LITERATURE.

THE EXPRESSION OF THE EMOTIONS IN MAN AND ANIMALS.

I might perhaps hardly be expected that any work Mr. Darwin would be likely to produce, could add to his reputation. Without possessing the same attraction of absolute novelty as the subject of his two former books, his present subject is so intimate a part of our mode of treatment, that this last work, like its two predecessors, brings us at once in contact with many unknown subjects. The study of the expression of the emotions, and, more particularly, of those which are expressed in the face, is a subject on which many people, both men and women, have given a great deal of thought. The subject is one of the most important in the world, and the more we know about it, the more we shall value it. The subject of the expression of the emotions in man and animals is a subject which has been studied by many writers, and the results of their studies have been very interesting. The expression of the emotions in man and animals is a subject which has been studied by many writers, and the results of their studies have been very interesting. The expression of the emotions in man and animals is a subject which has been studied by many writers, and the results of their studies have been very interesting.