistent with the attitude they have assumed, and with the convenience of public business at this season, as well as more conducive to the just influence of the Conservative party, at once to tender the resignation of their offices to her Majesty, rather than to wait for the assembling of a Parliament in which, in the present aspect of affairs, they are sensible they must be in a minority. In thus acting, her Majesty's Government have seen no cause to modify those opinions upon which they deemed it their duty to found their counsel to the Sovereign on the question of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church. They remain convinced that the proposition of Mr. Gladstone is wrong in principle, probably impracticable in application; and, if practicable, would be disastrous in its effects. While ready at all times to give a fair consideration and willing aid to any plan for the improvement of the Church in Ireland, to the policy which they opposed last session—rife as they believe it to be with many calamities to society and the State—they will continue, in whatever position they occupy, to offer an uncompromising resistance.”

2.—Paris. Anniversary of the coup d'état. A demonstration was attempted at Baudin's grave, but the cemetery gates were closed by the police, and several people who resisted their authority apprehended.

— Dr. Mansel installed as Dean of St. Paul's.

3.—In the Court of Exchequer Chamber the Lord Chief Justice delivers judgment in the case of Grinel v. Bristowe, raised to recover 800*l.* and interest, the amount of a call of 10*l.* per share upon eighty shares in Overend, Gurney, & Co. (Limited), made after the sale of the shares by the plaintiff to the defendants, who were stock-jobbers and members of the Stock Exchange. The shares were transferred by the plaintiff to the nominees of the defendants, but these nominees having omitted to execute the transfers or to cause themselves to be registered as the owners, and the plaintiff thus remaining the registered holder of the shares, he had been compelled to pay a call since made. The plaintiff then brought an action against the defendants to be indemnified in respect to these payments. The facts were turned into a special case, and argued in the Court of Common Pleas, when the majority of the judges gave judgment for the plaintiff. Against that decision the defendants appealed. The Lord Chief Justice now reversed the finding of the Court of Common Pleas, and directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants.

4.—In obedience to a royal summons conveyed to Hawarden Castle by General Grey, Mr. Gladstone proceeded to Windsor and had an audience of her Majesty this afternoon. He was then understood to have accepted the commands laid upon him to form a Ministry. Mr. Gladstone returned to town about six o'clock, and met several of his colleagues.

5.—Insurrection at Cadiz. The outbreak gradually acquired such importance as compelled the Provisional Government to lay a portion of the fleet alongside the city, for the purpose of bombarding it if necessary. The Republican party were ultimately put down by the Government troops.

5.—Panic at London Stock Exchange caused by untruthful rumours of the sudden death of the Emperor Napoleon.

— Mr. Gladstone had made such progress in the construction of his Ministry that he is able to wait on the Queen at Windsor this afternoon, and submit a list of names for the more important offices. What had hitherto been a vague rumour concerning the presence of Mr. Bright in the Cabinet now obtains general credence.

— Through Lord Stanley Mr. Peabody makes another donation of 100,000*l.* in aid of the London poor, bringing the gross sum given by him for that purpose up to 350,000*l.*

Certain portions of the protocol not approved of by America were returned to England, and the resignation of Mr. Disraeli's Ministry had for the moment put a stop to negotiations. The Senate refused to hear the Message read, and adjourned.

— Severe storm in and around London; destructive also at sea, the North Brion being cast ashore on the Long Rock near Penzance.

8.—Stormy meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge at Freemasons' Tavern. A proposal made to grant 2,000*l.* to the Bishop of Capetown was negatived by 765 to 674 votes.

9.—Her Majesty holds two Privy Councils—the first at one P.M., when Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues attended to deliver up the seals of office; the second at three, at which Mr. Gladstone and the new Ministry were sworn into office. Besides the new Premier, there were present, Sir W. Page Wood, Lord Clarendon, Lord Granville, the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Bright, Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Childers, the Marquis of Hartington, the Earl De Grey and Ripon, Lord Kimberley, Mr. Fortescue, Mr. Bruce, &c., who had an audience with the Queen, and received the seals of office. At this Council Mr. Childers and Mr. Bright were sworn in as Privy Councillors, and took their seats at the board accordingly.

10.—Banquet at Fishmongers' Hall, attended by the Lord Chancellor and other members of the new Cabinet. Sir W. Page Wood expressed the pleasure he felt in now being able to give an active support to Mr. Gladstone; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a humorous reply for the House of Commons, intimating his intention to do all he could to remove from the country the burden of taxation, so that we might enjoy the best institutions in the world without having to pay for them.

— The first session of the eighth Parliament of Queen Victoria opened by Royal Commission. On the motion of Sir George Grey, seconded by Mr. Walpole, the Right Hon. J. Evelyn Denison was unanimously elected Speaker. The swearing-in of members was proceeded with next day.

— The Rev. Mr. Macrorie, the rival of Dr. Colenso for the Bishopric of Natal, leaves England for the Cape.

— The Premier issues his address to the electors of Greenwich, stating that he was actively engaged "in the endeavour to form an Administration, which may, I trust, deserve the confidence of the country; and will certainly use every effort in office to give effect to the great measures which, out of office, its members generally have agreed in recommending to the country."

— The Gazette announces that the Queen had been pleased to create the new Lord Chancellor, Sir W. Page Wood, a baron, with the title of Baron Hatherley of Down Hatherley in the county of Gloucester.

11.—The Speaker of the new Parliament presents himself at the bar of the House of Lords to obtain her Majesty's approval of the choice made by the House of Commons. This approval was expressed through the Lord Chancellor, who had also her Majesty's commands to confirm the Commons in all their rights and privileges.

15.—In the House of Lords to-day the Lord Chancellor read a Royal Message, informing members that "since the time when her Majesty deemed it right to call you together for the consideration of many grave and important matters, several vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons. It is therefore her Majesty's pleasure that an opportunity may now be given to issue writs for supplying the vacancies so occasioned, and that, after a suitable recess, you may proceed to the consideration of such matters as will then be laid before you." The Lord Chancellor took the oaths and his seat as Lord Hatherley, after which the House adjourned till 11th February.

— In the House of Commons, Mr. Ayrton moves the issue of new writs for the election of as many members of the new Government as had been returned twenty-one days. These were—Greenwich, in the room of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, First Lord of the Treasury; Oxford, in the room of the Right Hon. E. Cardwell, Secretary for War; the University of London, in the room of the Right Hon. R. Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Pontefract, in the room of the Right Hon. H. C. E. Childers, First Lord of the Admiralty; Birmingham, in the room of the Right Hon. John Bright, President of the Board of Trade; Southwark, in the room of the Right Hon. H. A. Layard, First Commissioner of Works; Halifax, in the room of Mr. Stansfeld, Third Lord of the Treasury; Plymouth, in the room of Sir R. P. Collier, Attorney-General; Exeter, in the room of Sir J. D. Coleridge, Solicitor-General; Bradford, in the room of the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education; Ripon, in the room of Lord John Hay, one of the Lords of the Admiralty; Truro, in the room of Captain Vivian, a junior Lord of the Treasury; Wareham, in the room of Mr. Calcraft, deceased. The case of Mr. Göschen gave rise to a short discussion. His election had been petitioned against, but the House had no official knowledge whether the seat was claimed. Sir R. Palmer pointed out that all the House required was information from one of its members, and the mere fact of the writ being moved for was proof sufficient that the seat was not claimed. The writ was therefore ordered to be issued with the others. Several notices of motion were afterwards given, and the House adjourned till the 29th. The elections were in all cases unopposed, and took place in most instances on the 21st.

18.—Consols quoted at 92 ex dividend, being the lowest point touched during the year, with the exception of Jan. 1, when they opened at 91 $\frac{3}{4}$ to 92.

20.—Lord Mayo, the new Viceroy of India, lands at Bombay; and also Lord Napier of Magdala, to reassume his command of the troops there.

21.—Addressing an assembly of cardinals to-day, the Pope is reported to have said:—"The King of Sardinia has abased himself so low as to ask the pardon of two assassins—the King of Sardinia, who saw no guilt in the murders of the two priests at Siena—the same, who had not the smallest coin for the sufferers by the floods in Upper Italy, but who gave 5,000 francs for the widow of an assassin. This king, whom you know so well, and whom you recommend to our Lord, demands the pardon of two malefactors worthy of the last punishment."

— In the Ministerial re-election to-day, the addresses naturally of greatest interest were those delivered by the Premier at Greenwich and the President of the Board of Trade at Birmingham. Both gave clear indication of the intention of Government to support the ballot. Mr. Gladstone said:—"There are, however, two subjects that cannot be overlooked in connexion with the representation of the people. One of them is the securities afforded by the present system for perfect freedom in the giving of the vote—(loud cheers)—in the giving of that vote which has not only not been conferred as a favour, but has been imposed as a duty, by the Legislature upon the members of the community. Upon that subject, gentlemen, I will only say that in my opinion the occurrences which have marked the recent elections—especially in some portions of the country, and most of all, perhaps, in the large borough of Blackburn, situated in the county with which I have the honour to have some connexion—those occurrences, I say, ought to form—in the hands, probably, of independent members of Parliament rather than of those of the Government representing a party—the subject of a searching and impartial inquiry. (Cheers.) I have at all times given my vote in favour of the method of open voting; but I have done so before, and do so now, with this important reservation, that, whether by open voting or by whatever means, free voting must be secured. (Loud cheers.) The second point calling for immediate attention was the grievance suffered by the compound householder, which had been, he said, most needlessly—he would not say wantonly—inflicted by the late Government.—Mr. Bright said that when Mr. Gladstone asked him to join his Administration, “I have reason to know that he made that proposition with the cordial and gracious acquiescence of her Majesty the Queen.” Explaining that the state of his health prevented him undertaking the arduous duties of the India Office, he passed on to speak of the necessity that existed for an Administration working harmoniously together. “It is therefore possible that in seeking the maintenance of this harmony the members of the Administration may appear at times to take a different line to that which they have taken when unconnected with the Government. If there should be any such occasions—if any one of my constituents should find that I have on any occasion to come been in a lobby different to that in which at some former period I have been found, let him have such patience as he can; let him understand this, that until I say I have changed my views, my views remain unchanged; and that the different course which I am compelled to take is one which does not affect principle so much as time and opportunity, or that it is a temporary and inevitable concession to the necessity of continuing harmony of discussion amongst the members of the Government. I must ask you to look always at the general result.” Regarding the ballot the right hon. gentleman said:—“I am very glad to tell you that when I went up to London last week I found, I was going to say, almost nobody—(laughter and cheers)—professing to be on the Liberal side of the House of Commons who was not in favour of the ballot. (Hear, hear, loud and prolonged cheers.) Those who had previously been in its favour were strongly confirmed by recent transactions; and many, and some important persons, who heretofore have withheld their countenance from it, now admit with the greatest freedom that what they have seen of late has entirely changed their opinion, and that they believe with our present wide suffrage—I don't know why it should be more just in the one case than in the other—the adoption of the ballot is not only proper, but is inevitable.” He had not aspired at any time, he said, to the rank of a Privy Councillor, or to the dignity of a Cabinet office. “I should have preferred much to have remained in the common rank of the simple citizenship in which heretofore I have lived. There is a charming story contained in a single verse of the Old Testament, which has often struck me as one of great beauty. Many of you will recollect that the prophet, in journeying to and fro, was very hospitably entertained by what is termed in the Bible a Shunammite woman. In return for the hospitality of his entertainment he wished to make her some amends, and he called her and asked her what there was that he should do for her. ‘Shall I speak for thee to the King or to the Captain of the Host?’—and it has always appeared to me to be a great answer that the Shunammite woman returned. She said, ‘I dwell among mine own people.’ (Great applause.) When the question was put to me whether I would step into the position in which I now find myself, the answer from my heart was the same—I wish to dwell among mine own people. (Great applause.) Happily, the time may have come—I trust it has come—when in this country an honest man may enter the service of the Crown, and at the same time not feel it in any degree necessary to dissociate himself from his own people. (Great applause.)”

21.—Congratulatory address from the clergy of the diocese of London presented to Dr. Tait, upon his elevation to the primacy.

22.—Madame Rachel liberated on bail, pending the result of the arguments on a writ of error granted to try the right of Mr. Commissioner Kerr to sit as a judge in the Central Criminal Court.

23.—Lord Cairns delivers the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, involving the legality of the ritualistic practices observed in the church of St. Alban, Holborn. On both the charges opposed against—the kneeling or prostrating before the consecrated elements, and the use of lighted candles—Lord Cairns decided against Mr. Mackonochie. Lighted candles, he held, were not “ornaments” within the meaning of the Rubric. Mr. Mackonochie was also condemned in the costs of appeal as well as the costs of hearing in the court below. At a meeting of the Ritualistic party held afterwards with reference to this judgment the opinion was very generally expressed that the time had come when the church should demand to be delivered from the burden of its connexion with the State.

24.—The Marquis of Bute received into the Roman Catholic Church at Nice, by Monsignor Capel, an English priest.

— Died at Greenwich, aged 82, Abraham Cooper, the oldest Royal Academician.

26.—In reply to an Address from the Sacred College Pius IX said:—"Many Popes were persecuted, imprisoned, exiled, but they came out of prison with glory, and returned triumphant from exile. Such are the lessons of history which our contemporaries seem to have forgotten, but which, for all that, are not the less true. In considering the present state of Europe, in seeing so many thrones overturned, they believe that the Church also is to fall. But if even we were entirely isolated, if we should be deserted by all, which I do not believe we shall be, the voice of the Roman pontiffs will always find an echo in the world, because it is promised that support of which you have full knowledge."

— Another severe storm. Several wrecks took place in the English Channel, attended with loss of life. At Rochdale next day a building used as a place of worship was blown down, and about sixty people injured.

27.—Died, aged 72, Sir Richard Mayne, chief of the metropolitan police force.

29.—Conference of the great Powers for the settlement of the differences between Turkey and Greece arranged to meet in Paris early in January.

— Treasury minute issued relating to the bankruptcy or insolvency of members of the Civil Service. Pecuniary embarrassment occasioned by imprudence to be punished by forfeiture of all claim to promotion or increase of salary until the offender shall have relieved himself from the discredit of such a position.

— Parliament reassembles in pursuance of the last adjournment, and the newly-elected Ministers take the oaths and their seats. Writs having been moved for the additional seats rendered vacant by acceptance of office, a further adjournment was made to February 16th, 1869.

ADDENDA.

The following were omitted by accident in their proper places.

October 1.—Lord Auckland issues a "manifesto" from Simla, stating the reasons which had induced him to direct the assemblage of a British force for service across the Indus. "After much time," it was said, "spent by Captain Burnes in fruitless negotiation at Cabul, it appeared that Dost Mahomed Khan, chiefly in consequence of his reliance upon Persian encouragement and assistance, persisted, as respects his misunderstanding with the Sikhs, in urging the most unreasonable pretensions, such as the Governor-General could not, consistently with justice and his regard for the friendship of Maharajah Runjeet Singh, be the channel of submitting to the consideration of his Highness; that he avowed schemes of aggrandisement and ambition injurious to the security and peace of the frontiers of India; and that he openly threatened, in furtherance of these schemes, to call in every foreign aid which he could command." Reference was then made in the manifesto to the unjustifiable aggression of Persia upon Herat, and the countenance which had been given to the expedition by Dost Mahomed, and his brother Sirdar of Candahar. "After various and mature deliberation the Governor-General was satisfied that a pressing necessity, as well as every consideration of policy and justice, warranted us in espousing the cause of Shah Soojah-ool-Moolk, whose popularity throughout Affghanistan has been proved to his Lordship by the strong and unanimous testimony of the best authorities. A guaranteed independence will upon favourable conditions be tendered to the Ameer of Sindh, and the integrity of Herat in the possession of its present ruler will be fully respected: while, by the measures completed or in progress, it may reasonably be hoped that the general freedom and security of commerce will be promoted; that the known and just influence of the British Government will gain its proper footing among the nations of Central Asia; that tranquillity will be established upon the most important frontier of India; and that a lasting barrier will be raised against hostile intrigue and encroachment. His Majesty Shah Soojahool-Moolk will enter Afghanistan surrounded by his own troops, and will be supported against foreign interference and factious opposition by a British army. The Governor-General confidently hopes that the Shah will be speedily replaced on his throne by his own subjects and adherents; and when once he shall be secured in power, and the independence and integrity of Afghanistan established, the British army will be withdrawn. The Governor-General has been led to these measures by the duty which is imposed upon him of providing for the security of the possessions of the British Crown; but he rejoices that in the discharge of his duty he will be enabled to assist in restoring the union and prosperity of the Afghan people. Throughout the approaching operations British influence will be sedulously employed to further every measure of general benefit, to reconcile differences, to secure oblivion of injuries, and to put an end to the distractions by which for so many years the welfare and happiness of the Afghans have been impaired." A notification was at the same time made that Mr. W. H. Macnaghten, Secretary to the Government, would assume the function of Envoy and Minister at the Court of Shah Soojah, and that Captain Burnes would be employed under his direction as Envoy to the Chief of Khelat or other States. A number of political assistants were also appointed. It was of this proclamation Sir J. C. Hobhouse said afterwards, speaking officially:—"Lord Auckland must not be permitted to bear the blame of the Simla manifesto against Dost Mahomed. It was the policy of the Government; and he might mention that the despatch which he wrote, stating his opinion of the course that ought to be taken in order to meet expected emergencies, and that written by Lord Auckland informing him that the expedition had already been undertaken, crossed each other on the way."

1842.

October 1.—Unaware of the calamity which had befallen Stoddart and Conolly at Bokhara, Lord Ellenborough writes to the Ameer:—"I was informed when I reached India that you detained in confinement two Englishmen, supposing them to have entertained designs against you. This must have been your reason, for no prince detains an innocent traveller. I am informed that they are innocent travellers. As individuals they could not entertain designs against you; and I know they were not employed by their Government in such designs, for their Government is friendly to you. Send them away towards Persia. It will redound to your honour. They shall never return to give you offence, but be sent back to their own country. Do this, as you wish to have my friendship." Many other attempts were made to soften the Ameer's heart towards the captives by the Governments of Russia and Turkey, as well as by British agents at Herat, Khiva, and Cabul; but failure attended each successive appeal, chiefly, it was thought, from the refusal or unwillingness of the British Government to recognise the captives in any way as ambassadors or official agents. General Pollock exerted himself successfully to obtain an adjustment of the claims of Captain Conolly's servants, though a letter written in connexion therewith by the Secretary for India shows in what light Lord Ellenborough regarded the mission. "I am directed to inform you," wrote Mr. Maddock, "that the Governor-General has no knowledge of Lieutenant A. Conolly's mission to Kokund having been authorized. On the contrary his Lordship was informed by the late President of the Board of Control that Lieutenant A. Conolly was expressly instructed by him not to go to Kokund, and in all probability he owes all his misfortunes to his direct transgression of that instruction."
