TO the RIGHT HONOURABLE

Sir Robert Walpole,

KNIGHT of the most noble order of the Garter, chancellor and under-treasurer of the exchequer, first commissioner of the treasury, and one of his Majesty's most honourable privy-council, &c.

S I R,

AS soon as the demand of the public made it necessary to collect the following papers together, and to prepare a second edition of them, I took the resolution of addressing them to you. The style of my dedication will be very different from that, which is commonly employ'd to persons in a your

your station. But if you find nothing agreeable in the style, you may find perhaps something useful, something that will deserve your serious reflection, in the matter of it. I shall compare you neither to BURLEIGH, nor GODOLPHIN. Let me not profane the tombs of the dead to raise altars to the living. I shall make you no compliments on the wisdom of your administration, nor on the wonders you have perform'd, to the honour and advantage of this kingdom, in the course of fourteen, or fifteen years, either at home, or abroad. I shall leave these copious themes to others, and shall confine myself to reasons of another kind, that induced me to this dedication. If these reasons prove sufficient to convince the public of the extreme propriety of it, I have all that I propose to myself. Give me leave to present to you, in one short view, the general design of these little essays.

DEDICATION. v

THEY are design'd then to expose the artifice, and to point out the series of misfortunes, by which we were divided formerly into parties, whose contests brought even the fundamental principles of our constitution into question, and whose excesses brought liberty to the very brink of ruin.

THEY are design'd to give true ideas of this constitution, and to revive in the minds of men the true spirit of it.

THEY are design'd to assert and vindicate the justice and honour of the revolution; of the principles establish'd, of the means employ'd; and of the ends obtain'd by it.

THEY are design'd to explode our former distinctions, and to unite men of all denominations in the support of these principles, in the defence of these means, and in the pursuit of these ends.

THEY are design'd to shew how far these ends were answer'd at the revolution, or have been answer'd since; and by consequence how much, or how little is wanting, to render that glorious work complete, according to the original plan, and agreeably to the engagements taken, at that time, with the nation.

LET me now appeal to you, Sir. Are these designs, which any man, who is born a Briton, in any circumstances, in any situation, ought to be ashamed, or afraid to avow? You cannot think it. You will not say it. That never can be the case, until we cease to think like freemen, as well as to be free. Are these designs in favour of the pretender? I appeal to the whole world; and I scorn, with a just indignation, to give any other answer to so shameless, and so senseless an objection. No; they are designs in favour of the constitution; designs to secure, to fortify, to perpetuate that excellent system of government. I

court no other cause ; I claim no other merit.

LET the illustrious and royal house, that hath been call'd to the government of these kingdoms, govern them till time shall be no more. But let the spirit, as well as the letter of the constitution, they are intrusted to preserve, be, as it ought to be, and as we promise ourselves it will be, the sole rule of their government, and the sole support of their power; and whatever happens in the course of human contingencies, whatever be the fate of particular persons, of houses, or families, let the liberties of Great-Britain be immortal.

THEY will be so, if that constitution, whose genuine effects they be, be maintain'd in purity and vigour. A perpetual attention to this great point is therefore the interest and duty of every man in Britain ; and there is scarce any man, who may not contribute to the advancement of it, in some degree. The old may inform the young, and the young may animate the old. Even they, who are most retired from the scene of business, may be useful, in this cause, to those, who are in it ; to those, who are heated by the action, distracted by the cares, or dissipated by the pleasures of the world. I say, they may be useful ; and I add, that they ought to be so to the utmost, that their situation allows. Government is the business of those, who are appointed to controul them. But the British constitution is the business of every Briton. It is so more particularly, indeed, of persons raised, like you, to the highest posts in the government. You lie under particular obligations of this kind, besides the general engagements of interest and duty, that are common to all ; and a neglect in

DEDICATION. ix

others would be a breach of trust in you. We say that our kings can do no wrong. The maxim is wisely establish'd, and ought to be follow'd, no doubt, as far as the conduct of princes renders the observance of it practicable. But from the establishment of this maxim results the necessity of another, without which the exercise of the executive power would remain under no controul. Though our kings can do no wrong, and though they cannot be call'd to account by any form our constitution prescribes, their ministers may. They are answerable for the administration of the government; each for his particular part, and the prime, or sole minister, when there happens to be one, for the whole. He is so the more, and the more justly, if he hath affected to render himself so, by usurping on his follows; by wriggling, intriguing, whispering, and bargaining himself into this dangerous post, to which he was not call'd by the general suffrage, nor perhaps by the deliberate choice of his master himself. It follows then that ministers are answerable for every thing done to the prejudice of the constitution, in the same proportion as the preservation of the constitution in its purity and vigour, or the perverting and weakening it, are of greater consequence to the nation than any other instances of good, or bad government.

BELIEVE me, Sir, a reverence for the constitution, and a conscientious regard to the preservation of it, are in the political, like charity in the religious system, a cloke to hide a multitude of sins; and as the performance of all other religious duties will not avail in the fight of God, without charity, so neither will the discharge of all other ministerial duties avail in the fight of men, without a faithful discharge of this principal duty.
Should

DEDICATION. xi

Should a minister govern, in various instances of domestic and foreign management, ignorantly, weakly, or even wickedly; and yet pay this reverence, and bear this regard to the constitution, he would deserve certainly much better quarter, and would meet with it too from every man of sense and honour, than a minister, who should conduct the administration with great ability and success, and should at the same time procure and abet, or even connive at such indirect violations of the rules of the constitution as tend to the destruction of it; or even at such evasions as tend to render it useless. A minister, who had the ill qualities of both these, and the good ones of neither; who made his administration hateful in some respects, and despicable in others; who sought that security by ruining the constitution, which he had forfeited by dishonouring the government; who encouraging the profligate, and seduced ced the unwary, to concur with him in this design, by affecting to explode all public spirit, and to ridicule every form of our constitution ; such a minister would be look'd upon most justly as the shame and scourge of his country ; sooner or later he would fall without pity ; and it is hard to say what punishment would be proportionable to his crimes. To conclude this head therefore ; since the obligation of interest and duty on every man, especially on every minister, and more especially still on a prime, or sole minister, to reverence the constitution, to conform his conduct to it, and neither to invade, nor suffer it to be invaded by others, are so undeniable, and so strong ; and since the means, which the minister's power gives him to preserve it in purity and vigour, or to corrupt and weaken it, are so many ; nothing could be more proper than a dedication to one, in your exalted station, of papers, that are written to explain this interest,

DEDICATION. xiii

and to enforce this duty, and to press them on the understanding and conscience of every man in Britain; but of him most, who is most concern'd.

AFTER the general reasons, that have been given, and suggested, for addressing this declaration to you, give me leave to descend into some, that are a little more particular, and that regard the man, as well as the minister.

IF the principles of the revolution, and the means employ'd in it, have not been vindicated by me, with as great force of reason and eloquence, as they were by you, in a famous oration you made at SACHEVEREL'S trial, they have been vindicated however to the best of my power. The cause is the same, though the performances are not equal; and since the cause is the same, the cause will recommend my writings to your good opinion, how little soever you may like the advocate. But I have something

thing more to urge in my own favour. You had a sermon to condemn, and a parson to roast; (for that, I think, was the decent language of the time) and, to carry on the allegory, you roasted him at so fierce a fire that you burnt yourselves. Your arguments being confined to the propositions this preacher had advanced, you may seem rather to have justify'd resistance, or the means employ'd to bring about the revolution, than the revolution; for though the principles of the revolution were, and must for ever remain true, and though the means were just, and will for ever be so, in cases of the like nature; yet true principles, and just means, require to be farther sanctify'd by their ends. The man, who should affect the greatest zeal for the principles then establish'd, and the means then used, would deserve, I think, to be rank'd among the false brethren, and would prove himself a treacherous;

and a mercenary friend to the revolution, if he shew'd any indifference about the ends obtain'd, or endeavour'd in any manner to defeat those, that were intended to be obtain'd by it. The people, who run so great a risque, and bring about so great an event, in order to restore their constitution, and to secure their liberties against dangers of every kind, and especially against those, which recent experience hath taught them to apprehend, have surely a good right to the whole benefit of such a revolution; and they cannot be deprived of any part of this benefit, or left exposed to any shadow of the same dangers, by any rule of justice, or good policy.

SUCH considerations as these made me think that, to assert and vindicate fully the honour and justice of the revolution, it was necessary that the ends of the revolution should be insisted upon in my arguments, whether

ther they were so or not in yours; and that the importance of the subject, as well as the difference of the occasions, (for the whole lay open before me) would be a sufficient reason for supplying in the copy what was wanting in the original. I have endeavour'd therefore to shew how much our constitution hath been improved, how far our liberties have been better secured by the revolution, and how little is wanting to compleat that glorious design, and to render the British constitution the most perfect system of a free government, that was ever establish'd in the world. If all the ends of the revolution are already obtain'd, it is not only impertinent to argue for obtaining any of them, but factious designs might be imputed, and the name of incendiary be apply'd with some colour, perhaps, to any one, who should persist in pressing this point. On the other hand, if any of these ends have not been fully

obtain'd, the reproach of faction and the title of incendiary will belong to every person, who raises a contest by his opposition to these instances, and who endeavours to make the friends of the constitution pass for enemies to the government. Thus it is easy to join issue; and when issue is once join'd, it cannot be difficult to decide. If a principal end of the revolution was to secure the nation for the future against all the dangers, to which liberty, as well as religion, had been exposed before the revolution; if one of these dangers arose from the corruption, that had been employ'd to create a dependency of the two houses of parliament on the crown; if this corruption might have succeeded very probably then, had the means been sufficient to support it; if no provision was made, at the revolution, to secure the independency of the two houses, and the freedom of elections, against corruption; if no provision hath been made against this danger; since the revolution, proportionable to that increase of the possible means of corruption, which hath happen'd since the revolution, by the increase of the revenue of the crown, of debts, of taxes, and of officers, and powers to raise these taxes; and if this be so, (and the whole merits of the cause may be safely rested there) how can it be pretended that all the ends of the revolution have been already obtain'd? They have not most certainly. When, and in what manner, they shall be obtain'd, it would be presumption in any private persons so much as to insinuate. They may represent such things as they judge to be of use to the public, and may support their representations by all the reasons, that have determin'd their opinions. Thus far their province extends. All beyond this belongs to their superiors; and, in the case before us, to the wisdom of the nation assembled tion of our present settlement, and of all our future national happiness, is laid immoveably in these two respects. Shall it not be so, and does it not become you in a particular manner to endeavour that it should be so, in every respect? Could you forgive yourself, if you neglected the first opportunity of concurring to remove the least pretence from the disaffected, nay from the well affected, to say that the ends of particular men, of parties, and of families, have been answer'd by the revolution, even beyond their several expectations; but that the national expectations have not been so fully answer'd, nor the ends of the revolution entirely obtain'd? No man knows better than you the truth and force of what hath been here advanced. No man therefore is abler to make a juster application of it to the most important interests of your country, to the true interest of your royal master, and to your private interest too; if that will add, as I presume it will, some weight to the scale; and if that requires, as I presume it does, a regard to futurity, as well as to the present moment. Upon the whole matter therefore, I cannot but expect that you should receive favourably an address, made so properly, and in which, if I have press'd you a little warmly, yet I have done it with the decency, that every gentleman owes to another, at least to himself. You will allow me, and every friend of the revolution and of liberty, leave to hope that the time is coming, when you will not oppose, or shall not have it in your power to oppose, the endeavours of those, who promote the entire completion of all the ends proposed by the first, and the full security of the last. Whenever this happens; whenever the independency of the two houses of parliament, and the uninfluenced and uninfluenceable freedom of elections, are once effectually secured against the dangers, that may possibly arise hereafter from the growth of corruption ; then will all our future kings be reduced to the agreeable necessity of establishing their thrones, as we are obliged to acknowledge that the throne is now establish'd, not on the narrow and sandy foundations of court-craft, and unconstitutional expedients, but on the popularity of the prince, and the universal affection of the subjects ; foundations of the kingly authority so evidently supposed by our constitution, that a king, who will add weight to his scepter, must govern by them, or govern against this constitution, against the very rule of his government.

I AM now come to the last reason, drawn from the subject of these writings, that I shall trouble you with, for dedicating them to you. The attempt to extinguish the animosities, and even the names of those parties, that distracted the nation so long, so fatally at first, and so foolishly at last, intitles this volume to your kind reception of it ; at least, as properly as the attempt to expose the dangers, that may possibly arise hereafter, from corruption, to the independency of parliament, and to the freedom of elections. Whilst a real difference of principles and designs supported the distinction, we were divided into national parties ; and this was misfortune enough. It was lamented as a great one, at the time, by every good man of every party. But if the distinction should remain, when the difference subsists no longer, the misfortune would be still greater ; because they, who maintain'd the distinction, in this case, would cease to be a party, and would become a faction. National interests would be no longer concern'd ; at least, on one side. They would be sometimes sacrificed, and always made subordinate to personal interests ; and that, I think, is the true characteristic of faction. This attempt

therefore ought to have your approbation. To dedicate it to you may be construed to suppose that it will have your approbation; and he, who supposes that it will, makes you no indifferent compliment.

WHEN the court fomented our national divisions, the very worst designs were carry'd on; for to divide can never be an expedient for good purposes, any more than to corrupt; since the peace and prosperity of a nation will always depend on uniting, as far as possible, the heads, hearts and hands of the whole people, and on improving, not debauching their morals. "Divide et impera," is a maxim often quoted. How are we to apply it? There is no place for it in arbitrary governments; for in them, the interest of the governors requires that a servile union, if it may be call'd an union, should be maintain'd by the weight of power, like that of slaves in a galley, who are united by their chains,

DEDICATION. xxv

chains, and who tug the oar together, at the sound of a whistle. In free governments, it can have place as little, whilst they, who are at the head, intend the maintenance of liberty. To what case then can it be apply'd? There is but one, and that is the case of those, who aspire at more power than a free constitution of government gives them. Such governors must divide and incense parties one against another, that they may be always able to bribe the passions of one side, and so usurp on both. But the prince, who pursues this method, risques the power he hath for a power he does not want. He would be the more inexcuseable, under such a constitution as ours; because, if he could not gain esteem by his great, he might gain affection by his good qualities; and this principle would carry him, even better perhaps than the other, to the power he would obtain. What can a prince desire more than to be placed at the head of an united people; among whom he may have as many friends as he pleases, and can have no enemies, unless he creates them, by supposing them to be such, and by treating them accordingly? If the designs of a prince, in fomenting the divisions, are to invade the liberties of his people, his designs are laid in the utmost folly. When a people submits quietly to government, and is willing to obey on the terms, on which alone their prince hath a right to command, how extravagant must his demands be, and how unaccountable his conduct, to divide such a people? Shall he expect, for instance, that all his people should think like him and his council, about every occurrence, about every measure he takes, and every man he employs; and since this is too much to ask of freemen, nay of slaves, if his expectation be not answer'd, shall he form a lasting division upon such transient motives? Shall he

proscribe every man, as an enemy to his government, who dislikes the administration of it? Proscriptions are abominable, and inhuman, when they are back'd by a fulness of arbitrary power. But to hang up the tables of proscription, without the power of sending centurions to cut off every head, that wears a face disliked at court, would be madness in a prince. Such a conduct cannot suit his interest, however it may his passions, in any circumstance whatever. There are indeed circumstances, wherein it may suit the interest of a minister. Till the sword of civil war be drawn, a prince can scarce become irreconcilable with his people, and be reduced; for want of national strength, to support his power and dignity by the force of faction. But a minister may fall easily, and soon, into this desperate state; and after fomenting, as long as he could, the divisions of parties, he may have no refuge but in faction.

There

xxviii DEDICATION.

There may be such a conduct, as no national party will bear, or at least will justify. But faction hath no regard to national interests. Faction therefore will bear any thing, share in any thing, justify any thing. If the minister, who takes this method to support himself, hath any art, he will endeavour to disguise his faction under the name and appearance of a national party. But even this disguise will soon fall off. The best of those, who were engaged in the party, will quit the faction, and then the latter must stand confess'd to view. But it is not only the criminal conduct of a minister, and the fear of resting his administration on the national judgment, that may oblige him to govern by division, and by faction. As the most opposite notions are often united in the head, so are the most contrary sentiments in the heart of man. Incapacity often begets sufficiency; and yet a consciousness of incapacity often begets

DEDICATION. xxix

begets a jealousy of power, grounded on a sense of the superior merit of other men. The minister, who grows less by his elevation, like a little statue placed on a mighty pedestal, will always have this jealousy strong about him. He must of course select a faction to himself; and this faction must be composed, to answer his purposes, of men servilely obsequious, or extremely inferior to him by their talents. Whenever this happens, the reign of venality, of prostitution, of ignorance, of futility, and of dulness commences. The minister will dread to see the persons employ'd, whom he secretly esteems, for this very reason, because he esteems them. Abilities to serve the commonwealth will be an objection sufficient to outweigh the strongest proofs of attachment to the person of the prince, and of zeal for his government; nay, even the merit of a whole life spent in giving these proofs. In short,

xxx DEDICATION.

short, the very reasons, that should determine the prince to employ men, will determine the minister to proscribe them. Dislike, or contempt of him, will pass with his master for disaffection to the government; and, under this pompous name of government, will nothing but the paultry interest, or humour, of the minister be couch'd. The minister will reap, perhaps, (for even that may be doubtful) the immediate benefit of dividing, or maintaining the divisions of the nation, and of nursing up faction, by continuing longer in power, his sole security, and by deferring, if not escaping, the evil day, the day of account and retribution. But the prince will reap, in this case, the permanent mischief of establishing division and faction; and may possibly make the lamentable exchange of his own popularity, for his minister's impunity. I need not finish up this picture of imagination, since I write to you,

DEDICATION. xxxi

who know so much better than I pretend to do the characters of men, and the arts of government. It is sufficient that I have hinted at the general causes and effects of the endeavours, that are sometimes used, and to which Great-Britain hath not been a stranger, to foment national divisions, and to govern by the faction of a minister, arm'd with the power of the prince, against the sense and spirit of a nation, and the interest of the prince himself. This may serve, and it is all I shall say, to bespeak your approbation of the papers that follow, on account of the matter they contain.

BUT, Sir, the reasons I have given, how pertinent soever they may be, are not the only reasons I had for addressing myself, in this manner, and upon this occasion, to you. There are reasons of another kind; reasons, that come still more home to yourself; reasons, that appear very important to me, and that will appear

xxxii DEDICATION.

so to you, perhaps, when you have reflected duly on them, and have weigh'd impartially the consequences of them. I shall press these reasons with all the plainness and force, that decency permits, in so public and personal an application; because, though truth may sometimes offend, I am very indifferent to offences taken with truth on my side. If you hearken to truth, which men in your station seldom hear, you may be the better for it. If you do not, the author of this dedication cannot be the worse; for I will add, upon this occasion, that whoever he is, he is one you cannot impose upon, in your private capacity, neither as a man, nor as a gentleman; and that you can as little do it, in your public capacity. You cannot disappoint him, because the temper of his mind gives you no hold on him. He hath neither avarice to make him desire riches, nor ambition to make him

DEDICATION. xxxiii

desire power, nor vanity to make him desire honours. You cannot oppress him; because he is free from guilt, and from every probable (for no man is free from every possible) imputation of guilt. The laws of his country are his protection; and they are sufficient to protect every Briton, who reverences and obeys them, in how peculiar a situation soever he may be found. They, who act against these laws, and they alone, may have reason to fear, let their situation be never so high, or their present power never so great.

HAVING said this, I proceed to observe to you, that you are in the right most certainly to retort by yourself, or others, in the best and smartest manner that you, or they can, whatever the writings publish'd in the Craftsman may contain, which you judge to be injurious to yourself, or reflecting on your administration. The public will judge uprightly upon

xxxiv- D E D I C A T I O N.

the whole matter. The Laughters will be for those, who have most wit, and the serious part of mankind for those, who have most reason on their side. Again. As to affairs of peace, or war, public occurrences, domestic management, foreign negotiations, in short, the news of the day, and the current business of the time, weekly and daily papers, or more elaborate anniversary treatises, are properly employ'd by you to explain in your own favour, the series of your conduct; to refute Caleb; or, which is still more easy, and by some thought as useful, to keep the cavil on one point, till a new one is started, that draws off the attention of the world. All this may be call'd fair war; and whoever prevails in the judgment of the public, the public will reap information from the contest, and will have reason to be pleas'd with these appeals, which present an image of the custom, that obtain'd in the antient commonwealths

of Greece and Rome, where the greatest interests of the state were debated, and the greatest men in those governments were accused and defended in public harangues, and before the whole people.

BUT the writings of the Craftsman have not been confined to these subjects, that are personal, or temporary. The cause of the British constitution hath been pleaded through the whole course of these papers; every danger to it hath been pointed out; every security, or improvement of it, hath been explain'd and press'd. Now here, Sir, begins my complaint. I said that the cause of our constitution hath been pleaded in the Craftsman; and I am sorry that the expression is so precisely just, that no other would come up to the case. The cause of the constitution hath been pleaded; for the constitution hath been attack'd; openly, insolently attack'd, and is so every day by those, against whom the Craftsman so often employs his pen. Who could have expected, (for I will give an instance or two) who could have expected, at this time, and under the present establishment, to hear the necessity of maintaining standing armies in times of peace, even against the people of Britain, who maintain them, contended for and asserted? Who could have expected to hear a dependency, a corrupt dependency of the parliament on the crown, contended for and asserted to be a necessary expedient to supply a want of power, which is falsely supposed, in the crown; as if our fathers had opposed, and at length destroy'd that chimæra, call'd prerogative, formerly so dangerous to our liberties, for no other reason but to furnish arguments for letting loose upon us another monster, more dangerous to our liberties by far? Who could have expected that attempts to revive the doctrines of old whiggism, and the principles and spirit of the revolution, revolution, in opposition to such manifest contradictions of them all, would give any umbrage, or cause any alarm, among men, who still affect to call themselves whigs, and pretend zeal for a government, that is founded on the revolution, and could not have been establish'd without it? This could not have been expected, I think; and yet so it is. There are persons, who take to themselves the title of ministerial writers, that have sometimes the front to assume that of writers for the government. These persons are not content to ring, in daily panegyric, encomiums on the wisdom and virtue, the justice and clemency, the success and triumphs of your administration, and to answer, or to attempt to answer, the almost innumerable objections, that have been made (it matters not here whether justly, or unjustly) to your conduct at home, and your own, and that of your brother abroad; but they take fire, they shew an alarm,

xxxviii DEDICATION.

and they grow angry, whenever any thing is written, nay when a word is dropt, in favour of the fundamental articles of British liberty. Sometimes they argue directly, and in plain terms, against them. Sometimes they perplex and puzzle the cause; evade what they cannot deny; and when they cannot impose a fallacy, endeavour at least to hinder men from discerning a truth. Thus, Sir, they mingle your justification with the condemnation of our constitution; and labour, as much as in them lies, to make your preservation and the destruction of this constitution a common cause. If you could possibly doubt the truth of what is here advanced, I might refer you to the particular pamphlets and papers, which are known at least by the answers, that have been given to them; till such time as an extract of all the passages, hinted at here, be made public, as I hope it will; and whenever it is, I dare appear beforehand to your private thoughts, whether the principles they contain, and the consequences deducible from them, would not destroy, if they were to take place, the whole scheme of the British constitution. It hath been ask'd, why do the writers on one side eternally harp on liberty, and the constitution? Do they mean to instil jealousy and distrust, and to alienate the minds of the people? In what instances have the laws been broken, or hath the constitution been invaded by those, who govern? These questions deserve an answer; and I shall answer the first by asking another question. Why do the writers on one side eternally labour to explain away liberty, and to distinguish us out of our constitution? If nothing had been said of this kind, I am persuaded that much less would have been said of the other; and I can assure you, with great truth, that the public had not been troubled particularly ticularly with this Differtation upon Parties. As to the other two questions, they may be taken together. There is a plain and real difference between jealousy and distrust, that may be observed in the present case. Men may be jealous, on account of their liberties, and I think they ought to be so, even when they have no immediate distrust that the persons, who govern, design to invade them. An opportunity of invading them open'd, is reason sufficient for awakening the jealousy; and if the persons, who have this jealousy, apply to those, who govern, to help to cure it, by removing the opportunity, the latter may take this, if they please, as a mark of confidence, not distrust; at least, it will be in their power, and surely it will be for their interest, to shew that they deserved confidence, in this case, not distrust. But it will be always trifling, and foolish, to ask what laws have been broken, what invasions on the the constitution have been made ; because as nothing of this sort will be done, when there are no designs dangerous to the constitution carried on ; so when there are such designs, whatever is done of this sort will be private, indirect, and so cover'd, that the greatest moral certainty may be destitute of proof. Whenever any of these things are done publicly, directly, and in a manner to be easily proved, the danger will be over, the constitution will be destroy'd, and all fear for it and concern about it will be impertinent, because they will come too late. If ever that old trite maxim, " principiis obsta," was well apply'd, it is so in the case we speak of here.

THE reasons I have given for mentioning these writers ought to excuse me for it ; at least to you ; and even to you I shall say very little more about them. The flowers they gather at Billingsgate, to adorn and enliven their productions, shall be pass'd over by me, without any reflection. They assume the privilege of watermen and oyster-women. Let them enjoy it in that good company, and exclusively of all other persons. They cause no scandal; they give no offence; they raise no sentiment but contempt in the breasts of those they attack; and it is to be hoped, for the honour of those, whom they would be thought to defend, that they raise, by this low and dirty practice, no other sentiment in them. But there is another part of their proceeding, which may be attributed by malicious people to you, and which deserves for that reason alone some place in this dedication, as it might be some motive to the writing of it. When such authors grow scurrilous, it would be highly unjust to impute their scurrility to any prompter; because they have in themselves all that is necessary to constitute a scold; ill manners, impudence, a foul mouth, and a fouler heart. But when they menace, they rise a note higher. They cannot do this in their own names. Men may be apt to conclude therefore that they do it in the name, as they affect to do it on the behalf, of the person, in whose cause they desire to be thought retain'd. Many examples of these menaces might be quoted, and most of them would be found directed against one particular person. After employing the whole impotence of their rhetoric against him, and venting for many years together, almost without notice on his part, as much calumny as their imaginations could furnish, a pamphlet hath been lately publish'd, the profess'd design of which is to call for a vigorous proceeding in parliament against this man. To introduce this proposal, it is preceded by a long series of facts; some notoriously false; some, which it is impossible should be true; others, which it is impossible this writer should know to be true, if they were so; and others again, not only destitute of proof, but even of probability. Such accusations must be brought by some * creature of so notoriously prostituted a conscience, that his evidence would be rejected in any common cause, and should not be refuted therefore by me, if I was concern'd to refute him. But, Sir, if I take notice of this libel, or refer to others of the same kind, it is not done out of regard to these authors, whom I despise, as I am persuaded the person does, against whom all the virulence of their malice is directed. My concern, upon this occasion, is for you alone, and you will allow me to represent what that concern dictates. It is possible that you may have very strong resentments against this person, and he against you. It is possible that you may have shewn yours, and he may have shewn his, according according to the different circumstances you have been in, and the different opportunities you have had. But this will not become a matter of state, though you are a minister of state. The public will espouse your passions no more than his; nor concern itself to enquire who gave the first occasion to these resentments; who hath acted the part of a fair, and who of a treacherous enemy. It is, I doubt, too certain that the public hath been employ'd sometimes to revenge private quarrels, and to serve the low turns of envy, or jealousy. But, in all these cases, the public hath been imposed upon; these motives have been conceal'd; others have been pretended; and the others have been of a public nature alone; because the bare suspicion of any private interest, or passion, in a public prosecution is sufficient, and most justly so, to create invincible prejudices to it. The scribblers I speak of have laid you therefore pear every day, in the face of the world, not to be your friends, and who make no scruple of objecting, with the utmost freedom, to your conduct. But such assertions as these will only serve to make men angry, or laugh. They, who have the best opinion of your abilities, will no more agree that the present establishment is supported, than that it was made, by you. They will never be wanting in their respect to the crown so much, as to confound the cause of the king with the cause of his minister; or to suppose that the reins of government would grow weaker in his majesty's hand, if you was out of power, or out of the world. In short, Sir, you may pass, and I believe you do pass, justly, for a man of extreme good parts, and for a minister of much experience; but you would not desire, I think, to be represented as the ATLAS, who supports this state; and your brother will not certainly pass for the HERCULES, HERCULES, who relieves you, and who sustains, in his turn, the important burthen.

I KNOW very well that something is added to supply, if that were possible, this defect, and to make the cause more plausible. It is pretended that the writings imputed to this particular person, and several others publish'd in the Craftsman, contain reflections of a very extravagant, indecent, and even seditious nature; such as they alone, who are capable of supposing them, are capable of making. But then these reflections are to be proved by the constructions, which the accusers make of the expressions employ'd by those, whom they accuse; constructions as arbitrary, and as forced, as many of those, by which some of the best men at Rome were brought within the interpretation of the law of majesty, by some of the worst. Examples of much the same

But there is no room to fear that any such examples should be renew'd, whilst * a British spirit prevails in a British parliament. Whilst that spirit prevails, no parliament will condemn any man upon principles, which parliaments have always condemn'd as unjust and tyrannical. Less than any will they condemn those, who write in defence of this constitution, at the request and on the instances of those, who attack it. A British spirit and the spirit of the British constitution are one and the same; and therefore † if ever there arises a British spirit in a British parliament, of which I presume no doubt ought to

to be made at this time, vengeance will not overtake the former; it may be the latter.

WHAT hath been said might suffice to shew how foolish and vain it is to throw out menaces against those, who have nothing to fear, at a time, when zeal to preserve the constitution in every part inviolate seems daily to increase. But since I have enter'd on the subject, and the matter seems of some concernment to you, give me leave to add one consideration more, that may serve to shew how foolish and vain such a proceeding would be, even at any other time. Let us suppose that the very person pointed at was, and could be proved to be, the author of this Dissertation upon Parties, for instance, which I now dedicate to you. Let us suppose that the resolution was taken to follow the generous and equitable advice of the Pamphlet writer, who thinks he ought to be proceeded against in a peculiar manner.

manner. Let us even suppose that we lived in an age, when parliaments were brought, in some degree, under that very dependency, against which so much is said in this Dissertation. In short, let us suppose that the most innocent man, who was obnoxious to those in power, might have reasonable grounds to fear an exorbitant exercise of this power against him. But then let us make one single supposition on the other side. Let us suppose that this obnoxious man was really in earnest; that he wrote from his heart; and that he felt there the same warmth for the British constitution, which he express'd in his writings, and labour'd to infuse into the breast of every other man. I would ask you, Sir, do you think such a man would be ashamed to avow, in the face of his country, the contents of the following sheets, or be afraid to suffer for them? Could any eloquence, even yours, if you would employ ploy it so unworthily, expect, by the help of false surmises, and invidious comments, (the base inventions of little railers) to make him pass for an enemy to the present establishment, who had proved himself a friend to that constitution, in consequence of which, and for the sake of which alone, this establishment was made? Would his endeavours to reconcile parties, and to abolish odious distinctions; would pleading for the attainment of all the ends proposed by, and promised at the revolution; for securing the independency of the two houses of parliament, and the freedom of elections, as effectually against corruption, as they are already secured against prerogative; would this, I say, make him pass for the greatest of criminals? No, Sir, not in the breasts even of those, who gave sentence against him, if men capable of giving such a sentence could be found. Among the rest of mankind his inno-gency would be acknowledged; his constancy would be applauded; his accusers, and his grand accuser, in the first place, would pass alone for criminal. He might fall a victim to power; but truth and reason, and the cause of liberty would fall with him; and he, who is buried in their ruins, is happier than he, who survives them. Thus I am persuaded the person here intended would be found, upon trial, to think. The event therefore of such a prosecution, whatever it might be, could not turn to his disadvantage; and consequently to threaten him with it would be ridiculous, even at such a time as we have supposed, much more at the present. Void of all ambition, except the ambition of honest fame, he might stand the efforts of violence in such a cause, not only with little concern, but with much inward complacency. Weary of the world, determined and preparing to retire totally from it, he would surely suspend his retreat to face the persecution; and whatever his persecutors might imagine, they would erect a sort of triumphal arch to the man they hated. He would leave the world with more honour than they would remain in it. By suffering in defence of the constitution of his country, they, who had thought favourably of him, would think that he crown'd the good, and they, who had entertain'd prejudices against him, that he atoned for the ill, which had been imputed to him. Such different judgments you know, Sir, will attend every man's character, who acts on our divided stage; and he is happy, who can reconcile them so nearly. It never happens that there is a man, of whom all speak well; as it rarely, very rarely, happens that there is a man, of whom all speak ill, except those, who are hired to speak well.

I recommend them to nothing else. I do not apprehend that they will want your patronage any more than the person, who wrote them. HERE are some characters that seem formed by nature to take delight in struggling with opposition, and whose most agreeable hours are passed in forms of their own creating. The subject of the present sketch was perhaps of all others the most indefatigable in raising himself enemies, to shew his power in subduing them; and was not less employed in improving his superior talents, than in finding objects on which to exercise their activity. His life was spent in a continued conflict of politics, and, as if that was too short for the combat, he has left his memory as a subject of lasting contention.

It is indeed no easy matter to preserve an acknowledged impartiality, in talking of a man so differently regarded on account of his political, as well as his religious principles. Those whom his politics may please, will be sure to condemn him for his religion; and on the contrary, those most strongly attached to his theological opinions, are the most likely to decry his his politics. On whatever side he is regarded, he is sure to have opposers, and this was perhaps what he most desired, having from nature a mind better pleased with the struggle than the victory.

HENRY ST. JOHN, Lord Viscount BOLINGBROKE, was born in the year 1672, at Battersea in Surry, at a seat that had been in the possession of his ancestors for ages before. His family was of the first rank, equally conspicuous for its antiquity, dignity, and large possessions. It is found to trace its original as high as ADAM DE PORT, Baron of Basing in Hampshire, before the conquest; and in a succession of ages to have produced warriors, patriots, and statesmen, some of whom were conspicuous for their loyalty, and others for their defending the rights of the people. His grandfather Sir WALTER ST. JOHN, of Battersea, marrying one of the daughters of lord chief justice ST. JOHN, who as all know was strongly attached to the republican party, HENRY, the subject of the present memoir, was brought up in his family, and consequently imbibed the first principles of his education amongst the dissenters. At that time DANIEL BURGESS, a fanatic of a very peculiar kind, being at once possessed of zeal and humour, and as well known for the archness of his conceits as the furious obstinacy of his principles, was confessor in the presbyterian way to his grandmother, and was appointed to direct our author's first studies. Nothing is so apt to disgust a feeling mind as mistaken zeal; and perhaps the absurdity of the first lectures he received, might have given him that contempt for all religions, which he might have justly conceived against one. Indeed no task can be more mortifying than that he was condemned to undergo: “ I “ was obliged, says he in one place, “ while yet a boy, to read over the “ commentaries of Dr. MANTON, “ whose pride it was to have made “ an hundred and nineteen sermons, “ on the hundred and nineteenth “ psalm.” Dr. MANTON and his sermons were not likely to prevail much on one, who was, perhaps, the most sharp-sighted in the world at discovering the absurdities of others, however he might have been guilty of establishing many of his own.

But these dreary institutions were of no very long continuance; as soon as it was fit to take him out of the hands of the women, he was sent to Eaton school, and removed thence to Christ-Church college in Oxford. His genius and understanding were seen and admired in both these seminaries, but his love of pleasure had so much the ascendancy, that he seemed contented rather with the consciousness of his own great powers, than their exertion. However his friends, and those who knew him most intimately, were thoroughly sensible of the extent of his mind; and when he left the university, he was considered as one who had the fairest opportunity of making a shining figure in active life.

Nature seemed not less kind to him in her external embellishments, than in adorning his mind. With the graces of an handsome person, and a face in which dignity was happily blended with sweetness, he had a manner of address that was very engaging. His vivacity was always awake, his apprehension was quick, his wit refined, and his memory amazing: his subtilty in thinking and reasoning were profound, and all these talents were adorned with an elocution that was irresistible.

To the assemblage of so many gifts from nature, it was expected that art would soon give her finishing hand; and that a youth begun in excellence, would soon arrive at perfection: but such is the perverseness of human nature, that an age which should have been employed in the acquisition of knowledge, was dissipated in pleasure, and instead of aiming to excel in praise-worthy pursuits, BOLING-

BROKE seemed more ambitious of being thought the greatest rake about town. This period might have been compared to that of fermentation in liquors, which grow muddy before they brighten; but it must also be confessed, that those liquors which never ferment are seldom clear. In this state of disorder he was not without his lucid intervals; and even while he was noted for keeping Miss GUMLEY, the most expensive prostitute in the kingdom, and bearing the greatest quantity of wine without intoxication, he even then despised his paltry ambition. “ The love of study, says “ he, and desire of knowledge, were “ what I felt all my life; and though “ my genius, unlike the dæmon of “ SOCRATES, whispered so softly, that “ very often I heard him not in the “ hurry of these passions with which “ I was

“ I was transported, yet some calmer “ hours there were, and in them I “ hearkened to him.” These secret admonitions were indeed very few, since his excesses are remembered to this very day. I have spoke to an old man, who assured me that he saw him and another of his companions run naked through the Park, in a fit of intoxication; but then it was a time when public decency might be transgressed with less danger than at present.

During this period, as all his attachments were to pleasure, so his studies only seemed to lean that way.
 His first attempts were in poetry, in which he discovers more wit than taste, more labour than harmony in his versification. We have a copy of his verses prefixed to DRYDEN'S Virgil, complimenting the poet, and

praising his translation. We have another not so well known, prefixed to a French work, published in Holland, by the Chevalier de ST. HYACINTH, intituled, le Chef de Oeuvre d'un Inconnu. This performance is an humorous piece of criticism upon a miserable old ballad, and BOLINGBROKE's compliment, though written in English, is printed in Greek characters, so that at the first glance it may deceive the eye, and be mistaken for real Greek. There are two or three things more of his composition, which have appeared since his death, but which neither do honour to his parts or memory.

In this mad career of pleasure he continued for some time; but at length in 1700, when he arrived at the twenty-eighth year of his age, he began to take a dislike to his method of living, and to find that sensual pleasure alone was not sufficient to make the happiness of a reasonable creature. He therefore made his first effort to break from his state of infatuation, by marrying the daughter and co-heiress of Sir HENRY WINCHESCOMB, a descendant from the famous JACK of NEWBURY, who though but a clothier in the reign of HENRY VIII. was able to entertain the king and all his retinue in the most splendid manner. This lady was possessed of a fortune exceeding forty thousand pounds, and was not deficient in mental accomplishments; but whether he was not yet fully satiated with his former pleasures, or whether her temper was not conformable to his own, it is certain they were far from living happily together. After cohabiting

for some time together, they parted by mutual consent, both equally displeas'd; he complaining of the obstinacy of her temper, she of the shamelessness of his infidelity. A great part of her fortune some time after upon his attainder was given her back, but as her family estates were settled upon him, he enjoyed them after her death, upon the reversal of his attainder.

Having taken a resolution to quit the allurements of pleasure for the stronger attractions of ambition, soon after his marriage he procur'd a seat in the house of commons, being elected for the borough of Wotton-Basset, in Wiltshire, his father having served several times for the same place. Besides his natural endowments and his large fortune, he had other very considerable siderable advantages that gave him weight in the senate, and seconded his views of preferment. His grandfather SIR WALTER ST. JOHN was still alive, and that gentleman's interest was so great in his own county of Wilts, that he represented it in two parliaments in a former reign. His father also was then the representative for the same, and the interest of his wife's family in the house was very extensive. Thus BOLINGBROKE took his seat with many accidental helps, but his chief and great resource lay in his own extensive abilities.

At that time the whig and the tory parties were strongly opposed in the house, and pretty nearly balanced. In the latter years of king WILLIAM, the tories, who from every motive were opposed to the court, had been gaining

gaining popularity, and now began to make a public stand against their competitors. ROBERT HARLEY, afterwards earl of Oxford, a staunch and confirmed tory, was in the year 1700, chosen speaker of the house of commons, and was continued in the same upon the accession of queen ANNE, the year ensuing. BOLINGBROKE had all along been bred up, as was before observed, among the dissenters, his friends leaned to that persuasion, and all his connexions were in the whig interest. However, either from principle, or from perceiving the tory party to be then gaining ground, while the whigs were declining, he soon changed his connexions, and joined himself to HARLEY, for whom he then had the greatest esteem: nor did he bring him his vote alone, but his opinion; which even before the

the end of his first session he rendered very considerable, the house perceiving even in so young a speaker the greatest eloquence, united with the profoundest discernment. The year following he was again chosen anew for the same borough, and persevered in his former attachments, by which he gained such an authority and influence in the house, that it was thought proper to reward his merit; and on the 10th of April 1704, he was appointed secretary at war, and of the marines, his friend HARLEY having a little before been made secretary of state.

The tory party being thus established in power, it may easily be supposed that every method would be used to depress the whig interest, and to prevent it from rising; yet so much much justice was done even to merit in an enemy, that the duke of MARLBOROUGH, who might be considered as at the head of the opposite party, was supplied with all the necessaries for carrying on the war in Flanders with vigour; and it is remarkable, that the greatest events of his campaigns, such as the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies, and several glorious attempts made by the duke, to shorten the war by some decisive action, fell out while BOLINGBROKE was secretary at war. In fact, he was a sincere admirer of that great general, and avowed it upon all occasions to the last moment of his life: he knew his faults, he admired his virtues, and had the boast of being instrumental in giving lustre to those triumphs, by which his own power was in a manner overthrown.

As

As the affairs of the nation were then in as fluctuating a state as at present, HARLEY, after maintaining the lead for above three years, was in his turn obliged to submit to the whigs, who once more became the prevailing party, and he was compelled to resign the seals. The friendship between him and BOLINGBROKE, seems at this time to have been sincere and disinterested; for the latter chose to follow his fortune, and the next day resigned his employments in the administration, following his friend's example, and setting an example at once of integrity and moderation. As an instance of this, when his coadjutors the tories were for carrying a violent measure in the house of commons, in order to bring the princess SOPHIA into England, BOLINGBROKE so artfully opposed it, that it dropt without a debate. For this his moderation was praised, but perhaps at the expence of his sagacity.

For some time the whigs seemed to have gained a complete triumph, and upon the election of a new parliament, in the year 1708, BOLINGBROKE was not returned. The interval which followed of above two years, he employed in the severest study; and this reclude period he ever after used to consider, as the most active and serviceable of his whole life. But his retirement was soon interrupted, by the prevailing of his party once more; for the whig parliament being dissolved in the year 1710, he was again chosen, and HARLEY being made chancellor, and under treasurer of the exchequer, the important post of secretary of state was given to our author, thor, in which he discovered a degree of genius and assiduity, that perhaps have never been known to be united in one person to the same degree.

The English annals scarce produce a more trying juncture, or that required such various abilities to regulate. He was then placed in a sphere, where he was obliged to conduct the machine of state, struggling with a thousand various calamities: a desperate and enraged party, whose characteristic it has ever been to bear none in power but themselves; a war conducted by an able general, his professed opponent, and whose victories only tended to render him every day more formidable; a foreign enemy, possessed of endless resources, and seeming to gather strength from every defeat; an insidious alliance, that wanted only to gain the advantages of victory, without contributing to the expences of the combat; a weak declining mistress, that was led by every report, and seemed ready to listen to whatever was said against him; still more, a gloomy, indolent, and suspicious colleague, that envied his power, and hated him for his abilities: these were a part of the difficulties, that BOLINGBROKE had to struggle with in office, and under which he was to conduct the treaty of the peace of Utrecht, which was considered as one of the most complicated negotiations that history can afford. But nothing seemed too great for his abilities and industry, he set himself to the undertaking with spirit: he began to pave the way to the intended treaty, by making the people discontented at the continuance of the war; for for this purpose he employed himself in drawing up accurate computations of the numbers of our own men, and that of foreigners employed in its destructive progress. He even wrote in the Examiners, and other periodical papers of the times, shewing how much of the burden rested upon England, and how little was sustained by those who falsely boasted their alliance. By these means, and after much debate in the house of commons, the queen received a petition from parliament, shewing the hardships the allies had put upon England in carrying on this war, and consequently how necessary it was to apply relief to so ill-judged a connexion. It may be easily supposed that the Dutch, against whom this petition was chiefly levelled, did all that was in their power to oppose it;

many of the foreign courts also, with whom we had any transactions, were continually at work to defeat the minister's intentions. Memorial was delivered after memorial; the people of England, the parliament, and all Europe were made acquainted with the injustice and the dangers of such a proceeding: however BOLINGBROKE went on with steadiness and resolution, and although the attacks of his enemies at home might have been deemed sufficient to employ his attention, yet he was obliged at the same time that he furnished materials to the press in London, to furnish instructions to all our ministers and ambassadors abroad, who would do nothing but in pursuance of his directions. As an orator, in the senate he exerted all his eloquence, he stated all the great points that were brought before fore the house, he answered the objections that were made by the leaders of the opposition; and all this with such success, that even his enemies, while they opposed his power, acknowledged his abilities. Indeed, such were the difficulties he had to encounter, that we find him acknowledging himself some years after, that he never looked back on this great event passed as it was, without a secret emotion of mind, when he compared the vastness of the undertaking, and the importance of the success, with the means employed to bring it about, and with those which were employed to frustrate his intentions.

While he was thus industriously employed, he was not without the rewards that deserved to follow such abilities, joined to so much assiduity,

In July 1712, he was created Baron ST. JOHN, of Lidyard Tregoze, in Wiltshire, and Viscount BOLINGBROKE, by the last of which titles he is now generally known, and is likely to be talked of by posterity: he was also the same year appointed lord lieutenant of the county of Essex. By the titles of TREGOZE and BOLINGBROKE, he united the honours of the elder and younger branch of his family; and thus transmitted into one channel, the opposing interests of two races, that had been distinguished one for their loyalty to king CHARLES I. the other for their attachment to the parliament that opposed him. It was afterwards his boast, that he steered clear of the extremes for which his ancestors had been distinguished, having kept the spirit of freedom of the one, and acknowledged the subor-subordination that distinguished the other.

BOLINGBROKE being thus raised very near the summit of power, began to perceive more nearly the defects of him who was placed there. He now began to find that lord OXFORD, whose party he had followed, and whose person he had esteemed, was by no means so able or so industrious as he supposed him to be. He now began from his heart to renounce the friendship which he once had for his coadjutor; he began to imagine him treacherous; mean, indolent, and invidious; he even began to ascribe his own promotion to OXFORD's hatred, and to suppose that he was sent up to the house of lords, only to render him contemptible. These suspicions were partly true, and partly suggested by

BOLINGBROKE'S own ambition; being sensible of his own superior importance and capacity, he could not bear to see another take the lead in public affairs, when he knew they owed their chief success to his own management. Whatever might have been his motives, whether of contempt, hatred, or ambition, it is certain an irreconcilable breach began between these two leaders of their party; their mutual hatred was so great, that even their own common interest, the vigour of their negotiations, and the safety of their friends, were entirely sacrificed to it. It was in vain that SWIFT, who was admitted into their counsels, urged the unseasonable impropriety of their disputes; that while they were thus at variance within the walls, the enemy were making irreparable breaches without. BOLINGBROKE'S antipathy was so great, that even success would have been hateful to him, if lord OXFORD were to be a partner. He abhorred him to that degree, that he could not bear to be joined with him in any case; and even some time after, when the lives of both were aimed at, he could not think of concerting measures with him for their mutual safety, preferring even death itself to the appearance of a temporary friendship.

Nothing could have been more weak and injudicious, than their mutual animosities at this juncture; and it may be asserted with truth, that men who were unable to suppress or conceal their resentments upon such a trying occasion, were unfit to take the lead in any measures, be their industry or their abilities ever so great. In fact, fact, their dissensions were soon found to involve not only them, but their party in utter ruin; their hopes had for some time been declining, the whigs were daily gaining ground, and the queen's death soon after totally destroyed all their schemes with their power.

Upon the accession of GEORGE I. to the throne, dangers began to threaten the late ministry on every side; whether they had really intentions of bringing in the Pretender, or whether the whigs made it a pretext for destroying them, is uncertain; but the king very soon began to shew, that they were to expect neither favour nor mercy at his hands. Upon his landing at Greenwich, when the court came to wait upon him, and lord OXFORD among the number, he studiously studiously avoided taking any notice of him, and testified his resentment by the caresses he bestowed upon the members of the opposite faction. A regency had been some time before appointed to govern the kingdom, and ADDISON was made secretary; BOLINGBROKE still maintained his place of state secretary, but subject to the contempt of the great, and the insults of the mean. The first step taken by them to mortify him, was to order all letters and packets directed to the secretary of state, to be sent to Mr. ADDISON; so that BOLINGBROKE was in fact removed from his office, that is, the execution of it, in two days after the queen's death. But this was not the worst, for his mortifications were continually heightened, by the daily humiliation of waiting at the door of the apartment where the regency sat, with a bag in his hand, and being all the time, as it were, on purpose, exposed to the insolence of those who were tempted by their natural malevolence, or who expected to make their court to those in power by abusing him.

Upon this sudden turn of fortune; when the seals were taken from him, he went into the country, and having received a message from court, to be present when the seal was taken from the door of the secretary's office, he excused himself, alledging, that so trifling a ceremony might as well be performed by one of the under secretaries, but at the same time requested the honour of kissing the king's hand, to whom he testified the utmost submission. This request however however was rejected with disdain, the king had been taught to regard him as an enemy, and threw himself entirely on the whigs for safety and protection.

The new parliament, mostly composed of whigs, met the 17th of March; and in the king's speech from the throne, many inflaming hints were given, and many methods of violence were chalked out to the two houses. " The first steps, (says lord
 " BOLINGBROKE, speaking on this oc" casion) in both were perfectly an" swerable; and to the shame of the " peerage be it spoken, I saw at that

Such was the miserable situation to which he was reduced upon this occasion ; of all the number of his former flatterers and dependants, scarce one was found remaining. Every hour brought fresh reports of his alarming situation, and the dangers which threatened him and his party on all sides. PRIOR, who had been employed in negotiating the treaty of Utrecht, was come over to Dover, and had promised to reveal all he knew. The duke of MARLBOROUGH planted his creatures round his lordship, who artfully endeavoured to increase the danger; and an impeachment was actually preparing, in which he was accused of high treason. It argued therefore no great degree of timidity in his lordship, to take the first opportunity to withdraw from danger, and to suffer the first boilings of popular animosity, to quench the flame that had been raised against him: accordingly, having made a gallant shew of despising the machinations against him, having appeared in a very unconcerned manner at the play-house in Drury-Lane, and having bespoke another play for the night ensuing; having subscribed to a new opera that was to be acted some time after, and talked of making an elaborate defence, he went off that same night in disguise to Dover, as a servant to LE VIGNE, a messenger belonging to the French king; and there

one WILLIAM MORGAN, who had been a captain in General HILL's regiment of dragoons, hired a vessel, and carried him over to Calais, where the governor attended him in his coach, and carried him to his house with all possible distinction.

The news of lord BOLINGBROKE's flight was soon known over the whole town; and the next day, a letter from him to lord LANSDOWNE, was handed about in print, to the following effect.

MY LORD,

“ I LEFT the town so abruptly,
 “ that I had no time to take leave “ of you or any of my friends. You “ will excuse me, when you know

his flight was construed into a proof of his guilt; and his enemies accordingly set about driving on his impeachment with redoubled alacrity.

Mr. afterwards, Sir ROBERT WALPOLE, who had suffered a good deal by his attachment to the whig interest during the former reign, now undertook to bring in and conduct the charge against him in the house of commons. His impeachment consisted of six articles, which WALPOLE read to the house, in substance as follows. First, That whereas the lord BOLINGBROKE had assured the Dutch ministers, that the queen his mistress would make no peace but in concert with them, yet he had sent Mr. PRIOR to France, that same year, with proposals for a treaty of peace with that monarch, without the consent of the allies. Secondly, That he advised and promoted moted the making a separate treaty or convention with France, which was signed in September. Thirdly, That he disclosed to M. MESNAGER, the French minister at London, this convention, which was the preliminary instructions to her majesty's plenipotentiaries at Utrecht. Fourthly, That her majesty's final instructions to her plenipotentiaries, were disclosed by him to the abbot GUALTIER, who was an emissary of France. Fifthly, That he disclosed to the French the manner how Tournay in Flanders might be gained by them. And lastly, That he advised and promoted the yielding up Spain and the West-Indies to the duke of ANJOU, then an enemy to her majesty. These were urged by WALPOLE with great vehemence, and aggravated with all the eloquence of which he was master. He challenged any any

any person in the house to appear in behalf of the accused, and asserted, that to vindicate, were in a manner to share his guilt. In this universal consternation of the tory party, none was for some time seen to stir; but at length General Ross, who had received favours from his lordship, boldly stood up, and said he wondered that no man more capable was found to appear in defence of the accused. However, in attempting to proceed, he hesitated so much that he was obliged to sit down, observing, that he would reserve what he had to say to another opportunity. It may easily be supposed, that the whigs found no great difficulty in passing the vote for his impeachment through the house of commons. It was brought into that house on the 10th of June 1715, it was sent up to the house of lords lords on the 6th of August ensuing, and in consequence of which he was attainted by them of high treason on the 10th of September. Nothing could be more unjust than such a sentence; but justice had been long drowned in the spirit of party.

BOLINGBROKE thus finding all hopes cut off at home, began to think of improving his wretched fortune upon the continent. He had left England with a very small fortune, and his attainer totally cut off all resources for the future. In this depressed situation, he began to listen to some proposals which were made him by the Pretender, who was then residing at Barr, in France, and who was desirous of admitting BOLINGBROKE into his secret councils. A proposal of this nature had been made him shortly after his arrival at Paris, and before his attainder at home; but while he had yet any hopes of succeeding in England, he absolutely refused, and made the best applications his ruined fortune would permit, to prevent the extremity of his prosecution.

He had for some time waited for an opportunity of determining himself, even after he found it vain to think of making his peace at home. He let his Jacobite friends in England know that they had but to command him, and he was ready to venture in their service the little all that remained, as frankly as he had exposed all that was gone. At length, (says he, talking of himself) these commands came, and were executed in the following manner. The person who was sent to me, arrived in the beginning ginning of July 1715, at the place where I had retired to in Dauphine. He spoke in the name of all the friends whose authority could influence me ; and he brought me word that Scotland was not only ready to take arms, but under some sort of dissatisfaction to be withheld from beginning : that in England the people were exasperated against the government to such a degree, that far from wanting to be encouraged, they could not be restrained from insulting it on every occasion ; that the whole tory party was become avowedly Jacobites ; that many officers of the army, and the majority of the soldiers, were well affected to the cause ; that the city of London was ready to rise, and that the enterprizes for seizing of several places, were ripe for execution ; in a word, that most of the the principal Tories were in a concert with the duke of ORMOND : for I had pressed particularly to be informed whether his grace acted alone, or if not, who were his council ; and that the others were so disposed, that there remained no doubt of their joining, as soon as the first blow should be struck. He added, that my friends were a little surpris'd, to observe that I lay neuter in such a conjuncture. He represented to me the danger I ran, of being prevented by people of all sides from having the merit of engaging early in this enterprize, and how unaccountable it would be for a man, impeached and attainted under the present government, to take no share in bringing about a revolution so near at hand, and so certain. He intreated that I would defer no longer to join the Chevalier, to advise and assist assist in carrying on his affairs, and to solicit and negotiate at the court of France, where my friends imagined that I should not fail to meet a favourable reception, and from whence they made no doubt of receiving assistance in a situation of affairs so critical, so unexpected, and so promising. He concluded, by giving me a letter from the Pretender, whom he had seen in his way to me, in which I was pressed to repair without loss of time to Comercy; and this instance was grounded on the message which the bearer of the letter had brought me from England. In the progress of the conversation with the messenger, he related a number of facts, which satisfied me as to the general disposition of the people; but he gave me little satisfaction as to the measures taken to improve this disposition, tion, for driving the business on with vigour, if it tended to a revolution, or for supporting it to advantage if it spun into a war. When I questioned him concerning several persons whose disinclination to the government admitted no doubt, and whose names, quality, and experience were very essential to the success of the undertaking; he owned to me that they kept a great reserve, and did at most but encourage others to act by general and dark expressions. I received this account and this summons ill in my my bed; yet important as the matter was, a few minutes served to determine me. The circumstances wanting to form a reasonable inducement to engage, did not excuse me; but the smart of a bill of attainder tingled in every vein, and I looked on my party to be under oppression, and to call call for my assistance. Besides which, I considered first that I should be certainly informed, when I conferred with the Chevalier, of many particulars unknown to this gentleman; for I did not imagine that the English could be so near to take up arms as he represented them to be, on no other foundation than that which he exposed.

In this manner having for some time debated with himself, and taken his resolution, he lost no time in repairing to the Pretender at Comercy, and took the seals of that nominal king, as he had formerly those of his potent mistress. But this was a terrible falling off indeed; and the very first conversation he had with this weak projector, gave him the most unfavourable expectations of future success. He talked to me, (says his lordship) like a man who expected every moment to set out for England or Scotland, but who did not very well know for which; and when he entered into the particulars of his affairs, I found, that concerning the former, he had nothing more circumstantial or positive to go upon, than what I have already related. But the duke of ORMOND had been for some time, I cannot say how long, engaged with the Chevalier: he had taken the direction of this whole affair, as far as it related to England, upon himself, and had received a commission for this purpose, which contained the most ample powers that could be given. But still, however, all was unsettled, undetermined, and ill understood. The duke had asked from France a small body of forces, a sum of money, and a quantity of amunition; but to the first part of the request he received a flat denial, but was made to hope that some arms and some amunition might be given. This was but a very gloomy prospect; yet hope swelled the depressed party so high, that they talked of nothing less than an instant and ready revolution. It was their interest to be secret and industrious; but rendered sanguine by their passions, they made no doubt of subverting a government with which they were angry, and gave as great an alarm, as would have been imprudent at the eve of a general insurrection.

Such was the state of things, when BOLINGBROKE arrived to take up his new office at Comercy; and although he saw the deplorable state of the party with which he was embarked, yet he resolved to give his affairs the best complexion he was able, and set out for Paris, in order to procure from that court the necessary succours for his new master's invasion of England. But his reception and negotiations at Paris, were still more unpromising than those at Comercy, and nothing but absolute infatuation seemed to dictate every measure taken by the party. He there found a multitude of people at work, and every one doing what seemed good in his own eyes; no subordination, no order, no concert. The Jacobites had wrought one another up to look upon the success of the present designs, as infallible: every meeting-house which the populace demolished, as he himself says, every little drunken riot which happened, served to confirm them them in these sanguine expectations; and there was hardly one among them who would lose the air of contributing by his intrigues to the restoration, which he took for granted would be brought about in a few weeks. Care and hope, says our author very humorously, sat on every busy Irish face; those who could read and write, had letters to shew, and those who had not arrived to this pitch of erudition, had their secrets to whisper. No sex was excluded from this ministry; FANNY OGLETHORPE kept her corner in it, and OLIVE TRANT, a woman of the same mixed reputation, was the great wheel of this political machine. The ridiculous correspondence was carried on with England by people of like importance, and who were busy in sounding the alarm in the ears of an enemy, whom it was their interest to surprize. By these means, as he himself continues to inform us, the government of England was put on its guard, so that before he came to Paris, what was doing had been discovered. The little armament made at Havre de Grace, which furnished the only means to the Pretender of landing on the coasts of Britain, and which had exhausted the treasury of St. Germain, was talked of publicly. The earl of STAIR, the English minister at that city, very soon discovered its destination, and all the particulars of the intended invasion; the names of the persons from whom supplies came, and who were particularly active in the design, were whispered about at tea-tables and coffee-houses. In short, what by the indiscretion of the projectors, what by the private interests interests and ambitious views of the French, the most private transactions came to light; and such of the more prudent plotters, who supposed that they had trusted their heads to the keeping of one or two friends, were in reality at the mercy of numbers. Into such company, exclaims our noble writer, was I fallen for my sins. Still, however, he went on, steering in the wide ocean without a compass, till the death of LEWIS XIV. and the arrival of the duke of ORMOND at Paris, rendered all his endeavours abortive: yet notwithstanding these unfavourable circumstances, he still continued to dispatch several messages and directions for England, to which he received very evasive and ambiguous answers. Among the number of these, he drew up a paper at Chaville, in concert with the duke of ORMOND, marshal BERWICK, and DE TORCY, which was sent to England just before the death of the king of France, representing that France could not answer the demands of their memorial, and praying directions what to do. A reply to this came to him through the French secretary of state, wherein they declared themselves unable to say any thing, till they saw what turn affairs would take on the death of the king, which had reached their ears. Upon another occasion, a message coming from Scotland to press the Chevalier to hasten their rising, he dispatched a messenger to London to the earl of MAR, to tell him that the concurrence of England in the insurrection, was ardently wished and expected; but instead of that nobleman's waiting for instructions, he had already gone into the highlands, and had there actually put himself at the head of his clans. After this, in concert with the duke of ORMOND, he dispatched one Mr. HAMILTON, who got all the papers by heart, for fear of a miscarriage, to their friends in England, to inform them, that though the Chevalier was destitute of succour, and all reasonable hopes of it, yet he would land as they pleased in England or Scotland, at a minute's warning; and therefore they might rise immediately after they had sent dispatches to him. To this message Mr. HAMILTON returned very soon, with an answer given by lord LANS-DOWNE, in the name of all the persons privy to the secret, that since affairs grew daily worse, and would not mend by delay, the malecontents in England had resolved to declare immediately, and would be ready to join the

the duke of ORMOND on his landing; adding, that his person would be as safe in England as in Scotland, and that in every other respect it was better he should land in England; that they had used their utmost endeavours, and hoped the western counties would be in a good posture to receive him, and that he should land as near as possible to Plymouth. With these assurances the duke embarked, though he had heard before of the seizure of many of his most zealous adherents, of the dispersion of many more, and the consternation of all; so that upon his arrival at Plymouth, finding nothing in readiness, he returned to Brittany. In these circumstances the Pretender himself sent to have a vessel got ready for him at Dunkirk, in which he went to Scotland, leaving lord BOLINGBROKE all this this while at Paris, to try if by any means some assistance might not be procured, without which all hopes of success were at an end. It was during his negotiation upon this miserable proceeding, that he was sent for by Mrs. TRANT, (a woman who had some time before ingratiated herself with the regent of France, by supplying him with mistresses from England) to a little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where she lived with mademoiselle CHAUSSERY, an old superannuated waiting-woman belonging to the regent. By these he was acquainted with the measures they had taken for the service of the duke of ORMOND; although BOLINGBROKE, who was actual secretary to the negotiation, had never been admitted to a confidence in their secrets. He was therefore a little surpris'd, at finding

such mean agents employed without his privity, and very soon found them utterly unequal to the task. He quickly therefore withdrew himself from such wretched auxiliaries, and the regent himself seemed pleased at his defection.

In the mean time the Pretender set sail from Dunkirk for Scotland, and though BOLINGBROKE had all along perceived that his cause was hopeless and his projects ill designed; although he had met with nothing but opposition and disappointment in his service, yet he considered that this of all others was the time he could not be permitted to relax in the cause. He now therefore neglected no means, forgot no argument which his understanding could suggest, in applying to the court of France: but his success cess was not answerable to his industry. The king of France, not able to furnish the Pretender with money himself, had writ some time before his death to his grandson the king of Spain, and had obtained from him a promise of forty thousand crowns. A small part of this sum had been received by the queen's treasurer at St. Germans, and had been sent to Scotland, or employed to defray the expences which were daily making on the coast: at the same time BOLINGBROKE pressed the Spanish ambassador at Paris, and solicited the minister at the court of Spain. He took care to have a number of officers picked out of the Irish troops which serve in France, gave them their routes, and sent a ship to receive and transport them to Scotland. Still however the money came in so slowly, and in such trifling sums, that that it turned to little account ; and the officers were on their way to the Pretender. At the same time he formed a design of engaging French privateers in the expedition, that were to have carried whatever should be necessary to send to any part of Britain in their first voyage, and then to cruize under the Pretender's commission. He had actually agreed for some, and had it in his power to have made the same bargain with others : Sweden on one side, and Scotland on the other, could have afforded them retreats ; and if the war had been kept up in any part of the mountains, this armament would have been of the utmost advantage. But all his projects and negotiations failed, by the Pretender's precipitate return, who was not above six weeks in his expedition, and and flew out of Scotland even before all had been tried in his defence.

The expedition being in this manner totally defeated, BOLINGBROKE now began to think that it was his duty as well as interest, to save the poor remains of the disappointed party. He never had any great opinion of the Pretender's success before he set off; but when this adventurer had taken the last step which it was in his power to make, our secretary then resolved to suffer neither him, nor the Scotch, to be any longer bubbles of their own credulity, and of the scandalous artifices of the French court: In a conversation he had with the marshal DURANDELLES, he took occasion to declare, that he would not be the instrument of amusing the Scotch; and since he was able to do them them no other service, he would at least inform them of what little dependence they might place upon assistance from France. He added, that he would send them vessels, which with those already on the coast of Scotland, might serve to bring off the Pretender, the earl of MAR, and as many others as possible. The marshal approved his resolution, and advised him to execute it as the only thing which was left to do; but in the mean time the Pretender landed at Graveline, and gave orders to stop all vessels bound on his account to Scotland; and BOLINGBROKE saw him the morning after his arrival at St. Germans, and he received him with open arms.

As it was the secretary's business, as soon as BOLINGBROKE heard of his return, he went to acquaint the French court with it, when it was recommended to him to advise the Pretender to proceed to Bar with all possible diligence; and in this measure BOLINGBROKE entirely concurred. But the Pretender himself was in no such haste, he had a mind to stay some time at St. Germain, and in the neighbourhood of Paris, and to have a private meeting with the regent: he accordingly sent BOLINGBROKE to solicit this meeting, who exerted all his influence in the negotiation. He wrote and spoke to the marshal DE HUXELLES, who answered him by word of mouth and by letters, refusing him by both, and assuring him that the regent said the things which were asked were puerilities, and swore he would not see him. The secretary, no ways displeased with his ill success, returned with this answer to his master, who acquiesced in this determination, and declared he would instantly set out for Lorraine, at the same time assuring BOLINGBROKE of his firm reliance on his integrity.

However the Pretender, instead of taking post for Lorraine, as he had promised, went to a little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where his female ministers resided, and there continued for several days, seeing the Spanish and Swedish ministers, and even the regent himself. It might have been in these interviews that he was set against his new secretary, and taught to believe that he had been remiss in his duty, and false to his trust: be this as it will, a few days after, the duke of ORMOND came to see BOLINGBROKE,

BROKE, and having first prepared him for the surprize, put into his hands a note directed to the duke, and a little scrip of paper directed to the secretary; they were both in the Pretender's hand-writing, and dated as if written by him on his way to Lorraine: but in this BOLINGBROKE was not to be deceived, who knew the place of his present residence. In one of these papers the Pretender declared that he had no further occasion for the secretary's service, and the other was an order to him to give up the papers in his office; all which he observes, might have been contained in a letter-case of a moderate size. He gave the duke the seals, and some papers which he could readily come at; but for some others, in which there were several insinuations under the Pretender's own hand, reflecting upon the duke himself, these he took care to convey by a safe hand, since it would have been very improper that the duke should have seen them. As he thus gave up without scruple all the papers which remained in his hands, because he was determined never to make use of them, so he declares he took a secret pride in never asking for those of his own which were in the Pretender's hands; contenting himself with making the duke understand, how little need there was to get rid of a man in this manner, who only wanted an opportunity to get rid of the Pretender and his cause. In fact, if we survey the measures taken on the one side, and the abilities of the man on the other, it will not appear any way wonderful that he should be disgusted with a party, who had neither principle to give a foundafoundation to their hopes, union to advance them, or abilities to put them in motion.

BOLINGBROKE being thus dismissed from the Pretender's service, he supposed that he had got rid of the trouble and the ignominy of so mean an employment at the same time; but he was mistaken: he was no sooner rejected from the office, than articles of impeachment were preferred against him, in the same manner as he had before been impeached in England, though not with such effectual injury to his person and fortune. The articles of his impeachment by the Pretender were branched out into seven heads, in which he was accused of treachery, incapacity, and neglect. The first was, That he was never to be found by those who came to him about business; and if by chance or stratagem they got hold of him, he affected being in an hurry, and by putting them off to another time, still avoided giving them any answer. The second was, That the earl of MAR complained by six different messengers, at different times, before the Chevalier came from Dunkirk, of his being in want of arms and ammunition, and prayed a speedy relief; and though the things demanded were in my lord's power, there was not so much as one pound of powder in any of the ships, which by his lordship's directions parted from France. Thirdly, The Pretender himself, after his arrival, sent general HAMILTON to inform him, that his want of arms and ammunition was such, that he should be obliged to leave Scotland, unless he received speedy relief: yet lord Bo-

LINGBROKE amused Mr. HAMILTON twelve days together, and did not introduce him to any of the French ministers, though he was referred to them for a particular account of affairs; or so much as communicated his letters to the queen, or any body else. Fourthly, The count DU CASTEL BLANCO had for several months at Havre, a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, and did daily ask his lordship's orders how to dispose of them, but never got any instructions. Fifthly, The Pretender's friends at the French court, had for some time past no very good opinion of his lordship's integrity, and a very bad one of his discretion. Sixthly, At a time when many merchants in France would have carried privately any quantity of arms and ammunition into Scotland, his lordship desired a public order for the embarkation, which being a thing not to be granted, is said to have been done in order to urge a denial. Lastly, The Pretender wrote to his lordship by every occasion after his arrival in Scotland; and though there were many opportunities of writing in return, yet from the time he landed there, to the day he left it, he never received any letter from his lordship. Such were the articles, by a very extraordinary reverse of fortune, preferred against lord BOLINGBROKE, in less than a year after similar articles were drawn up against him by the opposite party at home. It is not easy to find out what he could have done, thus to disoblige all sides; but he had learned by this time, to make out happiness from the consciousness of his own designs, and to consider all the rest of mankind

But though it was mortifying to be thus rejected on both sides, yet he was not remiss in vindicating himself from all. Against these articles of impeachment, therefore, he drew up an elaborate answer, in which he vindicates himself with great plausibility. He had long, as he assures, wished to leave the Pretender's service, but was entirely at a loss how to conduct himself in so difficult a resignation; but at length, says he, the Pretender and his council disposed of things better for me than I could have done for myself. I had resolved on his return from Scotland, to follow him till his residence should be fixed somewhere; after which, having served the Tories in this, which I looked upon as their last struggle for power, and having continued to act in the Pretender's affairs, till the end of the term for which I embarked with him, I should have esteemed myself to be at liberty, and should, in the civilest manner I was able, have taken my leave of him. Had we parted thus, I should have remained in a very strange situation all the rest of my life; on one side, he would have thought that he had a right on any future occasion to call me out of my retreat, the tories would probably have thought the same thing, my resolution was taken to refuse them both, and I foresaw that both would condemn me: on the other side, the consideration of his having kept measures with me, joined to that of having once openly declared for him, would have created a point of honour by which I should have have been tied down, not only from ever engaging against him, but also from making my peace at home. The Pretender cut this Gordian knot asunder at one blow; he broke the links of that chain which former engagements had fastened on me, and gave me a right to esteem myself as free from all obligations of keeping measures with him, as I should have continued if I had never engaged in his interest.

It is not to be supposed that, one so very delicate to preserve his honour, would previously have basely betrayed his employer: a man conscious of acting so infamous a part, would have undertaken no defence, but let the accusations, which could not materially affect him, blow over, and wait for the calm that was to succeed ceed in tranquillity. He appeals to all the ministers with whom he transacted business, for the integrity of his proceedings at that juncture; and had he been really guilty, when he opposed the ministry here after his return, they would not have failed to brand and detect his duplicity. The truth is, that he perhaps was the most disinterested minister at that time in the Pretender's court; as he had spent great sums of his own money in his service, and never would be obliged to him for a farthing, in which case he believes that he was single. His integrity is much less impeachable on this occasion than his ambition; for all the steps he took may be fairly ascribed to his displeasure, at having the duke of ORMOND and the earl of MAR treated more confidentially than himself. It was his aim always to be foremost in every administration, and he could not bear to act as a subaltern, in so paltry a court as that of the Pretender.

At all periods of his exile, he still looked towards home with secret regret; and had taken every opportunity to apply to those in power, either to soften his prosecutions, or lessen the number of his enemies at home. In accepting his office under the Pretender, he made it a condition to be at liberty to quit the post whenever he should think proper; and being now disgracefully dismissed, he turned his mind entirely towards making his peace in England, and employing all the unfortunate experience he had acquired to undeceive his tory friends, and to promote the union and quiet of his native country. It was not a little favourable to his hopes, that about this time, though unknown to him, the earl of STAIR, ambaffador to the French court, had received full power to treat with him whilst he was engaged with the Pretender ; but yet had never made him any propofals, which might be confidered as the groffest outrage. But when the breach with the Pretender was univerfally known, the earl fent one monfieur SALUDIN, a gentleman of Geneva, to lord BOLINGBROKE, to communicate to him his majesty king GEORGE'S favourable difpofition to grant him a pardon, and his own earneft defire to ferve him as far as he was able. This was an offer by much too advantageous for BOLINGBROKE in his wretched circumftances to refufe ; he embraced it, as became him to do, with all poffible fenfe of the king's goodnefs, and of the ambassador's friendship. They had frequent conferences shortly after upon the subject. The turn which the English ministry gave the matter, was to enter into a treaty to reverse his attainder, and to stipulate the conditions on which this act of grace should be granted him: but this method of negotiation he would by no means submit to; the notion of a treaty shocked him, and he resolved never to be restored, rather than go that way to work. Accordingly he opened himself without any reserve to lord STAIR, and told him, that he looked upon himself obliged in honour and conscience, to undeceive his friends in England, both as to the state of foreign affairs, as to the management of the Jacobite interest abroad, and as to the characters of the persons; in every one of which points

he knew them to be most grossly and most dangerously deluded. He observed, that the treatment he had received from the Pretender and his adherents, would justify him to the world in doing this. That if he remained in exile all his life, that he might be assured that he would never have more to do with the Jacobite cause; and that if he were restored, he would give it an effectual blow, in making that apology which the Pretender had put him under a necessity of making. That in doing this, he flattered himself that he should contribute something towards the establishment of the king's government, and to the union of his subjects. He added, that if the court thought him sincere in those professions, a treaty with him was unnecessary; and if they did not believe so, then a treaty would be dangerous to him.

him. The earl of STAIR, who has also confirmed this account of lord BOLINGBROKE's, in a letter to Mr. CRAGGS, readily came into his sentiments on this head, and soon after the king approved it upon their representations: he accordingly received a promise of pardon from GEORGE I. who on the 2d of July 1716, created his father baron of BATTERSEA, in the county of Surry, and Viscount ST. JOHN. This seemed preparatory to his own restoration; and instead of prosecuting any farther ambitious schemes against the government, he rather began to turn his mind to philosophy; and since he could not gratify his ambition to its full extent, he endeavoured to learn the arts of despising it. The variety of distressful events that had hitherto attended all his struggles, at last had thrown him into a state of reflection, and this produced, by way of relief, a consolatio philosophica, which he wrote the same year, under the title of Reflections upon exile. In this piece, in which he professes to imitate the manner of SENECA, he with some wit draws his own picture, and represents himself as suffering persecution, for having served his country with abilities and integrity. A state of exile thus incurred, he very justly shews to be rather honourable than distressful; and indeed, there are few men that will deny, but that the company of strangers to virtue, is better than the company of enemies to it. Besides this philosophical tract, he also wrote this year several letters, in answer to the charge laid upon him by the Pretender and his adherents; and the following year he drew up a vindication

of his whole conduct with respect to the tories, in the form of a letter, to Sir WILLIAM WYNDHAM.

Nor was he so entirely devoted to the fatigues of business, but that he gave pleasure a share in his pursuits. He had never much agreed with the lady he first married, and after a short cohabitation, they separated and lived ever after asunder. She therefore remained in England, upon his going into exile, and by proper application to the throne, was allowed a proper maintenance to support her with becoming dignity: however, she did not long survive his first disgrace, and upon his becoming a widower, he began to think of trying his fortune once more, in a state which was at first so unfavourable. For this purpose, he cast his eyes on the widow of the marquis of VILLETTE, and niece to the famous madam MAINTENON; a young lady of great merit and understanding, possessed of a very large fortune, but encumbered with a long and troublesome law-suit. In the company of this very sensible woman, he passed his time in France, sometimes in the country, and sometimes at the capital, till the year 1723, in which, after the breaking up of the parliament, his majesty was pleased to grant him a pardon as to his personal safety, but as yet neither restoring him to his family inheritance, his title, or a seat in parliament.

To obtain this favour, had been the governing principle of his politics for some years before; and upon the first notice of his good fortune, he prepared to return to his native country, where, however, his dearest connexions were either dead, or declared themselves suspicious of his former conduct in support of their party. It is observable, that bishop ATTERBURY, who was banished at this time, for a supposed treasonable correspondence in favour of the tories, was set on shore at Calais, just when lord BOLINGBROKE arrived there on his return to England. So extraordinary a reverse of fortune, could not fail of strongly affecting that good prelate, who observed with some emotion, that he perceived himself to be exchanged: he presently left it to his auditors to imagine, whether his country were the loser or the gainer by such an exchange.

make very vigorous applications for further favours from the crown; his pardon, without the means of support, was but an empty, or perhaps, it might be called a distressful act of kindness, as it brought him back among his former friends, in a state of inferiority his pride could not endure. However, his applications were soon after successful, for in about two years after his return, he obtained an act of parliament to restore him to his family inheritance, which amounted to near three thousand pounds a year. He was also enabled by the same, to possess any purchase he should make of any other estate in the kingdom; and he accordingly pitched upon a seat of lord TANKERVILLE's, at Dawley, near Uxbridge in Middlesex, where he settled with his lady, and laid himself out to enjoy the rural pleasures pleasures in perfection, since the more glorious ones of ambition were denied him. With this resolution he began to improve his new purchase in a very peculiar style, giving it all the air of a country farm, and adorning even his hall with all the implements of husbandry. We have a sketch of his way of living in this retreat, in a letter of POPE'S to SWIFT, who omits no opportunity of representing his lordship in the most amiable points of view. This letter is dated from Dawley, the country farm above-mentioned, and begins thus. “ I now “ hold the pen for my lord BOLING-“ BROKE, who is reading your letter “ between two hay-cocks; but his “ attention is somewhat diverted, by “ casting his eyes on the clouds, not “ in admiration of what you say, but “ for fear of a shower. He is pleased “ with your placing him in the tri“ umvirate, between yourself and “ me ; though he says he doubts he “ shall fare like LEPIDUS, while one “ of us runs away with all the power, “ like AUGUSTUS, and another with “ all the pleasure, like ANTONY. It “ is upon a foresight of this, that he “ has fitted up his farm, and you will “ agree that this scheme of retreat is “ not founded upon weak appear“ ances. Upon his return from Bath, “ he finds all peccant humours are “ purged out of him ; and his great “ temperance and œconomy are so “ signal, that the first is fit for my “ constitution, and the latter would “ enable you to lay up so much mo“ ney as to buy a bishopric in Eng“ land. As to the return of his “ health and vigour, were you here, “ you might enquire of his hay-

“ makers ; but as to his temperance,
 “ I can answer that for one whole “ day, we have had nothing for din“ ner but mutton broth, beans and “ bacon, and a barn-door fowl. Now
 “ his lordship is run after his cart, I “ have a moment left to myself to tell “ you, that I overheard him yesterday “ agree with a painter for two hun“ dred pounds, to paint his country-“ hall with rakes, spades, prongs, &c.
 “ and other ornaments, merely to “ countenance his calling this place a “ FARM.” What POPE here says of his engagements with a painter, was shortly after executed ; the hall was painted accordingly in black crayons only, so that at first view it brought to mind the figures often seen scratched with charcoal, or the smoak of a candle, upon the kitchen walls of farm-houses. The whole however produced a most striking

ing effect, and over the door at the entrance into it, was this motto: SATIS BEATUS RURIS HONORIBUS. His lordship seemed to be extremely happy in this pursuit of moral tranquillity, and in the exultation of his heart, could not fail of communicating his satisfactions to his friend SWIFT. I am in my own farm, says he, and here I shoot strong and tenacious roots; I have caught hold of the earth, to use a gardener's phrase, and neither my enemies nor my friends will find it an easy matter to transplant me again.

There is not, perhaps, a stronger instance in the world than his lordship, that an ambitious mind can never be fairly subdued, but will still seek for those gratifications which retirement can never supply. All this time he was mistaken in his passion for solitude, and supposed that to be the child of philosophy, which was only the effects of spleen: it was in vain that he attempted to take root in the shade of obscurity, he was originally bred in the glare of public occupation, and he secretly once more wished for transplantation. He was only a titular lord, he had not been thoroughly restored; and, as he was excluded from a seat in the house of peers, he burned with impatience to play a part in that conspicuous theatre. Impelled by this desire, he could no longer be restrained in obscurity, but once more entered into the bustle of public business, and disavowing all obligations to the minister, he embarked in the opposition against him, in which he had several powerful coadjutors; but previously he had taken care to prefer a petition to the house of commons, desiring to be reinstated in his former emoluments and capacities. This petition at first occasioned very warm debates; WALPOLE, who pretended to espouse his cause, alleged that it was very right to admit him to his inheritance; and when lord WILLIAM PAWLETT moved for a clause to disqualify him from sitting in either house, WALPOLE rejected the motion, secretly satisfied with a resolution which had been settled in the cabinet, that he should never more be admitted into any share of power. To this artful method of evading his pretensions, BOLINGBROKE was no stranger; and he was now resolved to shake that power, which thus endeavoured to obstruct the increase of his own: taking therefore his part in the opposition with PULTNEY, while the latter latter engaged to manage the house of commons, BOLINGBROKE undertook to enlighten the people: accordingly he soon distinguished himself by a multitude of pieces, written during the latter part of GEORGE the first's reign, and likewise the beginning of that which succeeded. These were conceived with great vigour and boldness; and now, once more engaged in the service of his country, though disarmed, gagged, and almost bound, as he declared himself to be, yet he resolved not to abandon his cause, as long as he could depend on the firmness and integrity of those coadjutors, who did not labour under the same disadvantages with himself. His letters in a paper called the Craftsman, were particularly distinguished in this political contest; and though several of the most expert politicians of
time

of the times joined in this paper, his essays were peculiarly relished by the public. However, it is the fate of things written to an occasion, seldom to survive that occasion: the Craftsman, though written with great spirit and sharpness, is now almost forgotten, although when it was published as a weekly paper, it sold much more rapidly than even the Spectator. Beside this work, he published several other separate pamphlets, which were afterwards reprinted in the second edition of his works, and which were very popular in their day.

This political warfare continued for ten years; during which time he laboured with great strength and perseverance, and drew up such a system of politics, as some have supposed to be the most complete now existing.

But

But as upon all other occasions, he had the mortification once more to see those friends desert him, upon whose assistance he most firmly relied, and all that web of fine spun speculation actually destroyed at once by the ignorance of some, and the perfidy of others. He then declared that he was perfectly cured of his patriotic phrenzy; he fell out not only with PULTNEY for his selfish views, but with his old friends the tories, for abandoning their cause as desperate, averring, that the faint and unsteady exercise of parts on one side, was a crime but one degree inferior to the iniquitous misapplication of them on the other. But he could not take leave of a controversy in which he had been so many years engaged, without giving a parting blow, in which he seemed to summon up all

all his vigour at once, and where, as the poet says,

This inimitable piece is intituled, A Dissertation on Parties, and of all his masterly pieces, it is in general esteemed the best.

Having finished this, which was received with the utmost avidity, he resolved to take leave not only of his enemies and friends, but even of his country; and in this resolution, in the year 1736, he once more retired to France, where he looked back to his native country with a mixture of anger and pity, and upon his former professing friends, with a share of contempt and indignation. I expect little, says he, from the principal actors that tread the stage at present.

They

They are divided not so much as it seemed, and as they would have it believed, about measures. The true division is about their different ends. Whilst the minister was not hard pushed, nor the prospect of succeeding to him near, they appeared to have but one end, the reformation of the government. The destruction of the minister was pursued only as a preliminary, but of essential and indisputable necessity, to that end: but when his destruction seemed to approach, the object of his succession interposed to the sight of many, and the reformation of the government was no longer their point of view. They had divided the skin, at least in their thoughts, before they had taken the beast. The common fear of hastening his downfall for others, made them all faint in the chace. It was this, and this alone, that saved him, and put off his evil day.

Such were his cooler reflections, after he had laid down his political pen, to employ it in a manner that was much more agreeable to his usual professions, and his approaching age. He had long employed the few hours he could spare, on subjects of a more general and important nature to the interests of mankind; but as he was frequently interrupted by the alarms of party, he made no great proficiency in his design. Still, however, he kept it in view, and he makes frequent mention in his letters to SWIFT, of his intentions to give metaphysics a new and useful turn. I know, says he in, one of these, how little regard you pay to writings of this kind; but I imagine, that if you can like any, it must be those that strip metaphysics tics of all their bombast, keep within the sight of every well constituted eye, and never bewilder themselves, whilst they pretend to guide the reason of others.

Having now arrived at the sixtieth year of his age, and being blessed with a very competent share of fortune, he retired into France, far from the noise and hurry of party; for his seat at Dawley was too near, to devote the rest of his life to retirement and study. Upon his going to that country, as it was generally known that disdain, vexation, and disappointment had driven him there, many of his friends, as well as his enemies supposed, that he was once again gone over to the Pretender. Among the number who entertained this suspicion, was SWIFT, whom POPE, in one of his letters, very roundly chides for harbouring such an unjust opinion. “ You should be cautious, “ says he, of censuring any motion “ or action of lord BOLINGBROKE, “ because you hear it only from shal- “ low, envious, and malicious re- “ porters. What you writ to me “ about him, I find, to my great “ scandal, repeated in one of yours “ to another. Whatever you might “ hint to me, was this for the pro- “ fane? The thing, if true, should “ be concealed; but it is, I assure “ you, absolutely untrue in every “ circumstance. He has fixed in “ a very agreeable retirement, near “ Fontainbleau, and makes it his “ whole business VACARE LITTERIS.”

This reproof from POPE was not more friendly than it was true; lord
BOLING-

BOLINGBROKE was too well acquainted with the forelorn state of that party, and the folly of its conductors, once more to embark in their desperate concerns. He now saw, that he had gone as far towards reinstating himself in the full possession of his former honours, as the mere dint of parts and application could go, and was at length experimentally convinced, that the decree was absolutely irreverfible, and the door of the house of lords finally fhut againft him. He therefore, at POPE'S fuggestion, retired merely to be at leifure from the broils of oppofition, for the calmer pleasures of philofophy. Thus the decline of his life, though lefs brilliant, became more amiable; and even his happinefs was improved by age, which had rendered his paffions more moderate, and his wifhes more attainable.

But

But he was far from suffering, even in solitude, his hours to glide away in torpid inactivity. That active restless disposition, still continued to actuate his pursuits; and having lost the season for gaining power over his contemporaries, he was now resolved upon acquiring fame from posterity. He had not been long in his retreat near Fontainbleau, when he began a course of letters on the study and use of history, for the use of a young nobleman. In these he does not follow the methods of St. REAL, and others who have treated on this subject, who make history the great fountain of all knowledge; he very wisely confines its benefits, and supposes them to consist in deducing general maxims from particular facts, than in illustrating maxims by the application of historical passages. In mentioning ecclesiastical tical history, he gives his opinion very freely, upon the subject of the divine original of the sacred books, which he supposes to have no such foundation. This new system of thinking, which he had always propagated in conversation, and which he now began to adopt in his more laboured compositions, seemed no way supported either by his acuteness or his learning. He began to reflect seriously on these subjects too late in life, and to suppose those objections very new and unanswerable, which had been already confuted by thousands. “ Lord Bo-

 “ his letters, is above trifling; when “ he writes of any thing in this world,
 “ he is more than mortal. If ever “ he trifles, it must be when he “ turns divine.”

In the mean time, as it was evident, that a man of his active ambition, in chusing retirement when no longer able to lead in public, must be liable to ridicule in resuming a resigned philosophical air: in order to obviate the censure, he addressed a letter to lord BATHURST, upon the true use of retirement and study; in which he shows himself still able and willing to undertake the cause of his country, whenever its distresses should require his exertion. I have, says he, renounced neither my country, nor my friends; and by friends I mean all those, and those alone, who are such to their country. In their prosperity, they shall never hear of me; in their distress, always. In that retreat wherein the remainder of my days shall be spent, I may be of some use to them; since even from thence I may advise, exhort, exhort, and warn them. Bent upon this pursuit only, and having now exchanged the gay statesman for the grave philosopher, he shone forth with distinguished lustre. His conversation took a different turn from what had been usual with him; and, as we are assured by lord ORRERY, who knew him, it united the wisdom of SOCRATES, the dignity and ease of PLINY, and the wit of HORACE.

Yet still amidst his resolutions to turn himself from politics, and to give himself up entirely to the calls of philosophy, he could not resist embarking once more in the debates of his country; and coming back from France, settled at Battersea, an old seat which was his father's, and had been long in the possession of the family. He supposed he saw an impending calamity, and though it was not in his power to remove, he thought it his duty to retard its fall. To redeem or save the nation from perdition, he thought impossible, since national corruptions were to be purged by national calamities; but he was resolved to lend his feeble assistance, to stem the torrent that was pouring in. With this spirit he wrote that excellent piece, which is intituled, The Idea of a Patriot King; in which he describes a monarch uninfluenced by party, leaning to the suggestions neither of whigs nor tories, but equally the friend and the father of all. Some time after, in the year 1749, after the conclusion of the peace, two years before the measures taken by the administration, seemed not to have been repugnant to his notions of political prudence for that juncture; in that year he he wrote his last production, containing reflections on the then state of the nation, principally with regard to her taxes and debts, and on the causes and consequences of them. This undertaking was left unfinished, for death snatched the pen from the hand of the writer.

Having passed the latter part of his life in dignity and splendor, his rational faculties improved by reflection, and his ambition kept under by disappointment, his whole aim seemed to have been to leave the stage of life, on which he had acted such various parts, with applause. He had long wished to fetch his last breath at Battersea, the place where he was born; and fortune, that had through life seemed to traverse all his aims, at last indulged him in this. He had long been troubled with a cancer in his cheek, by which excruciating disease, he died on the verge of fourscore years of age. He was consonant with himself to the last, and those principles which he had all along avowed, he confirmed with his dying breath, having given orders that none of the clergy should be permitted to trouble him in his latest moments.

His body was interred in Battersea church, with those of his ancestors; and a marble monument erected to his memory, with the following excellent inscription.

In the Reign of Queen Anne

Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and Viscount Bolingbroke.

LORD BOLINGBROKE. 109

George II.

Something more and better.

His Attachment to Queen Anne Exposed him to a long and severe Persecution ;

He bore it with Firmness of Mind.
He passed the latter Part of his Time at home,
The Enemy of no national Party ;
The Friend of no Faction.

Distinguished under the Cloud of Proscription,

Which had not been entirely taken off,
By Zeal to maintain the Liberty,
And to restore the ancient Prosperity of Great-Britain.

He died the 12th of December 1751,
Aged 79.

In this manner lived and died lord BOLINGBROKE ; ever active, never depressed, ever pursuing fortune, and as constantly disappointed by her. In whatever light we view his character, we shall find him an object rather pro-

perer for our wonder, than our imitation; more to be feared than esteemed, and gaining our admiration without our love. His ambition ever aimed at the summit of power, and nothing seemed capable of satisfying his immoderate desires, but the liberty of governing all things without a rival. With as much ambition, as great abilities, and more acquired knowledge than CÆSAR, he wanted only his courage to be as successful; but the schemes his head dictated, his heart often refused to execute; and he lost the ability to perform, just when the great occasion called for all his efforts to engage.

The same ambition that prompted him to be a politician, actuated him as a philosopher. His aims were equally great and extensive in both capacities: unwilling to submit to any power in the one, or any authority in the other, he entered the fields of science, with a thorough contempt of all that had been established before him, and seemed willing to think every thing wrong, that he might shew his faculty in the reformation. It might have been better for his quiet, as a man, if he had been content to act a subordinate character in the state; and it had certainly been better for his memory as a writer, if he had aimed at doing less than he attempted. Wisdom, in morals, like every other art or science, is an accumulation that numbers have contributed to increase; and it is not for one single man to pretend, that he can add more to the heap, than the thousands that have gone before him. Such innovators more frequently quently retard, than promote knowledge; their maxims are more agreeable to the reader, by having the gloss of novelty to recommend them, than those which are trite, only because they are true. Such men are therefore followed at first with avidity, nor is it till some time that their disciples begin to find their error. They often, though too late, perceive, that they have been following a speculative enquiry, while they have been leaving a practical good; and while they have been practising the arts of doubting, they have been losing all firmness of principle, which might tend to establish the rectitude of their private conduct. As a moralist, therefore, lord BOLINGBROKE, by having endeavoured at too much, seems to have done nothing: but as a political writer, few can equal, and

none can exceed him. As he was a practical politician, his writings are less filled with those speculative illusions, which are the result of solitude and seclusion. He wrote them with a certainty of their being opposed, sifted, examined, and reviled; he therefore took care to build them up of such materials, as could not be easily overthrown: they prevailed at the times in which they were written, they still continue to the admiration of the present age, and will probably last for ever.

SIR,

TO CORRUPT and to DIVIDE are the trite and wicked expedients, by which some ministers in all ages have affected to govern; but especially such as have been least capable of exerting the true arts of government. There is however a difference to be made between these two expedients, to the advantage of the latter, and by consequence between the characters of those, who put them in practice.

B EVERY

EVERY busy, ambitious child of fortune, who hath himself a corrupt heart, and becomes master of a large purse, hath all that is necessary to employ the expedient of CORRUPTION with success. A bribe, in the hand of the most blundering coxcomb, that ever disgraced honour and wealth and power, will prevail as much as in the hand of a man of sense, and go farther too, if it weigh more. An intriguing chamber-maid may slip a bank-note into a griping paw, as well as the most subtle dæmon of hell. HORACE may govern as triumphantly by this expedient as the great knight, his brother, and the great knight as BURLEIGH himself.

BUT every character cannot attempt the other expedient of dividing, or keeping up divisions with equal success. There is, indeed, no occasion for any extraordinary genius to divide; and true wisdom despises the infamous task. But there is need of that left-handed wisdom, call'd cunning, and of those habits in business, call'd experience. He, that is corrupted, co-operates with him that corrupts. He runs into his arms at the first beckon; or, in order sometimes to raise the price, he meets him but half way. On the other hand, to divide, or to maintain and renew the division of the parties in a state, a system of seduction and fraud is necessary to be carried on.

The DIVIDED are so far from being accessory to the guilt, that they would not be DIVIDED, if they were not first deceived.

FROM these differences, which I have observed between the two expedients, and the characters and means, proper to put them in practice with success, it may be discover'd perhaps why, upon former occasions, as I shall hereafter shew, the expedient of DIVIDING prosper'd so much better than that of CORRUPTING; and why, upon some later occasions, the expedient of CORRUPTING succeeds so well in those hands, which are not, and, I trust, will not be so lucky in maintaining, or renewing our party-divisions.

MUCH hath been written by you, Mr. D'ANVERS, by your correspondents and others, who have drawn their pens in the cause of truth, virtue, and liberty, against the right reverend, as well as undignify'd, the noble, as well as ignoble assertors of corruption; enough surely to shame those, who have not lost all sense of shame, out of so ignominious a crime; and to make those, who have not lost every other sense, tremble at the consequences of it. We may flatter ourselves that these honest endeavours have had some effect; and have reason to hope that far greater will follow from those illustrious examples of repulses, which have been lately given to the GRAND CORRUPTOR, notwithstanding his frequent and insolent declarations that he could seduce whomsoever he had a mind to gain. These hopes are farther confirm'd to us by repeated declarations of the sense of parliament, and will be turn'd, we doubt not, into certainty, whenever the wisdom of the two houses shall again think it proper to raise new barriers of law against this encroaching vice.

IN the mean time, I think nothing can better answer the design of your papers, nor promote the public good more effectually in the present conjuncture, than to put our countrymen frequently on their guard against the artifice which is clumsily, but industriously employ'd to maintain, and, if it be possible, to create NEW DIVISIONS amongst them. That day, which our fathers wish'd to see and did not see, is now breaking upon us. Shall we suffer this light to be turn'd again into party darkness by the incantations of those, who would not have pass'd for conjurors, even in the days of superstition and ignorance? The nation is not only brought into an uniformity of opinion concerning the present administration, by the length and the righteous conduct of it; but we are grown into an unanimity about principles of government, which the most sanguine could scarce have expected, without extravagance. Certain associations of ideas were made so familiar to us, about half a century ago, and became

in the course of time so habitual, that we should have not been able, even a few years ago, to break them, nor have been easily induced to believe, on the faith of any prediction, that experience and the evidence of facts would, in a few years more, break them for us, destroy all our notions of party, and substitute new ones in their room.

THE power and majesty of the PEOPLE, an ORIGINAL CONTRACT, the authority and independency of PARLIAMENTS, liberty, resistance, exclusion, abdication, deposition; these were ideas associated, at that time, to the idea of a WHIG, and supposed by every Whig to be incommunicable, and inconsistent with the idea of a TORY.

DIVINE, hereditary, indefeasible right, lineal succession, passive-obedience, prerogative, non-resistance, slavery, nay, and sometimes popery too, were associated in many minds to the idea of a TORY, and deem'd incommunicable, and inconsistent, in the same manner, with the idea of a WHIG.

But now that, which neither side would have believed, on the faith of a prediction, is come to pass;

These associations are broken ; these distinct sets of ideas are shuffled out of their order ; new combinations force themselves upon us ; and it would actually be as absurd to impute to the tories the principles, which were laid to their charge formerly, as it would be to ascribe to the projector and his faction the name of whigs, whilst they daily forfeit that character by their actions. The bulk of both parties are really united ; united on principles of liberty, in opposition to an obscure remnant of one party, who disown those principles, and a mercenary detachment from the other, who betray them.

How this change for the better comes to have been wrought in an age, when most things have changed for the worse ; and since it hath been wrought, why the old distinctions are kept up in some measure, will I think be accounted for in treating this subject farther. At present, what shall we say to those, who publicly speak of this national union as impracticable and chimerical ; yet privately act against it, with all their might, as a practicable thing, and a real evil to them ? If it be as compleat and as well cemented, as I imagine it is, and as every honest Briton wishes it may be ; nay, if there is nothing more than a strong tendency on all sides towards it, which no man of the least observation and candour will deny ; it is surely the duty of every one, who who desires the prosperity of his country, to seize the opportunity, to cultivate and improve it. If men are to be known by their works, the works of those, who oppose this union, denote them sufficiently. Wicked and unhappy men! who seek their private safety, in opposing public good. Weak and silly men! who vainly imagine that THEY shall pass for the NATION, and the NATION for a FACTION; that THEY shall be judged in the right, and the WHOLE BODY OF THE PEOPLE in the wrong. On whom would they impose? How long do they imagine that so unequal a contest can last?

THERE is no complaint, which hath been more constantly in the mouths, no grief hath lain more heavily at the hearts of all good men, than those about our national divisions; about the spirit of party, which inspires animosity and breeds rancour; which hath so often destroy'd our inward peace; weaken'd our national strength, and sullied our glory abroad. It is time therefore that all, who desire to be esteem'd good men, and to procure the peace, the strength and the glory of their country by the only means, by which they can be procured effectually, should join their efforts to heal our national divisions, and to change the narrow spirit of party into a diffusive spirit of public benevolence.

8 POLITICAL WORKS.

THAT we may be more encouraged to do so, it will be of use perhaps to consider, in some particulars, what advances are already made towards that national union, without which no national good can be expected in such circumstances as ours.

LET us begin with the present temper of the members of the church of England towards the dissenters. Those laws, by which the latter were debarr'd from serving God after their own way, have not been these many years a terror to them. Those, which were design'd to hinder the propagation of their principles, and those, which shut the door of all public preferment, even to such amongst them as conform'd occasionally, are repeal'd. Far from desiring to impose any new hardships upon them, even those, who have been reputed their enemies, and who have acted as such on several occasions, acknowledge their error. Experience hath removed prejudice. They see that indulgence hath done what severity never could; and from the frankness of these, if I was a dissenter, I should sooner entertain hopes of future favour, than from the double dealing of those, who lean on the dissenters, when they are out of power, and who esteem them a load upon them, when they are in it. We are now in the true and only road, which can possibly lead to a perfect reconciliation among protestants ; to the abolition of all their differences ; or to terms of difference so little essential, as to deserve none of distinction. These happy ends must be obtain'd by mutual good will. They never can be obtain'd by force. It is true, indeed, that force, which is the effect of a majority and superior power, may support a rivalship and erect even counter-establishments. But then, by the same means, our antient disputes will be revived ; the church will be thought really in danger ; and religious feuds, which have been so long and so beneficially kept down, will once more disturb the peace of the state. It is a certain truth, that our religious and civil contests have mutually, and almost alternately, raised and fomented each other. Churchmen and dissenters have sometimes differ'd, and sometimes thought, or been made to think, that they differ'd, at least, as much about civil as religious matters. There can be therefore no way so effectually to compose their differences on the latter, as to improve the growing union between them on the former. " Idem sentire de republica, to think alike about political " affairs," hath been esteem'd necessary to constitute and maintain private friendships. It is obviously more essential in public friendships. Bodies of men in the same society can never unite, unless they unite on this principle ; and if they once unite on this principle, principle, they will unite on all others, or they will readily and chearfully make one another easy about them. Let me speak plainly. It becomes a man to do so, who means honestly. In our political divisions of whig and tory, the dissenters have adhered to the former, and they want no apology for doing so. They join'd themselves to those, with whom they agreed, and stood in opposition to those, with whom they differ'd in principles of government. There could be no objection brought against them, on this account. They certainly did not follow power. They did not act like a sect or a faction, who had, and pursued an interest distinct from the interest of the whole. Their non-conformity hath nothing to do here. They concur'd with conformists; and if they had been conformists themselves, as they were dissenters, they would have acted in the same manner. But if this division of parties, on the same principles, subsists no longer; if there be in truth neither a tory, nor a whig, as I have said above, but a court and a country party in being; if the political principles, which the dissenters have formerly avow'd, are manifestly pursued on one side; and those, which they have opposed, or others equivalent to them in their effects, are pursued on the other; can the dissenters hesitate about the option they are to make? I am persuaded they cannot.

I know that several amongst them do not. What might be, and certainly would be said, if they made their option to stand by the minister, I will not so much as suggest. What must be the consequence of their standing by the nation, in opposition to him, (for between these two powers the present contest lies) it is easy to tell, and impossible to deny. They will prove, in this case, to the whole world, that the spirit of liberty animates, and conscience alone determines their conduct. They, who could never brook a regal, will have the merit of saving their country from the danger of a ministerial tyranny; and their country will owe them all the acknowledgments, which are due from good and grateful citizens of the same commonwealth.

As to the other great and national division of whig and tory; he, who recollects what hath pass'd in parliament, and observes what passes out of it, can differ very little in his opinion from what hath been said concerning it. The principal articles of your civil faith, publish'd some time ago, (or, to speak more properly, the civil faith of the old whigs) are assented and consented to by the country party; and I say, upon good authority, that if this creed was made a test of political orthodoxy, there would appear at this time but very few hereticks amongst us. How different the case is, on the other side, will appear not only from the actions, but from the principles of the court party, as we find them avowed in their writings; principles more dangerous to liberty, though not so directly, nor so openly levell'd against it, than even any of those, bad as they were, which some of these men value themselves for having formerly opposed.

IN short, the revolution is look'd upon by all sides as a new æra; but the settlement then made is look'd upon by the whole country party as a new Magna Charta, from whence new interests, new principles of government, new measures of submission, and new obligations arise. From thence we must date both king and people. His majesty derives his title from acts, made in consequence of it. We likewise derive, not our privileges (for they were always ours) but a more full and explicit declaration, and a more solemn establishment of them from the same period. On this foundation all the reasonable, independent whigs and tories unite. They could unite on this alone; for the whigs have always profess'd the principles, which paved the way for the revolution; and whatever the tories may have profess'd, they acted upon the same principles, or they acted upon none, which would be too absurd to assert, when they brought about that great event, in concert with the test of the nation, as I shall some time or other prove.

To this Magna Charta, and these principles, let us adhere inviolably, in opposition to the two extremes mention'd by me at the beginning of this letter, viz. to those, who disown them, and to those, who betray them. Let neither the polemical skill of LESLY, nor the antique erudition of BEDFORD, persuade us to put on again those old shackles of false law, false reason, and false gospel, which were forged before the revolution, and broken to pieces by it. As little let us suffer the arch slyness of G—ON, the dogmatical dryness of H——E, or the fouling prostitution of SH——K to slip new shackles on us, which are inconsistent with the constituent principles of our establishment. Let us maintain and improve the national union, so happily begun, and bless God for disposing the temper of the nation almost universally to it. Such a coalition hath been long wanted in this kingdom, and never more than at this important crisis; for on this it will depend whether they, who not only oppose the progress of that growing corruption, which had well nigh overspread the land, but endeavour to extirpate it by the roots, shall prevail; or they, who nourish and propagate it, who eat themselves, and tempt others to eat the baneful fruit it bears. On this it will depend whether they shall prevail, who constantly insist against the continuance of a standing army in time of peace, agreeably to the principles of our constitution, or they, who plead for it, and endeavour to make it a necessary part of that constitution, though incompatible with public liberty. On this it will depend whether they shall prevail, who endeavour to conceal the frauds, which are practised, and to screen the fraudulent, at the risque of ruining credit, and destroying trade, as well as to monopolize in the hands of a few the whole wealth of the nation; or they, who do their utmost to bring the former to light, and the latter to punishment at a time, when glaring fraud, or very strong symptoms of fraud, appear in so many parts of public management, from some of the greatest companies down to the turnpike at Hyde-park corner. On this it will depend whether they shall prevail, who desire that Great Britain should maintain such a dignity and prudent reserve in the broils of Europe, as become her situation; suit her interest, and alone can enable her to cast the balance; or they, who are eager, on every occasion, to prostitute her dignity, to pawn her purse, and to sacrifice her commerce, by intangling her not only too much with the other great powers of Europe, from whom she may sometimes want reciprocal engage-engagements, but even with those diminutive powers, from whom it would be ridiculous to expect any.

I am, Sir, your's, &c.

LETTER II.

S I R,

WHILST I was writing my last letter to you, it came into my thoughts that nothing would illustrate the subject better, nor enforce more strongly the exhortation to an union of parties, in support of that constitution, on the terms of which alone all right to govern us, and all our obligations to obey is now founded, than an enquiry into the rise and progress of our late parties; or a short history of torism and whigism from their cradle to their grave; with an introductory account of their genealogy and descent.

YOUR papers have been from the first consecrated to the information of the people of Britain; and I think they may boast very justly a merit singular enough; that of never speaking to the passions, without appealing to the reason of mankind. It is fit they should keep up this character, in the strictest manner, whilst they are employ'd on the most important subject, and published at the most important crisis. I shall therefore execute my design with sincerity and impartiality. I shall certainly not flatter, and I do not mean to offend. Reasonable men and lovers of truth, in whatever party they have been engaged, will not be offended at writings, which claim no regard but on this account, that they are founded in reason and truth, and speak with boldness what reason and truth conspire to dictate. As for the drummers and trumpeters of faction, who are hired to drown the voice of both in one perpetual din of clamour, and would endeavour to drown, in the same manner, even the dying groans of their country, if she was already brought into that extreme condition; they shall not provoke me to break a most contemptuous silence. The subject is too solemn. They may prophane it by writing on it. Far be it from me to become guilty of the same crime, by answering them.

If the enquiry I am going to make into the rise and progress of our late parties should produce in any degree the good, which I intend, it will help to confirm and improve the national union, so happily begun, by taking off some remains of shyness, distrust and prejudice, which may still hang about men, who think alike, and who press on from different quarters to the same common point of view. It will help to unmask unmask more effectually the wicked conduct of those, who labour with all the skill, and, which is much more considerable, with all the authority they possess, to keep up the divisions of parties; that each of these may continue to be, in it's turn, what all of them have been too often and too long, the instruments and the victims of private ambition. It will do something more. A few reflections on the rise and progress of our distemper, and the rise and progress of our cure, will help us of course to make a true judgment on our present state, and will point out to us, better perhaps than any other method, the specific remedies still necessary to preserve our constitution in health and vigour. Having premised this, I come to the point.

QUEEN ELIZABETH design'd, and the nation call'd king JAMES to the throne; tho' the whole Scottish line had been excluded by the will of HENRY the eighth, made indeed under the authority of an act of parliament, and yet little regarded either by the parliament, or the people. As soon as he was on the throne, a flattering act of recognition pass'd; for though all princes are flatter'd on their first accession, yet those princes are sure to be flatter'd most, who deserve panegyric least. In this act the parliament acknowledged, on the knees of their hearts, (such was the cant of the age) the indubitable

table right, by which they declared that the crown descended to him immediately, on the decease of queen ELIZABETH. Of this act, and of the use, which some men, very weakly I think, endeavour'd to make of it, I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. I would only observe here that this is the æra of hereditary right, and of all those exalted notions, concerning the power and prerogative of kings, and the sacredness of their persons. All together they compos'd such a system of absurdity as had never been heard of in this country, till that anointed pedant broach'd them. They have been spoken of pretty much at large in your papers; particularly in some of those, publish'd under the name of OLDCASTLE. To them I refer.

To assert that the extravagant principles of ecclesiastical and civil government, which began to be propagated in this reign, and were carried still higher in the next, gave occasion to those of another kind, or of another extreme, which were taught with success, and gain'd by degrees great vogue in the nation, would be too much. Opinions very different from those, which receive the sanction of a legal establishment in church and state, had crept about obscurely, if not silently, even whilst the government of ELIZABETH lasted. But this I say; that the principles, by which king JAMES and king CHARLES the first govern'd, and the excesses of hierarthical and monarchical power, exercised in consequence of them, gave great advantage to the opposite opinions, and entirely occasion'd the miseries, which follow'd. Phrenzy provoked phrenzy, and two species of madness infected the whole mass of the people. It hath cost us a century to lose our wits, and to recover them again.

IF our grievances under king CHARLES the first had been redress'd by a sober, regular, parliamentary reformation of the state; or, if the civil war happening, a new government had been establish'd on principles of the constitution, not of faction; of liberty, not of licentiousness, as there was on the abdication of king JAMES the second; we may conclude, both from reason and experience, that the absurd and slavish doctrines I have mention'd would have been exploded early. They would have been buried in the recent grave of him, who first devised them; and the memory of him and of them would have stunk together in the nostrils of mankind. But the contrary fell out. The state was subverted, instead of being reform'd; and all the fury of faction and enthusiasm was employ'd to destroy the constitution to the very foundation. A natural consequence follow'd. If the principles of king JAMES's and king CHARLES's reigns had been disgraced by better, they would not have risen again; but they were only kept down for a time by worse; and therefore they rose again at the restoration, and revived with the monarchy. Thus that epidemical taint, with which king JAMES infected the minds of men, continued upon us; and it is scarce hyperbolic to say, that this prince hath been the original cause of a series of misfortunes to this nation, as deplorable as a lasting infection of our air, of our water, or our earth, would have been. The spirit of his reign was maintain'd in that of his son, (for how could it well be otherwise, when the same ministers were continued in power?) and the events of both produced the civil war. The civil war ended in the death of the king, and the exile of his family. The exile of these princes reconciled them to the religion of Rome, and to the politics of foreign nations, in such degrees as their different characters admitted. CHARLES sipp'd a little of the poisonous draught, but enough however to infect his whole conduct. As for JAMES, he drank the chalice off to the lowest and foulest dregs.

sense of a SAMOJEDE, or an HOTTENTOT, and had just before deluged the nation in blood, should come into vogue again at the restoration, will not appear strange to those, who carry themselves back as it were to that point of time. The wounds of the civil war were bleeding, and the resentments of the cavaliers, who came into power at court and in parliament, were at their height. No wonder then if few men had, in such a ferment as this, penetration enough to discern, or candour enough to acknowledge, or courage enough to maintain, that the principles we speak of were truly and primarily the cause of all their misfortunes. The events, which proved them so, were recent; but for that very reason, because they were recent, it was natural for men, in such a circumstance as this, to make wrong judgments about them. It was natural for the royal party to ascribe all their and their country's misfortunes, without any due distinction, to the principles, on which king CHARLES and even king JAMES had been opposed; and to grow more zealous for those, on which the governments of these two princes had been defended, and for which they had suffer'd. Add to this the national transport, on so great a revolution; the excess of joy, which many felt, and many feign'd; the adulation employ'd by many to acquire new merit, and by many to atone for past demerit;

and you will find reason to be surpris'd, not that the same principles of government, as had threaten'd our liberties once, and must by necessary consequence do so again, were establish'd; but that our liberties were not immediately, and at once given up. That they were saved, we owe, not to parliament, no not to the convention parliament, who brought the king home; but to those great and good men, CLARENDON and SOUTHAMPTON. Far from taking advantage of the heat and fervor of the times, to manage parliaments into scandalous jobs, and fatal compliances with the crown; to their immortal honour, (with gratitude and reverence to their memories be it spoken) they broke the army, stinted the revenue, and threw their master on the affections of his people. But I return.

BESIDES these reasons, drawn from the passions of men, others of a more sober kind may be given, to account for the making a settlement at the restoration upon principles too near a-kin to those, which had prevail'd before the war, and which had in truth caused it. Certain it is, that although the non-conformists were stunn'd by the blow they had just received, and though their violence was restrain'd by the force of the present conjuncture, yet they still existed. Symptoms of this appear'd, even whilst the government was settling, and continued to appear appear long after it was settled. Now, every symptom of this kind renew'd the dread of relapsing into those miseries, from which the nation had so lately recover'd itself; and this dread had the natural effect of all extreme fears. It hurried men into every principle, as well as measure, which seem'd the most opposite to those of the persons fear'd, and the most likely, though at any other risque, to defeat their designs, and to obviate the present danger, real or imaginary. May we not fairly conjecture, for it is but conjecture, something more? In such a temper of mind, and such a situation of circumstances, might not even those, who saw how groundless and dangerous such extravagant notions about the right, power and prerogative of kings were, imagine however that it was a part of prudence to give way to them, and to countenance them, in the present conjuncture; to suffer the opinions of the nation to be bent too far on one side, as they had been bent too far on the other; not that they might remain crooked, but that they might become strait?

THE same spirit and much the same reasons as determined our settlement, at the restoration, upon such high principles of monarchy, prevail'd relatively to our religious differences, and the settlement of the church. I shall speak of it with that freedom, which a man may take, who is con-

I SAY then very frankly, that the church and the king having been join'd in all the late contests both by those, who attack'd them, and those, who defended them, ecclesiastical interests, resentments, and animosities came in to the aid of secular, in making the new settlement. Great lenity was shewn at the restoration, in looking backwards; unexampled and unimitated mercy to particular men, which deserved no doubt much applause. This conduct would have gone far towards restoring the nation to its primitive temper and integrity, to its old good manners, its old good humour, and its old good nature, (expressions of my lord chancellor CLARENDON, which I could never read without being moved and soften'd) if great severity had not been exercised, immediately after, in looking forwards, and great rigour used to large bodies of men, which certainly deserves censure, as neither just, nor politic. I say, not just; because there is, after all, a real and wide difference between moral and party justice. The one is founded in reason; the other takes its colour from the passions of men, and is but another name for injustice. Moral justice carries punishment as far as reparation and necessary terror require; no farther. Party

justice carries it to the full extent of our power, and even to the gorging and satiating of our revenge; from whence it follows that injustice and violence, once begun, must become perpetual in the successive revolutions of parties, as long as these parties exist. I say, not politic; because it contradicted the other measures, taken for quieting the minds of men. It alarm'd all the sects anew; confirm'd the implacability, and whetted the rancour of some; disappointed and damp'd a spirit of reconciliation in others; united them in a common hatred to the church; and rouzed in the church a spirit of intolerance and persecution. This measure was the more imprudent, because the opportunity seem'd fair to take advantage of the resentments of the presbyterians against the other sectaries, and to draw them, without persecuting the others, by the cords of love into the pale of the church, instead of driving them back by severe usage into their ancient confederacies. But when resentments of the sort we now mention were let loose, to aggravate those of the other sort, there was no room to be surpris'd at the violences, which follow'd; and they, who had acted greater, could not complain of these, great as they were, with any very good grace.

IF we may believe * one, who certainly was not partial against these sects, both presbyterians and independents had carried the principles of rigour, in the point of conscience, much higher, and acted more implacably upon it, than ever the church of England hath done, in its angriest fits. The securing themselves therefore against those, who had ruin'd them and the constitution once already, was a plausible reason for the church party to give, and I doubt not the true and sole motive of many for exercising, and persisting in the exercise of great severity. General, prudential arguments might, and there is reason to believe they did, weigh with particular men; but they could have little force, at such a time, on numbers. As little could some other considerations have then, whatever they have now. The promises at Breda, for instance, and the terms of the declaration sent from thence could not be urged with force to a parliament, who had no mind, and was strictly under no obligation, to make good such promises as the king had made, beyond his power of promising, if taken absolutely; or from which, if taken conditionally, he was discharged, on the refusal of parliament to confirm them. Thus again, the merit pleaded by the presbyterians, on account of the share they had in the restoration, which was very real and very considerable, could avail however but little. That they went along with the national torrent, in restoring the constitution of church and state, could not be denied. But then it was remember'd too that these fruits of repentance came late; not till they had been oppress'd by another sect, who turn'd upon them, wrested the power out of their hands, and made them feel, what they had made others feel, the tyranny of a party.

SUCH reasons and motives, as I have mention'd, prevail'd; and worse than these would have been sufficient, when the passions of men ran so high, to lay the dissenters, without any distinction, under extreme hardships. They seem'd to be the principal object of the fears and jealousies of parliament. Addresses were continually made, and the edge of the law continually whetted against them, from 1660 to 1669, when the law for suppressing conventicles, and the last of these penal statutes pass'd, as I remember. Experience will justify me, for saying that this long and extreme rigour was unwise, as well as unjust. It appears, indeed, from the memorials of those times, that they, who suffer'd, had given abundant provocation, though not sufficient excuse, to the the rigour, under which they suffer'd. Some former hardships, which the dissenters had endured from the church, made them more violent against it, when they got possession of an usurp'd power. Just so the violence, which they exercised at that time, stimulated the severity they felt in their turn, when the legal constitution of the church was restored. Notwithstanding all which, I incline, upon very good reasons, to think that this severity was not in the first design of the ministers, nor would have been shewn, if another fatal influence had not prevail'd. The influence I mean is that of popery. It prevail'd from the first moments to the last of the reign of king CHARLES the second. The best ministers were frequently driven off their bias by it. The worst had a sure hold on their master, by complying with it. On the occasion now mention'd, this influence and the artifice of the popish faction work'd very fatally on the passions of parties, and the private interests of individuals; and the ministers, and the church, and the dissenters, were bubbles alike of their common enemy. Barefaced popery could ask no favour, because popery could expect none. Protestant dissenters were therefore to serve as stalking horses, that papists might creep behind them, and have hopes of being, some time or other, admitted with them. The church party was

halloo'd on the dissenters ; whilst the dissenters were encouraged to unite and hold out ; whilst they were flatter'd with an high opinion of their own strength, and the king's favour ; and whilst some leading men amongst them, who thought it better to be at the head of a sect, than at the tail of an establishment, were perhaps encouraged, and confirm'd in that thought, by the private application of the court.

THESE arts, these wicked arts (for such they were) prevail'd ; and though the 2000 ministers, who went out of their churches on one day, were far from being all of the same mind, or having one positive, consistent scheme ; though many of them must have lost their benefices, even if they had comply'd with the act of uniformity, because they were intruders, and in actual possession of benefices legally belonging to others ; yet, by uniting in the point of non-conformity, they appear'd as one body, and in some sense they were so. Several of them were popular for certain modes of devotion, suited to the humour of the times ; and several were men eminent for true learning and unaffected piety. They increased the zeal of their flocks, and created compassion in others. Here the court began to reap the fruits of their management, in the struggle for a toleration. I use the word, though I know it may be simply cavill'd at. The first step made was an application to the king, who declared himself ready and willing to dispense, in their favour, with several things in the act of uniformity; and thus the dissenters were made, by the severity of the parliament and the intrigues of the court, the instruments of introducing a dispensing power. Such attempts were made more than once: but happily fail'd, as often as made, through the vigorous opposition of parliament; till at last the scene began to open more, and the dissenters to see that they were made the tools of promoting, what they never intended, the advancement of the prerogative above law, and the toleration of popery against it.

To conclude. By such means, as I have described, the constitution of parties after the restoration preserved unhappily too near a resemblance to the constitution of parties, before the war. The prerogative was not, indeed, carried so high, in some instances, as JAMES and CHARLES the first had attempted to carry it. Nay, some supports of it were brought off, and taken away; and others more dangerous, as we have observed, were prevented by the virtue of the men at that time in power. But still the government was establish'd on principles, sufficient to invite a king to exercise arbitrary power, and support him by their consequences in the exercise of it afterwards; so that, in this respect, the seeds of future divisions were sow'd abundantly. The dissenters had, indeed, lost much of their credit and all their power. But still they had numbers, and property, and industry, and compassion for them; so that here was another crop of dissensions planted to nurse up, and to strengthen the other. They did not inflame the contest, which follow'd, into a civil war, as they had help'd to do formerly; but I think that, without them, and the disunion and hatred among protestants, consequent upon them, the zeal against popery could not have run into a kind of factious fury, as we shall be obliged to confess it did. I think that fears of falling once more under presbyterian, or republican power, could not have been wrought up in the manner they were, towards the end of this reign, so as to drown even the fear of popery itself; so as to form a party, in favour of a popish successor; so as to transport both clergy and laity into an avowal of principles, which must have reduced us to be at this time slaves, not freemen, papists, not protestants, if the very men, who had avow'd such principles, had not saved themselves and us, in direct opposition to them. But I am running into the subject of another letter, when this is grown too prolix already.

I am, Sir, your's, &c.

LETTER III.

S I R,

THE sum of what hath been said, concerning the settlement of church and state, and the division of parties, at the restoration, amounts to this; that as the attempts of king JAMES and king CHARLES the first, against the spirit of the constitution, threw the nation into a civil war, and all the miserable consequences, both necessary, and contingent, of that calamity; so the fury, enthusiasm and madness of those factions, which arose during that unnatural ferment, frighten'd the nation back, if not into all, yet more generally perhaps than before, into most of the notions, that were establish'd to justify the excesses of former reigns. Hereditary, indefeasible right, passive obedience, and non-resistance (those corner-stones, which are an improper foundation for any superstructure but that of tyranny) were made, even by parliament, the foundation of the monarchy; and all those, who declined an exact and strict conformity to the whole establishment of the church, even to the most minute parts of it, were deprived of the protection, nay exposed to the prosecution of the state. Thus one part of the nation stood proscribed by the other;

other; the least, indeed, by the greatest; whereas a little before the greatest stood proscribed by the least. Roundhead and cavalier were, in effect, no more. Whig and tory were not yet in being. The only two apparent parties were those of churchmen and dissenters; and religious differences alone, at this time, maintain'd the distinction.

SUCH was the state of party, upon the meeting of the first parliament called by king CHARLES the second, and for some years afterwards, as nearly as I have been able to observe by what I have read in history, and received from tradition. How the notions then in vogue began to change, and this spirit to decline, some time after the restoration; how the zeal of churchmen and dissenters against one another began to soften, and a court and country party to form themselves; how faction mingled itself again in the contest, and renew'd the former resentments and jealousies; how whig and tory arose, the furious offspring of the inauspicious parents roundhead and cavalier; how the proceedings of one party might have thrown us back into a civil war, confusion and anarchy; how the success of the other had like to have entail'd tyranny on the state, and popery in the church; how the revolution did, and could alone, deliver us from the grievances we felt, and from the dangers

we fear'd; how this great event was brought about, by a formal departure of each side from the principles objected to them by the other; how this renewal of our constitution, on the principles of liberty, by the most solemn, deliberate, national act, that ever was made, did not only bind at least every one of those, who concurr'd in any degree to bring it about; (and that description includes almost the whole nation) but how absurd it is for any man, who was born since that æra, or who, being born before it, hath been bound by no particular, legal tie to any other settlement, to be willing to give up the advantages of the present constitution, any more than he would give up the privileges of the great charter, which was made and ratified so many ages ago; all these points are to be now touch'd in that summary manner, which I have prescribed to myself, and which will be sufficient, in so plain a case, where men are to be reminded of what they know already, rather than to be inform'd, and to be confirm'd, not to be convinc'd.

I proceed therefore to observe, that the nation began to be indispos'd to the court, soon after the restoration. The sale of Dunkirk help'd to ruin a great and good minister, though it be still doubtful at least, notwithstanding the clamour rais'd, and the negotiations with D'Estrades so much insisted upon, whether whether he was strictly answerable for this measure. Who knows how soon the re-establishment of the same port and harbour may be laid in form to the charge of those two men, who are strictly and undeniably answerable for it, and who stagger already under the weight of so many other just imputations ?

THE first Dutch war, which was lightly and rashly undertaken, and which ended ignominiously for the nation, augmented the public indisposition. Nay misfortunes, such as the plague and the burning of London, as well as mismanagement, had this effect. But we must place at the head of all a jealousy of popery, which was well founded, and therefore gather'd strength daily. This soon heated the minds of men to such a degree, that it seems almost wonderful the plague was not imputed to the papists, as peremptorily as the fire.

THE death of my lord SOUTHAMPTON, and the disgrace and banishment of my lord CLARENDON, made room for new causes of jealousy and dissatisfaction ; and the effects increased in proportion. These two noble lords had stood in the breach against popery and foreign politics ; and what one of them said of the other, that is SOUTHAMPTON of CLARENDON, may be apply'd with justice to both. They were true protestants, and honest Englishmen. Whilst they were in place, our laws, our religion, and our liberties were in safety. When they were removed, England felt the ill effect of the change; for when they were removed, all these were in danger. How glorious a panegyric is this, in which the unanimous voice of posterity does and must agree! It is preferable surely to all the titles and honours and estates, which those illustrious patriots left behind them; and so I persuade myself it is esteem'd by the young noblemen, who are heirs to their virtues, as well as their fortunes.

KING CHARLES, and more than him the duke and the popish faction were now at liberty to form new schemes; or rather to pursue old ones, with less reserve, against the religion and liberty of England. As soon as the famous cabal had the whole administration of affairs, these designs were push'd almost without any reserve at all. I am not writing the history of this reign; nor have I undertaken any thing more, than to make a few observations on the several turns of parties in it. I need not therefore descend into particular proofs of the designs, which I attribute to the court; nor into a deduction of the measures taken to promote them, and the efforts made to defeat them. That these designs were real, can be doubted of by no man; since without quoting many printed accounts, which are in the hands of every one, or insisting on other proofs, which which have not seen the light, (and such there are) the abbot PRIMI's relations of the secret negotiations between the king and his sister, the duchess of Orleans, publish'd in 1682, as I think, and immediately suppress'd, as well as the history of the jesuit D'ORLEANS, written on memorials furnish'd to him by king JAMES the second, put the whole matter out of dispute, and even beyond the reach of cavil. It is sufficient for my purpose to observe that the tide of party, which had run so strongly for the court, and had been seldom so much as slacken'd hitherto, began now to turn, and to run year after year more strongly the other way.

WHEN this parliament sat down, (for it deserves our particular observation that both houses were full of zeal for the present government, and of resentment against the late usurpations) there was but one party in parliament; and no other party could raise its head in the nation. This might have been the case much longer, probably as long as king CHARLES had set on the throne, if the court had been a little honefter, or a little wiser. No parliament ever did more to gain their prince than this. They seem'd, for several years, to have nothing so much at heart as securing his government, advancing his prerogative, and filling his coffers. The grants they made him were such as pass'd for instances of profusion in those days, when 1,200,000 l. a year for the civil list, the fleet, the guards and garrisons, and all the ordinary expences of the government, was thought an exorbitant sum; how little a figure soever it would make in our times, when two thirds of that sum, at least, are appropriated to the use of the civil list singly. But all this was to no purpose, a foreign interest prevail'd; a cabal govern'd; and sometimes the cabal, and sometimes a prime-minister had more credit with the king, than the whole body of his people. When the parliament saw that they could not gain him over to his own, and to their common interest; nor prevail on him, by connivance, compliance, and other gentle methods; they turn'd themselves to such as were rough, but agreeable to law and the custom of parliament, as well as proportionable to the greatness of the exigency. That they lost their temper, on some particular occasions, must not be denied. They were men, and therefore frail; but their frailties, of this kind, proceeded from their love of their country. They were transported, when they found that their religion and liberty were constantly in danger from the intrigues of a popish faction; and they would have been so transported, no doubt, if liberty alone had been attack'd by a protestant faction. Then it was, that this high-church parliament grew favourable to protestant dissenters, dissenters, and ready to make that just distinction, so long delay'd, between them and popish recusants, that the whole protestant interest might unite in the common cause. Then it was, that this pretogative parliament defied prerogative, in defence of their own privileges, and of the liberties of their country. Then it was, that this passive-obedience and non-resistance parliament went the utmost lengths of resistance, in a parliamentary way; and the necessary consequence of the steps they made, in this way, must have been resistance in another, if the king had not dropt his ministers, retracted his pretensions, redress'd some, and given expectation of redressing other grievances. In fine, this pensioner-parliament, as it hath been stiled, with some corruption in the house, and an army sometimes at the door of it, disbanded the army in England, and protested against the militia, settled in Scotland by act of parliament, and appointed to march for any service, wherein the king's honour, authority and greatness were concern'd, in obedience to the orders of the privy-council. That I may not multiply particular instances, they not only did their utmost to secure their country against immediate danger, but projected to secure it against remote danger, by an exclusion of the duke of YORK from the crown, after they had endeavour'd strenuously, nuously, but in vain, to prevent his entailing popery more easily upon us by his marriage with a popish princess; for he had declared himself a papist with as much affection, as if he expected to grow popular by it; had already begun to approve his zeal, and exercise his talent in conversions, by that of his first wife; and was notoriously the agent of Rome and France, in order to seduce his brother into stronger measures than king CHARLES was willing to take. King CHARLES, to use an expression of the lord HALIFAX of that age, would trot; but his brother would gallop.

WHEN I reflect on the particulars here mention'd, and a great many others, which might be mention'd to the honour of this parliament, I cannot hear it call'd the pensioner-parliament, as it were by way of eminence, without a degree of honest indignation; especially in the age, in which we live, and by some of those, who affect the most to bestow upon it this ignominious appellation. Pensions indeed, to the amount of seven or eight thousand pounds, as I remember, were discover'd to have been given to some members of the house of commons. But then let it be remember'd likewise, that this expedient of corrupting parliaments began under the administration of that boisterous, over-bearing, dangerous minister, CLIFFORD. As long as there remain'd main'd any pretence to say that the court was in the interest of the people, the expedient of bribery was neither wanted, nor practis'd. When the court was evidently in another interest, the necessity and the practice of bribing the representatives of the people commenced. Should a parliament of Britain act in compliance with the court, against the sense and interest of the nation, mankind would be ready to pronounce very justly that such a parliament was under the corrupt influence of the court. But in the case now before us, we have a very comfortable example of a court wicked enough to stand in need of corruption, and to employ it; and of a parliament virtuous enough to resist the force of this expedient; which PHILIP of Macedon boasted that he employ'd to invade the liberties of other countries; and which had been so often employ'd by men of less genius as well as rank, to invade the liberties of their own. All that corruption could do in this parliament, was to maintain the appearance of a court-party, whilst the measures of the court united a country-party, in opposition to them. Neither places, nor pensions could hinder courtiers in this parliament from voting, on many signal occasions, against the court; nor protect either those, who drew the king into ill measures, nor those, who comply'd with him in them. Nay, this pensioner-parliament, parliament, if it must be still call'd so, gave one proof of independency, besides that of contriving a test, in 1675, to purge their members on oath from all suspicion of corrupt influence, which ought to wipe off this stain from the most corrupt. They drove one of their pay-masters out of the court, and impeach'd the other, in the fulness of his power; even at a time, when the king was so weak as to make, or so unhappy as to be forced to make, on account of pensions privately negotiated from France, the cause of the crown and the cause of the minister one, and to blend their interests together.

WHAT I have said to the honour of the long parliament is just; because in fact, the proceedings of that parliament were agreeable to the representation I have given of them. But now, if some severe censor should appear, and insist that the dame was chaste, only because she was not enough tempted; that more pensions would have made more pensioners; that much money and little prerogative is more dangerous to liberty than much prerogative and little money; and that the worst and weakest minister king CHARLES ever had might have been absolute in this very parliament, whose character I defend, if such a minister had been able to insist, with places, pensions and occasional bribes, not a slender majority, which the defection of a few might at any time defeat, but such a bulky majority, as might impose on itself; if any one, I say, should refuse in this manner, and continue to insist that such a minister, with such a purse, would have stood his ground, in the parliament I speak of, with how much contempt and indignation soever he might have been every where treated by the people, I shall not presume to assert the contrary. It might have been so. Our safety was owing as much, perhaps, to the poverty of the court, as to the virtue of the parliament. We might have lost our liberties. But then I would observe, before I conclude, that if this be true, the preservation of our religion and liberty, at that time, was owing to these two circumstances; first that king CHARLES was not so parsimonious, but squander'd on his pleasures what he might have employ'd to corrupt this parliament; secondly, that the ministers, in that reign, fingering no money but the revenue, ordinary and extraordinary, had no opportunity to filch in the pockets of every private man, and to bribe the bubbles very often with their own money; as might be done now, when funding hath been so long in fashion, and the greatest minister hath the means of being the greatest stockjobber; did not the eminent integrity of the minister,

WE have now brought the deduction of parties very near to the æra of whig and tory; into which the court found means to divide the nation, and by this division to acquire in the nation a superiority, which had been attempted ineffectually, even by corruption in parliament. But this I reserve for another letter, and am,

S I R,

THERE is a passage in TULLY so extremely applicable to the mischievous, but transitory prevalence of those principles of government, which king JAMES the first imported into this country, that since it occurs to my memory, I cannot begin this letter better than by quoting it to you, and making a short commentary on it *, “opinionum commenta delet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat. Groundless opinions are destroyed, but rational judgments, or the judgments of nature, are confirm’d by time.” It is BALBUS, who makes this observation very very properly, when he is about to prove the existence of a supreme being. The same observation might have been employ'd as properly, on other occasions, against BALBUS himself; and the truth of it might have been exemplified, by comparing the paradoxes and superstitious opinions of his own sect, as well as the tales of an hippocentaur, or a chimæra, with the eternal truths of genuine theism, and sound philosophy. In short, the application of it might have been justly made then, and may be so now in numberless instances, taken from the most important subjects, on which the thoughts of men are exercised, or in which their interest, as men and members of society, are concern'd.

THE authority of a sect, and much more of a state, is able to inspire, and habit to confirm the most absurd opinions. Passion, or interest, can create zeal. But nothing can give stability and durable uniformity to error. Indolence, or ignorance, may keep it floating, as it were, on the surface of the mind, and sometimes hinder truth from penetrating; or force may maintain it in possession, when the mind assents to it no longer. But such opinions, like human bodies, tend to their dissolution from their birth. They will be soon rejected in theory, where men can think, and in practice, where men can act with freedom. They maintain maintain themselves no longer, than the same means of seduction, which first introduced them, or the same circumstances, which first imposed them, attend and continue to support them. Men are dragg'd into them, and held down in them, by chains of circumstances. Break but these chains, and the mind returns with a kind of intellectual elasticity to its proper object, truth. This natural motion is so strong, that examples might be cited of men, embracing truth in practice, before they were convinced of it in theory. There are cases, where reason, freed from constraint, or roused by necessity, acts in some sort the part of instinct. We are impell'd by one, before we have time to form an opinion. We are often determined by the other against our opinion; that is, before we can be said properly to have changed it. But observe here the perverseness of that rational creature, man. When this happens; when the judgment of nature, for so we may speak after TULLY, hath prevail'd against the habitual prejudice of opinion; instead of acknowledging the victorious truth, which determined him to act; instead of condemning the erroneous opinion, against which he acted, he is too often apt to endeavour, peevishly and pedantically, to reconcile his actions to his error; nay, to persist in renouncing true, and asserting false maxims, whilst whilst he reaps the benefit, and maintains the consequences of the former.

You see whither we are brought by these general reflections. The absurd opinions, (fictæ & vanæ, our Roman orator would have call'd them) about the right, power, and prerogative of kings, were so little able to take a deep root, and to stand the blasts of opposition, that few of those, who drew their swords on the side of king CHARLES the first, were determined to it by them. I assert this fact on co-temporary authority; on the authority even of some, who were themselves engaged in that cause, from the beginning to the end of our civil wars. A more recent tradition assures us, that when the same opinions revived at the restoration, they did not sink deep even then into the minds of men; but floated so superficially there, that the parliament, (the very parliament, who had authorized them, and imposed them, as I observed in the last letter) proceeded a great way, and was ready to have proceeded farther, in direct opposition to them. A tradition still more recent will inform us, and that is to be the subject of this letter, that when these opinions revived again, at the latter end of the same reign, with an appearance of greater strength, and of a more national concurrence than ever, they revived but to be exploded more effectually than ever. King CHARLES made use of them to check the ferment raised against his government; but did not seem to expect that they would subsist long in force. His wiser brother depended much on them; but his dependence was vain. They were, at that time, wearing out apace; and they wore out the faster, by the extravagant use which was made of them. They were in the mouths of many, but in the hearts of few; for almost all those, who had them in their mouths, acted against them. Thus were these wicked and ridiculous principles of government twice revived, and twice destroy'd again, in less than thirty years from the restoration.

 “ ——— ter pereat!”

THE second revival of these principles, for enough hath been said of the first, happen'd soon after the dissolution of the long parliament; and there, I think, we must place the birth of whig and tory, though these parties did not grow up into full maturity, nor receive their names, till about two years afterwards. The dissolution of this parliament was desired by men of very different complexions; by some, with factious views; by others, on this honest and true maxim, that a standing parliament, or the same parliament long continued, changes the very nature of the constitution in the the fundamental article, on which the preservation of our whole liberty depends. But whatever motives others might have to desire this dissolution, the motives, which prevail'd on the king, were probably these. This parliament not only grew more reserved in their grants of money, and stiff and inflexible in other matters, but seem'd to have lost that personal regard, which they had hitherto preserved for him. They brought their attacks home to his family; nay, to himself, in the heats, which the discovery and prosecution of the popish plot occasion'd. That on the queen provoked him. That on his brother embarrass'd him. But that, which provoked and embarrass'd him both, was the prosecution of the earl of DANBY, in the manner in which it was carried on. I will not descend into the particulars of an affair, at this time so well understood. This minister was turn'd out, and might have been punish'd, in another manner, and much more severely than I presume any one, who knows the anecdotes of that age, thinks that he deserved to be. But the intention of this attack, according to RAPIN, was to shew that the king, as well as his brother, was at the head of a conspiracy to destroy the government, and the protestant religion. This is a very bold assertion, and such a one as I do not pretend to warrant. But thus much is certain; that if the earl of DANBY's impeachment had been tried, he must have justified himself by shewing, what every one knew to be true, that the secret negotiations with France, and particularly that for money, were the king's negotiations, not his.

Now, whether the king hoped, by dissolving the parliament, to stop this prosecution; or to soften that of the popish plot; or to defeat the project of excluding the duke of YORK; his hopes were all disappointed. The following parliaments trod in the steps of this. How, indeed, could they do otherwise in those days, when the temper of the people determined the character of the parliament; when an influence on elections, by prerogative, was long since over, and private, indirect means of gaining another more illegal influence were not yet found, or the necessary supports of such means were not yet acquired; when any man, who had desired people, who knew neither his fortune, his character, nor even his person, to chuse him their representative in parliament, (that is, to appoint him their trustee) would have been look'd upon and treated as a madman; in short, when a parliament, acting against the declared sense of the nation, would have appear'd as surprising a phænomenon in the moral world, as a retrograde motion of the sun, or any other signal deviation of things from their ordinary course, in the natural world? THERE.

THERE was indeed one point, which this parliament had taken extremely to heart, and which was no longer open to the parliaments, that follow'd, I mean the conduct of the king in foreign affairs, during the war between France, and Holland, and her allies, which ended by the treaty of Nimguen. That war was not made in remote countries. It was made at our door. The motives to it, on the part of the aggressor, were neither injuries received, nor rights invaded; but a spirit of conquest, and bare-faced usurpation. The interest we had in it was not such as depended on a long chain of contingencies, and required much subtlety to find out, but plain and immediate. The security and, at one time, the very existence of the Dutch commonwealth depended on the event of it. No wonder then, if the conduct of the king, who join'd openly with France at first, and served her privately to better purpose at last, furnish'd ample matter to the public discontent, and help'd to increase the ill humours of succeeding parliaments on two other points, which were still open, and continued to draw their whole attention as long as king CHARLES suffer'd any to sit, during the rest of his reign.

THESE two points were the prosecution of persons involved in the popish plot, and the exclusion of the duke of YORK. The first of these had prepared mankind for the second. The truth is, that if nothing, which affected the duke, had been produced; besides COLEMAN's letters, these proofs of his endeavours to subvert the religion and liberty of the people he pretended to govern, join'd to so many others of public notoriety, which shew'd the whole bent of his soul, and the whole scheme of his policy, would have afforded reason more than sufficient for sacrificing the interest, or even the right (if you will call it so) of one man to the preservation of three kingdoms. I know how partial we are in the judgments we make, concerning ourselves, and our own interests. I know that this partiality is the immediate effect of self-love, the strongest spring in the human, nay in the whole animal system; and yet I cannot help being surpris'd that a man should expect to be trusted with a crown, because he is born a prince, in a country where he could not be trusted by law, and ought not to be trusted in reason, with a constable's staff, if he was born a private person. Let me add, that such an expectation must be deem'd more unreasonable in a descendant of HENRY the fourth of France, if possible, than in any other man. The hereditary title of the house of Bourbon, on the extinction of that of Valois, was certainly as clear, and much better establish'd by the laws and usages of France, than the hereditary right of any prince of the house of STUART to the crown of England; and yet HENRY the fourth, with all the personal qualifications, which could recommend a prince to the esteem and love of his subjects, would never have been received into the throne by the French nation, if he had not been of the religion of that nation. On what foundation then could it be expected that a protestant and a free people should be less animated by religion and liberty both, than their neighbours had been by religion alone; for liberty had nothing to do in that contest? Our fathers were thus animated, at the time I am speaking of. The long parliament projected the exclusion; and if the design had been carried on, in the spirit of a country-party, it would probably have been carried on with a national concurrence, and would consequently have succeeded in effect, though not perhaps at once, nor in the very form at first proposed.

THE violent and sanguinary prosecution of the popish plot was intended, no doubt, to make the success of the exclusion more secure, by raising the passions of men so high, that no expedient but an absolute and immediate exclusion, in the terms of the bill, should be thought sufficient. I cannot help saying, on this occasion, that I wish this laudable and just design had not been pursued, sued, by wading through the blood of so many men; enemies to our religion and liberty, indeed; but convicted, for the most part, on evidence, which could hardly have pass'd, at any other time. I wish we had done nothing, which might be interpreted to the disrepute of our own religion, whilst we attempted to proscribe theirs. In fine, I wish, for the honour of my country, that the prosecutions, on account of this plot, and much more on account of another, which was set up as a kind of retaliation for this, and which caused some of the noblest, as well as some of the meanest blood in the nation to be spilt, could be erased out of the records of history. But there is still a farther reason to wish that greater temper had been join'd, at this time, to the same zeal for religion and liberty. Men were made to believe that the king, who had yielded on so many other occasions, would yield on this; that he, who had given up so many ministers, would give up his brother at last; and that if the parliament would accept nothing less than the exclusion, in their own way, it would be extorted from him. Now in this they were fatally deceived; and I must continue to suspect, till I meet with better reasons than I have yet found to the contrary, that they were so deceived by the intrigues of two very opposite cabals; by the duke of YORK's, who were averse to all exclusions, whether absolute,

absolute, or limited, but most to the last; and by the duke of MONMOUTH's, who could not find their account in any but an absolute exclusion; nor in this neither, unless the bill pass'd without any mention of the duke's daughters, as next in succession; to which, as bishop BURNET tells us, the prince of ORANGE was willing to comply, on the faith of assurances he had received from hence; a fact, which the bishop might know, and we may therefore take on his word, as extraordinary as it seems. I would only observe that king WILLIAM, then prince of ORANGE, could have no reason for consenting that his wife's pretensions to the crown should not be confirm'd by an act, which excluded her father, except one; and that was the necessity, real, or apparent, of uniting different private interests in the public measure of excluding the duke of YORK. Now, if this was his reason, the same reason proves, what shall be farther confirm'd in the next letter, that a spirit of faction ran through the proceedings of those, who promoted the bill of exclusion; and when faction was oppos'd to faction, there is no room to wonder, if that of the court prevail'd. The king, who had not used to shew firmness, on other occasions, was firm on this; and the consequence of pushing the exclusion, in this manner, was giving him an opportunity of breaking the country party; of dividing the nation into whig and tory ; of governing himself, without parliaments ; and of leaving the throne open to his brother, not only without limitations, or conditions, but with a more absolute power establish'd, than any prince of his family had enjoy'd.

As soon as the court had got, by management, a plausible pretence of objecting a spirit of faction to those in the opposition, the strength of the opposition was broken, because the national union was dissolved. A country party must be authorized by the voice of the country. It must be form'd on principles of common interest. It cannot be united and maintain'd on the particular prejudices, any more than it can, or ought to be, directed to the particular interest of any set of men whatsoever. A party, thus constituted, is improperly call'd a party. It is the nation, speaking and acting in the discourse and conduct of particular men. It will prevail in all struggles, sooner or later, as long as our constitution subsists ; and nothing is more easy to demonstrate than this ; that whenever such a party finds it difficult to prevail, our constitution is in danger ; and when they find it impossible, our constitution must, in fact, be alter'd. On the other hand, whenever the prejudices and interests of particular sets of men prevail, the essence of a country party is annihilated, and the very appearance of it will soon be lost. Every man will resort in this case to that standard, under which he hath been marshal'd in former divisions; to which his inclinations lead him; or which, though he does not entirely approve, yet disapproves the least.

SUCH a dissolution of a country party was brought about at the period, to which we are now come in our deduction of parties, by the passions, the public pique, and private interest of particular men, and by the wily intrigues of the court. The dissolution of this party, and the new division of the nation into whig and tory, brought us into extreme danger. This extreme danger reunited the nation again, and a coalition of parties saved the whole. Such an experience might have shew'd them, that how opposite soever their professions were, yet they really differ'd more on negative than on positive principles; that they saw one another in a false light, for the most part, and fought with phantoms, conjured up to maintain their division, rather than with real beings. Experience had not this happy effect soon. The swell of the sea continued, long after the storm was over; and we have seen these parties kick and cuff like drunken men, when they were both of the same side. Let us hope that this scene of tragical folly is over, to the disappointment of those, who are conscious of past iniquity, or who meditate future mischief. There are no others, who wish and endeavour to prolong it.

I am, Sir, &c.

S I R,

NOTHING is more useful, nothing more necessary in the conduct of public affairs, than a just discernment of spirits. I mean here not only that natural private sagacity, which is conversant about individuals, and enables some men to pry, as it were, into the heads and hearts of others, and to discover with them those latent principles, which constitute their true characters, and are often disguised in outward action; but I mean principally that acquired, public, political sagacity, which is of the same kind, tho' I think not altogether the same thing, as the former; which flows from nature too, but requires more to be assisted by experience, and form'd by art. This is that superior talent of ministers of state, which is so rarely found in those of other countries, and which abounds so happily at present in those of Great-Britain. It is by this, that they discover the most secret dispositions of other courts; and discovering those dispositions, prevent their designs, or never suffer themselves to be surpris'd by them. It is by this, that they watch over the public tranquillity quillity at home; foresee what effect every event, that happens, and much more every step they make themselves, will have on the sentiments and passions of mankind. This part of human wisdom is therefore every where of use; but is of indispensable necessity in free countries, where a greater regard is to be constantly had to the various fluctuations of parties; to the temper, humour, opinion and prejudices of the people. Without such a regard as this, those combinations of peculiar circumstances, which we commonly call conjunctures, can never be improved to the best advantage, by acting in conformity and in proportion to them; and without improving such conjunctures to the best advantage, it is impossible to atchieve any great undertaking; or even to conduct affairs successfully, in their ordinary course.

A WANT of this just discernment of spirits, if I am not extremely mistaken, defeated the designs of those, who prosecuted with so much vigour the popish plot, and the exclusion of the duke of YORK. Several of them were men of very great abilities; and yet we shall have no reason to be surpris'd that they fail'd in this point, if we reflect how unfit even the greatest genius is to discern the spirit of others, when he hath once overheated his own. All men are fallible; but here lies the difference. Some men, such as I have just mention'd, cross'd by difficulties,

press'd by exigencies, transported by their own passions, or by the passions of those, who fight under their banner, may now and then deviate into error, and into error of long and fatal consequence. But there are some men, such as I shall not mention upon this occasion, (because I reserve them for another and a better) who never deviate into the road of good sense; who, cross'd by no difficulties, press'd by no exigencies, meeting scarce opposition enough to excite their industry, and guiding a tame well-tutor'd flock, that follow their bell-weather obstinately, but never tread on his heels; there are men, I say, whose special privilege it is to proceed with all these advantages, deliberately and superciliously, from blunder to blunder, from year to year, in one perpetual maze of confused, incoherent, inconsistent, unmeaning schemes of business.

BUT having nothing to do with the men of this character at present, I return to those of the former class; to the men, who led the whig party, at its first appearance, in the time of king CHARLES the second. The foundation upon which they built all their hopes of success, was this; that they should frighten and force the king into a compliance with them; but they did not enough consider that the methods they took were equally proper to frighten and force a great part of the nation from them, by reason of the particular particular circumstances of that time. They did not enough consider that when they began to put their designs in execution, scarce twenty years had pass'd from the restoration; and that the highest principles, in favour of the church and the monarchy, had prevail'd almost universally, during one half of that time, and very generally, during the other half; that they had the accidental passions of the people for them, but the settled habits of thinking against them; that they were going off from a broad to a narrow bottom; from the nation to a part of the nation; and this at a time when they wanted a more than ordinary concurrence of the whole body. They did not enough consider that they were changing the very nature of their party, and giving an opportunity to the court, which was then become, in the strict sense of the word, a faction, to grow up into a party again, and such a party as would divide, at least, the people with them, upon principles, plausible in those days, and sufficient to raise a spirit, capable to disappoint all their endeavours.

THE same resentments and prejudices, the same jealousies and fears, which burst out with violence, upon many occasions, a few years before, lay still in the hearts of men; latent and quiet, indeed, and wearing out by degrees; but yet easy to be revived, and to be blown up anew. If we compare the conduct duct of the long parliament, in 1674 and 1675; with the attempts, which had been lately made, during the administration of the cabal; with the secret of the second Dutch war, and many other designs and practices of the court, which were then come lately and very authentically to light; with the state of Scotland, which was then subdued under a real tyranny, and with that of Ireland, where, to say no more, the act of settlement was but ill observed; if we make this comparison, it will not yet appear that the proceedings of the house of commons were immoderate, tho' they were warm; nor factious, though they were vigorous; nor that any danger could be then reasonably apprehended from them, except to the enemies of the constitution in church and state; and yet even then the old resentments, prejudices, jealousies, and fears began to revive; and an apprehension of falling back under the influence of presbyterian and republican principles began to shew itself in the house of lords, and in the nation. It is true that this had no immediate consequence; because the popish plot broke out soon afterwards like a mighty flame, in which these little fires, that began to burn anew, were lost. This great event made the church and the dissenters continue to run into one, as they had begun to do before; and the sole division of parties was that of the court and the country, try, as long as this parliament lasted. But still it was evident with how delicate an hand every thing, that related to our former disputes, required to be touch'd. It was evident that the least alarm given to the church, or to those who valued themselves on the principles of loyalty then in fashion, would be sufficient to open those wounds, which were just skin'd over, and to raise two new parties out of the ashes of the old.

THESE parties were not raised, whilst the long parliament sat; because a general opinion prevail'd, and well enough founded on their precedent conduct, that however angry the king might be with the parliament, or the parliament with the king, a few popular steps made on one side, and a little money granted on the other, would soften matters between them, and dispose them to forget all former quarrels. As hot therefore as the parliament grew, and as much as some people might think that they exceeded their bounds, yet still it was difficult to persuade even these people that a parliament, like this, would push things to the last extremity; destroy the constitution they had settled and supported with so much zeal; or draw the sword against a prince, to whom they had borne so much affection. But in the parliaments, which follow'd, the case was not the same, and I will state as shortly as I can, upon authorities, which no man likely likely to contradict me must refuse, what made the difference. These authorities shall be that of BURNET, and that of RAPIN; whom I quote, on this occasion, for the same reason as I would quote my lord CLARENDRON against king CHARLES the first, or LUDLOW for him.

IN the year 1676, before we have grounds sufficient to affirm that the design of (a) excluding the duke of YORK was form'd, but not before we have reason to suspect that it might be in the thoughts of several, those, who stood foremost in the opposition to the court, were very industrious to procure a dissolution of the long parliament; so industrious, that they (b) negotiated the affair with the duke, who had concurr'd in a vote for an address to dissolve it; and they undertook (c) that a new parliament should be more inclinable to grant the papists a toleration, than they would ever find this would prove. The papists were in earnest for this measure; since COLEMAN drew a declaration for justifying it, and since their design in it was to divide the (d) king and his people. It is fair to conclude that the protestants, who had been in it at the time I mention, upon party views, were at least as much so, when their views rose higher. This parliament had push'd a strict and thorough examination into the popish plot, with great sincerity and zeal. Nay, the project of the exclusion had been started, though not prosecuted in the last sessions. May we not take it for granted however that they, who were now resolved to carry the exclusion in a manner, in which they soon attempted to carry it, and who foresaw by consequence the difficulties, that would be opposed to them, and the strong measures they should be obliged to pursue, in order to overcome these difficulties; I say, might not they think this parliament much less proper than any other to engage and persist in such measures? They thought thus, without doubt; and so far they judged better than the king, who came into the dissolution, upon very different motives. But as to the consequence of engaging a new parliament in such strong measures, the event shew'd that the king judged better than they, in the progress of this affair.

THE dissenters, who had been long persecuted by the parliament, and banter'd and abused by the court, were encouraged by the conjuncture to lift up their heads. They took advantage of the horror and indignation, which the discovery of the popish plot, and the use made of this discovery, had raised all over the kingdom. They could not be more zealous in this cause than the members of the establish'd church had shewn themselves to be; but they cried, perhaps, louder for it. In short, whatever their management was, or however they were abetted, certain it is that they were very active, and very successful too, in the elections of the parliament, which follow'd the long parliament, according to RAPIN, who asserts that many of the members, chosen into this house of commons, were presbyterians. He might have said as much, upon just as good grounds, of the two parliaments, which follow'd this, and I shall speak of them indiscriminately. The leaders, who muster'd all their forces, in order to push the bill of exclusion, look'd on this turn in the elections as an advantage to them, and it might not have been a disadvantage, if they and the dissenters had improved it with more moderation. But they were far from doing so, as RAPIN himself seems to own a little unwillingly, when he says, that "complaisance for the presbyterians was carried, perhaps, too far in the bill for the comprehension of protestant dissenters." Bishop BURNET speaks more plainly. He owns "that many began to declare openly in favour of the non-conformists; that upon this the non-conformists behaved themselves very indecently; that they fell severely on the body of the clergy; and that they made the bishops and clergy apprehend that a rebellion, and “ with it the pulling the church to pieces, “ was design’d.” Several other passages of the same strength, and to the same purpose, might be collected from this historian; and he, who reads them, will not be surprized, I think, to find that such proceedings as these, both in parliament and out of it, gave an alarm to the clergy, and set them to make parallels between the late and the present times; and to infuse the fears and the passions, which agitated them, into the nation. The bishop accuses them, indeed, of doing this with much indecency. But they, who are frighten’d out of their wits, will be apt to be indecent; and indecency begets indecency.

AT the same time, that the jealousies of a design to destroy the church prevail’d, others prevail’d likewise of a design to alter the government of the state; of a design not only against the successor, but against the possessor of the crown. “ Many well-meaning men, (says bishop BURNET upon one occasion) “ began to dislike these practices, and to apprehend that a change of government was “ design’d.—The king came to think himself, (says the same author upon another occasion) “ levell’d at chiefly, though for decency’s sake his brother was only named.” RAPIN goes farther; for, speaking of the same time, he uses this remarkable expression; that “ things seem’d to be taking the “ same course as in the year 1640; and there

 “ had no better intentions towards the king “ now then the enemies of king CHARLES
 “ the first had towards him.” But whatever some particular men, who knew themselves irreconcilable with the king as well as the duke, or some others, who had still about them a tang of religious enthusiasm and republican whimsies, might intend; I am far from thinking that the party, who promoted the exclusion, meant to destroy, on the contrary it is plain that they meant to preserve, by that very measure, the constitution in church and state. The reason why I quote these passages, and refer to others of the same kind, is not to shew what was really design’d, but what was apprehended; for as the distinction of whig and tory subsisted long after the real differences were extinguish’d, so were these parties at first divided, not so much by overt-acts committed, as by the apprehensions, which each of them entertain’d of the intentions of the other. When the resolution was once taken of rejecting all limitations, on the belief artfully, and, I think, knavishly propagated, that the king would yield, if the parliament persisted; the necessary consequences of the king’s adhering inflexibly to his brother were those, which follow’d; those fulmina parlamentaria, harsh votes, angry proceedings, addresses that were in truth remonstrances, projects of associations, pretensions.

ensions to a power of dispensing with the execution of laws, (that very prerogative they had so justly refused to the crown) and many others, which I omit. All these would have been blasts of wind, bruta fulmina, no more, if the king had yielded; and that they were push'd in this confidence by the bulk of the party who push'd them, cannot be doubted; since it cannot be doubted, that the bulk of the party depended on the king's yielding almost, perhaps, even to the last. Some few might be willing, nay desirous, that he should not yield, and hope to bring things into a state of confusion; which none but madmen, or those, whom their crimes, or their fortunes render desperate, can ever wish to see. But it would be hard indeed, if parties were to be characterized, not by their common view, or the general tenor of their conduct, but by the private views imputed to some amongst them, or by the particular sallies, into which mistake, surprize, or passion, hath sometimes betray'd the best-intention'd, and even the best-conducted bodies of men. Whig and tory were now form'd into parties; but I think they were not now, nor at any other time, what they believed one another, nor what they have been represented by their enemies, nay by their friends. The whigs were not roundheads, tho' the measures they pursued, being stronger than the temper of the nation would then bear, gave occasion to the suspicions I have mention'd. The tories were not cavaliers, though they took the alarm so sudden and so warm for the church and the king; and tho' they carried the principles in favour of the king, at least, whilst the heat of their contests with the opposite party lasted, higher than they had been ever carried before. The whigs were not dissenters, nor republicans, though they favour'd the former, and though some inconsiderable remains of the latter might find shelter in their party. The tories had no disposition to become slaves, or papists, tho' they abetted the exercise of an exorbitant power by the crown, and tho' they supported the pretensions of a popish successor to it. Thus I think about the parties, which arose in the reign of king CHARLES the second; and as I deliver my thoughts with frankness, I hope they will be received with candour. Some farther and stronger reasons for receiving them so may, perhaps, appear in a subsequent letter.

LETTER VI.

SIR,

IF king CHARLES the second could have been prevail'd upon to sacrifice the chimerical divine right of his brother to the real interest, interest, and right too, of his people; that happy event would have made him ample amends in future ease and quiet, and the nation in future security, for all precedent disorders, dangers and fears of danger. But instead of this, he was every day confirm'd in the resolution of not giving up, directly and in terms, that right to his brother, which he thought reflected strength on his own. The very measures, taken to force him to submit, enabled him to resist. The opposite spirit spent itself in blood and violence. The spirit of him rose visibly in the nation; and he saw very soon the time approach, when he might venture to appeal to his people against his parliament. This time was come, when men were convinced that a country party prevail'd no longer, but that faction had taken its place. Many appearances, which I have not room to enumerate, served to propagate this opinion; particularly the behaviour and almost avow'd pretensions of the duke of MONMOUTH, which were carried on even in defiance of the solemn declaration made by the king, that he had never married the duke's mother.

SOME of the worthiest and warmest men, who were engaged for the exclusion, complain'd themselves, even from the first, of the private interests and factious intrigues, which prevail'd amongst them. "I must confess" (says a very considerable man, who laid down his life for this cause afterwards, and whose original letter is still extant) “ I must “ confess, I do not know three men of a “ mind ; and that a spirit of giddiness reigns “ amongst us, far beyond any I ever observed “ in my life;” and yet he had lived and acted in as factious a time as this nation ever saw.

 He proceeds; “ some look who is fittest to “ succeed. They are for the most part di“ vided between the prince of ORANGE, and “ the duke of MONMOUTH. The first hath “ plainly the most plausible title. I need not “ tell you the reasons against MONMOUTH.
 “ The strongest for him are, that whoever “ is opposed to YORK will have a good party;
 “ and all Scotland, which is every day like to “ be in arms, doth certainly favour him, and “ may probably be of as much importance “ in the troubles, that are now likely to “ fall upon us, as they were in the begin“ ning of the last. Others are only upon “ negatives, &c.”

I COULD easily multiply proofs of this kind, but I think I need not take any pains to shew that there was such a faction form'd at this time; nor to refute WELWOOD, who asserts “ that the duke of MONMOUTH was not “ ambitious to the degree of aspiring to the “ crown, till after his landing in the west.” I will only remark that the efforts of this faction amongst those, who drove on the bill of exclusion, furnish'd another motive to the division and animosity of parties. The Tories, who had divided from the others, on jealousies of designs to change the constitution in church and state, began now to apprehend that the opposite party might succeed in another view, and set up a king of their own nomination. A notion then entertain'd by many, that the worse title a man had, the better king he was likely to make, did not persuade them. They had suffer'd under the tyranny of a party; many of them had been themselves the abettors of a party-administration; and they fear'd with reason a party-king. Thus personal interests were mingled on both sides with public considerations; and the duke of YORK gain'd a great number of adherents, not by affection to him, but by an aversion to MONMOUTH; which increased among the tories, in proportion as the duke's popularity increased among the whigs; not by any favourable disposition in the tories to popery and arbitrary power; but by a dread, as I have observed already, of returning in the least degree under the influence of those principles, and the power of those men, whose yoke had gall'd the necks of many that were still alive and active on the stage of public affairs. "Men grew

 "jealous of the design (says bishop BURNET, speaking of MONMOUTH's popularity) "and "fancy'd here was a new civil war to be "rais'd. Upon this, they join'd with the "duke's party;" meaning the duke of YORK's.

I say nothing of the apprehensions entertain'd on one side, and the expectations entertain'd on the other from Scotland; because though there was, even in the beginning of these struggles, a concert between those, who were oppress'd by the court there, and those, who oppos'd it here, which grew afterwards into a closer correspondence, and became riper for action; yet the seditious spirit, that gave occasion to these apprehensions and expectations, was roused and exasperated by the inhumanity of the duke of LAUDERDALE; who, though a presbyterian himself, was the butcher of that party; push'd the warmest of them into unjustifiable excesses; revived their silly zeal for the covenant; and wrought up their enthusiasm even to assassination and rebellion. Let me only observe that this was plainly the fault of the court, and could not therefore be imputed to the whigs, whatever use some of that party might propose to make of such a disposition. The violence of the conventiclers was sounded high, in order to palliate the severities exercised in the government of that kingdom. But the reasonable men of all parties thought then, as they think now, and always will think, that it is the duty of those, who govern, to discern the spirit of the people; to consider even their passions; to have a regard to their weaknesses; and to shew indulgence to their prejudices; and that that ministers, who punish what they might prevent, are more culpable than those, who offend.

As the two parties were form'd, so was their division maintain'd by mutual jealousies and fears; which are often sufficient to nourish themselves, when they have once taken root in the mind; and which were, at this time, water'd and cultivated with all the factious industry possible. The most improbable reports, the most idle surmises, carried about in whispers, were sufficient (as I might easily shew in various instances) to raise a panic terror in one party or the other. In both, there were but too many persons on the watch, to improve and to propagate these terrors, and by a frequent repetition of such impressions to raise the alarm and hatred of parties to the highest pitch. He, who went about to allay this extravagant ferment, was call'd a trimmer; and he, who was in truth a common friend, was sure of being treated like a common enemy. Some, who voted for the bill of exclusion, were very far from being heartily for it; but I have seen good reasons to believe, and such there are even in our public relations, that some of those, who voted against it, and declared for limitations, concurr'd in the end, tho' they differ'd in the means, with those, who promoted the bill. And yet such men were constantly

mark'd out as favourers of popery and enemies to their country. Thus in the other party, men, who had no other view but that of securing their religion and liberty, and who meant nothing more than to force the court into such compliances, as they judged necessary to establish this security, were stigmatized with the opprobrious names of fanatic and republican. Thus it happen'd in those days; and thus it happens in ours; when any man, who declares against a certain person, against whom the voice of the nation hath already declared, or complains of things, which are so notorious, that no man in the nation can deny them, is sure to be follow'd by the cry of jacobitism, or republicanism. But there is a great difference, God be praised, between the two cases. The present cry, being void of pretence, is therefore without effect. It is heard in few places, and believed only in one. But to return;

WHEN the nation was divided in this manner, the heat of the parties increased as their contest lasted, according to the usual course of things. New engagements were daily taken; new provocations and offences were daily given. Public disputes begot private pique; and private pique supported public disputes with greater rancour and obstinacy. The opposite principles, advanced by the two parties, were carried higher and higher, as they grew more inflamed; and the measures they pursued, in order to get the better each of his adversary, without overmuch regard to any other consequence, become stronger and stronger, and perhaps equally dangerous. The meeting of the parliament at Oxford had a kind of hostile appearance; and as soon as parliaments were laid aside, which happen'd on the sudden and indecent dissolution of this, the appearance grew worse. No security having been obtain'd by parliamentary methods, against the dangers of a popish succession, it is probable that they, who look'd on these dangers as nearest and greatest, began to cast about how they might secure themselves, and their country against them, by methods of another kind; such as extreme necessity, and nothing but extreme necessity can authorize. Such methods were happily pursued and attended with glorious success, a few years afterwards, when this succession had taken place; and, by taking place, had justify'd all that had been said against it, or forboded of it; when this nation was ripe for resistance, and the prince of ORANGE ready and able, from a multitude of fortunate, concurring circumstances, to support so great an enterprize. But the attempts, which were wise at one time, would have been desperate at the other; and the measures, which produced a revolution, lution, in the reign of king JAMES, would have produced, in the reign of king CHARLES, a civil war of uncertain event at the best ; I say of uncertain event at best ; because it seems to me that whoever revolves in his thoughts the state of England and Scotland, as well as the situation of our neighbours on the continent, at that time, must be of opinion that if the quarrel about the exclusion had broke out into a war, the best cause would have been the worst supported. The king, more united than ever with his brother, would have prevail'd. What was projected in 1670, and perhaps more than was then intended, would have been effected ; and the religion and liberty of Great-Britain would have been destroy'd by consequence. We cannot say, and it would be presumption to pretend to guess, how far the heads of party had gone, in Scotland, or in England, into measures for employing force. Perhaps, little more had pass'd, in which they, who became the principal sacrifices, were any way concern'd, than rash discourse about dangerous, but rude, indigested schemes, started by men of wild imaginations, or desperate fortunes, and rather hearken'd to than assented to ; nay, possibly, despised and neglected by them. But the court, who wanted a plot to confirm and increase their party, and to turn the popular tide in their favour, took the first opportunity of having one ;
by

one; which was soon furnish'd to them by the imprudent, but honest zeal of some, and by the villainy as well as madness of others; and they prosecuted it so severely, with the help of * "forward sheriffs, willing juries, bold witnesses, and mercenary judges," that it answer'd all their ends. The design of assassinating the king and the duke was certainly confined to a few desperate villains, but † "too many had heard it from them, who were both so foolish and so wicked, as not to discover them;" and this reflected great prejudice, though I doubt not in many cases very unjustly, against all those, who had acted upon better principles, but yet were involved in these prosecutions.

As this event disarm'd, dispirited and broke one party; so it strengthen'd, animated and united the other. The Tories, who look'd on the dangers they apprehended from the Whigs to be greater and nearer than those, which they had apprehended, as well as the Whigs, before this new division of parties, from a Popish succession, were now confirm'd in their prejudices. Under this persuasion, they ran headlong into all the measures, which were taken for enlarging the king's authority, and securing the crown to the duke of York. The principles of divine hereditary right, of passive-obedience, and non-non-resistance, were revived and propagated with greater zeal than ever. Not only the wild whimsies of enthusiasts, of schoolmen, and philosophers, but the plainest dictates of reason were solemnly condemn'd, in favour of them, by learned and reverend bodies of men; who little thought that in five years time, that is in 1688, they should act conformably to some of the very propositions, which at this time they declared false, seditious and impious.

IN short, the Guelphs and Gibellines were not more animated against each other, at any time, than the tories and whigs at this; and in such a national temper, considerable steps were made, as they well might be, towards the destruction of our constitution. One of those, which RAPIN enumerates, and insists upon very gravely, can scarce be mention'd without smiling. "The king, (says he,) in order to make his people feel the slavery he had newly imposed on them, affected to review his troops; and these troops amounted, by the return of the garrison of Tangier, to 4000 men, effective, and well-arm'd." The whigs, indeed, in those days, were so averse to standing armies, that they thought even those troops, commonly call'd guards, unlawful; and bishop BURNET argues in his reflections on my lord RUSSEL's trial, that "a design to seize on them amounted to no more than a design to seize on a part of the king's army. But it is possible that the tories, who had shew'd their dislike of standing armies sufficiently in the long parliament, might think it however no unreasonable thing, when designs of insurrections, and even of assassinations had come so lately to light, that a number of regular troops, sufficient to defend the person of the king, but not sufficient to oppress the liberties of the people, and five times less than we have since seen kept up, in the midst of the most secure tranquillity, should be wink'd at; till these distempers were entirely over.

ANOTHER step, which the same author mentions, was indeed of the greatest consequence, and laid the ax to the root of all our liberties at once, by giving the crown such an influence over the elections of members to serve in parliament, as could not fail to destroy that independency, by which alone the freedom of our government hath been, and can be supported. I mean the proceedings by quo warranto, and the other methods taken to force, or persuade, the corporations to surrender their old charters, and accept new ones, under such limitations and conditions, as the king thought fit to innovate. These proceedings were violent, the judgments upon them arbitrary, and the other methods employ'd scandalous. But still it was the end, it was the consequence, that alarm'd and terrify'd all those, who had not fold themselves to the court, or who had not lost, in their zeal for party, all regard to their country, much more than the means, that are employ'd upon this occasion. If, instead of garbling corporations by prerogative, the court could have purchased their elections by money, we may reasonably believe that the surer and more silent way would have been taken. But would the alarm have been less among all the friends of liberty? Certainly not. They would have seen that the end was the same, and have disliked these means the more, for being less liable to observation and clamour. A prince, asserting an illegal and dangerous prerogative, and applauded for doing so, and seconded in the attempt by a numerous party in the nation, carried no doubt a very terrible aspect. But still there was room to hope, the violent character of the duke of YORK consider'd, (and that hope was actually entertain'd by many) that the party, who abetted these usurpations of the prerogative, might be soon frighten'd back again from a court to a country interest; in which case, there was room to hope likewise, the milder character and better understanding of the king consider'd, that the evil might be in some degree redress'd, and the consequences of it prevented. It was reasonable for the friends of liberty to expect that men, who were injured, would complain and seek relief, on the first favourable favourable opportunity. But if they had been corrupted, and the practice of selling elections had been once establish'd, I imagine that the friends of liberty would have thought the case more desperate. It is certainly an easier task, and there is somewhat less provoking, as well as less dangerous in it, to struggle even with a great prince, who stands on prerogative, than with a weak, but profligate minister, if he hath the means of corruption in his power, and if the luxury and prostitution of the age have enabled him to bring it into fashion. Nothing surely could provoke men, who had the spirit of liberty in their souls, more than to figure to themselves one of these saucy creatures of fortune, whom she raises in the extravagance of her caprice, dispatching his emissaries, ecclesiastical and secular, like so many evil dæmons, to the north and to the south, to buy the votes of the people with the money of the people, and to chuse a representative body, not of the people, but of the enemy of the people, of himself.

THIS was not the case at the time we are speaking of. It was prerogative, not money, which had like to have destroy'd our liberties then. Government was not then carried on by undertakers, to whom so much power was farm'd out for returns of so much money, and so much money intrusted for returns of so much power. But though the case was not so desperate, yet was it bad enough in all conscience; and among all the excesses, into which the tories ran, in favour of the crown, and in hopes of fixing dominion in their own party, their zeal to support the methods of garbling corporations was, in my opinion, that, which threaten'd public liberty the most. It hath been reproach'd to them by many; but if among those, who reproach'd them, there should be some, who have shared since that time in the more dangerous practice of corrupting corporations; such men must have fronts of brass, and deserve all the indignation, which is due to iniquity, aggravated by impudence. The others abetted, in favour of a prerogative, supposed real by many in those days, and under the pretence at least of law, a power, which gave the crown too much influence in the elections of members of the house of commons; but these men, if there are any such, have been concern'd in a practice, for the sake of their own vile interest, which spreads like a gangrene over the whole body of a nation, and to every branch of government; and which hath never fail'd, in any one instance, where it hath been suffer'd, to become the bane of liberty.

WE have now carried the two parties through that period of time, when the conduct of both was most liable to the objections made to them by their adversaries. The tories acted on the most abject principles of submission to the king; and, on those of hereditary right, were zealous for the succession of a prince, whose bigotry render'd him unfit to rule a protestant and a free people. The whigs maintain'd the power of parliament to limit the succession to the crown, and avow'd the principles of resistance; in which they had law, example and reason for them. But then the fury of faction was for doing that without parliament, which could only legally be done by it; and, in order to this, the principles of resistance were extended too far; and the hottest of the party taking the lead, they acted in an extravagant spirit of licence, rather than a sober spirit of liberty; and the madness of a few, little inferior to that of CROMWELL's enthusiasts, dishonour'd the whole cause for a time. My intention was not to have left them here; but to have carried these observations on so far as to justify, notwithstanding these appearances, what is said at the conclusion of my last letter, concerning the true characters of both parties. But either the abundance of matter hath deceived me, or I have wanted skill and time to abridge it; so that I must defer this part of my task, and crave your indulgence, as well as that of your readers, for my proximity.

LETTER VII.

S I R,

I Advanced, in the first of these essays, something to this effect; that every clumsy, busy, bungling child of fortune, on whom the bestows the means and the opportunity of corrupting, may govern by this infamous expedient; and, having gratified his ambition and avarice, may have a chance to secure himself from punishment, by destroying the liberties of his country. It was advanced likewise, in the same paper, that every character is not equally fit to govern a people, by dividing them; because some cunning, some experience, nay, some skill to form, and some address to conduct a system of fraud, are necessary in this case. I persuade myself that no man, who read that paper, was at a loss to find an instance to confirm the truth of the first of these propositions; and we have now before us another, which may serve to confirm the truth of the second.

THOUGH I do not think the designs of king CHARLES the second either deeply laid, or deeply fix'd in his own mind; yet in general

ral they were founded on bad principles, and directed to bad ends. He desired indeed to be easy, and to make his people so; but then he desired both these on such conditions, as were inconsistent with good government, during the whole course of his reign, and with the security of religion and liberty, during the latter part of it. We have seen how the intemperate conduct of many, and the flagitious designs of some among the whigs, weaken'd their own party, and gave new strength and new provocations to the other. But we have not yet consider'd some other advantages, without which these divisions could neither have been fomented, nor supported as they were. Now these advantages arose chiefly from the character and conduct of the king himself. If king CHARLES had found the nation plunged in corruption; the people chusing their representatives for money, without any other regard; and these representatives of the people, as well as the nobility, reduced by luxury to beg the unhallow'd alms of a court; or to receive, like miserable hirelings, the wages of iniquity from a minister; if he had found the nation, I say, in this condition, (which extravagant supposition one cannot make without horror) he might have dishonour'd her abroad, and impoverish'd and oppress'd her at home, tho' he had been the weakest prince on earth, and his ministers the most odious, and contemptible men, that ever presumed to be ambitious. Our fathers might have fallen into circumstances, which compose the very quintessence of political misery. They might have "sold their birth-right for porridge," which was their own. They might have been bubbled by the foolish, bullied by the fearful, and insulted by those, whom they despised. They would have deserved to be slaves, and they might have been treated as such. When a free people crouch, like camels, to be loaded, the next at hand, no matter who, mounts them, and they soon feel the whip, and the spur of their tyrant; for a tyrant, whether prince, or minister, resembles the devil in many respects; particularly in this. He is often both the tempter and tormentor. He makes the criminal, and he punishes the crime.

BUT this was not the state of the English nation, at the time we speak of. We were not yet corrupted, nor even quite ripe for corruption. Parties there were; and the contests of these parties gave occasion to the rise and growth of factions; some of which ran into the most seditious practices against the government, and others into the vilest submission to it. But still a spirit of liberty remain'd in many, uncorrupted and unextinguish'd; and such as work'd our national deliverance in the days of distress, that soon follow'd. We were free men then, in the proper proper sense, and full extent of the words; because not only the laws which asserted our common rights, were maintain'd and improved, but private independency, which can alone support public liberty, under such a government as ours, was itself supported by some of that antient œconomy and simplicity of manners, that were growing, but not grown, out of fashion. Such a people, as we then were, could neither be bought, nor driven; and I think king CHARLES could not have divided and led them, if he had wanted any of the qualities he possess'd, or had held another conduct than he held. Far from being proud, haughty, or brutal, * “ he had not a grain of pride, or vanity, “ in his whole composition;” but was the most affable, best-bred man alive. He treated his subjects like noblemen, like gentlemen, like freemen; not like vassals, or boors. Whatever notion he had of his hereditary right, he own'd his obligation for the crown he wore to his people, as much as he would have been bound to do, in reason, in justice, in honour, and in prudence, if he had stood at the greatest distance from it, in the course of lineal succession, and had been call'd to it from the low estate, in which he was before, by the free gift and choice of the nation.

His professions were plausible, and his whole behaviour engaging; so that he won upon the hearts, even whilst he lost the good opinion of his subjects, and often balanced their judgment of things, by their personal inclination. These qualities and this part of his conduct went a great way to give him credit with his people, and an hold on their affections. But this was not all. He observed their temper, and he comply'd with it. He yielded to them in points, from which he had determined, and declared too, that he would never depart. To know when to yield, in government, is at least as necessary, as to know when to lose in trade; and he, who cannot do the first, is so little likely to govern a kingdom well, that it is more than probable he would govern a shop ill. King CHARLES gave up to the murmurs of his people, not one or two such ministers as may be found almost behind every desk; those awkward pageants of courts, those wooden images, which princes gild and then worship; but several great and able men; nay, whole cabals of such, who had merit with him, though they had none with the nation. He started often out of the true interest of his people, but the voice of his people almost as often-reclaim'd him. He made the first Dutch war; but he made the triple alliance too. He engaged with France in the war of 1672; but he made a separate peace with Holland.

True

True it is, indeed, that neither the representations of his parliament, nor the desires of his people, could prevail on him to go farther, and to enter in earnest into the war against France. But the confidence between him and his parliament was so broken at that time, that they would not trust him, nor he them. At this I am not surpris'd, and for that very reason, I confess, I have always been so at the strong and repeated instances made to force him into that war; since it cannot surely be better policy to drive a prince into a war, which he has no inclination to make, than it would be to be drawn by him into a war, if he had no ability to conduct it. In home-affairs, besides his frequent concessions, whenever the nation took umbrage at his proceedings, he pass'd the test and the habeas corpus bills, and many others for the public benefit; and I scarce remember any popular act, which stopp'd at the throne in his time, except that about the militia, which he apprehended to be a dangerous encroachment on his prerogative, and another in favour of the dissenters, which was contriv'd, meanly enough, to be stolen off the table in the house of lords.

WHAT has been touch'd here, and in former papers, will be sufficient to shew, in some measure, how king CHARLES was enabled to divide a nation so united and so heated

as this nation was, on the discovery of the popish plot; to oppose so avowedly and so resolutely the exclusion of his brother; the prospect of whose succeeding to the crown was become still more dreadful, even by that small part of COLEMAN'S correspondence, which had come to light; and yet to attach so numerous a party to himself, nay to his brother; to lay aside parliaments for several years, and not only to stand his ground, but to gain ground in the nation, at the same time. But there is still something more to be added. He had not only prepared for the storm, but he acquir'd new strength in the midst of it; that is, in the proceedings on the popish plot, and the bill of exclusion. He would gladly have kept the former out of parliament; but when it was once there, he put on the appearances of great zeal for the prosecution of it. These appearances help'd him to screen his brother; as the ill success of the exclusion bill in the house of lords, where it was rejected by sixty-three against thirty, help'd to screen himself from the violence of the house of commons. But that, which gave him the principal advantage, in the present contests, was another management. As soon as the first preparatory steps were made to the bill of exclusion in 1678, he declared himself, in a speech to his parliament, ready to pass any bills to make his people safe in the reign of his successor, "so they tended

 “the descent of the crown in the true line.”
 He persisted in his declaration to the last; and if he had done nothing else, I imagine that he would have gain'd no great popularity.
 When a free people lie under any grievance, or apprehend any danger, and try to obtain their prince's consent to deliver them from one or prevent the other; a flat refusal, on his part, reduces them to the melancholy alternative of continuing to submit to one, and to stand exposed to the other, or of freeing themselves from both, without his consent; which can hardly be done by means very consistent with his and their common interest. King CHARLES was too wise to push the nation to such an extremity. He refused what his parliament press'd on him, in the manner and on the principle they press'd it; but then his refusal was follow'd by expedients, which vary'd the manner, and yet might have been managed so as to produce the effect; and which seem'd to save, rather than actually saved, the principle. Numbers concurr'd, at that time, in avowing the principle; and the tests had made many persons think religion safe; as the king's offers made them think it no fault of his, if it was not made safer. The council had prepared some expedients; and the limitations, and other provisions against a popish successor, proposed directly

directly from the throne by the chancellor in 1679, went a great way towards binding the hands of such a successor, and lodging the power, taken from him, in the parliament. But the scheme of expedients, debated in the Oxford parliament, was a real exclusion from every thing, but the title of king. The first article banish'd the duke of YORK, during his life, to the distance of 500 miles from England, Scotland and Ireland; and the tenth, to mention no more, excluded him ipso facto, if he came into any of these kingdoms; directed that he should suffer, in this case, as by the former bill, and that the sovereignty should vest forthwith in the regent; that is, in the princess of ORANGE. Surely this was not to vote the lion in the lobby into the house. It would have been to vote him out of the house, and lobby both, and only to suffer him to be call'd lion still. I am not ignorant of the refinements, urged by Sir WILLIAM JONES and others against this scheme; but I know that men run into errors from both extremes; from that of seeing too much, as well that of seeing too little; and that the most subtle refiners are apt to miss the true point of political wisdom, which consists in distinguishing justly between what is absolutely best in speculation, and what is the best of things practicable in particular conjunctures. The scheme, no doubt, was built on a manifest absurdity, and was liable to to many inconveniencies, difficulties and dangers; but still it was the utmost, that could be hoped for at that moment; and the single consideration, one would think, should have been this; whether, united under such an act of parliament, they would not have opposed the succession of the duke of YORK, with less inconveniency, less difficulty and danger, than disunited, and with the laws against them. The truth is, that as there were men at this time desirous that the king should be on desperate terms with his parliament, because they were so themselves; in like manner, there were others, who desired, for a reason of the same nature, that the parliament should be on desperate terms with the king. These were factious interests, and they prevail'd against the national interest; which required that the king should be separated at any rate from his brother, instead of being united to him by a fear made common to both. But the dye was thrown; and the leaders of the whig-party were resolved † “to let all lie in confusion, rather than hearken to any thing, besides the exclusion.” Obstinacy provoked obstinacy. The king grew obstinate, and severe too, against his natural easiness and former clemency of temper. The tory party party grew as obstinate, and as furious on their side, according to a natural tendency in the disposition of all parties; and thus the nation was deliver'd over, on the death of king* CHARLES "à la sottise de son frere; " to the folly and madness of his brother."

IT was this folly and madness however, that cured the folly and madness of party. As the common danger approach'd, the impressions of terror, which it made, increased. Whig and tory then felt them alike, and were brought by them, as drunken men sometimes are, to their senses. The events of king JAMES'S reign, and the steps by which the revolution was brought about, are so recent and so well known, that I shall not descend into any particular mention of them. A few general remarks on the behaviour of this prince, and on the behaviour of parties, in his reign, and at the revolution, will be sufficient to wind up the history of whig and tory, and to prove what I have so often asserted, that both sides purged themselves, on this great occasion, of the imputations laid to their charge by their adversaries; that the proper and real distinction of the two parties expired at this æra, and that although their ghosts have continued to haunt and divide us so many years afterwards, yet there neither is,

is, nor can be any division of parties at this time, reconcilable with common sense, and common honesty, among those, who are come on the stage of the world, under the present constitution; except those of churchmen and dissenters; those of court and country.

THE behaviour and conduct of king JAMES the second would be sufficient, if there was no other instance, and there are thousands, to shew that as strong prejudices, however got, are the parents, so a weak understanding is the nurse of bigotry, and injustice, and violence and cruelty its offspring. This prince was above fifty, when he came to the throne. He had great experience of all kinds; particularly of the temper of this nation, and of the impossibility to attempt introducing popery, without hazarding his crown. But his experience profited him not. His bigotry drew false conclusions from it. He flatter'd himself that he should be able to play parties against one another, better than his brother had done; (which, by the way, was the least of his little talents) and to compleat his designs by an authority, which was but too well establish'd. He pass'd, I think, for a sincere man. Perhaps, he was so; and he spoke always with great emphasis of the word of a king; and yet never was the meanest word so scandalously broken as his. In the debate in 1678, about the test, when he got a proviso put in for excepting himself, it has been advanced in print, and not denied that I know of, that speaking with † “ great earnestness and with tears in his eyes, he solemnly protested that whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own soul ; and that no effect of it should ever appear in the government.” At his accession to the throne, in council first, and after that in full parliament, in the face of the nation, he made the strongest declaration in favour of the constitution in church and state, and took the most solemn engagements to defend and support it. But bigotry burst thro’ all these cobwebs ; for such they are to men, transported by a religious delirium, who acquire a strength, that those, who are well, have not, and conscientiously break all the obligations of morality. These admirable dispositions in the king were encouraged by the state, in which his brother left and he found the nation, and by the complaisance of the parliament, which he call’d soon after his accession. They were confirm’d, and he was determin’d to pull off the mask entirely, by the ill success of the duke of MONMOUTH and the earl of ARGYLE. Bishop BURNET speaks of this parliament very

Very indecently, and I think very untruly. They were neither men of parts, nor estates, according to him. The truth is, that the circumstances, under which we were brought, by the factious proceedings of both parties, in the late reign, for and against the court, were such as might perplex the best parts, and puzzle the heads even of the wisest men. A profess'd, zealous papist, in full and quiet possession of the throne, and, instead of any provision made, or any measures taken against him, the notion and the exercise of the prerogative establish'd at an extravagant height, were such circumstances, as laid the nation almost at the mercy of the king. They therefore, who were the most determin'd not to part with either their religion, or their liberty, and yet had more to lose in the fray than doctor BURNET, might be willing to look round them; to wait opportunities, and not undertake rashly what can seldom be undertaken twice. It is impossible to believe that their confidence in the king's word was such as they affected. But, like drowning men, who saw nothing else to catch at, they caught at a straw. The duke of MONMOUTH'S expedition into England, and the earl of ARGYLE'S into Scotland, were so far from affording the nation any opportunity of mending their condition, that the declaration of the former might draw some of the dissenters to his standard, as it did; but was calculated to drive the tory party, most of the whigs, and in short the bulk of the people from him. The declaration of the latter was founded in the solemn league and covenant; and gave so much reason to apprehend that a revival of the same principles, and a renewal of the same tyranny was intended, that we cannot wonder it had no better an effect; though we lament the fate of a worthy and gallant man, whose crime was refusing a test, that should never have been imposed on protestants and freemen, and who had been driven into these extreme resolutions by a series of unjust and tyrannical usage.

Thus were these invasions, in the very beginning of his reign, favourable in some respects to the designs of king JAMES. They fortified, in the minds of men, the jealousies and fears, which had a few years before form'd the tory party; and disposed them, by consequence at least, to keep measures and not break with the king. They gave him the pretence, which he seized very readily, of raising and keeping up a standing army. But, in the event, they forwarded our deliverance from all the dangers, to which we were exposed, under his government, by precipitating his attempts against our religion and liberty. The same day, that the news of the invasion in Scotland

was communicated to the parliament here, the commons voted that great revenue, which they gave him, and gave him for life. After these invasions were over, they voted a supply, which was intended for the charge of maintaining the additional forces. They offer'd to pass a law for indemnifying his popish officers from the penalty they had incurr'd; and to capacitate such others as he should name in a list to be given to the house. In short, they suffer'd themselves to be drawn to the brink of the precipice; but there they stopp'd. They would neither give him the whole supply of 1,200,000 l. which he ask'd, nor sanctify, by the authority of parliament, the practice of keeping up a standing army in time of peace; but rejected the words moved for that purpose. They would neither repeal the test and penal laws; nor submit to his dispensing, or suspending, which was in effect a repealing power; that is, they would not cast themselves headlong down the precipice; and because they would not, he quarrel'd with them, lost the 700,000 l. they had voted, rather than suffer them to sit any longer; and never met them more.

THINGS hasten'd now to a decision. The king's designs were openly avow'd and desperately push'd. The church of England opposed them, with the utmost vigour. The dissenters were cajoled by the court; and they, who had been ready to take arms against king CHARLES, because he was unwilling to exclude his brother, and who had taken arms against this prince, since he was on the throne, became abettors of his usurpations. It were easy to prove this, even by bishop BURNET'S account, as much as that is soften'd; and if the excuses, which have been made for their silence against popery in this critical moment, or for their approving and encouraging the exercise of a dispensing power, are to be received, one may undertake to excuse, on the same principles of reasoning, all those instances of misconduct in the church party, which I have presumed to censure so freely. But the truth is, these excuses are frivolous. I could quote some, that are even burlesque. Let us reverence truth therefore, and condemn the dissenters as frankly, on this occasion, as we have condemn'd the members of the church of England on others.

THE revolution soon follow'd. Many of the most distinguish'd Tories, some of those, who carried highest the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, were engaged in it; and the whole nation was ripe for it. The whigs were zealous in the same cause; but their zeal was not such as, I think, it had been some years before, a zeal without knowledge; I mean, that it was better temper'd.

per'd, and more prudently conducted. Tho' the king was not the better for his experience, parties were. Both saw their errors. The Tories stopp'd short in the pursuit of a bad principle. The Whigs reform'd the abuse of a good one. Both had sacrificed their country to their party. Both sacrificed on this occasion, their party to their country. When the Tories and the Whigs were thus coalited, the latter stood no longer in need of any adventitious help. If they did not refuse the assistance of those, who had weaken'd their cause more by the jealousies and fears, to which they gave both occasion and pretence, than they had strengthen'd it by their numbers; yet they suffer'd them to have no influence in their councils, no direction of their conduct. The cause of liberty was no longer made the cause of a party, by being set on such a bottom, and push'd in such a manner, as one party alone approv'd. The revolution was plainly design'd to restore and secure our government, ecclesiastical and civil, on true foundations; and whatever may happen to the king, there was no room to suspect any change of the constitution. There were some, indeed, concern'd in this great and glorious undertaking, who had obstinately preserved, or lightly taken up the republican and other whimsies, that reign'd in the days of usurpation and confusion. If they could have

prevail'd, and it was no fault of theirs they did not, the coalition of parties had been broken; and instead of a revolution, we might have had a civil war; perhaps, not even that sad chance for our religion and liberty. But this leaven was so near worn out, that it could neither corrupt, nor seem any longer to corrupt the mass of the whig-party. The party never had been presbyterians, nor republicans, any more than they had been quakers; any more than the tory party had been papists, when, notwithstanding their aversion to popery, they were undeniably under the accidental influence of popish councils. But even the appearances were now rectified. The revolution was a fire, which purged off the dross of both parties; and the dross being purged off, they appear'd to be the same metal, and answer'd the same standard.

I SHALL deliver my thoughts, on some other occasion, concerning the disputes, that arose about the settlement of the crown, after the revolution; and shew, if I do not very much deceive myself, that no argument can be drawn from thence against any thing I have advanced.

I am, Sir, &c.

THE slavish principles of passive-obedience and non-resistance, which had sculk'd perhaps in some old homily before king JAMES the first, but were talk'd, written and preach'd into vogue in that inglorious reign, and in those of his three successors, were renounced at the revolution by the last of the several parties, who declared for them. Not only the laity, but the clergy embraced and co-operated in the deliverance, which the prince of ORANGE brought them. Some of our prelates join'd to invite them over. Their brethren refused to sign an abhorrence of this invitation. The university of Oxford offer'd him their plate, and associated for him against their king. In one word, the conduct of the tories, at this crisis, was such as might have inclined a man to think they had never held resistance unlawful, but had only differ'd with the whigs about the degree of oppression, or of danger, which it was necessary to wait, in order to sanctify resistance. Now, it may appear at first a little strange that these principles, which had always had gone hand in hand with those of the divine, hereditary, indeindefeasible right of kings that were just as well founded in reason, in support of which the example of the primitive christians might be pompously cited, and to countenance which some texts of the Bible might be piously strain'd, would not keep their hold, and maintain their influence, as well as the others.

THIS attachment to hereditary right will appear the more strange, if we consider what regard was shewn, at this time, to the difficulties they, who had pawn'd themselves, as it were, for the principle, would be under, when they came to concur in establishing a settlement repugnant to it. That great and solemn resolution, about the abdication of king JAMES, and the vacancy of the throne, might have been express'd in terms much stronger and plainer than it was. I have heard there were persons, who had a mind it should be so; and who, more attach'd to the honour, that is the humour of party, than to the national interest, in this great event, would have turn'd this resolution, as well as the declaration of the prince of ORANGE, to a more express approbation of the whig, and a more express condemnation of the tory tenets and conduct. But a wiser and honest consideration prevail'd. Instead of erecting the new government on the narrow foundations of party systems, the foundations of it were laid as wide, and made as comprehensive, as they could be.

No.

No man, I believe, at this time, thinks that the vote asserted too little; and surely there was no colour of reason on the side of those, who cavil'd against it, at that time, for asserting too much.

THE disputes about the words abdicate, or desert, and about the vacancy of the throne, were in truth fitter for a school than a house of parliament, and might have been expected in some assembly of pedants, where young students exercised themselves in disputation, but not in such an august assembly as that of the lords and commons, met in solemn conference upon the most important occasion. The truth is that they, who form'd the opposition, were reduced to maintain strange paradoxes; stranger, in my opinion, than most of those, which cast so much ridicule on the stoics of old. Thus, for instance, they were forced to admit that an oppress'd people might seek their remedy in resistance; for they had sought it there themselves; and yet they oppos'd making use of the only remedy, which could effectually secure them against returns of the same oppression, when resistance had put it in their power, as oppression had given them a right to use this remedy. Surely this must appear a paradox, and a very absurd one too, if we consider that resistance, in all such cases, is the mean, and future security the end; and that the former is impertinent, nay wicked in the highest degree, if it be not employ'd to obtain the latter. Thus again, the same men declared themselves willing to secure the nation against the return of king JAMES to that throne, which he had abdicated; or, according to them, deserted; nay, some of them were ready, if we may credit the anecdotes of that time, to proceed to such extreme resolutions, as would have been more effectual, than justifiable in the eyes of mankind; and yet they could not prevail on their scrupulous consciences to declare the throne vacant. They had concurr'd in the vote, that it was inconsistent with the laws, liberties and religion of England to have a papist rule over the kingdom. King JAMES had follow'd the pious example of SIGISMOND, who, not content to lose the crown of Sweden himself for his religion, had carried his son away, that he might be bred a papist, and lose it too; and yet they maintain'd, though they did not expressly name him, that if the throne was then, or should be at any time vacant of the father, it must be reputed instantaneously full of the son, upon the foundation of this silly axiom, that the king never dies. According to this law, and these politics, king JAMES and his successors, to the twentieth generation, might have continued abroad, a race of royal exiles, preserving their indefeasible right to govern, but debarr'd from the exercise of it; whilst the nation continued, during all this time, time, from century to century, under the dominion of regents, with regal authority, but without any regal right; an excellent expedient sure to keep the monarchy in an hereditary succession! But there remain'd none better, on the principles of these men; since the prince of ORANGE had committed the fatal oversight of neglecting to conquer the nation. His sword would have cut the gordian knot of hereditary right, and they could have submitted with safe consciences to a conqueror. But to give the crown to a prince, though they had put the whole administration into his hands; which, by the way, was high treason, unless the throne was, what they deny'd it to be, actually vacant; to give the crown, I say, to a prince, who would not take it, when it was in his power to take it, without their consent; to settle a new government by agreement and compact, when the glorious opportunity of establishing it by force and conquest had been unhappily lost; these were propositions, to which they could not consent. King JAMES had violated the fundamental laws, which he had promised over and over and sworn to maintain. He had shewn by his first escape, when nothing was more imposed on him, than to wait the resolution of a free parliament, that he would renounce his crown rather rather than submit to secure effectually the observation of these laws. He had made a second escape, which was voluntary as well as the first, and made on the same principle, against the intreaties of his friends, and the instigations of the same council as had directed his former conduct, and on a letter from the queen, claiming his promise to do so. Notwithstanding all these reasons, they, who maintain'd the hereditary right of our kings, reduced themselves, and would have reduced their country, to the absurd necessity of altering the constitution, under pretence of preserving it. No king, except a STUART, was to reign over us. But we might establish a doge, a lord archon, a regent; and thus these warm assertors of monarchy, refusing to be slaves, contended to be republicans. Many more paradoxes of equal extravagance might be cited, which were advanced directly, or which resulted plainly, from the arguments employ'd on one side of the question in those disputes. But the instances I have cited may suffice for our present purpose, and may serve to shew that although difficulties, hard to solve in speculation, or to remove in practice, will arise in the pursuit of the most rational principles; yet such absurdities as these can never arise, except from the most irrational, and always must arise from such.

IF the persons, who maintain'd this divine, hereditary, indefeasible right of our kings, had thought fit to drop these principles, when they laid aside those of passive obedience and non-resistance, and no tolerable reason can be given why they did not, their conduct would have been consistent and uniform on this great occasion; and this consistency and uniformity would have been productive of great good, by taking away at once even the appearances of all political division in the bulk of the nation. But whilst they labour'd to reconcile their present conduct to their antient system, they were true to neither. They had gone much farther than this would allow, and then they refused to go as far as the other required, in order to be safe, and therefore in order to be justify'd. They lost every kind of merit; the chimerical merit of adhering to a set of silly principles; the real merit of sacrificing their prejudices to the compleat deliverance of their country from the recent danger of popery and arbitrary power. Nay, they did worse; for the mischievous consequences of their conduct were not hurtful to them alone, and at that time alone, but to the public, and even down to these times. They furnish'd pretence to factions, who kept up a division under the old names, when the differences were really extinguish'd by the conduct of both parties; because the conduct of both parties was no longer conformable to the principles imputed to them. The tories had no longer any pretence of fearing the designs of the whigs; since the whigs had sufficiently purged themselves from all suspicion of republican views, by their zeal to continue monarchical government, and of latitudinarian schemes in point of religion, by their ready concurrence in preserving our ecclesiastical establishment, and by their insisting on nothing farther, in favour of the dissenters, than that indulgence, which the church was most willing to grant. The whigs had as little pretence of fearing the tories; since the tories had purged themselves, in the most signal manner, from all suspicion of favouring popery, or arbitrary power, by the vigorous resistance they made to both. They had engaged, they had taken the lead in the revolution, and they were fully determined against the return of king JAMES. The real essences of whig and tory were thus destroy'd; but the nominal were preserved, and have done since that time a good part of the mischief, which the real did before. The opposition made to the settlement of the crown brought this about. An overcurious enquiry into the motives of this opposition would be a task too invidious for me to undertake. Something however may be said upon it. We may say in general, without offence, that private ambition mingled itself early in the great and national concerns of the revolution; and that it did so more, as the prospect of a new settlement, and of the elevation of the prince of ORANGE approach'd. Expectations were rais'd; disappointments were given, or foreseen; and a variety of motives of the same kind began to influence very strongly the conduct of the principal actors. Some endeavour'd to lay the foundations of their future fortune by demonstrations of a personal attachment to the prince; which were carried on, I doubt a little too independently of the regard due to their country, in some cases; particularly, if I mistake not, in that of the declaration of rights, of which we may pronounce, and experience will justify us, that it was too loose, too imperfect, and nothing less than proportionable to the importance of the occasion, and the favourable circumstances of the conjuncture. Others there were, who imagined that the shortest and surest way for them to take, in pursuit of the same view, was to make themselves considerable by opposition, to form a party, and maintain a struggle for personal power, under the pretence and umbrage of principle. This was, without doubt, the motive of some particular leading men, and could not be, at least at first, the motive of numbers. But there was another motive, which easily became that of numbers, because it arose

no

out of a fund common to all men, the perversity of human nature, according to an observation made in one of these letters. Whilst the event of the prince of ORANGE'S expedition was undecided, men remain'd under the full influence of their fears, which had determined them to act against their prejudices. But when the revolution was secure and these fears were calm'd, these prejudices resumed, in some degree, their former power, and the more for being revived and encouraged by men of reputation and authority, who argued for some, and might as reasonably have argued for all the errors, in contradiction to which most of them had acted, nay, and were ready to act. With such views, and by such means, were many brought, at this time, to entangle themselves in a maze of inextricable absurdities. Had they own'd candidly and fairly that their principles, as well as those of the whigs, were carried too high in the former disputes of parties, and that these principles could not be true, since they found themselves actually in a situation, wherein it was not possible to act agreeably to them without manifest absurdity, the distinction, as well as the difference, of whig and tory had been at an end. But contrary measures produced a contrary effect. They kept up the appearances, and they could keep up no more, of a whig and a tory party, and with these appearances ances a great part of the old animosity. The two names were founded about the nation; and men, who saw the same ensigns flying, were not wise enough to perceive, or not honest enough to own, that the same cause was no longer concern'd; but list'd themselves on either side, as their prejudices at first, and their inclinations, or other motives, which arose in the progress of their contests, directed them afterwards; whigs very often, under the tory standard; tories very often under the whig standard.

THIS general representation, which I have made of the state of parties at the revolution, is I am verily persuaded, exactly just; and it might be supported by many particular proofs, which I chuse rather to suggest, than to mention. But if any doubt remains, let us analyse the several parties of that time a little more, reduce them to their first and real principles, and then pronounce whether we find the whig, or the tory party subsisting among them.

IN the first place then, there was a party that concurr'd in making the new settlement; a party, that prevail'd in parliament, and was by much the majority of the nation out of it. Were the whigs this majority? Was this party a whig party? No man will presume to affirm so notorious an untruth. The whigs were far from being this majority, and king JAMES must have died on the throne, if the tories had not concurr'd to place the prince of ORANGE there, in his stead. Was this party a tory party then? Certainly no. The whigs had been zealous in the same cause, and had contributed to make it successful by their temper, as well as their zeal; by waiting the time of the tories, or rather the maturity of the conjuncture, and by moderating their principles and their conduct, in favour of that coalition, without which the revolution could have succeeded no more than the exclusion did. We find then here neither a whig, nor a tory party; for in coalitions of this kind, where two parties are melted, as it were, into one, neither of them can be said, with truth and propriety, to exist.

THERE was another party directly opposite to this; a certain number of men, on whom the original taint, transmitted down from king JAMES the first, remain'd still in the full strength of its malignity. These men adhered to those principles, in the natural sense and full extent of them, which the tories had profess'd. But yet, the tories having renounc'd these principles, or distinguish'd themselves out of any obligation to observe them, this inconsiderable faction could not be deem'd the tory party, but received the name of jacobite with more propriety.

Two other parties there were at this time, form'd on one common principle, but widely different however, by the different consequences they drew from it. The principle I mean is that contain'd in the distinction of a king de jure, and a king de facto. The famous statute of HENRY the seventh authoris'd this distinction. The statute was design'd principally, no doubt, for the advantage of the subjects, that they might be safe, whichever side prevail'd in an age, when the epidemical folly of fighting for different pretenders had spilt oceans of blood on the scaffold, as well as in the field; and yet the statute was design'd for the service of kings de facto too, and particularly of HENRY the seventh. The author of hereditary right asserted would have us believe otherwise; and yet surely nothing can be more evident than this, that if king HENRY the seventh's right had been as unquestionable as he supposes, and I presume to deny that it was, yet he would have been declared a king de facto only, if the intrigues of the duchess of BURGUNDY, and the faction of YORK had succeeded, and consequently this provision for the safety of his adherents, in that possible contingency, gave strength to him, as it would have given strength to any other prince, whilst it attach'd his adherents to him by the apparent security it provided; for this author contends that it did not establish a real security, and advises us to suspend our judgment on the validity of this statute, till we see what the opinion of parliament, or the judges, may be, whenever a king de jure shall dispossess a king de facto. He refers us ad calendas Græcas.

BUT there are two observations to be made to our present purpose on this statute, which seem to me natural and plain. First, it con- founds in effect the very distinction it seems to make; since it secures alike, and, by se- curing alike, authorizes alike those, who adhere to the king de jure, and those, who adhere to the king de facto, provided they adhere to the king in possession. Secondly, it was contrived to hinder people, according to my lord BACON's sense of it, "from busying themselves in prying into the king's title, and that subjects might not trouble them- selves with enquiries into the justness of the king's title, or quarrel." Now, upon the foundation of this distinction, and this sta- tute, thus understood, they, who demurr'd on the settlement of the crown, at the revolution, might plausibly, though I think very unrea- sonably, resolve neither to vote, nor act them- selves against those maxims and principles, which they had entertain'd and profess'd, as maxims of law, and principles of the con- stitution, and yet resolve to submit sincerely, and adhere faithfully to a new establishment, when it was once made. But the other of the two parties I mention'd drew from the same principle, of distinguishing between a king king de facto, and a king de jure, a very different conclusion. They acknowledged one king, and held their allegiance still due to another. They bound themselves by oath to preserve a settlement, which they pretended themselves in conscience obliged to subvert. This was to justify perfidy, to sanctify perjury, to remove the sacred boundaries of right and wrong, and, as far as in them lay, to teach mankind to call good evil, and evil good.

SUCH were the three divisions, into which men broke at the revolution, in opposing the settlement then made; whilst the great body of the nation concurr'd in it, and whig and tory form'd in reality but one party. The first of these divisions continued, and became a faction in the state; but made no profelytes, and was worn out by time. The principle of the second was wrong; but it could not be reputed dangerous, whilst it lasted, and it seems it have been built on so narrow and slippery a foundation, that it did not continue long in force. I may be more bold in asserting this, since if we look back to the æra of the revolution, and to the times, which follow'd, we shall find among those, who voted for a regent, not a king, on the abdication of king JAMES, some illustrious persons, who served king WILLIAM faithfully, who adhered inviolably to our new establishment, and who have been distinguish'd friends of the succession, that hath now taken place. That there have been persons, who deserved to be rank'd under the third head, is too notorious to be deny'd; but I persuade myself that this division hath consisted always of a flux body. On one hand, it is scarce possible to believe that any number of men should be so harden'd, as to avow to themselves, and to one another, the acting and persisting to act on a principle so repugnant to every notion and sentiment, that harbour in the breasts of social creatures. On the other, we know how the sallies and transports of party, on some occasions, can hurry even reasonable men to act on the most absurd, and honest men to act on the most unjustifiable principles, or both one and the other on no principle at all, according as the object, which the prevailing passion presents to them, directs. This hath been the case of many, since the revolution, and there are some of all sides, I believe, still alive, sure I am that there were some a few years ago, who know that no side is absolutely unexceptionable in this respect.

LETTER IX.

S I R,

BUT whatever the state of parties was at the revolution, and for some time afterwards, the settlement made at that time having continued, that state of parties hath changed gradually, tho' slowly, and hath received at length, according to the necessary course of things, a total alteration. This alteration would have been sooner wrought, if the attempt I have mention'd, to defend principles no longer defensible, had not furnish'd the occasion and pretence to keep up the appearances of a tory, and a whig party. Some of those, who had been call'd tories, furnish'd this pretence. They who had been call'd whigs, seized and improved it. The advantages to one side, the disadvantages to the other, the mischiefs to the whole, which have ensued, I need not deduce. It shall suffice to observe, that these appearances were the more easy to be kept up, because several men, who had stood conspicuous in opposition to one another before the revolution, continued an opposition, tho' not the same, afterwards. Fresh provocations were daily given, and fresh pretences for division daily taken. These contests were present ; sent; they recall'd those, that had past in the time of king CHARLES the second; and both sides forgot that union, which their common danger and their common interest had form'd at the revolution. Old reproaches were renew'd, new ones invent-ed, against the party call'd whigs, when they were as complaisant to a court as ever the tories had been; against the party call'd tories, when they were as jealous of public liberty, and as frugal of public money, as ever the whigs had been. Danger to the church, on one side, and danger to the state, on the other, were apprehended from men, who meant no harm to either; for though dissenters mingled themselves on one side, and jacobites on the other, and notwithstanding the leanings of parties in favour of those, by whom they were abetted; yet is it a certain truth, that the struggle was in the main for power, not principle; and that there was no formal design laid, on one side, to destroy the church, nor, on the other, the state. The cavils, which may be made, and the facts, which may be cited, some of older, and some of fresher date, against what hath been here said, do not escape me. Men of knowledge, and of cool and candid thought, will answer one, and account for the other, without my help; and I cannot resolve, for the sake of the passionate, nor even of the ignorant, to descend upon this subject into a greater detail.

I PASS to that, which is closer to my present purpose, and of more immediate use; and I say that as the natural dispositions of men are alter'd and form'd into different moral characters by education, so the spirit of a constitution of government, which is confirm'd, improved and strengthen'd by the course of events, and especially by those of fruitless opposition, in a long tract of time, will have a proportionable influence on the reasoning, the sentiments, and the conduct of those, who are subject to it. A different spirit and contrary prejudices may prevail for a time. But the spirit and principles of the constitution will prevail at last. If one be unnatural, and the other absurd, and that is the case in many governments, a vigorous exercise of power, signal rewards, signal punishments, and variety of other secondary means, which in such constitutions are never wanting, will however maintain, as long as they are employ'd, both the spirit and the principles. But if the spirit and principles of a constitution be agreeable to nature, and the true ends of government, which is the case of the present constitution of the British government, they want no such means to make them prevail. They not only flourish without them, but they would fade and die away with them. As liberty is nourish'd

and supported by such a spirit and such principles, so they are propagated by liberty. Truth and reason are often able to get the better of authority in particular minds; but truth and reason, with authority on their side, will carry numbers, bear down prejudices, and become the very genius of a people. The progress they make is always sure, but sometimes not observable by every eye. Contrary prejudices may seem to maintain themselves in vigour, and these prejudices may be kept up long by passion and by artifice. But when truth and reason continue to act without restraint, a little sooner, or a little later, and often when this turn is least expected, the prejudices vanish at once, and truth and reason triumph without any rival.

THE constitution of England had been seen in two very different lights, for almost a century before the revolution; so that there is no room to be surpris'd at the great opposition, that appear'd (when the whig and tory parties arose a very few years before that æra) between principles, which, as opposite as they were, each side pretended to establish on the nature of one and the same constitution. How this happen'd, hath been often hinted, and I have not here room to explain any farther. Let us be satisfy'd that it is no longer the case. Our constitution is no longer a mystery, the power of the crown is now exactly limited; the chi-

mæra of prerogative removed; and the rights of the subject are no longer problematical, though some things necessary to the more effectual security of them may be still wanting. Under this constitution, the greatest part of the men now alive were born. They lie under no pretence of obligation to any other, and to the support of this they are bound by all the ties of society, and all the motives of interest.

LET us prove what we advance; and that we may do so ad homines, let us borrow our argument from the great champion of hereditary right. Having mention'd in his introduction what he endeavours pompously, but vainly, to establish in his book, in favour of "hereditary right, a prescription of nine "centuries, a continual claim of five hundred and fifty years," he attempts to convince us by a novel law, and a modern constitution. This modern constitution is the act of recognition, in the first of king JAMES the first. The declarations there made, in favour of hereditary right, are no doubt as strong as words can frame, and the words are such as would tempt one to think, by the fustian they compose, that his majesty himself had penn'd them. From hence it is concluded that since "the vows and "acts of fathers—bind their posterity—this "act, till the society hath revoked it lawfully, lays the same obligation on every "member

“ member of the society, as if he had personally consented to it.” If this act then was lawfully revoked, or repeal’d, another novel law, contrary to it, might be made equally binding; but neither this act, nor the act of the twelfth of CHARLES the second, affirming the crown to appertain by just and undoubted right to the king, his heirs and lawful successors, having been expressly repeal’d, we still lie under the same obligations, and every settlement, contrary to them, and by consequence the settlement made at the revolution, is unlawful. Now I ask, was not the will of HENRY the eighth, which excluded the whole Scottish line, made in pursuance, and by the authority of an act pass’d in the 25th year of his reign? Hath not this author justify’d the validity of this will, much to his own satisfaction, and, I believe, to that of his readers? Was this will lawfully revoked? Was this statute expressly repeal’d? I ask farther, whether hereditary right, and the obligations of subjects to it, could be made immutable and eternal, as this author asserts that they were by the act of recognition, without a manifest contradiction to the act of queen ELIZABETH, which declares the power of parliament to limit and bind the succession to the crown? Was this act expressly repeal’d? That king JAMES the first succeeded lawfully against law, our author is fond to maintain, and the proposition proposition is not unlike that of some popish casuists, who assert that his holiness "Jure potest contra jus decernere, can decree "rightfully against right;" but if these questions are fairly answer'd, it will result from such answers, and from the arguments I have quoted, that this novel law, this modern constitution, is a meer illusion; that it never bound any member of the society; and that the parliament had as much right to make the settlement in 1688, notwithstanding the act of recognition, as the parliament had to make this act in 1603, notwithstanding the two acts I have mention'd, and the will of HENRY the eighth, made by virtue of the first of them. This wayward and forlorn hereditary right must therefore fall to the ground, or be supported by the supposed prescription of nine centuries, and claim of five and a half, which no intelligent man, who reads this book, will be persuaded that the author hath proved a jot better, than the uninterrupted succession of popes, from St. PETER down to his present holiness, is proved by the learned antiquaries of Italy. If this act of recognition be urged, as it sometimes is, to shew the declared sense of the three estates of the kingdom, which declaration was obtain'd, it seems, in an hurry, since the act was read three times in one house the same day; the declared sense of the three estates, not pronounced nounced in an hurry, but after the most solemn debates and conferences, may be urged with much greater weight, in favour of our present settlement. If this act of recognition, notwithstanding what hath been objected, be urged as a law, which had the assent of a king, in opposition to the proceedings of the convention, by which king WILLIAM and queen MARY were raised to the throne; the answer is obvious and conclusive. The circumstances of the two cases are very different; but when they come to be weigh'd a fair balance, those, which attended the settlement of the crown on the revolution, will be found at least as conformable to reason, to law, and to practice, as those, which attended the establishment of the STUART family. Queen ELIZABETH design'd king JAMES the first to be her successor; the nation concurr'd to make him so; neither she nor they paid any regard to the law, which stood in his way. Their reasons for acting in this manner are easy to be discover'd in the history of that time; and on the same authority we may certainly conclude, that they would not have acted in this manner, if king JAMES had been, like his mother, a profess'd papist. Thus he got into the throne, and when he was there, he got like other kings, such a title, as he chose to stand upon, agnized, or recognized, by his parliament. The settle-

meant at the revolution was made by a convention of the lords spiritual and temporal, and a full and free representative of the whole body of the people. WHEN king WILLIAM and queen MARY were once settled on the throne, this settlement was continued and confirm'd by an assemblage of all the legislative powers. He, who will dispute the validity of these proceedings, must shew therefore first of all, what hath never yet been shewn, (no, not by the author I have so often quoted) the invalidity of the proceedings of those parliaments, which raised EDWARD the third, and HENRY the fourth to the throne; which were call'd as irregularly, though by writs in the names of EDWARD the second and RICHARD the second, as it can be pretended that the convention was. He must shew the invalidity of the proceedings even of that assembly, by which CHARLES the second was call'd home, till their proceedings became valid by a subsequent confirmation. He must shew farther, how any of the laws of the princes of the house of LANCASTER came to be constantly received and executed, a little better than the author of Hereditary right asserted hath done, by assuring us on his word that it was by the "sufferance of EDWARD the fourth and his successors, and the approbation of the people." He must account for the continuance in force of the laws of

RICHARD the third, and of HENRY the seventh, a little better than the same author does, by the deficiency of HENRY the seventh's title, (which, upon another occasion, he magnifies; though upon this he affirms it to have been no better than that of RICHARD the third) and by the great respect of HENRY the eighth for his father. When this hath been once shewn, it will be time to think of a reply. In the mean while, we will observe that besides the passion and party-spirit, which possess almost all those, who write on this subject, there is a distinction, which should be constantly made in cases of this nature, and which they never make, or never make exactly enough. They compare the proceedings without comparing the situations. Necessity and self-preservation are the great laws of nature, and may well dispense with the strict observation of the common forms of any particular constitution. Either the convention must have fallen into the absurdities I have already mention'd; or have call'd back king JAMES, which would have been still a greater absurdity; or have left their country in absolute anarchy; or have done what they did. What they did, was done as near as possible to the spirit of our constitution, the forms of our laws, and the examples of former times. They had the merit; their posterity hath the benefit; nay he, who would say that they had the guilt, not the merit, must still allow that their posterity hath the benefit, without sharing the guilt; and, upon the whole matter, I shall venture to assert that he, who scruples, or pretends to scruple, at this time, the validity of our present constitution, is no wiser, or else no honest, than he would be, who should scruple, or pretend to scruple, the validity of magna charta. I have often wish'd that some profound antiquary, of much leisure, would write an elaborate treatise to assert royal prerogative against the great charter, as well as hereditary right against the revolution. I am persuaded that he would succeed alike in both. Why, indeed, should a charter, extorted by force, and therefore vicious in its principle, stand on a better foot, or have more regard paid to it, than a settlement made in opposition to a divine, and therefore indefeasible right? I say, and therefore indefeasible; because if it be not proved to be something more than human, it will hardly be proved indefeasible. But I quit this subject; upon which, perhaps, you may think I have spent my time as ill, as I should have done, if I had preach'd against the Koran at Paul's. It is time to speak of the motives of interest, by which we are bound, as well as by the ties of duty, to support the present constitution.

UPON this head, a few words will be sufficient; since I presume that no prejudices can be strong enough to create much diversity of opinion, in a case so very clear, and capable of being stated so shortly. Whether the revolution alter'd our old constitution for the better, or renew'd it, or brought it back to the first principles, and nearer to the primitive institution, shall not be disputed here. I think the latter, and every man must think that one or the other was necessary, who considers, in the first place, how the majesty and authority of the prince began to swell above any pitch, proportionable to the rank of chief magistrate or supreme head, in a free state; by how many arts, the prerogative of the crown had been stretch'd; and how many precedents, little favourable to liberty, had been set, even before the accession of the Scottish line; and who considers, in the next place, the direct tendency, confirm'd by experience, of those principles of government, so frequently mention'd, which compos'd an avow'd system of tyranny and establish'd slavery as a political, a moral, and a religious obligation; which king JAMES the first was too successful in establishing; but neither he, nor his descendants were able to pursue. What these considerations made necessary, was done at the revolution; at least, so far as to put it into our power to do the rest. A spirit of liberty, liberty, transmitted down from our Saxon ancestors, and the unknown ages of our government, preserved itself through one almost continual struggle, against the usurpations of our princes, and the vices of our people; and they, whom neither the PLANTAGENTS, nor the TUDORS could enslave, were incapable of suffering their rights and privileges to be ravish'd from them by the STUARTS. They bore with the last king of this unhappy race, till it was shameful, as it must have been fatal, to bear any longer; and whilst they asserted their liberties, they refused and anticipated, by their temper and their patience, all the objections, which foreign and domestic abettors of tyranny are apt to make against the conduct of our nation towards their kings. Let us justify this conduct, by persisting in it, and continue to ourselves the peculiar honour of maintaining the freedom of our Gothic institution of government, when so many other nations, who enjoy'd the same, have lost theirs.

IF a divine, indefeasible, hereditary right to govern a community be once acknowledged, a right independent of the community, and which vests in every successive prince immediately on the death of his predecessor, and previously to any engagement taken on his part towards the people; if the people once acknowledged themselves bound to such princes by the ties of passive-obedience and non-resistance, by an allegiance unconditional, and not reciprocal to protection; if a kind of oral law, or mysterious cabala, which pharisees of the black gown and the long robe are always at hand to report and interpret, as a prince desires, be once added; like a supplemental code, to the known laws of the land; then, I say, such princes have the power, if not the right, given them, of commencing tyrants; and princes, who have the power, are prone to think that they have the right. Such was the state of king and people before the revolution. By the revolution, and the settlement since made, this state hath received considerable alterations. A king of Britain is now, strictly and properly, what kings should always be, a member, but the supreme member, or the head of a political body. Part of one individual, specific whole, in every respect; distinct from it, or independent of it, in none; he can move no longer in another orbit from his people, and, like some superior planet, attract, repel, influence, and direct their motions by his own. He and they are parts of the same system, intimately join'd and co-operating together, acting and acted upon, limiting and limited, controuling and controul'd by one another; and when he ceases to stand in this relation to them, he ceases to stand in any, any. The settlements, by virtue of which he governs, are plainly original contracts. His institution is plainly conditional; and he may forfeit his right to allegiance, as undeniably and effectually, as the subject may forfeit his right to protection. There are no longer any hidden reserves of authority, to be let out on occasion, and to overflow the rights and privileges of the people. The laws of the land are known, and they are the sole springs, from whence the prince can derive his pretensions, and the people theirs. It would be to no purpose to illustrate any farther a matter, which begins to be so well understood; or to descend into a more particular enumeration of the advantages, that result, or may result, from our present settlement. No man, who does not prefer slavery to liberty, or a more precarious security to a better, will declare for such a government, as our national divisions, and a long course, seldom interrupted, of improvident complaisance to the crown, had enabled king JAMES the second to establish against such a government as was intended by the subsequent settlement; and if there be any such man, I declare that I neither write to him, nor for him.

I MAY assume therefore, without fearing to be accused of begging the question, that the constitution, under which we now live, is preferable to that, which prevail'd at any time before the revolution. We are arrived, after many struggles, after a deliverance almost miraculous, and such an one as no nation hath reason to expect twice, and after having made some honest improvements on the advantages of our new constitution, very near to that full security, under which men, who are free and solicitous to continue so, may sit down, not without watchfulness, (for that is never to be suffer'd to relax under such a government as ours) but without anxiety. The sum therefore of all these discourses, and of all our exhortations to one another, is, and ought to be, that we should not stop short in so important a work. It was begun at the revolution; but he, who thinks it was perfected then, or hath been perfected since, will find himself very much mistaken. The foundations were laid then. We proceeded for some time after that, like the Jews in rebuilding their temple; we carried on the holy work with one hand, and held our swords in the other to defend it. That distraction, that danger is over, and we betray the cause of liberty without any colour of excuse, if we do not compleat the glorious building, which will last to ages yet remote, if it be once finish'd, and will moulder away and fall into ruins, if it remain longer in this imperfect state.

Now, that we may see the better how to proceed in the cause of liberty, to compleat the freedom, and to secure the duration of our present constitution; it will be of use, I think, to consider what obstacles lie, or may hereafter lie, in our way, and of what nature that opposition is, or may hereafter be, which we may expect to meet. In order to this, let us once more analyse our political divisions; those, which may possibly exist now, or hereafter, as we did those, which were form'd at the revolution.

ONE possible division then is that of men angry with the government, and yet resolved to maintain the constitution. This may be the case at any time; under the present, wise, virtuous, and triumphant administration; and therefore to be sure at any other.

A SECOND possible division is that of men averse to the government, because they are so to the constitution, which I think can never be the case of many; or averse to the constitution, because they are so to the government, which I think may be the case of more. Both of these tend to the same point: One would subvert the government, that they might change the constitution. The other would sacrifice the constitution, that they might subvert the government.

A THIRD possible division, and I seek no more, is that of men attach'd to the government; or, to speak more properly, to the persons persons of those, who govern; or, to speak more properly still, to the power, profit, or protection they acquire by the favour of these persons; but enemies to the constitution.

Now, as to the first and second of these possible divisions, if there be any such among us, I do not apprehend that we are at present, or can be hereafter, in much danger; or that the cause of liberty can meet with much opposition from them; though the second have certainly views, more likely to bring slavery upon us, than to promote liberty; and though prudence requires that we should be upon our guard against both. The first, indeed, might hope to unite even the bulk of the nation to them, in a weak and oppressive reign. If grievances should grow intolerable under some prince as yet unborn; if redress should become absolutely desperate; if liberty itself should be in imminent peril; the nature of our constitution would justify the resistance, that we ought to believe well enough of posterity to persuade ourselves would be made in such an exigency. But without such an exigency, particular men would flatter themselves extremely, if they hoped to make the nation angry, because they were so. Private motives can never influence numbers. When a nation revolts, the injury is national. This case therefore is remote, improbable, nay impossible, under the lenity, justice and heroical spirit spirit of the present government; and if I mention'd such an imaginary party, it was only done that I might omit none, which can be supposed. The projects of the second division, stated in the same hypothetical manner, are surely too extravagant, and their designs too wicked to be dangerous. Disputes may arise hereafter in some distant time, about ministers, perhaps about kings; but I persuade myself that this constitution will be, as it ought to be always, distinguish'd from, and preferr'd to both, by the British nation. Reasons must arise in process of time, from the very nature of man, to oppose ministers and kings too; but none can arise, in the nature of things, to oppose such a constitution as ours. Better ministers, better kings, may be hereafter often wanted, and sometimes found; but a better constituted government never can. Should there be therefore still any such men, as we here suppose among us, they cannot expect, if they are in their senses, a national concurrence; and surely a little reflection will serve to shew them, that the same reasons, which make them weaker now than they were some years ago, must make them weaker some years hence than they are now.

As to the third division, if any such there be, it is in that our greatest and almost our whole danger centers. The others cannot overthrow, but these may undermine our liberty.

liberty. Capable of being admitted into power, in all courts, and more likely than other men to be so in every court, except the present (whose approved penetration and spotless innocence give a certain exclusion to them) they may prevent any farther securities from being procured to liberty, till those already establish'd are dissolv'd, or perverted. Since then our principal danger must in all times arise from those, who belong to this division, it is necessary to shew, before we conclude these discourses, by what means such men may carry on their pernicious designs with effect, and by what means they may be defeated. These considerations will lead us to fix that point, wherein men of all denominations ought to unite, and do unite, and to state the sole distinction of parties, which can be made with truth, at this time, amongst us.

S I R,

IT may be ask'd, perhaps, how men, who are friends to a government, can be enemies at the same time to the constitution, upon which that government is founded. But the answer will be easy, if we consider these two things; first, the true distinction, so often confounded in writing, and almost always in conversation, between constitution and government. By constitution we mean, whenever we speak with propriety and exactness, the assemblage of laws, institutions and customs, derived from certain fix'd principles of reason directed to certain fix'd objects of public good, that compose the general system, according to which the community hath agreed to be govern'd. By government we mean, whenever we speak in the same manner, that particular tenor of conduct, which a chief magistrate, and inferior magistrates, under his direction and influence, hold in the administration of public affairs. We call this a good government, when the execution of the laws, the observation of the institutions and customs, in short, the whole administration of public affairs is wisely pursued, and with a strict conformity to the principles and objects of the constitution. We call it a bad government, when it is administer'd on other principles, and directed to other objects, either wickedly or weakly, either by obtaining new laws, which want this conformity, or by perverting old ones, which had it; and when this is done without law, or in open violation of the laws, we term it a tyrannical government. In a word, and to bring this home to our own case, case, constitution is the rule, by which our princes ought to govern, at all times; government is that, by which they actually do govern, at any particular time. One may remain immutable; the other may, and as human nature is constituted, must vary. One is the criterion, by which we are to try the other; for surely we have a right to do so, since if we are to live in subjection to the government of our kings, our kings are to govern in subjection to the constitution; and the conformity, or non-conformity of their government to it, prescribes the measure of our submission to them, according to the principles of the revolution, and of our present settlement; in both of which, though some remote regard was had to blood, yet the preservation of the constitution manifestly determined the community to the choice then made of the persons, who should govern. Another thing to be consider'd is this. When persons are spoken of as friends to the government, and enemies to the constitution, the term friendship is a little prostituted, in compliance with common usage. Such men are really incapable of friendship; for real friendship can never exist among those, whose have banish'd virtue and truth. They have no affection to any but themselves; no regard to any interest except their own. Their sole attachments are such as I mention'd in the last letter;

letter; attachments to power and profit, and when they have contracted a load of infamy and guilt, in the pursuit of these, an attachment to that protection, which is sufficient to procure them appearances of consideration, and real impunity. They may bear the semblance of affection to their prince and of zeal for his government; but they, who are false to the cause of their country, will not be true to any other; and the very same minister, who exalts his master's throne on the ruins of the constitution, that he may govern without controul, or retire without danger, would do the reverse of this, if any turn of affairs enabled him to compound, in that manner, the better for himself.

UNDER a prince therefore tolerably honest, or tolerably wise, such men as these will have no great sway; at least, they will not hold it long. Such a prince will know, that to unite himself to them, is to disunite himself from his people, and that he makes a stupid bargain, if he prefers trick to policy, expedient to system, and a cabal to the nation. Reason and experience will teach him that a prince, who does so, must govern weakly, ignominiously and precariously; whilst he, who engages all the hearts, and employs all the heads and hands of his people, governs with strength, with splendor, and with safety, and is sure of rising to a degree of absolute power, by maintaining liberty, which the most successful tyrant could never reach, by imposing slavery. But how few men (and princes, by their leaves, are men) have been found in times past, or can be hoped for in times to come, capable of governing by such arts as these? Some cannot propose the ends, nor some employ the means; for some are wicked, and some are weak. This general division runs through the whole race of mankind; of the multitudes design'd to obey, and of the few design'd to govern. It was this depravity of multitudes, as well as their mutual wants, which obliged men first to enter into societies; to depart from their natural liberty; and to subject themselves to government. It was this depravity of the few, (which is often the greater, because born no better than other men, they are educated worse) which obliged men first to subject government to constitution, that they might preserve social, when they gave up natural liberty, and not be oppress'd by arbitrary will. Kings may have preceded lawgivers, for aught I know, or have possibly been the first lawgivers, and government by will have been establish'd before government by constitution. THESEUS might reign at Athens, and EURYTION at Sparta, long before SOLON gave laws to one, and LYCURGUS to the other of these cities. Kings had had govern'd Rome, we know, and consuls had succeeded kings, long before the decemviri compiled a body of law; and the Saxons had their monarchs before EDGAR, tho' the Saxon laws went under his name. These, and a thousand other instances of the same kind, will never serve to prove, what my lord BACON would prove by them, " * that monarchies do not subsist, like other " governments, by a precedent law, or compact; that the original submission to them " was natural, like the obedience of a child " to his parents; and that allegiance to hereditary monarchs is the work of the law " of nature." But that, which these examples prove very plainly is, that however men might submit voluntarily in the primitive simplicity of early ages, or be subjected by conquest, to a government without a constitution, yet they were never long in discovering that, † " to live by one man's will, became the cause of all men's misery," and therefore they soon rejected the yoke, or made it sit easy on their necks. They instituted commonwealths, or they limited monarchies; and here began that struggle between the spirit of liberty and the spirit of dominion, which always hath subsisted, and, that we may not flatter ourselves, nor others, must always subsist, except in those instances, of which the most ancient histories furnish so few, in the reigns of a TITUS, or a TRAJAN; for it might look like flattery to quote the present most auspicious reign.

To govern a society of freemen by a constitution, founded on the eternal rules of right reason, and directed to promote the happiness of the whole, and of every individual, is the noblest prerogative, which can belong to humanity; and if man may be said, without profaneness, to imitate God in any case, this is the case. But sure I am, he imitates the devil, who is so far from promoting the happiness of others, that he makes his own happiness to consist in the misery of others; who governs by no rule but that of his passions, whatever appearances he is forced sometimes to put on; who endeavours to corrupt the innocent, and to enslave the free; whose business is to seduce or betray; whose pleasure is to damn; and whose triumph is to torment. Odious and execrable as this character is, it is the character of every prince, who makes use of his power to subvert, or even to weaken that constitution, which ought to be the rule of his government. When such a prince fills a throne with superior parts, liberty is in the utmost peril; nor does the danger diminish in proportion, if he happens to want them. Such

Such men as we are now to speak of, (friends to the government and enemies to the constitution) will be always at hand to supply his defects; for as they are the willing instruments of a wicked Prince, they are the ready prompters of a weak one. They may sink into the mass of the people, and disappear in a good and wise reign, or work themselves into power under false colours. "Sed genus immortale manet." Their race will continue as long as ambition and avarice prevail in the world, and there will be bad citizens as long as there are bad men. The good ought therefore to be always on their guard against them, and whatever disguise they assume, whatever veils they cast over their conduct, they will never be able to deceive those long, who observe constantly the difference between constitution and government, and who have virtue enough to preserve the cause of the former, how unprofitable soever it may be at all times, and how unpopular soever at some. But I ramble too long in generals. It is high time I should come to those particular measures, by which the men I have described are most likely to carry on their designs against our constitution; after which I shall say something of the methods, by which alone their designs may be prevented, or will be defeated, if a national union oppose itself by such methods as these, in time, to them.

Now,

Now, that I may do this the better, and make what I have to say the more sensibly felt, give me leave to suppose (though I speak of a remote time, and such an one as we ought to hope will never come) that our national circumstances will be just the same as they are now; and our constitution as far distant as it now is from that point of perfection, to which the revolution ought to have brought it, might have brought it, and hath given the nation a right to expect that it should be brought. The completion of that glorious deliverance is still imperfect, after five and forty years, notwithstanding the hopes then given, the engagements then taken, and the opportunities, that have since arisen. How this hath happen'd, by what arts this justice to the constitution hath been hitherto evaded, sometimes in favour of one government, and sometimes in favour of another, might easily be shewn, and proved too, beyond contradiction. But I had rather exhort, than reproach; and especially at a time, when a strong tendency appears among men of all denominations to such a national union, as will effectually obtain the complete settlement of our constitution, which hath been so long delay'd, if it be honestly, prudently and vigorously improved.

It is certain then, that if ever such men as call themselves friends to the government, but are real enemies of the constitution, prevail, vail, they will make it a capital point of their wicked policy to keep up a standing army. False appearances of reason for it will never be wanting, as long as there are pretenders to the crown; though nothing can be more absurd than to employ, in defence of liberty, an instrument so often employ'd to destroy it; tho' nothing can be more absurd than to maintain that any government ought to make use of the same expedient to support itself, as another government, on the ruins of which this government stands, was subverted for using; though nothing can be proved more manifestly by experience than these two propositions; that Britain is enabled, by her situation, to support her government, when the bulk of her people are for it, without employing any means inconsistent with her constitution; and that the bulk of the people are not only always for the government, when the government supports the constitution, but are even hard and slow to be detach'd from it, when the government attacks, or undermines the constitution, and when they are by consequence both justified in resisting, and even obliged in conscience to resist the government.

I HAVE heard it argued lately, that pretenders abroad are a security at home; and that a government, exposed to their attacks, will never venture to attack the constitution. I have been told too, that these notions were entertain'd by some, who drew many political consequences from them at the revolution. But if any of those persons are still alive, I persuade myself that they have alter'd this opinion, since such a situation will furnish, at all times, pretences of danger; since pretences of danger to a government, whether real or imaginary, will be always urged with plausibility, and generally with success, for obtaining new powers, or for straining old ones; and since whilst those, who mean well to the government, are imposed upon by those, who mean ill to the constitution, all true concern for the latter is lost in a mistaken zeal for the former, and the most important is ventured to save the least important, when neither one nor the other would have been exposed, if false alarms had not been rashly and too implicitly taken, or if true alarms had not given unnecessary strength to the government, at the expence of weakening the constitution.

NOTWITHSTANDING what hath been said, I do not imagine that an army would be employ'd by these men, directly and at first, against the nation, and national liberty. I am far from thinking any men can arise, in future times, capable of attempting, in this manner, what some men in our age, who call themselves friends to the government, have been so weak and so imprudent as to avow in print, and publish to the nation.

tion. To destroy British liberty with an army of Britons is not a measure so sure of success, as some people may believe. To corrupt the parliament is a slower, but might prove a more effectual method, and two or three hundred mercenaries in the two houses, if they could be listed there, would be more fatal to the constitution than ten times as many thousands in red and in blue out of them. Parliaments are the true guardians of liberty. For this principally they were instituted; and this is the principal article of that great and noble trust, which the collective body of the people of Britain reposes in the representative. But then no slavery can be so effectually brought and fix'd upon us, as parliamentary slavery. By the corruption of parliament, and the absolute influence of a king, or his minister, on the two houses, we return into that state, to deliver us or secure us from which parliaments were instituted, and are really govern'd by the arbitrary will of one man. Our whole constitution is at once dissolved. Many securities to liberty are provided; but the integrity, which depends on the freedom and the independency of parliament, is the key-stone, that keeps the whole together. If this be shaken, our constitution totters. If it be quite removed, our constitution falls into ruin. That noble fabric, the pride of Britain, the envy of her neighbours, raised by the labour of so many centuries, repair'd at the expence of so many millions, and cemented by such a profusion of blood; that noble fabric, I say, which was able to resist the united efforts of so many races of giants, may be demolish'd by a race of pigmies. The integrity of parliament is a kind of palladium, a tutelary goddess, who protects our state. When she is once removed, we may become the prey of any enemies. NO AGAMEMNON, NO ACHILLES will be wanted to take our city. THERSITES himself will be sufficient for such a conquest. But I need not dwell any longer on this subject. There is no man, who thinks at all, can fail to see the several fatal consequences, which will necessarily flow from this one source, whenever it shall be open'd. If the reason of the thing does not strike him enough, experience must. The single reign of HENRY the eighth will serve to shew that no tyranny can be more severe than that, which is exercised by a concert with parliament; that arbitrary will may be made the sole rule of government, even whilst the names and forms of a free constitution are preserved; that for a prince, or his minister, to become our tyrant, there is no need to abolish parliaments; there is no need that he, who is master of one part of the legislature, should endeavour to abolish the other two, when he can use, upon every occasion, occasion, the united strength of the whole; there is no need he should be a tyrant in the gross, when he can be so in detail, nor in name, when he can be so in effect; that for parliaments to establish tyranny, there is no need therefore to repeal Magna Charta, or any other of the great supports of our liberty. It is enough, if they put themselves corruptly and servilely under the influence of such a prince, or such a minister. On the whole, I conclude that, in the possible case here supposed, the first and principal object will be to destroy the constitution, under pretence of preserving the government, by corrupting our parliaments. I am the better founded in concluding that this may happen in some future age, by what we may observe in our own. There is surely but too much reason to suspect, that the enemies of our constitution may attempt hereafter to govern by corruption, when we hear and see the friends and advocates of our present most incorrupt minister harangue and scribble, in favour of corruption; when it is pleaded for and recommended, as a necessary expedient of government, by some men of all ranks and orders; not only by profess'd hirelings, who write that they may eat; but by men, who have talk'd and written themselves already out of their native obscurity and penury, by affecting zeal in the cause of liberty; not only by such as these, but by men, whose birth, education and fortune aggravate their crime and their folly; by men, whom honour at least should restrain from favouring so dishonourable a cause; and by men, whose peculiar obligations to preach up morality should restrain them, at least, from being the preachers of an immorality, above all others, abominable in its nature, and pernicious in its effects.

These men are ready, I know, to tell us, that the influence they plead for is necessary to strengthen the hands of those, who govern; that corruption serves to oil the wheels of government, and to render the administration more smooth and easy; and that it can never be of dangerous consequence, under the present father of our country. Absurd and wicked triflers! according to them our excellent constitution (as one of your correspondents hath observed extremely well) "is no better than a jumble of incompatible powers, which would separate and fall to pieces of themselves, unless restrain'd and upheld by such honourable methods as those of bribery and corruption." They would prove, that the form of our government is defective to a degree of ridiculousness. But the ridicule, as well as the iniquity, is their own. A good government can want no power, under the present constitution. A bad one may, and it is fit it should.

Popularity

Popularity is the expedient of one, and will effectually support it. Nothing but corruption can support the other. If there was a real deficiency of power in the crown, it ought to be supplied, no doubt. The old whimsies of prerogative should not be revived; but limitations ought to be taken off, or new powers to be given. The friends of liberty acknowledge, that a balance, of the powers, divided among the three parts of the legislature, is essential to our constitution, and necessary to support it. The friends of liberty therefore would concur, at least to a certain point, with the friends of the ministry; for the former are friends to order, and enemies to licence. For decency's sake therefore, let the debate be put on this issue. Let it be such a debate as freemen may avow, without blushing. To argue for this supposed deficiency of power in the crown, in favour of a scheme of government, repugnant to all laws divine and human, is such an instance of abandon'd, villainous prostitution, as the most corrupt ages never saw, and as will place the present age, with infamous preheminance, at the head of them; unless the nation do itself justice, and fix the brand on those, who ought alone to bear it. Thus much for the iniquity of the practice pleaded for. As to the danger of it, let us agree that a prince, of such magnanimity and justice as our present monarch, can never never be tempted by any sordid motives to forget the recent obligation, which he and his family have to the British nation, by whom they were made kings; nor to aim at greater power and wealth than are consistent with the safety of the constitution they are entrusted to preserve, and obliged to secure. Allowing this to be our present case, (and concerning our present case, there are not two opinions, I dare say, in the whole nation) yet still the symptoms I have mention'd shew that the poison, with which these pretended friends of the government, and real enemies of the constitution, corrupt the morals of mankind, hath made some progress; and if this progress be not immediately check'd by proper antidotes, and the power of poisoning taken from these empiricks, the disease will grow incurable. The last dismal effect of it may not, or, if you please, cannot happen in this reign; but it may, nay it must happen in some other, unless we prevent it effectually and soon; and what season more proper to prevent it in, and to compleat the security of our liberties, than the reign of a prince, for whom the nation hath done so much, and from whom by consequence the nation hath a right to expect so much? King WILLIAM deliver'd us from popery and slavery. There was wisdom in his councils, and fortitude in his conduct. He steer'd through many difficulties culties at home, and he fought our battles abroad; and yet those points of security, which had been neglected, or not sufficiently provided for, in the honey-moon of his accession, were continually press'd upon him, during the whole course of his reign. The men, who press'd them, were call'd jacobites, tories, republicans, and incendiaries too, not from the throne indeed, but by the clamour of those, who shew'd great indifference at least for the constitution, whilst they affected great zeal for the government. They succeeded however in part, and we enjoy the benefit of their success. If they did not succeed in the whole; if the settlement necessary to secure our liberty, and therefore intended at the revolution, be not yet compleat; let us be persuaded, and let us act on that persuasion, that the honour of compleating it was reserved to crown the glories of the present reign. To finish the great work, which king WILLIAM began, of establishing the liberties of Britain on firm and durable foundations, must be imputed an honour surely; and to whom can this honour belong more justly than to a prince, who emulates in so remarkable a manner all the other heroic virtues of his renown'd predecessor?

LETTER XI.

S I R,

IF it was possible for any man, who hath the least knowledge of our constitution, to doubt in good earnest whether the preservation of public freedom depends on the preservation of parliamentary freedom, his doubts might be removed and his opinion decided, one would imagine, by this single obvious remark ; that all the designs of our princes against liberty, since parliaments began to be establish'd on the model still subsisting, have been directed constantly to one of these two points ; either to obtain such parliaments as they could govern ; or else to stand all the difficulties, and to run all the hazards of governing without parliaments. The means principally employ'd, to the first of these purposes, have been undue influences on the elections of members of the house of commons, and on these members, when chosen. When such influence could be employ'd successfully, they have answer'd all the ends of arbitrary will ; and when they could not be so employ'd, arbitrary will hath been forced to submit to the constitution. This hath been the case, not only since, but before that great change in the balance of property, which began in the reigns of HENRY the seventh and HENRY the eighth, and carry'd a great part of the weight into the scale of the commons, which had lain before in the scale of the peers and clergy.

IF we look back as far as the close of the XIVth century, (an æra pretty near to that, when parliaments received their present form) we shall find both these means employ'd by one of the worst of our kings, RICHARD the second. That he might obtain his will, which was rash, he directed mandates to his sheriffs (officers of the crown and appointed by the crown; for such they were then, and such they still are) to return certain persons nominated by himself; and thus he acquired an undue influence over the elections. In the next place, he obliged the persons thus return'd, sometimes by threats and terror, and sometimes by gifts, to consent to those things, which were prejudicial to the realm; and thus he acquired an undue influence over the house of commons; so that upon the whole, the arbitrary will of a rash, headstrong prince, and the suggestions of his wicked ministers, guided the proceedings of parliament, and became the law of the land. I might pursue observations of the same kind through several succeeding reigns; but to avoid lengthening these letters, which are grown perhaps too long already, let us descend scend at once to the reign of king CHARLES the second ; for in that we shall find examples of all the means, which a court, that hath common sense, and a prince, who will not set his crown on the cast of a die, can take to undermine the foundations of liberty, either by governing parliaments, or by governing without them.

Now the first attempt, of this kind, which king CHARLES made against the constitution, was this. He improved and managed the spirit of the first parliament he call'd, so as to render the two houses obsequious to his will, almost in every case; and having got the TRIENNIAL BILL repeal'd, he kept the same parliament in being for many years by prorogations; which crept into custom long before his time, but were still a modern invention with respect to the primitive institution of parliaments, and wholly repugnant to the antient practice. Thus he establish'd a standing parliament; which is, in the nature of it, as dangerous as a standing army, and may become, in some conjunctures, much more fatal to liberty. When the measures of his administration grew too bad, and the tendency of them too apparent to be defended and supported, even in that parliament, and even by a party-spirit, he had recourse to a second attempt; that is, to corruption, and CLIFFORD first list'd a mercenary band of friends to the government against the constitution. Let us observe on this occasion, and as we pass along, that a national party (such a party as the court adopts, in contradistinction to such a party as it creates) will always retain some national principles, some regard to the constitution. They may be transported, or surprized, during the heat of contest especially, into measures of long and fatal consequences. They may be carried on for a certain time, and to a certain point, by the lusts of vengeance and of power, in order to wreak one upon their adversaries, and to secure the other to themselves. But a national party will never be the instruments of completing national ruin. They will become the adversaries of their friends, and the friends of their adversaries, to prevent it; and the minister, who persists in so villainous a project, by what name soever he may affect to distinguish himself and his followers, will be found really at the head of a faction, not of a party. But the difference between one and the other is so visible, and the boundaries, where party ceases and faction commences, are so strongly mark'd, that it is sufficient to point at them.

I RETURN therefore and observe, that when the spirit of party fail'd king CHARLES, and the corruption he employ'd proved ineffectual, he resolv'd to govern for a time without parliaments, and to employ that time, as soon as he had check'd the spirit of one party, by inflaming that of another, in garbling corporations. He had found by experience that it was impossible to corrupt the stream in any great degree, as long as the fountain continued pure. He apply'd himself therefore to spread the taint of the court in them, and to poison these springs, from whence the health and vigour of the constitution flow. This was the third, the last, and by much the most dangerous expedient, employ'd by the friends of the government, in the reign of king CHARLES the second, to undermine our liberties. The effect of it he did not live to see; but we may easily conjecture what it would have been.

THE use I make of what hath been here said is this. The design of the revolution being not only to save us from the immediate attempts on our religion and liberty, made by king JAMES, but to save us from all other attempts, which had been made, or might be made, of the same tendency; to renew and strengthen our constitution; * “ to establish the peace, honour and happiness of these nations upon lasting foundations, and to procure a settlement of the religion, and of the liberties and properties of the subjects; upon so sure a foundation, that there might be no danger of the nation's relapsing

" into the like miseries at any time hereaf" ter;" this being, I say, the avow'd design of the revolution, and the nation having engaged in it on a confidence that all this would be effectually perform'd, the design of the revolution was not accomplish'd, the benefit of it was not secured to us, the just expectations of the nation could not be answer'd, unless the freedom of elections, and the frequency, integrity, and independency of parliaments were sufficiently provided for. These are the essentials of British liberty. Defects in other parts of the constitution can never be fatal, if these are preserved entire. But defects in these will soon destroy the constitution, though every other part of it should be so preserved. However it happen'd, the truth and notoriety of the fact oblige us to say, that these important conditions, without which liberty can never be secure, were almost wholly neglected at the revolution.
 The claim of right declares, indeed, that " elections ought to be free; that freedom of " speech and debates ought not to be im" peach'd or question'd out of parliament;
 " and that parliaments ought to be held fre" quently." But such declarations, however solemnly made, are nothing better than pompous trifles, if they stand alone; productive of no good, and thus far productive of ill, that they serve to amuse mankind, in points

concerns them the most nearly, neither to be deceived, nor so much as amused. These were rights, no doubt, to which the nation had an indisputable claim. But then they ought to have been more than claim'd, since they had been so often and so lately invaded. That they were not more than claim'd, that they were not effectually asserted and secured, at this time, gave very great and immediate dissatisfaction; and they, who were called whigs in those days, distinguish'd themselves by the loudness of their complaints. Thus for instance, they insisted that there could be no * real settlement, nay that it was a jest, to talk of settlement, till the manner and time of calling parliaments, and their sitting, when called, were fully determined; and this, in order to prevent the practice of keeping one and the same parliament so long on foot, till the majority was corrupted by offices, gifts and pensions. They insisted that the assurances given at the revolution had led them to think that † the antient legal course of annually chosen parliaments would have been immediately restored; and the particular circumstances of king WILLIAM, who had received the crown by gift of the people, and who had renew'd the original contract with the people,

THE frequent sitting of parliament was indeed provided for, indirectly and in consequence, by the exigencies of the war, which soon follow'd the revolution. This war made annual supplies necessary; and, before it was over, the same necessity of annual sessions of parliament came to be establish'd, as it continues to this hour, by the great alteration made with relation to the public revenue. The whole public revenue had been the king's formerly. Parliamentary aids were, in those days, extraordinary and occasional; and things came to that pass at last, that parliaments were more frequently, or more rarely convened, just as courts had more frequent, or more rare occasions for such supplies. But king WILLIAM began to be, and all our princes since him have continued to be, only proprietors for life of that part of the public revenue, which is appropriated to their civil-list; although they are entrusted still with the management of the whole; and are even the stewards of the public creditors for that part, which is the private property of these creditors. This is the present state, sufficiently known, but necessary to be mention'd particularly on this occasion; and this must continue to be the state; unless some prince should arise hereafter, who being advised by a desperate minister, abetted by a mercenary faction, supported by a standing army, and instigated like RICHARD the second, by the * rashness of his own temper, may lay rapacious hands on all the funds that have been created, and by applying illegally what he may raise legally, convert the whole to his own use, and so establish arbitrary power, by depriving at one stroke many of his subjects of their property, and all of them of their liberty. Till this happens, (and heaven forbid that it should be ever attempted!) sessions of parliament must be annually held, or the government itself be distress'd. But neither is this such a direct and full security as the importance of the thing requires; nor does the security of our liberty consist only in the frequent sessions of parliament; but it consists likewise in frequent new parliaments. Nay, it consists so much more in this than in the other, that the former may tend, without the latter, even more than the discontinuance of parliaments, to the loss of liberty. This was foreseen by the wisdom of our constitution: According to that, although it became in time (by the course of events, and insensible alterations) no longer necessary to call parliaments once, or even twice in a

year, which had been the more antient practice, yet still our kings continued under an incapacity of proceeding long in government, with any tolerable ease and safety to themselves, without the concurrence and assistance of these assemblies. According to the same constitution, as parliaments were to be held, so they were to be chosen frequently; and the opinion, that the holding and continuance of parliaments depended absolutely on the will of the prince, may be justly ranked amongst those attempts, that were made by some men to set the law, whilst others endeavoured to set the gospel, on the side of arbitrary power. This is the plain intent and scheme of our constitution, which provides that the representatives of the people should have frequent opportunities to communicate together about national grievances; to complain of them, and to obtain the redress of them, in an orderly, solemn, legal manner; and that the people should have frequent opportunities of calling their representatives to account, as it were, for the discharge of the trust committed to them, and of approving, or disapproving their conduct, by electing, or not electing them anew. Thus our constitution supposes that princes may abuse their power, and parliaments betray their trust; and provides, as far as human wisdom can provide, that neither one, nor the other, may be able to do so long, without a sufficient controul. If the crown, indeed, persists in usurping on the liberty of the people, or in any other kind of mal-administration; and if the prince, who wears it, proves deaf, as our princes have sometimes been, to the voice of his parliament and his people, there remains no remedy in the system of the constitution. The constitution is broken by the obstinacy of the prince, and the * “people must appeal to heaven in this, as in all other cases, where they have no judge on earth.” Thus if a parliament should persist in abetting mal-administration, or any way give up those liberties, which they were intrusted to maintain, no doubt can be made but that the people would be in the same case; since their representatives have no more right to betray them, than their kings have to usurp upon them; and by consequence they would acquire the same right of appealing to heaven, if our constitution had not provided a remedy against this evil, which could not be provided against the other; but our constitution hath provided such a remedy in the frequent succession of new parliaments, by which there is not time sufficient given to form a majority of the representatives of the people into a ministerial cabal; or by which, if this should happen, such a cabal must be soon broken. These reflections

and such others, as they naturally suggest, are sufficient to convince any thinking man, first, that nothing could make it safe, nor therefore reasonable, to repose in any set of men whatsoever, so great a trust as the collective body delegates to the representative in this kingdom, except the shortness of the term, for which this trust is delegated. Secondly, that every prolongation of this term is therefore, in its degree, unsafe for the people; that it weakens their security, and endangers liberty, by the very powers given for its preservation. Thirdly, that such prolongations expose the nation, in the possible case of having a corrupt parliament, to lose the great advantage, which our constitution hath provided, of curing the evil, before it grows confirm'd and desperate, by the gentle method of chusing a new representative, and reduce the nation by consequence to have no other alternative than that of submitting, or resisting; though submission will be as grievous, and resistance much more difficult, when the legislature betrays its trust, than when the king alone abuses his power. These reflections, I say, are sufficient to prove these propositions; and these propositions set before us, in a very strong light, the necessity of using our utmost efforts, that the true design of our constitution may be pursued as closely as possible by the re-establishment of annual, or at least of triennial parliaments. But the importance of the matter, and the particular reasonableness of the conjuncture, invite me to offer one consideration more upon this head, which I think will not strike the less for being obvious and plain. It is this. Should a king obtain, for many years at once, the supplies and powers which used to be granted annually to him; this would be deem'd, I presume, even in the present age, an unjustifiable measure and an intolerable grievance, for this plain reason; because it would alter our constitution in the fundamental article, that requires frequent assemblies of the whole legislature, in order to assist and controul too, the executive power, which is intrusted with one part of it. Now I ask, is not the article, which requires frequent elections of the representatives by the collective body of the people, in order to secure the latter against the ill consequences of the possible weakness or corruption of the former, as fundamental an article, and as essential to the preservation of our liberties, as the other? No man dares say that it is not; at least no man, who deserves our attention. The people of Britain have as good a right, and a right as necessary to be asserted, to keep their representatives true to the trust reposed in them, and to the preservation of the constitution, by the controul of frequent elections,

as they have to keep their kings true to the trust reposed in them, and to the preservation of the constitution, by the controul of frequent sittings of parliament. How comes it then to pass, that we may observe so great a difference in the sentiments of mankind, about these two cases? Propose the first, there is no servile friend of government, who will not affect all that horror at the proposition, which every friend of the constitution will really feel. Propose the keeping up septennial, nay the making decennial parliaments, the same friends of government will contend strenuously for one, and by consequence for both; since there can be no reason alledged for the first, which is not stronger for the last, and would not be still stronger for a longer term. These reasons, drawn from two or three common-place topics of pretended conveniency and expediency, or of supposed tranquillity at home, and strength abroad, I need not mention. They have been mention'd by others, and sufficiently refuted. But that, which may very justly appear marvellous, is this, that some men, I think not many, who are true friends of the constitution, have been stagger'd in their opinions, and almost seduced by the false reasonings of these friends of government; though nothing can be more easy than to shew, from reason and experience, that conveniency, expediency, and domestic tranquillity quillity may be, and in fact have been as well, nay better secured, under triennial, nay annual parliaments, than under parliaments of a longer continuance; and as for strength abroad, (that is, national credit and influence) it will depend on the opinion foreign nations have of our national dispositions, and the unanimity of our sentiments. It must be chiefly determined therefore by their knowledge of their real sense of the nation. Now that can appear no way so much as in the natural state of our constitution, by frequent elections; and when it does appear so, it must have another kind of effect, than the bare resolutions of a stale, ministerial parliament; especially if it happens, as it may happen in some future time, that the sense of the nation should appear to be different from the sense of such a parliament; and that the resolutions of such a parliament should be avowedly dictated by men, odious and hated, contemptible and contemn'd, both at home and abroad.

BUT in the supposition that some inconveniencies may arise by frequent elections; (which is only allow'd for argument's sake) are such inconveniencies, and the trifling consequences of them, to be set in the balance against the danger of weakening any one barrier of our liberty? Every form of government hath advantages and disadvantages vantages peculiar to it. Thus absolute monarchies seem most form'd for sudden and vigorous efforts of power, either in attacking, or in defending; whilst, in free constitutions, the forms of government must be necessarily more complicated and slow; so that in these, the same secrecy cannot be always kept, nor the same dispatch always made, nor the same steadiness of measures always pursued. Must all these forms, instituted to preserve the checks and controuls of the several parts of the constitution on one another, and necessary by consequence to preserve the liberty of the whole, be abandon'd therefore, and a free constitution be destroy'd, for the sake of some little conveniency, or expediency the more, in the administration of public affairs? No certainly. We must keep our free constitution; with the small defects belonging to it, or we must change it for an arbitrary government, free perhaps from these defects, but liable to more and to worse. In short, we must make our option; and surely this option is not hard to be made, between the real and permanent blessings of liberty, diffused through a whole nation, and the fantastick and accidental advantages, which they, who govern not the body of the people, enjoy under absolute monarchies. I will not multiply instances, though they crowd in upon me.

Two

Two consuls were chosen annually at Rome, and the proconsular power in the government of provinces was limited to a year. Several inconveniencies arose, no doubt, from the strict observation of this institution. Some appear very plain in history; and we may assure ourselves, that many arguments of conveniency, of expediency, of preserving the tranquillity of the city, and of giving strength and weight to the arms and counsels of the commonwealth, were urged to prevail on the people to dispense with these institutions, in favour of POMPEY and of CÆSAR. What was the consequence? The pirates were extirpated, the price of corn was reduced, Spain was held in subjection, Gaul was conquer'd, the Germans were repulsed, Rome triumph'd, her government flourish'd; but her constitution was destroy'd, her liberty was lost. The law of Habeas Corpus, that noble badge of liberty, which every subject of Britain wears, and by which he is distinguish'd so eminently, not from the slaves alone, but even from the freemen of other countries; the law of Habeas Corpus, I say, may be attended perhaps with some little inconveniencies, in time of sedition and rebellion. The slow methods of giving money, and the strict appropriations of it, when given, may be attended with some inconveniency likewise, in times of danger and in great exigencies of

of the state. But who will plead for the repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act? or who would not press for the revival of it, if it stood suspended for an indefinite, or even a long term? Who will say, that the practice of giving money without account, or passing notes of credit (by which the purse of the people is taken out of the hands of those, whom the people trusted, and put into the hands of those, whom they neither did, nor would have trusted) who will say, that such a deviation from those rules of parliament, which ought to be deem'd sacred and preserved inviolate, may be establish'd, or should not be opposed by all possible means, if it was establish'd?

If all this be as clear as I imagine it is; if the objections to frequent elections of parliaments do not lie; or, supposing them to lie, if the danger on one side outweighs vastly the supposed inconveniency on the other; nay, if laws and institutions, not more essential to the preservation of liberty than this antient and fundamental rule of our constitution, be maintain'd; and if all men are forced to agree (even they, who wish them perhaps abolish'd) that they ought to be maintain'd, for the sake of preserving liberty; let me ask again, how comes it to pass that we observe so great a difference between the sentiments and reasonings of mankind about frequent sessions of parliament, ment, and frequent parliaments; about the case now before us, and all the others, that have been mention'd? The only manner, in which I can account for such an inconsistency, is this. The fight of the mind differs very much from the fight of the body, and its operations are frequently the reverse of the other. Objects at a distance appear to the former in their true magnitude, and diminish as they are brought nearer. The event, that created much astonishment, indignation, or terror in prospect, creates less and less, as it approaches, and by the time it happens, men have familiarized themselves with it. If the Romans had been told, in the days of AUGUSTUS, that an emperor would succeed, in whose reign a horse should be made consul, they would have been extremely surprized. I believe they were not so much surprized, when the thing happen'd; when the horse was consul and CALIGULA emperor. If it had been foretold to those patriots at the revolution, who remember'd long parliaments, who still felt the smart of them, who struggled hard for annual, and obtain'd with much difficulty, at the end of five or six years, triennial parliaments, that a time would come, when even the term of triennial parliaments would be deem'd too short, and a parliament, chosen for three years, would chuse itself for four more, and entail septennial nial parliaments on the nation; that this would happen, and the fruits of their honest labours be lost, in little more than twenty years; and that it would be brought about, whilst our government continued on the foundations they had then so newly laid; if all this had been foretold at the time I mention, it would have appear'd improbable and monstrous to the friends of the revolution. Yet it hath happen'd; and, in less then twenty years, it is grown, or is growing, familiar to us. The uniform zeal and complaisance of our parliaments for the crown, leave little room to apprehend any attempt to govern without them; or to make them do in one session the work of seven; tho' this would be extremely convenient, no doubt, a great ease to future ministers, and a great saving of expence and time to country gentlemen. But suppose, (for I desire it may be remember'd that I reason hypothetically) a parliament, should think fit to give, in the first session, all the money, all the credit, and all the powers, necessary for carrying on the government, during seven years; and then let those persons, who will be shock'd at this supposition, and yet declare themselves for septennial parliaments, lay their hands on their hearts, and consider whether such an alteration of the constitution might not grow familiar to them, and even gain their approbation.

probation. I think, it would do so. I am sure, it might as reasonably as the other. They would find the ease, in one case, of little attendance, as much as that of distant elections, in the other. The arguments of conveniency, expediency, public tranquillity, and strength to the government, would be just as well apply'd; and if the ministers should, by miracle, make no very exorbitant ill use of such a situation, I doubt whether he, who should plead for annual parliaments then, would be much better heard by the same persons, than he who pleads for frequent elections of parliaments, is now. But let not the lovers of liberty, the friends of our constitution, reason in this manner. Let them remember that danger commences, when the breach is made, not when the attack is begun; that he, who neglects to stop the leak, as soon as it is discover'd, in hopes to save his ship by pumping, when the water gushes in by violence, deserves to be drown'd; and, to lay aside figures of speech, that our constitution is not, like the schemes of some politicians, a jumble of disjointed, incoherent whimsies, but a noble and wise system, the essential parts of which are so proportion'd, and so intimately connected, that a change in one begets a change in the whole; that the frequent elections of parliament are as much an essential part of this system, as the frequent frequent sittings of parliament; that the work of the revolution is imperfect therefore, and our future security precarious, unless our antient constitution be restored, in this essential part; and that the restoration of it, in this part, is one of those methods, by which alone the pernicious designs of such men, as we have mention'd in a former letter, if any such should be ever admitted into power, (enemies to the constitution, under the mask of zeal for the government) may be defeated.

S I R,

WE have observed already, that the constitution of the British government supposes our kings may abuse their power, and our representatives betray their trust; and provides against both these contingencies, as well as human wisdom can provide. Here let us observe, that the same constitution is very far from supposing the people will ever betray themselves; and yet this case is possible, no doubt. We do not read, I think, of more than * one nation, who refused liberty, when it was offer'd to them; but we read of many, and have almost seen some, who lost it through their fault, by the plain and necessary consequences of their own conduct, when they were in full possession of it, and had the means of securing it effectually in their power. A wise and brave people will neither be cozen'd, nor bully'd out of their liberty; but a wise and brave people may cease to be such; they may degenerate; they may sink into sloth and luxury; they may resign themselves to a treacherous conduct; or abet the enemies of the constitution, under a notion of supporting the friends of the government; they want the sense to discern their danger in time; or the courage to resist, when it stares them in the face. The TARQUINS were expell'd, and Rome resumed her liberty. CÆSAR was murder'd, and all his race extinct; but Rome remain'd in bondage. From whence this difference? † MACHIAVEL shall account for it. In the days of TARQUIN the people of Rome were not yet corrupted. In the days of CÆSAR, they were most corrupt. A free people may be sometimes betray'd; but no people will betray themselves, and sacrifice their liberty, unless they fall into a state of universal corruption; and when they are once fallen into such a state, they will be sure to lose what they deserve no longer to enjoy. To what purpose therefore should our constitution have supposed a case, in which no remedy can avail; a case which can never happen, till the spirit, which form'd this constitution first, and hath preserved it ever since, shall be totally extinguish'd; and till it becomes an ideal entity, like the Utopia, existing in the imagination, or memory, no where else? As all government began, so all government must end by the people; tyrannical governments by their virtue and courage, and even free governments by their vice and baseness. Our constitution, indeed, makes it impossible to destroy liberty by any sudden blast of popular fury, or by the treachery of a few; for though the many cannot easily hurt, they may easily save themselves. But if the many will concur with the few; if they will advisedly and deliberately suffer their liberty to be taken away by those, to whom they delegate power to preserve it; this no constitution can prevent. God would not support even his own theocracy against the concurrent desire of the children of Israel, but gave them a king in his anger. How then should our human constitution of government support itself against so universal a change, as we here suppose, in the temper and character of our people? It cannot be. We may give ourselves a tyrant in our folly, if we please. But this can never happen, till the whole nation falls into a state of political reprobation. Then, and not till then, political damnation will be our lot.

LET us descend into a greater detail, in order to develope these reflections fully, and to push the consequences of them home to ourselves, and to our present state. They deserve our utmost attention; and are so far from being foreign to the subject of these essays upon parties, that they will terminate in the very point at which we began, and wind up the whole in one important lesson.

To proceed then; I say, that if the people of this island should suffer their liberties to be at any time ravish'd, or stolen from them, they would incur greater blame, and deserve by consequence less pity, than any enslaved and oppress'd people ever did. By how much true liberty (that is, liberty stated and ascertain'd by law, in equal opposition to popular licence and arbitrary will) hath been more boldly asserted, more wisely or more successfully improved, and more firmly establish'd in this, than in other countries; by so much the more heavy would our just condemnation prove in the case that is here supposed. The virtue of our ancestors, to whom all these advantages are owing, would aggravate the guilt and the infamy of their degenerate posterity. There have been ages of gold and of silver, of brass and of iron, in our little world, as in the great world, though not in the same order. In which of these ages we are at present, let others determine. This, at least, is certain, that in all these ages, Britain hath been the temple, as it were, of liberty. Whilst her sacred fires have been extinguish'd in so many countries, here they have been religiously kept alive. Here she hath her saints, her confessors, and a whole army of martyrs, and the gates of hell have not hitherto prevail'd against her; so that if a fatal reverse is to happen; if servility and servitude are to over-run the whole world, like injustice, and liberty is to retire from it, like ASTRÆA; our portion of the abandon'd globe will have, at least, the mournful honour, whenever it happens, of shewing her last, her parting steps.

THE antient Britons are to us the aborigines of our island. We discover little of them through the gloom of antiquity, and we see nothing beyond them. This however we know; they were freemen. CÆSAR, who visited them in an hostile manner, but did not conquer them, perhaps was * beaten by them; CÆSAR, I say, bestows very liberally the title of kings upon their chieftains, and the compilers of fabulous traditions deduce a series of their monarchies from SAMOTHES, a cotemporary of NIMROD. But CÆSAR affected to swell the account of his expedition with pompous names; and these writers, like those whom † STRABO mentions, endeavour'd to recommend themselves by publishing romances to an ignorant generation, instead of histories. These supposed monarchs were the * heads of little clans; "reguli, vel melioris notæ nobiles;" and if our island knew any authority of the kingly sort in those days, it was that of occasional and temporary monarchs, elected in great exigencies, ‡ "communi consilio, suffragiis multitudinis," like CASSIVELLAUNUS in Britain, or VERCINGETORIX in Gaul; for, in some cases, examples taken from either of these people, will conclude for both. The kings, who have ruled in Britain, after the Romans abandon'd the island, in the beginning of the Vth century, held their authority from the people, and govern'd under the controul of national assemblies, as we have great reason to believe, and none to doubt. In short, as far as we can look back, a lawless power, a government by will, never prevail'd in Britain.

THE Saxons had kings, as well as the Britons. The manner in which they establish'd themselves, and the long wars they waged for and against the Britons, led to and maintain'd monarchical rule amongst them. But these kings were in their first institution, no doubt, such as TACITUS describes the German kings and princes to have been; * chiefs, who persuaded, rather than commanded; and who were heard in the public assemblies of the nation, according as their age, their nobility, their military fame, or their eloquence gave them authority. How many doughty monarchs, in later and more polite ages, would have slept in cottages, and have work'd in stalls, instead of inhabiting palaces, and being cushion'd up in thrones, if this rule of government had continued in force? But the Saxon kings grew into power in time; and among them, as among other nations, birth, instead of merit, became, for the sake of order and tranquillity, a title to the throne. However, tho' these princes might command, and were no longer under the necessity of governing by persuasion, they were still under that of governing to the satisfaction of the people. By what other expedient could they govern men, who were wise enough to preserve and exercise the right of electing their civil magistrates, and military officers, and the system of whose government was upheld and carried on by a gradation of popular assemblies, from the inferior courts to the high court of parliament; for such, or very near such, was the Wittena-gemote in nature and effect, whenever the word parliament came into use?

THE first prince of the Norman race was an absolute conqueror, in the opinion of some men; and I can readily agree, that he assumed, in some cases, the power of a tyrant. But supposing all this to be true in the utmost extent, that the friends of absolute monarchy can desire it should be thought so; this, and this alone, will result from it; unlimited, or absolute monarchy, could never be establish'd in Britain; no, not even by conquest. The rights of the people were soon re-asserted; the laws of the confessor were restored; and the third prince of this race, HENRY the first, covenanted in a solemn speech to his people for their assistance against his brother ROBERT and the Normans, by promising that sacred charter, which was in other reigns so often and so solemnly confirm'd by engaging to maintain his subjects in * their antient liberties, to follow their advice, and to rule them in peace with prudence and mildness.

I NEED

I NEED not descend into more particulars to shew the perpetuity of free government in Britain. Few men, even in this age, are so shamefully unacquainted with the history of their country, as to be ignorant of the principal events and signal revolutions, which have happen'd since the Norman æra. One continual design against liberty hath been carry'd on by various methods, almost in every reign. In many, the struggles have been violent and bloody. But liberty still hath triumph'd over force, over treachery, over corruption, and even under oppression. The altars of tyranny have been demolish'd as soon as raised; nay, even whilst they were raising; and the priests of that idol have been hew'd to pieces; so that I will affirm, without the least apprehension of being disproved, that our constitution is brought nearer than any other constitution ever was to the most perfect idea of a free system of government. One observation only I will make, before I leave this head, and it is this. The titles of those kings, which were precarious, from circumstances of times, and notions that prevail'd, notwithstanding the general acquiescence of the nation to them, afforded so many opportunities to our ancestors of better securing, or improving liberty. They were not such hubbles as to alter, without mending the government; much less to make revolutions, lutions, and suffer by them. They were not such bubbles as to raise princes to the throne, who had no pretence to sit in it but their choice, purely to have the honour of bettering the condition of those princes, without bettering their own in proportion. If what I have been saying appears a little too digressive from the main scope of this essay, I shall hope for indulgence from this consideration, that the natural effect of such reflections, as I have made and suggested, must be to raise in our minds the honest ambition of emulating the virtue and courage of our forefathers, in the cause of liberty; and to inspire a reasonable fear, heighten'd by shame, of losing what they preserved and delivered down to us, through so many mixtures of different people, of Britons with Saxons, of both with Danes, of all three with Normans, through so many difficulties, so many dangers, so many revolutions, in the course of so many centuries.

THERE is another reason to be given, why the people of this island would be more inexcusable than any other, if they lost their liberty; and the opening and enforcing of this reason will bring us fully into our subject.

I SUPPOSED just now, that our liberty might be ravish'd, or stolen from us, but I think that expression must be retracted, since it will appear, upon due consideration, that our liberty cannot be taken away by the force, or fraud alone of those, who govern; it cannot be taken away, unless the people are themselves accomplices; and they who are accomplices, cannot be said to suffer by one, or the other. Some nations have received the yoke of servitude with little or no struggle; but if ever it is imposed upon us, we must not only hold out our necks to receive it; we must help to put it on. Now, to be passive in such a case is shameful; but to be active is supreme and unexampled infamy. In order to become slaves, we of this nation must be beforehand, what other people have been render'd by a long course of servitude; we must become the most corrupt, most profligate, the most senseless, the most servile nation of wretches, that ever disgraced humanity; for a force sufficient to ravish liberty from us, such as a great standing army is in time of peace, cannot be continued, unless we continue it; nor can the means, necessary to steal liberty from us, be long enough employ'd with effect, unless we give a sanction to their iniquity, and call good evil, and evil good.

IT may be said, that even the friends of liberty have sometimes different notions about it, and about the means of maintaining, or promoting it; and therefore, that even the British nation may possibly, some time or other, approve and concur in measures destructive of their liberty, without any intention to give it up, and much more without changing from the character, which they have hitherto borne amongst the societies of mankind, to that infamous character I have just now supposed. If this were true, it would only furnish more reasons to be always on our guard, to be jealous of every extraordinary demand, and to reject constantly every proposition, though never so specious, that had a tendency to weaken the barriers of liberty, or to raise a strength superior to theirs. But I confess I do not think we can be led blindfold so far as the brink of the precipice. I know that all words, which are signs of complex ideas, furnish matter of mistake and cavil. We dispute about justice, for instance, and fancy that we have different opinions about the same thing; whilst, by some little difference in the composition of our ideas, it happens that we have only different opinions about different things, and should be of the same opinion about the same thing. But this, I presume, cannot happen in the case before us. All disputes about liberty in this country, and at this time, must be disputes for and against the self-same, fix'd and invariable set of ideas, whatever the disputants on one side of the question may pretend, in order to conceal what it is not yet yet very safe to avow. No disputes can possibly arise from different conceptions of any thing so clearly stated, and so precisely determined, as the fundamental principles are, on which our whole liberty rests.

If liberty be that delicious and wholesome fruit on which the British nation hath fed for so many ages, and to which we owe our riches, our strength, and all the advantages we boast of; the British constitution is the tree that bears this fruit, and will continue to bear it, as long as we are careful to fence it in, and trench it round, against the beasts of the field, and the insects of the earth. To speak without a figure, our constitution is a system of government suited to the genius of our nation, and even to our situation. The experience of many hundred years hath shewn, that by preserving this constitution inviolate, or by drawing it back to the principles on which it was originally founded, whenever it shall be made to swerve from them, we may secure to ourselves, and to our latest posterity, the possession of that liberty, which we have long enjoy'd. What would we more? What other liberty than this do we seek? And if we seek no other, is not this mark'd out in such characters, as he that runs may read? As our constitution therefore ought to be, what it seldom is, the rule of government; so let us make the conformity, or

repugnancy of things to this constitution, the rule, by which we accept them as favourable, or reject them as dangerous to liberty. They who talk of liberty in Britain on any other principles than those of the British constitution, talk impertinently at best, and much charity is requisite to believe no worse of them. But they who distinguish between practicable and impracticable liberty, in order to insinuate what they mean, (or they mean nothing) that the liberty establish'd by the true scheme of our constitution is of the impracticable kind; and they, who endeavour, both in speculation and practice, to elude and pervert the forms, and to ridicule and explode the spirit of this constitution; these men are enemies, open and avow'd enemies to it, and by consequence to British liberty, which cannot be supported on any other bottom. Some men there are, the pests of society I think them, who pretend a great regard to religion in general, but who take every opportunity of declaiming publicly against that system of religion, or at least against that church-establishment, which is received in Britain. Just so the men, of whom I have been speaking, affect a great regard to liberty in general, but they dislike so much the system of liberty establish'd in Britain, that they are incessant in their endeavours to puzzle the plainest thing in the world, and to refine and distinguish away the life and strength of our constitution, in favour of the little, present momentary turns, which they are retain'd to serve. What now would be the consequence, if all these endeavours should succeed? I am persuaded that the great philosophers, divines, lawyers and politicians, who exert them, have not yet prepared and agreed upon the plans of a new religion, and of new constitutions in church and state. We should find ourselves therefore without any form of religion, or civil government. The first set of these missionaries would take off all the restraints of religion from the govern'd; and the latter set would remove, or render ineffectual, all the limitations and controuls, which liberty hath prescribed to those that govern, and disjoint the whole frame of our constitution. Entire dissolution of manners, confusion, anarchy, or perhaps absolute monarchy, would follow; for it is possible, nay probable, that in such a state as this, and amidst such a rout of lawless savages, men would chuse this government, absurd as it is, rather than have no government at all.

But here again it may be said, that as liberty is a word of uncertain signification, so is constitution; that men have taught the most opposite doctrines, and pretended at least to build them on the principles of the constitution ; that the rule therefore of determining our notions of liberty, by the principles of our constitution, is no rule, and we are by consequence just where we were before. But the answer is ready. It is true that there were formerly men, who persisted long in the attempt to talk and write that chimera, call'd prerogative, into vogue ; to contend that it was something real ; a right inherent in the crown ; founded in the constitution of our government, and equally necessary to support the just authority of the prince, and to protect the subject. How we had like to have lost our liberty by the prevalence of such doctrines, by the consequences drawn from them, and the practices built upon them, hath been touch'd in the deduction of the state of parties. But happily this kind of progression from a free to a slavish constitution of government was stopp'd at the revolution ; and the notions themselves are so exploded in the course of six and forty years, that they are entertain'd at this hour by no set of men, whose numbers, or importance, give them any pretence to be reckon'd among our national parties. It is as true, that there are now men, who pursue the very same design by different methods. The former attack'd, these undermine our liberty. The former were the beasts of the field, hinted at above ; these are the insects

of the earth; and like other insects, though sprung from dirt, and the vilest of the animal kind, they can nibble and gnaw, and poison; and if they are suffer'd to multiply and work on, they can lay the most fruitful country waste. Corruption and dependency are their favourite topics. They plead for the first as a laudable expedient of government; and for the last, I mean corrupt, private dependency, as an essential part of our constitution. When they have perplex'd, as much as they are able, our ideas of dependency and independency; they reason, if I may give their sophisms so good a name, as if the independency of each part of the legislature, of the king particularly, arose from the dependency of the other parts on that part. Now, this is both false and absurd. It is false, because the constitutional independency of each part of the legislature arises from hence; that distinct rights, powers and privileges are assign'd to it by the constitution. But then this independency of one part can be so little said to arise from the dependency of another, that it consists properly and truly in the free, unbiass'd, uninfluenced, and independent exercise of these rights, powers and privileges, by each part, in as ample an extent as the constitution allows; or, in other words, as far as that point, where the constitution stops this free exercise, and submits the proceedings of one part, not to the private influence, but to the public controul of the other parts. Before this point, the independency of each part is meant by the constitution to be absolute. From this point the constitutional dependency of each part on the others commences. To talk of natural independency belonging to the kingly office, to an house of peers, or an house of commons (the institutions of art, not of nature) is impertinent. It is absurd, because it absolutely destroys the very thing it is advanced to establish; for if A's independency arises from the dependency of B, and B's independency from the dependency of A, then are A and B both dependent, and there is no such thing as constitutional independency at all. The crown is the source of honours, and hath the disposal of public employments. This no man disputes; nor would any man, I believe, go about to alter. But will it follow that the * constitutional independency of the king would be lost, because the house of commons give the supplies, if he had not the power of giving part of this money, in places and pensions, back again to the members of that house? It would be easy for me to turn this whole profound reasoning into many, even ridiculous lights; but the subject creates other sentiments than those of mirth, though the logic employ'd about it deserves a ludicrous, not a serious treatment. I ask pardon for having said so much upon so slight an occasion, and I proceed.

Notwithstanding all these endeavours to puzzle our constitution formerly, in favour of that prerogative, by the weight of which it must have been crush'd, and actually at this time in favour of that corruption and corrupt dependency, by which it would be soon demolish'd; the main principles of the British constitution are simple, and obvious; and fix'd, as well as any truths can be fix'd; in the minds of men, by the most determinate ideas. The state of our constitution then affords an easy and unerring rule, by which to judge of the state of our liberty. The improvement or decay of one, denotes the improvement or decay of the other; and the strength or weakness of one, the safety or danger of the other. We cannot lose our liberty, unless we lose our constitution, nor lose our constitution, unless we are accomplices to the violations of it; for this constitution is better fitted than any, ancient or modern, ever was, not only to preserve liberty, but to provide for its own duration, and to become immortal, if any thing human could be so.

I am, Sir, &c.

S I R,

MUCH hath been said occasionally, in the course of these letters, concerning the beauty and excellency of the British constitution. I shall make, however, no excuse for returning to the same subject upon an occasion, which introduces it so naturally, and indeed so necessarily. Nothing can be more opposite to the profess'd design of these writings; nothing of more real, and more present use. Let me speak plainly. We have been all of us, those of every side, and of every denomination, accustomed too long to value ourselves foolishly or knavishly, on our zeal for this, or that party, or for this, or that government; and to make a merit of straining the constitution different ways, in order to serve the different purposes of each. It is high time we should all learn, if that be still possible, to value ourselves in the first place on our zeal for the constitution; to make all governments, and much more all parties, bow to that, and to suffer that to bow to none, But how shall this constitution be known, unless we make it the subject of careful enquiry, quiry, and of frequent and sober reflection? Or unknown, how shall it become, what it ought to be, the object of our admiration, our love and our zeal? Many of those, who reap the greatest advantages from it, pass it by unregarded, with equal folly and ingratitude. Many take a transient, inattentive view of it. Many again consider it in part only, or behold it in a narrow, pedantic light. Instead of this, we should view it often. We should pierce through the form to the soul of it. We should contemplate the noble object in all its parts, and in the whole; and render it as familiar to our intellectual sight, as the most common sensible objects are to our corporeal sight. * “Quam illa ardetes amores excitaret sui, si videtur?” Well may it be allow’d me to apply to so glorious an effort of human wisdom what TULLY says after PLATO, in the Phædrus, if I mistake not, of wisdom herself.

“All public regiment, says Mr. HOOKER, hath arisen from deliberate advice, consultation and composition between men.” The proposition is undoubtedly and universally true. It is as true in the kingdom of Morocco, as it is in the kingdom of Britain; and the undeniable consequences, which flow from it, are obvious. We are not to wonder, however, if men do not look up to this original of government, nor trace these consequences from it, in most countries. In the institution of governments, too great powers have been usually given, and too great confidence reposed, either at first, or in process of time. These powers have subsisted, have been confirm'd by more time, and increased by the very nature of power, which is the properest instrument of its own propagation. But the original composition, for want of being express'd, or sufficiently imply'd, or frequently recurr'd to by the forms of the government, hath been forgot, or hath grown so obsolete, that they, whose interest required that no such thing should be believed, have thought themselves at liberty boldly to deny it; and not only so, but to suppose some other original of government. Strange systems of policy, and stranger of religion, have been devised to support and sanctify these usurpations. Education hath been set on the same side; and saucy authority hath prevail'd against the clearest light of nature, and the plainest dictates of common sense. No man, who hath read and look'd abroad into the world, and made a reasonable use of either, will think this too strange to be true; since there is no demonstrated truth (such truths I mean as are here spoken of) which may not be render'd, at least, very problematical by long, uniform, positive contradiction;

diction; nor any demonstrated lye, which may not be render'd probable to many, and certain to some; by long, uniform, positive affirmation; according to a just observation made by father PAUL somewhere or other, on occasion of CONSTANTINE's supposed grant, and other cheats of the court of Rome. But we of this country have been more happy. Our original contract hath been recurr'd to often, and as many cavils as have been made, as many jests as have been broke about this expression, we might safely defy the assertors of absolute monarchy and arbitrary will, if there were any worth our regard, to produce any one point of time, since which we know any thing of our constitution, wherein the whole scheme of it would not have been one monstrous absurdity, unless an original contract had been supposed. They must have been blinded therefore by ignorance, or passion, or prejudice, who did not always see, that there is such a thing necessarily, and in the very nature of our constitution; and that they might as well doubt, whether the foundations of an antient solid building were suited and proportion'd to the elevation and form of it, as whether our constitution was establish'd by composition and contract. Sure I am, that they must be worse than blind, if any such there are, who do not confess at this time, and under the present settlement, that our constitution tion is, in the strictest sense, a bargain, a conditional contract between the prince and the people, as it always hath been, and still is, between the representative and collective bodies of the nation.

THAT this bargain may not be broken, on the part of the prince, with the people, (though the executive power be trusted to the prince, to be exercised according to such rules, and by the ministry of such officers, as are prescribed by the laws and customs of this kingdom) the legislative, or supreme power, is vested by our constitution in three estates, whereof the king is one. Whilst the members of the other two preserve their private independency, and those estates are consequently under no dependency, except that which is in the scheme of our constitution; this controul on the first will always be sufficient; and a bad king, let him be as bold as he may please to be thought, must stand in awe of an honest parliament.

THAT this bargain may not be broken, on the part of the representative body, with the collective body of the nation, it is not only a principal, declared right of the people of Britain, that the election of members to sit in parliament shall be free; but it hath been a principal part of the care and attention of parliaments, for more than three hundred years, to watch over this freedom, and to secure it, by removing all influence of the crown, and all other corrupt influence, from these elections. This care and this attention have gone still farther. They have provided, as far as they have been suffer'd to provide hitherto, by the constitutional dependency of one house on the other, and of both on the crown, that all such influence should be removed from the members, after they are chosen. Even here the providence of our constitution hath not stopp'd. Lest all other provisions should be ineffectual to keep the members of the house of commons out of this unconstitutional independency, which some men presume with a silly dogmatical air of triumph, to suppose necessary to support the constitutional independency of the crown; the wisdom of our constitution hath thought fit, that the representatives of the people should not have time to forget that they are such; that they are empower'd to act for the people, not against them. In a word, our constitution means, that the members of this body should be kept, as it were, to their good behaviour, by the frequent returns of new elections. It does all that a constitution can do, all that can be done by legal provisions, to secure the interests of the people, by maintaining the integrity of their trustees; and lest all this should fail, it gives frequent opportunities to the people to secure their interests themselves, selves, by mending their choice of their trustees; so that as a bad king must stand in awe of an honest parliament, a corrupt house of commons must stand in awe of an honest people.

BETWEEN these two estates, or branches of the legislative power; there stands a third, the house of peers; which may seem in theory, perhaps, too much under the influence of the crown, to be a proper controul upon it; because the sole right of creating peers resides in the crown; whereas the crown hath no right to intermeddle in the electing commoners. This would be the case, and an intolerable one indeed, if the crown should exercise this right often, as it hath been exercised sometimes with universal and most just disapprobation. It is possible too, that this may come to be the case in some future age, by the method of electing peers to sit in parliament for one part of the same kingdom, by the frequent translations of bishops, and by other means, if the wisdom and virtue of the present age, and the favourable opportunity of the present auspicious and indulgent reign do not prevent it. But in all other respects, the persons who are once created peers, and their posterity, according to the scheme of the constitution, having a right to sit and debate, and vote in the house of peers; which cannot be taken from them, except by forfeiture; all influence of the kind I have mention'd seems to be again removed, and their share in the government depending neither on the king, nor the people, they constitute a middle order, and are properly mediators between the other two, in the eye of our constitution.

IT is by this mixture of monarchical, aristocratical and democratical power, blended together in one system, and by these three estates balancing one another, that our free constitution of government hath been preserved so long inviolate; or hath been brought back, after having suffered violations, to its original principles, and been renew'd, and improv'd too, by frequent and salutary revolutions. It is by this, that weak and wicked princes have been opposed, restrain'd, reform'd, punish'd by parliaments; that the real, and perhaps the doubtful exorbitances of parliaments, have been reduced by the crown; and that the heat of one house hath been moderated, or the spirit raised, by the proceedings of the other. Parliaments have had a good effect on the people, by keeping them quiet, and the people on parliaments, by keeping them within bounds, which they were tempted to transgress. A just confidence in the safe, regular, parliamentary methods of redressing grievances hath often made the freest, and not the most patient people on earth, bear bear the greatest grievances much longer; than people held under stronger restraints, and more used to oppression, who had not the same confidence, nor the same expectation, have borne even less. The cries of the people, and the terror of approaching elections, have defeated the most dangerous projects for beggaring and enslaving the nation; and the majority without doors hath obliged the majority within doors to truckle to the minority. In a word, two things may be said with truth of our constitution, which I think neither can, nor ever could be said of any other. It secures society against the miseries, which are inseparable from simple forms of government; and is liable as little as possible to the inconveniencies, that arise in mix'd forms. It cannot become uneasy to the prince, or people; unless the former be egregiously weak, or wicked; nor be destroy'd, unless the latter be excessively and universally corrupt. But these general assertions require to be a little better explain'd.

By simple forms of government, I mean such as lodge the whole supreme power, absolutely and without controul, either in a single person, or in the principal persons of the community, or in the whole body of the people. Such governments are governments of arbitrary will, and therefore of all imaginable absurdities the most absurd.

They

They stand in direct opposition to the sole motive of submission to any government whatsoever; for if men quit the state, and renounce the rights of nature, (one of which is, to be sure, that of being govern'd by their own will) they do this, that they may not remain expos'd to the arbitrary will of other men, the weakest to that of the strongest, the few to that of the many. Now, in submitting to any single form of government whatever, they establish what they mean to avoid, and for fear of being expos'd to arbitrary will sometimes, they chuse to be govern'd by it always. These governments do not only degenerate into tyranny; they are tyranny in their very institution; and they who submit to them, are slaves, not subjects, however the supreme power may be exercised; for tyranny and slavery do not so properly consist in the stripes that are given and received, as in the power of giving them at pleasure, and the necessity of receiving them, whenever and for whatever they are inflicted. Absolute democracy may appear to some, in abstracted speculation, a less deviation from nature than monarchy, and more agreeable to reason; because here, it is the will of the whole community, that governs the whole community, and because reason does certainly instruct every man, even from a consciousness of his own frailty, the "impotentia animi" of the Latin writers, writers, to trust as little power as possible to any other man. But still it must be confess'd, that if it be unsafe for a people to trust too much power to a prince, it is unsafe for them likewise to keep too much power to themselves. Absolute monarchy is tyranny; but absolute democracy is tyranny and anarchy both. If aristocracy be placed between these two extremes, it is placed on a slippery ridge, and must fall into one or the other, according to the natural course of human affairs; if the few who govern are united, into tyranny, perhaps more severe than any other; if they are disunited, into factions and disorders, as great as those of the most tumultuous democracy.

FROM such observations, and many of the same kind and tendency, it hath been concluded very reasonably, that the best form of government must be one compounded of these three, and in which they are all so temper'd, that each may produce the good effects, and be restrain'd by the counterworkings of the other two, from producing the bad effects, that are natural to it. Thus much is evident. But then how to fix that just proportion of each, how to hit that happy temperament of them all in one system, is a difficulty that hath perplex'd the wisest politicians, and the most famous legislators. Let me quote one of the greatest writers of antiquity. † TACITUS acknowledges, in the fourth book of his annals, what is here advanced; but he thinks such a constitution of government rather a subject of fine speculation, than of practice. He thinks it much more likely that such a system should continue to be admired and practised in idea, than establish'd in fact; and if it happens ever to be establish'd, he does not imagine it can be supported long. Not only the real difficulties, which his sagacity presented to his mind, but his reflections on the constitution and fate of the Roman commonwealth might lead TACITUS into this despondency. But what the refinements of Roman policy could not do, hath been done in this island, upon foundations laid by the rough simplicity of our northern ancestors.

IT would be a curious and entertaining amusement, to reduce the constitutions of the Roman government and of those, which were form'd on the ruins of that empire, particularly of our own, to their first principles; to observe in which they agree, and in which they differ, and the uniform or various tendencies of each; to mark the latent, as well as apparent causes of their rise and fall; how well or how ill they were contrived for triumphs abroad, or peace at home; for vain grandeur, or real prosperity; for resisting corruption, or being ruin'd by it. Such an analysis and enquiry would be, I imagine, not only amusing, but useful. At least, it would be more so than any rhapsody of general reflections, huddled together with little order, or design; for these leave no systematical impressions on the mind; nothing but a confusion of ideas, often bright and glittering, seldom instructive. But a work of this kind would be too voluminous and too aspiring for these little essays, and the humble author of them. He will therefore keep to his point, and content himself to make some of those observations alone, which seem proper to illustrate and prove what he hath advanced; that the British constitution is a plain and sufficient rule of judgment and conduct to us in every thing, that regards our liberty; for preserving of which, as well as for securing its own duration, it is better fitted than any other.

THERE was so great a mixture of monarchical power in the Roman commonwealth, that * LIVY dates the original of liberty from the expulsion of the TARQUINS, rather because the consular dignity was made annual,

hual, than because the regal power had suffer'd any diminution in that change. The dictatorial power, the most absolute that can be imagined; was introduced in eight, or at farthest in eleven years afterwards, and may therefore be reckon'd coæval with the commonwealth; and whatever diminution either this, or the consular power might suffer, the axes and the rods were terrible to the last; especially when they were carry'd before a dictator, for whom the tribunes of the people were not a match, as they were for the consuls. But tho' there were three sorts of power exercised, there were but two orders, or estates, establish'd in this commonwealth; the patricians and the plebeians; and the supreme power was divided accordingly between the senate and the collective, not a representative, body of the people. These two orders, or estates, had frequent contests, and well they might, since they had very opposite interests. Agrarian * laws, for instance, began to be promulgated within three and twenty years, and continued to the end of the commonwealth to produce the same disorders. How inconsistent, indeed, was that plan of government, which required so much hard service of the people; and which, leaving them so much power in the distribution of power, left them so little property in the distribution of property! Such an inequality of property, and of the means of acquiring it, cannot subsist in an equal commonwealth; and I much apprehend that any near approaches to a monopoly of property would not be long endured even in a monarchy. But I return to my first observation.

THOUGH the Romans made frequent experience of the cruel mischiefs, and even extreme danger to liberty, which attended almost every variance of the two estates, yet did they never fall upon any safe, or effectual method of preventing these disputes, or of reconciling them, without violence. The old expedients alone subsisted; and surely they were not only violent, but extra-constitutional. When the senate was inflexible, the people had immediate recourse to sedition. When the people was refractory, the senate had recourse to a dictator. The latter had an approbation, which could not be given to the former, and was a legal institution; notwithstanding which, I make no scruple of saying that it was, at least, as inconsistent with a free constitution of government as the former. Sedition was temporary anarchy. A dictator was a tyrant for six months, unless he thought fit to abdicate sooner. The constitution was suspended, and endanger'd by both. It might have have been destroy'd by the excesses of one. It was destroy'd by the bare duration of the other. If the Romans had annually elected out of their tribes a certain number of men to represent the people, instead of depending on their tribunes (a sort of bullying magistracy, and often a very corrupt one) and if this representative body had been one estate, and had acted as such, the consuls might very well have supply'd the place of a third estate, and have been safely trusted, even more independently of the senate than they were, with the executive power. But the want of a third estate in the Roman system of government, and of a representative body, to act for the collective body, maintain'd one perpetual ferment, which often increased into a storm, but never subsided into a calm. The state of Rome, and of the greatest men in that commonwealth, would have deserved pity rather than envy, even in the best times, if their defective constitution had not made such a state of * trouble and tumult the price they paid for the maintenance of their liberty. But this was not the whole price. Whilst Rome advanced triumphantly in con-questing the world, as her orators, poets and historians have express'd themselves; that is, a few nations round the Mediterranean sea, and little more; her citizens turn'd against one another those weapons, which were put into their hands against the enemies of Rome. Mutual proscriptions and bloody massacres follow'd; each party triumph'd in its turn; they were more animated and better disciplined by their contests; both grew stronger; the commonwealth alone grew weaker; and POMPEY and CÆSAR finish'd the last tragical scene, which MARIUS and SYLLA began. In fine, the Roman commonwealth would have been dissolved much sooner than it was, by the defects I have mention'd, which many circumstances concurr'd to aggravate, if such a spirit of wisdom, as well as courage, and such an enthusiasm for the grandeur, the majesty, and the duration of their empire had not possess'd this people, as never possess'd any other. When this spirit decay'd, when this enthusiasm cool'd, the constitution could not help, nay work'd against itself. That dictatorial power, on which the senate had always depended for preserving it, completed the ruin of it, in the hands of CÆSAR; and that tribunitial power, to which the people had always trusted the defence of their liberty, confirm'd their slavery, in the hands of AUGUSTUS.

THE defects, which I have presumed to censure in the Roman constitution of government, were avoided in some of those, that were establish'd on the breaking of that empire by the northern nations and the Goths; for I suspect that the Goths were not properly and strictly a northern nation, any more than the Huns and the Alans, though they have been often confounded, and I believe by myself. Let us cast our eyes on Spain and France.

WE cannot arrive, as far as my scanty knowledge informs me, at any particular and authentic account of the scheme of that government, which the western Goths establish'd, when, driven out of Gaul by the Franks, they drove the Vandals and the Alans out of Spain; nor distinguish very accurately between such institutions as were parts of the original Gothic plan, and such as were introduced into the several kingdoms, that form'd themselves on the re-conquest of the country by the Spaniards from the Arabs and Moors. The original of the Cortes particularly is quite in the dark, as we are assured by a very * industrious enquirer and judicious writer. Thus much however we may assert; that the Gothic kings were at first elective, and always limited, even after they became hereditary; and that the cortes, whenever it was establish'd, was an assembly, that may be more truly compared to a British parliament than the assembly of the states of France could ever pretend to be. Churchmen had wriggled themselves into a share of temporal power among the Goths, as they did in every country, where they were admitted to preach the gospel, though without any authority from the gospel; so that the cortes consisted of prelates, as well as dukes, masters of orders, earls and ricoshomes, who composed the whole body of the nobility; and of the procurators of the commons; that is, the citizens and burgeses, chosen by the cities and boroughs to represent and act for the whole body of the commons. To preserve the independency of this assembly, these procurators were to be paid by the corporations, for which they served; the king was to give no office, or salary to any of them; nay, a † resumption of rewards, granted to members of the cortes, was once at least debated, if not enacted.

In short, he was not to name their president, nor even send letters unopen'd to any of them. No money could be raised on the subjects, without the consent of this assembly; and it was a standing maxim, or order, that redress of grievances should precede the grants of supplies. Such a frame of government as this seems built for duration; and in fact, if it had not been undermined, it could not have been demolish'd. The manner, in which it was both undermined and demolish'd totally at last, deserves the attention of every man in Britain. It was undermined by the influence of the court, too much connived at and too long tolerated, on the members of the cortes. Prostitute wretches were found in those days, I doubt not, as well as in ours, to maintain that the necessary independency of the prince could not be supported, without allowing a corrupt dependency of the cortes on him; and they had, in those days, such success in Castile, as we ought to hope they will never obtain in Britain. When corrupt majorities were thus secured, pretences were not wanting, nor will they ever be so, for making concessions to the crown, repugnant to the spirit of the constitution, and even inconsistent with the forms of it. Such pretences, however plausible, would not have been admitted by men zealous to preserve their liberty; because any real danger, remote as well well as immediate, to a free constitution, would in their balance outweigh all considerations of real expediency, and much more all the frivolous pretences of that kind. But the * members of the cortes were no longer such men, when Castile lost her liberties under CHARLES the fifth. The custom of bribing the representatives of the commons, by gifts and promises, and so securing a majority to the court, had long prevail'd, as we have just now said; and after that, it is not to be wonder'd at if excises, given for eight years only, became perpetual; if money was granted before grievances were redress'd; and if the precedent, set in the time of HENRY the second, was follow'd in all succeeding reigns. The cortes gave this prince a supply, for making war on the Moors; but the † sum being represented by the court to be insufficient for the service, it was carried that, in case of a deficiency, the king might raise, without calling a cortes, the money necessary to make good that deficiency. This vote of credit gave an incurable fatal wound to that constitution. I call it a vote of credit, though the powers it gave seem to be less than those, which are given by some modern votes of credit; for surely there is a difference, and not a small one, between a power to raise money, directly on the people, for a service known, and already approved, and provided for in part by their representatives; and a power to borrow money, on the national credit, for services unknown, and to lay the nation under an obligation of paying for that, which it is possible their representatives may disapprove.

THIS precedent having been made, in favour of one king, and in one particular conjuncture, it became a prevailing argument, in favour of every other king, and in every other conjuncture; for though it may be, nay must be, in the vast variety of characters, and of conjunctures, prudent and just to grant, in favour of some princes, and upon some occasions; what it would be neither prudent nor just to grant, in favour of other princes, and upon other occasions; yet such is the merit of every prince, who fills a throne, or rather such is the servile adoration paid to power, in what hands soever it be lodged, that general and almost universal experience shews this rule, which no man of sense would break in the management of his private interests, absolutely reversed in the management of the most important, national interests. The inference to be drawn from hence is plainly this; that the inconveniency, or danger of refusing to every prince, and in every conjuncture, such things as are inconsistent with the constitution of a free government, must be always less than the inconveniency, or danger of granting them to any prince, and in any conjuncture.

LET me add this farther observation, which presents itself so naturally after the former. Though it be proper, in all limited monarchies, to watch and guard against all concessions, or usurpations, that may destroy the balance of power, on which the preservation of liberty depends; yet is it certain that concessions to the crown from the other constituent parts of the legislature are almost alone to be fear'd. There is no danger that the crown should make them to the others; and on this head the people may very safely trust to those, who wear it, and those, who serve it. The nobility will not make them to the commons, without great struggles, which give time to interpositions; nor the commons to the nobility. But both may be easily induced to make them to the crown. The reasons of this difference are obvious enough; for first, a king is really nothing more than a supreme magistrate, instituted for the service of the community, which requires that the executive power should be vested in a single person. He hath, indeed, a crown on his head, a scepter in his hand, and velvet robes on his back, and he sits elevated in a throne, whilst whilst others stand on the ground about him; and all this to denote that he is a king, and to draw the attention and reverence of the vulgar. Just so, another man wears a mitre on his head, a crozier in his hand, and lawn sleeves, and sits in a purple elbow-chair, to denote that he is a bishop, and to excite the devotion of the multitude, who receive his benediction very thankfully on their knees. But still the king, as well as the bishop, holds an office, and owes a service. Officium est imperare, non regnum. The king, when he commands, discharges a trust, and performs a duty, as well as the subject, when he obeys. Notwithstanding which, kings are apt to see themselves in another light, and experience shews us that even they, who made them what they are, are apt to take them for what they are not. From hence it happen'd in Spain, and may happen possibly in other countries, that the kings, instead of being satisfy'd with, and thankful for the dignity, honour, power and wealth, which they possess'd in so eminent a degree above all other magistrates and members of the commonwealth, repined at their being possess'd of no more. What they had, was given them by the constitution; and what they had not, was reserved by the same authority to the nobility, and to the commons. But they proceeded, and their sycophants reason'd, son'd, as if the sole power of the government, and the whole wealth of the nation, belong'd of right to them, and the limitations of the monarchy were so many usurpations on the monarch. In the second place, besides this constant desire of encroaching, there is another reason why concessions to the crown are more to be guarded against than others, in limited monarchies. The regal power resides in one person. The other shares of the supreme power are assign'd to bodies of men. From hence it follows that the interest of the king, and the interest of the crown, cannot well be divided in the mind of a prince; whereas the interest of each individual may be distinguish'd from the interest of the nobility, or of the commons, and still more from that of the nation, in the minds of those, who compose an house of peers; or who are representatives of the people. A king cannot be tempted to give up the interest of the crown, because he cannot give up this public interest, without giving up his private interest; whereas the members of such assemblies may promote their private interest, by sacrificing to it that of the public. Several other reasons might be insisted upon, to establish the truth of the observation we have made, and to shew how unfairly they argue, who all along suppose that the independency of the crown may as easily be lost, lost, and the balance of power be destroy'd on that side, by concessions from the prince, and usurpations on him, as the independency of the lords, or commons, may be lost, and the balance of power be destroy'd on that side, by concessions to the prince, and by his usurpations. Such reasons, for instance, might be drawn from the difference of that influence, which the crown hath on the other estates, and which the other estates have on the crown; as well as from the difference of the pretences, which may be urged on behalf of the crown, or of the nobility, or commons, to obtain such concessions; for supposing them all co-equal, as parts of the legislature, yet if it be consider'd that the executive power is solely in the crown; that the disposition of public money, as well as public employments, is a part of this power; that this power is in continual exercise, and may immediately affect, more or less, at one time or at another, every particular man, peer as well as commoner; whereas the other powers are exercised occasionally, are continued or suspended, in great measure, at the will of the prince, and are employ'd chiefly in matters of general, not particular concern; in fine, if it be consider'd farther, that the powers exercised by assemblies of peers and commoners, whether these assemblies be regarded as parts of the legislature, as the great councils councils of the nation, or as the judges and prosecutors of enormous offenders, are few and simple, directed to notorious purposes, conducted by rules always known, always the same, and always sufficient to these purposes; whereas the branches of executive power are numerous and complicated, the rules various, and the purposes often unknown, often contingent; so that it may become difficult to judge either of the utility of the purposes, or of the sufficiency of the powers; if all these things be consider'd, I say, we shall not be at a loss to determine on which side the danger to liberty, in a limited monarchy, lies; and whether concessions to the crown, in prejudice of the constitution, are not more likely to be made, than concessions from it.

HAPPY had it been for the people of Castile, if they had seen this danger in time, and had remedy'd, whilst the remedies were in their power, those defects in their constitution, whatever they were, which gave their kings by degrees such an influence over the cortes, as overturn'd at last the whole constitution, and gain'd to the German race, that began to reign in CHARLES the fifth (for his father PHILIP is scarce to be reckon'd) such an absolute power as the Gothic kings had never been able to obtain. Tho' CHARLES the fifth was a very able prince, yet the honour (for such it will be esteem'd by some some men) or more truly the infamy, of enslaving Castile must not be ascribed to his superior capacity, nor to that of his ministers. Had he been the meekest tool, a thing of straw, but something less than a scarecrow, and unable to protect the property of his subjects; he might still have taken their liberties from them, in that conjuncture, as he did most effectually. Corruption was establish'd; a majority of the cortes was bribed; the nobility was detach'd from the common interest by titles, places, pensions, and grants; and the clergy in general, for exceptions there were, took no farther share in it than particular piques, or some indirect and fleeting consideration, inspired them to take. The nation saw itself betray'd, and the commons protested loudly against the proceedings of their representatives. But this was the very point, for which the enemies of the Castilian constitution waited; and as soon as a pretence for employing force was given them, they muffled themselves up in their threadbare coat of zeal for the government, and stabb'd their country to the heart. An ordinance of the cortes had been made, about a hundred years before, against increasing the standing forces of the kingdom to more than 400 soldiers in garrisons, and 1500 ginetts. This ordinance had not been very well observed. The long wars with the Moors made armies often necessary, when there was no actual war. The danger of being invaded by the Moors (for every Moorish king was deem'd a pretender to the throne) might serve to make them so represented; and when this reason fail'd entirely, as it did by the conquest of Granada, the last possession of these people in Spain, pretences for keeping armies on foot were still to be found. There were still Moorish factions; the new christians were Moors in their hearts; amongst the old christians there were several, who favour'd them; the people were not to be trusted with their own preservation. CHIEVRES, the rapacious minister of CHARLES the fifth, and his journeymen (for so were those Spaniards call'd, according to Dr. GEDDES, who did not care how much their country was plunder'd by foreigners, provided they shared the spoils) CHIEVRES, I say, and his journeymen, a real faction, and perhaps not a great one, were the fast friends of the government. The rest of the nation were open, or secret enemies. According to this excellent logic, the former were to be protected in blundering, for they were guilty of that too, as well as in plundering; and the latter were to be oppress'd for complaining. The nation was sacrificed to a faction, and an excellent constitution destroy'd, in favour of a profligate government. This destruction however would not have been so easily accomplish'd, accomplish'd, nor would Castilians alone have enflav'd Castile to a foreign race, after asserting their liberty so often, and so boldly, against princes of their own country, if two other circumstances had not concurr'd. FERDINAND had conquer'd Navarre, and a regular, disciplin'd army defended that conquest against the French. This army, which was at hand, march'd into Castile, defeated the commons, and extinguish'd liberty in a country, where it had been long declining. The nobility was detach'd from the commons by grants of land, amongst other considerations, as I said above; and the commons renew'd their contest on this head, perhaps unjustly, to be sure very unseasonably. The commons however were justify'd for taking arms, in the opinion of the nobility, and even in that of ADRIAN, who govern'd during the absence of CHARLES, whose preceptor he had been; for this honest man, (too honest to be long endured on the papal throne, where he was afterwards placed) affirm'd that all the troubles of Castile were caused by the king, and by his covetous and tyrannical ministers. The conduct of the commons, upon this great occasion, was in many instances rash and violent, as well as ill advised and weak. But they were tumultuous assemblies driven into despair; and the nobility, who might have had great sway amongst them, and might have help'd to regulate their fire, and to keep them sober, help'd on the contrary to make them mad, either by neglecting them, or by taking part against them, till it was too late; and then complain'd of their being mad, with as ill a grace as the principal men of Rome, who help'd to corrupt that people, complain'd of their corruption, and assign'd it as a reason for depriving them of their liberty.

THERE cannot be a greater solecism in politics than that of a nobility, under monarchical government, who suffer the liberty of the commons to be taken away. In Aristocracies, the nobility get whatever the commons lose; but in monarchies, the crown alone is the gainer, and the certain consequence of their helping to enslave the commons, must be that of being enslaved themselves at last. How, indeed, should it be otherwise; since the liberty of the commons cannot be taken away, unless the constitution be first broken; and since neither the peers, nor any one else can hold their privileges or their properties, by a better tenure than that of arbitrary will, when the constitution is once broken? Was it possible to doubt of this truth, we might find the proof of it, without going out of the country where we are; I mean Spain. Amongst all the surprizing phænomena, which have appear'd in the world of late years, there are none, that have struck mankind with more astonishment, than those instances of persons raised to the highest posts of power, authority and command, nay to empire, who had not, either from their obscure birth, or their low talents, or their still lower habits, the least occasion even to dream of such elevation. Amongst other countries, Spain hath had her share of them; and the grandees, as they are pompously stiled, the successors of those men, who thought to rise on the ruin of the commons of Castile; they, who have the vain honour of cocking their hats in the presence of their prince, have been seen to stand at awful distance, or approach with respectful cringe, in the presence of a parasite and buffoon.

I KNOW full well that, in such governments as we speak of here, it is both the duty and interest of the nobility to oppose the excesses of the commons; but I know too that they have another duty, which they are not to leave undone; another point of interest, which they are not to neglect; and therefore I have spoken of this second estate in our government, as of a middle order, that are properly mediators between the other two, in the eye of our constitution. Whilst the peers maintain this character, they will be able to discharge this duty; but they would cease to be so, if it was possible they should ever become the tools of faction, or the vassals of a minister. In mediations of this kind, different from those that are more commonly call'd such, mediators mingle in the contest, as parties concern'd, and can by that alone expect to mediate with effect, whether they be consider'd as bodies of men, or individuals. When the commons are assisted by the peers in their reasonable endeavours to promote, or restore frugality, to secure liberty, and to correct all sorts of mal-administration; the peers will have, both collectively and separately, a credit with the people, as well as with the representatives of the people; by which they may contribute to check the latter, whenever an house of commons shall grow unreasonable, factious, or seditious. But if the peers of the realm neglect to oppose the commons in their just attempts, and forfeit by consequence the character of impartiality, and even the air of independency, the peers will then add little strength to the crown, whenever the evil day comes, and have as little power to prevent it from coming. There was a time, our fathers saw it, when an house of commons destroy'd, instead of supporting, the constitution, and introduced tyranny, under pretence of excluding slavery. I think it might be shewn, from the anecdotes of that age, that this could not have happen'd, if the court had not been so long and so partially abetted by the

the greatest part of the nobility and clergy, both in the house of lords and out of it. An universal and timely concurrence with the spirit of the commons, which was pious in the true sense of the word at first, would have had, I presume, the full effect that every honest man proposed in a parliamentary reformation of the state; and those fatal opportunities, that were afterwards given to the republican, presbyterian, and independent factions, would have been avoided. But they, who could have trimm'd, (for there is a wise and honest, as well as a silly and corrupt trimming) or have mediated with success, lost the power of doing either; some by abetting the crown so long, for fear of the commons, and others by concurring with the commons so far, for fear of the crown, that the people in general had no confidence in the former, and that the latter were afraid to trust their prince after all they had done against him. If any man had trusted to the plausible professions of the court at that time, and the court had subdued the opposite party, we may judge without any breach of charity, that these men would have found themselves deceived. Just so, if any men, who meant the reformation, not the destruction of the state, believed in the canting reformers of that age, such men were, no doubt, egregiously deceived. But I confess myself of opinion, and surely upon no improbable grounds, that there were few, or no such men. The good intentions of the court were distrusted even by those, who took arms for the king, and the ill intentions of many of the leaders on the other side were suspected, no doubt, by many, who took arms for the parliament. But two of the three estates being ripe for the rashest enterprizes, and the third being in no condition to mediate, the extremes clash'd without any power sufficient to interpose; and when the sword was drawn, the sword could alone decide. I conclude therefore, from these two examples, that as there cannot be a greater error in politics than that of a nobility, who assist a prince to take away the liberties and privileges of the commons; (which was the case in Castile) so the surest way of preventing that terrible dilemma, wherein men are obliged to chuse either submission to tyrannical government, or concurrence with an enraged and no longer governable people, (which hath been the case in Castile and Britain both) is for the nobility, and the principal men amongst the commons, to engage so early in the cause of liberty, that the former may be always in condition to mediate with effect, and the latter have always power to allay the intemperate heat of their own body.

and

LETTER XV.

S I R,

BUT to resume the comparison of other constitutions of government with our own, I say that if the Gothic constitution in Spain, either by original defects, or by deviating from, and not being reduced again in time to its first principles, was destroy'd through the corruption of parliaments, and by the force of an army, one of which betray'd, and the other conquer'd the commons of Castile; the commons of France seem either not to have had, or to have lost, in the dark beginnings of that monarchy, all share in the supreme, legislative power. The great, original defect of having but two estates to share the supreme power is an objection common to the Roman, and to the French constitutions, with this difference; of the three, simple forms of government, the monarchical, the aristocratical, and the democratical, Rome wanted the first, and France hath always wanted the last. Rome had a nobility and a commonalty, but no magistracy fitted by its institution to answer the purposes of that supreme magistrate, who is call'd king, even in limited monarchies.

monarchies. France hath always had a king and a nobility, and hath felt in their turns all the evils of monarchical and aristocratical tyranny. But the people have not had, I presume, since the government of the Franks was fully establish'd on this side of the Rhine, and the form of their monarchy settled, any share in the supreme power, either collectively or representatively, how much soever a contrary notion may have been countenanced by some writers, and have been generally entertain'd, at least in other countries.

“ THERE is no nation in the world, says MEZERAU, more illustrious, nor any, whose original is more obscure than that of the French.” They, who would dispute the first, could hardly dispute the last; and it is no business of mine to controvert either. As dark as their original is, we may discover enough to establish what hath been said, and to carry on the comparison we are making.

THE Franks were a nation of Germany, seated at one time between the Elbe, Rhine and Neckar, and at another (that is, in the reign of THEODOSIUS the younger) extending themselves on the German side of the Rhine, from Cologne down to Nimiguen, and still lower. What is known therefore of the government of the antient Germans, either from TACITUS, or any other good authority, may be properly apply'd to their government, government, whilst they continued in Germany, and even after they settled in Gaul; till such times as we find, by relations more modern, that a different form of government prevail'd amongst them. Now it seems to me extremely plain, that a different form of government did prevail amongst them even from the time of CLOVIS, the conqueror of Gaul. Thus for instance, that passage in TACITUS, where he says * “ That “ the antient Germans took their kings on “ account of nobility, and their generals on “ account of valour; that the power of their “ kings was not absolute and unlimited; and “ that their generals commanded by the au“ thority, which their example rather than “ their power gave them;” that passage, I say, is properly enough apply'd to the Franks before, and perhaps during the conquest of Gaul; but very improperly afterwards †, when CLOVIS, both king and general of that people, had founded the monarchy, which he transmitted to his posterity. That the nation of the Franks was divided into several tribes or clans, and that these were govern'd by several little princes, cannot be doubted. “ Habebat quot pagos, tot pæne

mand the whole with sovereign authority, but according to certain rules made by common consent, whenever any great enterprize was undertaken, and that CLOVIS himself, though he succeeded his father CHILDERIC in commanding over a part of the Franks, was chosen in this manner, and for this purpose, is certain. In his first expedition, he led an army of freebooters, and was obliged by compact to divide the spoil by lots amongst them. The story, which so many authors have told, after GREGORY of Tours, of a private soldier, who refused to leave to his disposition a vessel of gold, that had been taken out of a church at Rheims, and broke it before his face, is a proof that he was nothing more at first than I have represented him, the head of a troop of adventurers, who chose him to lead them, but made their conditions with him. The Franks therefore might be at this time, in some sense, * “all free, perfectly equal, and independent;” but will it follow from hence that they continued to be so, in any sense, after CLOVIS had founded their monarchy; had destroy’d all their little kings; united in one body, and under his own domination, all their little states; and changed the form of their government, by appointing dukes, earls, vicars, and other magistrates, to govern under him, according to the model of government in the latter Roman empire? Certainly not. However this change was brought about, and to whatever it was owing; the monarchy of the Franks in Gaul was built on the ruins of their former government. This BOULAINVILLIERS himself confesses, when he says (though not very accurately, nor consistently, as I imagine, in calling their former government a kind of aristocracy) that the principle of union, which founded the monarchy, on the ruins of a kind of aristocracy, was the mistaken ambition of particular men. In short, proofs enough may be collected out of this very author to shew that the government of the Franks, even under the first race of their kings, was not only different from the German governments, but in some respects founded on quite opposite principles. One of these respects, which is immediately to my purpose, I shall mention.

THE general assemblies, that were held at first in the month of March, and afterwards in the month of May, were national assemblies indeed; but not such as the antient Germans held; among whom the principal * “men consulted and decided about the least, and the whole body of the people about the greatest affairs.” In these assemblies of the French the people had nothing to do, unless we reckon for something the function of * hallowing, which the author I have just now quoted assigns them, and which he says that custom had render'd necessary. In one word, the people had not any share in the supreme power, either collectively or representatively, in the original plan of the French government. Whether they acquired any share in this power afterwards, let us enquire next. † MEZERAU pretends, and indeed the whole history of France vouches for him, ‡ “ that no nation “ ever honour'd their nobility so much as the “ French ; amongst whom the nobility was “ not only exempt from all sorts of imposi“ ons and charges, but commanded absolutely

 “ all inferior ranks, who were almost in a state “ of servitude.” How could it be otherwise, when the nobility and chief magistrates, and the clergy, compos'd alone the national councils, or parliaments, and even exercis'd distributive justice all over the kingdom ? Their power increased, as that of the kings of the first race diminish'd. CHARLES MARTEL, indeed, who trusted to that battle-axe, which gave him his name, and to foreign troops, laid aside the national assemblies, neglected the nobility, and misused even the clergy, who damn'd him for it. But PEPIN found it necessary to regain both, and attach them to his interest, in order to mount the throne. By attaching them, he attach'd the whole nation to him. CHILDERIC was deposed, and he chosen king in a general assembly held at Soissons, which MEZERAI calls most improperly (since the expression communicates a false idea to his reader) "the States, les etats." These assemblies, in his time, in that of his son CHARLES the great, and so on, consisted of the nobility and clergy alone; and once more it is beyond all dispute certain, that the people had no more share in these national councils, under the second, than under the first race of the kings of France.

WHEN the third race of these kings began in HUGUES CAPET, the lords were so powerful in their estates, and so independent in their governments, that he was forced to come to a kind of composition with them. They became sovereigns, each in his territory, but held of the crown, and acknowledged the king for the supreme lord. There was scarce a town, which had not a little sovereign;

reign; scarce a castle without some little tyrant. The parliaments, in those ages took several turns; "Ils prirent divers plis," as * PASQUIER expresses himself; but still they consisted of princes, great lords, bishops and abbots, who decided in them their disputes with one another, and with the king, and maintain'd by these means a sort of national confederacy, or fœderal union of many states, politically united under one head. Such assemblies as these, under the second and third race, were the original institutions, from whence the † parliaments of France have proceeded, as many alterations as they have received, and as much as they are now changed; so that we may safely affirm the parliaments of France never gave the people any share in the government of that kingdom; and whoever entertains a notion that the assemblies of the states did, or that ‡ these assemblies are of great antiquity, or that they are the foundation of the liberty of the people of that country, will find himself, on due examination; grossly deceived.

THESE assemblies of the three estates, the nobility, clergy, and commons, were invented first by * PHILIP LE BEL. They were entirely unknown before the year 1301. The people had no right to any such assemblies; and when they were instituted, they were plainly design'd for nothing less than the good of the people. Long after the establishment of the Capetian race, when taxes grew heavy, and were laid on and levied very arbitrarily, † seditions and rebellions of an oppress'd people, who had no other recourse, follow'd. To prevent these, not only writs, or orders, were sent to the nobility and clergy, in the several sheriff-wicks and bailywicks, but to the commons, to assemble and take into consideration how to redress grievances, and support the public expences; and after such consideration had amongst themselves, to depute some persons of each order, or estate, to confer together in the place appointed for holding such general assemblies. "The commons were added to these assemblies," ‡ says PASQUIER, "against the antient order or practice of France, for no other reason than this, that the principal burden, or charge, was to fall upon them." This was the true reason.

Redress

Redress of grievances had no part in the schemes of that rapacious and profuse prince, who was the author of this institution; and he, that considers the manner, in which these assemblies were convened, the powers they were suffer'd to exercise, the subordination, in which the commons particularly were kept, and the habitual, unavoidable influence, under which they lay, will be easily convinced that such assemblies were fitted to do the jobs, and sanctify the iniquity of the court, and nothing more. If, at any time, they make any good ordinances for the reformation of the state, * "these ordinances are," says honest PASQUIER, "like fine pieces of tapestry, hung up to make a shew to posterity." They have no other effect. But the imposition granted to the king hath its full effect. I conclude therefore, and upon sufficient grounds, that even since the establishment of these assemblies of the estates, in the beginning of the 14th century, the people of France have had no real share in the supreme power of the government, either collectively or representatively.

I might illustrate and prove what is here advanced by the example of every assembly of the states of France, of which we have any good accounts, from the first in 1301 to the last that was held, as I remember, in 1614. But such a deduction would carry us too far. I shall content myself therefore with making two observations.

FIRST, that these farces (for such these assemblies were, and such they were design'd to be) owe their institution not only to one of the worst kings, but to one of the worst ministers, that France ever saw; ENGUERAND DE MARIGNY, who was call'd the coadjutor and the governor of the kingdom; the most insolent, the most avaricious, and the most prodigal man of his age. The great ability of this minister, on which his whole merit with a greedy master was raised, consisted in making his administration a system of violence and fraud, in order to plunder and enslave the people. When he durst not employ one, he turn'd himself to the other; and how grossly and impudently he managed even fraud, it may not be improper to take notice, in one instance; because we shall see the better, by this instance, what the nature and effect of these assemblies were, of which we speak, and what use the court made of them from their first institution. ENGUERAND DE MARIGNY then, meeting with great opposition to * some taxes he had devised, propos'd the calling an assembly of the states, and hoped probably that he might gain the commons to favour the intention he had of extending these taxes to the nobility and clergy. A great scaffold was erected. The king, the lords and the clergy took their places on it. The commons attended at the foot of it. The minister made a most vehement declamation to stir the passions of the audience, and made no scruple of insinuating in it, what neither he nor his master intended to perform, a promise of reimbursing, after the expedition proposed, what the people should give to the king. The king rose from his throne, and advanced to the extremity of the scaffold, that he might second by his looks the harangue of his treasurer, and see who those were, that refused, or consented, to the aid he demanded. The deputies of Paris promised to give a sufficient supply, or to follow the king in their persons to the war. The other deputies concurr'd in this general engagement, and the assembly broke up, without any farther deliberation, or any ordinance of the estates. But an ordinance of the king soon follow'd; a * general excise was imposed by his authority, as if it had been a grant of the estates to him; and his ministers had a number of harpies ready, whom he let loose to desolate the kingdom, by levying this infamous tax, for the consideration of some little advance made to the king. If you ask what were the consequences of these proceedings, it will be sufficient to mention two. The tax of a fifth on the revenues of the subject, which is the proportion of our land-tax of four shillings in the pound, was continued, though the general excise had been imposed*. ENGUERAND DE MARIGNY was hang'd in the succeeding reign for this, amongst other crimes, though not by an assembly of the estates; for the estates had neither the opportunity, nor the power of resenting the greatest insult that could be offered them, and the greatest injury that could be done to the nation.

THE next observation I have to make is very short; but I think very pertinent, and very important. This example shews us how true it is, that no instruments of tyranny can be found so sure and effectual as an assembly of the states of a realm, when such an assembly is so constituted as to want the power (which was from the first the cause of the three estates in France) and the same must happen, when they are so managed as to want the will (which became at last the case of the cortes in Spain) to secure the liberty and defend the property of the people, against such kings as PHILIP LE BEL, and such coadjutors as MARIGNY. This prince and his minister had strain'd prerogative to the utmost, and had govern'd by it very tyrannically. Whilst this expedient would do, they try'd no other; but when they apprehended it might fail them, they added a deputation of the commons to the assembly of the estates; that, seeming to create a new controul on the crown, they might in reality give greater scope and freer exercise to arbitrary will. The friends of liberty therefore, who live under limited monarchies, cannot be too careful to preserve their constitution in vigour, nor too fearful lest their representatives should be so influenced as to neglect their privileges, misapply their powers, and depart from their integrity; since these friends of liberty see that the greatest masters of tyranny have judged the form, without the spirit, of a free government more favourable to their schemes of oppression, than all the authority, that absolute monarchy can give; and that they made an innovation in the form of their government on this very motive, and for this very very purpose.

I HAVE dwelt long, perhaps too long, on the last head. I was induced to it, not only because the account, I have given according to the truth of history, is contrary to the national prejudices of many people on this subject, as I hinted before; but principally because the great point of strength and security, on which the freedom of our constitution rests, will appear in a fuller light, by being thus contrasted with the constitution of the French government. Both their ancestors and ours came out of Germany, and had probably much the same manners, the same customs, and the same forms of government. But as they proceeded differently in the conquests they made, so did they in the establishments that follow'd. The conquest of Britain was a work of time, and the Saxon monarchy was long in forming. The conquest of Gaul was carry'd on with greater rapidity, and the French monarchy was sooner form'd. From hence some reasons might be drawn to account, amongst others, for that great difference between the constitutions of the two

monarchies, which these two German nations founded, at no great distance of time, in Britain and in Gaul. But I shall not indulge myself in guessing at the reasons, or accidents, that determined the Franks to the division they made of their people, and to the form of government they establish'd. Whatever reasons, or accidents, determined them, this is certain; that the distinction of lord and vassal became the general distinction of the whole nation; that the * commons amongst them were little better than slaves, whatever they had been in Germany; and that they were so inured to servitude under their kings, prelates and lords, that they look'd on themselves at last, not justly, but unjustly, as men, who had no right, no not even a right by nature, to any share in the government of that community, whereof they made so vastly the principal part.

In Britain another constitution was form'd; and another spirit prevail'd. The Saxons had a † nobility too, arising from personal valour, or wisdom, continued by blood, and sometimes conferr'd by the prince, however legally at first it matters not to enquire, on such as held great offices about his person. All these were the adelings, or nobles, an handful in comparison of the frigilingi, or freeborn, who made the body of the Saxon people. The freedom of this people was erected on two columns, that have proved more durable than brass. They were parties to the making, and to the executing all the general laws of the kingdom. They shared the legislative power; were join'd to the lords in the administration of justice; and no magistrate, or officer, could exercise jurisdiction, or authority over them, no not ecclesiastical, without their consent and election. The comites ex plebe, who were chosen for this last function, the administration of justice, made one rank amongst the Saxon commonalty. The custodes pagani, such as had an helmet, a coat of mail, and a gilt sword, for their ordinary arms, whether they fought on foot or on horseback, made another rank; and the plain pagani, ceorles, made the lowest. But even these were totally distinct from, and far superior to the lazzi, or slaves, nay to the free lazzi, such as had been slaves, and were become free. The ceorles were freemen to all intents and purposes, and in all the essentials of liberty, as much as the Saxons of any superior rank, and were capable of rising to any superior rank by merit, or by favour.

THESE are the sources, from which all the distinctions of rank and degree, that exist at this day amongst us, have flow'd. These are the general principles of all our liberties. That this Saxon constitution hath vary'd in many particulars, and at several periods of time, I am far from denying. That it did so, for instance, on the entry of the Normans, though certainly not near so much as many have been willing to believe, and to make others believe, is allow'd. Nay, let it be allow'd for argument's sake, and not otherwise, that during the first confusion, and the subsequent disorders, which necessarily accompany and follow so great, and so violent a revolution, the scheme of the Saxon constitution was broken, and the liberties of the people invaded, as well as the crown usurp'd. Let us even agree that laws were made, without the consent of the people; that officers and magistrates, civil, military and ecclesiastical, were imposed without their election; in one word, that these Norman kings and the lords had mounted each other too high to be lords over freemen, and that the government was entirely monarchical and aristocratical, without any exercise of democratical power. Let all this be granted, and the utmost that can be made of it will amount to this; that confusion and violence at the entry, and for sometime after, under the government of a foreign race, introduced many illegal practices, and some foreign principles of policy, contrary to the spirit, and letter too, of the ancient constitution; and that these kings and the lords abused their power over the freemen, by extortion and oppression, as lords over tenants. But it will remain true that neither kings nor lords, nor both together, * could prevail over them, or gain their consent to give their right, or the law, up to the king's beck. But still the law remain'd arbiter both of king and people, and the parliament supreme expounder and judge both of it and them. Though the branches were lopp'd, and the tree lost its beauty for a time, yet the root remain'd untauch'd, was set in a good soil, and had taken strong hold in it; so that care, and culture, and time were indeed required, and our ancestors were forced to water it, if I may use such an expression, with their blood; but with this care, and culture, and time, and blood, it shot up again with greater strength than ever, that we might sit quiet and happy under the shade of it; for if the same form was not exactly restored in every part, a tree of the same kind, and as beautiful, and as luxuriant as the former, grew up from the same root.

To

To bring our discourse to that point, which is here immediately concern'd; parliaments were never interrupted, nor the right of any estate taken away, however the exercise of it might be disturb'd. Nay, they soon took the forms they still preserve, were constituted almost as they now are, and were entirely built on the same general principles, as well as directed to the same purposes.

WHEN I say that they were constituted almost as they now are, I do not mean to enter into any of those minute questions, about which a man may employ much time and study, and have as little true and useful knowledge of our constitution as the most ignorant man alive. But I propose to make a short reflection or two on the property and power of the three estates that compose our parliament, as they stood formerly, and as they now stand; because although our parliaments were composed of king, lords and commons in those days, as well as these, yet the difference of the weight, which each of these estates hath cast into the scale of government, at different periods, does in effect make some difference in the constitution of parliament; and by considering this difference, our thoughts will be led the better to judge of the true poise of our constitution, on maintaining which our all depends; since the nearer we keep to it, the safer our liberty is, and since every variation from it is dangerous to our liberty, in a degree proportionable to such variation. Property then, and power by consequence, have changed hands, or rather have shifted much in the same hands, since the Norman æra. Kings, lords and the church were in those days, and long afterwards, the great proprietors, and by the nature of tenures, as well as by the bulk of their estates, they held the commons in no small subjection, and seem'd to have govern'd without much regard to them, or to their concurrence, in many cases. But the regard, that was not paid them at first, the kings, the lords and the church found it necessary to pay them in a short time; and that authority, that weight in the balance of power, which property did not give them, they soon acquired, or rather resumed by their numbers, and by the circumstances, that follow'd. By the circumstances that follow'd, I mean the great disorders in the state, and the civil wars, which the ambition of princes, of the nobility, and of the church too, created. In all these conflicts, some of the commons *, holding for the king, who promised liberty from the lords, and others siding with the lords, who promised them liberty from the king, they came off better in the end than their

principals, and an example rarely to be paralleled was set; for general liberty was nursed, by these means, under the wings of particular ambition. In later days, when the nation, harassed and spent by the long wars of YORK and LANCASTER seem'd glad to settle under any stable government, and in this temper gave many advantages to the cunning of HENRY the seventh, which the violence of his son improved, it is certain that the commons suffer'd extremely from the avarice of one, the profusion of the other, and the high-strained prerogative of both. But then their sufferings were temporary, and may be said to have ended with these reigns; whereas the sufferings of the nobility and the church were permanent and irretrievable. The king and his council, says the author I quoted last, under colour of liveries and retainers, brought the whole kingdom to be of their livery. It was so. But still the commons lost nothing, and gain'd much. They were more under subjection to the crown; but they were less under subjection to the lords and the church. Not only the dependencies on these were broken, but the lords and the church were made more dependent on the crown than the commons had been on them. The lords were obliged to attend the court at their own expence, and might alienate their estates to defray this expence. A great part of the lands

lands of the church were confiscated and parcell'd out to those, who could buy, at very cheap rates; and the increase of trade, which began about this time to be very considerable, put the commons into a condition of being the buyers. Thus were the old foundations of property and power sapp'd on one side, and new foundations laid on the other. Some of the weight of the church continued in the scale of the lords, and some of it hath gone since into that of the commons. The parliamentary controul of the crown did not become less, but it became more equally and more usefully placed. Democracy was so well poised with aristocracy, after this great change, that if they divided, they could not invade one another; and if they united, they could not be invaded by the monarchy. Far different was the case in other countries, where the crown got the better of the lords, and baffled, at least in some degree, the monstrous attempts of ecclesiastical usurpation. In France, for instance, when the incroachments of the papal power were check'd, the church compounded with the crown, and an alliance succeeded of the monarchy with the hierarchy. But if the church was able to compound, the nobility was forced to submit in that kingdom; so that the authority and wealth of the church being fix'd on the side of the crown, the whole strength and influence of the nobility being taken from them, and incorporated with the power of the crown, and the commons having nothing to do in that government but to pay taxes, and carry arms, the kings of France are become absolute monarchs; and whatever liberty, or appearance of liberty, there was in that constitution, it is totally destroy'd.

When I say, that parliaments were entirely built on the same general principles, as well as directed to the same purposes, as they still are, I shall be justify'd by the whole tenor of our history, and of our law. Let us consider this in a case the plainest imaginable, though it suffers so much debate through the effrontery of some men. Let us consider it relatively to that great principle, that parliaments ought to be independent of the crown in all respects, except such as are settled by the law and custom of parliament, and concerning which there is no dispute. Now, this general principle hath not only been always the same, but it hath been always so declared, in the most authentic and solemn manner; and parliaments have not been more intent on any national concern whatever, than on maintaining this principle, and securing the effects of it. I say parliaments have been constantly thus intent, and especially in the best times, during more than three centuries at least; for

I would not go back too far, nor grope unnecessarily in the dark. What else did those laws mean, that were made in the time of the Lancaster kings, to regulate the elections, and to prevent the influence, which RICHARD the second had illegally and arbitrarily employ'd, and which there was room to fear that other princes might employ? What else do all those resolutions, all those declarations, all those remonstrances, all those acts of parliament mean, that have been made so often, and enforced so strongly, from time to time, and from those days to these, against the influence of the crown, either on the elections, or on the members of parliament? I should be ashamed to ask any more questions of this kind, or to descend into any detail, in order to prove what every clerk of a justice of peace, nay almost every day labourer, knows. But there is another question, which I must ask. If this be so, what do those men mean, who are employ'd, or rather what does he mean, who employs them to plead in all places, and on all occasions, even the most solemn, in favour of this very influence, nay of the very worst sort of it; of that influence, which is created immediately by corruption; for to that their arguments reach by undeniable consequences? Reason is against him and them; since it is a plain absurdity to suppose a controul on the crown, (and they have not yet ventured to suppose the contrary, that I know of) and to establish at the same time a power, and even a right, in the crown, to render this controul useless. Experience is against them; since the examples of other countries, and at some times (former times I mean) of our own, have proved that a prince may govern according to his arbitrary will, or that of his more arbitrary minister, as absolutely and much more securely with, than without the concurrence of a parliament. Authority, even the uniform authority of our whole legislature, is against them. The voice of our law gives them the lye. How then shall we account for this proceeding; this open and desperate attack upon our constitution, and therefore upon our liberty? Have these great men made any nice discovery, that escaped the blunt sagacity of our ancestors formerly, and is above the narrow conceptions of all other men, except themselves, at this time? Is it less fit than the wisdom of this nation hath judged it to be, for so many ages, that kings should govern under the constitutional controul of two other estates? Or is it less fit that they should govern so for the time to come, than it was for the time past? We shall hear, for aught I know, even in this age, that kings are God's vicegerents; that they are, next to him him and his son Christ Jesus, supreme moderators and governors. We shall hear again, perhaps, of their hereditary, their divine, their indefeasible right, and the rest of that silly cant, which was invented to make the usurpations of prerogative go down the better. But will even this alter the case? Will this make it unworthy of them to submit to the full controul of such a constitution as God himself approved, in the institution of the Jewish senate? MOSES was undoubtedly God's vicegerent. He was, if ever man was so, next and immediately under God, a supreme moderator and governor. He was * inspired and assisted in a supernatural manner; and yet he took the advice of his father-in-law JETHRO, the priest of Midian. He associated to himself in the government of the commonwealth, or he bade the people take, as he says in † another place, or chuse "wise men and understanding, and known among the tribes," that they might be associated to him. He found himself unequal to the task of governing alone, and he expostulated with God upon it. "‡ I am not able to bear all this people alone. Have I conceived all this people? Have I begotten them? If thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand." Whether they, who deduce from hence the institution of sanhedrins, are in the right, or they, who assign them a more modern date, against the opinion of the Jewish doctors themselves, whose authority our doctors receive implicitly enough in some cases, and reject as arbitrarily in others, it matters not to enquire. Let us leave the dispute to the partisans of JOSEPH SCALIGER and PETAVIUS, of father SIMON and LE CLERC. Thus much is certain. A great sanhedrin subsisted at Jerusalem even at the coming of the Messiah, as well as inferior sanhedrins in several parts of Palestine; which form of government bore some resemblance to our old Saxon constitution; and he, who takes the trouble of looking into Mr. * SELDEN, will find that the great sanhedrin had as much authority, and exercised as much power, as ever parliaments did, or wittenagemotes could claim. That God approved a kind of parliamentary establishment, and a division of the supreme power between his vicegerent MOSES and the seventy elders, to whom he gave some of the spirit, that was on MOSES, the quotations I refer to from holy writ do sufficiently prove. After this, it cannot be said, I think, to derogate from the majesty of any prince, let us entertain as high notions of this majesty as we please, that he is relieved from the burthen of go-

vernal alone; that he is obliged to share the supreme power with the nobility and commonalty of the realm; and that he is hinder'd from destroying, either directly or indirectly, that independency of those other estates, which can alone preserve this division of the supreme power, really, as well as apparently. But perhaps, these great and honest men have discover'd a necessity of putting the members, or a majority of the members of parliament, under the influence of the crown, in order to preserve this very constitution. Let us see therefore what dangers this expedient is fitted to prevent. Are we afraid that an house of commons, unless restrain'd by places and pensions, should give up the constitution to the lords, and establish an aristocracy? This fear would be ridiculous surely; and he, who should argue against such a supposition, would make himself so. Are we afraid that an house of commons, unless restrain'd in this manner, should usurp more power than belongs to them, and establish a kind of democratical tyranny? But they would have in opposition to them a power sufficient to defeat their designs; the united power of the crown and of the house of lords. Formerly, indeed, they succeeded in an attempt of this kind; and the king and the lords may, at any time, throw too much power into the scale, and set the sense and spirit of the people on their side, as was done at that time. But this neither hath been, nor can be done, unless both king and lords conduct themselves so ill, that the mischiefs to be apprehended from their prevalency appear as great, or greater than those, which are to be apprehended from the prevalency of the commons. Let it be remember'd too, that as the king and the lords may give too much power and popularity to the commons, so the lords and commons may give too much power to the crown. The difference will lie only here; that the king and lords will never do the first designedly; whereas there is a possibility that the lords and commons may be induced, in some age less virtuous than the present, by places, pensions, and other gratifications, bestow'd on a majority of those assemblies, to do the last designedly. What now remains to be urged in favour of this expedient? From what danger are we to be protected by it? Shall we be told that parliaments will not pursue the national interest, unless their members are bought in to it by the crown? Something like this hath been advanced, I have heard, and nothing more impudent, nor more silly could be advanced. A court, that is truly in the interest of the nation, will have, nay must have, a concurrence of parliament, as it would be easy, if it was needful, to shew. Time and trouble, indeed, may be sometimes times required to lead independent men, who judge for themselves, and comply, because they are convinced; whereas neither one nor the other are wanting to determine such as hold to a court by a corrupt dependency on it; for they are soon disciplined and ready to perform the whole exercise of parliamentary mercenaries at the beat of a drum. Some inconveniencies may likewise arise (for that, which I have just mention'd, does not deserve the name) from the independency of parliament. Ministers, for instance, may be call'd to account by the passion, by the prejudice, if you will, of such assemblies, oftener perhaps than they deserve to be; or their errors may be censured, or their faults be punish'd, in a greater degree, and with more rigour, not only than true political justice requires, which should always be temper'd with mercy, but even than strict justice exacts. But as one of these is a fault, if it be a fault, on the best side, and as the other will certainly happen very seldom, it does not seem reasonable that a door should be open'd to corruption and dependency, in order to prevent them. Nay farther, this vigilance, and this severity of parliaments, which we here suppose, will not fail to have some very good effects, that are more than sufficient to balance the supposed ill effects. Among the rest, they may render the rash, who are in power, more cautious, and the bold more modest. They may render fools less fond of power, and awe even knaves into honesty. It were better surely that able and good men should now and then suffer, (nay the good man, who suffer'd, would be himself of this opinion) than that the adulation and servility of parliaments, which are the necessary consequences of corruption and dependency, should ever contribute to make the court become, in any future age, a sanctuary for pickpockets, and an hospital for changelings.

LETTER XVII.

S I R,

THE great alteration we have spoken of, in property and power, brought our constitution, by slow degrees, and through many struggles and dangers, so near the most perfect idea of a free system of government, that nothing would be now wanting to compleat it, if effectual means were found of securing the independency of parliament against corruption, as well as it is secured against prerogative. Our kings have lost little of the gaudy plumage of the crown.

Some

Some of their superfluous power, indeed, hath been bought, and more hath been wrested from them. Notwithstanding which, it is a very demonstrable truth, that the crown must sit lighter, and more secure, on the head of a wise prince, (and no constitution provides for, though every constitution should provide against, a weak prince) since the great change of property and power, in favour of the commons, than ever it did before. Our kings are no longer exposed, as some of the greatest of them have been, to the insults of turbulent, ambitious lords, or haughty prelates. It is no longer in the power of a few factious noblemen to draw armies into the field, and oblige their prince to fight for his crown, to fight to gain it, and to fight to keep it; as EDWARD the fourth did, I think, in nine pitch'd battles. To make the prince uneasy, or insecure, as we are now constituted, the whole body of the people must be uneasy, under his government. A popular king of Great-Britain will be always not only easy and secure, but in effect absolute. He will be, what the British constitution alone can make any prince, the absolute monarch of a free people; and this popularity is so easily acquired, a king gains the public confidence and affection at so cheap a rate, that he must be poor indeed in all the kingly virtues, who does not purchase them, and establish true popularity upon them. IF

IF the condition of our kings is mended in many respects, and made worse in none, that of the nation is mended in every respect, by the great improvements of our constitution; which are due principally to the change I have mention'd; as the advances we have made in trade, and in national wealth and power, are due principally to these improvements. It is by these, that the subjects of Great-Britain enjoy hitherto such a freedom of their persons, and such a security of their property, as no other people can boast. Hence that great encouragement of industry; hence that broad and solid foundation of credit, which must always continue, unless the weight of taxes, and the oppression of tax-gatherers, make it worth no man's while to be industrious any longer, and unless national credit be reduced, by length of time, and private management, to rest no longer on its natural and original foundation, but on the feeble props of yearly expedients, and daily tricks; by which a system, that ought to be the plainest and fairest imaginable, will become of course a dark, intricate, and wicked mystery of stockjobbing.

BUT the great advantage we are to insist upon here, which hath arisen to the whole nation from the alteration in the state of property and power, is this; that we have been brought by it to the true poise of a

mix'd government, constituted like ours on the three simple forms. The democratical power is no longer kept under the same dependencies; and if an house of commons should now fail to assert that independent share in the supreme, legislative power, which the constitution assigns to this assembly, it could not proceed, as it might, and sometimes did formerly, from the nature of tenures and many other unavoidable restraints; it could proceed alone from the corruption of particular men, who threw themselves into a voluntary dependency. The democratical power of our constitution is not sufficient to over-top the monarchical and aristocratical; but it is sufficient to counterwork and balance any other power by its own strength, and without the fatal necessity of favouring the ambition of the crown against the lords, or that of the lords against the crown. Nay more, as our government is now constituted, the three estates have not only one common interest, which they always had; but they have, consider'd as estates, no separate, contradictory interest. Our constitution gives so much grandeur, so much authority and power to the crown, and our parliaments gives so immense a revenue, that no prince hath any real interest to desire more, who looks on himself as the supreme magistrate of a free people; for if we suppose inordinate ambition, or avarice, to make part of his character, these passions are insatiable; but then for this very reason, because they are so, there ought to be no account held of them; and though a prince may measure his demands, a people, who are in their senses, will never measure their concessions by them.

THE property of the commons is not only become far superior to that of the lords upon the whole, but in the detail there are few, very few instances to be produced of greater shares of private property amongst the latter, than amongst the former; and as the property of the commons is greater, so it is equally free. There are no badges of servitude on one side; no pretence of any superiority, except those of title and rank, on the other. The peers are, in some points, (I speak it with all the respect due to them) commoners with coronets on their coats of arms; and affecting to act as such, it is plain they desire very wisely to be taken for such, on many occasions. The interests of these two estates then, with regard to property, are the same; and their particular rights and privileges are now so well ascertain'd, and so widely distinguish'd, that as the proximity of their interests of one sort should always unite them, so the distance of those of another sort cannot easily make them clash. In short, these two orders, according to the present constitution, (and how different is it from from that of Rome, or in the least respect, even from that of Spain, not to mention that of France?) have no temptation, and scarce the means, of invading each other; so that they may the better, and the more effectually, employ their vigilance, and unite their efforts, whenever it shall be necessary, against the encroachments of the crown, from whom shackles they have both emancipated themselves, whether the attempts to impose these shackles again are carried on by prerogative, or by the more formidable enemy of liberty, corruption.

IT hath been observed already, that altho' the crown hath the sole power of creating peers, yet the independency of the peerage on the crown is secured by this; that their rights and privileges cannot be taken from them, at the will of the crown. Could the crown unmake, as well as make peers, it would be a jest to talk of three estates, since there would be virtually, and in effect, but two; and therefore our constitution hath provided against it. But the commons of Great-Britain can make, and, at proper seasons, and in a proper manner, un-make their representatives; by which means, many inconveniencies and mischiefs are avoided, and many just and wise ends obtain'd. The peers of the realm can, the commons cannot, assemble in their collective body, without exceeding those numbers, amongst whom the quiet, order, decency and solemnity of a senate may be preserved. The peers therefore sit in parliament in their collective, the commons in their representative body. The peers have an inherent, the commons a delegated right. The peers are therefore accountable for their conduct, as all other men are, to God, to their own consciences, to the tribunal of public fame, and to no other. But the commons are accountable to another tribunal, as well as to these; to that of their constituents, before which they must frequently appear, according to the true intent of our constitution, to have a censure, or approbation, pass'd on their conduct, by the refusal, or grant of new powers to the particular members. Thus the collective body of the people of Great-Britain, delegate, but do not give up, trust, but do not alienate their right and their power, and cannot be undone, by having beggary, or slavery, brought upon them, unless they cooperate to their own undoing, and in one word betray themselves.

WE cannot therefore subscribe to those two sayings of my lord BACON, which are quoted to this effect; "that England can never be undone, unless by parliaments; and that there is nothing, which a parliament cannot do." Great-Britain, according to our present constitution, cannot be undone even by parliaments; for there is something, which a parliament cannot do. A parliament cannot annul the constitution; and whilst that is preserved, though our condition may be bad, it cannot be irretrievably so. The legislative is a supreme, and may be call'd, in one sense, an absolute, but in none an arbitrary power. * "It is limited to the public good of the society. It is a power, that hath no other end but preservation, and therefore can never have a right to destroy, enslave, or designedly to impoverish the subjects; for the obligations of the law of nature cease not in society, &c."

If you therefore put so extravagant a case, as to suppose the two houses of parliament concurring to make at once a formal cession of their own rights and privileges, and of those of the whole nation to the crown, and ask who hath the right, and the means, to resist the supreme legislative power; I answer, the whole nation hath the right; and a people, who deserve to enjoy liberty, will find the means. An attempt of this kind would break the bargain between the king and the nation, between the representative and collective body of the people, and would dissolve the constitution. From hence it follows that the nation, which hath a right to preserve this constitution, hath a right to resist an attempt, that leaves no other means of preserving it but those of resistance. From hence it follows, that if the constitution was actually dissolved, as it would be by such an attempt of the three estates, the people would return to their original, their natural right, the right of restoring the same constitution, or of making a new one. No power on earth could claim any right of imposing a constitution upon them; and less than any, that king, those lords, and those commons, who have been entrusted to preserve, had destroy'd the former. But to suppose a case more within the bounds of possibility, though one would be tempted to think it as little within those of probability; let us suppose our parliaments, in some future generation, to grow so corrupt, and the crown so rich, that a pecuniary influence constantly prevailing over the majority, they should assemble for little else than to establish grievances, instead of redressing them; to approve the measures of the court, without information; to engage their country in alliances, in treaties, in wars, without examination; and to give money without account, and almost without stint. The case would be deplorable. Our constitution itself would become our grievance, whilst this corruption prevail'd; and if it prevail'd long, our constitution could not last long; because this slow progress would lead to the destruction of it as surely as the more concise method of giving it up at once. But, in this case the constitution would help itself, and effectually too, unless the whole mass of the people was tainted, and the electors were become no honeste than the elected. Much time would be required to beggar and enslave the nation, in this manner. It could scarce be the work of one parliament, tho' parliaments should continue to be septennial. It could not be the work of a triennial parliament most certainly; and the people of Great-Britain would have none to blame but themselves; because, as the constitution is a sure rule of action to those, whom they chuse to act for them, so it is likewise a sure rule of judgment to them in the choice of their trustees, and particularly of such as have represented them already. In short, nothing can destroy the constitution of Britain, but the people of Britain; and whenever the people of Britain become so degenerate and base, as to be induced by corruption (for they are no longer in danger of being aw'd by prerogative) to chuse persons to represent them in parliament, whom they have found by experience to be under an influence, arising from private interest; dependents on a court, and the creatures of a minister; or others, who are unknown to the people, that elect them, and bring no recommendation but that, which they carry in their purses; then may the enemies of our constitution boast that they have got the better of it, and that it is no longer able to preserve itself, nor to defend liberty. Then will that trite, proverbial speech be verified in our case, that "the corruptions of the best things are the worst;" for then will that very change in the state of property and power, which improved our constitution so much; contribute to the destruction of it; and we may even wish for those little tyrants, the great lords, and the great prelates again, to oppose the encroachments of the crown. How preferable will subjection to these powerful landlords, (whom the commonalty were accusom'd to serve; and by whom, if they suffer'd on one hand, they had considerable advantages on the other) how preferable indeed, will this subjection appear to them, when they shall see the whole nation oppress'd by a few upstarts in power; often by the meanest, always by the worst of their fellow-subjects; by men, who owe their elevation and riches neither to merit nor birth, but to the favour of weak princes, and to the spoils of their country, beggar'd by their rapine! Then will the fate of Rome be renew'd, in some sort, in Britain. The grandeur of Rome was the work of many centuries, the effect of much wisdom, and the price of much blood. She maintain'd her grandeur, whilst she

She preserved her virtue; but when luxury grew up to favour corruption, and corruption to nourish luxury; then Rome grew venal; the election of her magistrates, the sentences of her judges, the decrees of her senate, all was sold; for her liberty was sold when these were sold; and her riches, her power, her glory, could not long survive her liberty. She, who had been the envy, as well as the mistress of nations, fell to be an object of their scorn, or their pity. They had seen and felt that she govern'd other people by will, and her own by law. They beheld her govern'd herself by will; by the arbitrary will of the worst of her own citizens; of the worst of both sexes, of the worst of human kind; by CALIGULA, by CLAUDIUS, by NERO, by MESSALINA, by AGRIPPINA, by POPPÆA, by NARCISSEUS, by CALISTUS, by PALLAS; by princes, that were stupid, or mad; by women, that were abandon'd to ambition and to lust; by ministers, that were emancipated slaves, parasites and panders, insolent and rapacious. In this miserable state, the few that retain'd some sparks of the old Roman spirit, had double cause to mourn in private; for it was not safe even to mourn in public. They mourn'd the loss of the liberty and grandeur of Rome; and they mourned that both should be sacrific'd to wretches, whose crimes would have been punish'd, and whose talents would scarce have recommended them to the meanest offices, in the virtuous and prosperous ages of the commonwealth. Into such a state, (the difference of times, and of other circumstances consider'd) at least into a state as miserable as this, will the people of Britain both fall, and deserve to fall, if they suffer, under any pretence, or by any hands, that constitution to be destroy'd, which cannot be destroy'd, unless they suffer it; unless they co-operate with the enemies of it, by renewing an exploded distinction of parties; by electing those to represent them, who are hired to betray them; or by submitting tamely, when the mask is taken off, or falls off, and the attempt to bring beggary and slavery is avow'd, or can be no longer conceal'd. If ever this happens, the friends of liberty, should any such remain, will have one option still left; and they will rather choose, no doubt, to die the last of British freemen, than bear to live the first of British slaves.

LETTER XVIII.

S I R,

IF we had propos'd nothing more to ourselves in writing this Dissertation upon Parties than the entertainment, such as it is, of your readers, and your own amusement; we should not have dwelt, perhaps, so much on the nature of the British constitution, nor have recurr'd so often to assert the necessary independency of parliaments on the crown. But we had another motive, which we are neither afraid nor ashamed to avow. This necessary independency of parliaments, in which the essence of our constitution, and by consequence of our liberty, consists, seems to be in great, not to say in imminent, danger of being lost. They, who are alarm'd at every thing, that is said in favour of our constitution, and of British liberty, and who are prejudic'd against every man, who writes or speaks in defence of them, may take, or affect to take, and try to give, offence at this expression. But we desire to be understood, as we have explain'd our meaning upon some former occasion. We understand our constitution to be in danger, not only when it is attack'd, but as soon as a breach is made, by which it may be attack'd; and we understand this danger to be greater, or less, in proportion to the breach, that is made, and without any regard to the probability, or improbability of an attack. This explanation of our meaning is the better founded, because the nation hath an undoubted right to preserve the constitution not only inviolate, but secure from violations. Should corruption prevail among the members, which we trust will never happen, as notoriously as it does in the elections of parliament, we all know how much the magnanimity of our present king would scorn to take so mean an advantage over the nation; how much, on the contrary, his heroical spirit would prompt him to maintain the liberty even of a degenerate people, who might deserve no longer the enjoyment of so invaluable a blessing, but who could never deserve to have it taken from them by a prince of that family, which was raised by them to the throne, for no other reason but to preserve it. All this we know; and the nation may have, no doubt, the same confidence in every future king, of the same illustrious and royal house. But this will not alter the case; nor make that, which I call danger, cease to be such. Should angels and arch-angels come down from heaven to govern us, the same danger would exist until the springs, from whence whence it arises, were cut off; not because some angels and arch-angels have fallen, and from being the guardians have become the tempters and tormentors of mankind, and others therefore may fall; but because as private liberty cannot be deem'd secure under a government, wherein law, the proper and sole security of it, is dependent on will; so public liberty must be in danger, whenever a free constitution, the proper and sole security of it, is dependent on will; and a free constitution like ours is dependent on will, whenever the will of one estate can direct the conduct of all three.

HAVING thus explain'd what I mean by danger, and taken away all colour for cavil, it remains that I prove this danger to be real, and not the phantom of a crazy imagination, or a prejudiced mind. This shall be done therefore as shortly as I am able, and by an undeniable deduction of facts.

HE, who undertakes to govern a free people by corruption, and to lead them by a false interest, against their true interest, cannot boast the honour of the invention. The expedient is as old as the world, and he can pretend to no other honour than that of being an humble imitator of the devil. To corrupt our parliaments hath been often attempted, as well as to divide our people, in favour of prerogative; and in order to let the arbitrary will of our princes loose from the restraints of law. We observed this, in speaking of the reign of CHARLES the second; but the efforts then made were ineffectual. The frugal habits of the former age were not entirely lost in that; and this, I presume, may be reckon'd as one cause of the noble stands, that were then made by our parliaments, in opposition to the court. But not to ascribe more honour than is due, perhaps, to our fathers, the revenue of the crown was at that time so small, (I speak comparatively; for, in every other respect, it was very ample) and the profusion of that prince on his pleasures was so great, that no minister of king CHARLES the second could find sums sufficient to buy a parliament. He stood therefore on his prerogative, strain'd it as far as he durst, and made all the use of it he could. The revenue of the crown was greatly increased in the reign of king JAMES the second, and was given most unwisely for life. I say most unwisely; for as a prince, who hath an heart and hand to govern well, cannot stand in need of such a grant; so a prince, who hath neither, does not deserve it; and therefore whatever the generosity of our countrymen to their princes may carry them to do at any time, they might leave this undone at all times, without any reflection on their prudence, or even their generosity. The reign of king JAMES was short;

short; and, during this short reign, he rested on that prerogative, which he knew was a cheaper expedient than corruption, and which he vainly flatter'd himself was enough confirm'd to support the measures he took, for subverting the religion, the laws, and the liberty of Britain. Thus were men brought, by the conduct of these two princes, to fix their eyes on prerogative, as the sole instrument of tyranny, and to forget that corruption had been employ'd, though unsuccessfully, by king CHARLES, and might have been employ'd with greater force; and perhaps more success, by king JAMES. The cry of the nation was for a free parliament, and no man seem'd to doubt in that ferment, but that a parliament must be free, when the influence, which the crown had usurp'd, in the precedent reigns, over the elections, was removed, as it was by the revolution. But this general inadvertency, as well as the particular neglect of those, who took the lead in national affairs at that time, is the more surprizing, because corruption having been so lately employ'd, amongst other means, to render parliaments dependent on the crown, the danger of corruption was by consequence one of those dangers, against which the nation had a right to be secured, as well as a promise of being so, according to the terms of the prince of ORANGE'S declaration. Those persons sons especially, who had exclaim'd so loudly against place-men and pensioners in the reign of king CHARLES, and who complain'd at this instant so bitterly of the undue influence, that had been employ'd, in small boroughs, chiefly to promote the elections of the parliament, which sat in the reign of king JAMES, ought to have been attentive, one would think, to take the glorious opportunity, that was furnish'd them by a new settlement of the crown, and of the constitution, to secure the independency of parliaments effectually for the future. MACHIAVEL observes, and makes it the title of one of his discourses, "that a free government, in order to maintain itself free, hath need every day of some new provisions in favour of liberty." The truth of this observation, and the reasons, that support it, are obvious. But as every day may not furnish opportunities of making some of those new and necessary provisions, no day, that does furnish the opportunity, ought to be neglected. The Romans had been so liberal in bestowing the right of citizens on strangers, that the power of their elections began to fall into such hands as the constitution had not intended to trust with them. QUINTUS FABIVS saw the growing evil; and, being censor, he took the opportunity; confined all these new electors into four tribes; put it out of their power to turn the elections, as they they had done, whilst their numbers were divided among all the tribes; freed his country from this danger; restored the constitution, according to the true intent and meaning of it; and obtain'd, by universal suffrage, the title of MAXIMUS. If a spirit like this had prevail'd among us, at the time we speak of, something like this would have been done; for the revolution was, in many instances, and it ought to have been so in all, one of those renewals of our constitution, that we have often mention'd. If it had been such, with respect to the elections of members to serve in parliament, these elections might have been drawn back to the antient principle, on which they had been establish'd; and the rule of property, which was follow'd antiently, and was perverted by innumerable changes, that length of time produced, might have been restored; by which the communities, to whom the right of electing was trusted, as well as the qualifications of the electors and the elected, might have been settled in proportion to the present state of things. Such a remedy might have wrought a radical cure of the evil, that threatens our constitution; whereas it is much to be apprehended, even from experience, that all others are merely palliative; and yet the palliative must be employ'd, no doubt, till the specific can be procur'd.

BUT nothing of this kind was done at the revolution. Pleased that the open attacks on our constitution were defeated and prevented, men entertain'd no thought of the secret attacks, that might be carry'd on against the independency of parliaments; as if our dangers could be but of one kind, and could arise but from one family. Soon after the revolution, indeed, men of all sides, and of all denominations, (for it was not a party-cause, though it was endeavour'd to be made such) began to perceive not only that nothing effectual had been done to hinder the undue influence of the crown in elections, and an over-balance of the creatures of the court in parliament, but that the means of exercising such an influence, at the will of the crown, were unawares and insensibly increased, and every day increasing. In a word, they began to see that the foundations were laid of giving as great power to the crown indirectly, as the prerogative, which they had formerly dreaded so much, could give directly, and of establishing universal corruption. The first hath happen'd, and we pray that the last never may.

- THE net revenue of the crown, at the abdication of king JAMES, amounted to somewhat more than two millions, without any tax on land, or malt, and without a multitude of grievous impositions and excises, that have been since heap'd on the nation.

tion. It is plain, and it was so then, that this revenue might have been so increased, as to answer annually the great annual expences, in which we engaged soon afterwards. In this case, the people would not have had a greater, nay nor so great a burthen to bear, as they had in the course of the two wars, that follow'd; and, at the end of these wars, they would have found themselves with little or no load upon them, instead of crouching under a debt of fifty millions. That this method was not taken, furnishes matter of very melancholy reflection to the present, and will do so to future generations. But these reflections are no part of my subject. How it came to pass that a method so practicable, and so eligible, was not taken, (whether this was owing to private interest, to party-cunning of different and opposite kinds, or to an unhappy refinement in politics, that contracting national debts, under a new establishment, was an effectual expedient to attach men to this establishment) I shall not presume to say. All three might have their share, perhaps, in determining for another measure. At least, it is a point, on which the men of that time have spoken with much prejudice, and little candour. But however that might be, certain it is that we began to borrow at high interest, to anticipate and mortgage, immediately after the revolution; and having once begun, begun, there was no remedy. We were forced to proceed in the same manner thro' the course of two mighty wars. Formerly, the whole expence of the state was borne by the crown; and when this expence grew, upon extraordinary occasions, too great for the revenue of the crown to bear, the people aided the crown, if they approved the occasions of the expence. These grants were properly aids, no more; for the revenue of the crown was engaged in the first place, and therefore it might seem reasonable that the crown should have the levying and management of the whole; of these aids, as well as of the standing revenue. But it happen'd in this case, as it does in many; the reason of the thing ceased, and the thing continued. A separate, private revenue, or a civil-list, as we commonly call it, was assign'd to the crown. From that time, the former order hath been reversed. Our kings, instead of contributing most, have contributed nothing to the public charge; and the people of Britain, instead of giving occasionally aids to the crown, have taken upon themselves the whole load of ordinary and extraordinary expences, for which they annually provide. Notwithstanding this vast alteration in the state of the revenue, and the interest of the king and the people, in the management of it, the same forms of granting aids to the crown, and of levying taxes, and of managing the public treasure, have been continued; so that the people stand obliged (for the crown, that is trusted with the whole, is bound for nothing) to make good all deficiencies, tho' they have no share in the management of the revenue. Our kings, since the establishment of the civil-list, have not only a private and separate estate, but receive a kind of rent-charge out of the public estate, to maintain their honour and dignity, nothing else; and whether the public estate thrive, or not, this rent-charge must be made good to them; at least, as it hath been settled on our present most gracious monarch, if the funds appropriated produce the double of that immense revenue of 800,000*l.* a year, which hath been so liberally given him for life, the whole is his, without account; but if they fail in any degree to produce it, the entire national fund is engaged to make up the difference. But although our kings have thus no longer any immediate interest in the public estate, they are trusted with the entire management of it. They are not only stewards for the public, but they condescend to be such for all those private persons, who are the creditors of the public, and have the additional trouble of managing about three millions a year, on this head.

Now this new settlement, which appears absurd in speculation, how wise soever it may have been thought contrived for practice, hath had this evident and inevitable consequence. As we have annually increased our funds and our taxes, we have annually increased the power of the crown; and these funds and taxes being establish'd and laid for perpetuity, or for terms equivalent to perpetuity, in the sense here intended, this increase of power must not only continue, but still increase, as long as this system of œconomy subsists. How this increase of power arises from the increase of funds and taxes, and the influence of the crown grows, in proportion to the burthen on the people, heavier, hath been explain'd so much in the debates on a late detestable occasion, that much less needs be said on the subject here. If we consider, in the increase of taxes, nothing more than the increase of officers first, by which a vast number of new dependents on the crown are created in every part of the kingdom; (dependents as numerous, and certainly more prevalent than all the tenants and wards of the crown were anciently) and secondly the powers given to the treasury, and other inferior officers, on account of these taxes, and which are at least as great and as grievous in this free government of ours, as any that are exercised in the most arbitrary government, on the same same occasions; if we consider this alone, we shall find reason sufficient to conclude that although the power of prerogative was more open, and more noisy in its operations; yet the power thus acquired is more real and may prove more dangerous for this very reason, because it is more cover'd, and more silent. That men began to see, very soon after the revolution, the danger arising from hence to our constitution, as I said above, is most certain. No less than seven acts were made, in king WILLIAM's reign, to prevent undue influences on elections; and one of the acts, as I remember, for I have it not before me, is grounded on this fact, * that "the officers of the excise had frequently, by threats and promises, prevail'd on electors, and absolutely debarr'd them of the freedom of voting." What hath been done, or attempted to be done, since that time, in the same view; and what hath been done, or attempted to be done, both in the reign of king WILLIAM and since, to prevent an undue influence on the elected, as well as on the electors, I need not recapitulate. They are matters of fresh date, and enough known. Upon the whole, this change in the state and property of the public revenue hath made a change in our constitution, not yet perhaps attended to sufficiently, but such an

one however as deserves our utmost attention; since it gives a power, unknown in former times, to one of the three estates; and since public liberty is not guarded against the dangers, that may arise from this power, as it was, and as it is now more than ever, against the dangers, that used to arise from the powers formerly possess'd, or claim'd by the crown. Formerly, prerogative was kept in sight, and provisions were made against the effects and encroachments of it, as often as occasion required, and opportunity offer'd. They, who call'd themselves friends to the government, in those days, opposed these provisions. They, who were friends to the constitution, promoted them. That the same thing should happen again, in a similar case, we must expect. But as the friends of the constitution, in times past, were not deterr'd, tempted, nor wearied, whilst they defended it against dangers of one kind, and by their honest perseverance deliver'd it down, not only safe, but more improved, to posterity; let us flatter ourselves with this agreeable hope, that the friends of the constitution, at this time, and in all times to come, will be neither deterr'd, tempted, nor weary'd in the same generous cause, in watching and guarding it against dangers of another kind; and that they will deliver it down, in like manner, to future generations. Sure I am there are reasons, and those of no small moment, why they should be more watchful, more upon their guard, more bold, and more incessant in their endeavours, if possible, even than the assertors of British liberty were formerly; and the numeration of some of these reasons is an article not to be omitted on this occasion.
and

S I R,

AS the means then of influencing by prerogative, and of governing by force, were considered to be increased formerly, upon every increase of power to the crown, so are the means of influencing by money, and of governing by corruption, to be consider'd as increased now, upon that increase of power, which hath accrued to the crown by the new constitution of the revenue, since the revolution. Nay farther. Not only the means of corrupting are increased, on the part of the crown, but the facility of employing these means with success is increased on the part of the people, on the part of the electors, and of the elected. Nay, farther still. These means and this facility are not only increased, but the power of the crown to corrupt, as I have hinted already, and the proneness of the people to be corrupted, must continue to increase on the same principles, unless a stop be put to the growing wealth and power of one, and the growing depravity of the other. We are, to be sure, in no danger from any advantage his majesty will take of this situation; but if advantage be not taken, in favour of our constitution, of the present most happy reign, of the mild and beneficent temper of our heroic monarch, of the generous principles, instill'd by nature, and improved by philosophy, of his royal consort; it may be supposed, (for we speak hypothetically all along, as the reader will please to remember, even where the precaution is not used) it may be supposed, I say, that pretended friends to the government, and real enemies to this constitution, no matter whether they are such by principle, or become such by their crimes, will get into superior power, in some future time; and under some weak or wicked prince; and whenever this happens, the subversion of our constitution, and of our liberty by consequence, will be the most easy enterprize imaginable; because nothing can be more easy than the creation of an anti-constitutional dependency of the two houses of parliament on the crown will be in that case; and because such a dependency of the two houses is as real a subversion of our constitution as an absolute abolishment of parliaments would be.

THE first of those means of corruption, that have grown up, or been increased, since the revolution, which I shall mention, is the establishment of the civil-list; not so much on account of the manner, in which it was originally given, as on account of that, in which it hath been since given, and of the vast augmentations, that have been made to it; augmentations that may be doubled, or trebled, in times to come, upon the same motives, under the same and other pretences; in short, just as speciously as they have been made. The revenue of king JAMES the second, as it stood at his abdication, hath been mention'd; and it would not be hard to shew, by indisputable computations, that they, who apprehended he might be able to govern without parliaments, or to buy parliaments, if he wanted their assistance, had good reason for such apprehensions, notwithstanding the expence he was at, over and above all the ordinary charges of the government, in maintaining against law a great standing army of sixteen, or eighteen thousand men. But to go back to the reign of king CHARLES the second, whose revenue was much less. The patriots of that age, even when this revenue was computed at no more than

1,200,000*l.* a year, took great alarm at the pecuniary influence it might create, and look'd upon it, and spoke of it, as a fund for corruption. Now, if this revenue could afford a fund for corruption, when, besides maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown, it was to defray all the other expences of the state, and among the rest those of a small army, and a great fleet; what would the same patriots think of a revenue of 800,000*l.* or a million a year, applicable to the particular expences of the crown alone, and not one farthing of which sacred treasure was ever diverted to any national use? They would have the same just confidence, no doubt, as we have, in his present majesty; but they would say, as we do, that so immense a private, or separate revenue, may become hereafter an inexhaustible fund of corruption; and therefore that the independency of parliaments is, and must be in real danger, till some remedies, as effectual against the pecuniary influence, as have been found against the prerogative, of the crown, are provided. They would shew that a small sum, in aid of places and pensions, of fears and expectations, might serve for the ordinary charge of annual corruption; and that a small saving reserved every year might produce, at the end of seven, a fund sufficient for the extraordinary charge of septennial and national corruption.

BUT

BUT again. If we suppose the civil-list to become an insufficient fund for these purposes, by the profusion of some future king; (and nothing less than the most extravagant profusion can make it so) or if we suppose that some future king may join to so many ill qualities, as leave him no means of governing but by corruption, a sordid avarice, that renders him unable to open his coffers even for this use; yet will a very little iniquitous cunning suffice to create funds for corruption, that may come in aid of the civil-list. It is natural for men to be less frugal, when others are to pay for their want of frugality. Our kings therefore may become more apt to take, and our ministers to advise such engagements, as plunge the nation at every turn into vast expence; since the load, which fell, in part at least, on the crown formerly, falls entire on the people now. But besides this general reason to promote a want of frugality, there may arise particular reasons of more positive, and more pernicious effect. A weak administration, for instance, may pretend public necessity, when private inability alone hath form'd the conjuncture; and frequent and extravagant supplies may be ask'd and obtain'd to do, or to undo, by the weight of money, what might have been attain'd, or prevented, by a little foresight, and by a prudent conduct.

duct. A wicked administration may propose to impoverish the people; to render them as submissive and as abject as the subjects, the boors, or the slaves, in some foreign countries, and to beggar them out of their sturdiness. But there is another view, that may be common to a weak and a wicked administration both. In such an age as we suppose, public money will be easily granted, and public accounts rarely, or incuriously inspected. The ministers therefore, though never so weak, may be impudent enough to ask, and able enough to get, frequent supplies, on national pretences, for private purposes. The consequences of this are manifold; for in general, the more money passes through their hands, the more opportunities they have of gain; and, in particular, they may share, if they please, in every bad bargain they make for the public; and the worse their bargain, the better their share will be. Thus an immense subsidy given to some little prince, who deals in soldiers, or an immense arrear, stated in favour of these little merchants of human flesh, may be so order'd as to steal enough from the public to replenish the royal coffers, to glut the ministers, to feed some of their hungry creatures, and to bribe a parliament besides. Several of these occasional jobs may be, and no doubt will be contrived, in such an age, and by such means as we here suppose, and may be justly reckon'd as so many auxiliary funds, belonging to the great aggregate fund of corruption. Let us however break off from discoursing of these, which may be more easily and more frequently contrived under the present, but might have been contrived under the former constitution of the revenue; and let us turn our discourse to speak of that great source of corruption, which was open'd soon after the revolution; which was unknown before it; and which hath spread, since it was open'd, like the box of PANDORA, innumerable evils over this unhappy country.

THE increase and continuance of taxes acquire to the crown, by multiplying officers of the revenue, and by arming them with formidable powers against the rest of their fellow-subjects, a degree of power, the weight of which the inferior ranks of our people have long felt, and they most, who are most useful to the commonwealth, and which even the superior ranks may feel one time or other; for I presume it would not be difficult to shew how a full exercise of the powers, that are in being, with or even without some little additions to them, for the improvement of the revenue, (that stale pretence for oppression) might oblige the greatest lord in the land to bow as low to a commissioner of the customs, or excise, or to some subaltern harpy, as any nobleman,

or gentleman in France can be obliged to bow to the intendant of his province. But the establishment of public funds, on the credit of these taxes, hath been productive of more and greater mischiefs than the taxes themselves, not only by increasing the means of corruption, and the power of the crown, but by the effect it hath had on the spirit of the nation, on our manners, and our morals. It is impossible to look back, without grief, on the necessary and unavoidable consequences of this establishment; or, without indignation, on that mystery of iniquity, to which this establishment gave occasion, which hath been raised upon it, and carry'd on, for almost half a century, by means of it. It is impossible to look forward, without horror, on the consequences, that may still follow. The ordinary expences of our government are defray'd, in great measure, by anticipations and mortgages. In times of peace, in days of prosperity, as we boast them to be, we contract new debts, and we create new funds. What must we do in war, and in national distress? What will happen, when we have mortgaged, and funded all we have to mortgage, and to fund; when we have mortgaged to new creditors that sinking fund, which was mortgaged to other creditors not yet paid off; when we have mortgaged all the product of our land and even our land itself? Who can answer that when we come to such extremities, or have them more nearly in prospect, ten millions of people will bear any longer to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, to maintain the two hundredth part of that number at ease and in plenty? Who can answer that the whole body of the people will suffer themselves to be treated, in favour of an handful of men, (for they, who monopolize the whole power, and may in time monopolize the whole property of the funds, are indeed but an handful) who can answer that the whole body of the people will suffer themselves to be treated, in favour of such an handful, as the poor Indians are, in favour of the Spaniards; to be parcell'd out in lots, as it were; and to be assign'd, like these Indians to the Spanish planters, to toil and starve for the proprietors of the several funds? Who can answer that a scheme, which oppresses the farmer, ruins the manufacturer, breaks the merchant, discourages industry, and reduces fraud into system; which beggars so often the fair adventurer and innocent proprietor; which drains continually a portion of our national wealth away to foreigners, and draws most perniciously the rest of that immense property, that was diffused among thousands, into the pockets of a few; who can answer that such a scheme will be always endured? But I have run, before I was aware, from my subject, which requires no more than that I should take notice of the establishment of the public funds, as it furnishes new means of corruption, on the part of the crown, and new facilities to these means, on the part of the people.

Now this, I suppose, hath need of no proof, and of little explanation; for, first, the whole art of stockjobbing, the whole mystery of iniquity, mention'd above, arises from this establishment, and is employ'd about the funds; and, secondly, the main springs that turn, or may turn, the artificial wheel of credit, and make the paper estates, that are fasten'd to it, rise or fall, lurk behind the veil of the treasury. From hence it follows, that if this office should ever be unrighteously administer'd; if there should ever be, at the head of it, one of those veteran sharpers, who hath learn'd by experience, how to improve the folly, and aggravate the misfortunes, of his fellow-subjects, of the innocent, of the poor, of the widow, and of the orphan, to his own, or any other private advantage; it follows, I say, that he must have it in his power, and there can be no doubt of his will, to employ two methods of corruption, without any incumbrance to the civil-list. Such a ministerial jobber may employ the opportunities of gaining on the funds, that he

he can frequently create, by a thousand various artifices, (notwithstanding the excellent provisions, that have been lately made against the infamous practice of stockjobbing, by the wisdom of the legislature, and which we promise ourselves will be still improved) and he may apply the gains, that are thus made, to corruption, in aid of the civil-list. He may corrupt men with their own spoils, and bribe even those, whom he reduced by his clandestine practices to that penury, which could alone make them capable of being bribed; or, when he hath to do with men of another character, (for no rank alone will be sufficient to raise them, in such an age, above the most direct and prostitute corruption) he may bribe them by a whisper, initiate them into his mystery to gain them, and then secure them by a participation of the same fraud, and the same profit.

THOUGH this reasoning be hypothetical, yet the suppositions are not strain'd, nor unnatural; for as the meanest grubs on earth have raised themselves by stockjobbing to the rank and port of noblemen and gentlemen; so may noblemen and gentlemen debase themselves to their meanness, and acquire the same spirit, by following the same trade. That luxury, which began to spread after the restoration of king CHARLES the second, hath increased ever since; hath descended descended from the highest to the lowest ranks of our people, and is become national. Now nothing can be more certain than this, that national luxury, and national poverty may, in time, establish national prostitution. Besides this, it is to be consider'd that the immense wealth of particular men is a circumstance, which always attends national poverty, and is in a great measure the cause of it. We may apply already to our country thus much at least of that, which SALLUST makes CATO say of the state of Rome, and I wish we could apply no more, "habemus luxuriam, atque avaritiam; publice egestatem, privatim opulentiam; luxury and avarice, public want and private wealth abound." Now, as public want, or general poverty, (for in that sense I take it here) will lay numbers of men open to the attacks of corruption; so private wealth will have the same effect, especially where luxury prevails, on some of those, who do not feel the public want; for there is imaginary, as well as real poverty. He, who thought himself rich before, may begin to think himself poor, when he compares his wealth, and the expence he is able to make, with those of men, whom he hath been used to esteem, and perhaps justly, far inferior to himself in all respects. He, who would have been ashamed to participate in fraud, or to yield to corruption, may begin to think the faults venial, when he sees men, who were far below him, rise above him by fraud and by corruption; when he sees them maintain themselves by these means in an elevation, which they could not have acquired, by the contrary virtues, if they had had them. Thus may contraries unite their effect, and poverty and wealth combine to facilitate the means and the progress of corruption. Thus may the great thieves of the nation do more, and less reparable mischief by the practices they introduce, and the examples they set, than by the actual robberies they commit. “Plusque exemplo quam peccato nocent,” to use an expression of TULLY, in one of his books of laws.

MUCH more might be said, concerning the increase of power, which the crown hath acquired and must continue to acquire, according to the present constitution and management of the revenue. Much more might be said to shew that the power of money, as the world is now constituted, is real power, and that all power, without this, is imaginary; that the prince, who gets prerogative alone, gets a phantom; but that he, who gets money, even without prerogative, gets something real, and will be as much stronger than his neighbours, and his people too, as he hath a greater command of money. In fine, a great deal more might be said to shew how much corruption is a more deadly weapon than the highest prerogative, in the hands of men, who are enemies to such a constitution of government as ours is. But I hasten to a conclusion.

IF then a spirit of rapine and venality, of fraud and corruption, continue to diffuse themselves, not only luxury and avarice, but every kind of immorality will follow; and the whole may be improved by such ways as have been sketch'd out, and by others, whenever the nation falls under a bad government; till the prince on the throne shall not be able to say, speaking of his whole people, even that which PHILIP the second said, speaking of the corruption of his own court; "they all take money except MY SELF and SAPENA." Britain will then be in that very condition, in which, and in which alone, her constitution, and her liberty by consequence, may be destroy'd; because the people may, in a state of universal corruption, and will in no other, either suffer others to betray them, or betray themselves. How near a progress we have made towards this state, I determine not. This I say, it is time for every man, who is desirous to preserve the British constitution, and to preserve it secure, and contribute all he can to prevent the ill effects of that new influence and power, which hath gain'd strength in every reign since the revolution ; of those means of corruption, which may be employ'd, one time or other, on the part of the crown, and of that proneness to corruption, on the part of the people, that hath been long growing, and still grows. It may otherwise happen that these causes remaining in force, their effects will become too strong to be check'd, and will ensure the ruin of the best constitution upon earth, whenever the men in power shall think their grandeur, or their safety, concern'd in the ruin of it. We are not expos'd, at present, most certainly to any such contingency ; but the bare possibility of being so is a reason sufficient to awaken, and alarm every honest man. Hath not every such man, indeed, reason to be alarm'd, when he hears the cause of corruption publicly pleaded, and when men are suffer'd, nay paid by some body or other, to plead this unrighteous cause, as if it was that of our most righteous government. Had we lived when the star-chamber tyrannized, and many other extravagant powers were exercis'd, under the authority of the crown, we should have found fault as much as we dared, no doubt, and yet have waited patiently, perhaps, for some favourable opportunity of redressing the grievances. But when we heard these acts of power justify'd as legal and constitutional, and the prerogative, by virtue of which they were done, claim'd as a right in the crown, we should have taken the alarm, I presume, as hot as our predecessors did. Thus, in the case now before us, corruption may have been practis'd in some degree, perhaps, at all times. But then it hath been always kept under by the shame and danger, that attended both the corruptor and the corrupted. It hath been always complain'd of, never defended, and endeavours have been used, from time to time, with general applause, to prevent it. But according to the principles now avow'd, these endeavours were unjust; they ought to be repented of; and the acts made in consequence of them ought to be repeal'd; for the constitutional independency of the crown cannot be supported, unless the crown have the right and the means of taking their independency from the other parts of the legislature, by keeping the members of those assemblies under a pecuniary influence. Let no man think that the absurdity and profligacy of these doctrines secure us against the effect of them. They may soon grow into vogue, and be reputed as sacred truths as any of those falsehoods, that are establish'd by the systems of policy and religion, in many other countries. What can be too absurd, or too profligate, for an absurd, or for a superstitious people?

BUT if we should apprehend the effects of these doctrines as little as we esteem the doctors, who preach them, yet still the alarm is given by them, and it would be stupidity, or somewhat much worse than stupidity, not to take it. We despise the drummers and trumpeters of an enemy's army; (for I resume the allusion, that I apply'd in the first of these discourses) but when we hear the noise of their drums and trumpets, we take the alarm, and conclude the enemy is near. The friends of our constitution therefore are in the right to join issue upon this point with the enemies of it, and to fix upon this principal and real distinction, and difference, the present division of parties; since parties we must have; and since those, which subsisted formerly, are quite extinguish'd, notwithstanding all the wicked endeavours of some men, who can have no merit but party-merit, nor safety but in faction, to revive them. If there was merit, and surely there was great merit, in opposing the assertors of prerogative formerly, when it rose so high as to endanger our liberty; there is great merit in opposing the assertors of corruption now, and in exposing the means, by which this expedient may be improved to the ruin of our constitution, and therefore of our liberty. Nay, the merit is greater in some respects, if corruption be in itself, in its own nature, and in the present circumstances of the nation, and dispositions of the people, more dangerous than prerogative ever was ; and if the means of establishing a government of arbitrary will, by corruption, be more likely to prove effectual, than those of doing it by prerogative ever were. That it should ever become harder to save our country from the effects of corruption, than it was to defeat the efforts of prerogative, God forbid. On the whole matter, a Dissertation upon Parties could not wind itself up more properly, we think, than by shewing that the British constitution of government deserves, above all others, the constant attention, and care to maintain it, of the people, who are so happy as to live under it ; that it may be weaken'd for want of attention, which is a degree of danger ; but that it cannot be destroy'd, unless the peers and the commons (that is, the whole body of the people) unite to destroy it, which is a degree of madness, and such a monstrous iniquity, as nothing but confirm'd and universal corruption can produce ; that since the time, when all our dangers from prerogative ceased, new dangers to this constitution, more silent and less observed, are arisen ; and finally, that as nothing can be more ridiculous than to preserve the nominal division of whig and tory parties, which subsisted before the revolution, tion, when the difference of principles, that could alone make the distinction real, exists no longer; so nothing can be more reasonable than to admit the nominal division of constitutionists and anti-constitutionists, or of a court and a country party, at this time, when an avow'd difference of principles makes this distinction real. That this distinction is real cannot be deny'd, as long as there are men amongst us, who argue for, and who promote even a corrupt dependency of the members of the two houses of parliament on the crown; and others, who maintain that such a dependency of the members takes away the constitutional independency of the two houses, and that, this independency lost, our constitution is a dead letter, and we shall be only in a worse condition by preserving the forms of it.

To reduce therefore our present parties to this single division, our present disputes to this single contest, and to fix our principal attention on this object of danger, too long and too much neglected, hath been and is the sole design of these discourses. The design may have been insufficiently executed; but it is honest; but it is of the last importance; and whatever the enemies of our constitution, who call themselves the friends of the government, may say, to amuse and impose on the weak, ignorant, and trifling part of mankind, the importance of it will be felt every day, and every hour, more and more, till it be felt by every man in Britain. Let us hope, and endeavour by all possible means, that it may not be felt too late; and to encourage the constitutionists, or country party, in this attempt, let us consider from whom an opposition to it is to be expected. Shall it be expected then from those, who have pass'd under the denomination of tories? Certainly not. They feel as much as any men in Britain the preference, that ought to be given to that system of government, which was establish'd by the revolution, and in which they took so great a share, and shew themselves as ready to render that great work, which was left and still continues imperfect, compleat. Shall this opposition be expected from the dissenters? It cannot be. Shall they, who pretend to greater purity than others, become the advocates of corruption? Shall they contribute their endeavours to undermine the best constitution of government they can hope to enjoy, unless they hope to rise on the ruins of it, and to form another on their own model? As religious sects, they deserve indulgence, and they have it; but they are too wise not to see that, as a faction in the state, they would deserve none. In fine, shall this opposition be expected from those, who have been call'd whigs? That too is impossible. Their predecessors asserted the independency

of parliaments, and struggled hard against corruption in former reigns. When the rest of mankind embrace the same principles, and pursue the same ends, shall they renounce one, and run counter to the other? Shall they own themselves against one method of destroying our constitution, but for another; against making kings independent on parliaments by prerogative, but for making parliaments dependent on kings by corruption? Shall they give the enemies of the revolution a plausible pretence to say that nothing more was meant, by them at least, than a change of government, in which they hoped to find their particular and party account? This would be to cast black and odious colours on the revolution, indeed; more black, and more odious than any, that it was in the power of a * vain, forward, turbulent preacher to cast, by his frothy declamations. But the whigs are so far from opposing the endeavours to preserve our constitution, that they co-operate to promote the success of them, and that however personal prejudices, personal partialities, and old habits, that are daily wearing off may be still entertain'd by some amongst them, all the independent men, who pass under that name, unite in the common cause of liberty and their country. It remains therefore that no national party can be form'd in opposition to those, who endeavour to secure the independency of parliaments against the new influence of the crown, and against corruption; nor any strength be exerted, except that of a faction, composed of the refuse of all parties, glean'd up by one, who hath none for him. I would willingly carry this still farther; and, in doing so, I shall not advance a paradox, unless it be supposed, which I think would be a greater paradox, that a man may have abilities to destroy the constitution, and yet not sense enough to see his remote, as well as immediate, his family, as well as personal interest. I say, then, that if a design of raising the power of the crown above any pitch of prerogative, and of reducing parliaments to an absolute dependency, as well as a faction to support this design, be form'd; the very man, who forms such a design, and such a faction, must be infatuated, if he can wish very sincerely his own success. His first design, we are sure, will be that of raising a great family, and heaping upon it riches and honours. Shall his second design be that of rendering these riches and honours precarious and insecure, and of entailing servitude on his own race; for it will be impossible to exempt them from the common calamity? Nothing but despair, (that is, fear void of of hope) arising from a consciousness of guilt, can drive any man into such a design. But, in this case, there will be fear opposed to fear, and one of these fears may be allay'd by hope. The fear of being call'd to a severe account may be mitigated by the hope of escaping. Where is the insolent, rapacious, odious minister, that may not entertain some hope as well as fear, when he sets before his eyes the examples of those, who have gone before him? PALLAS was the favourite of AGRIPPINA. He govern'd like the master of the empire, and supported her pride and ambition by his counsels and services, as he had been raised to power, and was maintain'd in it by her credit, whilst her credit lasted. * NERO dismiss'd him; and, seeing him go from court with a croud at his heels, said pleasantly enough, as if it had been spoken of a dictator, that he went to abdicate. But PALLAS carry'd off the spoils of the empire with him; all scores were quitted between him and the public; and, according to the bargain he had made, he was call'd to no account. Many such examples might be cited to comfort with hope the most guilty minister, who is wise, if not honest enough, to stop in the career of iniquity, before the measure of it be entirely fill'd, press'd down, and running over. But if one of those bubbles of fortune, who thinks he always shall escape, because he always hath escaped, not content to wound a free constitution of government, should resolve to make it expire under his administration; the condition of such an one, however he may flatter himself, or be flatter'd by others, must be ten times more wretched and forlorn than the worst of those, to which his cruelty hath reduced multitudes. For what? If he succeeds in his sacrilegious designs, (they are of as deep a dye, at least) he may hope for impunity, perhaps, to his grey hairs, and be suffer'd to languish thro' the infirmities of old age, with an inward remorse more pungent than any of them; but he is sure to entail servitude on his whole race, and indelible infamy on his memory. If he fails, he misses of that impunity, to which he sacrificed his country; he draws triple vengeance on his own head; and exposes his innocent family to a thousand misfortunes, of which it will not be the least (whether he succeeds, or fails) that they descended from him. But whatever ministers may govern, whatever factions may arise, let the friends of liberty lay aside the groundless distinctions, which are employ'd to amuse and betray them; let them continue to

coalite; let them hold fast their integrity, and support with spirit and perseverance the cause of their country, and they will confirm the good, reclaim the bad, vanquish the incorrigible, and make the British constitution triumph even over CORRUPTION.

I HAVE NOW gone through the task I imposed on myself, and shall only add these few words. There was an engagement taken, in the beginning of these discourses, not to flatter. I have kept this engagement, and have spoken with great freedom; but I hope with the justice and moderation, and decency, that I intended, of persons and of things. This freedom entitles me to expect that no parallels, no innuendos, should be supposed, to carry my sense farther than I have express'd it. The reasonable part of mankind will not disappoint so reasonable an expectation. But there are a set of creatures, who have no mercy on paper, to use an expression of * JUVENAL, and who are ready to answer, even when they are absolute strangers to the subject. Unable to follow a thread of fact and argument, they play with words, and turn and wrest particular passages. They have done mine that honour, as I am told, and have once or twice seen. They may do the same again, whenever they please, secure from any reply,

unless they have sense enough, or their patron for them, to take for a reply the story I find related a little differently in one of the Spectators. The story is this;

A CERTAIN pragmatistical fellow, in a certain village, took it into his head to write the names of the 'squire, of all his family, of the principal parish officers, and of some of the notable members of the vestry, in the margin of the Whole Duty of Man, over-against every sin, which he found mentioned in that most excellent treatise. The clamour was great, and all the neighbourhood was in an uproar. At last, the minister was call'd in, upon this great emergency; a pious and prudent divine, and the same, for aught I know, who was a member of the Spectator's club. He heard them with patience; with so much, that he brought them to talk one after the other. When he had heard them, he pronounced that they were all in the wrong; that the book was written against sins of all kinds, whoever should be guilty of them; but that the innocent would give occasion to unjust suspicions by all this clamour, and that the guilty would convict themselves. They took his advice. The Whole Duty of Man hath been read ever since with much edification, by all the parishoners. The innocent have been most certainly confirm'd in virtue, and we hope the guilty have been reform'd from vice.
